Preface

This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 1997 and July 1997 Multistate Essay Examinations. Each test includes seven questions; jurisdictions that use the MEE select the six questions their applicants will answer.

These model analyses to the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. These models are not an official grading guide. Some states grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses, including the suggested weights given to particular points, as they wish. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topic or topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by Roman numerals which refer to the subject matter outline for that topic. For example, question 1 on the February 1997 MEE tested Decedents' Estates II.A, Execution requirements; II.I, Construction problems. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet and can also be found at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The Multistate Essay Examination is a three-hour examination consisting of six questions. The examination is administered in one continuous three-hour time period. Applicants are expected to spend approximately thirty minutes answering each of the questions. The areas of law covered by the questions in the examination are: Agency and Partnership, Commercial Paper, Conflict of Laws, Corporations, Decedents' Estates, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Sales, Secured Transactions, and Trusts and Future Interests. Some questions include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate in writing effectively

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You will have three hours in which to write your answers to six of the seven questions contained in this booklet; you will be told which of the questions you are to answer. Each question is designed to be answered in thirty minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts which are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show: an understanding of the facts; a recognition of the issues included; the applicable principles of law; and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Some jurisdictions instruct applicants to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

Husband's valid will provides:

I, Husband, leave my entire estate to Wife, or, if she predeceases me, I leave my entire estate in equal shares to my son, Son, and my daughter, Daughter.

Wife's valid will bequeaths her entire estate to Husband. It does not provide for an alternate gift if Husband predeceases her.

Husband and Wife recently died in a fire in their home. The fire was set by Son in his second-floor bedroom at 2:00 a.m. Wife's body was found in her nightclothes in the second-floor bedroom she shared with Husband. Husband's body was found in his nightclothes at the base of the stairs on the first floor of their home with his head facing the front door, his feet toward the upstairs landing, and red marks on his stomach indicating that he had been crawling down the stairs when he had been overcome by smoke.

Husband and Wife were survived by Son and Daughter and by Son's daughter, Granddaughter.

Son claims the fire was set inadvertently when a cigarette he was smoking in bed dropped to the mattress, causing it to ignite. The fire marshal has found traces of a combustible substance on the premises, suggesting the possibility that the fire may have been set intentionally. The local prosecutors, however, have declined to seek an indictment because, although the available evidence indicates that it is more likely than not that Son intentionally set the fire, the evidence is insufficient to support a criminal conviction.

The intestate succession statute of this jurisdiction provides that a decedent's surviving spouse is his or her sole heir. If there is no surviving spouse, the decedent's issue take the estate per stirpes. This jurisdiction also has enacted the Uniform Simultaneous Death Act.

1. To whom should Husband's estate be distributed? Explain.
2. To whom should Wife's estate be distributed? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Four years ago, Father and Mother began living together in Mother's house in a state that does not allow common-law marriage. They never married and they never discussed marriage. Father soon took over appointment-making and bookkeeping for Mother's veterinary practice. Mother asked Father to quit touring with his musical group and to stay home to help her with the practice and care for the home and their pets. "It would make our lives less hectic, and I'll share what I'm making with you," she said. He agreed. Mother did not pay Father a salary for helping her with her veterinary practice or for his housekeeping services.

Twenty months ago, Mother gave birth to Daughter, who is Father's biological child. Mother stayed at home with Daughter for six weeks and then went back to work, leaving Daughter in Father's full-time care.

Ten months ago, Mother told Father that she no longer loved him, and she demanded that he move out. He did so. Within a few weeks Mother married Stepfather, with whom she and Daughter now live. Father made no attempt to see Daughter after he moved out of Mother's house, and he has not paid or offered to pay child support.

Father has learned that a trial court recently entered a decree allowing Stepfather to adopt Daughter. The governing statute provides that notice of adoption proceedings must be given to unmarried fathers only if they have filed a declaration of paternity with the Bureau of Vital Statistics or if, within the six months preceding filing of the motion, they have lived with the child or offered to support the child. Since Father satisfied none of these criteria, he did not receive notice of the adoption proceeding.

1. If Father moves to set aside the adoption of Daughter on the ground that failure to give him notice of the proceeding violates due process, should the court grant the motion? Explain.
2. If the adoption decree is not set aside, may a court order that Father be allowed to visit Daughter over the objections of Mother and Stepfather? Explain.
3. Upon what theories, if any, may Father be entitled to a share of the property that Mother acquired between the time she asked him to quit traveling and stay home and the time he moved out of the house? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

Debtor manufactures widgets. On May 3, 1996, Lender loaned Debtor $ 100,000 for general operating expenses. That same day, Lender filed a valid financing statement, signed by Debtor, in the proper UCC filing offices. The financing statement covered all widget machines owned by Debtor, “including after-acquired widget machines.” On that date, May 3, Debtor owned just one widget machine, Machine No. 1, which was worth $50,000. No security agreement was signed at that time.

On May 13, 1996, a second lender, Bank, loaned Debtor an additional $100,000 for general operating expenses. On the same day, Debtor signed a valid security agreement that granted Bank a security interest in “all widget machines, now owned or hereafter acquired by Debtor.” Debtor also signed a valid financing statement which covered all widget machines owned by Debtor, “including after-acquired widget machines.” That day, Bank filed the financing statement in the proper UCC filing offices. At that point, Debtor still owned just one widget machine, Machine No. 1.

On May 16, 1996, a third lender, CreditCo, loaned Debtor an additional $50,000 to purchase a second widget machine, Machine No. 2. On that day, Debtor signed a valid security agreement that granted CreditCo a security interest in Machine No. 2. Debtor used the proceeds of CreditCo’s loan to purchase Machine No. 2 for $50,000 on the next day, May 17. Debtor, however, did not receive possession of Machine No. 2 until May 28. On May 31, CreditCo filed a valid financing statement that covered Machine No. 2, signed by Debtor, in the proper UCC filing offices.

Meanwhile, on May 29, 1996, Lender discovered that it had forgotten to have Debtor sign a security agreement for the May 3 loan. Later that day, May 29, Lender got Debtor to sign a security agreement in which Debtor granted to Lender a security interest in all of Debtor’s widget machines, “including after-acquired widget machines.” On that date, May 29, Debtor owned both widget machines, Machine No. 1 and Machine No. 2, each of which was worth $50,000.

Debtor subsequently defaulted on all three loans. Shortly after the default, but before any of Debtor’s creditors took steps to repossess the widget machines, Debtor sold Machine No. 2 to WidgetCo, another widget manufacturer, for $25,000. WidgetCo purchased the machine in good faith and had no actual knowledge that Machine No. 2 was covered by a security interest.

1. As between Lender and Bank, whose security interest has first priority as to Machine No. 1? Explain.
2. As among Lender, Bank, and CreditCo, whose security interest has first priority as to Machine No. 2? Explain.
3. Can the secured party with priority recover Machine No. 2 from the purchaser, WidgetCo? Explain

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP/CORPORATIONS QUESTION

Wareco is a corporation that operates a small commercial storage warehouse. Pres is the president of Wareco and Sec is the secretary of Wareco. Both Pres and Sec regularly attend board meetings, although neither of them is a director or shareholder of Wareco. At a January 1 board meeting, the Wareco board of directors passed a resolution stating that the president of the corporation may not enter into any contract for over $ 1 million without the express prior approval of the board of directors.

On February 1, Pres signed a contract as president of Wareco providing that Wareco would purchase a fleet of 50 trucks from Able, Wareco's usual supplier of trucks. The purchase price specified in the contract was $20 million. Able was unaware that the board of directors of Wareco had never approved this transaction, but he did know that Wareco had never owned more than five trucks at any one time. On February 2, the board learned of the contract with Able and immediately repudiated it.

On March 1, Pres proposed to the board of directors of Wareco that the corporation purchase a forklift from Beta. Forklifts are essential to Wareco's business and it owns several of them. Because the board did not believe Wareco needed an additional forklift, it passed a resolution disapproving the proposed purchase. Nevertheless, without the board's knowledge, on March 5, Pres signed a contract as president of Wareco to purchase a forklift from Beta for $2,000. Beta had no knowledge of the board's disapproval. On March 6, the board learned of the contract with Beta and immediately repudiated it.

On April 1, Pres signed a contract as president of Wareco providing that Wareco would purchase a herd of cattle from Rancher for $2 million. Sec, as secretary of Wareco, signed and delivered a document certifying to Rancher that the Wareco board of directors had earlier approved the execution of this contract by Pres in a resolution validly passed at a duly called meeting of the board. Sec attached a copy of the text of the resolution to the certificate. Sec frequently signed such certificates as part of Sec's duties as secretary. In fact, the execution of this contract had not been approved at a board meeting, but instead was previously approved without a meeting by a consent resolution signed by four of the five members of the Wareco board of directors. Rancher was unaware that Sec's certificate was incorrect. On April 2, the board learned of the contract with Rancher and immediately repudiated it.

1. Can Able recover damages from Wareco? From Pres? Explain.
2. Can Beta recover damages from Wareco, and, if so, does Wareco have a cause of action against Pres? Explain.
3. Can Rancher recover damages from Wareco? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE/CONFLICT OF LAWS QUESTION

Ten years ago, a valuable painting by an old master was stolen from Museum, a nonprofit organization incorporated and located in State X. At the time of the theft, the painting was worth approximately $800,000. Today it is worth several million dollars. Police investigated the theft, but no suspects were identified. Museum made diligent efforts to locate the painting, but it was never recovered.

Two days ago, on Wednesday, Museum Director learned from a friend in the art business that the stolen painting had surfaced in the hands of Collector, a resident and citizen of State Y. Museum Director's friend told him that Collector plans to sell the painting to an art dealer from Germany; that the sale is scheduled to take place tomorrow, on Saturday, at Collector's home in State Y; and that the German dealer has airplane tickets back to Germany shortly after the scheduled sale.

Museum's lawyer prepared a civil action against Collector to recover possession of the painting. This morning (Friday), the verified complaint in that civil action was filed in federal district court in State Y, properly invoking the diversity jurisdiction of the court. Museum simultaneously filed a motion asking the federal district court to restrain Collector's sale of the painting.

Both the verified complaint and the motion allege (among other things) that Museum owns the painting; that it was stolen; that Collector now has possession of it; that the painting is a priceless example of Renaissance artwork; that it was the centerpiece of Museum's collection before its theft; that Museum believes on the basis of reliable information that Collector plans to sell the painting to a foreign purchaser; and that Museum will suffer irreparable injury if the painting is sold and taken out of the country. The motion is also supported by an affidavit, based upon Museum Director's personal knowledge, detailing the difficulty Museum would have in recovering the painting if it left the country.

A separate affidavit by Museum's attorney states that several efforts have been made to locate Collector at his home and office in order to serve process and a copy of the motion, but that those efforts have failed, and that the location of Collector is unknown. Collector is, however, expected to be at his home to consummate the sale of the painting on Saturday morning, and Museum plans to have both the summons and the requested restraining order served on Collector at that time. Museum has filed with its motion a properly secured bond in an amount adequate to reimburse Collector for costs and damages that might result if Collector is wrongfully restrained.

The State Y statute of limitations for a civil action to recover possession of personal property has run. State X has a 15-year statute of limitations for art theft cases, included as part of a law that created a cause of action specifically for recovery of stolen art objects. This statute of limitations has not run.

1. May the federal district court issue an order restraining the sale of the painting before Collector has been served with process or given notice of the motion to restrain the sale? Explain.
2. If the court issues a restraining order and it is properly served on Collector (together with copies of the summons and complaint), will the order remain in effect until there can be a trial on the merits of the civil action, or must Museum take further steps to continue the restraint on Collector pending such trial? Explain.

3. Will the federal district court apply State Y's statute of limitations, thus barring the cause of action created by the law of State X? Explain.

COMMERCIAL PAPER QUESTION

Software, Inc., applied to Bank for a $250,000 loan to finance an expansion of its business. Bank was unwilling to make the loan unless Investor, an independently wealthy businessman with a substantial stock interest in Software, agreed to co-sign the loan. Despite the fact that he held stock in Software, Investor played no role in managing the company and did not serve on its board of directors.

Software's chief executive officer (CEO) asked Investor to co-sign the loan. After studying Software's expansion plans, Investor urged CEO to seek a $500,000 loan, arguing that $250,000 was not enough to finance fully the proposed expansion. CEO, however, was adamantly opposed to incurring any debt beyond $250,000 and refused to consider seeking a larger loan. Nonetheless, Investor agreed to talk further with Bank about co-signing the loan.

In separate negotiations with Bank, to which neither CEO nor Software was party, Investor explained his belief that a $500,000 loan was necessary to finance the proposed expansion and indicated his unwillingness to co-sign a loan for $250,000, which he felt would prove inadequate. Investor agreed to co-sign the $250,000 loan on condition that Bank agree to lend Software an additional $250,000 within six months, if necessary to complete the project. Bank agreed and wrote a letter to Investor to that effect. This agreement and letter were not disclosed to Software or CEO.

On January 15, Bank made Software a $250,000 loan with a due date of November 1. A negotiable promissory note was signed both by CEO on behalf of Software and by Investor personally. Software and Investor were designated co-makers on the note.

Within three months, Software had spent the full $250,000 and had still not completed the expansion project. Software approached Bank about a second loan for $250,000. Bank, fearful that Software was in a shaky financial situation, refused the second loan. As a result, Software was unable to complete the expansion project.

When the $250,000 loan came due on November 1, Investor told Software of the secret agreement between Investor and Bank. Both Software and Investor refused to pay Bank. After several requests for payment, Bank sold the overdue note to Collection Agency for $ 150,000. Bank endorsed the note and transferred it to Collection Agency on December 15.

Collection Agency has now sued both Software and Investor seeking payment of the note. State law permits the introduction of evidence of contemporaneous or previous agreements in suits for breach of contract.

What are the rights and liabilities of Investor, Software, and Collection Agency on the note? Explain.

TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS/DECEDENTS' ESTATES/ FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Husband, a freelance writer, and Wife, a successful attorney, divorced amicably after ten years of marriage. Their separation agreement, which was merged into their divorce decree, gave Husband custody of their child, Son, who is now eight years old. The decree required Wife to (1) pay $800 monthly to Husband for child support until Son reached age 18, (2) set aside $5,000 annually for ten years to finance Son's college education, and (3) transfer $20,000 annually to Husband during each of the following five years to compensate Husband for his financial contributions toward supporting the family during the marriage while Wife earned her law degree.

One year after the divorce, Wife married New Husband. Two days after they married, Wife executed a valid will leaving her entire estate to New Husband. One year later, she and New Husband had a child, Daughter. Wife died unexpectedly a week after Daughter was born.

In each of the two years immediately following her divorce from Husband, Wife had deposited $5,000 into a savings account in her name alone at Bank. Wife made only one withdrawal from this account, taking out $ 1,200 just one month before she died.

Although Wife had paid child support to Husband for the two years immediately before her death, she had made only one $20,000 payment to Husband before she died.

Wife owned $500,000 at her death, including the savings account at Bank. New Husband claims Wife's entire estate under her will.

1. Does Wife's obligation under the divorce decree to support Son survive Wife's death? Explain.
2. On what theory could Son make a specific claim to the Bank savings account, and would such a claim be likely to succeed? Explain.
3. Is Wife's estate obligated to pay Husband the unpaid amounts Wife owed him for his financial contributions toward supporting the family while she earned her law degree? Explain.
4. Do Son and Daughter have any other claims to any share of Wife's estate, and, if so, will they succeed? Explain.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

Laura, Tammy, and Sam agreed to open Central Subs, a fast food delicatessen. They each invested $ 10,000 in Central Subs for its initial expenses, and they agreed that Sam would manage the business and purchase supplies, although the approval of Laura and Tammy would be required for all expenditures over $500. Finally, they agreed that Central Subs' profits and losses would be shared equally among them.

As part of Central Subs' grand opening, promotional flyers were distributed that pictured Sam, Laura, and Tammy and identified them as the owners of the business.

Sam worked hard managing the store. However, one day when Sam was cleaning the bathroom, he negligently left water on the floor, and Karly, a customer, slipped and fell, severely injuring herself. Karly sued Central Subs and the three investors individually, claiming they were responsible for the injuries she had incurred. She demanded $100,000 in damages.

Several weeks later, the store ran out of luncheon meats. Without consulting anyone, Sam walked into Meatco, a nearby butcher shop, and ordered $600 worth of meat. Although Meatco was not the shop where Central Subs usually did business, Meatco agreed to sell Sam the meat on credit when Meatco's owner recognized Sam from the Central Subs promotional flyer.

After several months of operation, Central Subs' business was not profitable, and Laura and Tammy blamed it on Sam's poor management of the store. At the next meeting of the investors, Laura and Tammy told Sam that they were closing down the business and that his job at the store was terminated. They also told him to return to the store after the meeting to drop off all of Central Subs' property. They also refused to pay Meatco's bill, claiming that Sam had exceeded his authority by making the purchase without their approval.

Immediately after the meeting, while he was driving back to the store to drop off Central Subs' property, Sam negligently ran over Pat, a pedestrian, causing Pat serious physical harm. Pat filed suit against Central Subs and the three investors individually for tort damages. Meatco also filed suit against Central Subs and the three investors individually for the amount of its unpaid bill.

Can Karly, Meatco, and Pat each recover from Central Subs? Explain. From the investors individually? Explain.

TRUSTS QUESTION

In 1980, Smith, a graduate of Education College, created the Smith Trust, naming himself as Trustee. Under the terms of the Smith Trust, all income was to be used to “provide four-year full scholarships for deserving children of Smith Corporation employees to attend Education College.” The Smith Trust also provided that “if, for any reason, Education College should cease operations as a four-year college, the trust shall terminate and the trust property shall revert to Smith.” Smith reserved the power to revoke and amend this trust. Smith Corporation employs 15,000 people.

In 1994, Testator, also a graduate of Education College, and a resident of Smalltown, executed a will leaving $300,000 to Testator’s child, Able. Testator’s will also provided:

My child, Able, has been well provided for, and I do not want to discourage him from becoming a useful and productive citizen by leaving him more. For that reason, and because I have seen firsthand the tremendous benefits that Education College provides to people of diverse backgrounds, I give my residuary estate to the Trustee of the Smith Trust, as the same is amended from time to time, to be held and disposed of as part of the principal of the Smith Trust.

In 1995, Smith amended the terms of the Smith Trust to limit scholarships to “Presbyterian children of Smith Corporation employees,” rather than “deserving children of Smith Corporation employees.”

Three months later, Smith died intestate survived by only one child, Harry. Bank became successor trustee of the Smith trust.

On September 1, 1996, Education College closed permanently because of a lack of resources. One month later, Testator died leaving an estate of $2 million. Able was Testator’s only heir.

Harry claims that the Smith Trust terminated upon the closing of Education College and that Harry is entitled to the property Smith transferred to this trust.

Able claims that Testator’s residuary bequest to the Trustee of the Smith Trust fails and that Able is entitled to this bequest. As successor trustee, Bank claims that the Smith Trust is entitled to Testator’s residuary estate in accordance with the terms of Testator’s will. The Smalltown Civic Corporation, a local nonprofit corporation that annually awards $5,000 scholarships to high-ranking Smalltown High School graduates, also claims that it is entitled to Testator’s residuary estate. It proposes to use the income from the bequest to award additional scholarships to high school graduates of diverse backgrounds.

1. Is Harry entitled to the property Smith transferred to the Smith Trust? Explain.
2. To whom should Testator’s estate be distributed? Explain.

COMMERCIAL PAPER/SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

On August 1, Alice sold her piano to Bart. In addition to a down payment, Bart gave Alice a negotiable note for $2,000 payable on demand to the order of Alice. On August 5, Alice asked to borrow $2,500 from Cathy. Cathy agreed, but she insisted as a condition of the loan that the loan be secured by Bart's $2,000 note. Alice signed an agreement that granted Cathy a security interest in Bart's note and promised to deliver the note to Cathy in the next week or so. Cathy delivered the $2,500 to Alice that same day but did nothing further to perfect Cathy's interest in Bart's note.

On August 9, through no fault of Alice, Dan stole the note. Alice had already signed her name, and nothing more, on the back of the note. Dan wrote his own signature beneath Alice's. Dan then sold the note for $ 1,900 to Edwin, who had no way of knowing how Dan had acquired the note. On August 15, Edwin brought the note to Bart and presented it to him for payment. Bart refused to pay Edwin because the piano Alice had sold him turned out to be worthless. Also on August 15, Cathy learned that Edwin had the note and demanded that Edwin turn it over to her.

1. Can Edwin successfully enforce the note against Bart? Explain.
2. Is Cathy's claim to the note superior to Edwin's claim? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Al and Bonnie were graduate students at State University. They rented a house together, and each paid half the rent and utilities. They had separate bedrooms and shared the kitchen, bath, and living room. They usually prepared and ate their evening meals together. They were good friends but not lovers.

Six months ago, Al, who was a foreign student in the United States on a student visa, lost financial support for his research and contemplated quitting school temporarily in order to work. However, he knew that if he quit school he would lose his student visa. He explained his plight to Bonnie and asked if she would go through a marriage ceremony with him but not otherwise change the way they had been living. He believed this would entitle him to remain in the country as the spouse of a U.S. citizen even though he was not in school. Bonnie agreed on condition that they sign an agreement providing that they would (1) divorce whenever either wanted, (2) be free to come and go and associate with whom they pleased, and (3) not be responsible for each other's school and other debts. Al agreed, and both signed the agreement.

Four months ago, Al and Bonnie obtained a marriage license and participated in a marriage ceremony before a judge at city hall. Thereafter they continued to live as housemates as they had before.

Two weeks ago, Al was seriously injured in an automobile accident. He was brought, unconscious, to Hospital's emergency room, where doctors immediately performed surgery in an attempt to save his life. However, Al died without ever regaining consciousness. The course of treatment the doctors chose was appropriate under the circumstances. At some point, Hospital personnel found a card in Al's wallet that identified Bonnie as his wife and named her as the person to notify in an emergency. They called her, but she arrived at Hospital after he died. At Hospital, she openly grieved for him.

Some time later, Hospital's business office called to ask Bonnie about paying for Al's care, but Bonnie replied that she was "not really Al's wife" and was "not responsible for his debts." Al did not have medical insurance. Hospital has billed Bonnie for the costs of Al's care.

Is Bonnie liable for the payment of Hospital's bill for Al's care? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

State C has recently enacted an “Unfair Trade Practices Act” (UTPA), the key provision of which reads:

No person shall engage in an unfair method of competition or an unfair act or practice in the conduct of any trade or business.

The Act further provides a private right of action for “any individual who suffers an ascertainable monetary loss” as a result of conduct that violates the UTPA.

Acme is an auto liability insurance corporation incorporated under the laws of State A, with its principal place of business in State B. Acme engages in the insurance business in most states in the United States, including State C. Concerned about the size of jury verdicts in personal injury cases tried in State C courts, Acme ran full-page ads in all major newspapers in State C criticizing as grossly excessive the verdicts being returned by State C jurors. In the ads, Acme urged those who were to be jurors in the future to take into account in their deliberations the impact their verdicts would have on their own liability insurance premiums.

Parker is the plaintiff in a major personal injury case soon to be tried in a State C court. Parker, who is not insured by Acme, considers Acme’s ad campaign to be a form of “unfair act or practice” in violation of the UTPA. Consequently, Parker has filed an action for $500,000 in damages against Acme in the United States District Court for State C, invoking diversity jurisdiction. At the time this suit was filed, Parker was a citizen of State C. However, one month after the suit was filed, and one week before Acme was served with the summons and complaint, Parker moved his permanent residence to State B, where he now resides.

Acme has simultaneously filed two motions. The first is a motion to dismiss Parker’s suit for lack of jurisdiction over the subject matter on the grounds that: (1) Parker, a citizen of State C on the date suit was filed, was not eligible to file a diversity case in a federal court located in the state where Parker was then domiciled; and (2) even if there were diversity jurisdiction at the time the suit was filed, it has been divested by Parker’s change of domicile to State B.

Acme’s second motion asks the federal district court to stay further proceedings in the case on the ground that it has raised the following defenses: (1) the legislative history of the UTPA reveals that the private right of action it confers is available only to competitors or customers of the one allegedly violating the Act; (2) Acme’s ad campaign is not an “unfair act or practice” within the meaning of the UTPA; and (3) if the UTPA is interpreted to prohibit Acme’s ad campaign, the Act violates the free speech provisions of the United States Constitution. Acme argues that the federal district court should postpone deciding these issues because a State C trial court has recently dismissed an action brought under the UTPA because the plaintiff in that action was neither a customer nor a competitor of the defendant in that case. An appeal from that ruling has been accepted by the State C Supreme Court.

1. How should the federal district court rule on the motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction? Explain.
2. How should the federal district court rule on the motion to stay the case? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

Chempro is a closely-held chemical company incorporated in State F. In addition to a number of smaller shareholders, Chempro has five principal shareholders each of whom owns 15% of the shares: Paula, who is Chempro's Chief Executive Officer and Chairwoman of the Board; and Lawrence, Alan, Bruce, and Charles, who are also officers and directors of Chempro. Although each is an officer of Chempro, none of the five principal shareholders has an employment contract with the company.

The five shareholders signed a valid, enforceable shareholders' agreement requiring all of them to vote to elect each other as directors of Chempro.

For many years, Chempro's business prospered, and its value increased substantially. However, Lawrence recently became aware that Paula was diverting corporate funds into her personal bank account. Shortly after his discovery, Lawrence took Paula aside, confronted her with evidence of her wrongdoing from the company's files, and demanded that she repay the funds to Chempro. Paula responded by calling a board of directors' meeting to discuss dismissing Lawrence from the board of directors and firing Lawrence from his position as an officer of Chempro. Paula also immediately removed all of the incriminating files from Lawrence's office.

At the board meeting, Paula claimed that Lawrence had been taking corporate funds and using them for personal reasons. Lawrence responded that Paula was lying and that, in fact, Paula was the responsible party. Lawrence also told the board that he had documents to prove his story but that they had recently been stolen from his office. Without further investigation, Paula and the remaining board members, Alan, Bruce, and Charles, all of whom never really liked Lawrence, voted to remove Lawrence as both an officer and a director of Chempro. Lawrence dissented.

The State F corporate code and Chempro's articles of incorporation and by-laws permit directors and officers to be removed by the board without cause.

1. What claims, if any, does Lawrence have against Chempro, Paula, Alan, Bruce, and/or Charles in Lawrence's capacity as:
 - a) A director? Explain.
 - b) An officer? Explain.
 - c) A shareholder? Explain.
2. Are Lawrence's claims derivative or direct, and, as to any derivative claims, are there any procedural prerequisites he must satisfy before filing the derivative claims in court? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

Decedent recently died, owning a bank account at First Bank registered in the name of "Decedent in trust for Grandchild." At her death, the balance in this account was $15,000. Decedent had made all the deposits into this account.

Decedent was also a co-owner of an account at Second Bank, registered in the name of "Decedent and Son, as joint tenants with right of survivorship." Only Decedent had made deposits into this account, It had is balance of 520,000 at her death. Decedent had opened this account three year; before she died, near the time that she sold the family home and moved into Son's home rather than a nursing home. At the time Decedent opened this account, the Second Bank bank officer told her that "a joint account is an ideal way to let Son draw on the account in case you need to reach the money you have put into it."

Three weeks before she-died, Decedent typed a Letter to Friend, who lived in another state. The letter said: "I haven't been feeling well lately. I give you my diamond ring to remember me by. It's yours, but Son would be upset if he learned I had given it to you, and so I'll hold onto it for you. When I die, bring this letter to him and get it." Decedent signed and immediately mailed the letter to Friend, who received it the next day. The ring, which was found among Decedent's personal effects, was valued at $5,000.

Decedent died indebted and with only the foregoing assets. Her creditors claim that the two bank accounts and the ring must be used to satisfy their claims against her estate.

Are the two bank accounts and diamond ring available for payment of the creditors' claims? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES ANALYSIS

(Decedents' Estates II.A, II.I)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did Husband and Wife die simultaneously, or is the evidence sufficient to establish that Husband survived Wife?
- (2) Is Son barred from inheriting from his parents because he caused the fire that resulted in their death?
- (3) If Son is barred from inheriting from his parents because he feloniously and intentionally took the lives of his parents, to whom should the shares that he would have received from their estates pass?

DISCUSSION

The distribution of the estates of Husband and Wife depends on whether each is treated as having survived the other (see Point One), on whether Son is barred from inheriting from his parents because he set the fire that killed them (see Point Two), and, depending on the resolution of these issues, on whether the share of a residuary legatee who is disqualified from taking passes to the other residuary legatees (see Point Three).

Point One (35-45%)

Under the original Uniform Simultaneous Death Act Husband and Wife would probably not be treated as having died simultaneously. Instead, Husband would probably be treated as having survived Wife. However, under the revised version of the Act and the Uniform Probate Code, Husband would be treated as having predeceased Wife because he did not survive her by 120 hours.

The original version of the Uniform Simultaneous Death Act provides that:

Where the title to property or the devolution thereof depends upon priority of death and there is no sufficient evidence that the persons have died otherwise than simultaneously, the property of each person shall be disposed of as if he had survived, (emphasis added)

The Act was revised in 1991 to provide that, even if there is sufficient evidence to establish that a beneficiary named in the will in fact survived the testator, a beneficiary is only treated as having survived the testator if there is clear and convincing evidence that he or she survived the testator by 120 hours. See Rev. Unif. Simultaneous Death Act, § 2 (1993). The Uniform Probate Code also treats a beneficiary who does not survive the testator by at least 120 hours as having predeceased the testator. Unif. Prob. Code. §§ 2-104; 2-702.

Under the original Act, a jury might conclude that there was sufficient evidence to establish that Husband in fact survived Wife, even though both died in the fire. Evidence supporting that conclusion includes: (1) the fire was started on the second floor of the home; (2) the spouses were apparently in bed when the fire occurred, based upon the time of the fire and the fact that both spouses were in their bedclothes; and (3) Wife was found in the second-floor bedroom while Husband was found on the first floor at the bottom of the stairs, suggesting that both of them attempted to exit the room but that Wife was overcome by smoke before she could reach the stairs. This implies that she died before she could get out of the bedroom whereas he was able to get out of the bedroom and crawl down to the first floor, as evidenced by the position of his body and the marks on his body.

Of course, if the revised Act or the Uniform Probate Code applied, Husband would be treated as having predeceased Wife. Although he may have survived her for some brief period of time, he did not survive her by 120 hours (5 days).

Because Wife did not in fact survive Husband, for purposes of distributing Husband's estate she would not be treated as having survived him under either version of the simultaneous death act. Therefore, Husband's estate passes in equal shares to Son and Daughter, as provided in Husband's will, unless Son is prevented from inheriting (see Point Two).

If Husband is treated as having survived Wife for purposes of distributing Wife's estate, the estate passes to Husband under her will, and it then passes to the successors of Husband's estate. On the other hand, if Husband is treated as not having survived Wife, Wife's estate passes by intestate succession to her heirs because her will did not provide who would take her estate if Husband predeceased her, and antilapse statutes generally do not save gifts to the spouse who dies before the testator. See Unif. Prob. Code § 2-603(b). Wife's heirs would be her children, Daughter and Son, unless, as discussed in Point Two, Son is barred from inheriting.

Point Two (35-45%)

Whether Son is barred from inheriting from his parents because he caused the fire that resulted in their deaths depends upon whether the probate court would conclude that he feloniously and intentionally took the lives of his parents. If so, he would be barred from inheriting. If not, he would be entitled to claim as heir or devisee from his parents.

Under the Uniform Probate Code and most modern cases, a person who feloniously and intentionally kills a decedent is barred from claiming a share of the decedent's estate as either heir or beneficiary under the decedent's will. Unif. Prob. Code § 2-803; William M. McGovern Jr., Sheldon F. Kurtz, & Jan E. Rein, Wills, Trusts and Estates § 2.4 at 72 (1988). In a few states only murderers are disqualified, and in a few states all felonious killers are disqualified. McGovern et al. at 72. Generally, the decedent's estate is then disposed of as if the killer had predeceased the decedent. Id.

A conviction of felonious and intentional homicide conclusively establishes that the killer feloniously and intentionally killed the decedent, for purposes of the probate proceedings. See Unif. Prob. Code § 2-803(g). In some states inheritance is barred only if there has been a conviction. In most states, if there has been no conviction, the court having jurisdiction over the decedent's estate must determine whether a preponderance of evidence supports the conclusion that the alleged killer feloniously and intentionally took the life of the decedent. Id. Some states, however, use a clear and convincing standard, rather than a preponderance of the evidence standard. See, e.g., Estate of Safran, 102 Wis.2d 79,306 N.W.2d 27 (1981). See generally McGovern et al. at §2.4 at 73-74.

In some states where there is no slayer statute, courts apply the equitable principle that a wrongdoer cannot profit from his own wrong to prevent the killer from inheriting. In such states, the court is likely to hold that the killer succeeds to the property of the deceased victim but holds it as constructive trustee for others. See, e.g., Estate of Mahoney, 126 Vt. 31,220 A.2d475 (1966). The facts say that there is sufficient evidence to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that Son intentionally set the fire. If the jurisdiction uses this standard of proof, Son would be barred from taking his parents' estates, and they would be distributed as discussed in Point Three.

If Son is not barred from inheriting from his parents, their estates pass to him and Daughter as described at the end of Point One.

Point Three (15-25%)

If Son is barred from inheriting from Wife, her estate passes to her heirs—Granddaughter and Daughter. If Son is barred from inheriting from Husband, his one-half share passes to Granddaughter.

Wife's estate: As noted above, if Husband is treated as having survived Wife, he takes her entire estate under the terms of her last will, and it will be distributed to those entitled to take his estate. If he is treated as having predeceased her, her estate passes to her heirs, Son and Daughter, unless Son is barred from inheriting from Wife. The bequest to Husband is not saved by a lapse statute because those statutes do not apply to bequests to spouses. If Son is barred, he is treated as having predeceased Wife. Unif. Prob. Code § 2-803(b) and § 2-801(d)(1). Under intestate succession statutes, Son's child Granddaughter takes by right of representation the one-half share Son would have taken. Unif. Prob. Code § 2-103(1).

Husband's estate: As noted above, if Husband is treated as having survived Wife, his estate passes to the beneficiaries named in his will, Son and Daughter, unless Son is barred from inheriting Husband's estate. If Son is barred, the question arises whether Son's one-half share passes to Granddaughter, Son's child, or to Daughter, the other beneficiary named in Husband's will. As noted above, when a person is barred from inheriting because he feloniously and intentionally killed another, the victim's estate passes as if the killer predeceased the victim. See Unif. Prob. Code § 2-803(b) and § 2-801 (d)(1).

The argument for Granddaughter is that Husband's will did not expressly condition the gift to Son and Daughter on survivorship and that his will did not provide that the share of either who predeceased him should pass to the survivor. Furthermore, under the typical state antilapse statute, the share of any deceased beneficiary, such as Son, passes to that beneficiary's surviving issue unless the will otherwise provides. See Uniform Probate Code § 2-603(b). Under this analysis, Son's one-half share passes to Granddaughter.

Daughter, however, might argue that Son's one-half share passes to her under the "residue of a residue" rule. Under this rule, a residuary bequest that fails to take effect ordinarily passes to the surviving residuary legatee. See Unif. Prob. Code § 2-604(b). If the analysis ends there, Daughter takes all of Husband's estate. However, under the Uniform Probate Code, Granddaughter would take the share that Son would have taken, because Unif. Prob. Code § 2-604(a) provides that the antilapse statute prevails over the rule regarding multiple residuary legatees.

FAMILY LAW ANALYSIS

(Family Law V.A, V.B, VII.C, VII.D)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is a statute consistent with the due process clause if it allows a child born out of marriage to be adopted without the consent of the biological father who at one time lived with and provided full-time care for the child but who has not filed with a putative father registry or lived with or supported the child within the six months immediately preceding filing of the adoption petition?
- (2) Does a court have authority to order visitation for a biological parent after that parent's rights have been terminated by the child's adoption by a stepparent?
- (3) Upon what theories may an unmarried cohabitant be entitled to a share of property acquired during the period of cohabitation after the relationship has ended?

DISCUSSION

Point One (35-45%)

An adoption statute is probably unconstitutional if it does not require actual notice to an unwed father who has lived with and formed a substantial relationship with his child, even though he did not file with a putative father registry or live with or support the child during the six months before the adoption petition was filed.

The United States Supreme Court has held that parental rights are fundamental rights protected by the Constitution. Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745 (1982); Lassiter v. Dept. of Social Services, 452 U.S. 18 (1981). While the Supreme Court has never decided a case about the substantive showing that must be made to justify terminating parental rights, it can reasonably be inferred that heightened scrutiny would be used, since the Court has subjected actions limiting parental care and custody to heightened scrutiny. See, e.g., Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972); see also Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977).

If the court finds that Father is entitled to the constitutional rights of a parent, the statute will almost certainly be held unconstitutional because it does not require that he receive notice of the adoption proceedings. The state's interests in facilitating the adoption of children and in expeditious hearings are valid, but the means chosen here completely foreclose a parent from being heard on the merits. See Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645 (1972), (unwed father who was accorded full parental status was denied procedural due process when he was not given notice of legal proceedings to determine the custody of his children).

The critical question raised here is whether Father, the biological unwed father, has a constitutionally protected interest. Father will rely on Stanley and Caban v. Mohammed, 441 U.S. 380 (1979), to argue that he does. In Caban, the Court found that an unwed father had such an interest. It also held that a statute which protected his relationship to his children less than it protected their relationship to their mother violated the equal protection clause.

Mother, on the other hand, will rely on Lehr v. Robertson, 463 U.S. 248 (1983), which upheld, against due process and equal protection challenges, a statute which allowed a child born outside of marriage to be adopted without actual notice to a known biological father who did not satisfy a limited set of criteria for receiving notice. The Court said, “The possibility that he may have failed to [file with a putative father registry, which would have entitled him to notice under the statute] because of his ignorance of the law cannot be a sufficient reason for criticizing the law itself. The New York legislature concluded that a more open-ended notice requirement would merely complicate the adoption process, threaten the privacy interests of unwed mothers, create the risk of unnecessary controversy, and impair the desired finality of adoption decrees.” Based on this reading of Lehr, Mother would argue that the statute here is constitutional as applied to Father because he could have filed a declaration of paternity and assured himself of receiving notice of petitions to adopt Daughter.

Father can distinguish Lehr on the basis that the father and child in that case had never lived together and had never developed any kind of a relationship. The Lehr court specifically said, “[W]e are not assessing the procedures for terminating a developed relationship.” In this case, Father had fully assumed the responsibilities of fatherhood and had developed a substantial relationship with Daughter before Mother interfered with it. Therefore, he might successfully argue under Stanley and Caban that at a minimum he was entitled to notice of the adoption proceeding so that he had an opportunity to protect his legal relationship with Daughter. See generally Elizabeth Buchanan, The Constitutional Rights of Unwed Fathers Before and After Lehr v. Robertson, 45 Ohio St. L.J. 313 (1984).

In most states, adoption of a child completely severs the legal relationship between the child and the biological parent whose status as legal parent is terminated by the adoption. Courts are not authorized to order visitation for such a biological parent. In a few states, courts have discretion to order visitation when in the child’s best interests.

In most jurisdictions, the theory of adoption is that the adoptive parent completely replaces the biological parent, who becomes legally unrelated to the child. In such states, courts may not order visitation for a biological parent following adoption because such an order would be inconsistent with the fundamental nature of adoption. In most states, a court does not have discretion to determine whether visitation would be in Daughter’s best interests and would refuse to issue a visitation order.

In a few states, statutes authorize courts to order visitation for a nonparent who has a substantial relationship with a child when visitation is in the child’s best interests. E.g., Or. Rev. Stat. § 109.119; Cal. Fam. Code § 3100(a). However, these statutes may be applied narrowly in the factual setting of a contested stepparent adoption. See, e.g., Vincent B. v. Joan R., 126 Cal. App.3d 619, 179 Cal. Rptr. 9 (1981), discussed in Michael H. v. Gerald D., 491 U.S. 110 (1989) (court-ordered visitation over mother’s objection would be contrary to child’s best interests). In such states, Father would have a sufficient relationship with Daughter to support a visitation order, but a court might determine on the facts that it would be contrary to Daughter’s best interests to order visitation over Mother’s objection.

Point Three (35-45%)

In most states, an express contract between unmarried cohabitants to share property is enforceable, though often difficult to prove. Many states also order property sharing between cohabitants upon proof of an implied-in-fact contract or by means of an equitable remedy to prevent unjust enrichment.

When unmarried cohabitants break up, their property rights are different from the rights of married people getting a divorce. Most fundamentally, courts do not have authority to apply the law of equitable distribution to unmarried couples. Instead, it is presumed that the cohabitant in whose name property was titled during the relationship will own it after the break-up. If property is jointly titled or untitled, division by a suit in partition is available for relief. The leading American case on property rights of unmarried cohabitants, Marvin v. Marvin, 18 Cal.3d 660, 134 Cal. Rptr. 815, 557 P.2d 106 (1976), holds that the cohabitant who does not have title may be able to make a claim to ownership of some portion of the property under several theories: express contract, implied-in-fact contract, and constructive trust, resulting trust or quantum meruit to prevent unjust enrichment.

Today, many courts hold that if cohabitants make an express contract to share property or for support, the contract is enforceable and not contrary to public policy, provided that the sexual aspects of the relationship can be severed from the economic aspects. Homer H. Clark, The Law of Domestic Relations in the United States, §§ 1.2, 15.7 (2d ed. 1988). Contra: Hewitt v. Hewitt, 77 Ill.2d 49, 394 N.E.2d 1204 (1979); Rehak v. Mathis, 239 Ga. 541, 238 S.E.2d 81 (1977). In most states the statute of frauds does not require that an express contract between cohabitants be written. Butsee Minn. Stat. §§ 513.075, 513.076. On the facts here, severing the sexual and economic aspects of any contract is quite plausible, since Father helped in Mother's business as well as running the household. Father would have difficulty, however, proving that he and Mother entered into an express contract that was sufficiently definite for a court to enforce, since her words were very vague.

Father might have more luck arguing that an implied contract to share property could be inferred from his and Mother's conduct. They became economically interdependent at her suggestion. The birth of Daughter and the attendant division of labor, with Mother working in the marketplace and Father caring for the child, strengthens this argument.

Father might also argue that a court should impose a constructive or resulting trust on property that Mother acquired during the cohabitation to prevent her unjust enrichment. He would argue that she induced him to forego his chance to develop his career in reliance on her promises or led him to believe that the property she acquired would benefit both of them. Alternatively, he might argue that he is entitled to the fair market value of the services he provided her as business manager, housekeeper, and nanny on a theory of quantum meruit. Not all courts hold that these remedies are available to cohabitants because they think their use comes too close to re-creating common-law marriage. See, e.g., Hewitt v. Hewitt, 77 Ill.2d 49, 394 N.E. 2d 1204 (1979). If these theories were available, Mother might argue that Father has been adequately compensated for his services and work by her supporting him while they lived together.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS ANALYSIS

(Secured Transactions II.D, III.B, IV.C. IV.F)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did Lender's delay in getting a signed security agreement from Debtor subordinate Lender's position in Machine No. 1 to Bank, which filed after Lender but perfected before Lender?
- (2) Did CreditCo's delay in filing its financing statement prevent CreditCo from receiving the special priority benefits of its status as a purchase-money secured lender?
- (3) Can WidgetCo, a good-faith purchaser for value, retain Machine No. 2 when a secured party seeks to recover it after Debtor's default?

DISCUSSION

Point One (30-40%)

Because Lender was the first creditor to file a financing statement covering Machine No. 1, Lender's interest in the machine has priority over Bank's even though Bank was the first creditor to perfect its interest in the machine.

The general priority rule among competing secured creditors under UCC Article 9 is that the first creditor to file a financing statement or perfect its interest will prevail. UCC § 9-312(5)(a). In this case, Lender filed its financing statement against Machine No. 1 on May 3, the same day it lent Debtor $ 100,000. Because Lender failed to get a signed security agreement from Debtor, however, Lender did not perfect its security interest in the machine until May 29, when it belatedly obtained such a signed agreement.

According to the facts of this case, Bank both filed a financing statement and perfected its interest in Machine No. 1 on May 13. Notwithstanding that Bank's perfection came 16 days prior to Lender's, UCC § 9-312(5)(a) gives Lender priority in the machine over Bank because Lender filed its financing statement 10 days before Bank either perfected or filed its financing statement. Because Lender ultimately perfected, its priority dated back to the time it filed the financing statement.

Point Two (30-40%)

Because CreditCo had a purchase-money security interest and filed its financing statement within 10 days after Debtor received possession of the collateral, CreditCo takes priority over both Lender and Bank as to Machine No. 2 even though both Lender and Bank filed before CreditCo.

Creditors who have purchase-money security interests qualify for a special priority under UCC Article 9. If the purchase-money interest is in collateral other than inventory, the secured creditor with that special interest takes priority over competing interests in the same collateral as long as the purchase-money interest was perfected at the time the debtor received possession of the collateral or within 10 days thereafter. UCC § 9-312(4).

Under the facts of this case, CreditCo qualified as a purchase-money lender under Article 9. CreditCo gave value to enable Debtor to purchase Machine No. 2, and Debtor in fact used CreditCo's loan proceeds to purchase Machine No. 2. UCC § 9-107(b). Although CreditCo failed to file a financing statement until 15 days after it made the enabling loan to Debtor and 14 days after Debtor in fact purchased the machine, Debtor did not have possession of the machine until May 28, just three days before CreditCo filed its financing statement. The 10-day grace period given to purchase-money lenders under UCC § 9-312(4) measures the period between when the debtor receives possession of the collateral and when the creditor files a financing statement. Under the facts, CreditCo fell within that grace period in this case. Therefore, as to Machine No. 2, CreditCo's interest prevails over both Lender's and Bank's, even though Lender filed 28 days before CreditCo did, and Bank perfected 18 days before CreditCo did.

Point Three (30-40%)

WidgetCo loses to any of the perfected secured parties because the sale was not authorized and was not in the ordinary course of business.

A security interest continues in collateral notwithstanding its sale unless the secured party authorized the sale. UCC § 9-306(2). Moreover, the security agreement (and hence the security interest) is effective against purchasers of the collateral. UCC § 9-201. Buyers in the ordinary course of business and some purchasers of consumer goods can sometimes prevail over a protected secured party. UCC § 9-307. However, Debtor does not appear to be a merchant in the business of selling widget machines, so WidgetCo is not a buyer in the ordinary course. UCC § 1-201(9). If widget manufacturers regularly sell their used equipment to other manufacturers, a case might be made that the sale was "in the ordinary course." However, the purpose of the BIOC priority is to protect buyers out of inventory, which WidgetCo clearly was not.

Thus, WidgetCo would lose to any of the three secured parties, each of whom has a perfected security interest which continues in the collateral after its sale (UCC § 9-306) and is effective against the purchaser (UCC § 9-201).

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP/CORPORATIONS ANALYSIS

(Agency & Partnership II.A, II.B; Corporations V.B, V.C)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did Pres have the real or apparent authority to bind Wareco and, if not, is he personally liable to Able?
- (2) Did Pres have the real or apparent authority to bind Wareco to Beta and, if so, is he liable to Wareco?
- (3) Is Wareco liable on the contract with Rancher either because Pres had real or apparent authority or as a result of See's erroneous certificate?

DISCUSSION

The facts are clear that Wareco acted promptly to repudiate each of the unauthorized contracts. This eliminates any argument that Wareco had accepted any benefits from the contracts or that Able, Beta or Rancher had detrimentally relied upon Wareco's execution of the contracts, and that, therefore, the contracts would be binding on Wareco regardless of their unauthorized nature.

Point One (25-35%)

The January board resolution denied Pres any real authority to enter into the contract with Able. Apparent authority would exist only if a reasonable person in Able's position would believe authority existed. Without real or apparent authority Pres did not bind Wareco, but did bind himself by breaching his implied warranty of authority.

An agent may bind a principal to a contract if the agent is acting within his real or apparent authority. Real authority may be expressed or implied to the agent by the principal. In this case no real authority existed, because Wareco expressly stated in the board resolution that Pres had no authority to enter into contracts for this amount without prior board approval. Apparent authority exists if the conduct of the principal leads the third party reasonably to believe that the agent has the authority. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 27. By electing Pres president, Wareco may have led reasonable third parties to believe that Pres had authority to enter into transactions in the ordinary course of Wareco's business. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 73. Even though the nature of the transaction suggests that it was in the ordinary course of business, the number of trucks compared to the size of Wareco's current fleet made the transaction extraordinary. This should have put Able on notice that no authority existed. Thus, Pres had neither real nor apparent authority, and Wareco is not liable to Able.

An agent purporting to act on behalf of a principal, but lacking authority, becomes liable on the contract for breaching his implied warranty of authority. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 329. Because Pres had no real or apparent authority, he is personally liable to Able for breach of his implied warranty of authority.

Point Two (25-35%)

The March board resolution denied Pres real authority to enter into the contract with Beta. However, apparent authority existed given the ordinary nature of the transaction and Wareco is bound. Because Pres bound Wareco when he was directed not to, he is liable to Wareco.

As stated in Point One, an agent can bind a principal if operating within his real or apparent authority. Pres lacked real authority to purchase the forklift because the March board resolution instructed him not to enter into this transaction. Apparent authority existed, however, because a reasonable person in Beta's position would believe that the president of Wareco had authority to enter into this ordinary transaction. Thus, Wareco is liable to Beta on the contract.

An agent who injures his principal by acting beyond the principal's manifestation of consent is liable to the principal. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 383. In this case, Pres entered into the contract with Beta despite the disapproval of the board of directors of Wareco. Since Wareco became bound on this contract by the act of Pres beyond his real authority, Pres is liable to Wareco.

Point Three (25-35%)

Although Pres had no real authority because the consent resolution was not unanimous and absent See's certificate, had no apparent authority because the transaction was extraordinary, Wareco is bound because Sec had the authority to give the certificate which created apparent authority in Pres.

To be effective, a written consent in lieu of a directors' meeting typically requires signatures of all of the directors. See, e.g., Revised Model Business Corporations Act § 8.21; General Corp. Law of Delaware § 141(f). Because the consent resolution in this situation was not signed by all of the directors, it was ineffective. Pres, therefore, had no real authority because the purchase price exceeded the $ 1 million limitation contained in the January resolution.

In the absence of See's certificate, Pres had no apparent authority because the purchase of a $2 million herd of cattle was not ordinary for this corporation. Rancher could not reasonably believe that the president of a commercial warehouse corporation would have the authority to make such a purchase on behalf of a corporation.

However, delivery of See's certificate created apparent authority. The secretary of a corporation has the authority to authenticate records of the corporation. RMBCA §§ 8.40(c); 1.40(20). Sec erroneously authenticated a resolution approving the execution by Pres of the contract with Rancher. Although this authentication was not accurate, it binds Wareco, and Rancher may rely on the authority of Pres indicated in the authenticated resolution. Therefore, Wareco is liable on the contract with Rancher.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE/CONFLICT OF LAWS ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure III, Conflict of Laws III.C)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) May a federal district court issue an order restraining Collector from selling the painting even though Collector has not been served with process in the action and does not have notice of the request for the order?
- (2) If the court issues an ex parte order restraining the sale of the painting, how long will the order be effective and what further steps, if any, must Museum take to preserve the order in force until the date of trial?
- (3) Should the State Y statute of limitations be applied to bar Museum's cause of action to recover possession of the painting?

DISCUSSION

Point One (40-50%)

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(b) the court may grant a temporary restraining order against Collector without notice to Collector if irreparable injury will result without the issuance of the ex parte order and if notice cannot reasonably be given.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(b) permits federal courts to issue temporary restraining orders on an ex parte basis when that is necessary to prevent irreparable injury and preserve the status quo pending a hearing on an application for a preliminary injunction. Because the issuance of a restraining order without notice to a party is an extraordinary action that implicates the restrained party's due process rights, Rule 65(b) strictly circumscribes the circumstances under which ex parte restraining orders may be granted. See generally Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure: Civil § 2951.

To obtain an ex parte temporary restraining order, the moving party must meet three conditions set out in the federal rules: (1) the moving party must set out "specific facts" in the verified complaint or by affidavit that show that "immediate and irreparable injury... will result to the applicant before the adverse party... can be heard in opposition"; (2) the moving party's attorney "must certify to the court in writing the efforts, if any, which have been made to give the notice and the reasons supporting the claim that notice should not be required," Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(b); and (3) the moving party must provide "security... in such sum as the court deems proper" before the order is issued, Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(c).

Even if the basic requirements of the rules are met, the issuance of a temporary restraining order is still a matter for the sound discretion of the trial court. In addition to insisting on a showing of irreparable injury, the court may demand a demonstration of some likelihood that plaintiff will prevail on the merits. The court will also consider any harm that granting the order will cause and will weigh that harm against the hardship caused to the plaintiff if the order is not granted. See Wright & Miller, supra.

The facts of the problem suggest that it is an appropriate case for entry of an ex parte temporary restraining order. First, Museum is in danger of suffering irreparable injury if the order is not granted. The painting is about to be sold and taken out of the country, beyond the reach of the court's process. If that happens, Museum will have great difficulty in recovering it. (As required by Rule 65, these facts are set out in the verified complaint or by affidavit.) Moreover, the loss of the painting, a "centerpiece of Museum's collection," is not the kind of loss that could be adequately compensated by damages through an action for conversion against Collector.

Second, Museum has made a good showing that the order must be issued before notice is given to Collector if the requested relief is to be effective. Museum has attempted to find and notify Collector of the action and of its motion, but has failed to do so. It expects to be able to find Collector at his home at the time of the sale, but unless it has a restraining order in hand at that time, it will be unable to prevent the sale.

Other factors support issuance. There is no reason to believe that Collector would be greatly harmed by a delay in the sale of the painting. Certainly, any damages suffered by Collector as a result of the delay could be compensated. Moreover, once Collector learns of the restraining order, Collector can seek a hearing from the court to have it dissolved. (Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(b) such a hearing would have precedence over all other matters on the court's docket, and so could occur very quickly. See the next point in this analysis.)

Because Museum also has provided adequate security pursuant to Rule 65(c), issuance of an ex parte temporary restraining order would appear to be appropriate.

The fact that no summons has yet been served in this action is irrelevant. A civil action in the federal courts is commenced by the filing of a complaint. Fed. R. Civ. P. 3. Service of the summons is not necessary for the court to take steps otherwise authorized by the rules. Given that Rule 65(b) authorizes ex parte TROs in limited circumstances like these, it is irrelevant whether the summons has yet been served or not, especially when the same factors that prevent Museum from giving notice of the motion for a TRO would also prevent service of the summons.

Point Two (20-30%)

Absent Collector's consent or extraordinary circumstances, an ex parte restraining order can stay in effect a maximum of 10 days after which Museum must seek a preliminary injunction (which requires a hearing).

Because an ex parte temporary restraining order is an extraordinary remedy, issued without the usual due process guarantees of notice and a hearing, federal practice requires that temporary restraining orders be dissolved as soon as practicable. If Museum wishes to restrain Collector's sale of the painting until the date of trial, the appropriate remedy is a preliminary injunction, which will issue only after notice to Collector and a hearing. Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(a).

Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(b) ensures that a party who is restrained by a TRO will have an early opportunity for a hearing by providing that any TRO "shall expire by its terms within such time after entry, not to exceed 10 days, as the court fixes” unless the restrained party consents to an extension or good cause can be shown for an extension. Moreover, when a temporary restraining order is entered without notice, a “motion for a preliminary injunction shall be set down for hearing at the earliest possible time,” and the party who received the TRO must proceed with an application for a preliminary injunction or the TRO will be dissolved. Finally, the party restrained by the TRO may move for its dissolution on two days notice to the party who obtained the TRO.

On the facts given, the court is unlikely to extend the TRO beyond 10 days and, in all probability, it will expire before that date. Museum believes it will be able to locate Collector within 24 hours. This will permit Collector to have notice of the restraint of the sale of the painting, and the court should allow Collector to be heard as soon as possible. Certainly, given that Collector is expected to be located shortly, there is no reason to extend the ex parte order beyond 10 days. Collector is certainly entitled to an opportunity to be heard. In all likelihood, Collector will move to dissolve the TRO as soon as possible.

Thus, the TRO may not, without further steps, prevent sale of the painting until the civil action to recover possession of the painting is resolved. Museum must take further steps to restrain Collector: it must seek a preliminary injunction, which requires notice and a hearing. Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(a). If Museum does not seek a preliminary injunction, the restraint on Collector will expire within 10 days, if not earlier.

Point Three (30-40%)

The federal district court should probably apply the State Y statute of limitations to this action, although it might apply the State X statute on the theory that it goes to the right and not the remedy.

In diversity actions, federal courts use state law to determine the limitation period applicable to state causes of action. In determining which state’s limitation period to use, federal courts must look to the choice of law rules of the state in which they sit. Klaxon Co. v. Stentor Electric Mfg. Co., 313 U.S. 487 (1941).

The problem does not specify what choice of law approach is followed by the courts of State Y, where this action is being heard. However, most states treat statute of limitations as procedural for choice of law purposes. If State Y treats statutes of limitations as procedural, it would ordinarily apply its own statute of limitations in the absence of a borrowing statute indicating that some other state’s statute of limitations should be used. Because the problem does not indicate that there is any applicable borrowing statute, the usual rule is that State Y should apply its own statute of limitations if that statute bars the action. See Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws, § 142 (1988 revision). If that is done, the action is barred.

State X, however, has a special statute of limitations for this type of claim which is part of a law creating a special cause of action for the recovery of stolen art work. Where a statute of limitations is specific to a particular kind of claim and was created by the law that created the cause of action to which it applies, courts will often characterize the statute of limitations as substantive. In such cases, a court may disregard its own statute of limitations and apply the foreign “substantive” statute of limitations, at least if the foreign law creating the cause of action will be used to determine other substantive rights in the case. This old doctrine (that statutes of limitations are substantive when they go to the right and not just the remedy) was preserved in the Second Restatement of Conflict of Laws. See Restatement (Second) Conflict of Laws, § 143, and Restatement (Second) Conflict of Laws, § 142 (1988 revision). See also Uniform Conflict of Laws Limitations Act, 12 U.L. A. 61 (Supp 1992) (adopted in six states, this uniform act provides that the applicable limitations period should be that set by the state whose substantive law will be used to decide the case). However, this traditional rule may not lead to application of State X's statute of limitations, because the rule was traditionally applied only when the foreign statute of limitations BARRED an action otherwise timely under forum law, not when the foreign statute extended the period for bringing the action.

Instead of treating statutes of limitations as procedural or using the traditional right-remedy tort, some states use interest analysis to resolve choice of law issues, including statute of limitations issues. It is not clear what result is proper if interest analysis is used to determine the applicable statute of limitations in this case. On the one hand, State Y has a strong interest in applying its short statute to protect the interest of its resident (Collector) in repose and of its residents and courts in being free from stale claims. On the other hand, State X has a strong interest in its resident's ability to recover property stolen from it and in discouraging art theft by allowing the recovery of stolen art even years after the theft. The case is a true conflict. State Y could either apply its own law to resolve the conflict, or seek somehow to determine which state's interest should be honored in the case. In short, the outcome of interest analysis is uncertain.

Legal Problems:

- (1) What enforcement rights does Collection Agency have on the overdue note?
- (2) Can Investor raise Bank's failure to make a second loan as a defense to his obligation to pay the note?
- (3) Can Software raise Bank's failure to make a further loan as a defense to its obligation to pay the note?

DISCUSSION

Point One (30-35%)

Collection Agency is the holder of the note and is thus a "person entitled to enforce" it. Because the note was overdue on its face when Collection Agency acquired it, Collection Agency had notice that it was overdue and is not a holder in due course.

Because Collection Agency is in possession of a negotiable instrument (the note) payable to it by virtue of Bank's endorsement, Collection Agency is the holder of the note. UCC § 1-201(20). See also UCC § 3-201 (a) (negotiation of an instrument). As a holder of the note, Collection Agency is a "person entitled to enforce the instrument." UCC § 3-301. It is irrelevant that Collection Agency purchased the note for far less than its face amount.

Collection Agency is not, however, a holder in due course of the note. To be an HDC, Collection Agency must give value for the note in good faith and without notice of claims or defenses to the note. Collection Agency gave value for the instrument; $ 150,000 is value, even though it is less than the face amount of the note. There is also nothing to suggest that Collection Agency did not act in good faith.

However, the note was overdue on its face. Thus, Collection Agency would be deemed to have had notice that the note was overdue at the time it took possession of the note. ("A person has 'notice' of a fact when... from all the facts and circumstances known to him at the time in question he has reason to know that it exists." UCC § 1-201 (25).) A person who takes an instrument with "notice that the instrument is overdue" cannot be a holder in due course. UCC § 3-302(a)(2)(iii). Thus, Collection Agency is not a holder in due course and can enforce the note only as a holder and by asserting whatever rights Bank had to enforce the note. (As a transferee from Bank, Collection Agency takes "any right of the transferor to enforce the instrument." UCC § 3-203(b).)

Point Two (30-35%)

Because Investor's agreement to undertake an obligation on the note was expressly conditioned on Bank's promise to make a further loan to Software and Bank breached that promise. Investor can raise that agreement as a defense to payment and is not obligated to pay the note.

By signing the note as co-maker, Investor became a maker or "issuer" of the note. An issuer is generally "obliged to pay the instrument... according to its terms at the time it was issued" to "a person entitled to enforce the instrument." UCC § 3-412. Thus, Investor has a general obligation to pay the note to Collection Agency, a person entitled to enforce it.

However, because Collection Agency is not a holder in due course, its right to enforce the obligation of Investor is subject to all of Investor's defenses, including any defenses stated in Article 3. See UCC § 3-305(a)(2). Article 3 includes a defense based on the separate agreement between Bank and Investor.

UCC §3-117 provides:

"[T]he obligation of a party to an instrument to pay the instrument may be modified, supplemented, or nullified by a separate agreement of the obligor and a person entitled to enforce the instrument, if the instrument is issued or the obligation is incurred in reliance on the agreement or as part of the same transaction giving rise to the agreement. To the extent an obligation is modified, supplemented, or nullified by an agreement under this section, the agreement is a defense to the obligation."

Here, Investor incurred an obligation on the note in reliance upon the agreement of Bank (a "person entitled to enforce the instrument" at the time it was issued) to make a further loan to Software if one became necessary. The case is similar to the situation discussed in comment 1 to UCC § 3-117 in which a co-maker on a note signs only on condition that the creditor seek another co-maker. UCC §3-117 effectively provides that the separate agreement "modifies the terms of the note by stating a condition to the obligation of [the Obligor] to pay the note." If the condition is not met, the Obligor is not obligated to pay the note to the original creditor or to any subsequent holder who is not a holder in due course. See comment 1, UCC § 3-117. Investor undertook the obligation as co-maker only on the condition that Bank would make additional loans up to $250,000 if necessary to complete the project. Bank's failure to do so provides a defense to Investor against Bank and against subsequent holders without due course rights under both UCC §3-117 and UCC § 3-305(a)(2).

UCC § 3-117 is subject to state law regarding the exclusion of proof of contemporaneous or previous agreements. However, the problem states that applicable state law allows such proof.

Thus, Investor has a valid defense against payment of the note.

Point Three (30-35%)

Investor's defense to payment of the note is personal to Investor, and Software may not raise that defense against Collection Agency. Software does not appear to have any other defense and therefore must pay the note.

Investor's defense against payment of the note is not available to Software. Although Software may raise personal defenses, Software "may not assert against the person entitled to enforce the instrument a defense ... of another person." UCC § 3-305(c). Here, the agreement between Investor and Bank was kept secret from Software until after it obtained the loan. It was not part of the inducement leading to Software's decision to incur the debt. Under the circumstances, any defense provided by that agreement is personal to Investor and cannot be raised by Software against a person entitled to enforce the instrument.

Software might claim that Bank acted in bad faith in refusing to make the separate loan and that Bank's bad faith is a defense that can be raised against Collection Agency, as a non-holder in due course. Certainly, Bank's refusal to make a second loan after promising that it would do so may be characterized as bad faith. However, any bad faith would be attributable solely to the fact that failure to make the loan was a breach of the agreement with Investor. There is no suggestion that failure to make a further loan was bad faith vis-a-vis Software. Furthermore, there is no hint that Software told Bank a second loan would be necessary or that Software acted in reliance on Bank's stated willingness to make further loans. To the contrary, Software believed that the initial loan was all that was necessary, and Bank apparently agreed with Software.

Thus, Software would not appear to have an independent defense to payment of the loan. Because it cannot raise Investor's defense to avoid its own obligation, Software is liable to Collection Agency on the note.

TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS/DECEDENTS' ESTATES/ FAMILY LAW ANALYSIS

(Trusts & Future Interests I.B, I.C, II; Decedents' Estates III.B; Family Law III.D. III.E. III.F)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does Wife's obligation to pay child support for Son survive her death?
- (2) Can a trust be imposed on a savings account that does not indicate that the depositor was acting as a fiduciary?
- (3) Does a decedent's obligation to transfer property to a former spouse pursuant to a divorce decree survive the obligor's death?
- (4) Do children living when a will is executed or born after the will is executed have a valid claim against their deceased parent's estate when they are not otherwise provided for in the will?

DISCUSSION

Point One (25-35%)

Obligations to pay child support usually terminate upon the death of either the child or the obligor. Wife's estate probably has no obligation to continue child support for Son.

Wife's obligation to support Son is based upon the divorce decree into which the separation agreement between Wife and Husband merged. As a general rule, parental support obligations do not survive a parent's death even when those obligations have been reduced to a specific sum pursuant to a divorce decree. McKamey v. Watkins, 257 Ind. 195, 273 N.E. 2d 542 (1971).

The children of divorced parents, however, have fared better than the children of ongoing marriages in some cases holding that the support obligation established by a divorce decree is not discharged by death. Kujawinski v. Kujawinski, 71 Ill. 2d 563, 376 N.E.2d 1382 (1978); (relying on Ill. Rev. Stat. ch. 40 § 510(c) (1977); Silberman v. Brown, 34 Ohio Op. 295, 72 N.E.2d 267 (Ohio Ct. Com. Pl. 1946).

The weight of authority, however, still holds that court-ordered child support payments do not survive the obligor parent's death.

Point Two (35-45%)

The evidence is insufficient to establish Wife's intent to create a trust for Son. While no specific words are necessary to create a trust, there must be some evidence of such an intent and no language in either the separation agreement, the decree into which it merged, or the name on the savings account indicates that Wife intended to create a trust.

In order to create a trust, the settlor must intend to create the trust. Restatement (Second) of Trusts, § 23. The language of the separation agreement and the decree into which it was merged is unclear regarding Wife's intent to create a trust of the amounts she agreed to "set aside" for Son. Furthermore, there are no words on the savings account registration evidencing that intent. Although no specific words are necessary to create a trust, there must be some evidence of an intent to create a trust at the time the funds were set aside to hold Wife to the obligations of a trustee. Id. at § 2; George Bogert, Law of Trusts, §11.

An argument can be made, however, that the two $5,000 deposits into the savings account were actually held by Wife in trust for Son, particularly since they were made each year and no other deposits were made into the account. Cutting against this argument, however, is the fact that Wife withdrew $ 1,200 from the savings account one month before she died. On the theory that Wife would not intentionally withdraw monies that were not hers, this may evidence an intent on her part not to have created a trust. On the other hand, if the money was intended to be held in trust for Son's college education, Wife's withdrawal would be a breach of trust for which her estate would be liable to Son. In addition, the entire balance in the savings account remaining at Wife's death would belong to Son.

It might also be argued that Wife held the funds in a constructive trust for Son on the theory that Wife promised to formally create a trust and she should be held to that promise. The facts do not support this interpretation because the separation agreement made no reference to the creation of a trust.

Property division obligations incident to a divorce remain enforceable against a deceased obligor's estate. If Wife's obligation to transfer $20,000 annually to Husband for five years is considered a division of property, Wife's estate is liable for both the $20,000 past-due amount and the $60,000 in future payments that Wife was ordered to pay Husband.

In some jurisdictions, money awarded to a spouse who supported a former spouse while he or she earned a graduate degree is considered, in essence, a property division. Haugan v. Haugan, 117 Wis.2d 200, 343 N.W.2d 796 (1984). Unpaid property division obligations are treated like other creditors' claims against a decedent's estate. If Husband's right to the five $20,000 payments are unpaid property division claims, then Husband is entitled to receive $80,000 from Wife's estate.

In other jurisdictions, the award is called "reimbursement alimony." See Mahoney v. Mahoney, 91 N.J. 488, 453 A.2d 527 (1982). Depending upon the terms of the court decree, an award of reimbursement alimony may terminate on the obligor's death.

Point Four (15-25%)

Son is not entitled to a share of Wife's estate because he was alive when Wife's will was signed and, therefore, was not unintentionally omitted from Wife's will: Daughter, an after-born child, is deemed to have been unintentionally omitted from the will and may be entitled to a share of Wife's estate. Son may also have claims arising from Wife's obligation to set aside funds for Son's college education.

Trusts & Future Interests/Decedents' Estates/Family Law Analysis

Under the Uniform Probate Code, only an after-born child unintentionally omitted from a parent's will may claim his or her intestate share of the decedent's estate, but not if the deceased parent's will gives substantially all of the estate to that child's other parent. UPC § 2-302(a)(1). Therefore, under the Uniform Probate Code, Son can claim nothing from Wife's estate because he was alive when Wife signed the will; Daughter can claim nothing from Wife's estate because Wife willed her entire estate to Daughter's other parent, New Husband.

In many states, however, an after-born child is entitled to a share of the deceased parent's estate (generally equal to what that child's intestate share would have been if the parent had actually died intestate) even though the parent willed all or substantially all of her estate to the surviving parent of the child absent evidence of an intent to disinherit the after-born child. See, e.g., I.C. § 633.273. In such states, Daughter would be entitled to a share of Wife's estate since Wife's will was silent on whether Daughter was intentionally disinherited.

In a few states, even a child alive when the will was signed may be entitled to a share of the deceased parent's estate on the theory that the child was unintentionally omitted from the will. See, generally, W. McGovern, S. Kurtz & J. Rein, Wills, Trusts, and Estates § 3.6 (1988).

If, pursuant to Point Two, a trust was created for Son such that Wife's $1,200 withdrawal was a breach of trust, Son would also have a claim for $1,200 against Wife's estate. Furthermore, Wife's estate may be liable to Son for Wife's unfulfilled promise to set aside $5,000 annually for ten years to finance Son's education unless the promise is in the nature of child support which terminates at Wife's death. AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP ANALYSIS

(Agency & Partnership I, II.A, II.B, II.C, V, VI.A, VII, IX.A)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Was a general partnership created by the investors when they formed Central Subs?
- (2) What principles of agency and partnership law support Karly's claim for damages against Central Subs and the investors for Sam's negligence?
- (3) Under what principles of agency and partnership law did Sam's order from Meatco bind Central Subs and the investors?
- (4) Does the dissolution of the partnership affect Pat's ability to hold Central Subs and the investors liable for Sam's negligence?

DISCUSSION

Point One (15-25%)

The three investors created a general partnership by agreeing to share control and the profits of their business.

The facts do not indicate whether Laura, Tammy, and Sam intended to form their venture as a general partnership. However, no intent to form a partnership need be expressed for a partnership to be created. In most jurisdictions, the governing statute is the Uniform Partnership Act (UPA), which defines a partnership as "an association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit." UPA § 6(1). The key elements are the parties' agreement to share profits and control. Here both elements are present. Sharing of control is evidenced by Sam being charged with managing the business, while Laura and Tammy have the power to veto expenditures over $500. The facts specify that profits and losses are to be shared equally. UPA § 7(4) makes the sharing of profits prima facie evidence of the existence of a partnership. Therefore, the arrangement among Laura, Tammy, and Sam was a general partnership.

Karly has a valid claim against (a) Central Subs, since Sam was a partner acting in the ordinary course of the partnership's business and (b) each of the investors, since a partner in a general partnership is jointly and severally liable for any wrongful act of a partner in connection with the partnership.

Karly was injured as a result of Sam's negligence in cleaning the bathroom, which was part of his managerial duties for Central Subs. A partnership is liable for the wrongful acts or omissions of any partner acting in the ordinary course of the partnership's business or with the authority of the other partners to the same extent as the acting partner is liable. UPA § 13. Sam was clearly acting in the ordinary course of business and with the authority of Laura and Tammy when cleaning the bathroom. Since the facts state that Sam acted negligently and therefore would be personally liable to Karly, the principles of partnership law allow Karly to recover damages from Central Subs as well.

Agency & Partnership Analysis

In addition, UPA § 15(a) makes the individual partners jointly and severally liable for all obligations of the partnership arising under UPA S 13. See also Paracano v. Gray, 120 Or. App. 670,870 P.2d 837 (1994), which relies on Kneeland v. Shrover, 214 Or. 67,328 P.2d 753 (1958) for the rule that the failure to disavow an agent's acts by the principal is considered an affirmation of such acts under the common law. Consequently, Laura, Tammy, and Sam are each personally liable to Karly.

The UPA does not require that a plaintiff exhaust the partnership assets before making a claim against one or more partners individually. However, the Revised Uniform Partnership Act (RUP A) adopted in a few jurisdictions, specifically states that a judgment against a partnership can be satisfied from the personal assets of a partner only if the partnership has failed to satisfy the judgment or is in bankruptcy or if the liability would have been imposed on the partner regardless of the existence of the partnership. RUPA § 307. Under the RUPA, Karly would have to make a claim and obtain a judgment against Central Subs which was unpaid before she could look to the personal assets of Laura or Tammy. Since Sam would have been liable to Karly for his own negligence even if no partnership existed, Karly could immediately seek to recover her damages from Sam's personal assets as well as the partnership's.

Under principles of contribution, if Karly recovered the full amount of her damages from either Laura or Tammy individually, either under the UPA, the RUPA, or the common law, the paying partner would be entitled to payment from the other two partners for their proportional share of the damages.

Point Three (20-30%)

Sam's order from Meatco binds Central Subs both under the UPA and under the common law because he had either apparent authority or incidental authority.

Under the UPA, the act of every partner apparently carrying on the ordinary business of the partnership binds the partnership unless (A) the partner has no such authority and (B) the person doing business with the partnership knows that the partner has no such authority. UPA § 9. Sam purchased the meat in the ordinary course of the partnership's business. However, Sam violated the investors' agreement by ordering more than $500 worth of meat without getting the approval of Laura and Tammy. Since Sam ordered the meat from a store that had not done business with Central Subs before, Meatco had no way of knowing of any limitations on his authority. The partnership is therefore bound and Meatco can recover the amount of its bill from Central Subs.

Under the common law, there are two possible alternative theories under which Central Subs would be liable for Sam's meat order: apparent authority and incidental authority. Apparent authority is authority of an agent not actually possessed by that agent but of the type that the principal holds the agent out as having. See Sanborn v. Maryland Casualty Co., 255 Iowa 1319,125 N.W. 2d 758 (1964). Sam arguably had apparent authority to order the meat because Meatco knew from seeing the promotional flyers that Sam was an owner of Central Subs, and the purchase of $600 worth of meat would seem to be an action that an owner generally would have the authority to take. Reuschlein & Gregory, The Law of Agency and Partnership (2d. 1990), at § 23. See also East Girard Savings & Loan Ass'n. v. Houlihan, 373 Pa. 578,97 A. 2d 23 (1953).

Incidental authority could also apply to bind Central Subs for the meat purchase because under this doctrine Sam had authority to take action that a reasonable person in the principal's position should have foreseen the agent would be likely to take, even though the action would be contrary to the agent's instructions. Eisenberg, Introduction To Agency and Partnership (1987), at 16. Here Sam responded to an emergency at the store by ordering more meat, an act which should have been foreseeable. The only issue is the foreseeability of ordering more than $500 worth of meat. Despite the issue of foreseeability of the amount of meat ordered, a court would likely hold Central Subs liable for Meatco's bill under this agency theory.

To the extent that Central Subs is liable to Meatco under either the UPA or common-law agency analysis discussed above, each of the partners will be jointly and severally liable for this debt. UPA § 15(a).

Point Four (20-30%)

Laura and Tammy have dissolved the partnership, which leads to a winding up of the partnership business. The partners have authority to conduct old business as part of the winding up process. Sam is completing old business by acting on the instructions of his former partners to drop off Central Subs' property, even though he is no longer working in the store. Therefore, the partnership is liable to Pat for Sam's negligence.

Laura and Tammy's actions to close down Central Subs effectively dissolved the partnership. UPA §§ 29 and 31 (l)(b). However, dissolution does not terminate the partnership, which continues until the winding up of the partnership's affairs is finished. UPA § 30. Winding up generally includes completion of old business of the partnership, collection of monies owed to the partnership, payment of partnership debts, and distribution of assets to the partners. See Ellebracht v. Siebring, 525 F.Supp. 113, (W.D.Mo. 1981), affirmed 676 F.2d 706 (8th Cir.1982). One item of old business is that Sam return all of Central Subs' property to the store as instructed by Laura and Tammy, his former partners.

The general rule is that dissolution of a partnership terminates all authority of a partner, vis-a-vis the other partners, to act for the partnership. UPA § 33. However, there is an exception where a partner takes action in connection with the winding up of the partnership. UPA § 33. In addition, after dissolution a partner can bind the partnership to a third party in connection with such partner's activities to wind up the partnership. UPA § 35(l)(a). Since Sam's trip back to the store was part of the winding up of the partnership as expressly authorized by the other investors, he was acting in his capacity as a partner when he injured Pat. As a result, Central Subs will be liable for Sam's wrongful act or omission even though a dissolution has occurred. UPA § 13. To the extent that Central Subs is liable under UPA § 13, each of the investors will also be individually liable (jointly and severally) to Pat under UPA § 15(a). Furthermore, the fact that the partnership has been dissolved does not affect the existing liabilities of the investors. UPA § 36.

TRUSTS ANALYSIS

(Trusts I.C)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is the Smith Trust a valid charitable trust?
- (2) Did the Smith Trust fail as a result of the closing of Education College, and if so, how should the assets of the Smith Trust be distributed?
- (3) Was the bequest in Testator's will sufficient to pour over Testator's estate assets into the Smith Trust?
- (4) If the Smith Trust failed, should the cy pres doctrine be applied to save Testator's bequest, and if so, how should the money be distributed?

DISCUSSION

Point One (20-30%)

The Smith Trust was a valid charitable trust.

A trust for the advancement of education is a charitable trust (Restatement, Second, Trusts, § 370). A trust to establish scholarships is a trust for the advancement of education (Id., comment (a)), even if the scholarship is open only to a limited class of potential beneficiaries. If, on the other hand, the persons who are to benefit from a trust are "not of a sufficiently large or indefinite class so that the community is interested in the enforcement of the trust," the trust is not charitable (Restatement, Second, Trusts, § 375). In this case, the gift, as amended, to "Presbyterian children" is probably a sufficient description of a class to qualify the Smith Trust as a charitable trust as such class is not so narrow as to violate the rule of Restatement § 375. Generally, a trust whose potential beneficiaries are employees of a corporation is sufficiently broad to qualify as a charitable trust if its purposes are otherwise charitable (see id., Comment (g)). Moreover, Smith Corporation has thousands of employees. There is no reason to assume that the religious restriction unduly narrows the potential beneficiaries. Therefore, the trust is charitable and governed by the law of charitable trusts.

Point Two (20-30%)

The closing of Education College caused the Smith Trust to fail because Smith did not have a general charitable intent. This results in a reversion of the trust principal to Smith's estate as expressly provided by the terms of the trust.

Section 401(1) of the Restatement, Second, of Trusts, provides that when, by the terms of a charitable trust, the trust is to terminate upon the happening of a specified event, then the trust will terminate on the occurrence of that event unless the termination provision is invalid. In this case, Smith expressly provided that the trust was to terminate if, for any reason, Education College should cease operations and that upon such termination the trust property should revert to Smith. Since Education College ceased operating as a four-year college, the trust terminated, and the trust property should be distributed to Harry, the sole successor to Smith's estate. The cy pres doctrine (Restatement, Second, Trusts, § 399) is inapplicable because Smith did not have a general charitable intent as evidenced by the express and rather specific terms of the trust. Upon termination, the trust principal reverts to Harry.

Point Three (25-35%)

The bequest in Testator's will to the Smith Trust fails.

Section 2-511 of the Uniform Probate Code provides that a will may validly devise property to a trust created either by testator or by another person, even if the trust is amendable or revocable. Moreover, Section 2-511 provides that unless the will provides otherwise, the property devised should be administered in accordance with the provisions of the trust instrument, including any amendments made before or after testator's death. In jurisdictions that have not adopted the Uniform Probate Code, the same conclusions are reflected in the 1991 version of the Uniform Testamentary Additions to Trusts Act. (A similar result could follow under the common law incorporation by reference doctrine, at least with respect to the terms of the trust in effect when testator signed his will.) However, if the trust terminates prior to the testator's death, the bequest lapses, UPC § 2-511(c). Since the Smith Trust terminated before Testator died, the bequest lapses.

Point Four (30-40%)

The cy pres doctrine should be applied to save Testator's charitable bequest for the benefit of the Smalltown Civic Corporation's scholarship program.

As discussed above in Point Two, the Smith Trust failed when Education College closed. Likewise, the bequest to the trust under Testator's will failed. (See Point Three). Nevertheless, with respect to Testator's bequest to the trust, the cy pres doctrine is applicable. The cy pres doctrine is applicable when property is placed in trust for a charitable purpose that has become impossible to effectuate, and where testator has manifested a general intention to devote the property to charitable purposes. (Restatement of Trusts, Second, § 399). Testator exhibited a general charitable intention by giving reasons for limiting the share of the estate to go to Able, and by omitting any reverter clause to take effect if the charitable bequest were to fail. Compare, e.g. Trammel v. Elliott, 230 Ga 841.199S.E.2d 194(1973) (cypres applied; no reverter clause in will) with Simmons v. Parsons College, 256 N.W.2d 225 (Iowa 1977) (cy pres not applied because will included reverter clause). Although Able might argue that Testator's charitable intent was limited to schemes involving only Education College, Testator's expressed desire to assist people of "diverse backgrounds" should be sufficient, in the absence of any reverter clause, to establish a general charitable intent. Thus, the bequest should be saved for the benefit of another charity; Able should not be entitled to the bequest.

In determining which charity should receive the bequest, the court will seek to effectuate Testator's wishes as closely as possible. See Bogert, Trusts [6th ed.], § 147, at 521,526. Where Testator expressed an interest in benefiting a diverse group of students, the court would be unlikely to award the property to the Smith Trustee, who would be required by the terms of the amended trust instrument to limit beneficiaries to Presbyterian children of Smith Corporation employees. Instead, the court would more likely award the property to the Smalltown Civic Corporation, whose beneficiaries would be more likely to exhibit the diversity sought by Testator and, thus, would more likely carry out Testator's intent.

COMMERCIAL PAPER/SECURED TRANSACTIONS ANALYSIS

(Commercial Paper III.A, IV.A, IV.B; Secured Transactions IV.B, IV.C)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) (a) Was Edwin a “holder” of Bart’s note?
 (b) Was Edwin a “holder in due course”?
- (2) Does Cathy’s 21-day temporarily perfected security interest in the note prevail over Edwin’s claim to the note?

DISCUSSION

Point One(a) (35-45%)

Edwin, as a “holder,” was a “person entitled to enforce” Bart’s note.

Edwin’s claim for enforcement of the note will be based on Bart’s obligation as a maker (issuer) under UCC § 3-412, which states that “the issuer... is obliged to pay the instrument (i) according to its terms... at the time it first came into possession of a holder”

Because holders may enforce payment, see UCC § 3-301, it must first be determined whether Edwin is a “holder” of the instrument. A “holder” is one “who is in possession of an... instrument... drawn, issued, or indorsed to him or his order or to bearer or in blank.” UCC § 1-201(20). Since Alice had indorsed the note prior to the theft, the note at that time was converted to bearer paper under UCC § 3-205(b), and could be negotiated by delivery alone. Dan, as a possessor of bearer paper, was a “holder” capable of indorsing under UCC § 3-204(a), although delivery alone was sufficient for Dan to negotiate the instrument to Edwin. Dan’s delivery constituted a valid negotiation to Edwin and, since there is no break in the necessary chain of indorsements from Alice to Edwin, Edwin is a holder. UCC § 3-202(a), § 3-205(b).

Point One(b) (35-45%)

Edwin, who took without notice of how Dan had acquired the note, was a “holder in due course.” Accordingly, Bart cannot raise the personal defense of failure of consideration against Edwin.

If Edwin is merely a “holder,” Bart may raise any defenses he may have, including the defense that the piano was worthless. UCC § 3-305. However, if Edwin is a holder in due course, Bart may raise only the so-called “real defenses” enumerated at UCC § 3-305(a)(1) (i.e., infancy of the obligor, duress, illegality, fraud, etc.).

A holder in due course is a (i) holder (ii) who takes an instrument (iii) for value, (iv) in good faith, and (v) without notice that it is overdue or has been dishonored or of any defense or claim to it on the part of any person. UCC § 3-302(a)(2). Edwin is a “holder” as discussed above. He took an “instrument” which, at the time he took it, had no apparent evidence of forgery or alteration. UCC § 3-302(a)(1). The facts state that Edwin took the note without notice of how Dan had obtained it. Finally, nothing in the facts indicates that

Edwin was on notice that the instrument was overdue or had been dishonored, or of may defense at claim to it Therefore, Edwin is most likely a holder in due course.

Bart's defense is a garden variety "failure of consideration" persona] defense which cannot be raised against a bolder In due course. UCC § 3-305(b). The facts, do not indicate that Alice committed the sort of essential fraud" that would constitute a real defense under UCC § 3-30S(a)(l). Thus, Bart cannot raise his personal defense against Edwin when Edwin seeks to enforce the note.

Point Two (10-20%)

Cathy's automatic 21-day temporarily perfected security interest in the note does not prevail over the interest of a holder in due course such as Edwin.

Ordinarily, Cathy would have to take possession of the instrument in order to perfect her security interest in it. UCC § 9-304(1). However, lo the extent that new value is given under a written security agreement, which appears to be the case here (i.e., the £2, 500 loan to Alice), Cathy's security interest in the note is temporarily automatically perfected without filing or possession for a period of 21 days. See UCC 5 9-304(4). Thus, Cathy's security interest was perfected at the time Edwin received the note.

However, under UCC § 9-309, a holder in due course of an instrument takes priority "over earlier .security interests even though perfected." Thus, regardless of whether Cathy's security interest is perfected, Edwin, as a holder in due course (discussed above), will take priority under UCC § 9-309.

FAMILY LAW ANALYSIS

(Family Law I.D, IILA, IILB)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Are parties who agree to participate in a wedding ceremony validly married for purposes of spousal support duties if they do not intend to assume all the incidents of marriage?
- (2) Under the common law necessities doctrine or a family expense statute, is a wife obligated to pay for her husband's emergency medical care before the provider has attempted to secure payment from the husband or his estate?
- (3) Is a premarital agreement between spouses that they will not be financially responsible for the support of each other enforceable and binding on third parties?

DISCUSSION

The facts give no basis for finding that Bonnie entered into a contract with Hospital to pay for Al's care. She may, however, be liable because of her status as Al's wife and because of her spousal support duties. Thus, the first question is whether she and Al will be treated as married for these purposes. If not, Bonnie is not liable. If they were married, Bonnie may be liable under the common law necessities doctrine or a statutory alternative, such as a family expense statute. If Al and Bonnie were married, their agreement eliminating their duties to support each other may be unenforceable as contrary to public policy. Even if the agreement would be enforceable as between them, it is not binding on Hospital, which was not a party to the agreement.

Point One (35-45%)

Whether Al and Bonnie will be regarded as married for purposes of spousal support duties when they entered into the marriage only to give Al the immigration status of a spouse depends on how the court interprets "consent to be married."

Consent of the parties is a prerequisite to a valid marriage. Bonnie and Al consented to some aspects of marriage—participation in the wedding ceremony and representing themselves as spouses to immigration authorities. As evidenced by their written agreement, however, they did not agree to the other conventional aspects of marriage, such as emotional and sexual fidelity, economic interdependence, and commitment to the relationship. The problem, therefore, is the legal effect of a "limited purpose" marriage. See Homer H. Clark, Jr. The Law of Domestic Relations in the United States § 2.16 at 121 (Student ed. 1988).

While it would be possible to interpret the consent requirement as applying only to participation in the wedding ceremony, courts do not take this approach. Instead, they consider what policies would be advanced or impeded by treating parties as married in a particular case. Id.

A court taking the traditional approach would treat Al and Bonnie as married because they participated in a valid ceremony and sought to obtain at least some of the benefits of marriage. The argument supporting this approach is that parties should not be able to pick and choose which aspects of marriage they want because this would undermine the state's interests in determining the legal consequences of marriage. See, e.g., Lester v. Lester, 87 N.Y.S.2d 517 CN.Y. Dom.Rel. 1949); Schibi v. Schibi, 69 A.2d 831 (Conn. 1949). Under this approach, Al and Bonnie were married for all purposes.

The other major approach is to conclude that the parties are married only if they intended to take on the "usual obligations" of marriage. See, e.g., Faustin v. Lewis, 85 N.J. 507, 427 A.2d 1105 (1981) (granting an annulment on facts similar to question). The theory underlying this approach is that no good purpose is served by treating people as married if they have not taken on the commitments of marriage. Under this approach, Bonnie would argue that she did not intend to be married in the conventional sense.

Hospital would make several arguments against using the "intent to take on usual marital obligations" analysis, which would result in a conclusion that Al and Bonnie were not married. First, since intent is subjective, it may be hard to determine after the fact what the parties' intent was, though here Al and Bonnie's written agreement provides evidence of their intent. Second, determining what the "usual obligations" of marriage are is a problem. People who consider themselves married do not all live their lives in the same way, and some courts have suggested that a rule purporting to prescribe how married people must act might well violate the right to family privacy protected by the due process clause. See, e.g., Bark v. INS, 511 F.2d 1200 (9th Cir. 1975). See also Manwani v. INS, 736 F. Supp. 1367 (W.D. N.C. 1990) (certain portions of federal immigration law on the status of spouses unconstitutionally intrude on the right to marry); but see Azizi v. Thornbure, 908 F.2d 1130 (2d Cir. 1990); Anetekhai v. INS, 876 F.2d 1218 (5th Cir. 1989), both upholding the law, based on Congress's plenary authority over immigration matters. Third, even if the court settled on a paradigm of how married people usually behave, the evidence here is conflicting. Al and Bonnie shared a household, shared expenses to a limited extent, were fond of each other, and their written agreement indicates they thought they had to divorce to be unmarried. On the other hand, their economics were not fully integrated, and they did not have sexual relations.

Point Two (35-45%)

If Al and Bonnie were married, Bonnie would probably be liable for Al's medical expenses under the necessities doctrine or a family expense statute.

At common law, husbands were legally responsible for supporting their wives. This duty could be enforced under the necessities doctrine. Clark, supra § 6.3 at 265. This doctrine allows a wife to purchase goods or services on credit and charge them to her husband. The creditor who furnishes "necessaries" to a wife may recover the fair market value of the goods or services from the husband even if he did not enter into a contract to pay for them or otherwise authorize her to pledge his credit. A "necessary" item is something suitable to the parties' station in life. Medically necessary care generally is considered to be within the support duty. See, e.g., Greenspan v. Slate, 12 N.J. 426, 97 A.2d 390 (1953), (parent liable for a child's medical bills under the necessities doctrine).

At common law, only husbands had spousal support duties; wives did not. Modern cases and statutes, however, generally recognize that spouses have mutual support duties. Clark, supra § 6.1 at 251. But see Shands Teaching Hospital and Clinics, Inc. v. Smith, 497 So.2d 644 (Fla. 1986) (upholding the traditional necessities doctrine against an equal protection attack).

Those courts which have held that the traditional necessities doctrine cannot survive in the modern era of formal gender equality differ about whether a creditor may seek payment for necessities from either spouse. In a few states, courts have abolished the necessities doctrine in response to the equal protection challenge. See, e.g., Condore v. Prince George's County, 289 Md. 516, 425 A.2d 1011 (1981); Schilling v. Bedford

County Memorial Hospital Inc., 225 Va. 539, 303 S.E.2d 905 (1983). In those states, Hospital would not have a common law remedy against Bonnie.

Most states, however, have retained the necessities doctrine but modified it. In some states a creditor may sue either spouse or both, e.g., North Carolina Baptist Hospitals v. Harris, 319 N.C. 347, 354 S.E.2d 471 (1987). In such a state Bonnie would be liable, regardless of the solvency of Al's estate. In other states wives are only secondarily liable for necessities supplied the other spouse, e.g., Marshfield Clinic v. Discher, 105 Wis. 2d 506, 314 N.W.2d 326 (1982), and in some states a creditor must first seek payment from the spouse who incurred the obligation, e.g., Jersey Shore Medical Center-Fitkin Hospital v. Baum's Estate, 84 N.J. 137, 417 A.2d 1003 (1980). In either of the latter two kinds of states, Hospital could not sue Bonnie until its efforts to collect from Al's estate proved unsuccessful.

About 20 states have family expense statutes making both spouses liable for the expenses of the family. Clark, supra, § 6.1 at 257. Medical care would be such an expense. Under this kind of statute Bonnie would be liable.

Point Three (15-25%)

Under the majority view, spouses may not contract to eliminate fundamental marital duties, including support duties during marriage. Further, an agreement to allocate financial responsibilities between spouses is not binding on third parties.

Premarital contracts are covered by the Statute of Frauds and so must be in writing to be enforceable. 29 Car. II. c. 3 (1677); Uniform Premarital Agreements Act § 2. The contract between Al and Bonnie was in writing. Modern courts and statutes also require either that the terms of the agreement not be unconscionable or that the spouses have made adequate disclosures to each other before entering into the agreement. See, e.g., Uniform Premarital Agreements Act § 6. On this basis a court might find the agreement to be unenforceable, since there is no indication that Al and Bonnie disclosed their finances to each other. On the other hand, under the circumstances a court might find the terms of the agreement to be not unconscionable because the bargaining process was fair, and the relationship of Al and Bonnie was unconventional.

However, there are limits on spouses' ability to enter into legally binding agreements to alter their marital obligations. Under the modern view, the spouses' ability to define the terms of their relationship is much greater than in earlier times, but courts frequently still do not enforce agreements to limit the spouses' support duties during marriage. See, e.g., Graham v. Graham, 33 F. Supp. 936 (E.D. Mich. 1940); In re Marriage of Mathiasen, 268 Cal. Rptr. 895 (Cal. App. 1990) (contract to share expenses equally void as effort to alter statutory duty of support). Therefore, a court might refuse to enforce Al and Bonnie's agreement that they would not be liable for each other's bills.

Even if the agreement were enforceable as between Al and Bonnie, it probably is not binding on Hospital. The obligation to pay creditors imposed by the necessities doctrine or family expense statutes is not contractually based but arises by operation of law, and it cannot be altered by a contract to which the creditor is not a party.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure IA, IV.B)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Were the requirements for federal diversity jurisdiction satisfied in this case, even though the plaintiff sued in a federal district court in his home state and, subsequent to filing the complaint, moved so as to become domiciled in the same state as defendant?
- (2) In a diversity case in which both the meaning and the constitutionality of a new state statute are challenged, should a federal district court stay the case to allow the courts of the state an opportunity to rule on the statute's meaning and thereby possibly render the constitutional issue moot?

DISCUSSION

Point One (45-55%)

Because plaintiff Parker was a citizen of a different state than defendant Acme when the complaint was filed and the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000. Parker properly invoked federal diversity jurisdiction, which is not defeated by the fact that the suit was filed in a federal district court in his home state, nor by the fact that he later moved to State B where Acme is also deemed to be a citizen.

The court should deny the defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The requirements for federal diversity jurisdiction have been established in this case. Parker's complaint does not state a claim arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, 28 U.S.C. § 1331, so the federal court's jurisdiction must be based upon diversity of citizenship. The plaintiff and defendant must be citizens of different states. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(1). For purposes of diversity jurisdiction, Parker was a citizen of the state in which he was domiciled when the complaint was filed, State C, and Acme is deemed a citizen of the state in which it is incorporated, State A, and the state in which it has its principal place of business, State B. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c).

For federal diversity jurisdiction, the amount in controversy must exceed $75,000, exclusive of interests and costs. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a). The amount in controversy is generally measured by the amount claimed in apparent good faith on the face of the complaint, St. Paul Mercury Indemnity Co. v. Red Cab Co. 303 U.S. 283 (1938), which in Parker's case exceeds $75,000.

It is sometimes said that the purpose of diversity jurisdiction is to protect out-of-state litigants from local prejudice. However, the constitutional language authorizing diversity jurisdiction and the statutory language implementing it allows a plaintiff to invoke original federal jurisdiction based upon diversity of citizenship not only in the state where the defendant resides but also where the plaintiff resides. 28 U.S.C. § 1332. Accordingly, the first ground of Acme's attack on subject matter jurisdiction is without merit. Acme's argument on this point confuses the requirements for original federal jurisdiction with the requirement for removal jurisdiction; for the latter, only a non-resident defendant may remove a state action to a federal court based upon diversity of citizenship. 28 U.S.C. § 1441(b).

Federal Civil Procedure Analysis

If Parker had been domiciled in State B at the time suit was filed against Acme, the requirement for original federal diversity jurisdiction would not have been satisfied. However, it is well settled that the determination of whether there is diversity of citizenship is made as of the date the suit is filed. Morgan's Heirs v. Morgan, 15 U.S. 290 (1817). If there is diversity jurisdiction on that date, it will not be lost or divested by later events, such as the acquisition of a common domicile by plaintiff and defendant. On the date Parker's suit was filed, plaintiff Parker was a citizen of State C, and corporate defendant Acme was a citizen of States A and B. At that time, Parker's citizenship was different from either of Acme's dual citizenships. Therefore, plaintiff's motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction should be denied.

Point Two (45-55%)

Because the state courts of State C may interpret the Unfair Trade Practices Act (UTPA) either to deny Parker standing to sue for the UTPA violation, or to exclude Acme's ad campaign from its coverage, and because either interpretation would moot the constitutional issue raised by Acme, the federal district court should abstain from deciding either of these issues until the State C courts have an opportunity to resolve the statute's meaning.

Because this case is before the federal district court for State C by virtue of its diversity jurisdiction, the court is required by the Erie doctrine to apply the substantive law of State C, whose statutes have created any cause of action that Parker may have. Although it is clear that State C substantive law governs this case, it is unclear what that substantive law is. This happens frequently in diversity cases, and the normal procedure is for the federal district court to go forward, do its best to divine what the state law is, and decide the case. The leading decision is Meredith v. Winter Haven, 320 US 228 (1943), in which the court stated:

Congress having adopted the policy of opening the federal courts to suitors in all diversity cases involving the jurisdictional amount, we can discern in its action no recognition of a policy which would exclude cases from the jurisdiction merely because they involve state law or because the law is uncertain or difficult to determine.

Only in rare instances (e.g., eminent domain cases where an important state interest is also involved in the ultimate decision) should a federal judge abstain from deciding a diversity case simply because the applicable state law is unclear. Chemerinsky, Federal Jurisdiction § 12.2.2 at 698 (1989).

However, in this case there are two reasons why it is appropriate for the court to grant the motion for a stay and postpone deciding the case. The best argument for a stay is under the well-established Pullman abstention doctrine. Under that doctrine, "if there are unsettled questions of state law in a case that may make it unnecessary to decide a federal constitutional question, the federal court should abstain until the state court has resolved the state questions." Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice & Procedure: Jurisdiction 2d § 4241 (1988). See Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496 (1941). The facts of this question present a pristine case for application of the Pullman abstention doctrine. If the federal court goes forward with the case, it may decide that Parker has standing to sue under the state statute and that Acme's ad campaign violates the statute. It would then be required to evaluate the constitutionality of the statute. If, on the other hand, it waits for the State C Supreme Court's interpretation of the statute, that Court may decide that only customers or competitors of the defendant have standing to sue under the state UTPA. In that case, Parker would have no standing and the federal court could dismiss his claim without reaching the question of the constitutionality of the state statute. Thus, by granting a stay, the court may avoid unnecessarily deciding a federal constitutional question. A stay should therefore be granted.

A second reason for granting a stay in this case is that state law is unclear AND there is a state action pending which may result in a clarification of the law. As noted above, mere difficulty or uncertainty in interpreting state law is NOT an adequate basis for a federal court to stay its hand in a diversity action. However, abstention in private litigation to avoid deciding difficult questions of state law IS regarded as proper when “the federal court merely postpones decision for a time to await an opinion of the state court in an action already pending.” Wright, Miller & Cooper. Federal Practice & Procedure: Jurisdiction 2d § 4246 (1988).

In the instant action, the proper course for the federal district court is to stay Parker’s case. The State C Supreme Court may then decide the case pending before it in a way that would deny Parker’s standing to sue under the UTPA. This would moot the constitutional issue. In addition, the newly-enacted State C statute is unclear and an action which will clarify it is currently pending before the State G Supreme Court. Those facts also would support a postponement of the federal action.

CORPORATIONS ANALYSIS

(Corporations VA, VI.A, VLB, X)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does Lawrence have a claim against Chempro, Paula, Alan, Bruce, or Charles as a result of (a) his dismissal as a director, (b) his dismissal as an officer, or (c) the board's failure to investigate the claims against Paula?
- (2) Are the following claims by Lawrence derivative or direct claims:
 - (a) unlawful dismissal as a director
 - (b) failure to investigate the claim that Paula had stolen company property?
- (3) Is Lawrence required to make a demand on the board prior to bringing a derivative action or will he be excused from this requirement because the Chempro board of directors either is interested in the transaction or has breached its duty of care?

DISCUSSION

Point One (45-55%)

(a) Lawrence has a valid claim for unlawful dismissal as a director: (b) Lawrence does not have a valid cause of action for unlawful dismissal as an officer: and (c) Lawrence does have a valid claim for failure to investigate his claims against Paula.

The facts state that the State F corporations law and the Chempro articles and by-laws permit directors to be removed by the board without cause. Therefore, without other special circumstances, Lawrence would have no cause of action against either Chempro or the other shareholders resulting from his dismissal as director. However, Lawrence, Paula, Alan, Bruce, and Charles had entered into a shareholders' agreement which required each of the other shareholders to vote for Lawrence as director. A shareholders' agreement requiring the parties to vote for specified directors generally is enforceable and read to bar a vote to remove such directors, except for cause. Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA) §7.31; H. Henn & J. Alexander, Laws of Corporations, § 198 (3rd ed. 1986,1983). The shareholders' agreement created a binding contractual obligation on the other shareholders to vote for Lawrence as a director of Chempro. The board of directors vote by Paula, Alan, Bruce, and Charles to dismiss Lawrence as director was a breach of that shareholders' agreement. Since the board had not determined whether Paula's claims against Lawrence were true, they would not be entitled to terminate Lawrence for cause. Therefore, Lawrence has a claim against each of the other principal shareholders individually for breach of contract. The remedy may be either damages or specific performance of the shareholders' agreement. Id. at § 267 n.42.

Lawrence does not have a claim against either Chempro or the other principal shareholders as a result of his dismissal as an officer of Chempro. Generally, an officer is selected by the board of directors and may be removed by the board for any reason or for no reason. RMBCA § 8.43(b), and Henn at § 210. The primary exception, where the officer has been selected by the shareholders, does not apply here. Henn at § 210. Even where an officer has an employment contract with the company, the board retains the right to remove the officer. However, in that circumstance, the officer may have a breach of contract claim against the company.

RMBCA § 8.44(b), and Henn at § 210. The facts state that Lawrence did not have an employment agreement with Chempro. Chempro's articles and by-laws permit officers to be removed by the board without cause. The board acted within its rights when it dismissed Lawrence as an officer of Chempro.

Lawrence does have a valid claim arising from the board of directors' failure to investigate the claims against Paula. A director owes the corporation a fiduciary duty. This duty has been interpreted to mean that he must discharge his duties "in good faith, with the care an ordinarily prudent person in a like position would exercise under similar circumstances and in a manner he reasonably believes to be in the best interests of the corporation." RMBCA § 8.30(a). A director is entitled to rely on information from officers or employees whom he believes to be reliable. RMBCA § 8.30(b). However, a director is not acting in good faith if he has knowledge of the matter at issue which makes his reliance unjustified. RMBCA § 8.30(c). In general, the duty of care requires that a director take steps to become informed about the facts before taking any action. Henn at §234.

Here, the directors of Chempro have a fiduciary duty to investigate the claims made by both Paula and Lawrence since they each allege harm to the corporation. In this case, Paula clearly breached her fiduciary duties since she knew that the allegations against Lawrence were false. Alan, Bruce, and Charles also breached their fiduciary duties because they believed Paula's allegations and ignored Lawrence's conflicting claims without any supporting information. Failure to conduct an investigation into the truth of the matter is a breach of the directors' fiduciary duties. As a result, Lawrence has a claim against the directors for breach of their fiduciary duties.

Point Two (25-35%)

Lawrence's claim for removal as a director results from fee breach of the shareholders' agreement and is a direct claim against the shareholders who are parties to the shareholders' agreement. Lawrence's claim that Paula diverted corporate funds for her own personal use is a derivative claim because the claim alleges harm to the corporation.

When harm is done to the corporation, a shareholder may bring a derivative action on behalf of the corporation, with recovery going to the corporation. H. Henn & J. Alexander, Laws of Corporations §§ 358-360 (3rd ed. 1986,1983). A breach of the directors' fiduciary duties that depletes or diverts corporate assets and injures the corporation, including all of the shareholders, gives rise to a derivative claim. Id. Lawrence's claim that Paula diverted corporate assets for her own personal use would be a derivative claim because the harm from Paula's actions is damage to the corporation as a whole rather than to Lawrence individually.

By comparison, a wrongful act that does not deplete the corporate treasury or divert corporate assets but instead deprives a shareholder of a right to which his shares entitle him, or which is personal to the shareholder and not shared by other shareholders, gives rise to a direct claim. Henn, supra § 360. Lawrence's claim that he lost his job as a director is a claim for a violation of the shareholders' agreement. Lawrence's rights under the shareholder agreement are individual. Therefore, this claim should be brought against the other shareholders in their capacities as shareholders, that is, as a direct claim.

Point Three (20-30%)

Under RMBCA, demand would be required prior to commencing any derivative action. Under common law, demand is not required in this case because Paula is interested in the transaction and the other members of the board breached their duty of care by failing to investigate Lawrence's allegations against Paula. This creates a reasonable doubt that the board can fairly determine whether the corporation should pursue the case.

Shareholders who bring a derivative action are suing to enforce the corporation's rights when the corporation has failed to do so itself. Therefore, the shareholders must allege that they have made a demand on the corporation to file the suit. Henn, supra §§ 364-366.

The RMBCA requires that a shareholder make a written demand on the board in all circumstances before commencing a derivative action. RMBCA § 7.42. The shareholder must then wait 90 days after making the demand to file the derivative action, unless the board rejects the demand during the 90-day period. Id.

However, under the common law, demand need not be made when it would be futile to do so. Henn, supra § 365. To establish demand futility, it is insufficient for the shareholder to allege in a conclusory manner that the suit names all of the directors as defendants and that, therefore, they are incapable of considering the demand in a disinterested manner. However, if the shareholder can allege facts in its complaint that demonstrate a reasonable basis for the belief that the members of the board are interested in the transaction being challenged, or that they failed to exercise their duty of care in approving the matter at issue, that will be enough to show demand futility. Id.

Here Lawrence's claim is that the other board members did not investigate his charges that Paula was stealing corporate funds and instead accepted Paula's claim that Lawrence was responsible for the thefts without any investigation of the matter. At common law, this would probably be sufficient to excuse the making of a demand and Lawrence could immediately file his derivative action.

(Decedents' Estates II.K)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Do the funds on deposit at First Bank in the name of "Decedent in trust for Grandchild" pass outside of the probate estate to Grandchild, or are they assets of Decedent's estate subject to the claims of Decedent's creditors?
- (2) Can Decedent's creditors reach the money in the joint bank account on the theory that the joint bank account was opened merely as a convenience to Decedent?
- (3) Can Decedent's creditors reach the diamond ring on the theory that Decedent did not effectively give it to Friend while Decedent was alive?

DISCUSSION

Point One (20-30%)

Decedent's creditors can reach First Bank "trust account" assets if the assets in her probate estate are insufficient to pay the claims against her estate.

A person may deposit funds in a bank in the form "A in trust for B" and create a so-called tentative trust account, bank account trust, or "Totten" trust (so named for the famous New York case that upheld the account against a challenge that it violated the policies underlying the statute of wills). See In re Totten, 179 N. Y. 112, 71 N.E. 748 (1904). These accounts are also recognized by statutes in many states. See, e.g., Unif. Prob. Code §§ 6-201(8), 6-203.

The depositor is the sole owner of the account throughout his lifetime, absent clear and convincing evidence of a different intent. Unif. Prob. Code § 6-211 (b) Upon the owner's death, the remaining sums on deposit belong to the designated beneficiary. Unif. Prob. Code § 6-212(b). However, courts and statutes provide that if the depositor's probate estate is insufficient to pay claims against the estate, then the money on deposit in the trust account is available for the payment of claims. See, e.g., Restatement of Trusts § 58(d); Unif. Prob. Code § 6-215(a). The right of creditors to reach the trust assets is justified on the ground that up until the moment of Decedent's death, Decedent had the unrestricted right to the use and enjoyment of the funds in the same manner as Decedent had with respect to other assets that would have been included in the Decedent's probate estate.

Point Two (30-40%)

Under the Uniform Probate Code the creditors of Decedent's estate can reach the money in the joint account if the other assets of the estate are insufficient to satisfy their claims. At common law the creditors cannot reach the joint account assets unless the joint account is opened for the depositor's convenience and no survivorship feature was intended.

Decedents' Estates Analysis

Under the Uniform Probate Code if a decedent's probate estate is insufficient to pay the claims of creditors, the creditors' claim to funds in a joint account is superior to the rights of the surviving joint tenant to the extent that the decedent deposited money into the joint bank account. Unif. Prob. Code § 6-215(a).

Absent such a statute, the surviving joint tenant of a joint bank account ("A and B as joint tenants with right of survivorship") ordinarily is entitled to the money in the account at the death of the first joint tenant, and the deceased depositor's creditors have no claim to the money. In some states the survivorship feature is conclusive. See In re Estate of Gainer, 466 So.2d 1055 (Fla. 1985). In others the survivorship feature can be avoided if fraud, duress, undue influence or mental incapacity is shown. See Annot. 43 A.L.R.3d 971 (1972). In these states and under the facts, Son is entitled to the account balance to the exclusion of Decedent's creditors.

Some courts have held that no right of survivorship is created if the evidence shows that the person who created the joint bank account did not intend the other person(s) named on the account to have a right of survivorship. The intent of the person creating the joint bank account is not self-evident from the form of registration "A and B as joint tenants with right of survivorship." The depositor may have intended that during their joint lives either was empowered to withdraw funds from the account with the survivor being entitled to the balance. This might be called a "true joint tenancy account." Alternatively, the depositor may have intended only that the survivor be entitled to the funds in the account at the depositor's death, but that the non-depositor have no right of withdrawal during the depositor's lifetime. This would be a pay-on-death account. Then again, the depositor may have intended that the non-depositor have the right to withdraw funds during the depositor's lifetime, but not be entitled to the funds on deposit at the depositor's death. This intent suggests the account was intended to be a mere agency account. See generally, Jesse Dukeminier & Stanley Johanson, Wills, Trusts and Estates 293 (4th ed. 1990). If an agency account was intended, then a court could hold that the survivor is not entitled to the funds in the account at the depositor's death. Franklin v. Anna National Bank of Anna, 140 Ill.App.3d 533, 488 N.E.2d 1117 (1986). Only on this construction of the depositor's intent would the funds in the account be an asset of the decedent's estate, subject to the claims of creditors.

Under the facts of the problem, it appears that at minimum the account was opened for Decedent's convenience and as a device to enable Son to reach the deposited funds. What is unclear, however, is whether Decedent intended Son to take the funds remaining in the account at Decedent's death as the "survivor." It might be inferred that Decedent had no such intent, based on the fact that the bank officer suggested the account as a vehicle to enable Decedent's child to obtain access to Decedent's money in case of Decedent's need. On the other hand, it is likely that Decedent would want Son to have these funds as a "reward" for taking care of Decedent in old age, perhaps even as a form of compensation for Son's time and expense in taking care of Decedent and assuring that Decedent did not have to go to a nursing home. Since there are no direct statements from Decedent that the survivorship feature was not intended, it is unlikely under either a preponderance of the evidence standard or a clear and convincing standard that Decedent's creditors will be able to defeat the survivorship feature.

Point Three (45-55%)

The gift of the ring to Friend is valid because Decedent intended to make the gift, there was an appropriate delivery under the circumstances, and Friend is presumed to have accepted the gift. Therefore, the creditors of Decedent's estate cannot reach the ring.

Whether the ring is subject to the claims against the estate depends on whether it was in Decedent's estate when she died or had been given away by Decedent before her death. An inter vivos gift requires intent, delivery and acceptance. Acceptance is generally presumed, particularly when the subject matter of the gift is something of value. Thus in most cases, the issue is whether the donor intended to vest the donee with an interest in property immediately or only at some time in the future. If the latter is true, the donor has not made a gift. If the former is true, the gift was completed only if the delivery was appropriate under the facts and circumstances.

Cases in which the transfer of physical possession of the subject matter of the gift is deferred to some time in the future present a difficult case. The deferral of the transfer until the future might suggest the absence of an intent to make an immediate gift, or it might suggest an intent to make an immediate gift of a "future interest" in the property because the donor wants to retain possession of the item for life. The common law recognizes both present and future interests in property as distinct property interests. Thus, there is no reason why one cannot make an immediate gift of a future interest. In Gruen v. Gruen, 68 N.Y.2d 48, 505 N.Y.S.2d 849, 496 N.E.2d 869 (1986) the court held that a donor had made a gift to his son of a future interest in a painting where the donor wished to defer transferring possession of the painting to his son so that the donor could retain possession of the painting for the rest of his life. See also Innes v. Potter, 130 Minn. 320, 153 N.W. 604 (1915).

The facts, particularly the language in the signed typed letter which Decedent sent to Friend, indicate that Decedent intended to make a present gift of either a present or a future interest in the ring. If the court finds that Decedent intended to make a present gift to Friend, the next question is whether delivery was appropriate under the circumstances.

If a court views the ring itself as the subject of the gift, delivery of the letter would likely be considered appropriate under the circumstances, since the donee was not physically present for the donor to hand the ring to at the time the donor intended to make the gift. Courts have generally recognized that constructive or symbolic delivery of a gift is appropriate if the subject matter of the gift cannot be physically delivered (to the donee) at the time the donor wishes to complete the gift. See also In re Cohn, 187 App. Div. 392, 176 N.Y.S. 225 (1919).

If the subject matter of the gift is a future interest in a ring rather than the ring itself, then the gift can only be evidenced by a constructive or symbolic delivery, since the subject matter of the gift has no physical shape. In such case the best delivery would be a writing that is signed and delivered to the donee, as was done here. See Gruen v. Gruen, supra.

Under either interpretation, Decedent made a present gift to Friend of a future interest in the ring, and Decedent's creditors have no claim to it. On the other hand, if the court finds that delivery was insufficient, the ring would be an asset of Decedent's estate subject to the creditors' claims.

Decedent's creditors might argue that this was not an inter vivos gift but a gift causa mortis. The latter is a gift made under an immediate apprehension of death, usually from a known peril, which is revocable if the donor does not die. Like an inter vivos gift, a gift causa mortis must be evidenced by intent, delivery and acceptance. Some courts appear to require a greater degree of proof of intent, delivery and acceptance in the case of a causa mortis gift because of a concern that such gifts are inconsistent with policies underlying statutes of will in that they are often unwitnessed transfers. See, e.g., Foster v. Reiss, 18 N.J. 41, 112 A.2d 553 (1955). On the facts, it is not clear whether the decedent wrote the letter under the immediate apprehension of death. Thus, it is unclear whether the gift would be characterized as a gift causa mortis. If the court treated this gift as a gift causa mortis but regarded it with suspicion, it might find that delivery was insufficient. In this case, the ring would be an asset of Decedent's estate, subject to the creditors' claims.

Preface

This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 1998 and July 1998 Multistate Essay Examinations. Each test includes seven questions; jurisdictions that use the MEE select the six questions their applicants will answer.

These model analyses to the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. These models are not an official grading guide. Some states grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses, including the suggested weights given to « particular points, as they wish. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topic or topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by Roman numerals which refer to the subject matter outline for that topic. For example, question 1 on the February 1998 MEE tested Agency and Partnership VIII.A, Profits and losses, and VIII.D, Duty of loyalty. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet and can also be found at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE is a three-hour examination consisting of six questions. The examination is administered in one continuous three-hour time period. Applicants are expected to spend approximately thirty minutes answering each of the questions. The areas of law covered by the questions in the examination are: Agency and Partnership, Commercial Paper, Conflict of Laws, Corporations, Decedents' Estates, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Sales, Secured Transactions, and Trusts and Future Interests. Some questions include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate in writing effectively.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You will have three hours in which to write your answers to six of the seven questions contained in this booklet; you will be told which of the questions you are to answer. Each question is designed to be answered in thirty minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts which are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show: an understanding of the facts; a recognition of the issues included; the applicable principles of law; and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important; but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Some jurisdictions instruct applicants to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

Ashley, Bill, and Diane are equal partners in ABD Partnership, which manufactures computer components, including keyboards. Ashley supervises the factory, Bill supervises the sales force, and Diane is responsible for the financial management of the business.

Ashley and Diane are concerned about Bill's dealings with XYZ Computer Components, the partnership's most direct competitor. Two years ago, ABD Partnership wanted to sell some used manufacturing equipment valued at $250,000. ABD had an established policy of not selling used equipment to its competitors. Without the knowledge or consent of Ashley and Diane, Bill sold the equipment to XYZ for $275,000. Acquisition of the ABD equipment enabled XYZ to bid successfully against ABD for a profitable government contract. When Ashley and Diane learned of the sale, they became very angry and confronted Bill. Bill claimed he believed that the premium price paid by XYZ justified the sale.

Several months later, Bill developed an improved keyboard configuration for disabled computer users who suffer from limited hand and arm mobility. Bill had developed the configuration to accommodate his disabled child. He worked on the keyboard at home in his spare time, without using any of ABD's facilities. Bill obtained a patent on the special keyboard in his own name, and then he entered into a partnership with XYZ, called B-XYZ Partnership, to manufacture it.

Ashley and Diane recently learned of Bill's patent for the special keyboard. They criticize him for obtaining the patent in his own name and for forming the partnership with XYZ. Bill correctly points out that he developed the keyboard on his own time and that XYZ is in the business of manufacturing computers to accommodate people with disabilities, while ABD is not in that line of business.

1. Did Bill violate any duties to ABD Partnership by selling the surplus equipment to XYZ? Explain.
2. What rights, if any, does ABD Partnership have in the patent for the special keyboard obtained by Bill? Explain.
3. Did Bill breach any duties to ABD Partnership by entering into B-XYZ Partnership, and, if so, must he account to ABD Partnership for any portion of the profits received by B-XYZ Partnership derived from the sale of the computer keyboards designed to accommodate the disabled? Explain.

COMMERCIAL PAPER QUESTION

Ted is the treasurer of Acme Corporation. As treasurer, he is authorized to sign checks and issue them on behalf of Acme.

Ted and his brother-in-law Fred devised a plan to defraud Acme. Ted would issue checks to a fictitious sole proprietorship, SupplyCo, purportedly in payment of invoices for goods supplied to Acme by SupplyCo. To accomplish the fraud, Fred had phony invoices prepared on forms bearing the letterhead "SupplyCo" and opened an account at Small Bank in the name of SupplyCo. Ted and Fred made checks payable to the order of SupplyCo from their own personal accounts to establish a "track record" with Small Bank of checks payable to SupplyCo being honored by drawees.

After a month during which such checks cleared in amounts ranging from $100 to $10,000, Ted prepared a check as treasurer of Acme drawn on Acme's bank, Big Bank, in the amount of $9,000 payable to the order of SupplyCo. Ted signed the Acme check as treasurer and then gave the check to Fred. Fred indorsed the check as follows: "For Deposit Only - SupplyCo" and deposited the check in the SupplyCo account at Small Bank. The check was presented by Small Bank to Big Bank, and Big Bank honored the check.

After Big Bank honored the SupplyCo check, a routine audit of Acme was made. The audit uncovered the fraudulent payment to SupplyCo. However, by the time Acme discovered the fraud, Fred had withdrawn the $9,000 from the SupplyCo account in a transaction in which Small Bank was acting in good faith. Fred and Ted have disappeared.

Under Article 3 of the Uniform Commercial Code, which, among Small Bank, Big Bank and Acme, must bear the $9,000 loss? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES/CONFLICT OF LAWS QUESTION

Child was the biological daughter of Dad and Mom. When Child was an infant, Husband and Wife legally adopted her in State A with the consent of Dad and Mom. All the parties then lived in State A.

Three years after Child was adopted, Husband died. Thereafter, Wife married New Husband. At the time of this marriage, Child was four years old. Five years later, New Husband died intestate, domiciled in State A. He was survived by Wife, Child, and his closest blood relative, Uncle. Although New Husband never adopted Child, Child resided with Wife and New Husband until New Husband's death. New Husband raised Child and treated Child in all respects as if she were his biological child.

After New Husband's death, Wife moved to State B and established her domicile there. She died intestate in State B, survived by Child and by Grandmother, Wife's closest living blood relative. At the time of Wife's death, she owned property in State B and a summer vacation home in State A.

Grandmother, who was a domiciliary of State B, had a close relationship with Wife and Child. One week after Wife died, Grandmother died testate. Her valid will, executed two years earlier, bequeathed her entire estate to Wife, or "if Wife predeceases me, to such of Wife's children who survive me."

The laws of intestate succession in States A and B provide that one-half of an intestate decedent's property is distributable to the decedent's spouse and the other half to the decedent's issue per stirpes, or absent such issue, to the decedent's ancestors or, if none, to the decedent's collateral blood relatives.

The law of State A provides that an adopted child cannot inherit from the biological parents but can inherit from the adopting parents as if the adopted child were a biological child of the adopting parents.

The law of State B provides that an adopted child cannot inherit from an adopting parent who died intestate. However, State B law concerning the construction of wills provides, "If an adopting parent leaves a testamentary class gift to his or her children, adopted children are included in the class gift." There are no other governing state statutes.

1. Is Child entitled to inherit from New Husband's estate? Explain.
2. Is Child entitled to inherit from Wife's estate? Explain.
3. Is Child entitled to inherit from Grandmother's estate? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

Passenger was riding as a passenger on a motorcycle operated by Cyclist in State A. She sustained a severe head injury when a westbound car driven by Driver collided with Cyclist's northbound motorcycle at an intersection controlled by stop signs for both roads. The accident left Passenger with permanent amnesia concerning the accident and the events leading to the collision.

Passenger, a citizen of State B, sued Driver, a citizen of State A, in federal district court in State A for $ 1 million in damages for personal injuries. The federal court properly has diversity jurisdiction.

Passenger's complaint alleged that Driver failed to stop at the stop sign and that Driver's negligent driving was the proximate cause of her injuries. Driver's answer denied that he failed to stop and that there was any negligence on his part. In response to Driver's interrogatories, Passenger stated that her claim of negligence was based on Driver's failure to bring his automobile to a stop before proceeding through the intersection, despite the presence of a plainly visible stop sign regulating westbound traffic. She also stated, on information and belief, that Cyclist's motorcycle had reached the intersection first and was proceeding through it only after coming to a complete stop.

Before either side could take his deposition, Cyclist died of causes not connected with the accident. The only other eyewitness to the collision was Witness, who was traveling in a westbound truck immediately behind Driver's auto. When Witness's deposition was taken, he testified that he saw Driver come to a complete stop at the intersection, but that Cyclist did not stop. He also stated that the stop sign for westbound traffic was partly obscured by tall weeds, which made it difficult to see until a motorist was quite near the intersection. At her deposition, Passenger testified that, because of the accident-induced amnesia, she had no personal recollection of the events surrounding the collision.

After the close of discovery, Driver moved for summary judgment. Driver supported this motion with: (1) Passenger's answer to the interrogatories; (2) the deposition of Witness; (3) Driver's own affidavit to the effect that the westbound stop sign was difficult to see because of the growth of tall weeds in front of it, but that he had come to a complete stop before entering the intersection, whereas Cyclist did not; and (4) Passenger's deposition testimony regarding her amnesia and lack of personal recollection of the events surrounding the collision.

Passenger opposed the motion for summary judgment. Her opposition papers cited the conflicting facts raised by the allegation in her complaint that Driver failed to stop and Driver's denial of that allegation in his answer. In support of her opposition, she offered (1) an affidavit of the police officer who responded to the accident, stating that the westbound stop sign was not hidden by weeds, but, on the contrary, was plainly visible; and (2) Passenger's own affidavit stating, on information and belief, that Cyclist must have arrived at the intersection first, come to a complete stop, and only then proceeded into the intersection, and that Driver must have entered the intersection without stopping or even slowing down.

Should the trial court grant or deny Driver's motion for summary judgment? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

NOTE: Applicants answering this question in a community property state should use community property principles. For this purpose, the phrase “marital property” means community property and the phrase “non marital property” means separate property.

Harry and Wanda, who have been married for 13 years, have two children. Harry and Wanda are now divorcing. Before marrying, they each earned $25,000 per year as teachers. A year after their wedding, Harry quit teaching to open a television and stereo repair business called Audio-Video Repair (AVR). He invested in the business $5,000 that the couple had saved since the wedding and $10,000 that Wanda’s father had given the couple as a wedding gift. Wanda continued to work as a teacher. The couple postponed having children and cut back on all expenses. They invested every extra penny in the business.

AVR grew rapidly. Harry decided to incorporate AVR, contributing 52% of the shares to an employee profit-sharing plan and retaining 48% in his name alone. The contribution of shares to the profit-sharing plan was for legitimate business reasons.

At a time when Harry was earning over $ 150,000 a year, he and Wanda agreed that she would quit her teaching job and have children. Sonny was born the next year, and Debbie was born two years later.

Wanda took care of the house and children and entertained Harry’s many business guests. AVR continued to flourish and began to set up franchises in other cities. Harry increasingly devoted himself to the business, so that he had very little time for the children and even less time for Wanda. When Debbie was two years old, Wanda began an affair with a neighbor.

Harry and Wanda have agreed that they will divorce and that the children will live with Wanda. Wanda plans to return to teaching in another two years, when Debbie reaches school age, but she will need to update her teaching credentials and can expect to earn only $35,000 per year. Through AVR, including the franchises, Harry now earns $750,000 a year. AVR is worth $20 million. The parties’ only substantial asset besides the AVR stock is the family house, worth $300,000. Harry agrees that it should be awarded to Wanda so that she and the children will have a home.

In the divorce proceeding, Wanda demands a portion of the AVR stock and temporary and permanent spousal support. Harry resists these demands. Wanda also demands child support measured as a percentage of Harry’s income. Harry acknowledges his obligation to pay child support but is unwilling to pay the amount Wanda requests. In this jurisdiction only marital property is subject to division at divorce. Nonmarital property must be awarded to the owner.

1. Are Harry’s shares in AVR subject to division? Explain.
2. Will Wanda most likely be awarded permanent spousal support, temporary spousal support, or neither? Explain.

3. What will the court consider in determining the amount of Harry's child support obligation? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

Several years ago, Able, Baker, and Campbell properly incorporated Transport, Inc., a highway freight hauling business. Able and Baker each own 45% of Transport stock, and Campbell owns 10%. Since its incorporation, Transport has been quite profitable. However, most of its earnings have been retained to help the business grow, and only small dividends have been paid to the three shareholders.

Able, the president of Transport, is in charge of finance and sales for the business. Baker, the vice president, is in charge of operations. Able and Baker make all major decisions by consensus. Campbell is an artist and does not participate in the business operations. No shareholder or director meetings have ever been called or held. Able, who has expensive tastes and lives beyond his means, often uses corporate funds of Transport to pay his personal bills, telling Baker that once he gets his personal finances in order he will repay the company.

Last year, Able and Baker decided to expand Transport's hauling business to start hauling hazardous waste from local factories to a newly constructed hazardous waste disposal facility. Recognizing that hauling hazardous waste could be a risky business, Able and Baker wanted to keep the hazardous waste hauling activities separate from the rest of Transport's business. They formed a new corporation called HotTrucks, Inc., which was properly incorporated as a wholly owned subsidiary of Transport. Transport contributed the use (but not ownership) of a fleet of ten trucks to HotTrucks. HotTrucks' only asset was its right to use the trucks. In order to save money, Able and Baker did not obtain general business liability insurance for HotTrucks.

Able and Baker thought it wise not to be directors or officers of HotTrucks, so they asked Campbell to serve as the sole director and officer of HotTrucks. Campbell did not want to spend time on business matters when he could be working on his paintings. However, he agreed to serve as director and officer on the understanding that Able and Baker would handle all day-to-day management and operation of the business and that Campbell would not have to attend any directors' meetings or make business decisions.

A month ago, one of the trucks operated by HotTrucks crashed through the front of a video store. Baker, who was the driver of the truck, had negligently fallen asleep at the wheel. The regularly scheduled driver had called in sick, and Baker had taken his place, not having slept for 20 hours. The accident seriously injured five people.

1. On what basis, if any, can the injured persons hold Transport liable for tort claims resulting from the HotTrucks accident? Explain.
2. On what basis, if any, can the injured persons hold Able, Baker, or Campbell personally liable for such claims? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

Debtor publishes a newspaper. On May 3, Lender loaned Debtor $100,000 for general operating expenses. On May 4, Debtor signed a security agreement, which stated in full:

Debtor hereby grants Lender a security interest in Debtor's equipment to secure repayment of the $ 100,000 loan made by Lender to Debtor on May 3.

Also on May 4, Lender filed a valid financing statement, signed by Debtor, in the proper UCC filing offices.

On May 13, a second lender, Bank, also loaned Debtor $ 100,000 for general operating expenses. In conjunction with that loan, Debtor signed a standard form security agreement provided by Bank giving Bank a security interest in:

All Debtor's equipment now owned or hereafter acquired to secure repayment of all debts of whatever nature owed by Debtor to Bank, including all loans and future advances.

Bank failed to file a financing statement covering this transaction. At the time of both of these loans, Debtor owned a single printing press, Press No. 1.

On June 1, Debtor borrowed $50,000 from a third lender, CreditCo, for the specific purpose of purchasing a second printing press, Press No. 2. In conjunction with that loan, CreditCo had Debtor sign on that same day a valid security agreement that granted CreditCo a security interest in Press No. 2. Debtor used the proceeds of CreditCo's loan to purchase Press No. 2 for $50,000. Debtor took possession of Press No. 2 on June 2. No financing statement was filed in connection with this transaction.

Debtor made regular payments on its obligations to Lender and Bank. By July 15, Debtor had completely paid off its original debts to both Lender and Bank.

On August 1, however, Debtor borrowed an additional $50,000 from Lender and an additional $100,000 from Bank. No new security agreements or financing statements were generated in connection with these new loans.

It is now September 15. Debtor owes $50,000 each to Lender and CreditCo and $100,000 to Bank. Debtor is in default on all three loans, and Debtor's creditors are seeking to foreclose on Press No. 1 and Press No. 2. The presses are each worth $50,000.

1. As between Lender and Bank, which has the superior claim to Press No. 1 ? Explain.
2. As among Lender, Bank, and CreditCo, which has the superior claim to Press No. 2? Explain

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

On January 2, 1995, Testator died testate in a nursing care facility called Nursing Home, Inc. Testator's will, signed on December 28, 1994, when she was mentally competent, makes two bequests: (1) a bequest of $ 100,000 to "my heirs at law" and (2) a bequest of "my residuary estate to Nursing Home, where I shall be resident at my death." President, who is both a director and the president of Nursing Home, was named executor. Testator's will was drafted by Lawyer, a shareholder of Nursing Home, who also serves as Nursing Home's attorney. Testator's only heir is her cousin, Charles, who last saw Testator nearly a decade ago. T

Throughout the 1980s, Testator's health declined. During the 1980s, while still living on her own, Testator became close friends with President. He visited her apartment many times and arranged for employees of Nursing Home to moonlight as nurses in her apartment. In 1992, Testator's physical condition deteriorated so significantly that she needed full-time care. President helped Testator make arrangements for admission to Nursing Home. While Testator was living at Nursing Home, a number of "estate planning seminars" were presented there by Lawyer, and a pamphlet titled "Will Information Guide" was distributed to the residents. The pamphlet, written by President, had extensive provisions regarding Nursing Home's need for charitable gifts and the proper method of including bequests to Nursing Home in a will.

On the evening of December 28, 1994, after attending an estate planning seminar given by Lawyer, Testator said she wanted to write her will. Testator, Lawyer, and President immediately went into President's office, where Lawyer drafted the will in full accord with Testator's instructions and with President present. Two visiting friends of Testator were also present in the room when the will was signed. They will testify that after Testator declared the document to be her will and asked them to sign as witnesses, she attempted to sign the will. However, because of a chronic tremor, Testator's hand shook so badly that she was unable to hold the pen despite repeated attempts. In frustration, she finally asked President if he would write her name for her on the will, which President did. Immediately thereafter, the two friends signed the will as witnesses.

After the will was executed, Lawyer gave the will to Testator. She later placed it in her night table drawer for safekeeping.

After Testator's death, a nurse found the will in the night table. She gave it to President. When he read the will he saw that the bequest of $ 100,000 to Testator's heirs at law had been crossed out with a straight black line made by a felt-tip marking pen.

President petitions for the probate of Testator's will. In the petition, President alleges that the entire estate should pass to Nursing Home because the will was validly executed and the bequest to Charles had been revoked.

1. On what grounds might Charles contest the will, and how likely is he to succeed on each ground? Explain.
2. If the will is probated, is Charles entitled to the $ 100,000 bequest? Explain.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

Sam, Jake, and Bill are partners in a dry cleaning business. At the time the partnership was created, the three executed a written partnership agreement. The agreement recites that the partnership is being formed for the purpose of operating a dry cleaning business. The partnership agreement also states that each partner has an equal voice in the partnership's operations, will receive an equal share of any partnership profits, and will bear an equal share of any partnership losses. The agreement does not contain any provisions relating to the dissolution of the partnership and is silent on the duration of the partnership.

Lately the partnership has been losing money, and relations among Sam, Jake, and Bill have deteriorated. Bill believes that the business judgment of Sam and Jake is poor.

On April 15, the partnership contracted with Hotel to dry-clean drapes from Hotel's guest rooms under a phased delivery schedule that would last until June 30. The partnership expects to make a profit on this contract, payment for which is to be made by Hotel on July 15. In the meantime, the partnership has to pay the cost of performing the contract out of current operating capital.

On May 1, Bill sent separate letters to Sam and Jake stating that Bill was "ending" the partnership. The letters stated that Bill would no longer be bound by any actions of Sam and Jake, demanded that Sam and Jake immediately cease transacting any business whatsoever on behalf of the partnership, and stated that Bill would not be responsible for any expenses incurred or losses suffered by the business after May 5.

1. What is the effect of Bill's May 1 letters on the ability of the partnership to continue to conduct business, on the allocation of its future profits, and on Bill's continuing liability for expenses or losses? Explain.
2. Is Bill liable to Sam and Jake for wrongful dissolution of the partnership? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE/CONFLICT OF LAWS QUESTION

Husband and Wife, residents of State Y, are owners in joint tenancy of a large tract of land in State Z, which they purchased as an investment several years ago. They recently made an oral agreement to sell the land for $1 million to Developer, a shopping center developer who lives in State Z. The price seemed low to Husband, but he agreed to the sale because Wife told him she was anxious to raise some cash so they could buy a vacation home.

All negotiations concerning the transaction were held at Husband and Wife's home in State Y. Final agreement was reached over dinner after a day of discussions. No written memorandum was made of the oral agreement, but Developer immediately made a $150,000 down payment on the agreed purchase price.

Shortly after the oral agreement was reached, Wife separated from Husband, but she remained domiciled in State Y. Husband later learned from friends that Wife had secretly intended to leave him as soon as the land was sold, that she had privately approached Developer about selling the land before Developer ever contacted Husband and Wife formally, and that Wife had received a separate $250,000 "finder's fee" from Developer for persuading Husband to agree to the sale of the land.

Husband has filed a diversity action against Developer in the federal district court of State Z. The complaint recites the preceding facts and seeks a declaration that the oral agreement for the sale of the land is unenforceable under the State Z statute of frauds.

Under State Z's statute of frauds, oral agreements for the sale of land are never enforceable. Under State Y law, however, such agreements are enforceable when the purchaser has made a down payment.

In lieu of an answer to the complaint, Developer has filed a Rule 12(b) motion. The motion seeks relief from the complaint on two grounds. First, Developer asks for dismissal of the complaint because of Husband's failure to join Wife in the action. Alternatively, Developer seeks dismissal on the ground that the complaint fails to state a claim on which relief can be granted because the oral contract is enforceable under the law of State Y, where the agreement was made.

1. What ruling should the court make with respect to the motion to dismiss for failure to join Wife as a party in the action? Explain.
2. If the case were not dismissed because of Husband's failure to join Wife, how should the court rule on the motion to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS/SALES QUESTION

Builder constructs and manages large condominium developments. In January, Builder began work on a 240-unit complex of luxury condominiums known as the “Eden Project.” Builder borrowed $6 million from Bank to finance this project and granted Bank a construction mortgage on the “land and any improvements thereon” constituting the Eden Project. Bank recorded the mortgage in the proper real estate recording office. The mortgage document recited that the mortgage secured funds loaned “for acquisition of the land and for construction of improvements on the land.”

In March, Builder contacted Seller, an appliance manufacturer, about supplying built-in dishwashers and ranges, and freestanding clothes washers and dryers for the Eden Project. After preliminary negotiations, Builder sent Seller a Purchase Order for the necessary numbers and types of appliances at a total price of $300,000. The Purchase Order also provided that: “Goods are sold to Builder on 120-day credit without interest. Builder hereby grants Seller an unconditional security interest in any and all goods delivered under this contract to secure payment of all amounts owing pursuant to this contract.” Builder signed the Purchase Order.

Seller responded to the Purchase Order by sending Builder an “Order Acknowledgment.” The Order Acknowledgment recited the quantity and price information that appeared on the Purchase Order and indicated that payment should be made “on credit, per Builder’s Purchase Order, subject to the terms and conditions on the reverse of this Acknowledgment.” The back of the Order Acknowledgment contained several preprinted terms, including one term which read as follows: “In addition to the purchase price, the buyer shall pay the seller the amount of all shipping and handling charges.” Builder’s Purchase Order did not mention shipping and handling.

In April, Seller shipped the appliances. Builder installed the appliances in the condominium units in May. On August 1, Seller sent Builder a bill for $315,000, of which $300,000 was for the appliances and $15,000 was for shipping and handling.

It is November, and Builder is unable to pay its bills. It has not paid Seller and is far behind on its payments to Bank.

Seller wishes to repossess the appliances sold to Builder and remove them from the condominium project.

1. Is Builder liable to Seller for the shipping and handling charges? Explain.
2. Does Seller have the right to repossess any or all of the appliances? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Anna and Ben were contemplating getting married. Ben had been married before and had gone through an unpleasant divorce in which he felt that he had received unfair financial treatment. Ben told Anna he would not marry her unless she signed a premarital agreement with the following provisions: (1) all property acquired prior to or during the marriage will be held separately; (2) Anna waives all rights to alimony; (3) if they divorce or separate, custody of any children will be joint and shared; and (4) in the event Anna obtains sole custody, Ben will not be responsible for child support.

Ben's attorney prepared an agreement incorporating these provisions. Ben attached a complete statement of his financial worth to the agreement and gave it to Anna. He recommended to Anna that she show it to her attorney before signing it. Anna's attorney had serious reservations about the document and suggested she refuse to sign it as drafted. However, Anna, who loved Ben and wanted to marry him, signed it anyway without making any changes. Ben and Anna married each other three months after she signed the agreement.

At the time of their marriage, Ben was an investment advisor, with a stock portfolio worth approximately $ 100,000. Anna was a buyer for a specialty clothing store, making a sizeable salary.

Ben and Anna have now been married for ten years. Anna worked for the first seven years of the marriage. When the second of their two children was born, she left her job permanently to stay home and care for the children, who are now six and three years of age.

The marriage has broken down, and both Ben and Anna wish to divorce. Ben's annual salary is $ 150,000 and his portfolio is worth $500,000, in part due to his annually investing part of his salary during the marriage. Anna has no income. Her only asset is a $10,000 Treasury note that she inherited from her aunt.

In the divorce proceedings, Anna requests a property settlement, including a share of Ben's portfolio, as well as alimony, sole custody of the children, and child support. Ben disagrees and insists that they are bound by the premarital agreement.

How is the court likely to rule on each of Anna's requests? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

Acquiror, Inc., a publicly held corporation, entered into negotiations to buy the stock of XYZ Corporation through a merger. Although the companies were close to a final agreement on September 1, Acquiror insisted on delaying consummation and public announcement of the deal until September 15. XYZ agreed to the delay.

Usually, a corporation such as Acquiror that makes a merger offer for another corporation can expect that its stock price will decline after the announcement of the merger.

During the first week of September, while the merger was being delayed, XYZ's stock price increased and Acquiror's stock price remained unchanged at $10 per share. Several press reports suggested that Acquiror might be planning a merger with XYZ. On September 5, in response to specific inquiries from financial reporters and from the stock exchange where Acquiror's stock was listed for trading, Acquiror denied that it had "any agreement to enter into a merger agreement" with XYZ. Investors believed the statement, and the price of Acquiror's stock did not decline but remained at $ 10 per share.

On September 15, Acquiror announced its merger with XYZ. As expected, Acquiror's stock declined to $8 per share.

1. Do investors who purchased Acquiror's stock after Acquiror's denial on September 5 and before the disclosure of the merger have a claim for damages under federal law? Explain.
2. Do continuing shareholders in Acquiror have any basis under federal law to make a claim against Acquiror or its officers and directors if, because of Acquiror's statements, Acquiror is liable to other investors of Acquiror's shares? Explain.

TRUSTS QUESTION

Testator owned 50% of the stock of the ABC Corporation. Testator's sister, Sister, owned the other 50% of the stock.

Testator died in 1994. Under the terms of his testamentary trust, funded solely with his ABC stock, all income was payable to Testator's wife, Wife, for her life. Upon Wife's death the trust principal was payable to Child, who was the child of Testator from a prior marriage. Sister was named trustee of this trust.

In 1995, Sister, as trustee, attempted to sell the trust's ABC stock. The best offer she received was from Buyer, who offered her $80,000 for the stock. Buyer also offered Sister $400,000 if Sister would sell Buyer both the trust's ABC stock and Sister's own 50% share of the outstanding ABC stock. Sister declined this offer, preferring to retain her stock in ABC. After three more months, during which time no other offer materialized, Sister bought the ABC stock from the trust for $100,000. This represented a 25% premium over Buyer's offer.

Sister then invested the entire $100,000 held in the trust in 1,000 shares of Lo-Tech, Inc., a publicly traded company, which had a long record of paying steady and high dividends. At a time when other suitable trust investments were yielding a return of 5% per year, Lo-Tech paid a cash dividend of $8 per share on shares selling for $100 each. Just before Sister bought Lo-Tech stock for the trust, Lo-Tech hit hard times. Nonetheless, it announced that it would continue to pay its usual high dividends, even if share prices would decline as a result. Lo-Tech did so until 1997, and Sister paid all cash dividends to Wife.

In 1997, as Lo-Tech's business continued to slide, Lo-Tech substituted a stock dividend (one-tenth of a share for every share owned) for its previous cash dividend. Thereafter, Sister paid all stock dividends to Wife.

In 1998, Sister sold the trust's 1,000 shares of Lo-Tech because of her concerns about Lo-Tech's financial health. She realized only $50,000 as a result of the company's financial slide. Sister invested the $50,000 in a low-risk mutual fund.

Wife has just died.

What fiduciary duties owed to Child did Sister violate and, as to each:

1. what amount of damages may Child recover; and
2. what other remedies, if any, are available to Child? Explain.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP ANALYSIS

(Agency & Partnership VIII.A, VIII.D)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did Bill breach his duty of care or fiduciary obligations to his partners in ABD Partnership by selling the used manufacturing equipment to a competitor without the partners' knowledge or consent and in contravention of the partnership's established policy?
- (2) Did Bill breach his duty of loyalty or fiduciary obligations to ABD Partnership by patenting the invention in his own name?
- (3) Did Bill breach his duty of loyalty or fiduciary obligations to ABD Partnership by entering into a partnership with a competitor of ABD Partnership?

DISCUSSION

Point One (35-45%)

Bill owes ABD Partnership a duty of care and a duty of loyalty under the RUPA and has fiduciary obligations to ABD Partnership under the UP A. Bill violated his duty of care and fiduciary obligations by selling the used assets of ABD Partnership to a competitor, in violation of partnership policy.

At common law, partners' duties, inter se, are quite strict. According to Justice Cardozo in the frequently quoted case of Meinhard v. Salmon, "Copartners owe to one another... the duty of finest loyalty." "Not honesty alone, but the punctilio of an honor the most sensitive, is then the standard of behavior." 164 N.E. 545, 563 (1928).

The duties of partners to each other have been recognized by statute as well, although slightly different standards are applied under the two most important statutes, the Uniform Partnership Act (UPA) and the Revised Uniform Partnership Act (RUPA). The RUPA expressly recognizes that partners have duties to each other, stating that the "fiduciary duties a partner owes to the partnership and the other partners are the duty of loyalty and the duty of care." RUPA § 404(a) (1992). The duty of care is somewhat limited, however: A partner owes a duty of care to the partnership and the other partners to act in the conduct of the business of the partnership in a manner that does not constitute gross negligence or willful misconduct. An error in judgment or a failure to use ordinary skill and care is not gross negligence. RUPA § 404.

Unlike the RUPA, the UPA does not explicitly set out the fiduciary duties of partners toward one another. However, the fiduciary duties of care and loyalty are implied under the UPA because partners are agents of the partnership. UPA § 9. According to the UPA, "Each partner is an agent of the partnership for the purpose of its business.” Id. Agents owe a duty of care and a duty of loyalty to their principals. Restatement (Second) of Agency §§ 376-398 (1958). Under § 104 of the RUPA, principles of the law of agency apply to partnerships.

In this case, Bill has violated the duty of care for two reasons. First, Bill sold the equipment without the consent of the other partners. The RUPA provides that “each partner has equal rights to management.” RUPA § 401(f) (1992). Further, if there is a difference between partners regarding an act that is within the ordinary course of business, the difference must be decided by a majority of the partners, and any disagreement regarding any act outside the ordinary course of business must be resolved by agreement among all of the partners. Id. at § 401 (j). Regardless of whether the sale of the equipment to XYZ is considered to have been in the ordinary course of business, failure to consult the other partners is likely to be considered willful misconduct. Second, Bill violated the established policy of the partnership against selling used equipment to a close competitor. Agents (and, as agents, partners) have a duty to act only as authorized. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 381 (1958).

Bill may claim that his actions amount to nothing more than “an error in judgment or a failure to use ordinary skill and care,” and accordingly do not violate the duty of care. RUPA § 404(e) (1992). But Bill’s flagrant violation of partnership policy and failure to consult with the other partners is the sort of behavior that a court is likely to regard as willful misconduct and a violation of the duty of care.

The UPA does not expressly impose a duty of care on a partner. However, the UPA does state that “no act in contravention of any agreement between the partners may be done rightfully without the consent of all the partners.” UPA § 18(h). Clearly, Bill sold the equipment in contravention of partnership policy and without obtaining the consent of the other partners, and therefore the action was misconduct under the UPA as well.

Bill did not breach his duty of loyalty to ABD Partnership by patenting the invention in his own name.

The issue in respect of the patent is whether Bill, as an agent and partner, must hold the patent for the benefit of the partnership. As a general rule, an agent or partner assigned “to do noninventive work is entitled to patents which are the result of his invention, although the invention is due to the work for which he is employed.” Restatement (Second) of Agency § 397 (1958). Because Bill is in charge of sales, he is not employed in an inventive capacity and may hold the patent in his own name. In addition, Bill did not use any ABD facilities or any of his business time to develop the keyboard. Id. comment (b). If, unlike the facts given here, Bill had used ABD’s facilities to develop the invention, Bill may have owed the partnership a nonexclusive license to use the invention.

Agency & Partnership Analysis

Point Three (40-50%)

Bill did breach his duty of loyalty by competing with ABD Partnership through his participation in B-XYZ Partnership, and he must account to ABD for the profits derived from the sale of the keyboards for the disabled.

Under the RUPA and under the common law, Bill owes ABD Partnership a duty of loyalty. The duty of loyalty partners owe to the partnership imposed by the RUPA is as follows

- (1) to account to the partnership and hold as trustee for it any property, profit, or benefit derived by the partner, without the informed consent of the other partners, from a transaction connected with the formation, conduct, or liquidation of the partnership or from a use by the partner of partnership property;
- (2) to refrain from dealing with the partnership as, or on behalf of, an adverse party without the informed consent of the other partners, and
- (3) to refrain from competing with the partnership without the informed consent of the other partners. RUPA § 404.

The duty to refrain from competition is also found in agency law: “An agent is subject to a duty not to compete with the principal concerning the subject matter of the agency.” Restatement (Second) of Agency § 393.

The UPA does not expressly impose on a partner a duty of loyalty. However, as noted earlier, a duty of loyalty is implied because of the agency relationship of the partners. Moreover, the UPA requires that “every partner must account to the partnership for any benefit . . . derived by him without the consent of the other partners” in the conduct of the partnership. UPA § 21(1). Bill’s competition with the partnership through his participation in B-XYZ Partnership without obtaining the consent of the other partners is a breach of his obligations.

The issue that Bill is likely to raise is that ABD Partnership does not manufacture computer components to accommodate the disabled. ABD will argue, however, that it manufactures computer keyboards. Given the broad duties found in Meinhard v. Salmon, 164 N.E. 545 (1928), it is likely courts would find Bill’s action of competing in the same general line of business to be a violation of his obligations to ABD Partnership. H. Reuschlein & W. Gregory, The Law of Agency and Partnership (2d ed. 1990), at 279.

It is also possible to argue that Bill should have offered the business opportunity of manufacturing keyboards accommodating the disabled to ABD Partnership before entering into a new partnership with a competitor. Cases such as Guth v. Loft, Inc., 23 Del. Ch. 255, 5 A.2d 503 (1939) (involving a corporation) recognize that part of the duty of loyalty requires that business opportunities must be made available to the principal before the agent individually profits from the opportunity. A good argument can be made that as a part of Bill’s duty of loyalty, he should have first offered to enter into a partnership with ABD to manufacture the specialized keyboard.

Accordingly, the partnership may maintain an action against Bill for his breach of the duty of loyalty and Bill must account to the partnership for the profits he derived from that breach. RUPA § 406(a).

COMMERCIAL PAPER ANALYSIS

(Commercial Paper V.A, V.H, V.I)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Was the indorsement by Fred in the name of SupplyCo an effective indorsement?
- (2) Is there any basis upon which Big Bank could recover the $9,000 paid to Small Bank with respect to the SupplyCo check?
- (3) May Acme successfully demand that Big Bank recredit its account for the $9,000 paid to “SupplyCo”?

DISCUSSION

Point One (25-35%)

The indorsement was effective because an indorsement by any person in the name of a fictitious payee is effective as the indorsement of that payee.

Ordinarily an indorsement in the name of a named payee by other than the named payee or its authorized agent is a forgery and therefore ineffective. No one taking under the forgery of a necessary indorsement can be a holder. UCC § 3-201 (b). Nonetheless, the indorsement by Fred of the $9,000 Acme check payable to the order of SupplyCo is effective for either of two reasons.

First, the indorsement may be effective because of the fictitious payee rule. The Code says that if “the person identified as payee of an instrument is a fictitious person,” then “[a]ny person in possession of the instrument is its holder,” and “[a]n indorsement by any person in the name of the payee stated in the instrument is effective as the indorsement of the payee in favor of a person who, in good faith, pays the instrument or takes it for value or for collection.” UCC § 3-404(b). On our facts, SupplyCo is a fictitious person. Therefore, Fred’s indorsement of the check in the name of “SupplyCo” is effective both as to Small Bank and as to Big Bank, each of which either paid the instrument or took it for value or collection in good faith.

Alternatively, Fred’s indorsement in the name of SupplyCo is effective because Ted, who drew the check on behalf of Acme, never intended an entity called “SupplyCo” to have any interest in the check. Under UCC § 3-404(b), if “a person whose intent determines to whom an instrument is payable... does not intend the person identified as payee to have any interest in the instrument,” then “[a]n indorsement by any person in the name of the payee stated in the instrument is effective as the indorsement of the payee...” Ted, as treasurer of Acme who drew the check to SupplyCo, was the person “whose intent determines to whom [the] instrument is payable.” See UCC § 3-110. Ted did not intend that SupplyCo have any interest in the check. Consequently, Fred’s indorsement in the name of SupplyCo was effective as to both banks.

Point Two (35-45%)

The drawee bank may not recover the payment made to Small Bank because Small Bank acted in good faith.

Big Bank may not recover the payment made to Small Bank for the reason that Small Bank was a holder of the instrument, was entitled to enforce it, and did not breach any warranties in presenting the check to Big Bank. First, as noted in the analysis of Point One, Small Bank was a holder of the instrument because Fred’s indorsement was effective under the fictitious payee rule. As a holder, Small Bank was a “person entitled to enforce” the instrument, and could demand and receive payment from Big Bank. See UCC §§ 3-301, 3-602. Moreover, Small Bank breached no warranties when it presented the instrument to Big Bank for payment. (The applicable warranties are set out in UCC § 3-417; the parallel Article 4 provision is UCC § 4-208.) As noted, Small Bank was a person entitled to enforce the instrument. UCC § 3-417(a)(1). The draft had not been altered, UCC § 3-417(a)(2), and Small Bank had “no knowledge” that the signature of the drawer was unauthorized. UCC § 3-417(a)(3). Consequently, Big Bank has no basis to recover from Small Bank.

Some examinees might argue that Big Bank’s payment was a “Payment or Acceptance by Mistake” under UCC § 3-418, but this would not change the result. Section 3-418 generally applies only to payments over a stop order or to payments where the drawer’s signature was unauthorized. The question states, in its first paragraph, that Ted was authorized to sign checks on behalf of Acme. Moreover, even if Ted’s signature on the SupplyCo check were unauthorized (because it exceeded his actual authority), UCC § 3-418(c) would not permit Big Bank to recover a payment made to “a person who took the instrument in good faith and for value or who in good faith changed position in reliance on the payment.” The facts stipulate that Small Bank acted in good faith, and it certainly gave value and changed its position when it allowed Fred to withdraw funds from the SupplyCo account. Accordingly, there is no basis for recovery even if one regards the signature by Ted as “unauthorized.”

Finally, some examinees who are especially perceptive might note that Big Bank cannot recover anything from Small Bank because it will suffer no loss. That is, if Ted’s signature was authorized, Big Bank can properly charge Acme’s account and will suffer no loss. (See Point Three discussion.)

Point Three (25-35%)

As between the drawee bank and Acme, Acme bears the loss on this check because Ted had apparent authority to sign the check on Acme’s behalf.

As a technical matter, the question of whether a bank may charge or must recredit a customer’s account is governed by Article 4. In particular, UCC § 4-401 authorizes a bank to charge a customer’s account for any item that is “properly payable.” However, the question whether the bank properly paid the check and can charge Acme's account depends on an Article 3 question: whether Ted's signature on this particular check was an authorized signature of Acme.

In this case, Acme obviously would not have authorized Ted to sign a check for fraudulent purposes. However, the facts state that Acme had generally authorized Ted to sign and issue Acme checks; his signature generally authenticated Acme checks. Thus, the signature of Ted was "authorized" for purposes of Article 3. Under UCC § 3-402(a), Acme is bound by Ted's signature on the check if it would be bound by Ted's signature on a simple contract. Although Ted did not have actual authority to sign this particular check, there was no way for the drawee to know that. By generally authorizing Ted to authenticate its checks, Acme invested him with apparent authority adequate to make his signature binding on it in these circumstances. Therefore, the drawee bank properly paid the check and is entitled to charge Acme's account.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES/CONFLICT OF LAWS ANALYSIS

(Decedents' Estates IB.1; II.I/Conflict of Laws)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is Child entitled to take one-half of New Husband's estate, as New Husband's issue, on the ground that Child had been equitably adopted by New Husband?
- (2) Is Child entitled to Wife's estate, located in State A or State B?
- (3) Is Child entitled to Grandmother's entire estate as the alternate beneficiary named in Grandmother's will?

DISCUSSION

Point One (20-30%)

Child is entitled to one-half of New Husband's estate only if State A recognizes the doctrine of equitable adoption and facts can be established to prove there had been an equitable adoption. Among other things, to find an equitable adoption, a court might require that New Husband had promised to adopt Child and, if so, Child cannot take from New Husband's estate. If State does not recognize doctrine or Child cannot prove the required elements, then Child cannot inherit from New Husband's estate.

Under the law of State A, an adopted child is entitled to inherit from the estate of the deceased adopting parent. Thus, if Child had been legally adopted by New Husband, Child would have been entitled to receive one-half of New Husband's estate. (The other half, according to the governing statutes, would have passed to Wife as New Husband's surviving spouse.)

In fact, Child was not adopted by New Husband. Thus, whether Child can inherit from New Husband depends on whether State A recognizes the doctrine of "adoption by estoppel" or "equitable adoption."

If State A does not recognize the doctrine of adoption by estoppel, Child cannot inherit. Many states, however, recognize the doctrine of adoption by estoppel. See generally Note, 58 Va. L. Rev. 727 (1972). Where recognized, an equitably adopted child is entitled to inherit from the "adopting parent" in the same manner as a child who had been legally adopted through the appropriate statutory procedures. While there are variations among the states, most states require the child claiming to have been equitably adopted to prove by clear and convincing evidence that "he has stood from an age of tender years in a position exactly equivalent to a formally adopted child." See Wheeling Dollar Saving & Trust Co. v. Singer, 162 W.Va. 502, 250 S.E.2d 369 (1978). The requirement is that the "adopting parent" have treated the "adopted child" in the same manner as a parent generally would treat a child. Relevant factors establishing the relationship might include: (1) the "adopting parent's" bestowal of love and affection on the child, (2) the “adopting parent’s” performance of parental duties toward the child, (3) the child’s obedience to and companionship toward the “adopting parent,” (4) the child’s reliance on an adoptive relationship, and (5) the “adoptive parent’s” holding out the child as his child. Id. at 509. Many courts also require the child to prove that the “adopting parent” had promised, agreed, or attempted to adopt the child formally. See, e.g., Cavanaugh v. Davis, 149 Tex. 573, 235 S.W.2d 972 (1951).

The facts state that New Husband raised Child and in all respects treated Child as if Child were his biological child. This statement might be construed to suggest that the five elements mentioned above were satisfied. However, even if that were the case, in many states there must also have been a promise or agreement to adopt the child and no facts suggest such a promise was made here.. If a promise or agreement were required, Child could not claim an equitable adoption. If a promise or agreement is not required an equitable adoption might be formed. Absent an equitable adoption, New Husband’s estate would pass to Wife and Uncle (as New Husband’s closest living blood relative).

In a jurisdiction recognizing the doctrine of equitable adoption, if Child could prove sufficient facts to establish a basis for invoking the doctrine, New Husband’s estate would be distributed one-half to Wife and one-half to Child.

Point Two (30-40%)

Child is not entitled to inherit Wife’s property in State B but is entitled to inherit Wife’s real property in State A. State B law controls inheritance rights for all of Wife’s property other than the real property located in State A because State B was the state of Wife’s domicile at the time of her death. State A law, however, controls the disposition of the State A real property.

Whether Child is entitled to inherit as an heir of Wife depends upon whether the law of State A (permitting inheritance), where Child was adopted and certain real property is located, or the law of State B (not permitting inheritance), where Wife was domiciled at the time of death, apply. According to Restatement of Conflicts, Second, § 262, whether an adopted child is entitled to inherit the property of an intestate depends upon the law of the intestate’s domicile at the time of death. Thus, the comments provide that “if the law that would be applied by the courts of the state where the decedent was domiciled at the time of his death does not allow an adopted child to take a distributive share, he will not do so although the law governing the adoption would allow him to take.” Comment d, Restatement of Conflicts, Second, § 262. See also Unif. Prob. Code § 1-301; Pazzi v. Taylor, 342 N.W.2d 481 (Iowa 1984). This rule might be justified on the ground that the state of the intestate’s domicile at the time of intestate’s death has the most significant contacts with respect to this issue as to how the intestate’s estate should be administered as well as the most significant interest in determining which children in the state should have claims against a decedent’s property. Furthermore, estate administration is eased if only the laws of one jurisdiction control for purposes of determining the distribution of the decedent’s personal property.

However, this rule is inapplicable to real property located outside of the state of the intestate’s domicile. Under Restatement of Conflicts, Second § 263, the law governing the disposition of real property from an intestate is the law of the situs.

Decedents' Estates Analysis

Thus, Child is entitled to inherit the State A real property because State A permits an adopted child to inherit from his or her adopting parent. On the other hand, Child is not entitled to inherit Wife's State B property.

Point Three (30-40%)

Child is not entitled to take Grandmother's estate as the alternate beneficiary under her will under the State B class gifts statute. However, there are good arguments that under generally applicable rules for construing wills, Child should take under Grandmother's will because that is what she intended.

Whether Child is entitled to take under Grandmother's will also depends on the law of State B because she died a domiciliary of State B. State B law provides that an adopted child cannot inherit from an adopting parent who dies intestate. It also provides that "if an adopting parent leaves a testamentary class gift to his or her children, adopted children are included in the class gift." (emphasis added) Under this statute, if Wife had bequeathed property to her "children," Child would have been entitled to share in that class gift because the bequest would have been made by the adopting parent. The statute, however, does not provide similar treatment for class gifts to grandchildren. Thus, Child could not rely on this statute to argue that she is included in the class gift to children.

On the other hand, Child may be included in the class gift under Grandmother's will under general common-law principles. The governing principle is that in construing a testator's will, courts should, whenever possible, give effect to a testator's intent. Under this "intent principle," there is a strong argument that Grandmother intended Child to be included in the testamentary class gift. This conclusion is based upon the fact that Grandmother's will was signed two years before she died and at a time when she knew that Wife had only one child and was then a widow with little or no expectation of having more children. Furthermore, Grandmother was close to the child. Although Grandmother was a so-called "stranger to the adoption," most courts today would include an adopted child within a class gift under the facts of this problem even though no state statute specifically so provides. See generally William S. McGovern, Sheldon Kurtz & Jan E. Rein, Wills, Trusts and Estates § 2.2 (West Publishing Co. 1988).

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure IV.E.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does the existence of a material issue on the face of the pleadings preclude adjudication of a case without trial?
- (2) Does conflict in affidavits concerning an immaterial fact preclude a summary judgment?
- (3) Does the plaintiffs affidavit controverting defendant's version of the accident preclude a summary judgment, when affidavits and depositions clearly show that plaintiff cannot present evidence to support her version of the facts?

DISCUSSION

Point One (20-30%)

Existence of a material issue on the face of the pleadings will not preclude adjudication of a case without trial when it is shown on motion for summary judgment, as here, that plaintiff has no evidence to support her pleading on the issue of defendant's negligence.

The face of the pleadings in this case presents a material issue of fact, namely, whether Driver's negligence was the proximate cause of the collision between his auto and Cyclist's motorcycle. A motion for summary judgment is a procedural device that is capable of going behind the pleadings and demonstrating that there really is no genuine issue as to any material fact. Fed.R.Civ.P 56; Friedenthal, Kane & Miller, Civil Procedure §§ 9.1-9.3 (1985). Absent any genuine and material factual issue, there is no need for a trial of the action. One side or the other is entitled to win the case as a matter of law.

Driver has used an interrogatory (Fed.R.Civ.P. 33) to force Passenger to state a more specific basis for her conclusory allegation that Driver was "negligent." He has then set about showing that when the case comes to trial, Passenger will have no evidence to support this claim. If this is so, at trial Driver will be entitled to a directed verdict at the close of the plaintiffs case. His motion for a summary judgment is in essence an accelerated motion for a directed verdict: it seeks to show the court now what will happen later at trial after the plaintiff has rested her case at trial. "[T]he standard [for granting summary judgment] mirrors the standard for a directed verdict. . . ." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc. 477 U.S. 242 (1986).

Under Ceotex v. Catrett, 411 U.S. 317 (1986), Driver must inform the court of the basis for his motion, explaining why there is no genuine issue of fact. The papers supporting and opposing the motion for summary judgment indicate that there are three factual issues: (1) Was the stop sign for westbound traffic obscured by weeds? (2) Did Driver bring his vehicle to a complete stop before proceeding into the intersection? (3) Did Cyclist stop at the stop sign? Driver must explain to the court that the first factual issue is immaterial, that he has affirmatively produced evidence in his favor on the second and third, and that Passenger will be unable to provide evidence to refute Driver's evidence regarding the second and third issues.

Point Two (20-30%)

The conflict in the affidavits concerning the visibility of the stop sign will not pre-clude a summary judgment because that issue will be immaterial in the light of uncontradicted evidence that Driver did stop.

Driver, in his affidavit, and Witness, in his deposition, swear that the stop sign was obscured by weeds. On the other hand, the affidavit of the investigating police officer says that it was plainly visible. This creates a genuine issue of fact on this matter. Although a motion for summary judgment can dissolve a "paper" issue, it cannot resolve a genuine one. Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(b), (c); Friedenthal, Kane & Miller, Civil Procedure § 9.3 (1985). Therefore, if this issue is also a material one, the motion for summary judgment must be denied.

This issue would be material if Driver was claiming that he failed to stop because he could not see the stop sign. However, Driver's supporting papers show that notwithstanding the obscured sign, he did manage to see and obey the sign by stopping his auto. Therefore, the visibility of the stop sign is not a material fact in this case.

Point Three (40-50%)

Plaintiffs affidavit controverting defendant's version of the accident will not preclude a summary judgment because her affidavit fails to show that she can produce any evidence to support her allegation that defendant failed to stop.

This is clearly a material factual issue whether Driver failed to stop at the intersection. However, for it to be a genuine issue it must appear that at trial Passenger will have enough evidence to take her version of the accident to the jury. Driver swears that he stopped and that Cyclist did not; Witness corroborates this. This makes it incumbent on Passenger to show that at trial she will have some evidence to the contrary. Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(e); Friedenthal, Kane & Miller, Civil Procedure § 9.3, pp. 440-41 (1985); Celotex, supra.

At trial Passenger cannot testify herself about which driver ran the stop sign, because her amnesia precludes her from having any personal knowledge about this matter. Since she has no admissible evidence to support her version of the accident, she will be unable, at trial, to carry her burden of proof on the issue of Driver's negligence. Passenger cannot make an issue merely by questioning the credibility of Driver's or Witness's affidavits, unless she provides affidavits supporting her case on the merits or specifically casting doubts on the veracity of their statements. Id. at 442. Therefore, there is no genuine issue as to this material fact. See Celotex Corp. v. Catrett 477 U.S. 317 (1986). It may be conventional wisdom that summary judgment is generally inappropriate in negligence cases, because the jury may still infer negligence when underlying facts are undisputed; but that does not apply here, because plaintiff has no evidence to establish the only particular fact (Driver's failure to stop) from which negligence could be inferred.

The outcome of the case is a foregone conclusion: Driver would be entitled to a directed verdict because of Passenger's lack of evidence to support her version of the accident. Accordingly, the trial court should enter a summary judgment in his favor.

FAMILY LAW ANALYSIS

(Family Law III.D, III.E, III.F)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is a spouse's interest in a closely held corporation, which the spouse founded and worked in throughout the marriage and in which marital funds were invested, marital property subject to division at divorce?
- (2) Is a spouse who divorces after a medium-length marriage and who can be self-supporting, but not at the marital standard of living, entitled to spousal support, and, if so, for how long and at what level?
- (3) How is the amount of child support determined when the noncustodial parent's income is very high?

DISCUSSION

Point One (35-45%)

Harry's closely held corporation stock is marital property because the stock was acquired with marital funds and through the industry of both spouses during the marriage.

Property which spouses acquire during the marriage is presumed to be marital property. Uniform Marital Property Act § 4(b)(1983); Uniform Marriage and Divorce Act (UMDA) § 307, 9 U.L.A. 490 (1973); H. Clark, The Law of Domestic Relations, Second § 15.2 & nn.3,7 (1988). The fact that title to the AVR stock is held in Harry's name alone does not rebut this presumption, since he determined in whose name the stock would be held. The remaining facts in this problem support the conclusion that the stock is marital property. The company was initially financed with a wedding gift, which is marital property, and with money the spouses earned after the wedding, which is also marital property. The business grew because of Harry's efforts and skills, and the product of a person's efforts during marriage is ordinarily marital property. Further, the business is the family's major source of livelihood. Clark, supra, § 15.2 & n.27. Moreover, Wanda worked during the early years, giving Harry the flexibility to invest so much time and energy in the business. Wanda's career sacrifice, contribution as homemaker, and entertainer of business guests enabled Harry to expend his time building the business.

Even though Harry reorganized the business into a corporation, his shares of stock are traceable to his original interest in the company, which was marital property, and, therefore, they are marital property as well. Indeed, Wanda might try to argue that the whole corporation (including the stock held by the employee profit-sharing plan) is Harry's, on the theory that it is his alter ego. However, the fact that a third party owns shares in the corporation cuts against this argument, particularly because AVR was incorporated and the stocks were contributed to the employee profit-sharing plan for valid business purposes, and there is no evidence of a fraudulent conveyance. Clark, supra, § 15.1 & n.17.

Point Two (35-45%)

Following a medium-length marriage a court would probably award spousal support only if the dependent spouse's share of marital property is insufficient to generate enough income to meet his or her needs. If the income from the property is insufficient, a court would probably award spousal support for at least long enough to allow the dependent spouse to become self-supporting. However, some courts might award a spouse in Wanda's position permanent spousal support if necessary to enable her to maintain the marital standard of living.

Spousal support is awarded on the basis of a number of factors, including the payor's ability to pay, the recipient's need and ability to be self-supporting, and the marital standard of living. The first factor is not a limit here.

The problem is determining what Wanda's "needs" are. In some states, a person is not considered to be in need if he or she has sufficient income to support a modest standard of living, regardless of the marital standard of living. A court following this approach would probably still award Wanda "rehabilitative alimony," that is, temporary support at a sufficient level and for sufficient time to enable her to update her teaching credentials and re-establish her career. Some courts would also extend the period of temporary support to enable her to remain at home to care for the children while they are young. Clark, supra, § 16.4.

However, in many states spouses are considered to be in need if their income is insufficient to maintain the marital standard of living, at least in some circumstances. Several factors here would support an award to enable Wanda to maintain the marital standard of living. She stopped working to care for the family and to entertain Harry's business friends. Wanda could argue that she sacrificed her own career to further Harry's and the children's interests and that the court should reward these reliance expenditures. In some states this marriage would be treated as a long-term marriage, which would strengthen Wanda's claim to maintain the marital standard of living. Clark, § 16.4 & nn. 80-82.

If Wanda is entitled to spousal support, most courts would first determine whether she was awarded sufficient property to generate the income she needs. UMDA § 308(a), 9 U.L.A. 160 (1979). If her share of the property is not sufficient to generate enough income, she will be awarded spousal support, although in this case a property settlement of one-half of Harry's stock would be about $4 million, probably enough to vitiate the need for spousal support.

In a few states Wanda's commission of adultery would preclude her from being awarded spousal support; and in others it would diminish the amount she received. Clark, supra, § 16.4 & n.21. However, fault may not be considered under UMDA § 308(b), 9 U.L.A. 160 (1979) and under the laws of many states.

Point Three (25-35%)

Most courts would not award child support based solely on a percentage of the parents' income where that income is very high. Instead, they would cap the award based on some evaluation of the child's needs.

Child support is based on the parents' capacity to pay, the parents' income, and the needs of the children. All states now have child support guidelines, as required by federal law. Social Security Act, 42 U.S.C.A. § 667. The guidelines must consider the income of the noncustodial parent and must also provide for the child's health care needs. 45 C.F.R. § 302.56 (1996). In all states the amount produced by the formula is presumed to be the proper amount of the award, although this presumption is rebuttable. Deviations from the guideline can be made only upon express findings of fact.

Where the parents' combined income is very high, as here, some state guidelines would establish a presumptive amount that would be far more than any measure of the children's needs, while other guidelines would not address this situation at all. In either case, most courts probably would not apply the guidelines or extrapolate from them in a way that resulted in an extremely high award.

Instead, the primary factor that a court would most likely consider is the children's needs, generously defined. Clark, supra, § 17.1. Another factor might be the degree of luxury established during the marriage. UMDA § 309. Lynn D. Wardle, Christopher L. Blakesley & Jacqueline Y. Packer, Contemporary Family Law: Principles, Policy and Practice § 38.02 (1988).

(Corporations III)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Do the facts justify piercing the corporate veil of HotTrucks in order to hold its parent liable for tort claims of the subsidiary?
- (2)(a) Do the facts justify piercing the corporate veil of Transport?
- (2)(b) If the court pierces the corporate veil of Transport, is each of Able, Baker, or Campbell personally liable to the injured persons?
- (2)(c) Is Baker, as the negligent driver of the truck, protected from liability because he was acting on behalf of the corporation?

DISCUSSION

Point One (35-45%)

A court is likely to pierce the corporate veil of HotTrucks because certain formalities of corporate procedure have not been followed, it is undercapitalized, and it is an alter ego or agent of Transport.

As a general rule, shareholders of a corporation are not personally liable for the debts of the corporation. Harry G. Henn & John R. Alexander, Laws of Corporations, § 146 at 344-347 (1983). One exception to this general rule is the doctrine of piercing the corporate veil. Courts generally look to see whether the corporation has been so dominated by an individual or another corporation that it may be considered as the other's "alter ego." Robert W. Hamilton, The Law of Corporations, § 6.2 at 829-831 (1987).

When analyzing whether a parent corporation is liable for the obligations of its subsidiary, courts have looked for the existence of the following circumstances:

- "The formalities of separate corporate procedures for each corporation are not observed." Henn & Alexander, § 148 at 356 (1983).
- "The corporation is inadequately financed as a separate unit " Id. The courts analyze whether the corporation is capitalized to meet "its normal obligations foreseeable in a business of its size and character..." Id.
- "The policies of the corporation are not directed to its own interests primarily but rather to those of the other corporation." Id.

Each of the three elements is present in the case of HotTrucks. HotTrucks did not observe required corporate formalities such as conducting regular directors' meetings. In addition,

Corporations Analysis

Campbell, who is listed as the corporation's officer and director, did not manage the business and in fact had nothing to do with it. The facts indicate that Able and Baker, who actually managed Transport, the parent corporation, also managed HotTrucks, the subsidiary corporation, even though they were not officers of HotTrucks.

Furthermore, HotTrucks was inadequately capitalized since its sole asset was the use of ten trucks. The business of hauling hazardous waste is risky, and HotTrucks does not have assets sufficient to meet the obligations and risks associated with the type of business in which it is engaged.

Finally, the policies of HotTrucks were directed at the interests of Transport not at its own independent business interests. This is shown by the fact that no business insurance was obtained to cover its operations and from the fact that the nature of HotTrucks' business was to service certain high risk activities in which Transport was unwilling to engage. Robert W. Hamilton, Corporations, IYB(4) at 205 (1992). The subsidiary corporation was, in substance, an alter ego of Transport.

As a result, a court is likely to pierce the corporate veil and hold Transport liable for the obligations of HotTrucks in connection with the truck accident.

Point Two(a) (25-35%)

A court may pierce the corporate veil of Transport because Transport failed to follow certain corporate formalities in its operation of the business.

The standards for piercing the corporate veil are the same whether the shareholders are corporations or individuals. As a general rule, "where corporate formalities are substantially observed, initial financing reasonably adequate, and the corporation not formed to evade an existing obligation or a statute or to cheat or to defraud, even a controlling shareholder enjoys limited liability." Henn & Alexander, § 146 at 347.

There is no evidence that Transport was inadequately capitalized since the business has been profitable and most of its earnings were retained for use in the business, rather than distributed to the shareholders as dividends. Transport was not set up for any fraudulent or illegal purpose. A desire by owners of a business to benefit from the limited liability that a corporate form provides does not constitute an improper purpose. Henn & Alexander, § 146 at 344.

However, the shareholders of Transport failed to follow corporate formalities: shareholders' and directors' meetings were not held; Able and Baker made all decisions by consensus without involving Campbell; and Able did not treat his personal finances and those of Transport separately.

Courts are inconsistent in their approach to piercing the corporate veil when corporate formalities are disregarded but the other elements of proper corporate existence are found. If the corporation is adequately capitalized and there is no other evidence of inequity or fraud, some courts refuse to pierce the corporate veil. See, e.g., Zubik v. Zubik, 384 F.2d 267 (3rd Cir.1967). Other courts pierce the corporate veil in cases like this because shareholders should not be permitted to ignore the rules of corporate behavior and claim the advantage of the corporate shield. See Zaist v. Olson, 227 A.2d 552 (Conn. 1967); Hamilton, Corporations IVB(3) at 203-204; Lewis D. Solomon & Alan R. Palmiter, Corporations: Examples and Explanations § 6.24 at 71-72.

Therefore, it is arguable but not certain that a court would pierce the corporate veil of Transport.

Point Two(b) (10-20%)

If the corporate veil of Transport is pierced. Able and Baker are likely to be the shareholders personally liable, but Campbell, a passive shareholder, may not be held personally liable.

As a general rule, when courts pierce the corporate veil, all of the shareholders of that corporation are liable. Some courts, however, have not extended liability to passive investors. Solomon & Palmiter, § 6.2.7 at 73. There “is some authority, for example, for piercing the corporate veil to hold shareholders active in the business personally liable, but recognizing the same corporation’s separate existence to protect passive investors from the same liability.” Hamilton § 6.9 at 99. See discussion in Musco Corp. v. Qualite, Inc., 1994 U.S. Dist. Lexis 9799 at n.6. Protecting passive investors seems particularly appropriate if the corporate shield is being pierced because the corporation is the alter ego or agent of dominant shareholders.

Able and Baker were active investors in Transport; they made all major corporate decisions by consensus. Able and Baker each owned 45% of the shares of Transport and Able did not treat the finances of Transport separately from his personal finances. In addition, the facts indicate that Transport was operated as the agent of Able and Baker who were the dominant shareholders. This is shown by the fact that shareholders’ and directors’ meetings were not called or held and that the decisions were made by Able and Baker alone without any input from Campbell. This makes it even more likely that a court would pierce the corporate veil of Transport and hold Able and Baker personally liable.

By contrast, Campbell was only a 10% shareholder and did not participate in the business in any way. As a result of Campbell’s role as a passive investor, some courts would not hold Campbell personally liable even if the corporate veil of Transport was pierced and Able and Baker were held personally liable.

Point Two(c) (5-15%)

Baker, as the negligent driver of the truck, is not protected from liability by virtue of his corporate position.

The general rule is that if “the shareholder personally commits a tort while acting as an agent for his or her corporation, he or she is personally liable for the tort because of the general rule that tortfeasors are personally liable even though they are acting as agents.” Hamilton, § 6.3, at 83. See also Henn & Alexander, § 146 at 347. Likewise, an “agent who does an act otherwise a tort is not relieved from liability by the fact that he acted at the command of the principal or on account of the principal.” Restatement (Second) of Agency § 343 (1957).

Corporations Analysis

Baker was negligent when he fell asleep while driving the truck for HotTrucks that was involved in the accident. He cannot argue that he is not personally liable because he was acting as an employee of HotTrucks. Because Baker was negligent, he is liable for the accident whether or not the corporate veil of Transport is pierced.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS ANALYSIS

(Secured Transactions III.C, IV.A.F)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does Lender's security interest cover future advances when the security agreement is silent on the point?
- (2) Which of two unperfected security interests prevails?

DISCUSSION

Point One (40-60%)

Because Lender's security agreement explicitly applied only to the May 3 loan, it does not cover future advances made by Lender. Thus, Lender's August 1 loan is unsecured and Lender no longer has a security interest in Press No. 1. Bank prevails.

The security agreement between Lender and Debtor provided that Lender had a security interest in Debtor's equipment to secure the $ 100,000 loan granted "on May 3." Thus, on its face the agreement does not cover any obligation owed to Lender by Debtor other than the May 3 loan.

Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code permits security agreements to cover future advances. See UCC § 9-204. However, a security agreement covers fixture advances only if the security agreement explicitly includes a future advances clause. Id. at comment 5.

Here, Lender's May 3 loan has been paid in full. It has made a further loan, but there is no agreement giving it a security interest in Press No. 1 or Press No. 2 to secure that further loan. Thus, Lender is completely unsecured. By contrast, Bank's security agreement with Debtor expressly covers "all loans and future advances." Thus, Bank's August 1 loan is secured.

Some examinees will be tempted to conclude that Lender has priority over Bank because of the fact that Lender was the only party to file a financing statement. However, although Lender has filed a financing statement, it is unsecured as to its second loan (i.e., future advance). Bank, on the other hand, is secured although its interest is unperfected. Because Lender is only a general creditor of Debtor with no security interest or lien to secure the August 1 loan, Lender has no enforceable interest in Debtor's property. Thus, Bank is the only party with a security interest in Press No. 1 even though it failed to file a financing statement. Although that interest is unperfected, its interest still has priority over Lender.

Point Two(a) (40-60%)

With respect to Press No. 2. Bank and CreditCo have conflicting unperfected security interests. In such a situation, the first security interest to attach prevails, (b) CreditCo's interest was first to attach because Bank's unperfected interest secures only the August 1 loan, which was made after CreditCo's interest attached.

Secured Transactions Analysis

As noted above, Lender has no interest in Press No. 2 because Debtor's current obligation to Lender is unsecured.

(a) First-to-attach has priority.

Bank does have an interest in Press No. 2. Its interest secures the $100,000 advance it made on August 1 because Bank's security agreement with Debtor had an explicit future advance clause and an after-acquired property clause. However, Bank's interest is unperfected because it never filed a financing statement.

CreditCo also has a security interest in Press No. 2 to secure the purchase money loan it made to Debtor to purchase the machine, but CreditCo also neglected to file a financing statement.

Neither Bank nor CreditCo has a perfected interest, because neither filed a financing statement. In the event of a conflict between unperfected security interests, "the first to attach has priority." UCC § 9-312.

(b) CreditCo was first to attach.

The first-to-attach rule favors CreditCo in this case. A security interest based on a written security agreement attaches when the last of three things occurs: (i) debtor has signed the security agreement, (ii) value has been given, and (iii) debtor has rights in the collateral. In this case, Debtor signed the agreement with Bank in May and Bank advanced value to Debtor at that time. However, Debtor did not acquire rights in Press No. 2 until June 2, so Bank's security interest in Press No. 2 attached at that time. However, CreditCo's security interest attached at the same instant. CreditCo and Debtor signed a security agreement on June 1 and CreditCo gave value at that time. Debtor acquired rights in the collateral on June 2, so CreditCo's interest attached the instant Debtor acquired rights in the collateral, just as Bank's did. But Debtor paid off Bank's May loan, extinguishing its security interest in Press No. 2, and the security interest did not re-attach until the August 1 loan was made. (The priority of future advances dates back to the time of the first advance under § 9-312(7), but only if the security interest is perfected.)

(Decedents' Estates II.A, II.F, II.J)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did Testator execute the will with the formalities required by the statute of wills?
- (2) In light of the facts, could Testator's will be denied probate (or have its probate set aside) on the grounds that the Testator executed the will while under the undue influence of others?
- (3) Was the $100,000 bequest revoked by cancellation as a result of the fact that, when the will was found, the language of the bequest had been crossed out with a black felt-tip pen?

DISCUSSION

Point One (20-30%)

Under the statutes of wills imposing minimum formalities of execution, the will appears to have been validly executed in that it was signed for Testator by a third party in Testator's presence and at Testator's direction, and witnessed by at least two witnesses.

The Uniform Probate Code § 2-502 requires either that the testator sign her will or that another sign the testator's name "in the testator's conscious presence and by the testator's direction." This statute, in common with most statutes of wills, contemplates the possibility that under certain circumstances the testator may be physically unable to sign his or her name. While "third-party signing" statutory provisions were historically motivated by a concern that a testator would not know how to write, the language is sufficiently broad to validate third-party executed wills whenever the testator's signature has been affixed to the document by another acting at the testator's direction and in the testator's presence. While the UPC has no declaration or verbal attestation request requirement, factually both occurred here and the will would not fail for want of due execution on those grounds, if required by the governing statute.

Under the facts, Testator first attempted to sign the will on her own. When that failed because of her shaking hand, she requested President to sign for her, which he did, in her presence. Thus the statutory requirements appear to be fully satisfied and the will was validly executed. See generally William McGovern, Sheldon F. Kurtz & Jan Rein, Wills, Trusts and Estates § 4.2.

Point Two (40-50%)

It is unlikely under the facts presented that the court would find that the will was procured by undue influence.

Wills may be contested on a number of grounds, including undue influence. The burden to prove that a will should be denied probate on this ground is upon the contestant. UPC § 3-407.

Courts scrutinize cases for undue influence when the will leaves property to persons who would not otherwise be deemed to be natural objects of a testator's bounty. In this case, it is possible that a court might find Nursing Home a natural object of Testator's bounty since she had spent much time there, was apparently well-cared for, and was not close to her blood relatives.

To set aside a will on the grounds of undue influence, the contestant must prove that, at the time the will was signed, the testator was susceptible to undue influence, that the procurer had motive and opportunity to influence, and that the will was a result of the substitution of wills. William McGovern, Sheldon F. Kurtz & Jan Rein, Wills, Trusts and Estates § 7.3. As to the first requirement, susceptibility, the contestant alleges weakened physical state; on the other hand, the facts state Testator was mentally competent and include no facts suggesting a weakened mental state.

Motive (to secure the bequest) and opportunity (confinement in nursing home; participation in execution) are easily demonstrated.

The most difficult element to prove is substitution of wills. If the burden of proof remains on the contestant, he cannot merely imply it from the existence of other elements, and substitution by direct evidence is difficult to prove. Weakened physical state is not evidence of weakened mental state; in fact, here the Testator was mentally competent when she signed the will; furthermore, there is no evidence that Testator's free agency was overcome by President, so that the will can be regarded as a product of his volition rather than hers. Here, for example, it appears that Testator initiated the draft of her new will. Furthermore, Testator had no close relatives who had attended her that she might have preferred to Nursing Home; she hadn't seen Cousin in a decade.

There is the possibility of arguing that a confidential relationship existed between Testator and President, raising a higher degree of suspicion and perhaps even a presumption of undue influence. While President received nothing under the will, jurisdictions usually do not require personal benefit. In re Estate of Maheres, 897 P.2d 268 (OK. 1995). However, courts have held that the mere showing of a confidential relationship is insufficient to set aside a will on the grounds of undue influence.

Point Three (20-30%)

Unless the presumption about marks of cancellation found on a will is overcome which may be possible under the facts), the bequest to Charles will be revoked if the jurisdiction permits partial revocations.

Most jurisdictions recognize "partial revocation by physical act." UPC § 2-507(a). The straight black line through the bequest is a "cancellation" within the meaning of the statute since it came in contact with the words of the will. When marks of cancellation are found on a will known to last have been in the testator's possession, a presumption arises that such marks were made by the testator with the intent to revoke. See William McGovern, Sheldon F. Kurtz & Jan Rein, Wills, Trusts and Estates, § 5.2. Under this presumption, it would appear that the bequest had been revoked by the testator. If the bequest is revoked, then it passes as part of the residuary estate to Nursing Home, as President claims. In jurisdictions that do not permit partial revocations, the bequest to Charles is valid because partial revocations are impermissible.

The presumption of revocation is rebuttable. The burden to overcome this presumption is on the party claiming that the bequest has not been revoked. Here, two facts may aid in rebutting the presumption. The first is that while the will was in the custody of the decedent until her death (and the law, therefore, presumes that the cancellation was made by the decedent with intent to revoke), the will was found by an individual who, as an employee of the beneficiary, might have an interest in seeing the bequest revoked. While this fact alone is probably not sufficient to overcome the presumption, there is also the fact that the marks of cancellation were made by a straight black line. Testator, at the time she attempted to sign the will, had a chronic tremor and was in such weakened physical condition that she was incapable of holding a pen. Given that condition, it is unlikely that her condition had improved between December 28 when the will was signed and the following January 2 when she died. There is, accordingly, good reason to believe that she did not make the marks on the will. In light of this, a jury could conclude that the presumption had been overcome and that the bequest to Charles was not revoked.

If the state does not permit partial revocations, the bequest to Charles is not revoked.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP ANALYSIS

(Agency & Partnership V, VIII.B)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) What effect do Bill's letters have, if any, on continuation of the partnership business and allocation of expenses, losses and profits?
- (2) Is Bill liable in damages to Sam and Jake for sending the May 1 letters?

DISCUSSION

Point One (55-65%)

Bill's May 1 letters did not terminate the partnership, although the letters dissolved the partnership of Sam, Jake, and Bill. The partnership will not terminate until the winding-up of the partnership is completed. Old business must be completed, with expenses, losses and profits shared as per the partnership agreement. New business may not be undertaken by the partnership.

Under the Uniform Partnership Act (UPA), a partner has the power to dissolve a partnership at any time. See UPA §31. See also Claire M. Dickerson, Partnership Law Adviser 223-224 (1991). Dissolution of a partnership is defined by the UPA as "the change in the relation of the partners caused by any partner ceasing to be associated in the carrying on as distinguished from the winding-up of the business." UPA § 29. The partnership is not terminated by the dissolution, but rather "continues until the winding-up of partnership affairs is completed." UPA § 30. See also Harold G. Reuschlein & William A. Gregory, The Law of Agency and Partnership § 227 at 343 (2d ed. 1990). Thus, the terms "dissolution" and "termination," as used in the UPA, are not synonyms. Englestein v. Mackie, 182 N.E.2d 351, 357-58 (111. App. Ct. 1962). Under the UPA, winding-up (sometimes referred to as liquidation of the partnership) is the process that normally occurs between the dissolution and the termination of a partnership. See Englestein, 182 N.E.2d at 357-58.

Under the above principles, Bill's May 1 letters did not terminate the partnership, even though they purported to end it. Instead, the letters dissolved the partnership of Sam, Jake and Bill. As a result, Bill was no longer associated with Sam and Jake in the carrying on of the partnership's dry cleaning business. The letters did not terminate the partnership because after the dissolution it was still necessary to wind up the partnership affairs. The partnership will terminate at the completion of the winding-up process. Moreover, Bill will receive his share of the profits from the Hotel contract, and he will also remain liable for any expenses or losses incurred in the winding-up process, including the expenses of carrying out the Hotel contract (as opposed to losses resulting from new business), even if the losses are incurred after May 5.

Agency & Partnership Analysis

Sam and Jake have no authority to enter into new business on behalf of the partnership after dissolution of the partnership by Bill. However, Sam and Jake have authority to wind up the partnership by finishing uncompleted business, including completion of the contract with Hotel. In addition, they have authority to do any acts necessary to wind up the partnership business. Acts that may be necessary for the winding-up of the partnership business include collecting debts owed to the partnership, paying obligations owed by the partnership, liquidating partnership assets, and settling accounts between the partners. See Reuschlein & Gregory, supra, § 227 at 344-45.

The right of Sam and Jake to wind up the partnership is not affected by Bill's May 1 letters demanding that Sam and Jake cease transacting any business on behalf of the partnership. Bill does not have the unilateral power to prevent Sam and Jake from completing unfinished business and winding up partnership affairs. Unless there is a different agreement between the parties, Sam and Jake have a right to wind up partnership affairs. Security First Nat'l Bank v. Whittaker, 50 Cal. Rptr. 652, 654 (Cal. Dist. Ct. App. 1966).

Point Two (35-45%)

Bill is not liable to Sam and Jake for dissolving the partnership because the partnership was a partnership at will. Dissolution of a partnership at will is not wrongful.

A partner always has the power to dissolve the partnership. However, under the UPA a partner is liable for damages if he or she dissolves a partnership in contravention of the partnership agreement. UPA § 38(b). For example, if the partnership agreement specifies a term of duration or a particular undertaking for the partnership, a dissolution before the expiration of the specified term or the accomplishment of the particular undertaking contravenes the partnership agreement. UPA § 3' 1(2). In those situations the partner has the power but not the legal right to dissolve the partnership. See II Alan R. Bromberg & Larry E. Ribstein, Partnership § 7.03(a) (1994); Reuschlein & Gregory, supra, § 229(G).

A dissolution of a partnership does not contravene the agreement between the partners where the agreement does not specify a definite term or a particular undertaking for the partnership. UPA § 31(l)(b). Such a partnership is often referred to as a partnership at will. The law is clear that a partner is not required to have cause to dissolve a partnership at will. Girard Bank v. Haley, 332 A.2d 443, 446 (Pa. 1975). A partner in a partnership at will has both the power and the legal right to dissolve the partnership. See II Bromberg & Ribstein, supra, § 7.02(c); Reuschlein & Gregory, supra, § 227 at 344.

The partnership agreement between Sam, Jake, and Bill is a partnership at will. The partnership agreement does not specify a term for the partnership and the partnership is not for a particular undertaking. See Butler v. Forker, 221 N.E.2d 570,573 (Ind. Ct. App. 1966)(concluding that partnership to build a bridge dissolved upon completion of bridge). While the partnership agreement states that it is for the purpose of operating a dry cleaning business, this is insufficient to make the partnership one for a particular undertaking. A partnership for a particular undertaking is one which has a purpose which is capable of accomplishment at some time, even if the exact time is unknown or is not ascertainable at the time of the agreement. Girard Bank v. Haley, 332 A.2d 443, 447 (Pa. 1975).

Since the partnership is at will, Bill has not only the power to dissolve the partnership but also the legal right to do so. Bill does not need a justification for dissolving the partnership. Because the dissolution is not wrongful, i.e., in contravention of the partnership agreement, Bill is not liable in damages for dissolving the partnership. Campbell v. Miller, 161 S.E.2d 546, 551-52 (N.C. 1968)

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure IV.C Conflict Of Laws III.C)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 19, is Wife a necessary and indispensable party who cannot be joined without destroying the court's diversity jurisdiction?
- (2) Which state's law will be applied to determine whether the oral agreement for the sale of land is enforceable?

DISCUSSION

Point One (45-55%)

As a co-owner of the land and a joint obligor on the contract. Wife is a necessary and indispensable party to any action that potentially affects title to the land or validity of the contract. Since her joinder as a defendant would destroy diversity, the court should dismiss the action.

A motion to dismiss an action for "failure to join a party" raises three issues. First, is joinder of the absent party proper under Rule 19(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure? Second, if joinder is proper, is it possible to join the party? Finally, if it is not possible to join the absent party, should the court proceed in the absence of the party or dismiss the action? In other words, is the absent party an "indispensable" party—a party in whose absence the action cannot fairly proceed? Fed. R. Civ. P. 19(b). See generally Wright, Miller, & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure: Civil 2</§ 1609(1986).

1. Joinder is proper.

A federal court should join a person as a party if (1) in the person's absence complete relief cannot be accorded among those already parties, or (2) the person claims an interest relating to the subject of the action and is so situated that the disposition of the action in the person's absence may (i) as a practical matter, impair or impede the person's ability to protect that interest or (ii) leave any of the persons already parties subject to a substantial risk of incurring double, multiple, or otherwise inconsistent obligations by reason of the claimed interest. Fed. R. Civ. P. 19(a).

Wife is a "necessary party" under this rule. Her substantial interest in the contract for the sale of the real estate will invariably be affected if the court declares the contract unenforceable. See, e.g., Chiodo v. General Waterworks Corp., 380 F.2d 860 (10th Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 1004. Similarly, her interest in the land is implicated by the action. If Developer establishes that the contract is enforceable and valid, Developer effectively proves his equitable ownership of the land, and Wife's land interest will have been transferred. If Developer loses, then Wife's effort to transfer her interest in the land to Developer under the contract will be effectively thwarted. Moreover, Developer faces potentially inconsistent liabilities if Husband wins this case and Wife later sues to recover a portion of the purchase price. See Wright, Miller, & Kane, supra, at § 1621.

2. Joinder is not possible.

When the court joins Wife, it must determine her ultimate interest in the action and align her accordingly. Wife, of course, shares with Husband the position of owner of the land and obligor under the sales contract. However, her true position in the action is adverse to Husband's. She has a strong interest in seeing the contract enforced (to protect her "finder's fee") and she was a party to the alleged fraud against Husband.

In these circumstances, Wife is properly considered a defendant and her joinder would destroy diversity jurisdiction because she has the same state citizenship as Husband, the plaintiff. See Schetter v. Heim, 300 F. Supp. 1070 (E.D. Wis. 1969) (W, co-owner of real estate with H, should be joined as D in action alleging that W agreed with others to defraud H in sale of land), noted in Wright, Miller, & Kane, supra, at § 3607. Accordingly, the court cannot join Wife and must therefore decide whether to proceed without her or dismiss the action.

3. The action should be dismissed.

When a party with an interest in the action under Rule 19(b) cannot be joined without destroying the court's jurisdiction, the court must determine "whether in equity and good conscience the action should proceed among the parties before it, or should be dismissed, the absent person being thus regarded as indispensable." Fed. R. Civ. P. 19(b). In making this decision, the court must consider, among other factors, (a) the extent to which a judgment rendered without the party might prejudice the absentee or the existing parties; (b) whether the prejudice can be lessened or avoided by appropriately shaping the relief granted; (c) whether adequate relief can be granted without the absentee; and (d) whether the plaintiff has an adequate remedy if the action is dismissed for nonjoinder.

These factors compel dismissal in a case of this nature. Wife has interests in both the contract and the land that will be affected if the contract is rescinded. There would not appear to be any relief that the court could grant that would be both responsive to Husband's complaint and protective of Wife's interest. Moreover, if Developer wins the action, Developer cannot receive complete relief if Wife is not joined. It is always possible that Developer might face a later action by Wife to defeat the contract if Wife at some point changed her mind about the contract's desirability.

Husband, on the other hand, has an alternative forum in which to try this action: Husband can pursue his case in state court in State Z. Jurisdiction over Developer can easily be established (he resides in State Z) and Wife's ownership of the land in State Z provides an adequate basis for the state courts to exercise jurisdiction over her in an action involving title to the land and a contract for sale of the land. A suit in state court would thus provide Husband with an adequate remedy. In cases of this sort, courts almost invariably dismiss the action rather than proceed in the absence of a necessary party. Numerous cases hold that “an action seeking rescission of a contract must be dismissed unless all parties to the contract, and others having a substantial interest in it, can be joined.” Acton Co. v. Bachman Foods, Inc., 668 F.2d 76, 81-82 (1st Cir. 1982); Naartex Consulting Corp. v. Watt, 722 F.2d 779, 788 (D.C.Cir. 1983). Furthermore, when ownership of land is involved in an action, persons with interest in the land are almost always considered “indispensable parties” in part because “real property disputes are particularly suited to resolution by state courts.” Doty v. St. Mary Parish Land Co., 598 F.2d 885 (5th Cir. 1979). See Wright, Miller, & Kane, supra, at § 1621 (1991 Pocket Part).

Point Two (45-55%)

State Z’s law should be applied to determine the enforceability of a contract for conveyance of land located in State Z. Because the contract is unenforceable under that law, the court should deny Developer’s motion to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim.

Developer’s motion to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim raises a choice of law issue. To determine the applicable substantive law, the federal district court must apply the choice-of-law rules of State Z (where it is hearing the action). The problem does not state what State Z’s choice of law rules are, so examinees should focus on providing some sensible analysis of this issue.

The traditional choice of law rule is that all issues affecting title to land are determined by the law of the situs of the land. Thus, in a case of this nature (a contract is negotiated and made in State Y for the sale of land in State Z), the law of State Z would determine the enforceability of that contract. See Meylink v. Rhea, 123 Iowa 310, 98 N.W. 779 (1904). Occasionally, a court will characterize a case of this sort as a contract case and apply the law of the place where the contract was made. But, generally, situs law governs the validity of contracts to convey land. See Restatement 2nd Conflict of Laws § 189.

Modern approaches to choice of law, however, would permit departure from this traditional rule if a state other than the situs state had a “more significant relationship” to the facts of the case or a greater interest in the outcome.” It is possible to argue on these facts, using either a “most significant relationship” analysis or an interest analysis, that State Y law should apply. State Y is the state where the contract at issue was negotiated and where the parties entered the contract. Both Husband and Wife are citizens of State Y and Developer journeyed there to negotiate the contract. Developer also made a substantial down payment on the contract in State Y. State Y’s law reflects a policy of protecting the expectations of land purchasers when they have made a down payment on the purchase price, even though the contract is not written. Arguably State Y has an interest in upholding the contract and protecting Developer, even though Developer is a State Z resident, because of its general interest in securing the integrity of transactions that occur within its borders. The policy of upholding the expectations of the parties would also generally point to an application of the law that would validate the contract. Indeed, were this a contract unconnected to land, its validity probably would be determined by the law of State Y given that it was negotiated and made there, Husband and Wife live there, and the contract would be upheld as valid under that state's law. See generally Restatement 2nd Conflict of Laws § 188, comment b. State Z arguably has little interest in applying its statute of frauds to protect two non-residents (Husband and Wife) whose own home jurisdiction does not protect them.

Although attractive, the above analysis is not likely to be adopted by most courts. Examinees should receive credit for arguments of that type, but it is likely that most courts would adhere to the traditional rule that State Z's law determines the validity of contracts to convey land in State Z. The simple explanation for this is that State Z always has a strong, perhaps dominant, interest in any action that will affect title to its land. State Z is the only state that can, in the end, award title to anyone. Problems concerning title must ultimately be resolved in State Z, and State Z has a stronger interest than any other state in promulgating rules that govern questions concerning how and when and with what degree of formality legal actions affecting title should be taken. If State Z says that contracts to convey land must be written to be enforceable, that is not merely a policy statement affecting the private interests of the parties to that contract; it is a policy about the proper formalities to be used when actions are taken that affect title to land in State Z. It affects the rights and interests of the state and other parties in the event that title is ever put in question. In short, State Z is likely to have the most significant relationship to this issue, despite the strong connections with State Y. See Cayce v. Carter Oil Co., 618 F. 2d 669 (10th Cir. 1980); Denny v. Teel, 688 P.2d 803 (Okl. 1984). But see Matter of Penn Central Transp. Co., 471 F. Supp. 1354 (E.D. Pa. 1979).

Thus, unless State Z has a special choice of law rule that points to the law of the state of contracting (which is unlikely), the traditional rule would probably be followed by the court and State Z's law would be used to determine the validity of the contract. Under State Z's law, the contract is unenforceable. The motion to dismiss the complaint therefore should be denied.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS/SALES ANALYSIS

(Secured Transactions IV.G; Sales III.C)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is the provision for Builder's payment of "all shipping and handling charges" a part of the contract between Builder and Seller?
- (2)(a) Does Seller have a security interest in the appliances?
- (2)(b) May Seller repossess the appliances when they have been installed in a building covered by a prior construction mortgage held by Bank?

DISCUSSION

Point One (40-50%)

Because the provision for payment of shipping and handling charges was an additional term that materially altered the offer made by Builder in its Purchase Order, the provision did not become part of the contract.

This is a classic "battle of the forms" problem. Builder's Purchase Order is an offer to buy appliances from Seller. Seller's Order Acknowledgment purports to accept the Purchase Order, but the printed terms on the back of the Order Acknowledgment add a provision that "... the buyer [Builder in this case] shall pay the seller the amount of all shipping and handling charges." The question is whether this new term is part of the contract. See generally Uniform Commercial Code § 2-207, comment 1.

Under the traditional common law "mirror image" rule, Seller's Order Acknowledgment would be a rejection of Builder's offer and a counteroffer because the Order Acknowledgment differs significantly from the offer. Builder's subsequent acceptance of the appliances would in turn be an acceptance by conduct of the counteroffer, and Seller would be entitled to recover its shipping and handling charges.

Under the Uniform Commercial Code, the result changes. The Order Acknowledgment, which on its face appears to accept the Purchase Order/Offer, would operate as an acceptance of the contract under UCC § 2-207, "even though it states terms additional to or different from those offered" UCC § 2-207(1). In this case, the provision for Builder's reimbursement of Seller's shipping and handling charges should be considered an additional term rather than a different term, as there is no indication that the Purchase Order itself addressed shipping and handling charges in any way. See Advanced Mobilehome Systems of Tampa, Inc. v. Alumax Fabricated Products, Inc., 666 So.2d 166,169 (Ct. App. Fla. 1995).

UCC § 2-207 (2) provides that “additional terms are to be construed as proposals for addition to the contract.” Additional terms become part of any contract between merchants unless (a) “the offer expressly limits acceptance to the terms of the offer”; (b) they materially alter it; or (c) notification of objection to them “is properly given.” In this problem, the question is whether the new provision materially alters the offer. Neither of the other bases for dropping it applies.

The Code does not define “materially alter,” but the comments to § 2-207 indicate that a clause will materially alter a contract if it changes the bargain in such a way as to “result in surprise or hardship if incorporated without express awareness by the other party.” UCC § 2-207, comment 4. A clause of this sort, which has the potential to significantly increase a buyer’s financial obligation under the contract, is probably a material change in the parties’ bargain. See, e.g., Advanced Mobilehome Systems of Tampa, supra, at 169; Union Carbide Corp. v. Oscar Mayer Foods Corp., 947 F.2d 1333 (7th Cir. 1991).

On the other hand, payment of shipping and handling charges in addition to the stated price is a normal occurrence in many sales transactions. Thus, an argument might fairly be made that the disputed provision on the Order Acknowledgment should not be considered a surprising or hardship-inducing addition to the contract. One would also need to examine the usage in the trade. If it were shown that it is standard for the purchaser to pay shipping and handling, this would lead one to conclude that inclusion of the clause would not materially alter the contract.

The sales contract included a written security agreement signed by the debtor. The security interest attached when Seller delivered the appliances to Builder.

The Purchase Order stated that “Builder hereby grants Seller an unconditional security interest in any and all goods delivered under this contract. . . .” Nothing in Seller’s Order Acknowledgment, which was an acceptance of the terms of the Purchase Order, altered that provision. Thus, the provision for a security interest was part of the contract between the parties.

As a result, the three requirements of Article 9 for attachment of security interest were satisfied by this transaction. See UCC § 9-203(1). First, the debtor (Builder) must have “signed a security agreement which contains a description of the collateral.” UCC § 9-203(1)(a). No particular formalities are imposed in connection with this requirement. A security agreement is simply “an agreement which creates or provides for a security interest.” UCC § 9-105(1)(L). The sales contract would seem to fit this definition, and the Purchase Order, which continues the agreement’s key terms, was signed by Builder.

The second requirement for a security interest to be created is that value be given. Clearly, Seller gave value when it provided appliances to Builder. Finally, Builder must have rights in the collateral. Again, this requirement was satisfied when Seller transferred the appliances to Builder pursuant to the sales contract.

Point Two(b) (30-40%)

Seller may repossess the appliances only if they are not fixtures under local real estate law.

A secured party ordinarily has the right to repossess collateral that secures an obligation when the debtor is in default on the obligation, as is the case here. See UCC § 9-503. See generally James J. White & Robert S. Summers, Uniform Commercial Code § 25-8 (4th Ed. 1995).

However, Bank's presence as holder of a construction mortgage on the Eden Project may defeat Seller's repossession rights. The issue turns on whether the appliances became "fixtures" when they were installed in the Eden Project's condominiums.

The Code provides that "goods are 'fixtures' when they become so related to particular real estate that an interest in them arises under real estate law." UCC §9-313(1)(a). This provision leaves the determination of the status of goods as fixtures to the local real property law of the jurisdiction concerned. In most jurisdictions this is a fairly complicated property law issue, but the facts here give room for argument that the built-in dishwashers and ranges, which have probably been affixed to the realty, are fixtures and that the freestanding washers and dryers, which probably have not been affixed, are not fixtures.

a. Assuming the appliances are not fixtures.

If the appliances are not fixtures, Seller would have an absolute right to repossess them under UCC §§ 9-503 and 9-504. There are no competing creditors, secured or otherwise. Bank's interest is triggered only if the appliances are fixtures.

b. Assuming the appliances are fixtures.

If the appliances became fixtures upon their installation in the condominium project, then they are subject to Bank's construction mortgage, which covers "land and any improvements thereon" constituting the Eden Project. The question is whether the Bank's interest will preclude Seller from repossessing the collateral.

The relevant code provision, UCC § 9-313, has a complicated set of priority rules and restrictions on remedies for situations like these. Examinees should not be expected to know these rules in detail, but should be expected to discuss at least some of the key issues raised by these facts.

First, the Code generally makes security interests in fixtures subordinate to the interests created by prior construction mortgages. See UCC § 9-313(6). This priority for prior construction mortgage interests applies even as against purchase money lenders such as Seller, and it extends to mortgages securing "an obligation incurred for construction of an improvement on land including the acquisition cost of the land, if the reduced writing so indicates." UCC § 9-313(1)(C). On our facts, therefore, Bank has priority over Seller as to the appliances (if they are fixtures) because Bank holds a prior construction mortgage.

Second, it should be noted that Seller has never perfected its security interest. Quite apart from the construction mortgage rule, Seller's unperfected security interest in fixtures would be subordinate to any "conflicting interest of an encumbrancer... of the related real estate..." except in limited circumstances not applicable here. See UCC § 9-313(7).

Finally, the protection given by the Code to encumbrancers of real estate over holders of security interests in fixtures operates to limit the secured party's repossession rights. Under UCC § 9-313(8), a secured party who "has priority over all owners and encumbrancers of the real estate" is entitled, upon default, to "remove his collateral from the real estate." UCC § 9-313(8). This section does not describe explicitly the rights of the holder of a subordinate security interest in fixtures, but the negative implication of this section is that a secured party does not have a right to remove the collateral from real estate unless the secured party has priority over all real property interests. See White & Summers, supra, at § 24-11. Moreover, even if the secured party has priority over all real estate interests, the secured party must reimburse the real estate interests for any physical injury caused by removal of the fixtures.

The bottom line is that Seller will not be able to repossess the appliances if they are fixtures under real estate law. First, they are subject to a prior construction mortgage. Second, Seller's interest is unperfected and thus subject to all real estate interests, except in limited circumstances. Finally, repossession is not an option under UCC § 9-313(8) where there are real estate interests in the fixtures that are superior to the security interest.

FAMILY LAW ANALYSIS

(Family Law I.F, III.D, III.E, III.F, IV.A)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) For a premarital contract to be valid, what are the general requirements and were they met in this case?
- (2) Is a court likely to hold the provisions involving property and/or support unfair?
- (3) Is the court likely to uphold the provision relating to child custody and support?

DISCUSSION

Point One (30-40%)

The premarital contract is valid because it is in writing, was voluntarily executed, and there was full disclosure.

Premarital contracts are generally valid if they meet three conditions: they are in writing, they are voluntary, and they are executed after full disclosure. The contract between Anna and Ben is in writing. On the issue of voluntariness, Anna will argue that her consent was not voluntary, as Ben drafted the agreement and refused to marry her unless she signed it. However, Anna did consult with her own attorney and refused to follow his advice not to sign it. The wedding was three months later, not the next day, so she had time to reflect. Under these circumstances, it is unlikely a court would hold that there was duress or coercion sufficient to invalidate the contract. Ben's attachment of his complete financial statement to the draft of the contract before Anna signed it would satisfy any requirement of full disclosure. Therefore, the premarital agreement is valid. The question does not state that Ben signed the agreement, nor does it address Anna's disclosure. However, since it is Anna challenging the agreement, this is not of particular importance although it may be recognized in some answers.

Point Two: (30-40%)

The terms of the contract regarding property and spousal support may be evaluated by a court in terms of fairness. However, courts are more likely to set aside provisions affecting support obligations than property settlements. A court may intervene to award Anna alimony.

Anna will argue that the provisions of the contract stating that all property should be held separately and that she should receive no alimony are fundamentally unfair. Almost all of the property is in Ben's name, although, absent the premarital agreement, under the marital property rules of all jurisdictions she would be entitled to make a claim with respect to the property that was earned after marriage, regardless of title.

Regarding spousal support, at the present time Anna has no independent source of income, has not worked for several years, and has two small children. She has very little property as well.

Although Ben will argue that Anna is bound by the terms of the contract, some courts would at least set aside the provision on spousal support under these circumstances. The support obligation is a traditional and essential part of marriage and divorce, and Anna apparently has the need (and Ben the ability) since she has no other means of support. H. Clark, The Law of Domestic Relations in the United States, § 1.9 (2nd ed. 1987).

On the other hand, if the jurisdiction follows the Uniform Premarital Agreement Act (UPAA), then the property distribution and alimony provisions are probably enforceable. Under the UPAA, a premarital agreement will be enforced unless (a) it was not executed voluntarily or (b) it was unconscionable when executed and there was a procedural defect with respect to disclosure of financial information. UPAA § 6, 9B U.L.A. 369. The agreement was executed voluntarily (as discussed above), and there is little, if any, evidence of procedural unfairness here. UPAA, supra, § 6. Therefore, at the time of enforcement, even though the provisions are obviously disadvantageous to Anna, and may even be unconscionable, they would not be set aside in these jurisdictions. The UPAA does allow (but does not require) a court to order alimony, notwithstanding a premarital agreement, if the spouse would otherwise become eligible for public support. Id.

A sub-issue of fairness is one of timing: should the agreement be reviewed for fairness as of the time of the execution of the contract or as of the time of enforcement? Some courts look to fairness at the time of execution of the contract; others to fairness at the time of enforcement. Ben would argue for fairness at the time of execution, when each had some property and Anna was making a good salary. The UPAA provides that unconscionability should be determined as of the time the agreement was executed. UPAA, supra, § 6a.

Anna of course would argue that fairness at the time of enforcement is the only realistic measure. It is ten years after the contract was signed. Circumstances have changed and Anna has a need for spousal support, which was not present at the time of execution. She left a well-paying job in order to stay home with the children. If a court is willing to look at fairness (or unconscionability) as of the time of enforcement, Anna is in a good position to have the provision set aside. However, in a jurisdiction which has adopted the UPAA, Anna will be unsuccessful.

Point Three (30-40%)

Provisions in premarital contracts concerning child custody and child support are probably unenforceable and, therefore, these sections of the contract would not be binding on a court.

It is highly unlikely that provisions in a premarital agreement regarding child custody and child support would be enforceable. Although the ability to contract with respect to child custody is not entirely clear in the UPAA, most courts would hold that child custody should be determined by the court according to the best interests of the child at the time of the divorce or custody hearing, rather than by agreement of the parties prior to marriage. Therefore, a court could and probably would hold that it is not bound by a premarital custody provision. The court hearing Anna and Ben's divorce might decide that they should have joint custody, but this conclusion would be based on a consideration of the children's best interest, not because the contract so provided.

Finally, parents have an absolute obligation to support their children. The UPAA § 3 states that a child's right to support cannot be adversely affected by a premarital agreement. Moreover, federal law requires that each state have child support guidelines which set out a rebuttable presumption with respect to the amount of child support that will be ordered. Deviations from the guideline must be justified by the court through specific findings of fact. The conclusion regarding child support is clearly not enforceable.

CORPORATIONS ANALYSIS

(Corporations IX. A, X)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Does a corporation have an obligation to investors in general to give full and truthful answers to questions about its plans with respect to potential mergers?
- (1)(b) Do investors who buy in reliance on incomplete and misleading statements have a cause of action against the corporation making such statements?
- (2) Do shareholders who were not traders in a corporation's stock have a cause of action, either direct or derivative, against the corporation or its officers and directors for false and misleading statements that result in liability of the corporation to other shareholders?

DISCUSSION

Point One(a) (30-40%)

A corporation has an obligation to investors in general to give full and truthful answers to questions about its plans with respect to potential mergers.

Under Rule 10b-5 of the 1934 Securities Exchange Act, a public or private corporation must disclose the material facts necessary in order to make its statements not misleading in light of the circumstances in which they were made. Here, the merger would be a material fact and Acquiror's statement would violate this law. Acquiror's statement that it did not have an agreement to acquire XYZ was at best misleading because it omitted the fact that there was a clear tentative merger agreement with XYZ and a further understanding that the final commitment to that agreement would come at the end of the waiting period.

The issue is whether Acquiror could do less than tell the entire truth once it undertook to respond to a question. Acquiror's statement was clearly incomplete and misleading because it omitted material information about the existence as well as the status of the negotiations between Acquiror and XYZ.

A fact is considered to be material if a reasonable person would think such information was important in determining a course of action, such as a purchase or sale of the corporation's securities. SBC v. Texas Gulf Sulphur Co., 401 F.2d 833 (2d Cir. 1968). Information about a company's preliminary negotiations for a merger may or may not be material depending on the relative likelihood that the merger will be completed and on the size of the transaction compared to the size of the company. Basic, Inc. v. Levinson, 485 U.S. 224, 108 S.Ct. 978 (1988). Here, it is clear that the negotiations were nearly final, and there is nothing in the facts to indicate that the size of the merger would be immaterial.

Information about the true status of a major purchase by Acquiror is material information. TSC Industries, Inc. v. Northway, Inc., 426 U.S. 438 (1976). Moreover, in light of Basic, Inc. v. Levinson, 485 U.S. 224 (1988), the fact that full disclosure of the status of the negotiations might jeopardize the ultimate outcome of the pending transaction would not permit a misleading statement. In the Basic case, the Court suggested that a consistent policy of responding “no comment” to questions would protect the parties. However, in this case Acquiror chose to respond to the questions, and its answers implied that it had no discussions, and certainly had no nearly final merger agreement, with XYZ. The statement was highly misleading even if it was literally correct in a very narrow sense.

Investors who buy or sell a corporation’s securities in reliance on incomplete and misleading statements by the corporation have a cause of action against the corporation for making such statements.

Investors who purchased Acquiror’s stock after the denial and before the announcement of the merger have a claim against Acquiror for their losses under Rule 10b-5. The investors would claim that their losses are the difference between the $10 price that the investors paid due to Acquiror’s denial of the merger and the $8 price at which the market valued the shares in light of the merger. Investors must show reliance of some type on the statements to establish a valid claim. Since the statement about Acquiror’s plans for XYZ was made publicly, investors have a claim whether or not they heard the statement or relied on it in deciding to buy Acquiror’s stock. Direct reliance is not essential; under the Basic decision, a public misstatement by a company that has publicly traded securities which alters the market price of those securities constitutes a “fraud on the market,” and all investors who purchased or sold stock are presumed to have relied on the misstatement. Therefore, the investors can claim damages even if they have not personally relied on the misstatement. However, if Acquiror can show that in fact the market price was unaffected by the misstatement or that the particular investor’s purchase or sale would have occurred regardless of market price, the presumption would be rebutted, and the investor would have no claim because the deception would not have caused any loss.

Point Two (30-40%)

A continuing shareholder who did not trade in a corporation’s stock has a derivative cause of action against the corporation’s officers and directors for false and misleading statements that result in economic loss to the corporation.

Continuing shareholders ordinarily have no direct claim against the corporation, since they have neither bought nor sold securities at the affected market price. Blue Chip Stamps v. Manor Drug Stores, 421 U.S. 723 (1975). However, it is also clear that the corporation has suffered a loss as a result of the liability that it will incur to those investors who did buy or sell its stock based on misleading information. Acquiror, as a corporation, has a claim against its officers and directors who engaged in or approved of this misleading conduct as their conduct constitutes a breach of the duty of care under state law. Shareholders of Acquiror can bring a shareholder's derivative action, either individually or as a class action, against Acquiror to hold the officers or directors of Acquiror responsible for the misleading statements. See generally Basic v. Levinson, 485 U.S. 224 (1988). Any recovery from the responsible officers or directors would be paid to Acquiror for the benefit of all shareholders.

TRUSTS ANALYSIS

(Trusts I.I)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did Sister breach her duty of loyalty to the trust when she bought the trust's ABC stock, and, if so, what remedies were available to Child for Sister's breach?
- (2) Did Sister breach her duty to act prudently by putting all of the trust's assets into Lo-Tech stock, and, if so, what remedy may Child pursue for any breach?
- (3) Did Sister breach her duty to act impartially by purchasing stock that paid high dividends with very little promise of appreciation, and if so, what remedy may Child pursue for the breach?
- (4) Did Sister misallocate dividends when she distributed the stock dividend to Wife?

DISCUSSION

Point One (35-45%)

Sister breached the duty of loyalty when she purchased the ABC stock from the trust for her own account. As a result, Child is entitled to a share of the gain accruing to Sister as a result of that breach.

A trustee's duty of loyalty prevents the trustee from purchasing trust property for the trustee's own account. See Restatement, Second, Trusts, § 170, comment (b); Bogert, Trusts (6th ed) at 344. This rule is based on the "well-known quality of human nature that it is extremely difficult, or perhaps impossible, for an individual to act fairly in the interests of others whom he represents and at the same time to consider his own financial advantage." Bogert, Trusts (6th ed) at 342. Before entering into a "self-dealing" transaction with the trust, the trustee is obligated to seek court approval. See generally Restatement, Second, Trusts, § 170, comment (f). In this case, Sister obtained no prior judicial approval of her purchase of the stock from the trust. Therefore, she breached her duty of loyalty.

Sister might argue that Child is entitled to no damages for this breach, asserting that Sister's self-dealing transaction benefitted the trust: Sister paid the trust $ 100,000 for the ABC stock, while the best outside offer was only $80,000. This argument fails, however, because Child is entitled to recover any profit made by Sister as a result of Sister's breach. Restatement, Second, Trusts, §§ 205(b), 206. In this case, when Sister purchased the trust's ABC stock, she cemented her personal control over ABC Corporation. Buyer had offered $400,000 for the combined shares of Sister and the trust; Sister refused this offer but bought the trust's share for herself. When Sister made this purchase, she actually realized an economic gain of $220,000: the value of the combined shares ($400,000) as reflected by Buyer's offer, minus the price she paid to the trust ($100,000) and the value of Sister's own shares ($80,000 on the market). Even if the court declines to award Child all of Sister's gain (the full $220,000 premium) as a result of the self-dealing transaction, Child should at least be entitled to one-half of the combined value of the shares of $400,000, since Sister and the trust each started with half of the total ABC shares. On this theory, Child should be entitled to $ 100,000: one half of the total value of the shares ($V_i \times $400,000$) minus the money the trust already received for its interest ($100,000).

Child might also seek Sister's removal as trustee (Restatement, Second, Trusts, § 199(e)), but that remedy is not worth much because the trust is about to terminate.

Sister could also be required to return the ABC stock to the trust if the beneficiaries would prefer this remedy.

Point Two (15-25%)

Sister breached her duty to act prudently by putting all of the trust's assets into Lo-Tech stocks and Child would be entitled to recover any loss resulting from the failure to diversify the trust's investments.

A trustee is required to make only prudent investments for a trust. While Lo-Tech stock might generally be a prudent investment (although under the facts this may be debatable), a trustee is also 'undo* a specific duty to diversify the trust's investments (Restatement, Second, Trusts, § 228; Restatement of Trusts, Third, § 227(b); Unif. Prud. Inv. Act. § 3; Mueller v. Mueller, 28 Wis. 2d 26 (1965)) unless such duty is waived by the grantors. By placing all of the trust's assets into a single security, Sister acted improperly.

Child may not be able to recover the entire $50,000 loss incurred as a result of the Lo-Tech purchase, because Sister might have been entitled to invest some trust assets in Lo-Tech. For example, if Sister was entitled, consistent with the prudent person investor rule, to invest $10,000 rather than $100,000 in Lo-Tech, Child would be entitled to recover 90% of the loss on Lo-Tech stock, or $45,000. Restatement, Second, Trusts, § 228, comment (h), illustration (3).

Sister breached her duty to act impartially by purchasing stock that paid high dividends with very little promise of appreciation.

A trustee is under a duty to deal impartially with the beneficiaries. Restatement, Second, Trusts, § 232 and comment (a); Restatement of Trusts, Third, § 232; Dennis v. Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co., 744 F.2d 893 (1st Cir. 1984). Purchase of Lo-Tech, which paid high dividends at the expense of principal, when there were also no offsetting investments in the trust to provide benefits for Child, who ultimately was entitled to trust principal, was a violation of Sister's duty to Child as the remainder beneficiary. Sister's duty to Child would have permitted her to make such an investment only if she had adopted "accounting, investment, or other administrative practices reasonably designed to protect" the trust property's purchasing power, assuming the Lo-Tech investments were otherwise proper. See Restatement of Trusts, Third, §§ 239(a), 232, general comment c.

Child should be entitled to recover the amounts Child would have received had Sister made appropriate provision for protecting the remainderman.

Sister misallocated dividends when she distributed the stock dividend to Wife and therefore, Child is entitled to recover the value of stock dividends paid to Wife that should have been added to trust principal for ultimate distribution to Child.

The Uniform Principal and Income Act requires that all dividends paid in stock be treated as principal. Uniform Principal and Income Act, § 6; see also Restatement, Second, Trusts, § 236(b). Therefore, by distributing the stock dividend to Wife, Sister breached her fiduciary duty to Child. As a result, Child should be entitled to recover the value of the shares distributed to Wife.

Preface

This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 1999 and July 1999 Multistate Essay Examinations. Each test includes seven questions; jurisdictions that use the MEE select the six questions their applicants will answer.

These model analyses to the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. These models are not an official grading guide. Some states grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses, including the suggested weights given to particular points, as they wish. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topic or topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by Roman numerals which refer to the subject matter outline for that topic. For example, Question 1 on the February 1999 MEE tested Commercial Paper III.C, Reacquisition (§ 3-207); IV.A, Person entitled to enforce (§§ 3-101 through 3-102); IV.B, Value and consideration (§ 3-103); and V.D, Drawee not liable on unaccepted draft (§ 3-408). Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet and can also be found at www.ncbex.org.

The MEE is a three-hour examination consisting of six questions. The examination is administered in one continuous three-hour time period. Applicants are expected to spend approximately thirty minutes answering each of the questions. The areas of law covered by the questions in the examination are: Agency and Partnership, Commercial Paper, Conflict of Laws, Corporations, Decedents' Estates, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Sales, Secured Transactions, and Trusts and Future Interests. Some questions include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate in writing effectively.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You will have three hours in which to write your answers to six of the seven questions contained in this booklet; you will be told which of the questions you are to answer. Each question is designed to be answered in thirty minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts which are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show: an understanding of the facts; a recognition of the issues included; the applicable principles of law; and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Some jurisdictions instruct applicants to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

COMMERCIAL PAPER QUESTION

Trucker owned a truck insured by Insurance Co. (Insko) against loss by theft.

On January 2, Trucker reported the truck stolen and filed a claim for its value with Insko. The police were not able to recover the truck and, on February 2, Insko issued a draft in the amount of $ 10,000 in settlement of the loss. The draft is a negotiable instrument, payable to the order of Trucker, and is drawn by Insko on itself, payable through Bank.

On February 3, Trucker negotiated the draft to Acme Motors in partial payment for a new truck. Trucker signed on the reverse side of the draft, "Pay to Acme Motors, Trucker."

On February 4, Acme Motors stamped on the reverse side of the draft "Pay to State Savings, Acme Motors." Later that day, Acme Motors and Trucker had a disagreement about the purchase of the new truck. They rescinded their sales contract, and Acme Motors returned the Insko draft to Trucker. Trucker immediately drew lines through both Trucker's February 3 indorsement and the language stamped on the draft by Acme Motors.

On February 5, Trucker again indorsed the draft by signing "Trucker" on the reverse side. He delivered it to Bank with instructions to apply it to a loan on which Trucker owed Bank $20,000. Bank immediately applied the full amount of the $ 10,000 draft to the indebtedness Trucker owed to Bank.

On February 6, Insko learned from the police that Trucker had received $2,000 from Rob as part of a prearranged scheme between Rob and Trucker, in which Rob "stole" Trucker's truck and disposed of it.

On February 7, Bank presented the draft to Insko for payment, and the draft was dishonored. The draft is in the possession of Bank, which has timely given all necessary notices of dishonor. Trucker is insolvent.

Are Acme Motors and Insko liable to Bank on the draft? Explain.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

In 1992, XYZ limited partnership was formed in Central State by the proper filing of all necessary documents. XYZ's limited partnership agreement provided that it would engage in the purchase and sale of rare uncut blue diamonds. The partnership agreement further provided that the agreement could be amended only by the affirmative vote of 60% of the limited partnership interests.

XYZ has one general partner, GemCorp (a properly organized corporation), and three limited partners, individuals named Bill, David, and Emily. The three limited partners hold equal percentages of XYZ limited partnership interests. GemCorp is wholly owned by Bill, who is GemCorp's only officer and director. Bill's ownership of GemCorp has been disclosed to David and Emily. All corporate formalities have been complied with in the operation of GemCorp.

In addition to being the general partner of XYZ, GemCorp operates a number of other businesses including one that purchases and sells rare gemstones. XYZ's limited partnership agreement includes a provision permitting GemCorp to engage in its other businesses without offering any business opportunities to XYZ. However, it is silent about whether GemCorp can enter into business transactions with XYZ.

From 1992 until January 1996, XYZ built a successful diamond business and was a profitable and harmonious enterprise for all of the partners.

In 1992, GemCorp purchased three virtually identical lots of uncut rare blue diamonds for $ 1 million per lot from a well-known international dealer. In 1993, GemCorp sold one of the lots to an unrelated third party for $2 million. In 1994, GemCorp sold the second lot for $3 million to another unrelated third party. During 1995, vast quantities of uncut blue diamonds began to flood the market. By January 1996, the diamond market was in chaos and the price of uncut blue diamonds had dropped by 90%.

Shortly thereafter, GemCorp sold the third lot of uncut blue diamonds to XYZ for $5 million.

Central State has adopted the Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act (1976) with the 1985 amendments (the RULPA) and the Uniform Partnership Act (UP A).

1. On what basis, if any, could the XYZ limited partners challenge the actions of GemCorp in selling the blue diamonds to XYZ? Explain.
2. Are the claims of the XYZ limited partners against GemCorp derivative or direct, and what procedural steps, if any, must they take prior to bringing a claim? Explain.
3. What actions, if any, could GemCorp have taken before the sale to eliminate any potential liability it might have to the XYZ limited partners? Explain.
4. On what basis, if any, could Bill be found individually liable to the other limited partners for the sale of the blue diamonds to the partnership? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

Testator's validly executed will dated September 1, 1996, reads as follows:

I, Testator, being of sound and disposing mind, give:

1. All of my tangible personal property to Sister.
2. $1,000 to Uncle, to be paid from my bank account at Bank.
3. $5,000 to Friend.
4. 100 shares of ABC common stock to Brother.
5. The residue of my estate to Charity, a charitable organization.

At Testator's death, Testator's estate was valued at $50,000. This included tangibles valued at $1,000, Testator's bank account at Bank with a balance of $750, and 100 shares of ABC common stock valued at $20,000. ABC is a closely held corporation. Testator bought the 100 shares in December 1995. The balance of Testator's estate was held in publicly traded securities.

Testator died in an automobile accident resulting from Testator's negligence. The other party in that accident filed a claim against Testator's estate in the amount of $28,000. This claim was duly allowed by the court having jurisdiction over the estate, and $28,000 of the publicly traded securities were liquidated to pay the claim. There are no other debts, expenses, or taxes for Testator's estate.

Sister, Uncle, Friend, and Brother survived Testator. Uncle timely disclaimed any interest in the $1,000 bequest. Uncle's child, Son, also survived Testator.

How should Testator's estate remaining after the payment of the $28,000 claim be distributed among Sister, Uncle, Friend, Brother, Charity, and Son? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

Laptop, Inc., a State X corporation, manufactures laptop computers at its principal place of business in State Y. Paul, a resident of State Z, purchased one of Laptop's computers while attending college in State Y. During summer break, Paul took his computer back home with him to State Z, where he has his permanent residence. Shortly after Paul returned home, the computer caught fire while Paul was using it to access Laptop's website. Paul was severely burned in the fire.

The fire was caused by a defective memory chip installed by Laptop during manufacture in State Y. The memory chip was manufactured by Chip, Inc., a company incorporated overseas in Country A.

Laptop sells 50% of its computers in State Y, 25% in State X, and 25% in State Z. It regularly advertises in the State Z market through computer magazines with national circulations. Laptop also maintains a website in State Y where customers can contact it to make purchases and obtain technical help when problems are encountered in the use of its products. The website is accessible to anyone with Internet access anywhere in the world.

Chip sends to Laptop in State Y all of the memory chips it exports to the United States. Laptop installs them in all the computers it manufactures. Chip has sold to Laptop $5 million worth of memory chips per year for the last five years. Chip's income from memory chips sold to Laptop and installed in computers sold in State Z is less than 2% of its total annual income. Although Chip has never advertised in States X, Y, or Z and does not design its products specifically for those markets, Chip knew that its computer chips would be installed in computers sold in States X, Y, and Z.

Paul filed a lawsuit in federal district court in State Z against Laptop and Chip for personal injury damages of $250,000 basing subject matter jurisdiction on diversity of citizenship. Paul alleged both negligence and strict product liability claims against both defendants. Laptop was served with process in State Y, and Chip was served in Country A. The State Z long-arm statute authorizes personal jurisdiction over nonresident defendants "on any basis not inconsistent with the United States Constitution."

Both defendants move to dismiss Paul's claims for lack of personal jurisdiction. Alternatively, they move to dismiss and/or transfer venue to the U.S. District Court in State Y, arguing that venue in the district court in State Z is improper.

1. Should the court grant Laptop's motion to dismiss Paul's claim for lack of personal jurisdiction? Explain.
2. Should the court grant Chip's motion to dismiss Paul's claim for lack of personal jurisdiction? Explain.
3. Should the court grant both defendants' motions to dismiss and/or transfer venue to the district court in State Y? Explain.

FAMILY LAW/CONFLICT OF LAWS QUESTION

Father and Mother, an unmarried couple, lived together in State X. Three years ago, Mother gave birth to Son. Shortly before Son was born, Father moved out of the house and has never supported or visited Son. Mother and Father have continued to live in State X. When Son was one year old, Mother decided that raising him alone was more than she could handle emotionally and financially. Mother placed him with the Adopters, a married couple from State Z. At that time, she signed a document relinquishing her parental rights and consenting to Son's adoption by the Adopters.

The Adopters, who were lifelong residents of State Z, picked up Son in State X and immediately returned to State Z with him. They promptly filed a petition to adopt Son in a State Z court. They did not give notice to Father, relying on statutes in State X and State Z that provide that notice of an action to adopt a child born out of wedlock does not have to be given to a putative father if the putative father (1) had actual knowledge of the birth or impending birth of the child and (2) failed to acknowledge paternity of the child, or to take any legal action to establish his claim to paternity of the child, or to exercise parental rights or duties with regard to the child within the first six months of the child's life. Eighteen months after the adoption petition was filed, the State Z court granted it and entered the final adoption decree.

Seven months after the final adoption decree was entered, Father learned that Mother had placed Son for adoption. In a State Z court, Father moved to set aside the adoption on the grounds that State Z lacked jurisdiction to grant the adoption or, alternatively, that the statute that allowed Son to be adopted without notice to Father violates Father's due process rights.

The adoption statute of limitations in State Z, where the Adopters reside and which granted the adoption, requires that challenges to adoptions be brought within six months after a decree is entered. The adoption statute of limitations in State X, where Son was born and where Mother and Father have always lived, provides that challenges to adoptions may be brought within one year of the time the decree is entered. Relying on the State Z statute of limitations, the Adopters moved to dismiss Father's motion as untimely. Father claims that the State X statute of limitations, which has not run, applies.

1. Which statute of limitations applies to Father's cause of action? Explain.
2. Did the court in State Z have jurisdiction to enter the adoption decree? Explain.
3. Did failure to give Father notice of the adoption deny him due process? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

FurnitureCo has manufactured quality furniture for 20 years. It was incorporated under the Revised Model Business Corporation Act and its articles of incorporation and bylaws contain no provisions overriding the statutory provisions. FurnitureCo's articles of incorporation provide that the corporation can engage in any lawful business.

Adam owns 70% of the stock of FurnitureCo, and Diane and Edward each own 15%. The board of directors has five members: Adam; Adam's loyal children, Beth and Charles; and the two outsiders, Diane and Edward. Adam is the president of FurnitureCo, Beth is vice president, and Charles is secretary. Their duties are not specified in the bylaws. Neither Diane nor Edward is an officer.

Over the past few years, FurnitureCo's business has been flat, but marginally profitable. At its last regular board meeting, attended by Adam, Beth, Charles, and Edward, Adam presented a plan to diversify FurnitureCo's business, which included entering the tennis club business. Diane had been called out of town suddenly and was unable to attend the board meeting. After hearing Adam's presentation on the expanding opportunities in the sports field, the board voted 3 to 1 to direct Adam as president to "study and implement at his discretion a program for restructuring and/or reorienting the business operations of the company." It was Edward who voted against authorizing Adam to restructure the business.

After studying the matter, Adam decided that FurnitureCo's profits would be maximized by getting out of the furniture business altogether, selling all of its current assets, and using the sale proceeds and the cash on hand to buy a tennis club. On his own initiative and without anyone else's approval, he then scheduled an auction for next month to sell all of FurnitureCo's existing assets.

Diane and Edward were sure that Adam's plan would ruin the business, so they visited Adam in his office to tell him that they disagreed with his plan and to demand that he cancel the auction. Adam told them that he did not need their approval to implement his plan and ordered them to leave his office.

1. Does Adam have sufficient authority as president to change FurnitureCo's business and to sell its existing assets? Explain.
2. Could Adam, Beth, and Charles lawfully act together to approve and implement the change in the business and the sale of assets without the participation of Diane and Edward? Explain.
3. Assuming that Diane and Edward cannot block the sale, do they have any other remedies? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

On April 1, Debtor bought a used car from Smith Motors for his personal use. Debtor financed the sale with Smith Motors. The cash price was $16,500, and the credit service charge (total interest payments for the life of the loan) was $4,000. Debtor made a $500 down payment and agreed to pay the remaining $20,000 in 24 monthly payments. At the time of the purchase, Debtor executed a sales contract and granted a security interest in the car to Smith Motors. Smith Motors properly perfected that security interest.

After making only one monthly payment, Debtor defaulted on the contract. Following a peaceful repossession, Smith Motors decided to sell the car at auction on August 15. At that time, the unpaid balance of principal and accrued interest was $ 17,000. Smith Motors contacted a few dealers but did not advertise the auction.

On August 12, Smith Motors mailed notice of the August 15 auction by regular mail to Debtor at his home address. The notice arrived on August 14, one day before the auction. On August 15, the car was sold at auction for $ 10,000, which was well below the car's market value of $ 14,000. The only bidder at the auction was a dealer who specialized in repossessed vehicles.

Smith Motors has sued Debtor for the deficiency of $7,000 between the unpaid contract price and the amount for which the car was sold.

1. On what theories and in what amounts may Debtor recover damages from Smith Motors under the Uniform Commercial Code? Explain.
2. Is Debtor liable to Smith Motors for any part of the $7,000 deficiency? Explain.

TRUSTS AND FUTURE INTERESTS QUESTION

Testator bequeathed her residuary estate “to Trustee, as trustee,” on the following terms:

I direct Trustee to distribute the income from the trust to my son, Adam, until he reaches the age of 30. In addition, I authorize Trustee to invade the principal of the trust if, in its absolute discretion, it deems it necessary to provide for Adam’s education. At Adam’s 30th birthday, I direct Trustee to terminate the trust and to distribute the trust principal equally between my two children, Adam and Betsy.

When Testator executed her will, her estate was large enough so that her residuary estate would have been valued at $800,000. However, business reverses during the two years between execution of the will and Testator’s death reduced the value of the residuary estate to $300,000. Testator died last year survived by her husband, Husband, by their son, Adam, and by Betsy, Testator’s daughter from a prior marriage.

Adam is currently 23 years old, has no assets other than the interest in the trust, and has just entered dental school.

Husband has an annual income of $80,000 and assets of $400,000. Last month, Husband loaned Adam $25,000 to pay tuition at dental school.

The trust income is currently $ 18,000 per year, which Adam uses to pay for rent and food. Adam now asks Trustee to invade the trust principal to permit Adam to purchase a $50,000 automobile and to repay the $25,000 tuition loan from Husband.

1. Should Trustee invade the trust principal to enable Adam to purchase the automobile? Explain.
2. Can Trustee refuse to invade the trust principal to enable Adam to repay the loan he received from Husband? Explain.
3. If Trustee distributes trust principal to Adam to enable him to purchase the automobile, what are the rights and liabilities of Trustee, Adam, and Betsy? Explain.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

Susan is a talented furniture restorer. Benjamin is a wealthy furniture collector who enjoys buying and selling furniture. Benjamin and Susan agreed to form what they called a “limited partnership.” Benjamin would be the limited partner, would contribute $50,000 for working capital, and would contribute an additional $100,000 if needed. Susan would be the general partner, with full authority to buy, restore, and sell furniture, using her own well-equipped workshop and custom tools. They would split the profits as follows: 70% to Benjamin and 30% to Susan until Benjamin received an amount equal to his $50,000 capital contribution plus interest at 11%. Thereafter, the profits would be split 50%-50%.

Benjamin and Susan did not put their agreement in writing or take any other action to formalize it. Benjamin gave Susan $50,000 for the business, and Susan purchased, restored, and sold furniture. After six months of allocating distributions under the 70%-30% formula, Benjamin was repaid his total $50,000 capital contribution and accrued interest. Thereafter, profits were split 50%-50%.

The business has now become so successful that Susan will not need any additional capital from Benjamin. The business has $8,500 in its bank account and has no outstanding debts.

Susan has told Benjamin that she wants to end their business relationship. Benjamin claims that Susan has no right to dissolve the business just as it begins to produce profits. He further claims that if Susan does end the relationship, she must pay him 50% of the cash in the bank account, his share of the goodwill, and an amount equal to 50% of the value of her tools. The tools, which were Susan’s before she entered into the agreement with Benjamin, are worth $50,000, and Benjamin asserts that they are assets of the business. Susan denies that Benjamin is entitled to a share of the goodwill, if any, or to 50% of the value of the tools.

1. Was Benjamin and Susan’s business relationship a general partnership, a limited partnership, or neither? Explain.
2. Does Susan have the right to end her business relationship with Benjamin? Explain.
3. Assuming Susan has the right to end the business relationship, how should Benjamin’s claims be resolved? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE/CONFLICT OF LAWS QUESTION

A few years ago, the legislature of State A passed the following statute:

The owners of lots fronting on public sidewalk areas between the property line of the lot and the street line shall repair and maintain those areas at their own expense; failure to do so will result in an assessment against the property for the city's cost in making those repairs.

In the few cases that have arisen under this statute, the trial judges of State A have taken diametrically opposed positions as to its impact on tort cases arising from dangerous conditions in sidewalk areas. Some State A courts have concluded that the statute changes the common law by shifting from the city to the abutting landowner all liability in tort for any injury to a pedestrian caused by a dangerous condition anywhere in the sidewalk area. Other State A trial judges have interpreted the statute merely to obligate abutting landowners either to repair any dangerous condition themselves or to reimburse the city for the cost of doing so, but not to impose on them tort liability for personal injuries. The appellate courts of other states with similar sidewalk-repair statutes also are divided as to its effect. The Supreme Court of State A has yet to rule on a case involving the scope of the statute.

Defendant has long owned and occupied a bungalow on Main Street in the State A city of Suburbia. Main Street is a paved residential street with curbs running the full length of each side. Between Defendant's property line and the street is a "sidewalk area" consisting of a sidewalk, a 10-foot-wide grassy area (called a "parking strip"), and the curbing for the street. This entire area is a "public sidewalk area" within the meaning of the statute quoted above. Suburbia holds title to the street, curbs, parking strip, and sidewalks on Main Street.

Late one winter evening, Plaintiff, at all times a resident and citizen of State B, traveled by taxi to attend a gathering at the home of Defendant's next-door neighbor, Todd. Because two autos were already parked in front of Todd's residence, the taxi driver let Plaintiff out at the curb in front of Defendant's house. After taking a half-dozen steps in the direction of Todd's house, Plaintiff stepped in a leaf-covered six-inch hole in the parking strip area, which caused her to fall and fracture her hip.

Plaintiff sued Defendant for $250,000 in a federal court in State A. The complaint alleged that the hole was located in a part of the parking strip that abutted Defendant's property. At the week-long jury trial of the case, the testimony was in sharp conflict as to the location of the hole. Some witnesses asserted that it was in front of Defendant's property; others insisted that it was actually in front of Todd's property. Except for this conflict in the testimony, Defendant did not contest Plaintiff's proof of the elements of her case. At the conclusion of all the evidence, Defendant moved for judgment as a matter of law. In support of this motion, Defendant argued that, even if the hole was in an area abutting his lot, the sidewalk-repair statute did not impose upon owners any tort liability for injuries to others from dangerous conditions in the publicly owned parking strip in front of their lots.

The federal district court has taken Defendant's motion under consideration. The court believes that the sounder interpretation of such a "sidewalk-repair" statute would be that it does impose tort liability on abutting owners. However, it also has concluded, from a study of decisions by the State A Supreme Court construing other statutes, that when the issue of the scope of the sidewalk- repair statute eventually reaches that court, it will probably decide that it does not impose tort liability on abutting owners.

1. Is Defendant entitled to judgment as a matter of law? Explain.
2. Assuming Defendant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law, should the judge defer ruling for Defendant until after the jury renders its verdict? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Alice, a financial consultant, and Ben, an engineer, began living together six years ago in a state that allows common-law marriage. Alice and Ben were generally known as a couple, and they adopted Smith as their last name. They never formally married. They do not believe in marriage, a fact that is generally known in their community.

Alice and Ben earned approximately equal salaries during their relationship. They deposited their paychecks into a joint bank account from which they paid all their expenses. They never spent all their salaries, and Alice offered to invest the excess “for our retirement.” Ben, who much preferred to tinker in his workshop than to read the newspaper’s financial pages, gladly agreed. During the years they lived together, Alice withdrew $50,000 from their joint bank account and invested it in securities titled solely in her name. The investments are now worth $200,000.

Ben recently received a patent in his name on a device that he invented and developed with his own labor while living with Alice. Ben is negotiating with a company interested in manufacturing the device and believes that rights to the device may eventually be worth several million dollars.

Three months ago, Alice gave birth to a child, Carol. Ben does not deny that he is Carol’s biological father. Alice admits that she conceived Carol after she stopped using birth control pills without telling Ben, even though Ben had always made it clear that he did not want children. Ben is so angry at Alice that he has moved out. Ben believes that he should not have to contribute to Carol’s support because Alice tricked him into fatherhood.

Ben demands that Alice give him half of the securities that she purchased with their savings. Alice believes that she is entitled to a share of any money Ben makes from his invention.

1. Is Ben obligated to contribute to Carol’s support? Explain.
2. On what theory or theories might Ben assert a right to a share of the securities and might Alice assert a right to a share in the profits from the invention, and what is the likely result on each theory? Explain.

COMMERCIAL PAPER QUESTION

Andy wanted to install siding on his house. Barbara agreed to do the work for $10,000 and to accept as payment a $10,000 note that would come due on October 1. Andy issued the note to Barbara on August 1 using a form note that he bought at a stationery store. Assuming that Barbara would complete the form in accordance with their agreement, Andy did not fill in two parts of the form: the due date and the amount to be paid. He did, however, sign the note and insert Barbara's name in the space following the words "I promise to pay to the order of."

After Barbara took the note, she typed $20,000 in the blank space reserved for the amount instead of the $10,000 to which she and Andy had agreed. Barbara did not bother filling in the empty space for the due date. On August 15, Barbara properly indorsed the note and sold it to Carl for $19,000. When Carl took the note, he was unaware of the alteration and had no notice of any other claims or defenses to the note.

On August 20, Carl presented the note to Andy and demanded that Andy pay him $20,000. Andy explained to Carl that he had agreed to pay Barbara only $10,000 and that, in any event, he and Barbara agreed that the note would not be due until October 1.

1. Can Carl enforce the note against Andy for $20,000? Explain.
2. Can Carl enforce the note against Andy before October 1? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

Tom and Wanda were married and had a child, Anna. After Wanda died, Tom had a nonmarital relationship with Nancy, who had a child, Bill, from a prior marriage. At the time the relationship between Tom and Nancy began, Anna was 12 and Bill was 17. Three years after the relationship between Tom and Nancy began, they had a child, Chris. Shortly thereafter Nancy was killed in an automobile accident. Tom continued to raise all three children as his own but took no steps to adopt Bill. Although he acknowledged he was Chris's father, he took no steps to establish his paternity judicially.

During the 20 years following Nancy's death, the relationship between Tom and Anna soured, but Tom's relationships with Bill and Chris blossomed. Eventually, Tom came to have little to do with Anna. Last year, things came to a head. At Thanksgiving dinner, Tom handed each of the children a check in the amount of $50,000. Each check was accompanied by a personal handwritten note signed by Tom. The note to Anna read: "You have been a constant disappointment to me over these years. Take this but expect no more from me." The notes to Bill and Chris, which were identical, read: "You have been a wonderful child to me. Use this gift well. I love you very much."

Four months ago, Anna died survived by her son, Danny. One month later, Tom died intestate leaving a probate estate of $250,000. Tom was survived by Bill, Chris, and Danny.

A state statute provides that property descends to issue if the intestate has no surviving spouse. It defines "children" as children born during marriage, adopted children, and children born out of wedlock, provided paternity is established judicially or is otherwise recognized by the father. State law prohibits holographic wills.

How should Tom's estate be distributed? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

Carl decided to form a corporation to provide various support services to small businesses on a contract basis. After several months of searching, Carl found suitable office space in an office park that he thought was ideal for his future corporation. Leaseco was willing to rent the office space at a very favorable rate but only if the lease could be signed immediately. Although Carl had not taken any-steps to incorporate, he began negotiations with Leaseco for the lease. Carl told Leaseco that the lease was on behalf of a corporation that would be formed, to be called Small Service Corporation (SSC), and that Carl would be president of SSC. Carl signed a two-year lease with Leaseco for the office space at the favorable rate. The parties named in the lease were Leaseco and SSC. Carl signed the lease as “Small Service Corporation, a corporation to be formed, by Carl, President.” The following week, Carl moved his equipment and supplies into the office space and began business operations.

Two weeks after the lease was signed, Carl properly incorporated SSC. The articles of incorporation named Carl and two other individuals, David and Ellen, as the initial directors of the corporation, and the directors properly elected Carl as president.

At the first meeting of the board of directors, Carl provided David and Ellen with copies of the Leaseco office lease. SSC printed corporate letterhead with the address of the leased office space and began making monthly lease payments to Leaseco. SSC’s business was an immediate success and after nine months of operations it began to show a profit. Because of the initial success of the business, Carl, David, and Ellen needed to hire additional personnel. However, the office space leased from Leaseco was too small for any expansion. The directors unanimously voted to terminate the Leaseco lease before the end of its term. Then they entered into a lease with Rental, Inc. for a larger space, vacated the Leaseco premises, and refused to pay any further rent to Leaseco.

Several months after SSC began operations, at a regularly scheduled meeting of the board of directors for which all proper notice was given, Carl proposed that SSC contribute 4% of SSC’s profits earned since incorporation to a local charity that operates a nonprofit job training program. Carl and David voted to approve the resolution; Ellen voted against it. The SSC articles of incorporation have no provisions dealing with the power of the corporation to make charitable contributions.

1. Is Carl personally liable on the Leaseco office lease? Explain.
2. Is SSC liable on the Leaseco office lease? Explain.
3. Does SSC have the power to make the charitable contribution? Explain.

COMMERCIAL PAPER ANALYSIS

(Commercial Paper III.C, IV.A, IV.B, V.D)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) What is the effect of the cancellation of a subsequent indorsement by a former holder who reacquires the instrument?
- (2) What is the effect of the reacquisition of an instrument by a former holder on the power to negotiate the instrument again?
- (3) When does a collecting bank give value for the purpose of becoming a holder in due course?

DISCUSSION

Point One (50-60%)

The effect of the cancellation of a subsequent indorsement by a former holder who reacquires the instrument is that the instrument again becomes payable to the order of the reacquirer and the obligation of the indorser is discharged.

Insko issued a draft on itself and therefore is obligated to pay the instrument in the amount of $10,000. Uniform Commercial Code § 3-412. Because the draft is drawn on itself, Insko's liability is the equivalent of the maker of a note rather than the drawer of a draft. UCC § 3-412, comment 1. This obligation is owed to a person entitled to enforce the instrument as defined in UCC § 3-301.

Trucker, by signing the instrument, and Acme Motors, by stamping the instrument (which is a signature per UCC § 3-401 (b)), have each incurred the obligation of an indorser. See UCC § 3-415. Their obligations are likewise owed to a person entitled to enforce the instrument, but their liability will not arise unless there has first been a dishonor, which has occurred.

When Trucker first received the draft, Trucker was a "holder" pursuant to UCC § 1-201(20) as the draft was payable to an identified person (Trucker) and the identified person (Trucker) was in possession of the draft.

Trucker negotiated the draft to Acme Motors by indorsing the draft "Pay to Acme Motors, Trucker" and delivering it to Acme Motors. UCC § 3-204. This constituted a special indorsement under UCC § 3-205 and the draft could be negotiated further only by indorsement of Acme Motors. The effect of Acme's indorsing the draft "Pay to State Savings, Acme Motors" was to make a special indorsement, and the draft could normally be negotiated further only by the indorsement of State Savings. UCC § 3-205(a). (At this point, no one is a holder because the draft is in the possession of Acme Motors but is payable to State Savings.)

However, UCC § 3-207 provides that upon reacquisition by a former holder (Trucker) by negotiation or otherwise, the former holder (Trucker) may cancel the indorsement of Acme Motors. When Trucker struck out both Trucker's indorsement and that of Acme Motors, the effect was to cause the instrument to be payable to the order of the reacquires Trucker, as the original payee. UCC § 3-207.

When Trucker struck out the indorsement of Acme Motors, Acme Motors' indorser's obligation was discharged (UCC § 3-604) and this discharge is effective against any subsequent holder, which, in this case, means Bank. UCC § 3-207. And since the cancellation by Trucker would be obvious to any subsequent taker, there would be notice of the discharge, thus the discharge of Acme would be effective as a defense against Bank even if Bank is, or has the rights of, a holder in due course. UCC § 3-207, official comment, UCC §§ 3-302(b), 3-604.

Upon reacquisition of an instrument, a former holder has the power to further negotiate the instrument.

When Trucker first reacquired the instrument from Acme Motors, Trucker was not a holder in Trucker's own right. At that time, Trucker would have been able to transfer but perhaps would not have been able to negotiate the draft because it was still indorsed by Trucker to Acme Motors and then by Acme Motors to State Savings. However, when Trucker struck both indorsements, they were canceled and caused the instrument to be payable to the order of Trucker again. UCC § 3-207.

Therefore, Trucker, the "reacquirer, may negotiate the instrument." UCC § 3-207.

Point Three (15-25%)

Bank gave value when it accepted the draft in satisfaction of a debt owed by Trucker. Therefore, Bank was a holder in due course against which Insko has no defense.

Trucker was able to negotiate the draft by indorsement as it was still order paper. Moreover, because Trucker indorsed and delivered the draft to Bank in satisfaction of a debt and Bank applied the amount against an indebtedness of Trucker, Bank has given value. UCC § 3-303(a) (3). Because there are no facts to indicate otherwise, Bank has apparently taken the draft in good faith and without notice of any claim or defense to it. Bank is the holder in due course. Insko's defense against Trucker (fraud in the inducement, as opposed to fraud in the factum) is a personal defense and, as such, is not assertable against Bank. UCC §§ 3-302, 3-305. Accordingly, Insko must pay the instrument according to its terms at the time it was issued.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP ANALYSIS

(Agency and Partnership VIII.D, X.A)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Has a general partner of a limited partnership violated its duty of loyalty to the limited partners by entering into an interested transaction between itself and the limited partnership on terms less advantageous to the partnership than an arm's-length transaction would have been?
- (2) Is the limited partners' claim of a general partner's breach of loyalty a derivative or a direct claim and, if derivative, what procedures must they follow to pursue that claim?
- (3) Before the interested transaction occurs, can a general partner shield itself from liability by convincing the limited partners to amend the limited partnership agreement to expressly permit it to engage in interested transactions with XYZ by making full disclosure about the potential sale and obtaining the consent of the disinterested limited partners?
- (4) Is an individual who is the sole officer, director, and shareholder of a corporate general partner also deemed to be a general partner of XYZ and therefore liable for any actions taken by the corporate general partner?

DISCUSSION

Point One (30-40%)

GemCorp's sale of the third lot of uncut blue diamonds was an interested transaction and a breach of GemCorp's duty of loyalty to the limited partners of XYZ because the price paid to GemCorp by XYZ was unfair.

A general partner of a limited partnership has a fiduciary duty to the limited partners of the partnership similar to that which a partner of a general partnership has to the other general partners. Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act § 403(b). This fiduciary duty includes a duty of loyalty that historically is measured at a high standard. See UP A § 21 (partner accountable as a fiduciary to other partners); Clement v. Clement, 436 Pa. 466, 468, 260 A.2d 728-729 (quoting Meinhard v. Salmon, 249 N. Y. 458 (1928)). Generally, where a partner has a conflict of interest, he is obligated to resolve the conflict in favor of the partnership or to fully disclose the conflict and get the consent of the other partners. Reuschlein & Gregory, The Law of Agency and Partnership § 188 at 279 (2d ed. 1989).

In this case, all partners in XYZ knew when the limited partnership was formed that GemCorp was in the business of buying and selling rare gemstones. The partners agreed in the partnership agreement that GemCorp would have the right to continue its gem business without offering XYZ any business opportunities. Therefore, GemCorp's purchase of the three lots of diamonds and its sale of the first two lots to unrelated third parties was not a breach of its fiduciary duties to XYZ.

However, since the XYZ limited partnership agreement did not expressly permit GemCorp to engage in business transactions with XYZ, GemCorp had a conflict of interest between its duties to XYZ and the limited partners and its own self-interest when it sold the third lot of diamonds to XYZ.

David and Emily, as limited partners, could challenge the diamond sale to XYZ on the ground that it was a breach of GemCorp's duty of loyalty. They would argue that it was an interested transaction and the terms of the sale were unfair. Since Bill controls GemCorp, which is accused of the wrongdoing, Bill could not join with the other limited partners in the challenge. GemCorp will have the burden of demonstrating that the terms of the transaction are fair, such as would be negotiated by the parties to an arm's-length transaction, unless it has obtained prior consent of the other limited partners. (See Point Three below.) In this situation, no grounds are provided which would support a defense by GemCorp that the terms of the sale were fair to XYZ.

The limited partners' potential claim against GemCorp for breach of fiduciary duty is a derivative claim and subject to the procedural requirements for derivative claims, such as a demand on the general partner.

The limited partners' claim is a derivative claim because the loss they suffer is derived from any loss suffered by XYZ. If GemCorp has overcharged XYZ for the third lot of diamonds, this will reduce the value of the assets held by XYZ. Injury to the limited partners would be due to the resulting decrease in the value of their interests in XYZ.

A limited partner has the right to bring a derivative claim. However, the limited partner must be a partner both at the time of the conduct that is being challenged as well as at the time it files the lawsuit. RULPA § 1002. Further, the limited partner must plead with particularity that it has made demand on the general partner to bring the action or that the "effort to cause the general partners to bring the action is not likely to succeed." RULPA § 1001. Here, the limited partners are partners at the time the suit is brought and were partners when XYZ purchased the lot of blue diamonds from GemCorp. In addition, the limited partners can probably satisfy this procedural requirement if they plead demand futility, because the claim arises from illegal actions by the general partner.

Point Three (20-30%)

If GemCorp had made full disclosure to the disinterested limited partners of all the relevant details concerning its sale to XYZ of the third lot of diamonds before the sale, then GemCorp would not have been liable for the transaction with XYZ.

GemCorp's sale of the blue diamonds to XYZ was not per se improper. Unless limited by the partnership agreement, a partner has the same rights to transact business with the limited partnership as any person who is not a partner. RULPA § 107. The XYZ limited partnership agreement is silent on whether GemCorp may engage in business transactions with XYZ. The absence of an express provision would permit GemCorp to engage in transactions with XYZ.

However, GemCorp's fiduciary duties to XYZ require that those transactions be on arm's-length terms. Reuschlein & Gregory, The Law of Agency and Partnership § 188 at 279. Since the terms of GemCorp's sale to XYZ were much more favorable to GemCorp than GemCorp would have received in an arm's-length transaction, the transaction was improper.

However, GemCorp could have eliminated its liability from the sale to XYZ of the blue diamonds for such a high price if, prior to the sale, it had disclosed the terms of the sale to the limited partners and obtained their consent either (1) to amend the limited partnership agreement to allow GemCorp to engage in transactions with XYZ on terms more favorable to GemCorp than it could have obtained in an arm's-length transaction; or (2) to consent to this particular transaction between GemCorp and XYZ on more favorable terms. In either case, all of the partners would have been put on notice of GemCorp's right and sale by GemCorp to XYZ would have been proper. Reuschlein & Gregory, The Law of Agency and Partnership § 188 at 279 (2d ed. 1989). (Note that a vote by the limited partners on a transaction between the limited partnership and its general partner does not expose the limited partners to any risk that they are controlling the business of the partnership. RULPA § 303(b) (6) (vii).)

The limited partnership agreement provides that it can be amended by a 60% vote of the limited partners. Bill is interested in the contemplated transaction and therefore should abstain from voting to amend the limited partnership agreement. The other limited partners have the power to approve the proposed change. However, if GemCorp wants to avoid later charges by the limited partners that they were deceived into voting in favor of the amendment, it would need to make full disclosure to the limited partners of the terms of the sale by GemCorp to XYZ of the third lot of uncut diamonds before the transaction was entered into.

Bill would not be liable merely due to his position as sole shareholder, director, and officer of GemCorp, but may be liable because he caused GemCorp to breach its fiduciary duties to XYZ.

Bill is the sole owner of, and controls, GemCorp, the general partner of XYZ. As such, Bill effectively controls the business of XYZ in his capacity as corporate officer and shareholder of the general partner.

In cases relating to claims of third parties, in contrast to claims of the limited partners, courts have split on whether such control over the general partner will transform the liability of a limited partner into the unlimited liability of a general partner. See Western Camps, Inc. v. Riverway Ranch Enterprises, 70 Cal. App. 3d 714, 138 Cal. Rptr. 918 (1977) (Where court found the limited partner to be not liable). But see Delaney v. Fidelity Lease Limited, 526 S.W.2d 543 (Tex. 1975) (Where court held the limited partner liable as a general partner). However, RULPA expressly states that, with respect to claims by third parties, a limited partner will not be subject to the unlimited liability of a general partner solely by being an officer, director, or shareholder of a corporate general partner of the limited partnership. RULPA § 303(b) (1). The statute does not address whether this result would change if the claim were made by a limited partner rather than a third party. However, unless the limited partners were unaware of the ownership and control by a limited partner over the general partner, the better reading would follow the same rule as for third party claims under RULPA § 303, and the related cases. Since the other XYZ limited partners knew of the relationship between Bill and GemCorp, Bill should not have any personal liability as a general partner of XYZ by reason of his ownership and control of GemCorp.

It is possible to argue that Bill would be personally liable on the theory that an officer of a corporation who commits a tort is personally liable to injured third parties. See Washington Gas Light Co. v. Hansden, 172 U.S. 534; Shingleton v. Armor Velvet Corp., 621 F.2d 180 (5th Cir 1980). In this case, Bill was the corporate officer who caused GemCorp to breach its fiduciary duties to XYZ limited partnership.

(Decedents' Estates II.I)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Generally, what is the order of abatement among general, specific, demonstrative, and residuary bequests?
- (2) Is the bequest to Uncle general, specific, or demonstrative for purposes of abatement?
- (3) Should the bequest to Uncle that does not abate, if any, pass to Uncle's son who survives Testator or as a part of the residuary bequest?
- (4) Is the bequest of the ABC common stock general or specific for purposes of abatement?

DISCUSSION

Point One (20-25%)

Typically, when assets of an estate are insufficient to pay all claims against the estate, the bequests abate in the following order to pay claims: residuary bequests, general bequests, and specific bequests. Bequests charged to a specific fund for their source of payment are specific to the extent of the fund: to the extent they exceed the fund, they are general.

Beneficiaries under wills are entitled only to the net value of estate assets. The net value represents what remains of the decedent's assets owned at death after the payment of debts, expenses, and taxes. All states have statutes (known as abatement statutes) that determine how debts, expenses, and taxes should be allocated among the beneficiaries of residuary, specific, and general legacies. Invariably state statutes provide that, unless the will otherwise provides, legacies abate in the following order to pay debts, expenses, and taxes: (1) residuary devises, (2) general devises, and then (3) specific devises. See, e.g., Uniform Probate Code § 3-902. Many abatement statutes also provide that "a general devise charged on any specific property or fund is a specific devise to the extent of the value of the property on which it is charged, and upon the failure or insufficiency of the property on which it is charged, a general devise to the extent of the failure or insufficiency." Id.

The general and specific bequests under the will add up to $27,000. The value of the estate after payment of the $28,000 claim is only $22,000. Because the remaining value of the estate is $5,000 less than the general and specific bequests, the residuary bequest abates completely.

Moreover, the $5,000 shortfall must be allocated among the non-residuary legatees.

A bequest is specific if the subject matter of the bequest is specific property. See generally W. McGovern, S. Kurtz & J. Rein, Wills, Trusts and Estates § 10.1 at 398. A bequest is general if it can be satisfied with any estate assets. Id. Typically, a bequest of a specific dollar amount is general since it can be funded with cash or other property having a value equal to the amount of the bequest. A bequest of a specific dollar amount that is payable from a designated fund is a demonstrative bequest. Id. at 399. To the extent of the designated fund, a demonstrative bequest is specific since it is the designated fund from which the bequest is to be paid. A demonstrative bequest is general, however, to the extent the fund is insufficient to pay the dollar amount of the bequest in full.

Point Two (30-35%)

The bequest to Uncle of $1,000 to be paid from Testator's bank account at Bank is a demonstrative legacy. Therefore, it is specific to the extent of $750 and general as to $250. Accordingly, only $250 is subject to possible abatement as a general legacy, and then only in proportion to the other general legacies available for the payment of debts.

In light of the definition of a demonstrative legacy (see Point One), the bequest to Uncle is part specific (the $750 in the bank account), part general ($250), for purposes of the abatement statute. See UPC § 3-902. The portion that is specific will not abate if there are sufficient general legacies under the will to pay debts, expenses, and taxes that exceed the value of the residuary estate. Therefore, the amount of the abatement depends on what the aggregate value of all the general legacies is.

There is no doubt that the bequest to Friend of $5,000 is a general legacy.

If Friend's bequest is the only other general legacy in addition to the $250 to Uncle, then $$250/$5,250$ times $5,000 (or $238) of Uncle's bequest abates to pay the $5,000 of claims for which the residuary estate is insufficient and $4,762 of Friend's bequest abates as well. This would leave Uncle with $762 and Friend with $238. Of course, Sister gets the tangibles of $1,000 and Brother gets $20,000 of specifically bequeathed closely held corporate stock. This fully accounts for the $22,000 available for distribution.

If, on the other hand, the bequest of the stock (valued at $20,000) is also a general legacy, which is unlikely (see Point Four), then $$250/$25,250$ (or $50) of Uncle's bequest abates; $991 of Friend's bequest abates; and $3,959 of Brother's bequest abates. As noted in Point Four below, this is unlikely.

Point Three (15-25%)

The interest of a disclaimant in either a specific, general, or demonstrative bequest passes as if the disclaimant predeceased the testator. Unless the will otherwise provides, if the disclaimant is a person described in the applicable anti-lapse statute, the disclaimed interest passes to the disclaimant's surviving issue.

Under the typical disclaimer statute, if a disclaimant files a timely disclaimer (generally within nine months of a testator's death), the disclaimed interest passes as if the disclaimant had predeceased the testator. See UPC § 2-801. In other words, the typical disclaimer statute creates the fiction that the disclaimant predeceased the testator.

Under the typical lapse statute, if Uncle had predeceased Testator, the bequest to Uncle does not lapse; it passes to Uncle's issue. For example, under UPC § 2-603, a devise to a person who is a descendant of the testator's grandparents does not lapse if the deceased person's descendants survive the testator. Rather, a substituted gift is created in the deceased person's descendants. Under this and other typical lapse statutes, a substituted gift is created in Uncle's child, Son.

If an examinee assumes there is no lapse statute (which would be the common law rule) the amount to abate reduces from $5,000 to $4,000 and the entire amount would come from Friend's general bequest. This results from the fact that the bequest to Uncle is available to pay part of the $28,000 claim against the estate, leaving only $4,000 to come from the non-residuary bequests.

Point Four (15-30%)

The bequest of stock is most likely specific.

The classification of a bequest as either general or specific may depend on the intent of the testator. See generally Paulus, Special and General Legacies: Testator's Intent, 43 Iowa L. Rev. 467, 468 (1958). The classification of bequests of stock has proved most troublesome. If the language in the will evidences that the testator owned the securities at the time the will was executed (such as a will reading: "I give my stock in ABC Corporation"), courts generally conclude the gift is specific. This construction is based on the fact that the testator was referring to securities that he or she actually owned. Absent possessive words, courts use other factors to assist in the classification of the bequest. For example, if the stock is of a closely held business, the gift is usually specific on the theory that an executor could not readily acquire the stock for the named legatee on the open market, which would be the expectation if the bequest were classified as general. See, e.g., In re Buck's Estate, 186 P.2d 708 (Calif. 1949). Also, even if the testator did not use the possessive word "my" to describe the gift, if, when the will was signed, the testator owned shares equal to the amount described in the will, courts generally construe the gift as specific. Paulus, supra, at 495. On the other hand, if the testator did not then own shares at least equal to the amount of the gift, the tendency is to construe the gift as general. See, e.g., Paulus, supra, at 493.

In this case, ABC stock is closely held, and, at the time the will was executed, Testator owned 100 shares. Thus, more likely than not, the gift will be construed as specific and, therefore, will abate only if the residuary bequest and the general bequests are insufficient to pay all claims against the estate. Here, the general legacies are sufficient to pay the amount of debt that could not be paid from the residuary estate/Thus, the bequest of the ABC stock to Brother should not abate at all.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure I, I.A)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Can the State Z district court exercise personal jurisdiction over Laptop, when the defective computer that caused Paul's injuries was purchased by Paul in State Y and transported by Paul into State Z?
- (2) Can the State Z district court exercise personal jurisdiction over Chip, when Chip's only connection with State Z is that its computer chips enter that state as part of computers sold there by Laptop?
- (3) Is venue proper in State Z?

DISCUSSION

Point One (35-45%)

The district court in State Z can assert personal jurisdiction over Laptop because Laptop's activities in the state are extensive enough to warrant the exercise of jurisdiction, even over a cause of action unrelated to those activities.

State Z may exercise in personam jurisdiction over Laptop so long as the defendant has "certain minimum contacts with [the forum] such that the maintenance of the suit does not offend 'traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.'" International Shoe Co. v. State of Washington, 326 U.S. 310 (1945). The "defendant's conduct and connection with the forum state" must be "such that he should reasonably anticipate being haled into court there." A defendant corporation satisfies this requirement if it "purposefully avails itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State." WorldWide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, 444 U.S. 286 (1980). See also McGee v. International Life Insurance Co., 355 U.S. 220 (1957).

Laptop's connection to State Z easily satisfies the minimum contacts test. The combination of Laptop's substantial sales in State Z, its advertising in State Z and its provision of a website (by which customers in State Z can obtain advice in the use of its products) all show a clear intent to serve the State Z market. As Laptop's conduct includes actions "purposefully directed toward the forum State," those actions should satisfy the minimum contacts requirement. Asahi Metal Industry Co. v. Superior Court, 480 U.S. 102 (1987).

The only argument against jurisdiction might be that the particular computer involved in this case was not sold by Laptop in State Z, but was purchased by Paul in State Y and carried by him to State Z. In WorldWide Volkswagen Corp., the court held that the unilateral act of a customer in bringing a product into a state could not be regarded as creating minimum contacts between the state and the defendant, even if the product's presence in the state was foreseeable to defendant. That holding, however, has little relevance to this situation. Here, Laptop's connection to State Z is not merely a result of Paul's unilateral act of bringing the computer to State Z. Laptop has made its own intentional decision to serve the State Z market. Moreover, its contacts with State Z are "continuous and systematic general business contacts," Helicopteros Nacionales de Colombia, S.A. v. Hall, 466 U.S. 408, 416 (1984); 25% of its sales are there; it advertises there; and it provides technical support to customers who are located there. This is enough for State Z to assert jurisdiction over Laptop, even as to a cause of action that is not directly connected to those business contacts. See Perkins v. Benguet Consolidated Mining Co., 342 U.S. 437 (1952); cf. Helicopteros Nacionales de Colombia, S.A. v. Hall, 466 U.S. 408 (1984) (purchasing goods from a seller in a jurisdiction, even at regular intervals and even with related trips, is not enough to warrant assertion of jurisdiction over purchaser on cause of action unrelated to those transactions).

In all probability, Chip should not be subject to State Z jurisdiction because the defective chip reached State Z through Paul's unilateral act and Chip's connections with State Z are not otherwise substantial enough for it reasonably to expect to be haled into court there.

Chip put its goods into the stream of commerce in the U.S. by selling them to Laptop. It knew its chips could end up in computers that would be sold in State Z. It also earned revenue from the sale of chips that were destined to be a part of products sold in State Z. However, the cause of action in this case, although it occurred in State Z, arose out of an alleged defect in a chip that was sold in another state and brought into State Z by the purchaser.

On these unique facts, jurisdiction is probably not proper over Chip. First, jurisdiction over Chip would have to be based solely on a "stream of commerce" theory: by placing its goods in the "stream of commerce" with knowledge that they would end up in State Z, Chip avails itself of the privilege of doing business in State Z and subjects itself to suit there. The problem with this theory is that it may no longer be valid and, even if it is, the injuries in this case were not caused by a chip that entered State Z through the stream of commerce.

The "stream of commerce" theory of jurisdiction was last endorsed by the Supreme Court in dicta in the WorldWide Volkswagen case, decided in 1980. In 1987, the Court split 4-4 on the validity of the stream-of-commerce theory, with four members of the Court writing that placing goods into the stream of commerce was not a sufficient basis to exercise jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant, absent evidence of an explicit intention by the defendant to serve the target market. Since that time, the federal courts have been divided on the viability of the stream-of-commerce test.

In our case, the argument for jurisdiction on a stream-of-commerce rationale is especially weak. Although Chip sells some chips knowing that they will reach State Z through the stream of commerce, the particular chip that caused injury did not reach State Z via the stream of commerce. The allegedly defective chip entered State Z because of Paul's, unilateral act of bringing his laptop computer into the state. Moreover, Chip did nothing that indicated any special intention to serve the State Z market. Finally, Chip's revenue from State Z sales is relatively small (less than 2% of its annual revenue). Even if the stream-of-commerce theory is a viable basis for jurisdiction over Chip, that jurisdiction probably would not extend to acts unrelated to its in-state sales. The fact that Chip's products enter State Z on a small scale through the stream of commerce would not seem to be the “continuous and systematic general business contacts” required for exercise of jurisdiction in connection with claims unrelated to those contacts.

However, a case for jurisdiction can be supported by emphasizing that it was foreseeable to Chip that its products might cause injury in State Z. given its knowledge that they were incorporated into computers sold there.

A second reason for not asserting jurisdiction over Chip is the burden that Chip would face in defending in State Z. In the leading case involving jurisdiction over a foreign component manufacturer, the Supreme Court noted that “the unique burdens placed upon one who must defend oneself in a foreign legal system should have significant weight in assessing the reasonableness” of an exercise of jurisdiction. Asahi, supra. Even if an assertion of jurisdiction over Chip were otherwise appropriate, it might be unreasonable in light of the burden Chip would face in defending itself, especially in light of the small amount of revenue it actually makes from sales of its product in State Z.

On the other hand, Paul and State Z have a strong interest in having the case go forward in State Z. A State Z action would be convenient for Paul and would allow State Z courts to vindicate whatever interest the state may have in Paul’s recovery. These interests, which were not present in Asahi, offset the burden on Chip and provide strong reasons for hearing the action in State Z. If there were an otherwise sound basis for jurisdiction over Chip, it would probably be reasonable to assert it, despite the burdens that it would impose on Chip.

In sum, it would appear that the court should grant Chip’s motion to dismiss because jurisdiction is inappropriate where (1) Chip’s connections with State Z are slight, (2) Chip takes no actions itself that are directed at serving the State Z market, (3) the injury in the case was caused by a chip which entered State Z through the unilateral actions of the consumer, and (4) the burden on Chip of defending the action would be severe. However, a good argument could be made in favor of jurisdiction, stressing the foreseeability to Chip of an injury in State Z and the reasonableness of State Z jurisdiction in light of the interests of the state and the plaintiff.

Point Three (35-45%)

Venue is clearly proper in State Z. but the action should be transferred to State Y if the district court in State Z is found to lack jurisdiction over Chip.

Under 28 United States Code § 1391(a), venue in a diversity case is proper in “(1) a judicial district where any defendant resides, if all defendants reside in the same, state, (2) a judicial district in which a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred, ...” or “(3) a judicial district in which the defendants are subject to personal jurisdiction.” Where corporate defendants are involved, they are deemed to reside “in any judicial district in which [they] are subject to personal jurisdiction.” 28 U.S.C. § 1391(c). If State Z has jurisdiction over the defendants, it would clearly have venue over the action under any of these provisions. It would be a “district in which the defendants are subject to personal jurisdiction,” it would be (by definition) a district in which the defendants “reside,” and “a substantial part of the events ... giving rise to the claim” occurred there—the computer fire and Paul’s injuries.

If State Z has jurisdiction, the court is unlikely to grant a motion to transfer venue. Venue transfer is permitted, “in the interest of justice [and] for the convenience of the parties,” to any district in which the action could have been brought originally. 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a). There is no reason to believe that any outlier court would be significantly superior to State Z as a venue for the action. State Y might be a somewhat more appropriate venue for a product liability action, as it is the state of manufacture. But pertinent evidence (e.g., relating to Paul’s injuries) is likely to be present in State Z; a State Z trial will be convenient for Paul (as a State Z resident); and courts generally give deference to plaintiffs choice of forum where the choice is not unreasonable and convenience factors do not weigh strongly toward another forum.

If State Z does NOT have jurisdiction, however, the court is very likely to grant a motion to transfer venue to State Y. Both Laptop and Chip would almost certainly be amenable to suit in State Y (Laptop manufactures its laptops there and Chip ships its parts directly to State Y), State Y is a proper venue for the action because “a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred” there (manufacture of the computer), and a venue transfer to State Y would serve “the interests of justice” better than an outright dismissal of the case. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1631, a court may transfer an action to another court to cure a “want of jurisdiction” if it is “in the interest of justice” to do so.

FAMILY LAW/CONFLICT OF LAWS ANALYSIS

(Family Law V.B, VILA, VII.C / Conflict of Laws III.C)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) In an interstate adoption action, which state's statute of limitations applies?
- (2) Does the state which was the domicile of the adoptive parents but not the biological mother or the child have jurisdiction to enter the adoption decree?
- (3) Does it violate due process to allow a child born to unmarried parents to be adopted without notice to a putative father who has knowledge of the child's birth but has not visited the child, paid child support* or otherwise manifested willingness to take on the rights and duties of parenthood?

DISCUSSION

Point One (15-25%)

The statute of limitations in the forum state State Z. will apply.

Most states treat statutes of limitations as procedural for choice of law purposes. If State Z uses this approach, it would ordinarily apply its own statute of limitations. Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws § 142 (1986 Rev., as approved 1988) continues this approach. It provides that the forum's shorter statute of limitations applies absent "exceptional circumstances" that make its application "unreasonable." No such circumstances appear here.

The Uniform Conflict of Laws Limitations Act, 12 U.L.A. Pocket Part 56 (1988), adopted in six states, characterizes statutes of limitations as substantive. Under the Uniform Act, when a claim "is substantively based" on the law of a particular state, that state's statute of limitations applies. In this case, however, Father's claim raises primarily federal constitutional issues and is not substantively based on a particular state's law. In these circumstances, the forum applies its own statute of limitations.

Accordingly, whether State Z uses traditional law, the Restatement approach, or the Uniform Act, it will likely apply its six-month limitation to the collateral attack on the adoption decree.

Point Two (35-45%)

Under traditional principles, State Z has jurisdiction to enter the adoption decree because the adoptive parents are domiciled there. Under modern statutes, whether State Z has jurisdiction depends on whether the court finds that the connection between the child and State Z is significant and whether substantial evidence concerning the case is present in State Z.

Under traditional common-law principles and the Uniform Adoption Act as it existed before 1994, State Z would be able to assert jurisdiction because it is the domicile of the adoptive parents. Uniform Adoption Act § 4 (1969).

Under more current jurisdictional principles, expressed in the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act and the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act, the essential inquiry is whether State Z has a sufficiently strong connection with the child and whether substantial evidence concerning the case is present there. Section 4(2) of the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act would almost certainly allow State Z to take jurisdiction because “immediately before commencement of the proceeding, the prospective adoptive parent lived in this State for at least six consecutive months, excluding periods of temporary absence, and there is available in this State substantial evidence concerning the minor’s present or future care.”

However, many states have not adopted the Uniform Adoption Act and use the more general principles of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act to determine jurisdiction for adoption. Cases applying the UCCJA to adoption include In re Adoption of Child by T. W.C., 270 N.J. Super. 225, 636 A.2d 1083 (1994); In re Baby Girl Clausen, 502 N.W.2d 649 (Mich. 1993); In re Termination of Parental Rights over M.C.S., 504 N.W.2d 322 (S.D. 1993); In re A.E.H., 46% N.W.2d 190 (Wis. 1991); Foster v. Stein, 183 Mich. App. 424, 454 N.W.2d 244 (1990); Gainey v. Olivo, 258 Ga. 640, 373 S.E.2d 4 (1988); Souza v. Superior Court, 193 Cal. App. 3d 1304, 238 Cal. Rptr. 892 (1987).

The provision of the UCCJA which might allow State Z to take jurisdiction in this case is § 3(a) (2), which allows assertion of jurisdiction if the child and at least one contestant (here, the Adoptors) have a significant connection with the state and substantial evidence concerning the case is present in the state. Whether this test is satisfied is less clear. It can be argued that State Z does have a substantial connection because Son and the Adoptors intend to live there permanently and the evidence about Son’s future life with the Adoptors is available there. However, on facts similar to these some courts have held that the state in which a child has lived with prospective adoptive parents for a short time does not have jurisdiction under this provision. The rationale is that the child has spent all his life in the state of his birth and all the evidence about the validity of his relinquishment for adoption is available there. See, e.g., State ex rel. Torres v. Mason, 315 or. 386, 848 P.2d 592 (1993) (holding one-month stay in state with prospective adoptive parents is not long enough to give “significant connection” jurisdiction). It can also be argued that State Z is the child’s “home state” at the time the decree of adoption is entered, as the child and person acting as a parent (adoptors) have resided in State Z for a period in excess of 6 months.

Point Three (35-45%)

The due process clause does not require that notice of an adoption be given to an unwed father who knew of the pending birth of his child but who neither acknowledged paternity nor took steps to establish legal paternity or an actual parent-child relationship with the child.

Under the State Z adoption statute, Father was not entitled to notice of the adoption because he moved out shortly before the child was born, had no contact with the child, and took no legal action to establish paternity until after he learned of the adoption. As applied in this case, the statute allowing the child to be adopted without notice to the biological father is probably constitutional.

The United States Supreme Court has held that parental rights are fundamental rights protected by the Constitution. Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745 (1982); Lassiter v. Dept. of Soc. Serv., 452 U.S. 18 (1981). While the Supreme Court has never decided a case about the substantive showing that must be made to justify terminating parental rights, it can reasonably be inferred that heightened scrutiny would be used, since the Court has subjected actions limiting parental care and custody to heightened scrutiny. Id.

The critical question raised here is whether Father, the biological unwed father, has a constitutionally protected interest. Father will rely on Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645 (1972), and Caban v. Mohammed, 441 U.S. 380 (1979), to argue that he does. In Stanley, the Supreme Court held that an unwed father who was denied notice of juvenile court proceedings to determine the custody of his child had a constitutionally protected interest and that due process entitled him to notice. In Caban, the Court also found that an unwed father had such an interest and held that a statute which protected his relationship to his children less than it protected their relationship to their mother violated equal protection. However, in Lehr v. Robertson, 463 U.S. 248 (1983), the Supreme Court held that a state may allow the adoption of a child born outside of marriage without actual notice to a known biological father who did not satisfy a limited set of criteria for receiving notice. In Lehr, the father had not established a relationship with his child and had not registered his claim to paternity with the state putative father registry. He was not, therefore, entitled to notice under the statute. In upholding the statute the Court said, “The possibility that he may have failed to [file with a putative father registry, which would have entitled him to notice under the statute] because of his ignorance of the law cannot be a sufficient reason for criticizing the law itself. The New York legislature concluded that a more open-ended notice requirement would merely complicate the adoption process, threaten the privacy interests of unwed mothers, create the risk of unnecessary controversy, and impair the desired finality of adoption decrees.” The Court characterized the issue as whether the statute “adequately protected his opportunity to form such a relationship.” The court held that it had. Based on this reading of Lehr, the statute here would be constitutional as applied to Father. See generally Joan Heifetz Hollinger, Adoption Law and Practice 2.04.

CORPORATIONS ANALYSIS

(Corporations V.A, V.B, VIII.C)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is the decision of a president of a corporation to change the business, as authorized by the board, and his unilateral decision to sell the assets, within his power as an officer?
- (2) Do minority directors have the ability to block a change in the corporation's business and the sale of all of its assets?
- (3) Can minority shareholders force the corporation to buy their shares when they object to the corporation's change of business and sale of its assets?

DISCUSSION

Point One (40-60%)

The board of directors authorized Adam, as president, to change the corporation's business from furniture to tennis clubs. However, shareholder approval, in addition to board approval, is required to authorize Adam to sell all of the assets of FurnitureCo.

Officers are authorized to take actions as authorized in the bylaws, as directed by the board of directors consistent with the bylaws, or as directed by other officers acting under the authority of directors. Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA) § 8.41. In this case, Adam was authorized by the board of directors to "study and implement at his discretion a program for restructuring and/or reorienting the business operations of the company." There is nothing in the RMBCA that would prevent the board from making this decision. Since a quorum was present at the board meeting, the majority vote was the authorized action of the board. RMBCA § 8.24(a) (1) and (c). Unless the general direction to Adam is a violation of the board members' duties of good faith and care, (see RMBCA § 8.30), which the facts do not suggest given the general briefing on opportunities in the sports field and Adam's stock holdings, the delegation to Adam as president is within the board's power. The bylaws are silent as to whether an officer can exercise such authority upon the delegation of the board, and therefore such a delegation would not be in violation of RMBCA § 8.41.

Unlike the decision to redirect the business, the decision to sell FurnitureCo's assets is not within Adam's authority as president, even as directed by the board of directors. Adam's intended sale of FurnitureCo's current assets and use of the sale proceeds to buy a tennis club appears to be a sale of all, or substantially all, of the corporation's assets within the meaning of RMBCA §§12.01 and 12.02. Since the company has been in the furniture business for 20 years, the sale is clearly not in the regular course of business. Therefore, the board must vote to recommend the proposed sale to the shareholders and the shareholders must approve the sale in order for the sale to be properly authorized. RMBCA § 12.02. Since the board itself cannot alone authorize the sale, the board cannot grant the president the authority to implement the sale without shareholder approval.

Point Two (20-30%)

In their capacity as both directors and shareholders, Diane and Edward must be notified of and given the opportunity to vote on the sale of FurnitureCo's assets, although they don't have enough votes to prevail.

The board of directors must vote to recommend the sale of all or substantially all of the assets of FurnitureCo. RMBCA § 12.02. No resolution authorizing the sale was passed at a regular meeting of the board, since the general authorization by the board for Adam to study and implement a restructuring plan was insufficient authorization. Board approval could be obtained either at the next regularly scheduled board meeting or, if action was needed prior to the scheduled date of the regular meeting, at a special meeting of the board. It is necessary to hold a board meeting even where, as on these facts, the board has the required number of votes to approve recommending the sale to the shareholders.

In addition to board of director approval, the shareholders also must vote to approve the sale of all or substantially all of the assets. RMBCA § 12.02. Even though Adam owns 70% of the stock and will get the requisite majority, the action cannot be taken without giving all of the shareholders the opportunity to vote. All shareholders, including Diane and Edward, must be notified of a special meeting of the shareholders. RMBCA § 7.05. The notice must also state the purposes of the special meeting. RMBCA § 7.05(c). The only exceptions to the notice requirement are where a shareholder waives notice or joins in a unanimous written consent. RMBCA §§ 7.06 and 7.04.

The sale of assets has not been properly structured to date, but ultimately Adam has the power to prevail with his plan. RMBCA § 12.02 First, Adam must get the board to recommend the proposed sale. The facts indicate that Beth and Charles will vote with Adam to approve the sale. Furthermore, if they don't vote with him, Adam can vote as the 70% shareholder to remove them and replace them with directors who will. RMBCA § 8.08. Second, Adam will cause the corporation to give notice to the shareholders of a special meeting to vote on the sale proposal. Since Adam holds 70% of the shares and will vote, the sale will be approved.

Point Three (20-30%)

Diane and Edward can exercise their dissenters' rights and force FurnitureCo to buy their shares.

The sale of assets is "a sale or exchange of all, or substantially all, of the property of the corporation other than in the usual and regular course of business," which triggers dissenters' rights. RMBCA § 13.02(a) (3). Dissenters' rights are the right of dissenting shareholders to force the corporation to purchase their shares at an appraised market value. RMBCA § 13.02(a). To exercise their rights, Diane and Edward must deliver to FurnitureCo notice of their intent to dissent prior to the shareholder vote and must not vote in favor of the sale. RMBCA § 13.21. Once the shareholder vote authorizing the sale has occurred, FurnitureCo must deliver a dissenters' notice to Diane and Edward identifying the mechanics of the purchase of their shares.

Family Law/Conflict of Laws Analysis

RMBCA § 13.22. Diane and Edward must then demand payment and deposit the shares within the statutory time period (generally within 30 to 60 days) after the vote. RMBCA § 13.23.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS ANALYSIS

(Secured Transactions V.B)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Was the resale commercially reasonable?
- (1)(b) To what damages is Debtor entitled?
- (2) Is Smith Motors entitled to a deficiency judgment against Debtor?

DISCUSSION

Point One (a) (30-40%)

The resale was not conducted in a commercially reasonable manner, because Smith Motors did not adequately publicize the sale, failed to give adequate notice of the sale to Debtor, and sold the car for substantially less than its market value.

Smith Motors had a purchase money security interest under Uniform Commercial Code § 9-107(a). Because the car was used for personal purposes, it would be classified as consumer goods under UCC § 9-109(1). Thus any Article 9 default provisions applicable to purchase or non-purchase money security interests in consumer goods would govern the problem. Smith Motors purportedly held a public sale of the car pursuant to UCC § 9-504(3). A public sale is attended by the public pursuant to notice and often contemplates competitive bidding. J. White & R. Summers, Uniform Commercial Code 1217 (3d ed. 1988). Under UCC § 9-504(3), reasonable notice of a proposed resale must be sent to Debtor, and any resale must be commercially reasonable as to “method, manner, time, place, and terms.”

These standards were not met for three reasons:

(1) Smith Motors did not give adequate notice of resale to Debtor. UCC § 9-504(3) requires that “reasonable notification of the time and place of any public sale” shall be “sent by the secured party to the debtor.” Comment 5 to UCC § 9-504 suggests that reasonable notification “must be sent in such time that persons entitled to receive it will have sufficient time to take appropriate steps to protect their interests by taking part in the sale or other disposition if they so desire.” The notice was sent by mail and was delivered one day before the sale was to take place. It was too late to be of any use to Debtor. The purpose of notice—to give Debtor a chance to redeem the car under UCC § 9-506 or to maximize the number of bidders at the sale and thereby reduce any deficiency—was thereby thwarted. B. Clark, supra, § 12.05[5] [a], and the accelerated sale was commercially unreasonable. T. Crandall, supra, § 7.05[7] [c] [iv]; J. White, supra, at 1227. None of the UCC § 9-504(3) exceptions to debtor notice apply: the car was not perishable, it was not sold on a recognized market, and Debtor did not waive his rights to notice in writing after default. This was not sufficient for a commercially reasonable sale.

(2) Smith Motors did not give sufficient advance publicity to insure the success of a public sale. Advance publicity is important to increase the likelihood that a public sale will realize the market value of the collateral. B. Clark, The Law of Secured Transactions Under the Uniform Commercial Code § 4.08[5] [d] (1988). T. Crandall, R. Hagedorn, & F. Smith, The Law of Debtors and Creditors § 7.05[7] [d] [viii] (1991). Smith Motors did not do any advertising, and its contacts were with only a few dealers.

(3) The resale price of $10,000 to the lone bidder was below the fair market value of the car. While UCC § 9-507(2) specifies that a low price received at the sale does not always establish a lack of commercial reasonableness, most courts assume that a low price is a factor in deciding on commercial reasonableness. T. Crandall, supra, § 7.05[7] [d] [ii]; J. White, supra, § 25-15. When accompanied with procedural irregularities, a low resale price is the “paradigm commercially unreasonable resale.” Id. at 1234-35.

In addition, the resale was at wholesale to a dealer intending to resell. It could be argued that Smith Motors had sufficient expertise to resell at retail, thereby enhancing the sale price and reducing Debtor’s deficiency. However, a persuasive counterargument finds that requirement burdensome to retailers and wholesale disposition to be commercially reasonable. J. White, supra, § 25-11.

Under UCC § 9-507(1), Debtor is entitled to recover either the loss caused by Smith Motors’ failure to conduct a commercially reasonable sale or a minimum recovery in the form of a civil penalty.

As it is too late for any injunction against resale, the Uniform Commercial Code gives Debtor two options regarding damages. Under UCC § 9-507(1), Debtor is first entitled to recover “any loss caused by a failure to comply with the provisions” of Article 9 regarding default. Debtor may recover the difference between the resale price and the fair market value on August 15 ($14,000 - 10,000 = $4,000). In any event, because the collateral was consumer goods, Debtor may recover, as a civil penalty, not less than the greater of the credit service charge ($4,000) plus 10% of the principal of the debt ($1,600) or the time price differential ($4,000) plus 10% of the cash price ($1,650). (Note: Some jurisdictions would not include the down payment as part of the “cash price.” In such a jurisdiction, 10% of the cash price would be $ 1,600.) Thus, Debtor could recover a civil penalty of $5,650 ($4,000 + $1,650). T. Crandall, supra, § 7.05[9] [b]; J. White, supra, at 1244-45. Either of these amounts could be applied to reduce the deficiency owed to Smith Motors, and Debtor may recover the larger of the two. B. Clark, supra, § 4.12[5].

Point Two (30-40%)

Smith Motors may or may not be entitled to a deficiency judgment against Debtor depending upon the position of the jurisdiction as to the effect of creditor misbehavior.

The consequences for failure to publicize the sale and provide notice are provided in UCC § 9-507, which provides, in part: If it is established that the secured party is not proceeding in accordance with the provisions of this Part, disposition may be ordered or restrained on appropriate terms and conditions. If the disposition has occurred, the debtor or any person entitled to notification... has a right to recover from the secured party any loss caused by a failure to comply with the provisions of this Part.

The Uniform Commercial Code nowhere addresses the right of a creditor to recover a deficiency judgment after violating the rules contained in Part 5 (including the notice requirement of UCC § 9-504(3)). However, many courts have addressed the effect of the secured party's violation of such debtor protection provisions. Courts have taken three approaches, none of which can be clearly identified as the majority. White and Summers provide an extensive grouping of cases under each approach. White and Summers, Uniform Commercial Code 1245-53 (3d ed. 1988).

The first approach is to deny the secured creditor any deficiency if it is shown that Part 5 of Article 9 has been violated. In Skeels v. Universal CIT Credit Corp., 222 F. Supp. 696,702 (W.D. Pa. 1963), modified on other grounds, 335 F.2d 846 (3d Cir. 1964), the court held that "a security holder who sells without notice may not look to the debtor for any loss." Thus, under this approach, Debtor has an absolute defense to Smith Motors' suit, in addition to his right to recover damages.

A second line of cases applies what is known as the "rebuttable presumption" rule, under which the debtor who has not been notified has the benefit of a presumption that the value of the collateral was equal to the debt. See Emmons v. Burkett, 353 S.E.2d 908 (Ga. 1987). Under this rule, Smith Motors would carry the burden of showing that the collateral was worth less than the amount owed. The amount of Smith Motors' recovery would be limited to the difference between the value of the collateral as proved by it and the amount of the claim. See Universal CIT Credit Corp. v. Rone, 453 S.W.2d 37, 39-40 (Ark. 1970). In this question, there are not enough facts with which to calculate Smith Motors' recovery under this theory.

While a majority of courts would follow one of the two approaches above, see White and Summers, supra, at 1246 n.9, 1251 n.31, a minority of courts allow only a set-off for the loss proven by the debtor to have been caused by the secured party's failure to provide notice, or, alternatively, a set-off for Debtor's statutory recovery. See White and Summers, supra, at 1252. Again using the evidence provided by the facts, Debtor may be able to prove damages of $5,650 ($4,000 + $1,650 — see Point One) to offset against the $7,000 deficiency claim, for a net recovery by Smith Motors of $1,350.

TRUSTS AND FUTURE INTERESTS ANALYSIS

(Trusts and Future Interests I.F)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Should Trustee invade trust principal for the purpose of enabling Adam to purchase an automobile?
- (2) Can Trustee refuse to invade trust principal to enable Adam to repay a loan to Husband incurred to permit Adam to continue his education?
- (3) If Trustee invades principal improperly on Adam's behalf, does Trustee or Adam bear personal liability for the improper invasion?

DISCUSSION

Point One (20-30%)

Trustee should not invade trust principal for the purpose of permitting Adam to purchase a $50,000 automobile.

In general, unless the trust instrument authorizes the trustee to invade trust principal, an income beneficiary is entitled only to trust income. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 128 comment i. While in some cases a power of invasion can be implied, here Testator demonstrated that she knew how to create a power of invasion, since she expressly created one to provide for Adam's education. The inference is strong that she did not intend to confer on Trustee any other power of invasion for Adam's benefit. Trustee should refuse to make the distribution from principal without a court order because the trust does not expressly permit the requested $50,000 distribution and, therefore, the distribution without a court order would be a breach of trust.

However, when the income beneficiary will ultimately receive the trust principal, as here, a court may permit the trustee to invade principal to assist the income beneficiary, unless an invasion of trust principal would be inconsistent with the testator's express directions in creating the trust. Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 168. If Adam were the only trust beneficiary, a court might authorize Trustee to invade principal to permit Adam to purchase the automobile. Of course, that is not the case here.

A court might also permit an invasion due to a significant change in circumstances since the execution of Testator's will. Cf. Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 167(1). For example, when Testator executed the will, she undoubtedly believed that the trust income (possibly $48,000 annually assuming a 6% interest rate) would have been adequate to meet Adam's needs until Adam reached the age of 30. Testator's business misfortunes significantly reduced her expectation that Adam would receive such amount.

The problem, however, is that an invasion of principal to pay for the automobile when not specifically authorized would adversely affect the interests of the other beneficiary, Betsy. Accordingly, a court should not authorize invasion absent express language in the trust instrument or Betsy's consent. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 168 comment d, illus. 4.

Although Adam might argue that any depletion in principal could be subtracted from Adam's own share of the remainder, that argument is not plausible in light of Trustee's power to invade principal for Adam's education. That is, since Trustee has the express power to invade principal for Adam's education, Adam's share of the principal when the trust terminates may be too small to cover the cost of the car. As a result, invasion would threaten the interest of Betsy, and hence would be unjustified.

Adam might argue that buying a car helps to further his education, particularly if a car is necessary to permit Adam to go to and from school. While there may be some merit to that argument, it would not warrant a $50,000 invasion.

Point Two (35-45%)

Because Trustee was granted absolute discretion to determine whether to invade trust principal to provide for Adam's education, Trustee need not invade the principal to permit Adam to repay the loan to Husband, and Trustee's failure to do so would not be an abuse of discretion. On the other hand, Trustee would not be violating the terms of the trust should Trustee decide to invade the corpus to permit Adam to repay the education loan to Husband.

When a testator confers discretion (or absolute discretion) on a trustee to make or withhold distributions, courts do not compel trustees to exercise that discretion unless the trustee's failure constitutes an abuse of discretion. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 187; Bogert, Trusts and Trustees § 560; see also Gulf National Bank v. Sturtevant, 511 So. 2d 936 (Miss. 1987); Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 187; Dunkley v. Peoples Bank & Trust Co., 728 F. Supp. 547 (W.D. Ark 1989). Likewise, courts do not enjoin trustees from exercising such power unless an exercise of the power would be an abuse of discretion. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 187; Dunkley, 728 F. Supp. 547. The question here is whether Trustee would be abusing its discretion by paying, or by refusing to pay, for Adam's tuition. The facts do not warrant that conclusion. Therefore, Adam cannot compel Trustee to distribute principal to him.

Because the trust instrument provides a standard by which Trustee's conduct may be judged—are funds necessary for Adam's education—a court “will control the trustee in the exercise of a power where he acts beyond the bounds of a reasonable judgment.” Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 187 comment i. If, contrary to the actual facts, Adam had been without other funds to pursue an education, Trustee would likely have been obligated to invade the trust principal to provide Adam with assistance, absent some strong argument that even then an invasion would be inadvisable. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 187 comment i, illus. 11. Here, however, Adam's father, Husband, had assets and actually advanced Adam a loan to pay for Adam's tuition. These facts should permit Trustee to argue, if it chose not to invade principal, that it was exercising its discretion reasonably because Adam's educational expenses had been met by the loan from his father and thus Adam's need was fulfilled, and the fact that ultimately a beneficiary, in addition to Adam, would be entitled to some share of the trust principal.

Courts generally presume that a testator intended the beneficiary to receive support or education from the trust, regardless of other sources of support, unless the trust instrument otherwise provides. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 128 comment e; Godfrey v. Chandley, 248 Kan. 975, 811 P.2d 1248 (1991). Moreover, since Adam has reached the age of majority, Husband was under no legal obligation to provide for Adam's education. Therefore, Adam could argue that Trustee would be abusing its discretion if it did not invade principal to repay Husband. However, this argument does not seem compelling.

Point Three (30-40%)

If Trustee wrongfully invades the trust principal, without court approval, to pay Adam money to purchase the automobile, Trustee is personally liable to Betsy, but it will be entitled to indemnity from Adam unless Adam has detrimentally relied on the wrongful payment. Trustee might also be removed as trustee for this breach of the trust. Adam, a participant in the breach, would also be liable to Betsy.

When a trustee abuses discretion and makes excessive payments to a beneficiary or distributes the trust property to a beneficiary in breach of the terms of the trust, the trustee is liable for the resulting loss to the trust and other beneficiaries. See Dunkley v. Peoples Bank & Trust Co., 728 F. Supp. 547 (W.D. Ark. 1989); Austin v. U.S. Bank of Washington, 73 Wash. App. 293, 869 P.2d 404 (1994). Here, if Trustee paid Adam money to purchase a car, such payment would be inconsistent with the terms limiting principal invasions only for education, and Trustee would be liable to reimburse the trust for resulting losses.

At the same time, however, when a trustee overpays one of the beneficiaries, the trustee is entitled to recover the overpayment, unless the beneficiary has so changed his position that it would be inequitable to require repayment. Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 254; Dunkley v. Peoples Bank, 728 F. Supp. 547. If Adam had already spent the money advanced, and if it were impractical to recover the money from Adam, Trustee would be entitled to subject Adam's own remainder interest to a charge in the amount of the overpayment, thus effectively reimbursing Betsy for any losses she would otherwise have suffered. Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 254.

If Trustee's unjustified payments to Adam reduced Adam's share of the principal to such a degree that reimbursement from Adam's share would not make Betsy whole, she would be entitled to recover from Trustee personally. Moreover, if a trustee breaches the terms of a trust, another remedy is the trustee's removal from office. That remedy is more likely to occur where the trustee personally benefits from the breach, which did not occur in this case. Thus, it is unlikely that Betsy could successfully seek Trustee's removal.

When a beneficiary is unjustly enriched by a trustee's breach of trust, the beneficiary can be liable to the other beneficiary for any loss he or she sustains. Thus, Adam would also be liable to Betsy if neither Trustee nor the trust assets satisfied her claim for breach of trust. Bogert, Trusts § 167.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP ANALYSIS

(Agency & Partnership VI, VIII.A, IX)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Was either a limited partnership or a general partnership formed by the oral agreement between Benjamin and Susan?
- (2) Does Susan have the legal right to terminate the relationship with Benjamin?
- (3) What elements of the partnership is Benjamin entitled to a share in if Susan terminates the relationship?

DISCUSSION

Point One (40-50%)

A general partnership was created by Benjamin and Susan's oral agreement.

In order to form a limited partnership, a written certificate of limited partnership must be executed and filed with the Secretary of State. Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act (RULPA) § 201. Since the relationship between Benjamin and Susan was not memorialized in writing, no limited partnership was formed. The subjective belief of the parties that they had formed a limited partnership is not relevant.

The relationship that Benjamin and Susan formed was a general partnership. Unlike a limited partnership, there is no requirement that a general partnership agreement be in writing. Rather, the creation of a partnership de jure is a function of the intent of the putative partners to establish "an association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit. . . ." Uniform Partnership Act (UPA) § 6. See Meyer v. Lofgren, 949 S.W.2d 80 (Mo. Ct. App. 1997). Benjamin and Susan intended to operate their furniture restoration business as co-owners for profit, even though they were legally mistaken in calling the venture a limited partnership. See also Revised Uniform Partnership Act (1994) (RUPA) § 202(a). Moreover, under UPA § 7(4) "[t]he receipt by a person of a share of the profits of a business is prima facie evidence that he is a partner in the business...." Benjamin and Susan divided the profits 70% to Benjamin - 30% to Susan until Benjamin received his capital contribution plus interest and then 50%-50% thereafter. See also RUPA § 202(c)(3).

Point Two (5-10%)

Susan has the legal right to cause the dissolution of the partnership.

Susan has the right to dissolve the partnership because a partner always has such a right. UPA § 31; RUPA § 602(a). However, a partner's act of dissolution may be either a wrongful dissolution or a permitted action. UPA § 31(1), 31(2); RUPA § 602. Where the partnership agreement does not specify a definite term or a specified objective for the partnership to achieve during its operations, then dissolution does not contravene the partnership agreement. A partnership has been established for a particular undertaking if it has a stated purpose that can be achieved at a recognizable time, even if that time could not have been predicted when the partnership was established. Girard Bank v. Haley, 332 A.2d 443,447 (Pa. 1975).

The agreement between Benjamin and Susan does not specify any term. Although the purpose of the partnership was to restore and sell furniture, this is a continuous activity that does not constitute a particular undertaking. As a result, the partnership was a partnership at will. A partner is not required to have a reason to dissolve a partnership at will. Id. at 446. Therefore, Susan has not only the power but also the legal right to dissolve the partnership.

Point Three (40-50%)

After dissolution, Benjamin is entitled to a distribution of partnership assets, which do not include Susan's tools but probably do include his share of the goodwill.

When dissolution of a partnership is not wrongful or in contravention of the partnership agreement, the partnership property is applied to discharge the partnership's liabilities, and the surplus is paid to the partners. UPA § 38(1); RUPA § 807(a). Here there are no partnership liabilities, so the issue is post-dissolution distributions under UPA § 40 or RUPA § 807(b). There being no contrary agreement of the parties, the partnership assets are to be distributed under UPA § 40(b). See RUPA § 807(b). There are no outside or inside creditors, and Benjamin has already been reimbursed for his $50,000 capital contribution plus interest, so the partnership assets should be distributed as profits 50% to Benjamin and 50% to Susan.

The issue is what assets of the business constitute partnership assets available for distribution to the partners. Under the UPA "[a]ll property originally brought into the partnership stock or subsequently acquired... on account of the partnership, is partnership property." UPA § 8(1). See also RUPA § 204. The cash on hand, earned by the partnership from its operations, is clearly a partnership asset.

The facts state that Susan would use her own well-equipped workshop and custom tools for the partnership's operations. This indicates that Susan did not contribute ownership of Susan's tools to the partnership, but instead only made them available for use by the partnership. An argument that the tools were a contribution analogous to Benjamin's $50,000 capital contribution finds some support in the equivalent amounts involved. However, Benjamin's capital contribution was repaid with interest, and there was no similar provision with respect to the tools. Nor is there any evidence that the parties themselves treated the tools as partnership property. On balance, the tools are not partnership property.

Even if the tools are considered to be partnership property, their contribution to the partnership was a "capital contribution" by Susan. Under UPA § 40(b) (III), Susan is entitled to a return of Susan's "capital contribution" before either partner is entitled to a distribution of profits under UPA § 40(b) IV. See also RUPA § 807.

Benjamin has argued that, in addition to the tangible assets of the partnership, he is entitled also to an accounting for the intangible goodwill value of the business. "Goodwill" is the value of the business as a going concern over and above the aggregate value of its tangible property. Benjamin will argue that a business that generates such substantial profits on relatively small tangible assets has developed substantial “goodwill” or “going concern” value. Susan apparently intends to continue the business without Benjamin, thereby appropriating the value of the goodwill for herself, without compensation to Benjamin.

When a partnership is wrongfully terminated, the partner who has caused the wrongful dissolution is not entitled to an accounting for the value of the goodwill of the business if the business is continued. UPA § 38(2) (c) (II). By implication, where the partner seeking such an accounting has done nothing wrong, he is entitled to compensation for the value of the goodwill of the business where it is to be continued by the other partner. See Meyer v. Lofgren, 949 S.W.2d 80 (Mo. Ct. App. 1997). The RUPA does not address accounting for goodwill of the business and there have been no reported cases interpreting the RUPA’s approach to allocating the issue of goodwill among partners.

Susan will argue, on the other hand, that because she is a professional, there is no goodwill attributable to the business itself, but rather any “going concern” value is attributable to her own reputation and individual skill. The reputation of a professional partnership, such as partnerships of attorneys, physicians, or dentists, depends upon the individual skills of the members, and thus, it could be argued that there is no goodwill to be distributed as an asset upon the dissolution of such a partnership. See, e.g., Gaydos v. Gaydos, 693 A.2d 1368 (Pa. 1997) (where goodwill is “intrinsically tied to the attributes and/or skills of certain individuals” it “does not survive the disassociation of those individuals from the business”); see also Salinas v. Rafati, 948 S.W.2d 286 (Tex. 1997); Welder v. Green, 985 S.W.2d 170 (Tex. Ct. App. 1998). Susan will also argue that in continuing the business she is simply exercising her right to pursue the same business after dissolution; partnership law does not imply any covenant to compete or to engage in the same business after dissolution of the partnership, and here there is no explicit agreement to the contrary. Had Benjamin desired to protect himself from the possibility that Susan would terminate the partnership once the business became profitable, insufficiently recognizing the value of Benjamin’s start-up capital, Benjamin should have insisted that the partnership agreement be in writing and for a specific term of years.

Further, Susan will argue that under the terms of the oral partnership agreement, which Susan complied with, Benjamin’s capital investment has been repaid in full, with interest, and Benjamin has no further legitimate claims upon the future earnings of Susan’s personal efforts.

The likely outcome is that Benjamin is entitled to receive one-half of the $8,500 in the partnership bank account, and depending on the conclusion reached from the foregoing discussion, one-half of any goodwill of the partnership.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE/CONFLICT OF LAWS ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure II.A, IV.C / Conflict of Laws III.F)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) In ruling on Defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law, should the federal district court adopt the interpretation it prefers of the State A sidewalk-repair statute or apply what it believes is the likely interpretation by the State A Supreme Court?
- (2) If the trial court concludes that the defendant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law, should the trial court defer its decision until after the jury renders a verdict?

DISCUSSION

Point One (50-60%)

The federal district court should adopt the interpretation of the statute that it believes would be adopted by the State A Supreme Court. On that interpretation, Defendant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.

Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, judgment as a matter of law (JMOL) is appropriate when a "party has been fully heard" and "there is no legally sufficient evidentiary basis for a reasonable jury to find for that party" F.R.C.P. 50 (a) (1). Thus, the question is whether, under the applicable law, the jury could find any facts that would entitle plaintiff to recover from defendant. If not, then defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law may be granted.

This case is a diversity case. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332. When a federal court is hearing a case under its diversity jurisdiction, it must apply the same substantive law that would have been applied if the suit had been filed in a court of the state where the federal court is located. Erie Railroad v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938). The federal court is not free to make its own independent judgment, from a policy standpoint, of the better construction of a statute worded like State A's sidewalk-repair law. Id. Instead, the federal court must try to predict from available State A case law how the State A Supreme Court would be likely to interpret the statute. "The federal court must keep in mind ... that its function is not to choose the rule that it would adopt for itself, if free to do so, but to choose the rule that it believes the state court, from all that is known about its methods of reaching decisions, is likely in the future to adopt." Wright, Federal Courts 397 (5th ed. 1994). Once the federal court makes this prediction, it must apply that construction of the statute, whether it agrees with it or not. See Adams v. Madison Realty & Dev., Inc., 853 F.2d 163 (3rd Cir. 1988).

In this case, the federal district court has concluded, albeit reluctantly, that the State A Supreme Court probably would rule that its sidewalk-repair statute was not intended to impose tort liability on abutting landowners. Therefore, even if the hole was in fact located in an area of the parking strip that abutted Defendant's property, he is not liable for Plaintiff's injury and is entitled to prevail in this case as a matter of law.

Point Two (40-50%)

Having concluded that Defendant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law, the court should nevertheless defer ruling on the motion until after the jury has rendered a verdict in order to avoid the necessity for a retrial in the event the judge's legal ruling is overturned on appeal.

In view of the answer to the first question, it may seem that the answer to the second one is a foregone conclusion: the trial court should now grant Defendant's motion for a directed verdict. In fact, however, the much preferred course is for the trial court to reserve its ruling on this motion and submit the case to the jury to resolve the disputed factual question concerning the location of the hole. Wright & Miller, Federal Practice & Procedure § 2533 at 319. Rule 50 permits, but does not require, a trial judge to grant judgment as a matter of law during the trial. Sometimes there are sound reasons for the judge to reserve decision on such a motion until after a jury verdict. See Advisory Committee Notes to 1991 Amendment to Fed. R. Civ. P. 50.

If the jury concludes that the hole was actually located in front of the adjoining Todd house, the legal issue raised by Defendant's motion becomes moot. Without deciding the meaning of the State A statute one way or the other, the court could then simply enter judgment for Defendant on the basis of the jury's verdict in his favor. See Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Co. v. Breckenridge, 333 F.2d 990, 991 (8th Cir. 1964). This result would be preferable to a ruling based on a guess about the statute's meaning. On the other hand, if the jury resolves the factual issue concerning the hole's location in favor of Plaintiff, the defense simply renews post-trial its motion for judgment as a matter of law. The judge can then grant the motion. The advantage of this "reserved decision" procedure comes into play if Plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered for Defendant. If the trial judge's decision as to the meaning of the State A statute is overturned, the appellate court can reverse the judgment entered for Defendant and direct the trial court to enter judgment for Plaintiff on the basis of the jury verdict in her favor. See Shewmaker v. Capital Transit Co., 143 F.2d 142, 143 (D.C. Cir. 1944); see also Advisory Committee's Note to Subdivision (b) of Rule 50, 1991 Amendments to Fed. R. Civ. P.

If the court were to grant the defense motion for judgment made at the conclusion of the evidence and the plaintiff then succeeded in reversing the trial court, the appellate court would have to remand the case for a new trial. The time and effort of the trial court, the parties, and the jury at the first trial would have been unnecessarily wasted. See, e.g., Seganish v. District of Columbia Safeway Stores, Inc., 406 F.2d 653 (D.C. Cir. 1968); see also Shaw v. Hines Lumber Co., 249 F.2d 434 (7th Cir. 1957).

FAMILY LAW ANALYSIS

(Family Law I.E, V.A, VI.B)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is Ben released from his obligation to support Carol where Alice conceived Carol after she stopped using birth control without Ben's agreement?
- (2) In the absence of an explicit agreement to share their assets, under what circumstances is a cohabitant entitled to a share of assets titled in the other cohabitant's name?
 - (a) Have Alice and Ben entered into a common-law marriage such that marital property laws apply to them in light of the facts that they have cohabited and share a common surname but do not subjectively intend to be married?
 - (b) In the absence of a common-law marriage, are Alice and Ben entitled to share in each other's assets accumulated during the cohabitation?

DISCUSSION

Point One (15-20%)

A biological father, whether married or not, is obligated to support his child, regardless of whether he intended or wanted to father a child.

Parents are legally obligated to support their children, regardless of whether they are marital or nonmarital children. The facts state that Ben does not deny paternity.

Ben will argue that he cannot be held responsible for child support because he did not agree to Alice's becoming pregnant and expressly said that he did not want to have children. Courts have, however, uniformly rejected this argument. The reason is the overriding public policy in favor of children being supported, combined with the implicit or explicit conclusion that a man who has sexual relations with a woman necessarily takes the risk that she may become pregnant. See, e.g., Matter of L. Pamela P. v. Frank S., 449 N.E.2d 713 (N.Y. 1983) (rejecting argument that mother had deprived father of his constitutional right to decide whether to be a parent); Stephen K. v. Roni L., 164 Cal. Rptr. 618(1980) (rejecting breach of contract, fraud and misrepresentation arguments); Douglas R. v. Suzanne M., 487 N.Y.S.2d 244 (1985) (same); Linda D. v. Fritz C., 687 P.2d 223 (Wash. 1984) (same). See generally Pinhas Shiftan, Involuntary Parenthood: Misrepresentation as to the Use of Contraceptives, 4 Intl L.J. Law & Fam. (1990); Note, Misrepresentation of Sterility or of Use of Birth Control, 26 J. Fam. L. 623 (1987-88).

Point Two

Alice and Ben do not have a common-law marriage and their property rights depend on legal theories applicable to unmarried cohabitants. Ben is probably entitled to a share of the securities, but Alice is probably not entitled to share in Ben's invention.

The economic rights of Alice and Ben depend in the first instance on whether they are married. If so, the securities and at least some of the earnings from Ben's patent would be marital assets subject to equitable distribution if they divorced. As indicated below, however, Alice and Ben do not have a common-law marriage, and their rights in the assets are, therefore, determined by other legal principles.

Point Two (a) (25-35%)

If cohabitants do not subjectively intend to be married, they have not entered into common-law marriage, even though they share a common name and are otherwise known as a couple.

In most states that allow people to enter into common-law marriage, the party claiming that such a marriage exists must prove at a minimum (1) that the parties cohabited, (2) that they held themselves out as married, and (3) that they intend to be married. Homer H. Clark, Jr., Domestic Relations § 2.4 (student ed. 1988). Alice and Ben did cohabit, and it could be argued that they have represented themselves as married, or at least as a couple, by their use of a common surname and their having commingled their finances. However, because they expressly do not intend to be married, they have not entered into a common-law marriage. Often, the emphasis in common-law marriage cases is placed on the couple's "holding themselves out" as married, and intent to be married is inferred from that fact. However, in this case, we are told that the parties did not believe in marriage and that fact was generally known. Under these circumstances, an inference of intent from "holding out" would be inappropriate. Thus, principles of divorce property distribution do not apply, and any property rights of Alice and Ben arise outside of marriage.

Point Two (b) (45-55%)

In some states, a cohabitant has no right to assets titled in the other's name absent an express agreement to share assets. In other states, a cohabitant may have a claim based on implied contract, resulting trust, constructive trust, or quantum meruit. Ben is probably entitled to a share of the securities, but Alice is probably not entitled to share in Ben's invention.

In the majority of jurisdictions, if unmarried cohabitants agree to share property or otherwise to engage in forms of economic sharing, their agreement is enforceable, so long as the economic sharing is not intended as payment for sexual services. See Carol Bruch, Cohabitation in the Common Law Countries a Decade After Marvin: Settled In or Moving Ahead? 22 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 717 (1989); see also Clark, supra, § 1.2. Some jurisdictions continue to refuse to recognize such claims. See Hewitt v. Hewitt, 394 N.E.2d 1204 (111. 1979) (rejecting claim by unmarried cohabitant to property because relationship contrary to state public policy in support of marriage).

Assuming that this jurisdiction recognizes such claims, it appears that Ben has a claim to the securities, although Alice may not have a claim for a share of Ben's invention. The facts do not indicate that the parties had an express agreement to share the benefits of any of Ben's inventions. Although Ben might argue that Alice's statement that she would invest their savings "for retirement" constituted an express contract to share the securities purchased with those savings, this argument seems thin. However, in divorce cases from the era before equitable distribution law, on similar facts courts typically found that such words were not definite enough to create an explicit contract. See, e.g., Wirth v. Wirth, 326 N.Y.S.2d 308 (1971); Saff v. Saff, 402 N.Y.S.2d 690 (1978), appeal dismissed, 389 N.E.2d 142 (N.Y. 1979).

Even without an express contract, however, a court might still consider dividing the property. Some courts, following the lead of the California Supreme Court in Marvin v. Marvin, 55 P.2d 106 (Cal. 1976), also allow unmarried cohabitants to seek remedies based on implied-in-fact contract, resulting trust, constructive trust, or quantum meruit theories. Courts' application of these theories varies substantially. Unless a court applied these remedial theories very narrowly, Ben could probably make a successful claim to a share of the securities titled in Alice's name because they are traceable to his earnings, but Alice is less likely to prevail in her claim for a share of the profits from Ben's invention.

First, on these facts, some courts would say that Ben and Alice's having commingled their finances was sufficient to show an implied-in-fact contract to share all of the economic fruits of the relationship, while others would not. Compare Shuraleff v. Donnelly, 817 P.2d 764 (Or. App. 1991) with Friedman v. Friedman, 24 Cal. Rptr. 892 (Cal. App. 1993).

Second, Ben might claim a resulting trust. To make a claim to property titled in the name of another on a theory of resulting trust, traditionally a person must have contributed money to the purchase of the asset under circumstances indicating that the contributor intended to retain equitable ownership of an interest in the asset, rather than making a gift. Under this theory, Ben might successfully claim that he intended to retain a beneficial ownership in the securities purchased with his savings. Alice, however, did not contribute money to the development of Ben's invention, and so would not have a claim based on this theory.

Third, Ben might argue constructive trust. A constructive trust is imposed to prevent a party from being unjustly enriched by profiting from wrongful conduct. On this theory Ben might have a claim for a share of the securities on the theory that Alice had defrauded him into allowing her to take title to his money. However, some of the divorce cases cited above rejected such arguments on the basis that the party in whose name the property was titled never misrepresented what he or she was doing, thus taking a very narrow view of fraud. Alice, however, would have a difficult time making a claim to the invention under this theory because the facts do not indicate that Ben made any representations to Alice about the invention upon which she could rely.

Fourth, there is the possibility that either party might claim recovery based on a quantum meruit claim, which requires that a person pay the fair market value of services rendered to avoid unjust enrichment. While the facts are not clear as to whether either performed services for the other that resulted in unjust enrichment, Alice did take care of the investing, while Ben was able to tinker in his workshop. Alice, then, performed financial services that gave Ben the leisure time to work on his invention. The claim is, however, unlikely to succeed.

Finally, if either the investment or invention activities could be proved to be joint economic ventures, then Alice or Ben might have a claim based on a partnership theory. See Leslie Harris,

Lee Teitelbaum, & Carol Weisbrod, Family Law 170 (1996). The facts do not, however, support a partnership claim.

COMMERCIAL PAPER ANALYSIS

(Commercial Paper II.F, II.H, III.A)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does the unauthorized addition of an amount by the payee of an incomplete instrument bind the obligor when a subsequent good-faith purchaser for value attempts to enforce the note as completed?
- (2) Does an oral agreement between the obligor and the payee concerning the note's due date bind a subsequent good-faith purchaser of the note?

DISCUSSION

Point One (55-65%)

Because Carl took the note for value and in good faith without notice of the alteration, Carl may enforce the note according to its terms as completed.

One of the requirements of negotiability under Article 3 of the Uniform Commercial Code is that there be an unconditional promise to pay a fixed amount of money. UCC §3-104(a). In this case, when Andy issued the note to Barbara, the space for showing the amount due was left blank. If the amount space had remained blank, the note would not have been negotiable to Carl. But, when Barbara filled in this amount, albeit fraudulently, the note became negotiable to a holder in due course, UCC § 3-115 covers incomplete instruments, which include signed writings, "the contents of which show at the time of signing that it is incomplete but that the signer intended it to be completed by the addition of words or numbers." The note that Andy issued to Barbara therefore qualifies as an incomplete instrument. Once completed, a previously incomplete instrument may ordinarily be enforced "according to its terms as augmented by completion." See also UCC § 3-412. However, UCC § 3-115(c) says that if "words or numbers are added to an incomplete instrument without authority of the signer, there is an alteration of the incomplete instrument under Section 3-407." Because Barbara clearly had no authority to type in $20,000 as the amount payable on the note, her doing so constituted an alteration of the incomplete instrument, and the rules of § 3-407 will determine its effect.

UCC § 3-407(b) sets out a general rule that fraudulent alterations such as the one made by Barbara serve to discharge the party whose obligation is affected by the alteration, here Andy. That rule, however, is specifically made subject to UCC § 3-407(c), which provides that a person such as Carl, who takes the note for value, in good faith, and without notice of the alteration, is allowed to enforce the note against the original obligor according to its terms as completed. See also UCC § 3-412. Thus, Carl may insist that Andy pay him $20,000 rather than just the $10,000 that Andy had agreed to pay to Barbara. Official Comment 2 to UCC § 3-407 justifies this result: "If blanks are filled or an incomplete instrument is otherwise completed, subsection (c) places the loss upon the party who left the instrument incomplete by permitting enforcement in its completed form.”

Another way to explain this result is to say that Carl is probably a holder in due course, UCC § 3-302(a), and therefore he takes free of the defense that Andy is trying to assert against him as a way to avoid payment. UCC § 3-305(b).

Point Two (35-45%)

Because the note did not indicate a particular due date. Carl may enforce the note immediately as a demand note.

The fact that the due date was left blank did not affect negotiability. There is a requirement in § 3-104(a) (2) that a negotiable instrument be payable “on demand or at a definite time.”

UCC § 3-108(a) (2) tells us that a promise or order is payable on demand if it does not state any time of payment. In this case, since the due date was never filled in, Carl could treat the note as a demand note and insist that Andy pay him immediately. Although Andy had an agreement with Barbara that the note would not be due until October 1, that agreement will not bind Carl, who is a good-faith purchaser for value without notice of Barbara’s alteration. This is consistent with the idea expressed in Official Comment 2 to UCC § 3-407 that good-faith purchasers for value should not be adversely affected by the original obligor’s omissions, and that the loss in cases like this should be placed on the party who left the instrument incomplete, in this case, Andy..

DECEDENTS' ESTATES ANALYSIS

(Decedents' Estates, Wills)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is Bill, who was never adopted by Tom but who was raised by Tom, entitled to a share of Tom's estate?
- (2) Is Chris, born to Tom out of wedlock, entitled to a share of Tom's estate?
- (3) Is the lifetime gift to Anna an advancement, and, if so, is it taken into account in computing Danny's share of Tom's estate?
- (4) Would any of the lifetime gifts to Bill or Chris be taken into account in computing any share of Tom's estate to which they might be entitled?

DISCUSSION

Summary

In all states, an intestate's estate is distributable solely to the intestate's surviving issue when the intestate dies without a spouse, as Tom did. In this problem, the question arises who among Anna, Bill, Chris, and Danny are issue of the intestate and whether any of the lifetime transfers to them are advancements for purposes of computing their shares in Tom's estate. Under the laws of all states and here, there is no doubt that issue born-in-wedlock are an intestate's heir. Thus Danny's rights as an heir are unquestioned. However the amount of his share could be affected by the doctrine of advancements. See Point Three.

Point One (30-35%)

Bill would not be entitled to any share of Tom's estate unless Bill could establish that he was entitled to a share of the estate under the doctrine of "equitable adoption" or "adoption by estoppel." However, it is unlikely Bill could successfully claim to have been equitably adopted.

Bill was never legally adopted by Tom and, in fact, has no biological or legally created relationship to Tom. Thus, without more, Bill is entitled to no share of Tom's estate. However, if Bill could establish an adoption by estoppel, Bill could inherit from Tom as if Bill were Tom's legally adopted child.

Courts apply the doctrine of adoption by estoppel or equitable adoption where there is a finding of either an express or implied promise to adopt and the child "stood from an age of tender years in a position exactly equivalent to a formally adopted child." Wheeling Dollar Saving & Trust Co v. Singer, 162 W. Va. 502, 250 S.E.2d 369 (1978). The facts in this case do not appear to support Bill's claim to an equitable adoption because, among other things, there is no express promise to adopt and Bill was well beyond "tender years" before he even came into Tom's home. Further, a promise to adopt is not likely to be implied. Courts have rarely implied a contract to adopt even when a stepparent raises a stepchild, which is not even the fact in this case. See Matter of Van Cleave's Estate, 610 S.W.2d 620 (Mo. 1980).

Even if Tom had married Nancy, Bill, as a stepchild, would not have been entitled to any share of Tom's estate since stepchildren are not "children" for purposes of inheritance under the state law.

Point Two (25-30%)

Chris, born to Tom out of wedlock, is entitled to a share of Tom's estate because Tom recognized his paternity of Chris.

Chris is a biological child of Tom. However, Chris was born out of wedlock. While the common law prohibited a child born out of wedlock from inheriting, most states have enacted statutes allowing children born out of wedlock to inherit under certain circumstances. Typically, an illegitimate child can inherit from a deceased father provided paternity is proved. Laws that preclude an illegitimate child from inheriting from the father are unconstitutional. Trimble v. Gordon, 430 U.S. 762 (1977). States differ, however, regarding the burden of proof that a child born out of wedlock must meet to establish paternity, ranging from "preponderance of evidence" in some states to evidence that is "clear and convincing" in other states. Some states may also impose additional requirements such as recognition of paternity in writing or by some other act; some may require a judicial order of paternity. Under the Uniform Probate Code, a person is a child of his or her biological parents without regard to the parents' marital status. UPC §2-114(a).

In this problem, a specific statute deals with the right of a child born out of wedlock to inherit from the father. Although Tom's paternity was never judicially established, Chris can prevail if paternity was otherwise recognized by Tom. This should be easy for Chris to prove or demonstrate. First, the facts state that Tom had acknowledged that he was Chris' father. Second, Tom's letter to Chris at the time he gave Chris the $50,000 referred to Chris as his child.

The lifetime gift to Anna was probably intended minimally as an advancement and, if so intended, reduces the share of Tom's estate passing by intestacy to Anna's child, if the governing statute were to so provide.

Historically, a lifetime transfer to a person who was the transferor's heir was treated as a down payment (also known as an advancement) of the transferee's share of the transferor's estate. Most states now treat such transfers as gifts, rather than advancements, but preserve the concept of advancements under certain circumstances. State laws vary greatly on their laws of advancement and particularly on what acts are sufficient to rebut the presumption that a lifetime transfer is a gift and not an advancement. For example, under the Uniform Probate Code a transfer can be an advancement "only if (i) the decedent declared [his or her intent to that effect] in a contemporaneous writing," or the heir acknowledged the transfer to be an advancement, or "the decedent's contemporaneous writing . . . otherwise indicates that the gift is to be taken into account in computing the division and distribution of the decedent's intestate estate." UPC § 2-

109(a). On the other hand, in many states no writing is required and any competent proof is admissible to establish the transferor's intent that the transfer was an advancement. See W. McGovern, S. Kurtz & J. Rein, Wills, Trusts and Estates § 1.5 at 26-27 (1988).

In this problem, it could be argued that Tom would have intended any share Anna could claim in Tom's estate to be reduced by $50,000. This is evidenced by the contemporaneously written note Tom gave Anna stating: "You have been a constant disappointment to me over these years. Take this but expect no more from me." While Tom did not expressly state that the $50,000 was an advancement, it can be argued that this note evidences an intent to limit the amount Anna would receive from Tom in the future. Furthermore, when this note is read alongside the other notes, it seems clear Tom did not intend Anna to receive any more from his estate.

It could also be argued that the note expresses nothing more than Tom's statement that Anna would be receiving no more gifts from Tom, and that Tom did not intend the note to evidence any intent that Anna not take an intestate share. This argument seems less plausible in light of all the facts.

If the transfer to Anna is an advancement, since Anna predeceased Tom, it remains to be determined what effect the transfer to Anna has on the share of Anna's son Danny (Tom's grandchild) who takes whatever share of Tom's estate Anna would have been entitled to take. State laws differ on the question of whether the share of an heir of an advancee is diminished by advancements to his or her ancestors. Compare N.Y. EPTL § 2-1.5 and 111. Rev. Stat. ch. 755 § 5/2-5 (share of successor to advancee affected) with Tex. Prob. Code Ann. § 44 (share of successor of advancee unaffected unless transferor by contemporaneous writing indicates it should be). Thus, whether the grandchild's share is affected depends on underlying state law, which the facts do not specify.

Point Four (5-10%)

The lifetime gifts to Bill or Chris were not intended as advancements and, therefore, to the extent either of them is entitled to a share of Tom's estate, they would not reduce the size of the share either of them would otherwise be entitled to receive.

In his notes to Bill and Chris, Tom referred to the $50,000 as gifts. Further, no language in the note suggests that Tom intended the gift to reduce the size of the share either Bill or Chris would receive in Tom's estate. Of course, Bill may not be entitled to any share of Tom's estate, in which case the question of whether the $50,000 transferred to Bill is an advancement is moot.

In summary, Chris is treated as an heir, the gift to him is not an advancement, Bill is probably not an heir, and whether Danny's share is reduced by the advancement to his mother is unclear.

CORPORATIONS ANALYSIS

(Corporations I.A, II.A, II.B)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is a promoter personally liable on a preincorporation contract with a third party?
- (2) Is a corporation, once incorporated, liable on a preincorporation contract with a third party?
- (3) Does a corporation have the corporate power to use a portion of its profits to make a charitable contribution?

DISCUSSION

Point One (30-40%)

As a promoter, Carl is probably personally liable on the contract with Leaseco since the facts do not show that Leaseco agreed to look solely to SSC once formed for performance.

Carl was acting as a promoter when he entered into the lease with Leaseco for the office space. A promoter is the party who assists in the planning and formation of a new business. Hamilton, Corporations § III. A (3d ed. 1992). A promoter who enters into a contract with a third party on behalf of a corporation that both parties to the transaction know is not yet formed is personally liable on the contract unless the other party to the transaction agrees to look solely to the corporation for performance. Stanley J. How & Assoc., Inc. v. Boss, 222 F. Supp. 936,939 (S.D. Iowa 1963); Quaker Hill, Inc. v. Parr, 148 Colo. 45,364 P.2d 1056,1058 (1961). Where a person knowingly enters into an agreement with a promoter on behalf of a nonexistent corporation, there is an inference that the person intends to make a present contract with an existing person. See White & Bollard, Inc. v. Goodenow, 58 Wash. 2d 180, 184, 361 P.2d 571 (1961). As a result, there is a rebuttable inference that the parties intend the promoter to be a party to the contract. See Restatement (Second) of Agency § 326 comment b (1958).

The form of the contract entered into is an important factor in determining how preincorporation contracts are treated. The type of preincorporation contract at issue in this question is a contract by a promoter with a third party in the name of a corporation to be formed. In this circumstance, it is clear that both parties were aware at the time the contract was entered into that a corporation had not yet come into existence. Under such circumstances, the promoter is nearly always liable for the contract until the corporation is formed. See Southern-Gulf Marine v. Camcraft, Inc., 410 So. 2d 1181 (La. Ct. App. 1982); McDaniel v. Service Food & Supply, Inc., 271 Md. 371 (1974); Clinton Investors Company, II v. Berne Watkins, 536 N.Y.S.2d 270 (1989). The only exception is where it is clear that the third party agreed to look solely to the to-be-formed corporation for payment. Sherwood & Roberts-Oregon, Inc. v. Alexander, 269 Ore. 389 (1974).

The facts do not rebut the inference that the parties intended Carl, the promoter, to be liable on the lease. Carl moved his operations into the office space and began business immediately after execution of the contract and prior to incorporation of SSC. This suggests that the parties intended someone to be immediately bound. Since the corporation was not yet in existence, the only person that the parties could have intended to be bound was Carl. The facts do not indicate that Leaseco looked solely to the corporation to be formed for performance under the lease.

Sometimes a transaction between a promoter and a third person is interpreted as an offer by the third person to be conveyed to the corporation by the promoter when the corporation is formed. See Restatement (Second) of Agency § 326 comment b (1958). However, in this situation, where the parties desired to sign the lease immediately and where Carl immediately moved into the leased space and began business operations, it appears that the parties did not intend only an offer to the future corporation, but instead a present contract between Carl and Leaseco.

Subsequent adoption of a preincorporation contract by the corporation after it is formed generally would not release the promoter from liability unless there is a novation by which Leaseco agrees to release Carl from liability and look solely to SSC. See, e.g., Decker v. Juzwik, 255 Iowa 358, 121 N.W.2d 652, 659 (1953) (finding a novation). Whether or not SSC adopted the lease (see discussion in Point Two below), the facts presented here do not suggest that a novation with Leaseco occurred. Therefore, Carl's liability on the lease would continue even if SSC was deemed to have adopted the contract.

A promoter who has not violated any fiduciary duties to the corporation but is held liable on a preincorporation contract will often be able to obtain indemnity from the corporation. Hamilton, Corporations 176 (3rd ed. 1992). In addition, indemnification of the promoter may be provided for in the organizational documents signed by the initial board of directors in connection with incorporation of the corporation.

Point Two (30-40%)

Although not originally a party to the lease. SSC is probably liable on the lease with Leaseco since it appears that SSC adopted the lease as its own by accenting the benefits of the lease with full knowledge of the contract.

SSC was not originally a party to the lease. Because SSC did not exist when the lease was entered into, Carl could not have been acting as the agent of SSC in entering into the lease. Upon incorporation, a corporation is not automatically bound by the contracts previously entered into by its promoters. Henn & Alexander, Laws of Corporations §107 (3d ed. 1983). However, after the corporation is formed, a corporation may adopt a preincorporation contract and become liable under that contract. A corporation may adopt a contract in the same manner as it may make an original contract. Thus, in an appropriate case the adoption need not be express, but rather may be inferred from the actions of the corporation or its agents. See McArthur v. Times Printing Co., 48 Minn. 319, 51 N.W. 216, 216-17 (1892); Stolmeierv. Beck, 232 Neb. 715, 441 N.W.2d 888 891 (1989).

On the current facts, the SSC board was given a copy of the Leaseco lease and was aware of its terms, SSC occupied the leased office space, SSC paid the favorable rent for many months, and SSC generally accepted the benefits of the lease. A court would likely conclude that SSC had adopted the lease made on its behalf prior to incorporation.

Point Three (10-20%)

SSC has statutory power to make the charitable contribution because it is reasonable in amount and purpose.

Modern corporation statutes provide a corporation with statutory powers that need not be stated in the articles of incorporation. See Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA) § 3.02; Del. Gen. Corp. Law § 122. One of these powers is the power to make donations for charitable, scientific, or educational purposes. RMBCA § 3.02 (13); Del. Gen. Corp. Law § 122 (9).

Courts have found that a reasonable charitable contribution is within the statutory power of the corporation. See Kahn v. Sullivan, 594 A.2d 48 (Del. 1990); Theodora Holding Corporation v. Henderson, 257 A.2d 398,404-05 (Del. Ch. 1969); A. P. Smith Manufacturing Co. v. Barlow, 13 N.J. 145,98 A.2d 581, appeal dismissed 346 U.S. 861 (1953).

In determining whether a contribution is reasonable, a court will focus heavily on the amount of the contribution. Cf. Theodora Holding Corp., supra, at 405 (concluding that the Internal Revenue Code provisions pertaining to corporate charitable contributions provide a “helpful guide” on the issue of reasonableness). In this case a court is likely to find that the amount of the charitable donation authorized by the resolution of the board of directors (i.e., 4% of profits) is reasonable in amount.

A court may also look at the purpose of a charitable contribution to determine whether it is reasonable. However, as long as the donation is not made indiscriminately, the judgment of the corporate officials that the contribution furthers corporate interests is likely to be accepted. Cf. A.P. Smith Manufacturing Co. v. Barlow, supra, at 590 (no showing that donation to Princeton University was indiscriminate). A court is likely to determine that the donation by SSC is a reasonable means of “increasing good will and promoting patronage.” Memorial Hospital Association v. Pacific Grape Products Co., 45 Cal. 2d 634,290 P.2d 481 (1955). Since SSC is in the business of providing support services to small businesses, a contribution to a job training program has a reasonable relation to its business.

Absent statutory authority to make reasonable charitable contributions or specific authority to do so in the articles of incorporation, a corporation’s charitable contributions might be void under the ultra vires doctrine. This doctrine invalidates corporate acts inconsistent with the corporation’s purposes as stated in its articles. Today, most courts would not find the making of charitable contributions ultra vires and even in the absence of express statutory authority, find corporate contribution by board action consistent with the board’s authority to conduct corporate affairs.

Preface

This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2000 and July 2000 Multistate Essay Examinations. Each test includes seven questions; most jurisdictions that use the MEE select the six questions their applicants will answer.

These model analyses to the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. These models are not an official grading guide. Some jurisdictions grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses as they wish, including the suggested weights given to particular points. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topic or topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by Roman numerals which refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that topic. For example, Question 1 on the February 2000 MEE tested Secured Transactions 11.D, Definitions; “account”; “purchase money security interest” (§§ 9-105, 9-106, 9-107); II. E, Classification of goods (§ 9-109); II.I.D, Use or disposition of collateral by debtor (§ 9-205); and IV.F, Priority among conflicting security interests (§ 9-312). Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet and can also be found at www.ncbex.org.

The MEE is a three-hour examination consisting of six questions. The examination is administered in one continuous three-hour time period. Applicants are expected to spend approximately thirty minutes answering each of the questions. The areas of law covered by the questions in the examination are: Agency and Partnership, Commercial Paper, Conflict of Laws, Corporations and Limited Liability Companies, Decedents’ Estates, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Sales, Secured Transactions, and Trusts and Future Interests. Some questions include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant’s ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You will have three hours in which to write your answers to six of the seven questions contained in this booklet; you will be told which of the questions you are to answer. Each question is designed to be answered in thirty minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts which are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show: an understanding of the facts; a recognition of the issues included; the applicable principles of law; and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Some jurisdictions instruct applicants to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

Jane wanted to purchase a computer for home use and for her young children to use for school work and entertainment. On January 15, Jane went to Dealer, a retail store specializing in computers, and told a salesperson of her family's needs. She was shown a computer that she was told would suffice. She agreed to buy the computer and told Dealer that she would have to borrow the money to pay for it. Dealer agreed to finance the sale and gave Jane $3,000 in credit to buy the computer. Jane took delivery and signed a security agreement that described the computer and granted Dealer a security interest in it. Dealer did not file a financing statement.

Immediately after purchasing the computer from Dealer, Jane changed her mind about how she would use it. Jane had just begun work as an independent consultant, so she took the computer to her office and began using it for business purposes. She did not inform Dealer of this change of use.

On May 1, Jane borrowed $25,000 from Bank as operating capital for her business. She executed a security agreement granting Bank a security interest in her office machinery, including the computer. Also on May 1, Bank filed a valid financing statement in all proper public offices.

Jane defaulted on the loans to both Dealer and Bank. On December 1, Dealer peacefully repossessed the computer. Both Dealer and Bank claim a security interest in the computer.

As between Dealer and Bank, whose security takes priority? Explain.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

Dwight L.P. is a properly formed limited partnership created to purchase, renovate, and sell the historic Dwight Building in the downtown preservation district. The sole general partner of Dwight L.P. is Able, Inc. The Dwight L.P. partnership agreement provides that it will continue its operations until such time as the Dwight Building is renovated and sold.

Initially, Able estimated that it would cost $10 million to purchase and renovate the Dwight Building in a way that would maintain its unique architectural elements. Able's financial plan for the limited partnership was to admit limited partners who would contribute a total of $1 million to the partnership and then to obtain an additional $9 million in financing from a bank. Able found 10 local investors who contributed $100,000 each to join the partnership as limited partners. Bank made a loan to Dwight L.P. of $9 million, and Dwight L.P. bought the historic building and began work to renovate it.

Now, one year after formation of Dwight L.P., the Dwight Building renovation project has run into financial difficulty. Able failed to take into account the special requirements that the city imposed on materials and workmanship in the historic district and therefore seriously, but not fraudulently, underestimated the renovation costs of the Dwight Building. As a result, the $10 million financing has been spent, and the renovation is only three-fourths complete. The limited partners have retained a reputable independent architectural consultant who has informed them that the project can be completed for an additional $2.5 million and, upon completion, the building will probably be worth $13.5 million.

In the two weeks since the limited partners and Bank were informed of the financial situation, Bank, Able, and the limited partners have had a series of meetings. Able wants to complete the project but has no capital to contribute. Bank is unwilling to grant another loan to the partnership. Able is pressuring the limited partners to make additional capital contributions to cover the costs of completion. None of the limited partners wants to contribute any additional funds, and they are not obligated to do so under the limited partnership agreement. Able has threatened to dissolve the limited partnership unless the limited partners can come up with the additional funds required within the next 10 days.

Last week, Historical Society contacted Able and offered $10 million to Dwight L.P. to purchase the Dwight Building in its present uncompleted state. Historical Society has full information about the project, and its offer is firm. Because Able does not want to sell the building until it has been fully restored as originally intended, Able has rejected the offer without notifying the limited partners either of the offer or of Able's rejection.

Recently, the limited partners found out about Historical Society's offer and Able's failure to inform them of the offer. The limited partners believe they can no longer trust Able to run the partnership. They are now united in their desire to take one or more of the following actions: (1) dissolve the limited partnership; (2) push for the sale of the Dwight Building to Historical Society; (3) remove Able as general partner and elect a new general partner; or (4) allow Able to continue as general partner but require approval by the limited partners for every action Able takes.

1. Did Able have an obligation to inform the limited partners of Historical Society's offer? Explain.

2. Can Able carry out its threat to dissolve the limited partnership, and, if so, what options, if any, do the limited partners have as a result? Explain.
3. Can the limited partners take each of the four actions listed above without exposing themselves to unlimited liability? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

Adam is a citizen of State A and practices law in State A. He represented a citizen of State A in a criminal prosecution involving drugs and in a related civil forfeiture proceeding, both of which were pending in federal district court in State A. With his client's consent, Adam telephoned Barbara, a citizen of State B practicing law in State B, and reached an agreement that Barbara would become co-counsel in the civil forfeiture case. The client had agreed to pay Adam a contingent fee equal to 50% of the value of any property prevented from being forfeited. Barbara and Adam agreed that Adam would keep the first one-third of any fee resulting from the representation in the civil forfeiture action, and that they would share in the remaining two-thirds in proportion to their respective time spent on the forfeiture matter.

During the next two months, Barbara and Adam talked by telephone on two occasions and exchanged two letters in connection with the civil forfeiture matter. Adam's work on the case was performed entirely in State A, and Barbara's work was performed entirely in State B.

At the end of the two-month period, the government entered into an agreement accepting a guilty plea in the drug action. It also settled the forfeiture claim, agreeing to allow Adam's client to retain property valued at $480,000.

Adam refused to pay Barbara any portion of the $240,000 received as Adam's contingent fee. Barbara subsequently brought a breach of contract action against Adam in federal district court in State B, claiming $80,000 as her share of the contingent fee. Adam filed a motion to dismiss the action based on lack of jurisdiction over the subject matter or the person. Alternatively, Adam requested a transfer of venue to the federal district court of State A, where he resides and has his place of business. Adam's supporting affidavit stated that the settlement was in no way related to Barbara's efforts, and that Barbara's time spent on the forfeiture matter was less than one-third of the time spent by Adam.

A statute of State B provides:

A court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a person, who acts directly or by an agent, as to a cause of action arising from the person's transacting any business in this state.

How should the court rule on each issue raised by Adam's motion to dismiss and request for transfer of venue? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

Banks was a 70-year-old bachelor. His closest living relatives were his two nieces. Banks had long been a patron of the arts and of the Opera Society. On January 15, 1997, Banks executed a will bequeathing $100,000 to each of his nieces and leaving his residuary estate to the Banks Foundation for Opera, a private foundation that he planned to establish when he retired. He hoped that in gratitude for his generosity the Opera Society would name the new opera house after him.

A year later, Banks learned that he had a terminal disease. He told his nieces he would leave them his entire estate if they would take care of him. They agreed to do so, and, in February of 1998, Banks moved in with his two nieces and asked his attorney to draft a new will bequeathing them all his property and expressly revoking his January 15, 1997 will.

Shortly before Banks was to execute the new will, the president of the Opera Society told Banks that the Board had agreed to name the building in his honor if they received a substantial bequest from him. Banks then decided to execute the new will using his two nieces as the only witnesses, believing this would render the will invalid. A day later, Banks signed the new will and, at his request, the nieces witnessed it. It was dated February 10, 1998. Banks placed this will inside an envelope, wrote in ink on the outside of the envelope, "Not to be opened until my death," and initialed the writing.

Banks died without having created the Banks Foundation for Opera. The February 10, 1998 will was found in the envelope with the following unsigned note in Banks's handwriting on the back of the last page of the will:

Ignore this will. I never intended to give my whole estate to my nieces. I signed it only to trick them into caring for me. Long live the Banks Opera House!

1. For what reasons, if any, could the February 10, 1998 will be denied probate as Banks's last will? Explain.
2. If the will of January 15, 1997 is probated, on what theory or theories, other than fraud, may the nieces assert a claim against the estate of their uncle for their care of him? Explain.
3. If the will of January 15, 1997 is probated, on what theory, if any, might the Opera Society assert a claim to the residuary estate? Explain.

CONFLICT OF LAWS/FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Husband and Wife married in State X. Shortly thereafter, they moved to State Y, where they were domiciled for the next 10 years of their marriage. Wife never returned to State X. Recently, however, Husband left Wife and moved to State X, which has a six-week residency requirement for a divorce action. After living continuously for six weeks in State X, Husband filed for divorce in the appropriate state court in State X. Wife was served by registered mail at the couple's home in State Y. Although she received the process, Wife did nothing in response.

The law of State X provides that a plaintiff is presumed to be a domiciliary of State X for divorce purposes upon proof of six weeks' continuous residency in State X at the time of the filing of the divorce action. The long-arm statute of State X also provides for service of process on nonresident defendants by registered mail at their last known address. It provides that jurisdiction may be exercised over nonresident defendants in actions for marriage dissolution and for alimony "to the full extent permitted by the due process clause of the United States Constitution."

The State X court issued a decree granting Husband a divorce and ruling that neither Husband nor Wife was entitled to spousal support. As soon as Wife learned of the decree, she filed her own action for divorce and spousal support in the appropriate state court in State Y, where she was domiciled. Husband was properly served with process in State Y, to which he had returned after receiving the State X divorce.

Consistent with the due process and full faith and credit clauses, may the court in State Y grant the divorce and award spousal support to Wife? Explain.

COMMERCIAL PAPER QUESTION

Aaron agreed to paint Bob and Cathy's house for $2,000. After finishing the paint job, Aaron took as full payment from Bob and Cathy a $2,000 negotiable note that Bob and Cathy signed as co-makers. The note was due in one month and provided for 10% interest to accrue after the due date. A week after receiving the note from Bob and Cathy, Aaron sold the note for $1,500 to Debra, a good-faith purchaser for value. Aaron properly indorsed the back of the note.

Debra held the note for about two weeks and then sold it for $ 1,700 to Edward, another good-faith purchaser for value. Debra also properly indorsed the note on the back, directly beneath Aaron's signature. When Edward came into possession of the note, he crossed out Aaron's signature as indorser as a gesture of friendship to Aaron. Edward then indorsed the note and sold it to Frieda for $ 1,900.

Upon learning that Frieda was now in possession of the note. Bob approached Frieda on the note's due date and properly tendered $2,000 in payment of the note. Frieda did not need the cash at that time and assumed the note would continue to accrue interest, so she arbitrarily refused to accept payment. Six months later, Frieda decided to collect $2,000 in principal and $100 in accrued interest for the note.

What are Frieda's rights to recover the principal, interest, or both from:

- a. Bob? Explain.
- b. Cathy? Explain.
- c. Debra? Explain
- d. Aaron? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

PrattCo is a corporation. It has been developing a new textile inspection system that promises to revolutionize the market if it can be made to work. PrattCo has one class of stock, Class A Common, of which three million shares are authorized. All three million shares of the Class A Common are currently issued and outstanding. The Class A Common shares are currently trading at $25 a share on a recognized market.

PrattCo has two immediate problems. First, it needs a new chief executive officer with the expertise and drive to get the new system working and to expand PrattCo's operations. Second, PrattCo needs at least $75 million to finance the development of the new system and the expansion of its operations.

The PrattCo board has offered Leslie the job of PrattCo's president and chief executive officer. Leslie's salary requirements are modest, but as part of her compensation Leslie wants to receive options for 100,000 shares of Class A Common at $25 a share, with the right to exercise the options phased over a three-year period.

Brenda has offered to invest $75 million in PrattCo in return for three million shares of Class A Common at $25 per share, but she wants her Class A Common shares to be different from the existing Class A Common. Brenda wants her shares to have a preference such that any dividends would be allocated first to Brenda's Class A Common shares up to $2 per share per annum, then to the other Class A Common shares up to $2 per share per annum, and then to all Class A Common shares equally.

William currently owns 30% of the Class A Common stock. William was an inside candidate for the position of president and chief executive officer and is bitter that Leslie was offered the job. William also disagrees with the $75 million capital infusion from Brenda. William wants to license the new system to third-party manufacturers rather than have PrattCo expand its own operations.

William objects that: (1) the grant of the proposed stock options to Leslie is illegal; (2) the sale to Brenda of the Class A Common shares with preferential rights is illegal; (3) if the sale to Brenda can be legally accomplished, it requires William's consent; and (4) even if the grant to Leslie and the sale to Brenda can be made, William would have the right to purchase shares equal to 30% of the stock issued to both Leslie and Brenda.

PrattCo's articles of incorporation state that "the corporation elects to have preemptive rights." Assume the board and the stockholders of the remaining 70% of Class A Common will vote to hire Leslie, to grant her the options requested, and to accept Brenda's financing proposal. Also assume William has sufficient financial resources to exercise any stock purchase rights he may have.

Are each of William's four objections to PrattCo's plans valid and, if so, what steps could PrattCo take to avoid the objections? Explain

COMMERCIAL PAPER QUESTION

On February 1, Roofer and Brother agreed that Roofer would install a new roof on Brother's house for $8,000. They also agreed that Roofer would accept as payment a non-interest-bearing promissory note from Brother that would come due six months after Roofer finished the job.

Because Roofer had some concerns about Brother's creditworthiness, Roofer convinced Brother to have Sister, who lived in her own house, also sign the note. In addition, Brother agreed to secure his obligation on the note with a perfected security interest in Brother's three computers, each of which was worth $2,000.

On March 1, Roofer finished installing the roof on Brother's house. On that same day, Brother issued and signed as maker an $8,000 negotiable note payable "to the order of Roofer" and due on September 1 of the same year. Sister put her signature on the back of the note. There were no notations or descriptive words accompanying Sister's signature. At the same time, Roofer obtained and properly perfected a security interest in Brother's three computers.

On May 1, Roofer sold the note to Lender, who purchased the note in good faith for $7,500. Before transferring the note to Lender, Roofer signed the note on the back, beneath Sister's signature. Roofer also properly transferred his security interest in the computers to Lender.

On June 1, Brother convinced Lender to release Lender's rights to one of the three computers that secured the note, and Brother sold that computer. Sister had no knowledge of this release by Lender.

On July 1, it became clear that Roofer had done such a poor roofing job that Brother would need to spend $3,000 to fix the roof. On September 1, Lender still held the note. When Lender demanded payment, Brother refused because "the roof job was shabby."

1. Can Lender enforce the note to its full extent against Brother? Explain.
2. Can Lender enforce the note to its full extent against Sister? Explain.
3. If Sister has to pay all or part of the note, what rights, if any, does she have against Brother? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

Testator, a domiciliary of State A, died on February 1, 1998, leaving a net estate valued at $100,000. Testator was survived by three children, Andy, Billy, and Cory, and one grandchild, Gary, who is Cory's only child. The following documents were found in Testator's safe deposit box:

1. At the top, there was an envelope containing Testator's canceled check dated February 1, 1990, made payable to Charity Y in the amount of $15,000. Attached to this check were copies of other canceled checks to Charity Y paid over the previous 15 years and a copy of a note from Testator to Charity Y dated February 1, 1990, stating: "Enclosed is my check in the amount of $15,000. I know you will use this as you have all of my prior gifts to carry out the important work of your organization. I hope I'll be in a position to do more for you in the future. Your work is very important to me."
2. Underneath the first envelope was a second envelope containing a one-page typewritten will dated September 10, 1989, leaving all of Testator's estate to Andy and Billy. Testator had duly executed this will. However, the phrase "VOID—May 18, 1993" was written in large print across the entire face of the will, and on the back of the will the following words appeared: "Revoked, because I really prefer my March 2, 1983 will."
3. Underneath the second envelope was Testator's duly executed one-page typewritten will dated March 2, 1983. In this will, Testator bequeathed "$50,000 to Cory, $10,000 to Charity Y, and the residue of the estate to Andy and Billy."

On October 30, 1998, Cory filed a properly acknowledged document with the appropriate persons, renouncing all rights Cory had under Testator's two wills.

State A does not permit holographic wills. Under State A law, (1) an intestate's heirs are the intestate's surviving children, and (2) the issue of any child who predeceases the intestate take the deceased child's share.

1. Under what theory could the March 2, 1983 will be probated, and to whom would the estate be distributed under that will? Explain.
2. Under what theory could the September 10, 1989 will be probated, and to whom would the estate be distributed under that will? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

Claimant properly invoked the diversity jurisdiction of the federal district court to bring suit to recover damages for the death of Claimant's spouse, Wife. Claimant alleged that Wife died as a result of exposure to asbestos at BrakeCo, an employer that regularly used asbestos in its brakelining operation. The complaint sought damages from all major asbestos manufacturers, including Fiberco, and demanded a jury trial. Controlling law in all relevant jurisdictions would preclude recovery from Fiberco absent specific proof by the plaintiff of exposure to Fiberco asbestos products.

At the final pretrial conference, Fiberco argued that Claimant had failed to produce any evidence through discovery that would tend to establish that Wife had ever been exposed to Fiberco's product. Although the district court refused to grant summary judgment on this issue of exposure, the judge's final pretrial order did schedule the exposure issue as the first issue for trial to the jury (rather than permitting Claimant to put on the case in the order he would prefer). In compliance with the pretrial order, Claimant opened the trial with testimony from a former BrakeCo manager who testified that he often saw Fiberco asbestos packages in the storeroom. The manager admitted on cross-examination, however, that the first time he ever saw Fiberco products in the storeroom was after Wife had ceased working at BrakeCo, even though he was in the storeroom at least once a week throughout the period that Wife worked at BrakeCo.

At the conclusion of this testimony, Claimant's counsel indicated that Claimant had no other evidence to offer on the issue. Fiberco thereupon moved for judgment as a matter of law. The court granted the motion and dismissed the action as to Fiberco.

1. Did the district court have the power to require Claimant to present evidence on the exposure issue before proceeding with any other portion of Claimant's case? Explain.
2. Did the court err procedurally in granting the motion for judgment as a matter of law before the close of evidence? Explain.
3. Did the court err substantively in granting the motion for judgment as a matter of law? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

In 1950, John Smith founded Store, Inc., and he was its sole shareholder. Since 1970, Store has been a profitable business with eight large stores. In 1975, Smith took several steps to try to ensure that control of the business would stay in his family. One such step was properly to amend Store's Articles of Incorporation to provide that no Store shareholder could transfer any Store stock unless the shareholders unanimously consented to the transfer and approved the transferee.

In 1990, observing the formalities required by the amended Articles, Smith gave all of his Store stock in equal shares to his four children: Anne, Bob, Clyde, and Dave. Smith died in 1992, and his four children continued Store's business. After Smith's death, Anne, Bob, and Clyde served as the officers and directors of Store, and each was also employed by the corporation. Dave was a full-time dentist and was not interested in being an officer or a director of Store.

During the years following Smith's death, Anne, Bob, and Clyde followed a policy of reinvesting Store's earnings in order to expand the number of stores. Dave consistently opposed this policy and believed that the majority of the earnings should be distributed as dividends to Store's shareholders.

After Smith's death, Store's board of directors also substantially increased the compensation paid to Anne, Bob, and Clyde as directors and doubled their salaries as employees, increasing them to levels well above market salaries. During the same period, however, the board voted to eliminate the quarterly dividends that Store had historically paid out, even though Store had sufficient profits to pay those dividends. At every shareholders' meeting, Dave objected to the way Store was being run, but he was ignored each time. Eventually, Dave advised the three other shareholders, Anne, Bob, and Clyde, that he wanted to become a member of the board of directors or, in the alternative, that he wanted them to buy his shares. They refused both requests.

Last year, Dave pledged one-half of his Store stock to Bank as collateral for a personal loan, and Dave and Bank executed a pledge agreement covering those shares. Recently, the loan came due, and Dave was unable to repay it. Consequently, Bank properly foreclosed and became the owner of the shares under the pledge agreement.

Bank has told Anne, Bob, and Clyde that it is now the owner of one-half of Dave's shares of Store stock, and Bank requests that the shares be transferred on Store's books. Anne, Bob, and Clyde have told Bank that it is not the owner of any shares of Store stock because they have not approved the transfer as required by Store's Articles of Incorporation. Therefore, Store will not record the transfer of the shares to Bank.

Dave believes he is being "frozen out" of the corporation and wants to have Store dissolved.

1. Is the stock transfer restriction enforceable against Dave? Explain.
2. Can Bank compel Store to record the stock transfer? Explain.
3. Can Dave force a dissolution of Store? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Fred, age 12, has a heart ailment that severely limits his physical activity. His parents do not allow him to engage in vigorous sports at school. His doctor predicts that Fred's condition will slowly worsen and that, if he is left untreated, his life expectancy will be reduced by 20 years. Medical experts say that a routine operation can correct his heart defect. However, they have also indicated that it is major surgery, which, with the required anesthetic, is always risky. The hospital stay will be about five days, and recovery from the operation will take six weeks. Although the medical experts believe that postponing the operation until Fred reaches adulthood will result in some permanent loss of function, they also believe that the operation involves slightly less risk if performed on an adult rather than a child.

Fred wants to have the operation performed. He feels left out and different because most of his friends are active in sports. Some kids call him "sicky." The school psychologist has indicated that Fred is withdrawn and unhappy at school and that he is at risk of failing in his school work because of his emotional state.

Fred's parents are opposed to the surgery. While they are concerned about the risks of surgery, an even more compelling reason for their opposition is that their religion does not allow such surgery. They believe that their prayers for Fred are heard and that his illness must be part of a divine plan. Fred's doctor disagrees and wishes to obtain a court order that will allow the operation.

Fred's parents require him to attend weekly religious services with them. Fred, however, has decided that he does not wish to follow their religion but instead wants to convert to the faith of his best friend. When Fred's parents learn that Fred's best friend has been teaching Fred about his religion, they forbid him from attending any religious services other than those of their religion.

1. Can the surgery proceed with Fred's consent only? Explain.
2. Is a court likely to order the surgery over the objection of Fred's parents? Explain.
3. Do Fred's parents have the right to direct which religious services Fred will attend? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS/SALES QUESTION

Dealer owns and operates an antique store. On January 4, Bank loaned $250,000 to Dealer to finance Dealer's business operations. In connection with the loan, Dealer signed a security agreement that granted Bank a security interest in Dealer's "inventory" and assigned Dealer's "accounts and chattel paper" to Bank. The agreement covered "any and all obligations owed by Dealer to Bank including future advances." Later that day, Bank properly filed a financing statement reflecting its security interest.

On May 1, Thief stole a 17th-century cedar chest from Owner. Thief then sold it to Dealer. Dealer did not know the chest had been stolen. On June 1, Dealer sold the cedar chest to Purchaser, an interior designer, for $50,000. Purchaser bought the cedar chest for resale to a client.

Purchaser made a $10,000 down payment and signed an installment sales contract for the remainder of the purchase price, plus interest, to be paid monthly over 12 months. The installment sales contract granted to Dealer a security interest in the cedar chest and provided that all payments were to be made directly to Dealer. Purchaser subsequently made the payments due on July 1, August 1, and September 1 by sending checks to Dealer.

On September 1, Dealer failed to make a payment due on its loan from Bank. Bank immediately declared Dealer in default, as it was permitted to do under the loan and security agreements between the parties. Bank also sent a letter to Purchaser informing Purchaser of Dealer's default, advising Purchaser of Bank's security interest, and directing Purchaser to make all further payments on the installment sales contract directly to Bank. Purchaser contacted Dealer, who admitted that he was in default and that Bank had a security interest. However, Dealer told Purchaser, "Don't worry. I will pay Bank my September payment soon. Things will be straightened out. You should continue to send your monthly payments directly to me. Bank has no right to collect from you in any event. Our arrangement is between us."

On September 20, Purchaser was served with papers in a replevin action brought by Owner to recover the cedar chest. According to the complaint in the replevin action, the cedar chest had been stolen from Owner, and the bill of sale and other documents presented to Purchaser by Dealer as proof of Dealer's ownership were forgeries. Purchaser immediately answered the replevin action with a pleading alleging (a) that as a good faith purchaser for value, Purchaser's claim was superior to Owner's and (b) that any right of Owner to recover the cedar chest should be conditioned on Owner's reimbursing Purchaser for amounts paid to Dealer.

1. Who should prevail in Owner's replevin action to recover the cedar chest? Explain.
2. Assuming Purchaser prevails in the replevin action, should future payments on the installment sales contract be made to Dealer or to Bank? Explain.
3. Assuming Purchaser loses in the replevin action, does Purchaser continue to be liable for the payments on the installment sales contract either to Dealer or Bank? Explain.

TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS QUESTION

Grantor was wealthy, childless, and unmarried. Grantor created a revocable living trust and transferred assets to Trustee. The trust instrument directed Trustee “to pay the trust income to Grantor for life and, upon her death, to pay the trust income to Grantor’s brother, Brother, for his life and, upon his death, to distribute the trust principal to Cousin’s children who attain age 21.”

Grantor died several years later without having modified or revoked the trust. Grantor was survived by Brother and Cousin.

When Grantor created the trust, Cousin was married to Wife and had a young child, Adam, from that marriage. Shortly after Grantor’s death, Cousin and Wife had another child, Ellen. Later, Cousin and Wife divorced, and Cousin married Second Wife. Cousin adopted Second Wife’s child, Doris, a minor. Doris presently lives with Cousin and Second Wife.

Brother has recently died survived by Cousin; Cousin’s child, Adam, age 22; and Ellen and Doris, both of whom are under the age of 21.

1. Does the trust violate the common-law Rule Against Perpetuities? Explain.
2. Assuming that the trust does not violate the common-law Rule Against Perpetuities, are Adam, Ellen, and Doris entitled to a share of the trust principal and when, if at all, would each be entitled to possession of that share? Explain.

Legal Problems

- (1) Should the computer be classified as a consumer good or as equipment?
- (2) Does Dealer have a perfected security interest?
- (3) Does Bank have a perfected security interest?
- (4) Does Dealer's security interest take priority over Bank's security interest?

DISCUSSION

Point One (20-25%)

When Jane bought the computer, she expressed to Dealer an initial intent to use it for “personal, family, or household” use. Therefore, the computer would most likely be classified as a consumer good.

The relevant rules for resolving the priority dispute between Dealer and Bank will be determined by how one classifies the collateral. To do that, one must look at the expressed intent at the time of purchase and the use of the collateral in the hands of the debtor. The collateral's intended use at the time of the sale was as consumer goods under § 9-109(1) of the Uniform Commercial Code. Jane originally intended to use the computer for “personal, family, or household” purposes. However, Jane's actual use turned out to be “primarily in business.” If the latter use governs, the collateral will be “equipment” as defined in UCC § 9-109(2) (excluding consumer goods from definition of “equipment”).

Which use governs? One approach is that the debtor's intended use at the time of the sale should govern the classification. This approach is justified on the policy ground that the secured party should be able to rely on what the debtor represents as the intended use and should not be encouraged to police the collateral and keep the debtor under surveillance. J. White & R. Summers, Uniform Commercial Code 783-84 (4th ed. 1995). Moreover, UCC § 9-109(1) states that goods are consumer goods if they are “used or bought” for personal use. Accordingly, the computer should be classified as a consumer good.

There is, however, authority for the proposition that the ultimate use controls. T. Crandall, R. Hagedorn, & F. Smith, The Law of Debtors and Creditors § 7.06[3][e] (1991). If the latter view is adopted, the computer will be deemed to be “equipment.”

Point Two (30-35%)

Dealer acquired a purchase money security interest, which attached and was automatically perfected at the moment of sale without the need for the filing of a financing statement.

Assuming that the collateral is correctly classified as a consumer good, Dealer enjoyed a purchase money security interest in it. Under UCC § 9-107(a), a purchase money secured creditor includes a seller who allows the debtor to purchase the goods on credit and takes a security interest in the goods sold. J. White, supra, at 765. Under UCC § 9-302(1)(d), filing is not required to perfect a purchase money security interest in consumer goods. The security interest is perfected automatically upon its attachment because the burden of filing in numerous small transactions would outweigh the benefits achieved from notice to the public. T. Crandall, supra § 7.06[5][b]; J. White, supra, at 765. Accordingly, Dealer's failure to file a financing statement was of no consequence.

There is no doubt here that a security interest attached in Dealer's favor at the point of sale. Under UCC § 9-203(1) there are three requirements for attachment of a security interest: (1) The secured party must give value, which, under UCC § 1-201(44)(a), includes "the extension of immediately available credit"; (2) The debtor must have sufficient property rights in the collateral, which Jane had when she took delivery of the computer, UCC § 2-501(1)(a); (3) Finally, for non-possessory collateral (i.e., collateral not in possession of the creditor), the debtor must have signed a security agreement, which Jane did.

If, on the other hand, the actual use of the computer governs the classification of the collateral, then the computer will be viewed as equipment, in such a case, Dealer's security interest would have attached by virtue of Jane's having signed the security assignment, but would have remained unperfected initially as a result of Dealer's failure to file. However, under UCC § 9-305 a security interest in goods may be perfected by the secured party's taking possession of the collateral. In this case, Dealer's perfection would have been delayed until December 1, when Dealer peacefully repossessed the computer following Jane's default.

Bank's security interest attached and was perfected by filing on May 1.

Bank's security interest attached because the three elements of UCC § 9-203(1) were met: (1) Bank gave value by extending credit to Jane, UCC § 1-201(44)(a); (2) Jane already owned the computer collateral and had the necessary property rights; and (3) Jane signed a security agreement. Because Bank properly filed a financing statement, Bank had a perfected security interest in Jane's equipment on May 1. J. White, supra, at 781-83.

Assuming that the collateral is properly classified as a consumer good, Dealer's security interest takes priority over Bank's because Dealer was the first to perfect its security interest. Bank's security interest would take priority over Dealer's if the collateral were classified as equipment.

Priority between two perfected security interests is governed by the first-to-file-or-perfect rule of UCC § 9-312(5)(a). T. Crandall, supra § 7.07[4][a]. Assuming that Dealer's security interest was automatically perfected, it would take priority over Bank's later filing. Dealer's security interest was automatically perfected on January 15 when the security interest attached. Bank's security interest was perfected on May 1 when it made a conforming central filing.

On the other hand, if a court were to hold that actual use governed the classification of the computer for Dealer, it would be classified as equipment, and Dealer would not enjoy automatic perfection. Dealer's perfection would be delayed until December 1 when it perfected by taking possession of the computer. The priority result would then be reversed, because Bank would be the first secured party to file or perfect. Bank filed its financing statement on May 1, long before Dealer repossessed.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP ANALYSIS

(Agency & Partnership IX.C, X.A, X.B)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Does a general partner of a limited partnership have an obligation to inform the limited partners of an offer to purchase the limited partnership's sole asset?
- (2) Can a general partner of a limited partnership dissolve the limited partnership without obtaining the approval of the limited partners? If so, what are the limited partners' rights?
- (3) Can the limited partners take each of the desired actions without losing their status as limited partners and subjecting themselves to unlimited liability?

DISCUSSION

Point One (33%)

As general partner, Able had an obligation to inform the limited partners of the offer from Historical Society.

A general partner of a limited partnership has fiduciary duties to the limited partners of the partnership similar to that which a partner of a general partnership has to the other general partners. Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act (RULPA) § 403(b). These duties are the duty of care and the duty of loyalty. See Revised Uniform Partnership Act (RUPA) § 404(a). Able's failure to inform the limited partners of the offer from Historical Society was a violation of its fiduciary obligations as general partner. First, if the limited partners had a right under the partnership agreement to approve or disapprove the sale, the failure violated the implied right to information under the Uniform Partnership Act. (UPA § 18; RUPA § 403). Second, to the extent the offer was partnership property and Able would benefit from thwarting the sale, the withholding of information by Able violated its fiduciary duties under UPA § 21(1). In addition, Able's failure to inform the limited partners of the offer to purchase the partnership's major asset was a violation of Able's general common-law fiduciary duty. See, e.g., Meinhard v. Salmon, 249 N.Y. 458, 463-464, 164 N.E 545, 546 (1928). (Partners owe one another the "duty of the finest loyalty.")

Point Two (33%)

Able can dissolve the limited partnership, but such a dissolution would be wrongful. In a wrongful dissolution, the limited partners would wind up Dwight L.P. and could sell the Dwight Building to Historical Society.

A nonjudicial dissolution of a limited partnership can occur at a time specified in the limited partnership agreement, upon the happening of an event specified in the limited partnership agreement, or upon the written consent of all partners. RULPA § 801(1), (2), (3). In this case, the facts do not specify that the Dwight L P. partnership agreement provides for a time for dissolution. It does provide that on the sale of the Dwight Building, the partnership would terminate; however, this event has not occurred nor has the unanimous consent of the limited partners to the dissolution of the Dwight L.P. been obtained. Therefore, Able cannot properly dissolve the limited partnership. The general partner can withdraw, but the limited partners have 90 days in which to decide to continue the partnership. RULPA § 801(4). Those are the only means under the statute by which a limited partnership can be dissolved as a matter of right.

In a general partnership, each partner has the ability to dissolve the partnership even if the dissolution is not as a matter of right. UPA § 31(2). Although there is no parallel provision under RULPA, that act does contemplate an effective but wrongful dissolution by a general partner. RULPA § 803 (“... the general partners who have not wrongfully dissolved ...”). Thus it appears that Able could dissolve the limited partnership but that such a dissolution would be wrongful.

If Able wrongfully dissolves the limited partnership, the limited partners would have the right to wind up the limited partnership’s affairs. “[T]he general partners who have not wrongfully dissolved a limited partnership or, if none, the limited partners, may wind up the limited partnership’s affairs. . . . RULPA § 803. The winding up of a limited partnership is no different than the process of winding up a general partnership. Winding up is generally the process of completing old business of the partnership and distributing the partnership’s assets to the partners. Ellebracht v. Siebring, 525 F. Supp. 1.13, 116 (W.D. Mo. 1981), aff’d 676 F.2d 706 (8th Cir. 1982). Part of the winding up process is the conversion of the partnership’s assets into cash for distribution to the partners. Reuschlein & Gregory, The Law of Agency and Partnership, 344 (2d ed. 1990). As part of the winding up of the partnership, the limited partners would have the right to sell the Dwight Building to Historical Society.

Point Three (33%)

The limited partners may dissolve the limited partnership, push for a sale to Historical Society, and remove Able as general partner without the possibility of unlimited liability. The limited partners may require their approval for all actions taken by the general partner, but, in doing so, they increase their exposure to the possibility for unlimited liability.

A limited partner who is not also a general partner can be held liable for the obligations of a limited partnership if the limited partner “participates in the control of the business.” RULPA § 303(a). However, the Act provides a safe harbor for certain types of activities that are deemed not to constitute participation in the control of the business. RULPA § 303(b). Action by the limited partners to dissolve the limited partnership (RULPA § 303(b)(6)(i)), to sell all or substantially all of the limited partnership’s assets (RULPA § 303(b)(6)(ii)), or to remove the general partner (RULPA § 303(b)(6)(v)) are all within the safe harbor and therefore those actions by themselves will not expose the limited partners to any unlimited general partner-type liability.

A decision by the limited partners to keep Able as general partner but to require their approval for every action Able takes is not within the safe harbor provisions of the statute. RULPA § 303(b). It is likely that such oversight of all of the day-to-day decision-making of a general partner in its operation of the limited partnership would constitute participation in the control of the business. RULPA § 303(a).

However, even if such oversight was deemed to constitute participation in control of the partnership, the limited partners would not be automatically liable as general partners. Reliance by a third party is required in order to impose greater liability upon a limited partner. “[I]f the limited partner participates in the control of the business, he is liable only to persons who transact business with the limited partnership reasonably believing, based upon the limited partner’s conduct, that the limited partner is a general partner.” RULPA § 303(a). Here, Bank knew of the limited partners’ status; thus, there was no reliance by Bank. If the limited partnership were to continue its operations, it would be necessary to contract with various third parties to complete the restoration work. It would be likely that if Able was required, in each instance, to defer to the approval of the limited partners in the partnership's dealings with such third parties, they could have a reasonable belief that the limited partners were controlling the business and acting as a general partner.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure I.A, I.B, I.E)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Does the federal district court in State B have subject matter jurisdiction?
- (2) Does the federal district court in State B have personal jurisdiction?
- (3) Should venue be transferred to the federal district court of State A?

DISCUSSION

Point One (10-20%)

The federal district court has subject matter jurisdiction based upon diversity of citizenship and the required amount in controversy.

The challenge to jurisdiction raises issues as to personal jurisdiction as well as subject matter jurisdiction. Subject matter jurisdiction exists under 28 U.S.C. § 1332 if there is diversity of citizenship and the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000. Diversity of citizenship exists between Barbara, a citizen of State B, and Adam, a State A citizen.

Barbara's claim for $80,000 on its face satisfies the statutory amount in controversy. Adam's supporting affidavit suggests the possibility that Barbara may ultimately recover less than the statutory minimum, but that does not defeat the federal court's jurisdiction. "[T]he sum claimed by the plaintiff controls if the claim is apparently made in good faith. It must appear to a legal certainty that the claim is really for less than the jurisdictional amount to justify dismissal." St. Paul Mercury Indemnity Co. v. Red Cab Co., 303 U.S. 283, 288-89 (1938). Barbara's actual recovery will depend upon factual issues and cannot be said to a legal certainty to be less than the statutory minimum.

Point Two (45-55%)

The federal district court has personal jurisdiction based upon requisite minimum contacts and the state's long-arm statute.

Determining the existence of personal jurisdiction requires analysis both of whether personal jurisdiction can be constitutionally exercised by the State B federal district court and of whether the appropriate state statute allows the federal court to assert personal jurisdiction.

The constitutional question is dependent on the classic line of cases beginning with International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310 (1945). International Shoe requires the defendant to have sufficient "minimum contacts" with State B such that requiring defense in State B would not "offend 'traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.'" Id. at 3) 6, quoting Mi Hi ken v. Meyer, 311 U.S. 457, 463 (1940).

The sufficiency of contacts required under International Shoe and subsequent decisions depends on whether the court is seeking to assert general or specific jurisdiction. General jurisdiction is involved where the subject matter of the lawsuit is not related to the contacts the defendant has with the forum state. Specific jurisdiction is involved when the lawsuit arises out of the contacts which form the basis for determining whether there are minimum contacts. Fewer contacts are required to assert specific personal jurisdiction than to assert general personal jurisdiction:

[W]here a forum seeks to assert specific jurisdiction over an out-of-state defendant who has not consented to suit there, this “fair warning” requirement is satisfied if the defendant has “purposely directed” his activities at residents of the forum, and the litigation results from alleged injuries that “arise out of or relate to” those activities.

Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 472 (1985)(quoting Keeton v. Hustler Magazine, Inc., 465 U.S. 770, 774 (1984), Helicopteros Nacionales de Colombia S.A. v. Hall, 466 U.S. 408, 414 (1984)).

Were this a general jurisdiction case—for example, if Barbara were suing Adam on an unrelated personal injury claim—the contacts would clearly be insufficient. See Helicopteros Nacionales de Colombia, S.A. v. Hall, 466 U.S. 408 (1984).

Here, however, Barbara seeks to assert specific jurisdiction, since the cause of action arises out of Adam’s contacts (the fee-splitting contract) with State B. The contacts appear sufficient to assert personal jurisdiction. Purposeful activity was directed toward State B. Although there are factual points to the contrary, including where the contract was written, the contacts with State B are sufficient for an action arising out of such contacts. Adam initiated the contact, solicited the contract, and had further related contacts with Barbara.

Recognizing that personal jurisdiction is constitutionally permissible, the question remains whether there is statutory authority to assert that jurisdiction. Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 4(k)(1), Barbara must look to the law of State B to determine whether personal jurisdiction may be asserted in a diversity action. This requires interpreting State B’s long-arm statute. The statute clearly contemplates the exercise of jurisdiction in an action such as this because contracting with Barbara constitutes transacting business within the state.

Venue should not be transferred to the federal district court of State A because the convenience of the parties and the convenient administration of justice would not be better served there than in the federal district court of State B.

Venue transfers are controlled by 28 U.S.C. § 1404, which provides “in the interest of justice, a district court may transfer any civil action to any other district or division where it might have been brought.” The action could have been brought in State A. The subject matter jurisdiction is the same. Adam is doing business within the state sufficient to confer personal and subject matter jurisdiction, and venue is proper since all the defendants are in State A. The question is whether the interests of justice require the transfer. It would appear not. The relative difficulty to Barbara and Adam seems the same. The evidence necessary at trial is not predominately in one jurisdiction rather than the other. There appears to be no hardship on any third party who might be a witness. The logical conclusion would be that the preference for allowing Barbara to choose the forum has not been overcome.

(Decedents' Estates II.A, II.B, II.C, II. D, II.E, II.G)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Can the 1998 will witnessed only by interested witnesses be challenged on the grounds that it was not executed with testamentary intent, it was witnessed by interested persons, or it was revoked?
- (2) Assuming that only the 1997 will is entitled to be probated, can the testator's nieces claim any share of the testator's estate on the theory that they have a claim against his estate?
- (3) Assuming that only the 1997 will is entitled to be probated, can the testator's residuary estate be distributed to the Opera Society in lieu of the Banks Foundation for Opera under the cy pres doctrine, or does the bequest to the foundation fail, so that the residue of the testator's estate is distributed only to his heirs?

DISCUSSION

Testator's 1998 purported will can be denied probate because it was not executed with the requisite testamentary intent. If evidence of a lack of intent is inadmissible such that on its face the will is valid, the 1998 document might arguably have been revoked by cancellation or by codicil, and therefore is not entitled to be probated. If not so revoked, it is entitled to be probated.

The facts indicate that Banks intended to have the 1998 document executed in such a way that it would be invalid. He did this because he wanted his property to pass to the Banks Foundation for Opera under the terms of his 1997 will without his nieces knowing this, so they would continue to take care of him. What Banks failed to appreciate was that the mere fact that a will is witnessed by beneficiaries under the will does not mean the will is invalid. In fact, in almost all jurisdictions, the validity of the will is unaffected by whether a witness is interested, although interestedness on the part of a witness may have an adverse impact on the witness's right to receive the bequest. See generally William M. McGovern, Jr., Sheldon F. Kurtz, & Jan Ellen Rein, Wills, Trusts and Estates § 4.3 (1988). Jurisdictions which have adopted the Uniform Probate Code (UPC) are even less restrictive since in those jurisdictions an interested witness does not forfeit the testamentary gift. Unif. Prob. Code § 2-505.

Although Banks's will was properly executed, it is invalid as a will if it was not executed with any testamentary intent. In the absence of testamentary intent, a document, even though executed with the statutory formalities, is invalid. See generally 79 Am. Jur. 2d Wills § 12. Testamentary intent can be established by extrinsic evidence, Unif. Prob. Code § 2-502(c), and while cases such as this—where it is the absence of intent that is at issue—are rare, presumably lack of intent can also be shown by extrinsic evidence.

The evidence in this case, that Banks executed the 1998 will without testamentary intent and to accomplish his goals used his nieces as witnesses mistakenly believing this would invalidate his will, is also reaffirmed by Banks's handwritten note on the back of the last page of the will. This note would likely constitute sufficient evidence to prove that the will was not executed with testamentary intent. On the other hand, if the note were not admissible for that purpose (e.g., in jurisdictions with a very restrictive view regarding the admissibility of extrinsic evidence), the handwritten note might be a sufficient revocation of the will by cancellation, at least in some jurisdictions.

Under § 2-507 of the Uniform Probate Code, a will can be revoked by a number of acts, including a cancellation. Under the UPC, words of cancellation need not touch any of the words of the will, but they must be somewhere on the will. Under UPC § 2-507, the note revokes the will because it was written on the will. A different result follows in jurisdictions that follow the common-law rule, requiring words of cancellation to "touch" the words of the will. See, e.g., Thompson v Royal I, 163 Va. 492, 175 S.E. 748 (1934) (words of cancellation ineffective because they did not come in contact with the will).

Could the 1998 will be viewed as having been revoked by a codicil? That would depend upon whether local law recognized holographic wills, whether holographic wills had to be signed, and whether Banks's initials on the envelope would meet any signing requirement, information that is not provided here.

Banks's nieces probably cannot establish a claim against his estate on the basis of breach of contract to make a will, but they may be entitled to recover the reasonable value of their services to him.

Ordinarily, contracts to make a will must be in writing. See, e.g., N.Y. EPTL § 13-2.1; Unif. Prob. Code § 2-514. In the absence of a writing, such contracts are unenforceable. Jurisdictions that do not expressly address this matter in their probate codes may reach the same result by applying a statute of frauds. On the facts given, Banks's agreement with his nieces was made orally. No facts suggest that it was reduced to writing. Accordingly, any claim by the nieces for breach of a contract to make a will would face the hurdle that they never put their agreement with their uncle in writing, as required by most probate codes.

On the other hand, it could be argued that there is enough written evidence of the agreement to satisfy any writing requirement even though there is no formal written contract. The 1998 will itself combined with the note on the back of that will provide some written evidence of Banks's promise to his nieces. In addition, if a local statute of frauds (rather than the probate code) creates the requirement of a writing, arguably the doctrine of part performance or estoppel may avoid the operation of that statute. See, William M. McGovern, Jr., Sheldon F. Kurtz, & Jan Ellen Rein, Wills, Trusts and Estates 46-59 (1988). On that basis the nieces may be able to assert against Bank's estate a claim of breach of contract to make a will.

If a jurisdiction does not require a writing to establish a contract to make a will, the nieces should be able to recover the amount of their damages, assuming the 1997 will is probated.

If the nieces' claim cannot be sustained as a contract to make a will, they may be able to recover damages in an amount equal to the reasonable value of their services or impose a constructive trust for such amount on the successor of Banks's estate. Id.

Point Three (30-40%)

Assuming that the 1997 will is probated and the nieces are not entitled to the whole estate, the residue of Banks's estate should be distributed to the Opera Society in lieu of the Banks Foundation by application of the cy pres doctrine.

The residuary bequest in favor of the Banks Foundation for Opera cannot be given effect, even if this will is probated, because the Foundation was never organized prior to Banks's death. Where a charitable bequest becomes impossible or impracticable to fulfill, a court may use the doctrine of cy pres to reform that gift to accomplish the testator's general charitable intent. See generally Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 399 (1959), Cy pres is appropriate unless a court determined that Banks's intent was limited only to benefiting the foundation that was never formed. This seems unlikely under the facts of the case since the purpose of the foundation was itself to benefit the Opera Society, which can just as easily be accomplished by substituting it as the residuary legatee under the will.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Did the court in State X have jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage such that State Y is precluded from granting a divorce?
- (2) Did the court in State X violate due process by denying Wife spousal support?
- (3) Does the obligation of the court in State Y to give full faith and credit to the State X divorce decree preclude it from awarding spousal support to Wife?

DISCUSSION

The power of State Y to grant a divorce decree and award spousal support depends on the validity and effect of the divorce and support decree issued by State X. Under the doctrine of divisible divorce, the State X decree may be valid and effective as to the divorce, but not as to spousal support. Points One and Two concern the validity of the State X decree in these respects. Point Three addresses State Y's power to award spousal support, in the event that State X's decree is valid as to the divorce but not as to the spousal support.

Point One (30-40%)

A divorce decree dissolving a marriage is entitled to full faith and credit if the court in the rendering state had jurisdiction to enter it. A court has jurisdiction if at least one of the spouses is domiciled in the rendering state.

The in-state domicile of at least one of the parties is sufficient for a state court's jurisdiction in a divorce action. Williams v. North Carolina, 317 U.S. 287 (1942). A change of domicile is effected by moving to the new location with intent to remain there, regarding it as one's home. Friedenthal, Kane & Miller, Civil Procedure 31 (1996). Whether Husband intended to regard State X as his home is, of course, problematic, as he left State X immediately upon receiving his divorce. Arguably, at least, Husband lacked the intent required for domicile and hence for State X to exercise jurisdiction.

As the burden of proof is on the litigant who is contesting the jurisdiction, jurisdictional challenges based on lack of domicile when the durational residency requirement has been complied with rarely succeed. Nonetheless, State Y can independently examine whether State X had jurisdiction. Williams v. North Carolina, 325 U.S. 226 (1945) (Williams II). Since Husband does appear to have satisfied the durational residency requirement, most courts would hold that the court in State X did have jurisdiction to dissolve Husband and Wife's marriage and, therefore, State Y cannot issue a divorce decree. E.g., Newport v. Newport, 219 Va. 48 (1978).

Point Two (30-40%)

A court that does not have in personam jurisdiction over a person may not constitutionally assert jurisdiction to deny that person spousal support.

In personam jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant is not needed for a court to take jurisdiction to grant a divorce terminating the marital status of a party properly before it. But personal jurisdiction is required before a court may assert jurisdiction to determine the defendant's support rights and duties. This is the doctrine of "divisible divorce." See generally Estin v. Estin, 334 U.S. 541 (1948); Vanderbilt v. Vanderbilt, 354 U.S. 416 (1957); FT. Clark, The Law of Domestic Relations in the United States § 12.4, at 443-56 (2d ed. 1988). Thus, a court's decree can be entitled to full faith and credit with respect to its marriage dissolution order, but not with respect to its order granting or foreclosing alimony. Whether a court can constitutionally assert in personam jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant depends on whether the nonresident defendant has or has had minimum contacts with the rendering state such that the maintenance of the support action against him or her does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. See Kulko v. Superior Court of California, 436 U.S. 84 (1978).

The fact that the parties were married in State X might seem to give State X a very strong interest in all aspects of the marriage's dissolution, including the financial aspects. Since both Husband and Wife voluntarily chose to be married in State X and under the laws of State X, it might seem fair to conclude that they purposefully availed themselves of the benefits and protection of the laws of State X. But the U.S. Supreme Court in Kulko showed a marked reluctance to apply its minimum contacts theory to personal relations matters as broadly as it has in ordinary commercial litigation. The parties in Kulko were married in the rendering state, but the Court held that this contact alone was not sufficient in the context of a claim for child support. It is also unlikely that it would be sufficient in the context of a claim for spousal support or separate maintenance. That is especially the case where, as here, the marriage took place many years ago and the wife has had no significant contact with the rendering state during the intervening period. Following Kulko, a court would probably conclude that Wife does not have sufficient contact with State X for courts in that state to have asserted in personam jurisdiction over her. Therefore, the State X order cutting off her right to spousal support is not entitled to full faith and credit in State Y.

Point Three (30-40%)

State Y can probably award spousal support because State X granted an ex parte divorce in which it did not have jurisdiction to deny Wife support.

While a valid divorce decree issued by the state in which the plaintiff is domiciled can terminate the marital status of the parties, the state must have personal jurisdiction over the defendant spouse to determine spousal support. Thus, even if State X's divorce decree is accorded full faith and credit, the effect of the decree is limited to a determination of marital status unless the court had personal jurisdiction over the defendant.

Although courts typically do not have subject matter jurisdiction to award spousal support if it is not awarded at the time of the divorce, most states have statutes or case law that allows the spouse who was not subject to the in personam jurisdiction of the court granting the divorce to seek support notwithstanding the valid divorce. H. Clark, The Law of Domestic Relations in the United States § 12.4, at 452-53, citing cases and statutes. Some states do not provide an exception, finding that once a divorce decree entitled to full faith and credit with respect to marital status is issued, then spousal support cannot be awarded. See, e.g., Loeb v. Loeb, 118 Vt. 472, 114 A.2d 518 (1955). Nonetheless, regardless of the validity of the State X divorce decree, under the laws of most states, State Y could determine spousal support.

Legal Problems

- (1) Did Bob's tender of payment discharge his own liability on the note to Frieda?
- (2) Did Bob's tender of payment discharge the liability of his co-maker, Cathy, on the note to Frieda?
- (3) Did Bob's tender of payment discharge the liability of Debra, an indorser, to Frieda on the note?
- (4) Did the crossing out of Aaron's name by Edward discharge Aaron's liability to Frieda on the note?

DISCUSSION

Point One (25-35%)

As an obligor on a negotiable instrument. Bob's tender of full payment at maturity did not discharge his obligation on the instrument except with respect to future interest.

Frieda, as the current holder of the note, is the party who is entitled to enforce the note. Uniform Commercial Code § 3-301. As the co-maker of the note, Bob is jointly and severally liable on the instrument. UCC §§ 3-103(a)(5) & 3-116(a). A party who is jointly and severally liable as an obligor on a negotiable instrument is responsible to the holder for the entire amount of payment. Nevertheless, if such a party is forced to pay the entire amount of the instrument, he or she will have a right of contribution against the co-obligor. UCC § 3-116(b).

When Bob made the tender of full payment on the note's due date and Frieda refused it, the refusal by Frieda served to discharge only the obligation of indorsers and accommodation parties with a right of recourse against Bob. UCC § 3-603(b). As for Bob's own liability to Frieda, her refusal of his tender served merely to discharge Bob's obligation to pay interest following the refused tender. UCC § 3-603(c). Thus, under these facts, Bob would still be liable to Frieda for the $2,000 in principal but would not be liable for the $100 in interest on the note that had accrued since Bob's tender was refused by Frieda.

Bob's offer was not sufficient to cause Cathy's liability to be discharged when Frieda refused Bob's tender of payment.

Cathy, as co-maker on the note with Bob, was jointly and severally liable on the note. UCC §§ 3-103(a)(5) & 3-116(a). Cathy's status as co-maker gave her the potential right of contribution against Bob in the event that she ended up paying the holder of the note more than her pro-rata share of liability. UCC § 3-116(b). However, Cathy's potential right of contribution would not be sufficient to discharge her obligation to pay Frieda, the holder, when Bob, her fellow co-maker, made a tender to Frieda that was refused. The only obligations discharged by Bob's tender would be those of an "indorser or accommodation party having a right of recourse" regarding the obligation to which the tender related. UCC § 3-603(b). Cathy's status as a co-maker fits neither of those categories. Thus, Cathy's liability as co-maker on the instrument would not be discharged as to principal.

Cathy's obligation to pay interest is less certain. Section 3-603(c) says that "[i]f tender of payment of an amount due on an instrument is made to a person entitled to enforce the instrument, the obligation of the obligor to pay interest after the due date on the amount tendered is discharged." Section 3-603(c) does not make clear in a case such as this whether "the obligor" being benefited must be the party making tender (which was the result under pre-1990 UCC § 3-604(1)) or whether instead the no-interest result applies to all obligors on the instrument. The latter interpretation of § 3-603(c) would at least discharge Cathy with respect to the $100 in accrued interest; the former interpretation would not.

Point Three (20-30%)

As an indorser with a right of recourse against Bob. Debra's obligation on the note was discharged by Frieda's refusal of Bob's tender.

By signing on the back of the instrument as she did, Debra assumed the obligation of an indorser. UCC § 3-204(a) & (b). As an indorser, Debra had a potential right of recourse with respect to Bob, the co-maker whose tender was refused. UCC § 3-412. Accordingly, Debra benefited from the rule that completely discharges an indorser with a right of recourse where the obligor on a negotiable instrument makes a proper tender of full payment to the holder at or after maturity and payment is improperly refused. UCC § 3-603(b).

Point Four (20-30%)

Even in the absence of Bob's tender. Edward's crossing out of Aaron's signature discharged Aaron's liability as indorser on the instrument.

Under UCC § 3-604(a), Edward, as the holder of an instrument, may discharge any party's obligation on an instrument by cancellation. Cancellation would include "striking out of the party's signature," as Edward did here with respect to Aaron's signature as indorser. UCC § 3-604(a). To be effective, cancellation does not require consideration, but it must be done by someone entitled to enforce the instrument (which Edward clearly was as a holder under UCC § 3-301) and it must be intentional (which the cancellation was here since Edward did it as an act of friendship).

Legal Problems

- (1) (a) Can a corporation award an executive stock options in that corporation as part of the executive's compensation?
- (b) Can a corporation issue stock options when all of the authorized shares of such corporation are issued and outstanding?
- (2) Can a corporation issue additional shares of an existing class of common stock that have greater rights and preferences than the outstanding shares of that class?
- (3) Is the consent of all common shareholders required for the issuance of preferred shares by a corporation?
- (4) Are a common shareholder's preemptive rights triggered by an award of common stock options to an executive, by the issuance of additional common stock, or by the issuance of preferred stock?

DISCUSSION

Point One (a) (15-25%)

Subject to Point One(b), PrattCo has the right to award options to its officers for purchase of shares as part of the officers' compensation.

A corporation may issue options for the purchase of its shares on terms and conditions determined by the board of directors. Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA) § 6.24. Shares may be issued, and options extended, for different types of consideration, including both "services performed" and "contracts for services to be performed." RMBCA § 6.21(b). Thus, the board could agree to give Leslie the requested options either on an "as earned" basis as Leslie completes periods of service with the company, or "up front" in consideration for a contract for future services. Therefore, the board would normally be entitled to issue the options to Leslie subject to all necessary actions to authorize sufficient shares as discussed below.

PrattCo has issued all of its authorized shares: therefore, the stock options cannot be issued unless the board and the shareholders vote to increase the number of common shares authorized.

A corporation must have a sufficient number of authorized shares to cover all issued and outstanding shares, as well as all shares subject to options that have been issued. Articles of incorporation are required to state the number of authorized shares of the corporation. RMBCA § 2.02(a)(2). PrattCo's articles of incorporation authorize three million shares of Class A Common stock, of which all three million shares have been issued and are outstanding. This means that PrattCo cannot issue the stock options to Leslie unless its articles are amended to provide for additional authorized shares of Class A Common stock in a number at least sufficient to meet Leslie's options.

An increase in the number of Class A Common shares authorized requires approval of both the board of directors and the Class A Common shareholders. RMBCA §§ 10.03, 10.04. Although a supermajority vote for certain changes to a corporation's articles may be specified in the articles of incorporation, RMBCA § 7.27, no supermajority requirement is found in PrattCo's articles, so a majority of the shares voted will be sufficient to approve the change. RMBCA §§ 7.25, 10.03(e)(2). Since all Class A shareholders (other than William) will vote to authorize the additional shares, PrattCo will be able to carry out its plan to issue the options and hire Leslie.

Point Two (30-40%)

Brenda's proposal to purchase Class A Common shares cannot be implemented because it provides for preferential dividend rights within an undifferentiated class of stock.

Brenda's proposal cannot be implemented because it gives Brenda's Class A Common shares preferential dividend rights beyond that given to the other Class A Common shares. All shares within a class of stock must have identical rights and preferences unless the shares within a class are divided into separate series. RMBCA § 6.02 (c); Hamilton, Corporations, VC.4, at 243 (1992). In addition, shares that have a preferred right to receive dividends or distributions on liquidation should not be called "common" shares. Henn and Alexander, Laws of Corporations § 160, at 403 (1983). See McKinney's N.Y. Business Corporation Law § 501(b). Since Brenda's shares would have preferred rights to receive dividends, they cannot be issued as Class A Common shares.

Point Three (20-30%)

PrattCo could create a new class of shares (Preferred Stock) and sell Brenda shares of Preferred Stock with preferential rights if the board and the shareholders approved amendments to the articles to provide for such Preferred Stock. Amendment of the articles of incorporation to create Preferred Stock requires board approval and a majority vote of the Class A Common shareholders, which, under the facts, can be obtained.

PrattCo could accomplish Brenda's objective by issuing shares of Preferred Stock instead of Class A Common shares. To do so, PrattCo would have to amend the articles of incorporation to create the Preferred Stock and designate the shares to be sold to Brenda as Preferred Stock with the preferential rights that Brenda has requested. Amendment of the articles of incorporation to create Preferred Stock requires board approval and a majority vote of the Class A Common shareholders. RMBCA §§ 10.03, 10.04. Since William holds only 30% of the Class A Common shares and all shareholders other than William will vote in favor of creating the Preferred Stock, William will not be able to block the creation and issuance of the Preferred Stock.

William has preemptive rights under the articles and generally would be entitled to his proportional share of any Class A Common stock issued. However, no preemptive rights exist with respect to shares issued as compensation to officers, such as those to be issued to Leslie, and no preemptive rights exist for common shareholders with respect to preferred shares that are not convertible into common, such as the Preferred Stock that could be issued to Brenda.

The PrattCo articles of incorporation include language that “the corporation elects to have preemptive rights.” This triggers the preemptive rights provisions of the RMBCA. RMBCA § 6.30(b). Under the RMBCA and many state statutes, a corporation must “opt in” to create preemptive rights by expressly including the right in its articles of incorporation. In other states, preemptive rights are presumed to exist unless the corporation “opts out” and expressly excludes such rights in its articles. Regardless of the type of law in this jurisdiction, the statement in the PrattCo articles establishes preemptive rights for its shareholders.

However, there are several widely recognized exceptions to preemptive rights. Under the RMBCA and many state statutes, no preemptive rights exist as to “shares issued to satisfy . . . option rights created to provide compensation to . . . officers ... of the corporation. . . .” RMBCA § 6.30(b)(3)(H). Therefore, William has no preemptive right to buy any PrattCo shares as a result of the issuance of Leslie’s options.

If Brenda were to purchase Class A Common shares, the sale would not come within any of the statutory exclusions of preemptive rights, and William would have the right to purchase 30% of the Class A Common shares sold to Brenda. RMBCA § 6.30(b)(3). However, since Brenda’s shares must be issued as Preferred Stock (not Class A Common), as discussed in Point Three above, William’s preemptive rights claim can be defeated. Holders of common shares have no preemptive rights to preferential shares unless those shares are convertible to common. RMBCA § 6.30 (b)(5). So long as the Preferred Stock, which is entitled to preferential rights to dividends, is not convertible into Class A Common and carries no rights to acquire Class A Common, William would have no preemptive rights in the Preferred Stock sold to Brenda.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Will Lender be able to enforce the note against Brother free of Brother's personal defense against Roofer?
- (2) Will Lender be able to enforce the note against Sister given Lender's partial release of collateral against Brother?
- (3) Will Sister have a right of reimbursement against Brother?

DISCUSSION

Point One (15-25%)

Lender can enforce the note against Brother because Lender was a holder in due course. Therefore, Lender took the note free of Brother's claim in recoupment.

As the maker and issuer of the note, Brother is obligated under Uniform Commercial Code § 3-412 to pay the instrument according to its terms to any person, such as Lender, who is entitled to enforce the instrument. UCC § 3-301 (person entitled to enforce the instrument includes the holder of the instrument). However, Brother's obligation to pay the instrument is not absolute. Sections 3-305(a)(2) and (a)(3) say that the right to enforce an obligation of a party on the instrument is subject to any defense that would be available on a simple contract as well as to claims in recoupment arising from the underlying transaction. In an action by Lender to enforce the note, Brother could raise a claim in recoupment based on Roofer's poor roofing job.

The rules of § 3-305(a), however, are specifically made subject to § 3-305(b), which says that a holder in due course is not subject to the contract defenses described in § 3-305(a)(2). Lender should qualify as a holder in due course under § 3-302(a)(2) since it took the instrument for value, in good faith, and without notice of any claims to the instrument. Therefore, Lender should take free of Brother's claim in recoupment and should be able to enforce the note in full against Brother.

Lender's ability to recover on the note from Sister is reduced by $2,000, the extent to which Lender impaired Sister's right of recourse by releasing its collateral interest in one of Brother's computers.

Because Sister received no direct benefit for signing the note, Sister is an accommodation party on the note. UCC § 3-419(a). Even though Sister is an accommodation party, she is still liable in the capacity that she signed, here as an indorser. UCC § 3-419(b). Sister's obligation to pay the instrument as an indorser is not affected by her accommodation status except to the extent of the special provisions regarding accommodation party discharges contained in § 3-605. UCC § 3-419(c). As an indorser, Sister is obligated to pay the amount due to Lender, if Brother, as maker, were to dishonor the note and proper notice of dishonor were given to Sister. UCC §§ 3-415(a) & (c); § 3-503(a).

However, if a person entitled to enforce the instrument impairs the value of the collateral that secures the instrument's obligation, then an accommodation party having a right of recourse against the obligor is discharged to the extent of the impairment. UCC § 3-605(e). In this case, Lender impaired the value of the collateral securing the instrument through its binding release of rights to one of Brother's three computers that secured Brother's obligation under the instrument. UCC § 3-605(g)(ii). Because Lender impaired the value of the collateral by $2,000, Lender's own rights to recover against Sister (which would have been $8,000) are reduced to $6,000. UCC § 3-605(e).

Even though Lender is a holder in due course, Sister's partial discharge will still be effective against Lender. Since Sister's signature appeared on the back side of the note, her signature was an "anomalous indorsement" that gave notice to Lender and to any other later party that she was signing as an accommodation party. UCC § 3-419(c). Even putting aside Sister's anomalous indorsement, Lender knew that Sister was an indorser and therefore knew that Sister was a party with a right of recourse against Brother. UCC § 3-412 ("The obligation [of the issuer of a note] is owed to . . . an indorser who paid the instrument under Section 3-415") Although personal discharges such as Sister's here are not effective against holders in due course without notice of the discharge, UCC § 3-601(b), here the holder in due course had notice of Sister's right of discharge and in fact caused the partial discharge. Cf. UCC § 3-302(b) ("discharge is effective against a person who became a holder in due course with notice of the discharge").

For the same reason that Brother's obligation to Lender is not reduced, Sister's obligation to Lender is not reduced because of the shoddy roof job.

Point Three (15-25%)

Sister will have a right of reimbursement against Brother for the full amount that she pays Lender on the note.

Sister would have two different theories for recovering from Brother for any amount that Sister had to pay on the note to Lender. First, Sister signed in the capacity of an indorser. By that fact alone Sister has a right of recourse against Brother, the issuer of the note, if Sister has to pay a later holder of the note. UCC § 3-412. Second, if Sister had not signed as an indorser, she would nevertheless have a right of reimbursement against Brother because of her independent status as an accommodation party under UCC § 3-419(a). UCC § 3-419(e) ("An accommodation party who pays the instrument is entitled to reimbursement from the accommodated party and is entitled to enforce the instrument against the accommodated party.")

Legal Problems

- (1) (a) Is the March 2 will entitled to be probated because it was revived when Testator's September 10 will was revoked?
 - (b) Assuming the March 2 will is entitled to be probated, should $10,000 be distributed to Charity Y or was the bequest to Charity Y satisfied before Testator died by Testator's gift to the charity of $15,000 on February 1, 1990?
 - (c) Assuming the March 2 will is entitled to be probated, did Cory timely disclaim his interest in the $50,000 bequest and, if so, does the bequest pass to Gary or to the residuary legatees under Testator's will?
- (2) If the March 2 will was not revived, can the September 10 will be probated under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation and, if so, how will the estate be distributed?

DISCUSSION

Point One (a) (30-40%)

The March 2 will can be probated if State A permits a will that has been revoked by the execution of a later will to be revived if the later will is revoked. If the March 2, will, is revived, Andy and Billy take the residue but how the general bequests are distributed depends on the resolution of two separate issues.

The execution of the September 10 will revoked the March 2 will under the laws of all states. Under the common law, however, the later revocation of the second will revives the first will. This rule followed from the principle that wills only speak at the time of death and, since the second will was revoked and therefore is a nullity, only the prior will had legal effect. Because of the belief that the common-law rule frustrated the intent of testators who revoked the later will with the intent of dying intestate, many states adopted statutes rejecting the common-law revival rule. These statutes can take at least two forms. One is that the revocation of the second will does not revive the earlier will. See, e.g., Iowa Code § 633.284. The other form, as exemplified by the Uniform Probate Code § 2-509(a), is that the revocation of the second will does not revive the earlier will unless "it is evident from the circumstances of the revocation of the subsequent will or from the testator's contemporary or subsequent declarations that the testator intended the previous will to take effect as executed."

A will may be revoked by a cancellation. See generally Unif. Prob. Code § 2-507. When revoking the September 10 will by cancellation, the result of writing "VOID" across the face of the will, Testator explicitly indicated that he preferred his March 2 will. This statement is evidence of his intent to revive the earlier will. Thus, either under the common-law revival rule or a statutory substitute incorporating an intent standard, the March 2 will is entitled to be probated. Only if State A has an absolute no-revival rule would the March 2 will not be entitled to be probated.

If the March 2 will is probated, then $10,000 should be distributed to Charity Y. Testator's lifetime gift to Charity Y is not a gift in satisfaction of this general bequest.

Under the common law, if, subsequent to the execution of a will, a testator gives property to a person who is named as a general legatee in a will executed by the testator prior to the making of the gift, a rebuttable presumption arises that the testator intended the gift to be in satisfaction of the general legacy. This is known as the doctrine of "satisfaction" or "ademption by satisfaction" See generally W. McGovern, S. Kurtz & J. Rein, Wills, Trusts and Estates 30 (1988). The common-law rule is often abrogated or modified by statute. For example, under the Uniform Probate Code § 2-609(a)(ii), a gift to a legatee is not in satisfaction of the legacy unless the testator declared in a contemporaneous writing that he/she intended the gift to be in satisfaction of the bequest. In other states, the gift is not in satisfaction absent some writing evidencing testator's intent that the gift be in satisfaction of the bequest.

However, the ultimate result in this case is arguably the same whichever version of the doctrine applies because it appears Testator did not intend the $15,000 gift to be taken into account in determining the amount distributable to Charity Y under the will. This is evident from the language in the document found with the check that the $15,000 was one of many gifts and that Testator hoped to be in a position to make future gifts to Charity Y because the charity's work was so important to him. While it might be argued that the mere fact that Testator kept the check and note with his will evidences an intent that the gift of $15,000 be in satisfaction of the bequest, that argument seems weak in light of the more specific language on the note evidencing Testator's intent to continue making gifts to the charity.

Point One (c) (10-20%)

If the March 2 will is entitled to be probated Cory timely disclaimed his interest in the $50,000 bequest. The bequest should pass to his child, Gary.

The typical disclaimer statute provides that a disclaimer must be made within nine months of the testator's death. The nine-month period is typical because state disclaimer statutes are designed to comport with the federal disclaimer rules. See generally Int. Rev. Code § 2518(2). Since Cory disclaimed on October 30, 1998, Cory's disclaimer was made within nine months of Testator's death and therefore was timely.

The typical disclaimer statute further provides that if a timely disclaimer is made, the disclaimed property interest passes as if the disclaimant died before the testator. See, e.g., Unif. Prob. Code § 2-801(d)(1). In this case, the disclaimed property interest would pass in accordance with any applicable lapse statute to Cory's child, Gary. The lapse statute applies because (1) Cory is a descendant of Testator (a typical requirement of a lapse statute), (2) Cory has issue who survive Testator (another typical requirement of a lapse statute), and (3) Testator's will did not specially condition Cory's bequest on Cory surviving Testator. See generally J. Ritchie, N. Alford, R. Effland & J. Dobris, Decedent's Estates and Trusts 1021 (8th ed. 1993); cf. Unif. Prob. Code § 2-603 (applying the lapse statute, in some cases, even if the bequest is expressly conditioned on survivorship).

Point Two (35-45%)

If the March 2 will was not revoked, then the September 10 will is entitled to be probated under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation (DRR) if it is established that Testator would have preferred the disposition in the September 10 will to intestacy. Otherwise, Testator died intestate.

The March 2 will was revoked by the execution of the September 10 will regardless of whether the latter will was revoked. See generally Unif. Prob. Code § 2-507(a)(1). If the March 2 will is not revoked, either the revocation of the September 10 will is ignored under DRR or Testator died intestate. Most likely Testator died intestate.

If a valid will is revoked by a physical act (such as cancellation) under Testator's mistaken belief that in doing so Testator could revive an earlier will, the revocation of the will can be ignored under DRR. Because DRR is an intent-effectuating doctrine, it applies only when the court determines that the testator would prefer the disposition in the revoked will to that resulting from a determination that the testator died intestate. See generally Estate of Alburn 18 Wis.2d 340, 118 N.W.2d 919 (1963). Courts are more likely to apply DRR if the distribution of the estate using DRR approximates more closely the distribution testator actually intended than the distribution that would occur if DRR did not apply. When that is not the case, courts are more likely to reject using DRR.

For example, if the intended revocation of the September 10 will is ignored using DRR and, thus, that will is entitled to probate, Testator's entire $100,000 estate would be distributed equally to Andy and Billy. Cory, on the other hand, would take nothing. Alternatively, if the September 10 will is revoked and DRR is not applied, Testator would be deemed to have died intestate and Testator's entire estate would be distributed in equal thirds to Andy, Billy, and to Cory, since Cory's disclaimer did not apply to any intestate share.

It would appear that a distribution of $33,000, $33,000, and $33,000 to Andy, Billy, and Cory (ignoring DRR and using intestacy) approximates more closely what Testator actually intended—$50,000 to Cory, $10,000 to Charity Y, $20,000 to Andy and $20,000 to Billy, which was the distribution under the March 2 will—than a distribution of $50,000 to Andy and $50,000 to Billy (applying DRR and distributing the estate under the September 10 will). Here, Cory gets less than intended but at least something, while Andy and Billy get somewhat more than Testator intended. Thus, not applying DRR arguably more closely approximates Testator's intent. Of course, this is a close question, and examinees could argue either way.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure IV.F, VA, VI C)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Does the district court have the power to issue a pretrial order that dictates the order in which issues will be tried to a jury?
- (2) Was the court justified procedurally in granting the motion for judgment as a matter of law before the close of evidence?
- (3) Was the court justified substantively in granting the motion for judgment as a matter of law?

DISCUSSION

Point One (25-35%)

Under Rule 16, the district court has the power to enter a pretrial order that specifies the order in which issues will be tried.

Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure gives district court judges the power to structure trials in a manner that facilitates their expedited disposition. In particular, Rule 16(c) empowers courts to take action to simplify potentially difficult or complex litigation. Rule 16(c)(14) specifically authorizes courts to direct the parties “to present evidence early in the trial with respect to a manageable issue that could, on the evidence, be the basis for a judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50(a).” This language offers ample support for the court’s decision to require Claimant to present evidence of Fiberco exposure early to facilitate a motion for judgment as a matter of law.

Point Two (25-35%)

A motion for judgment as a matter of law may be granted before the close of evidence if the opposing party has been fully heard on the dispositive issue.

Rule 50 simplifies and clarifies federal practice on what were once called motions for directed verdicts, bringing the practice into line with that on motions for summary judgment. In brief, Rule 50 permits a party like Fiberco to move for judgment as a matter of law at any time during the course of a jury trial if the opposing party “has been fully heard” on an issue. Fed. R. Civ. P. 50(a)(1). Thus, Claimant’s indication that the testimony of BrakeCo’s manager concluded his proof on the issue of exposure to Fiberco asbestos suggests that the motion for judgment as a matter of law was procedurally proper at the time it was made. Fiberco was not required to await submission of Claimant’s entire case to make a procedurally proper motion for judgment as a matter of law, and the trial court is not obliged to wait before ruling on it.

Point Three (25-35%)

A motion for judgment as a matter of law is properly granted when it is clear that there is no legally sufficient basis for a verdict in favor of the nonmoving party.

It also appears that the court correctly resolved the motion in Fiberco's favor. Rule 50 specifies the standard for the grant of a motion for judgment as a matter of law, indicating that such motions may be granted whenever "there is no legally sufficient evidentiary basis for a reasonable jury to find for" the nonmoving party. Fed. R. Civ. P. 50(a)(1). In this case, the problem specifies that the relevant jurisdiction has rejected the so-called market share theory of liability and places the burden on the plaintiff to produce specific evidence establishing exposure to the defendant's asbestos product. While the manager's testimony places Fiberco products in the firm's storeroom, it does not establish that the products were there at the time Wife worked at the firm. One can argue that the presence of Fiberco products at one point in time provides evidentiary support for an inference that they were there on other occasions as well. However, the manager appears to negate that inference with the admission that he had never seen the Fiberco products in the storeroom until after Wife's employment had ended. Claimant might have attempted to bolster his case with other evidence of Fiberco exposure, either through company records or other testimony. In failing to do so, Claimant appears to have failed to provide evidence sufficient to support a rational jury verdict in his favor on the issue of Fiberco exposure.

Legal Problems

- (1) Are restrictions on a shareholder's ability to transfer stock of a close corporation that require the consent of all other shareholders to the transfer and the transferee enforceable against a transferring shareholder?
- (2) Are restrictions on a shareholder's ability to transfer stock of a close corporation that require the consent of all other shareholders to the transfer and the transferee enforceable against a third party that lacks notice?
- (3) Will a court order the dissolution of Store to protect the minority shareholders?

DISCUSSION

Point One (35-45%)

Restrictions on the transfer of stock that require approval of the transfer and transferee by all other shareholders are generally enforceable as long as the restrictions are created for reasonable purposes.

As a general rule, share transfer restrictions are invalid if they are unreasonable restraints on alienation of stock. Thus, an absolute restraint on alienation of stock is per se unreasonable and void. Usually, however, courts will permit share transfer restrictions if they are adopted for a lawful purpose. Lawful purposes include keeping a corporation closely held or keeping a corporation in the family. H. Henn & J. Alexander, Laws of Corporations § 281, at 756-58 (3d ed. 1983).

The share transfer restriction described in the facts requires the consent of all other shareholders and the approval by such shareholders of the proposed transferee. Consent restraints, such as this one, are among the most restrictive stock transfer restraints because they make stock unassignable if one shareholder refuses to vote to approve the transfer. The courts are split on the enforceability of consent restrictions. Some jurisdictions have considered such a restriction to be tantamount to an absolute restraint on alienation, manifestly unreasonable and void. See Hill v. Warner, Berman & Spitz P.A., 197 N.J. Super. 152, 484 A.2d 344 (1984); Rafe v. Hindin, 29 A.D.2d 481, 288 N.Y.S.2d 662 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. 1968), aff'd, 23 N.Y.2d 759, 296 N.Y.S.2d 955 (1968). Other jurisdictions, however, have enforced transfer restrictions of this type. See Gray v. Harris Land & Cattle Co., 227 Mont. 51, 737 P.2d 475 (1987); Benson v. RMJ Securities Corp. 683 F. Supp. 359 (SDNY 1988); Henn & Alexander, Laws of Corporations at 759; Del. Gen. Corp. Law § 202(c)(3). Modern statutory law frequently permits many types of restrictions on the transfer of stock. The Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA) permits restrictions established in a corporation's "articles of incorporation, bylaws, an agreement among shareholders, or an agreement between shareholders and the corporation." RMBCA § 6.27(a). "A restriction on the transfer or registration of transfer of shares is authorized for any . . . reasonable purpose." RMBCA § 6.27(c)(3). The RMBCA also provides that a stock transfer restriction may “require the corporation, the holders of any class of its shares, or another person to approve the transfer of the restricted shares, if the requirement is not manifestly unreasonable.” RMBCA § 6.27(d)(3).

An initial determination must be made as to whether the restriction on transfer is reasonable and therefore enforceable against Dave, a shareholder. Arguably, it is not manifestly unreasonable to allow family members to approve new shareholders so they can keep control in the family or in people acceptable to the family. Therefore, the restriction would be enforceable against Dave. Alternatively, it could be argued that the restriction would not be enforceable because the restriction might unreasonably result in the current shareholders never having the right to transfer their shares in Store.

Point Two (10-15%)

Restrictions on the transfer of stock would be enforceable against Bank if it had actual knowledge of the restrictions and would not be enforceable against Bank if it did not.

Assuming that the share transfer restriction is enforceable against Dave, it must be determined whether the restriction is binding on Bank. Both the RM BCA and the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) address the issue of whether the share transfer restrictions are binding on third parties to whom restricted stock is conveyed. The RMBCA states:

A restriction on the transfer or registration of shares is valid and enforceable against the holder or a transferee of the holder if the restriction is authorized by this section and its existence is noted conspicuously on the front or back of the certificate. . . . Unless so noted, a restriction is not enforceable against a person without knowledge of the restriction. RMBCA § 6.27(b).

Section 8-204(1) of the UCC similarly provides that a stock transfer restriction is invalid unless the restriction is noted conspicuously on the stock certificate.

The facts state that Store’s Articles of Incorporation provide for the share transfer restrictions. Therefore, the restriction is “authorized” as required by the RMBCA. RMBCA § 6.27(a)(b). However, the facts do not indicate whether the transfer restriction is conspicuously noted on the stock certificates. Therefore, it is not clear whether Bank knew of the share transfer restriction on the Store stock that Dave had pledged to the Bank. If the restriction is conspicuously noted on the certificates, the restriction is valid and enforceable against Bank. If it is not conspicuously noted, the restriction is enforceable only if Bank had actual notice of it through other means. Because the facts are silent as to whether Bank had knowledge of the restriction, it cannot be determined whether the restrictions are enforceable against Bank.

Point Three (45-55%)

A court is likely to order the dissolution of Store in order to protect the minority shareholders from oppressive conduct by the majority.

In this case, the directors and controlling shareholders may have embarked upon a plan to freeze out Dave, the minority shareholder. The plan appears to have two elements: to deprive Dave of a voice in management and to eliminate shareholder dividends while increasing salaries to the majority shareholders and the directors.

The RMBCA permits courts to intervene in the affairs of closely held corporations under limited circumstances. A court may dissolve a corporation “in a proceeding by a shareholder if it is established that... the directors or those in control of the corporation have acted, are acting, or will act in a manner that is illegal, oppressive or fraudulent.” RMBCA § 14.30(2)(ii).

The issue here is whether the conduct of Anne, Bob, and Clyde, the majority shareholders, is “illegal, oppressive or fraudulent.” Shareholder dividends were eliminated while directors’ and employees’ compensation was dramatically increased, and the minority shareholder was given no voice in management. It appears that the directors and controlling shareholders are attempting to pay to themselves what had formerly been regarded as corporate profits.

The majority shareholders will argue that they have a right to accumulate profits, that dividends are usually discretionary and within the business judgment of the board of directors, and that their actions had a legitimate business purpose. Henn & Alexander, supra, § 327, at 913-14. Nonetheless, the combination of eliminating dividends while substantially increasing the compensation of majority shareholders in their capacities as directors and employees of the corporation raises the issue of whether the minority shareholders have been oppressed.

The standard for oppressive conduct is not clearly established. Some courts define oppression as violating the reasonable expectations of shareholders, “One of the most significant trends in the law of close corporations in recent years is the increasing willingness of courts to look to the reasonable expectations of shareholders to determine whether ‘oppression’ or similar grounds exist as a justification for involuntary dissolution or another remedy.” F. Hodge O’Neal & Robert Thompson, Close Corporations § 9.30, at 9-141 (1988).

Many courts have taken an alternative approach, finding that in closely held corporations, controlling shareholders have a higher fiduciary duty to minority shareholders than in publicly held corporations. See Nelson v. Martin and Gammon, 1996 Tenn. App. Lexis 63; Henn & Alexander, supra, § 268, at 735. Under such a view, majority shareholders “are required to deal fairly, honestly and openly with minority shareholders and may not use their corporate control to prevent the minority from having an equal opportunity in the corporation.” Nelson v. Martin and Gammon, 1996 Tenn. App. Lexis 63, citing W&W Equipment Co., Inc. v. Mink, 568 N.E. 2d 564, 570 (Ind. Ct. App. 1991). In addition, some courts have held directors in a closely held corporation to higher fiduciary duties than those of directors in public corporations. Henn & Alexander, supra, § 276, at 747.

Whether the standard is reasonable expectations of shareholders or the duty of good faith and loyalty from majority to minority shareholders, it is clear that attempts to freeze out minority shareholders are oppressive if the majority shareholders profit from the corporation to the detriment of minority shareholders. If what is properly a dividend is converted to salary for majority shareholders, the expectations of the minority shareholders have been frustrated and the obligations of the majority shareholders have been breached, thereby justifying judicial dissolution.

The RMBCA provides that if a proceeding is started to dissolve a corporation, the corporation may terminate the action if it, or a shareholder, purchases the complaining shareholder’s shares for fair value. RMBCA § 14.34(a).

Thus, Dave, the minority shareholder, is likely to get a court-ordered dissolution of Store. The corporation or any of its shareholders may choose to purchase Dave’s stock to stop the proceeding.

FAMILY LAW ANALYSIS

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Can the child consent to surgery or is parental consent required?
- (2) Can a court order an operation over the objection of the parents, even when the parents' objections are based on their religious beliefs?
- (3) Must the child obey the parents' commands about the child's religious education?

DISCUSSION

Point One (25-35%)

Parental consent is required for Fred's surgery because his situation does not fit any of the usual exceptions to the general rule that the parent, not the child decides what medical care the child should receive.

A doctor who performs surgery on a minor child without the parents' consent is liable in tort. Homer Clark, The Law of Domestic Relations in the United States § 9.3 (2d ed. 1988). There are exceptions to this general rule, but none applies here. For example, consent is not necessary in emergency cases when there is no time to obtain parental consent. And, by statute, most states do not require parental consent for particular types of medical care, usually related to public health concerns, such as treatment for venereal disease (although sometimes even these statutes exempt children whose parents object to treatment on religious grounds). Some states, by statute or case law, make an exception to the parental consent requirement for older children, either specifying an age or indicating that the minor must be mature. Typically, however, the "mature minor" must be near the age of majority, and the medical procedure must not be major. Leslie Harris, Lee Teitelbaum, & Carol Weisbrod Family Law 985 (1996). Since none of these exceptions fits these facts, Fred's consent is not sufficient and parental consent is necessary.

Point Two (35-45%)

Although a court can order medical treatment for the child over the objections of the parents when the medical treatment is urgently needed to prevent serious harm to the child's health, even when the parents' objections are based on their religious beliefs, the court would probably not do so here.

Under the parens patriae authority of the state, the state can intervene to protect children when parents deny them needed medical care. The child labor case, Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944), is often cited to support the state's right to protect children. "Parents may be free to become martyrs themselves. But it does not follow they are free ... to make martyrs of their children." Id. at 170. Generally, if a parent fails to provide needed medical care, a child can be adjudicated neglected and the state can order the medical treatment. In addition, many states have exemptions to the abuse and neglect statutes that allow the state to order the medical care without a finding of parental fault if the parents object to the child's treatment on religious grounds. Homer Clark, The Law of Domestic Relations in the United States § 9.3 (2d ed. 1988).

When parents object to the medical care, however, the concept of "need" is interpreted narrowly. Here, no strong facts are presented that the care is "needed," because Fred does not face imminent death or serious injury. The medical condition is not life threatening and can be postponed until Fred is an adult. In these medical treatment cases, the courts weigh the risks and benefits of treatment. The strongest facts for ordering the operation are that Fred will suffer some physical damage and is suffering psychological harm that is having a negative impact on his school performance. In addition, Fred wants the surgery. On the other hand, the state has a strong respect for parents' autonomy, the parents are concerned about the risks inherent in the surgery, and the parents' religious beliefs are a major basis for their objection. On balance, a court would probably not order that Fred's surgery proceed. Nonetheless, even where the child is not in imminent danger, some courts will order medical treatment, notwithstanding the parents' religious objections. Leslie Harris, Lee Teitelbaum, & Carol Weisbrod, Family Law 982 (1996).

Point Three (20-30%)

The right of parents to direct the upbringing of their child includes control over the child's religious education, and children have a duty to obey their parents.

Parents generally have a right to raise their children as they see fit. Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972) (compulsory education case). A child who fails to follow parental commands is disobedient, and the state seeks to reinforce the parents' control over their child, not undermine it. Leslie Harris, Lee Teitelbaum, & Carol Weisbrod, Family Law 1484-85 (1996). The state would have authority to intervene only if the parents' commands were so extreme as to constitute abuse or neglect. Here, the requirement that Fred attend religious services once per week and follow his parents' religion is not likely to rise to that level. Thus, Fred must obey his parents' instructions with respect to religious services.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS/SALES ANALYSIS

(Secured Transactions IV.J, V.A; Sales IV.E, V.B)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Who has the superior claim to personal property, a previous owner from whom the property was stolen or a good faith purchaser for value?
- (2) May a secured party with a security interest in accounts and/or chattel paper require the obligors on the accounts to pay it directly upon the default of the debtor on the secured obligation?
- (3) May an account debtor raise defenses arising out of the underlying sales contract against the obligee of the account or assignees?

DISCUSSION

Point One (30-40%)

An owner of stolen property may recover that property from a subsequent purchaser without reimbursing the purchaser and regardless of the purchaser's good faith in the transaction in which the purchaser acquired the property.

Section 2-403 of the Uniform Commercial Code adopts the common-law principle of nemo dat: no one can give or sell what he does not have. Thus, under Article 2, a purchaser of goods acquires only that title "which his transferor had or had power to transfer."

On the facts of this problem, the cedar chest was stolen from Owner. The thief who stole it had no title and no power to transfer title. Any purchaser from the thief would therefore acquire no title. Subsequent purchasers would likewise acquire only such title as their transferors had, i.e., no title.

There are exceptions to the nemo dat rule. In particular, good faith purchasers for value are sometimes able to acquire good title even if their transferors had no title or defective title. See, e.g. UCC § 2-403(1), (2). However, the facts of this problem do not raise even a possibility of applying any of the recognized protections for good faith purchasers. In particular, the protection granted to buyers in the ordinary course from merchants who deal in goods of the kind purchased (e.g., the antique dealer in this problem) applies only if the goods were entrusted to the merchant by the true owner. Nothing of the sort happened in this problem.

Consequently, Owner will prevail in the replevin action, and Purchaser will be forced to give up the cedar chest with no reimbursement from Owner for payments already made to Dealer. Purchaser's remedy is against Dealer.

Point Two (30-40%)

After default by the principal debtor, a secured party with a security interest in accounts or chattel paper is entitled to collect payments directly from the account debtors.

The obligation owed by Purchaser to Dealer under the installment sales contract is either an account or chattel paper (if the installment sales contract includes a provision creating a security interest in favor of Dealer). In either case, Uniform Commercial Code § 9-502 permits a secured party to “notify an account debtor ... to make payment” when the account creditor (Dealer) is in default on the secured obligation. The purpose is to permit a party whose financing is secured by accounts or chattel paper to “liquidate by collecting whatever may become due on the collateral.” UCC § 9-502, cmt. 1. The account debtor must, after notification from the secured party, make payments directly to the secured party rather than to the defaulting debtor, at least insofar as there is no question about the legitimacy of the secured party’s claim. See UCC § 9-318(3) (after notice of assignment of an account and that payment is to be made to assignee, account debtor must pay assignee, subject to account debtor’s right to demand proof of the assignment). See generally James J. White & Robert S. Summers, Handbook on the Uniform Commercial Code—Practitioners’ Edition § 3 4-5 (a) (4th ed. 1995).

Dealer’s statements to Purchaser did not deny that Bank had a security interest or that Dealer was in default. Dealer simply denied that Bank had collection rights. Article 9, however, clearly grants Bank such rights in the event of Dealer’s default, even if the security agreement does not give Bank collection rights. UCC § 9-502(1). Consequently, Purchaser should make payments to Bank and not to Dealer.

Point Three (30-40%)

Purchaser has a breach of warranty claim against Dealer. This claim may be asserted against either Dealer or Bank as a defense to payment on the installment sales contract. Thus, Purchaser is not liable for payments to either Dealer or Bank.

As the facts make clear, Dealer had no title to the cedar chest that was sold to Purchaser. Under § 2-312 of the Uniform Commercial Code, every seller of goods makes a warranty of good title to the buyer, unless that warranty is “excluded or modified only by specific language or by circumstances” that put the buyer on notice that the seller claims no title. Nothing in these facts indicates any exclusion or modification of the warranty of good title.

Purchaser’s remedies in the case of breach of warranty of good title for accepted goods include revocation of acceptance and include recovery for “the loss resulting in the ordinary course of events from the seller’s breach.” UCC § 2-714(1). In this case, of course, Purchaser has lost the cedar chest and its full value. This loss is an ample defense to any attempt on the part of Dealer to recover further payments on the installment sales contract. This argument can also be effectively couched in terms of failure of consideration, with the same result.

Bank’s efforts to collect on the installment sales contract are also subject to Purchaser’s claim against Dealer for losses due to Dealer’s breach of the warranty of title. Section 9-318 of the Code provides that any assignee of accounts or chattel paper is subject to “any defense or claim arising” out of the contract between the account debtor and the assignor unless the account debtor has agreed not to assert defenses. On our facts, no such agreement is indicated. An assignee-secured creditor exercising collection rights under UCC § 9-502 is subject to the account debtor’s defenses under § 9-318, just as any other assignee would be subject to those defenses. See James J. White & Robert S. Summers, supra, at § 34-5(b). Accordingly, Purchaser has no obligation to pay Bank.

TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Does the trust violate the common-law Rule Against Perpetuities?
- (2) (a) Are Cousin's children Adam (who was alive when Grantor created the trust), Ellen (born after Grantor's death), and Doris (a minor adopted child) included in the class gift of a remainder interest in the trust?
 - (b) When, if at all, will Cousin's children be entitled to receive their shares?

DISCUSSION

Point One (10-15%)

The trust does not violate the common-law Rule Against Perpetuities.

The trust does not violate the Rule Against Perpetuities. Since the trust was revocable, the period of the rule begins to run from Grantor's death, not the date the inter vivos trust was created. At Grantor's death, Cousin was a life in being, and the non-vested interest created in Cousin's children vests or fails to vest no later than 21 years after Cousin dies. Thus, the non-vested interest vests within the permissible perpetuity period of lives in being plus 21 years. Brother's interest does not violate the Rule because the interest vests immediately at Grantor's death.

In some states, the common-law Rule Against Perpetuities has been repealed by statute. In such states, all interests in the trust would be valid.

Point Two (a) (40-50%)

Cousin's children Adam (who was alive at the time the trust was created) and Ellen (who was born after Grantor's death) are members of the class of "Cousin's children" and have remainder interests in the trust. Cousin's adopted child, Doris, also likely qualifies as a member of the class.

Grantor created a class gift in a contingent remainder when she created an interest in "Cousin's children who attain age 21." A class gift is a gift to a group of people collectively described, typically by reference to their relationship to a common ancestor, rather than a gift to named individuals. A class gift by its nature is capable of passing to multiple takers. The nature of a class gift is that the class membership, i.e., persons who may share in the gift, may fluctuate over time. Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 136-37 (2d ed. 1984). At issue is the identity of the members of the class. This class consists of all of Cousin's children who join the class before it closes. However, only those class members who reach age 21 are entitled to a share of the property. See Point Two(b).

Cousin's child, Adam, who was alive at the time Grantor created the trust, is included in the gift of the remainder interest in the trust as of the time the gift was created. However, because the gift is a future interest, not an immediate gift, the class gift remains open until Brother's death, when the class closes. As long as the class remains open, new members may join the class.

Therefore, since Cousin's other biological child, Ellen, was born prior to Brother's death and while the class was open, she is also a class member. Bergin & Haskell, supra, at 145.

The more difficult question is whether Doris, who is Cousin's adopted child, also is included in the class. While adopted children generally inherit from their adoptive parents, under the "stranger to the adoption" rule they were, until very recently, excluded from class gifts created by someone who did not know of the adoption and was not the adopting parent. Id. at 233-234.

Today, however, in many states, adopted children are more likely than they were in the past to be included in class gifts created by persons other than their parents. However, states differ in the criteria used for their inclusion in a class gift. For example, in states that follow the Uniform Probate Code, adopted children qualify as part of a class of "children" only if they "lived while a minor as a regular member of the household" of the named parent, unless the governing instrument indicates a contrary intent. UPC § 2-705 (and official comment). Under the UPC, Doris is likely to be included because she is under 21 and lives in Cousin's household.

In non-UPC states that have rejected the "stranger to the adoption" rule, an adopted child is included in a class gift created by someone other than the adopting parent on the theory that such child has been brought into the family of the adopting parent for all purposes and that society no longer distinguishes between adopted and biological children. In such states, adopted children are included in a class gift unless the governing instrument provides otherwise. See generally William M. McGovern, Jr., Sheldon F. Kurtz, & Jan Ellen Rein, Wills, Trusts, and Estates 46-59 (1988). In light of these modern reforms, it is most likely that Doris, Cousin's adopted child, will be included in the class gift since she was adopted before the class closed.

Depending on which of Cousin's children, as a group, qualify for an interest in the trust, those children, as earlier noted, acquired a contingent remainder in the trust. Two contingencies existed: (1) being born or adopted (becoming a child of Cousin) before the class closes and (2) attaining the age of 21. Once a child of Cousin reaches 21, that child's interest becomes vested, subject to open, i.e., subject to partial divestment by other children of Cousin. Once vested, the child is assured of obtaining a share of the trust principal because no other contingencies are stated, such as survival to any particular time, including the time for distribution. As more children attain the age of 21, the share of each becomes smaller because all the children in the class when it finally closes will ultimately share equally. Until the class closes, more potential class members may enter the class as they are born, but they may drop out of the class by not attaining the age of 21. Thus, the size of the class membership may fluctuate. Id.

Point Two (b) (35-45%)

Under the "rule of convenience," Adam may receive distribution of a pro rata portion of the principal of the trust at Brother's death since Adam has then fulfilled the condition precedent of attaining age 21 and there is then no outstanding present possessory estate. Ellen and Doris will receive their shares only if they reach age 21.

Although Brother has died, Cousin is still living and may have more children. Thus, the class of "Cousin's children" will not close physiologically until Cousin's death. However, absent any contrary intent of Grantor, the rule of convenience, which is a rule of construction, will close the class when any class member has a right to demand possession. Once a class closes, no new members can join the class.

A class member can demand possession of his share if there is no outstanding present possessory estate and the class member's interest is not subject to the happening of any unfulfilled condition precedent. Once the class closes, no new class members will be permitted to enter and take a share of the gift, although some may drop out of the class by failing to attain 21.

“The rule strikes a balance between a donor’s desire to include all possible members of the class and the desire to allow distribution to those who have qualified to take. It also avoids the administrative problems that would develop if living beneficiaries took property, subject to giving some back as new class members appeared.” Roger W. Andersen, Understanding Trusts and Estates 233.

Under the rule of convenience, Adam can demand a share at Brother’s death because both life tenants, Grantor and Brother, are dead, and Adam is a child of Cousin who has attained the age of 21. Adam will be entitled to a share of the trust principal in proportion to the total number of Cousin’s qualifying children who are currently living. At the time the class closes, there are two (or three) members of the class since they were born (or adopted) before the class closed. If either Ellen or Doris attains age 21, she will receive her proportionate share. If either of them fails to attain age 21, she falls out of the class and Adam (and the other member who has attained 21) will also receive a pro rata portion of that deceased class member’s share. If Cousin has additional children after the class closes, those children will not be permitted to share in the trust because the class will have closed prematurely under the rule of convenience. Preface

This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2001 and July 2001 Multistate Essay Examinations. Each test includes seven questions; most jurisdictions that use the MEE select the six questions their applicants will answer.

The model analyses to the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. These models are not an official grading guide. Some jurisdictions grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses as they wish, including the suggested weights given to particular points. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topic or topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by Roman numerals which refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that topic. For example, Question 1 on the February 2001 MEE tested Decedents' Estates II.I, will construction problems, II.A, execution requirements, and II.F, revocation. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet and can also be found at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE is a three-hour examination consisting of six questions. The examination is administered in one continuous three-hour time period. Applicants are expected to spend approximately thirty minutes answering each of the questions. The areas of law covered by the questions in the examination are: Agency and Partnership, Commercial Paper, Conflict of Laws, Corporations, Decedents' Estates, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Sales, Secured Transactions, and Trusts and Future Interests. Some questions include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You will have three hours in which to write your answers to six of the seven questions contained in this booklet; you will be told which of the questions you are to answer. Each question is designed to be answered in thirty minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts which are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show: an understanding of the facts; a recognition of the issues included; the applicable principles of law; and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Some jurisdictions instruct applicants to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

Testator's last will included the following four dispositive provisions:

1. I leave my family portrait painted by Painter to my sister, Susan.
2. I leave $100,000 each to my child Leslie, my child Doris, and my wife, Wendy.
3. I leave $40,000 to my brother, Ben, and direct that my stamp collection be sold to satisfy this bequest.
4. I leave the balance of my estate to the trustees of my alma mater, University.

Testator's will was signed by Testator and witnessed by Testator's brother, Ben, and by Testator's accountant, Aaron.

Two years after the will was executed, Testator and Wendy divorced. As a result of their property settlement agreement incident to that divorce, Testator transferred $200,000 to Wendy. That agreement imposed no further obligations on Testator.

Testator never remarried. Three years after the divorce, Testator died a domiciliary of State A. He was survived by Leslie and Doris, his only heirs, and the other individual devisees named in his will. Testator's estate consisted of the family portrait valued at $2,000, the stamp collection valued at $20,000, and $110,000 on deposit at a local bank.

State A law provides that a will must be signed by the testator and witnessed by two witnesses. How should Testator's estate of $132,000 be distributed? Explain.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

Three siblings, Andrew, Brenda, and Charles, are equal partners in ABC Partnership, a general partnership, which owns and operates a 2,000-acre farm. ABC does not have a written partnership agreement. The three partners meet periodically to discuss ABC's business but do not hold formal partnership meetings.

Andrew lives on the farm and manages its day-to-day operations. Neither Brenda nor Charles lives on the farm. Brenda owns an accounting business in town and helps keep ABC's books and records. Charles has an irrigation business in town and helps maintain ABC's irrigation system.

Andrew spent $10,000 to purchase a disease-resistant hybrid seed for the farm. Ordinary seed would have cost $6,000. Andrew purchased the seed in ABC's name, but the $7,000 down payment for the seed was made using his own funds. Charles believes Andrew wasted money on this expensive seed because disease has never been a problem for ABC's farm. Charles is particularly concerned because the balance of the purchase price ($3,000) is due in a month, and ABC does not have sufficient funds to pay the bill. Brenda and Charles never authorized Andrew to buy the more expensive seed and did not ask him to advance his own money for the down payment.

Andrew spends about twice as much time as his siblings conducting ABC business. Andrew has demanded that ABC pay him for the value of his services, although there is no express agreement that any of the partners should be compensated for their services.

Andrew entered into a written agreement with XYZ Farms to swap 500 acres of ABC cropland for 1,000 acres of woodland owned by XYZ that Andrew thinks ABC could divide and develop for a residential subdivision. Charles disagrees with Andrew's plan and is upset that any land would be sold since, in the 50 years that the farm has been operated by the partners' family, no land has ever been transferred. Andrew defends the swap saying, truthfully, that he and Brenda had agreed to the transaction after all three partners had discussed it.

1. Is Charles liable for any part of the unpaid balance on the seed? Explain.
2. Is Andrew entitled to reimbursement from the partnership or the partners for the down payment he made on the seed? Explain.
3. Is Andrew entitled to be paid for the value of all or part of his services to ABC? Explain.
4. Is the land swap agreement with XYZ Farms binding on ABC? Explain.

COMMERCIAL PAPER QUESTION

Maker and Neighbor own adjacent properties. For several years, Maker deposited leaves and grass clippings in a compost pile located in Neighbor's yard without Neighbor's permission. After a number of unsuccessful efforts to convince Maker to remove the compost pile, Neighbor sued Maker for trespass.

In settlement of the suit, Maker agreed to remove the compost pile and to give Neighbor a promissory note for $1,000, payable on demand. Neighbor dismissed the lawsuit and, at the same time, Maker prepared, signed, and delivered to Neighbor a document that contained the following and nothing more:

I promise to pay $1,000 to the order of Neighbor. /s/Maker

Neighbor, who owed Bank an overdue debt of $900, got Bank to agree to accept Maker's note in full satisfaction of the overdue debt. Without notice to Maker, Neighbor wrote on the back of the note, "Pay to the order of Bank," signed it, and delivered it to Bank. Bank thereupon canceled the debt owed to it by Neighbor.

The following week, Maker removed the compost pile. At that time, Neighbor approached Maker and without presenting the note said, "I'm here to collect my $1,000." Maker, unaware of the transaction between Neighbor and Bank, paid Neighbor $1,000.

A few days later, Bank presented the note to Maker and demanded that Maker pay Bank $1,000. Maker refused to pay Bank, telling Bank that he had already paid Neighbor the $1,000.

1. Was Maker obligated to pay Neighbor when Neighbor demanded payment? Explain.
2. Was Maker obligated to pay Bank when Bank demanded payment? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Soon after Daughter was born to Father and Mother, Father was killed in an automobile accident. Mother found the economic pressures and time restraints of single parenthood overwhelming, and she began to drink heavily. Mother's friend, Caretaker, a childless widow making a comfortable living, began to help Mother financially and with frequent babysitting.

After a few months, Mother asked Caretaker if she would keep Daughter full time until Mother got her life back together. Caretaker agreed, and for the next four years Daughter lived with Caretaker. Mother, who had a serious alcohol problem and could not keep a job, visited Daughter only twice and contributed no money towards Daughter's support.

Six months ago, Mother joined Alcoholics Anonymous. Since that time, she has been sober, has found steady work, and has begun visiting Daughter more often. She wants Daughter, now five years old, to come back to live with her and insists that she never intended to relinquish Daughter to Caretaker permanently.

Caretaker, to whom Daughter is closely attached, has refused to return her. She believes that it is in Daughter's best interest to remain with her, because she and Daughter have a stable relationship and Caretaker is the only mother figure Daughter knows. A qualified child psychologist has evaluated Daughter and her relationships with Caretaker and Mother. The psychologist would testify that: (1) Daughter is bonded to Caretaker, who has become Daughter's psychological mother; (2) Daughter recognizes Mother and is not afraid of her but does not have a child-parent relationship with her; and (3) if Daughter were separated from Caretaker, she would certainly suffer short-term emotional harm and might suffer permanent emotional damage.

This jurisdiction's adoption statutes provide that a child cannot be adopted without the mother's consent unless the mother has abandoned the child. Caretaker has filed a petition to adopt Daughter, alleging that Mother had abandoned Daughter. In the alternative, Caretaker's petition seeks custody of Daughter. Finally, the petition asks for visitation rights in the event the requests for adoption and custody are denied. Mother opposes Caretaker's petition in all respects.

How should the court rule on Caretaker's petition? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

Victim, a resident of State A, suffered personal injuries in a fall that occurred when she was exiting a tour bus operated by Bus, Inc., a company incorporated under the laws of State B with its principal place of business in State B. At the time of the injury, Victim and other tour guests were sightseeing in State A.

Victim filed a complaint against Bus in federal district court in State B. The complaint alleged negligence and requested damages in the amount of $100,000 for Victim's medical expenses, lost wages, and pain and suffering. In its answer, Bus denied that it was negligent.

The federal district court in State B requires the initial disclosure provided for by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(a)(1).

After the pleadings closed and the deadline for initial disclosure of documents had passed, the parties engaged in formal discovery for several months. At no time during discovery did either party request or produce the tour ticket or any copy of it.

The federal district judge called a pretrial conference, ordering both counsel and litigants to appear "to discuss further scheduling and the possibility of settlement." No corporate representative of Bus attended the conference. When the judge raised the question of settlement and asked why no representative of Bus had appeared as required by the judge's order, counsel for Bus stated that Bus was unwilling to settle or even discuss settlement and argued that the court lacked authority to require Bus's participation. At that point, the judge held counsel and Bus in contempt for their refusal to participate in settlement discussions.

The final pretrial order, issued after the conference, identified the issues for trial as whether Bus had negligently maintained and operated the tour bus, whether such negligence caused Victim's injuries, and whether Victim's injuries were compensable in damages.

At trial, after the presentation of Victim's case in chief, Bus introduced the stub of the ticket used by Victim, which contained a "Waiver of Liability" clause. When Victim's counsel objected, the court sustained the objection, ruling that the waiver was beyond the scope of the final pretrial order and beyond the scope of the pleadings. Bus's counsel then moved to amend the answer and the pretrial order to include the question of waiver. The judge denied the motion. The jury ultimately returned a general verdict for Victim and awarded Victim full damages. The court entered judgment on the verdict.

Bus has appealed the contempt order on the ground that the trial judge lacked the power to order Bus to participate in settlement discussions. Bus has also appealed the judgment on the grounds that the trial judge erred in not allowing Bus to (1) amend the answer, (2) amend the pretrial order, and (3) introduce the waiver into evidence despite not having produced it earlier.

1. Should the contempt order be set aside on the ground urged by Bus? Explain.
2. Should the judgment be reversed on the grounds urged by Bus? Explain.

TRUSTS QUESTION

In 1998, Grantor created an irrevocable inter vivos trust naming Bank as trustee. The trust directed the trustee to pay the income to Grantor's child, Son, for life. The instrument further provided that upon Son's death, the trust principal should be distributed in equal shares to Son's surviving children. The trust instrument did not authorize the trustee to invade the trust principal for the benefit of Son.

At the time the trust was created, Son was divorced and was in some financial difficulties. Accordingly, Grantor included the following clause in the trust instrument:

The interest of any trust beneficiary, whether in the income or principal of the trust, shall not be capable of assignment, anticipation, or seizure by legal process. In particular, none of the trust income shall be used to satisfy any claim against any beneficiary for unpaid alimony or child support.

The trust principal consisted of 500 shares of XYZ Corporation common stock.

Prior to 1996, Son's former spouse, Wife, had obtained a judgment against him for $10,000 for unpaid alimony. In 1997, Creditor had obtained a judgment against Son for $20,000 for money it lent to Son to finance Son's failed business venture. Wife and Creditor seek to enforce their respective judgments against Son's interest in the trust.

In 2000, XYZ Corporation, which typically distributed dividends in cash, paid the trustee a stock dividend of one-tenth of a share of stock for each share the trust owned.

1. Can Creditor compel Bank to pay its claim against Son from either the trust's income or principal? Explain.
2. Can Wife compel Bank to pay her claim for unpaid alimony from either the trust's income or principal? Explain.
3. Can Son be compelled to pay the claims of Wife or Creditor from the trust income that is actually distributed to him from the trust? Explain.
4. Should Bank distribute the stock dividend to Son as income or retain the dividend as part of the trust principal? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

Acme Corp. has 100 shares of common stock authorized, issued, and outstanding. Each share is entitled to one vote. The corporate records show that these shares are owned equally by five shareholders: Brenda, Candace, David, Eric, and Fran.

Acme held its annual meeting of shareholders on March 25. The record date for the meeting was 20 days before the meeting, as permitted by applicable law. Acme gave proper notice of the meeting to all five shareholders.

Of the five shareholders of record, only Candace and Fran were present at the meeting. However, two other individuals, George and Henry, were also present. George handed to the corporate secretary a proxy signed by Brenda and dated the day before the meeting, authorizing George to vote Brenda's shares at the meeting. Henry had purchased Eric's shares the day before the meeting and produced evidence of a sale.

The Chair of the meeting declared that a quorum was present and that Candace, Fran, and George were entitled to vote at the meeting. However, the Chair declared that Henry was not entitled to vote at the meeting.

One of the items on the agenda was the election of directors. According to Acme's bylaws, three directors have to be elected at Acme's annual shareholders' meeting.

At the meeting, the votes for director were cast as follows:

Candace cast 20 votes for Candace, 20 votes for Fran, and 20 votes for David.
Fran cast 20 votes for Candace, 20 votes for Fran, and 20 votes for David.
George cast 20 votes for George, 20 votes for Brenda, and 20 votes for Henry.

Henry attempted to cast a ballot of 20 votes for George, 20 votes for Brenda, and 20 votes for Henry. However, the Chair refused to accept Henry's ballot. The Chair then declared that Candace, Fran, and David were elected as directors.

There are no provisions in the articles of incorporation or the bylaws of Acme that are relevant to the following questions.

1. Was Henry entitled to vote at the annual meeting and, if not, what could he have done to acquire the right to vote? Explain.
2. Was there a quorum present for shareholder action at the annual meeting? Explain.
3. Did Candace, Fran, and David receive sufficient votes to be elected as directors of Acme? Explain.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

Principal is an antiques dealer. As is common in the antiques business, Principal acquires inventory by using a group of buyers to purchase antiques on his behalf. Principal pays the buyers a percentage commission on the items they buy for Principal. Principal trains the buyers to be able to evaluate potential purchases and sends them into the field with specific instructions as to the items Principal wants them to buy. The buyers are given credentials identifying them as buyers for Principal, and they use these credentials to introduce themselves to potential sellers. The buyers, using Principal's contract forms, enter into contracts with sellers.

Agent, one of Principal's buyers, was sent out to purchase antiques for Principal. During the next several months, the following three transactions took place:

Using Principal's credentials, Agent bought an antique church bell for $3,500 from Bellseller, who believed that Agent was acting on behalf of Principal. The church bell was on Principal's acquisition list and the price was within the range authorized by Principal. However, Agent did not intend to purchase the bell for Principal. Instead, Agent bought the bell for Greta, a competing antiques dealer, who had agreed to pay Agent $250 to find such a bell. Agent's intention was to use Greta's money to pay for the bell. Greta rejected the bell. Principal, who has received a demand from Bellseller, has decided he does not want the bell and has refused to pay Bellseller.

Agent had a written authorization from Principal to buy several books, including Looking Backward by Edward Bellamy. Agent showed this authorization to Tomeseller, who had a first edition of Looking Backward. However, Agent did not tell Tomeseller that Principal had given Agent an oral instruction, not to be disclosed to anyone, that Agent should not pay more than $8,000 for the book. Agent bought the book on Principal's behalf for $12,500. Principal now refuses to pay Tomeseller.

When Principal learned of Agent's transactions with Bellseller and Tomeseller, he decided to stop using Agent as his buyer. Principal sent Agent a letter terminating his agency and asking Agent to return the credentials that Principal had provided to Agent.

Several days after Agent received the letter from Principal, Agent purchased for his own account a whale oil lamp for $5,000 from Lampseller. Agent told Lampseller that the purchase was for Principal's account, showed Lampseller his credentials from Principal, and purchased the lamp using the contract forms provided to him by Principal. Agent did not disclose to Lampseller that Principal had terminated Agent as his buyer. Principal now refuses to pay Lampseller because, at the time of the purchase, Principal had terminated Agent and Agent was no longer Principal's buyer.

Is Principal liable to:

1. Bellseller for the purchase of the church bell? Explain.
2. Tomeseller for the purchase of the book? Explain.
3. Lampseller for the purchase of the whale oil lamp? Explain.

TRUSTS QUESTION

Harry, a widower, and Wanda, residents of State A, decided to marry. Prior to the wedding ceremony, they signed a prenuptial agreement in which Wanda waived her right to receive alimony in the event of a divorce. The agreement further stated that “in consideration of this waiver, Harry shall establish an inter vivos trust of the first $1 million he inherits from his mother, with himself as trustee to pay the income to Wanda for life.” They agreed that Harry was free to designate any person to take the trust property at Wanda’s death.

Three years later, Harry’s mother died, leaving her substantial estate to him. In addition to Harry, her only surviving relatives were Charles, who is Harry’s child from his first marriage, and Mary and Pat, Harry’s two nieces.

Two months after his mother died, Harry orally declared himself trustee of $1 million. In making this oral declaration Harry stated: “I will pay all trust income to my wife, Wanda, for her life and, when she dies, if I don’t have any issue who survive me, then I or my successor should distribute the trust principal to my surviving nieces and nephews.” Harry did not state who would succeed him as the trustee if he died prior to the termination of trust.

Harry died two months ago at his home in State A. Until his death, he faithfully paid the trust income to Wanda. Harry was survived by Wanda and by Charles, Mary, and Pat. One month after Harry died, Wanda, who had recently inherited substantial property from her father, disclaimed her income interest in the trust property.

Under the laws of State A, Wanda’s disclaimer of her interest in the trust property is valid. In addition, under the intestacy laws of State A, any property distributable as part of Harry’s probate estate passes one-third to Wanda and two-thirds to Charles.

1. Was Harry’s promise in the prenuptial agreement to create a trust in the future for Wanda legally enforceable? Explain.
2. Was the trust Harry later created for Wanda validly created? Explain.
3. Assuming the trust for Wanda was validly created, did the trust terminate at Harry’s death because there was then no trustee? Explain.
4. Assuming the trust for Wanda was validly created, what is the effect of her valid disclaimer, and should the trust principal be immediately distributed and, if so, to whom? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

Arcade, Inc. is in the business of selling pinball machines. Arcade needed funds to buy furniture for its showroom. On February 1, Arcade borrowed $10,000 from Bank and signed a valid financing statement, which stated that it covered all of Arcade's "inventory now owned or hereafter acquired." Bank neglected to obtain a signed security agreement from Arcade but properly filed the financing statement in the correct locations on February 12.

On June 1, Arcade borrowed $40,000 for working capital from Finance and signed a valid security agreement granting to Finance a security interest in its "inventory now owned or hereafter acquired." Also on June 1, Arcade signed financing statements, which properly described the collateral. On June 5, Finance filed proper financing statements in the correct locations.

On July 1, Bank realized that it had failed to obtain a security agreement from Arcade. On that date and at Bank's request, Arcade signed a valid security agreement, properly describing the collateral as "inventory now owned or hereafter acquired."

On August 20, Arcade purchased three pinball machines from Supplier on credit. The three machines were set aside in Supplier's warehouse and tagged "Sold to Arcade." Supplier took a security interest in the three pinball machines to secure payment of the purchase price. Also on August 20, Arcade signed both a valid security agreement covering the three pinball machines and valid financing statements. Supplier filed the financing statements in the correct locations on August 21 and sent proper notice of its security interest to Bank and Finance, both of whom received and read the notice by August 25. Arcade took possession of the machines on August 31 and placed them in its showroom for sale to customers.

On October 1, Oscar purchased a pinball machine from Arcade. This machine was one of the three machines that Arcade had purchased from Supplier. Oscar had no actual knowledge of any of the security interests held by Arcade's creditors.

Arcade defaulted on its loans to Bank and Finance and failed to pay Supplier. At the time of the default, Arcade's inventory consisted only of the two remaining pinball machines that had been previously purchased from Supplier. Bank, Finance, and Supplier are all claiming security interests in the two remaining pinball machines, as well as in the pinball machine purchased by Oscar.

1. What is the order of priority among Bank, Finance, and Supplier in their respective claims to a security interest in the two remaining pinball machines left in Arcade's inventory? Explain.
2. Can Bank, Finance, or Supplier successfully enforce a security interest in the pinball machine purchased by Oscar? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

On May 18, 1997, Testator duly executed a typewritten will in the presence of three witnesses. The will contained only the following three paragraphs:

1. I give my watch to my brother, Ben.
2. I give my dining room table to my sister, Sarah.
3. I give the balance of my tangible personal property to the person named in a letter I signed and dated May 17, 1997, which I have placed in the desk in my home.

Testator died on January 2, 2000, a domiciliary of State A. The foregoing will was found in the desk in Testator's home. However, in paragraph 2 of the will, the phrase "dining room table" had been scratched out and immediately above it the word "automobile" was typed. And, on the back of the will, the following language appeared in Testator's handwriting: "I don't want Ben to have my watch. I want it to go to my first cousin, Chris." No signatures appeared on the back of the will beneath this writing.

The letter referred to in paragraph 3 of the will was found in the desk, and named Nicole, the daughter of Sarah, as the beneficiary.

Testator's only surviving blood relatives are Ben, Sarah, Chris, and Nicole. In addition to the watch, dining room table, and automobile, Testator left a $10,000 bank account.

State A permits wills to be completely or partially revoked by the execution of a subsequent will or codicil, by physical act or by cancellation, when accompanied by an intent to revoke. State A law also provides that "unsigned holographic wills or codicils are valid."

To whom should Testator's estate be distributed? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Father and Mother divorced one year ago after a 14-year marriage. At the time of the divorce, Mother and Father lived in State A. They were both 39 years old, each had a college education, and they had two children, aged 10 and 12.

As part of the divorce decree, the court awarded custody of the two children to Mother. The court also ordered Father to pay Mother $2,000 per month in child support. In addition, the court ordered Father to pay Mother $500 per month in spousal support for five years. After their property was divided, they each ended up with $50,000 and a car.

Mother continued living in State A with the children. Mother had been working full-time for $28,000 per year at a daycare center prior to the divorce. Five months after the divorce, she had a heart attack. This forced her to cut back to three-quarter-time work, resulting in a pay reduction to $21,000 per year. Her doctor recommends that she not resume full-time work, because full-time work and caring for the children and the home would be too stressful.

For the first six months after the divorce, Father paid Mother the full amount he owed; but, for the past six months, Father has paid Mother nothing. Three months ago, Father was terminated from his $100,000-per-year job because of company downsizing. He received a lump sum severance payment of $50,000. Father decided to move to State B, in part because he hoped he could avoid paying Mother and in part because the job prospects were better there. He transferred all his bank accounts to State B. Although he has had several interviews and his prospects are good for finding a job comparable to the one he had, he does not yet have another job.

Mother has brought an action in State B court to collect child support and spousal support from Father. She claims that the spousal support obligation should be increased to $1,000 per month because she is in poor health. She also asks that the spousal support be extended for an additional five years.

Father claims that the State A child support order is no longer effective and cannot be enforced because he has moved to State B. In the alternative, he claims that his child support obligation should be reduced from $2,000 to $1,000 per month because of his unemployment. In addition, he asks that this modification be made six months retroactive. Father also opposes any increase in his spousal support obligation.

Both State A and State B are in compliance with federal law concerning the enforcement of child support orders.

1. Is State B required to recognize the State A child support order? Explain.
2. Does the State B court have jurisdiction to modify Father's child support obligation? Explain.
3. Without regard to jurisdictional issues, how should a court rule on Father's requests to modify his child support obligation? Explain.

Family Law Question

4. Without regard to jurisdictional issues, how should the State B court rule on Mother's request for an increase in and extension of the spousal support obligations? Explain.

COMMERCIAL PAPER/AGENCY QUESTION

Singer was a famous musician. Agent was authorized to collect payment for all of Singer's performances. Agent had no rights in any of the payments due Singer.

In payment for a completed performance by Singer, Concert issued a $20,000 check drawn on Bank One. As instructed by Singer, Concert made the check payable to the order of "Agent, as agent for Singer," and delivered the check to Agent. On the memo line on the face of the check, Concert had written, "For Singer's June 19th performance."

Agent visited Bank Two, where both she and Singer maintained separate checking accounts. Agent's personal account, #12345, was overdrawn. Agent spoke with Bank Two's manager, Manager, and apologized for being overdrawn in her personal account. Agent told Manager that, as a "temporary arrangement to cover the overdrafts," she wanted to deposit the $20,000 check from Concert into her own personal account at Bank Two. Agent indorsed the check as follows: "For Deposit To Account #12345 s/Agent."

Manager made the deposit as indicated by Agent although he knew that on all prior occasions Agent had deposited checks for Singer's performances into account #56789, which was Singer's checking account with Bank Two. The check was credited to Agent's personal account with Bank Two, clearing Agent's overdrafts, and the check was then timely presented to and paid by Bank One. Within the next few days, Agent withdrew the remaining balance from account #12345 and closed the account.

Subsequently, Agent and Singer had a falling out. Singer discovered the above facts and demanded that Bank Two pay him $20,000. Bank Two refused. Agent cannot be located.

Under the Uniform Commercial Code:

1. Can Singer successfully sue Bank Two for conversion and recover the $20,000? Explain.
2. What rights, if any, does Singer have to recover from Bank One? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

Plaintiff, a resident of State X, is a shareholder in Silver, Inc., a State X corporation. Plaintiff purchased 10,000 shares of Silver stock for $20 a share in Silver's initial public offering (IPO). Three weeks after the IPO, the value of Silver stock had fallen to $15 a share, and Plaintiff filed an action for securities fraud against Silver in federal district court. The complaint alleged that the registration statement for the IPO filed by Silver with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) was materially false and misleading, and therefore violated relevant provisions of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 as well as SEC regulations. Plaintiff sought damages of $50,000 for this violation.

Shortly after Plaintiff's initial filing, the SEC filed a public enforcement lawsuit against Silver, SEC v. Silver, in another federal district court. The claim asserted by the SEC, that the registration statement for the IPO contained false and misleading representations, was identical to the claim asserted in the Plaintiff v. Silver lawsuit. The SEC lawsuit went to trial very quickly, and Silver vigorously contested the misrepresentation issues in the SEC lawsuit. The SEC won its lawsuit. A declaratory judgment was entered finding that Silver's registration statement contained false and misleading information and enjoining Silver from making those misrepresentations in the future. That judgment became final, and Silver did not appeal.

Plaintiff then moved for partial summary judgment against Silver based on the judgment in SEC v. Silver. Plaintiff argued that the SEC v. Silver judgment conclusively determined the issue whether the information contained in the registration statement was false and misleading. Silver opposed the motion on the ground that it had the right to litigate this issue against Plaintiff because Plaintiff had not been a party to the SEC v. Silver lawsuit.

The district court judge denied Plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment on the ground that Plaintiff, a non-party to the SEC v. Silver action, could not rely upon the judgment in that case to preclude Silver from relitigating issues that were central to Plaintiff's claim. Plaintiff filed an appeal from this decision, although Plaintiff's case against Silver is still going forward in the district court.

Silver has moved to dismiss Plaintiff's appeal on the following grounds: (a) that the district court's denial of Plaintiff's judgment was not a final judgment subject to review; (b) that the collateral order exception is inapplicable; and (c) mandamus does not lie.

1. Did the district court properly refuse to give preclusive effect to the SEC v. Silver judgment when it denied Plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment? Explain.
2. How should the appellate court rule on each of the grounds asserted in Silver's motion to dismiss the appeal? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES ANALYSIS

(Decedents' Estates II.I, II.A, II.F)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Was either the will or the bequest to Ben invalidated because Ben was one of the two witnesses to Testator's will?
- (2) Was the bequest to Wendy revoked as a result of her divorce from Testator?
- (3) Since the assets of Testator's estate of $132,000 are insufficient to satisfy all of the bequests under the will, how should the bequests abate?

DISCUSSION

Point One (30-40%)

The validity of the will is unaffected by the fact that Ben was a witness to the will. However, in most states Ben forfeits the $40,000 bequest because two disinterested witnesses did not witness the will. On the other hand, in states that have adopted the Uniform Probate Code, Ben does not forfeit that bequest.

At common law, if a witness who received a benefit under a will witnessed the will, the will was invalid unless two disinterested witnesses also witnessed the will. The will was invalid because the interested witness was not competent to testify about the validity of the will in court; thus, its validity could not be judicially established. See generally RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY (Donative Transfers) § 3.1, Comment o (Tent. Draft No. 2, 1998). In virtually every state, the common-law rule has been abolished and the witnessing of a will by an interested witness does not affect the validity of the will. See, e.g., Unif. Prob. Code § 2-505. On the other hand, most states have statutes that provide that unless two disinterested witnesses witness the will, the interested witness forfeits the bequest to that witness. Some states temper that result if the interested witness would have been an heir of the testator by limiting the amount forfeited to the amount, if any, by which the bequest to the interested witness exceeds the beneficiary-witness's intestate share. See generally William McGovern, Sheldon Kurtz, and Jan Rein, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES (1988). If such statutes applied here, Ben would forfeit the entire $40,000 bequest, as he is not an heir of Testator.

Under the Uniform Probate Code, on the other hand, an interested witness does not forfeit any portion of the bequest to the witness. The Uniform Probate Code justifies that approach by noting that the interested witness statute rarely prevents undue influence (an argument usually made to justify such statutes) and typically adversely affects bequests to innocent persons who act as witnesses to wills at a testator's express request. Under the Uniform Probate Code, Ben would not forfeit any portion of the $40,000 bequest.

Point Two (30-40%)

The bequest of $100,000 to Wendy is revoked as a result of her divorce from Testator after the execution of the will.

At common law, divorce did not revoke a bequest to a former spouse by operation of law. In most states today, a divorce revokes a provision in a will for the testator's former spouse unless the will, a contract between the former spouses, or a court order expressly provides otherwise. See generally Unif. Prob. Code § 2-804. In other states, divorce revokes a will provision for the spouse but only if the divorce is accompanied by a property settlement agreement. See Dukeminier & Johanson, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES 283 (5th ed. 1995). Here, Testator's divorce from Wendy was accompanied by a property settlement agreement. Thus, the provision for Wendy was revoked and she is not entitled to any share of Testator's estate.

Where a provision in favor of the former spouse is revoked by operation of law, as in this case, the bequest passes as if the former spouse predeceased the testator. While Testator's will did not expressly require Wendy to survive to take, by virtue of the statutory fiction that Wendy predeceased Testator, the bequest lapses. It lapses because lapse statutes do not apply to bequests to former spouses. Typically, lapsed general legacies are distributed as part of the residuary estate. See, e.g., Unif. Prob. Code § 2-804(d).

Legacies abate in the following order: residuary, general, and specific. Testator's $132,000 estate is insufficient to satisfy all of the general and specific legacies under the will. Thus, the residuary estate fully abates, the specific bequest of the portrait can be fully funded, and the remaining bequests abate to a limited extent.

Both at common law and under the typical state abatement statute, legacies abate in the following order: (1) residuary bequests, (2) general bequests, and (3) specific bequests. For purposes of abatement, a demonstrative bequest is treated as specific to the extent of the designated fund from which it is payable, and treated as general to the excess, if any. See Unif. Prob. Code § 3-902(a).

Under Testator's will, Testator specifically bequeathed the family portrait to Susan. Testator created two effective general legacies of $100,000 each in Leslie and Doris. (The bequest to Wendy was revoked by operation of law. See Point Two.) The legacy to Ben is forfeited under the interested witness statute in most jurisdictions. (See Point One.) In those states where it is not forfeited, the bequest of $40,000 to Ben is treated as a demonstrative legacy that is specific to the extent of the value of the stamp collection ($20,000) and general as to the remaining $20,000 of value. See Unif. Prob. Code § 3-902(a).

If the bequest to Ben is forfeited because of an interested witness statute, there are $130,000 of assets (not counting the specifically devised portrait) available for distribution to Leslie and Doris, who would each take $65,000. Susan would take the portrait valued at $2,000. The residuary bequest to University is totally abated.

If the bequest of $40,000 to Ben is not forfeited, then $20,000 of that bequest (the portion that cannot be satisfied by the specific bequest of the stamp collection) as well as the $100,000 bequests to Leslie and Doris are treated as general legacies for a total of $220,000. Thus, the $110,000 of the estate remaining after $22,000 of assets is distributed to Ben and Susan, the two specific legatees, would have to be allocated among the three general legatees to whom $220,000 had been bequeathed. Of that, $10,000 (1/11th) would be payable to Ben, $50,000 (5/11th) would be payable to Leslie, and $50,000 (5/11th) would be payable to Doris. The residuary estate is totally abated.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP ANALYSIS

(Agency & Partnership VII, VIII.B)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is a general partner responsible for the debts of a general partnership if the partnership has insufficient funds to meet the debt, when the partners did not expressly authorize the debt?
- (2) Is a general partner who advances his own funds to purchase goods for the partnership entitled to reimbursement from the partnership?
- (3) Is a general partner who contributes more services to the general partnership than the other partners entitled to remuneration from the partnership?
- (4) May a majority, but less than all, of the partners bind the general partnership to a transaction outside the ordinary course of business without approval of all of the partners?

DISCUSSION

Point One (20-30%)

Partners are agents of a general partnership for the purpose of binding the partnership and are responsible for the obligations of the partnership.

Andrew purchased the special hybrid seed without obtaining the consent of the other partners. As a general rule, partners are agents of the partnership, and, as such, their acts (including entering into contracts) bind the partnership. Uniform Partnership Act (1969)(UPA) § 9(1). “An act of a partner, including the execution of an instrument in the partnership name, for apparently carrying on in the ordinary course the partnership business or business of the kind carried on by the partnership, binds the partnership, unless the partner had no authority to act for the partnership in the particular matter and the person with whom the partner was dealing knew or had received a notification that the partner lacked authority.” Id. See also Revised Uniform Partnership Act (1994)(RUPA) § 301(1).

In this case, the special hybrid seed was purchased in the name of ABC Partnership. Purchasing seed for a farm, including expensive disease-resistant seed, constitutes carrying on in the ordinary course of ABC’s partnership business. Because Andrew has operated the farm on a day-to-day basis, the seed vendor could properly assume that the purchase of the seed was for carrying on the ordinary business of the partnership and that Andrew had authority to make the purchase. As a result, ABC is liable for payment of the seed.

Agency & Partnership Analysis

Partners are jointly responsible for the debts of a general partnership. UPA § 15(b). Under RUPA, partners are jointly and severally liable for general partnership obligations. RUPA § 306(a).

Because the contract to purchase seed is an enforceable obligation of ABC, Charles is jointly (and, under RUPA, severally) liable with Andrew and Brenda for the obligation.

Point Two (20-30%)

A partner who uses his own funds to purchase goods for the partnership is entitled to reimbursement.

A partner is entitled to be repaid by the partnership for contributions to partnership property made by the partner individually. UPA § 18(a). Since Andrew made the $7,000 down payment from his own funds as an advance to the partnership, ABC is obligated to repay him that amount. See also RUPA § 401(d) (“A partnership shall reimburse a partner for an advance to the partnership beyond the amount of capital the partner agreed to contribute.”). Although the facts imply that ABC does not have sufficient funds, Andrew still has the right to be reimbursed by the partnership. Since, as previously stated, each partner is liable for the debts of the partnership, Charles and Brenda will also be personally liable for a portion of the down payment if the partnership is unable to reimburse Andrew.

Partners are not entitled to be paid for their services to a general partnership, unless the partners have an express agreement to provide such payments, but some courts will allow remuneration based on an implied agreement.

Andrew claims that he is entitled to be paid by ABC for his services to the partnership because he contributed many more services than Brenda and Charles. As a general rule, a partner is not entitled to separate remuneration for services on the theory that a partner’s compensation for his or her services is his or her share of profits. UPA § 18(f), RUPA § 401(h).

There are two exceptions to this rule. First, in the case of a winding up of the partnership, a surviving partner is entitled to reasonable compensation for services rendered in connection with winding up the business of the partnership. Since ABC is not winding up operations, this would not apply to Andrew’s request.

The second exception is where the partners expressly agree to pay a partner for his or her efforts. The UPA is explicit that the rights of a partner as stated in the Act, including the right to receive remuneration, may be changed by an agreement among the partners. UPA § 18. If partners want to pay salaries, they must agree to do so. Harold Gill Reushlein & William A. Gregory, THE LAW OF AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP § 186, at 275-76 (1990). Here the partners had no express agreement to pay any remuneration to Andrew. On that basis many courts would find that Andrew is not entitled to any compensation for his services to ABC. Yoder v. Hooper, 695 P.2d 1182 (Colo. Ct. App. 1984). However, other courts have permitted remuneration based on an implied agreement to compensate a partner but there are no facts here to suggest an implied agreement. Knutson v. Laner, 627 P.2d 66 (Utah 1981).

All partners must consent to the land swap by ABC Partnership in order for it to be binding on ABC since the action is outside the ordinary course of ABC's business.

As a general rule, matters outside the ordinary course of a partnership's business must be unanimously approved by the partners. UPA § 18(h); RUPA § 401(j). Although the UPA and the RUPA do not define the types of acts that are sufficiently outside the ordinary course of business to require the consent of all partners, the facts make clear that ABC's sale of 500 acres of farmland and purchase of land to be developed for a subdivision are not within the scope of the ordinary course of business of its farm operations. While a conveyance of land might be in the ordinary course of business when one partner had been given authority in the past to convey pieces of land, this was not the case here. See Smith v. Dixon, 238 Ark. 1018, 386 S.W.2d 244 (1965).

Because the transaction was not in the ordinary course of ABC's business and because it was not unanimously approved by the partners, Andrew's actions did not bind ABC. UPA § 9(2); RUPA § 301(2). Should XYZ claim Andrew had apparent authority to sell the land, that claim would fail because the transaction was not in the ordinary course of ABC's business. The nature of the transaction (i.e., not in the ordinary course of the partnership's business) put XYZ constructively on notice that Andrew alone might not have the authority to engage in the transaction.

COMMERCIAL PAPER ANALYSIS

(Commercial Paper II.B, II.H, IV.A, VII.A)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did Maker have an obligation to pay Neighbor when Neighbor demanded payment?
- (2) Did Maker have an obligation to pay Bank?

DISCUSSION

Point One (45-55%)

Maker had no obligation to pay Neighbor when Neighbor demanded payment. Neighbor lost the right to enforce the note when Neighbor transferred possession of the note to Bank.

Under the Uniform Commercial Code, the document prepared by Maker is a negotiable instrument, i.e., it is “an unconditional promise or order to pay a fixed amount of money” that is “payable to bearer or to order,” that is “payable on demand or at a definite time,” and that “does not state any other undertaking.” UCC § 3-104(a). The document prepared by Maker satisfies this definition because Maker promised to pay $1,000 to the order of Neighbor, and Maker did not promise to do anything else in the document. The document is a note because it is a written and signed undertaking to pay money. See § 3-104(e)(defining a “note” as a “promise”); § 3-103(a)(9)(defining a “promise” as a “written undertaking to pay money signed by the person undertaking to pay”). It is payable “on demand” because it does not state any time of payment. See UCC § 3-108(a)(ii).

In order for Maker to have been obligated to pay the money to Neighbor upon Neighbor’s demand, Neighbor would have had to have been a person entitled to enforce the note when he demanded payment. In circumstances like those present in this case, the UCC defines a “person entitled to enforce” a negotiable instrument as “the holder of the instrument.”

Neighbor was not a holder when he demanded payment because he had delivered the note to Bank and was not in possession of it. See UCC § 1-201(20)(requiring the “holder” of a negotiable instrument to have “possession”).

In short, Maker should not have paid Neighbor without insisting that Neighbor exhibit the note before Maker paid the money. See UCC § 3-501(b)(2)(“Upon demand of the person to whom presentment is made, the person making presentment must . . . exhibit the instrument”).

Point Two (45-55%)

Maker is obligated to pay Bank. Bank is a person entitled to enforce the note against Maker, and Maker cannot assert any defense to payment.

Bank is the holder of the note. The “holder” of a negotiable instrument is “the person in possession . . . in the case of an instrument payable to an identified person, if the identified person is in possession.” UCC § 1- 201(20). Bank is in possession of the note and the note is payable to Bank because Neighbor wrote “Pay to the order of Bank” on it and indorsed it. See § 3-204(a)(describing indorsement). As the holder, Bank is entitled to enforce the note against Maker, who issued the note. See § 3-301 (defining “person entitled to enforce”); § 3-412 (obligating issuer to pay the note to a person entitled to enforce the note).

Although Maker has paid Neighbor, Maker cannot assert this payment as a defense to enforcement by Bank. There are two independent reasons for this conclusion, either of which is sufficient. First, the payment to Neighbor did not discharge Maker’s obligation because Neighbor was not entitled to enforce the note. See UCC § 3-602(a)(stating that payment discharges an instrument only “to the extent payment is made . . . to a person entitled to enforce”). As explained above, Neighbor was not a person entitled to enforce the note because Neighbor did not have possession of the note.

Second, Bank is a “holder in due course.” A holder in due course is a holder who takes an instrument in good faith, for value, and without notice of any defenses or various other problems. See UCC § 3-302(a), (b). From all indications, Bank acted in good faith. See § 3-103(a)(4)(defining “good faith” as “honesty in fact and observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing”). Bank took the note for value because it canceled Neighbor’s outstanding debt. See § 3- 303(a)(stating that an instrument is transferred for “value” if it is transferred “as payment of . . . an antecedent claim”). The facts do not suggest that Bank had notice of any defenses or other problems with the note.

As a holder in due course, no discharge would be effective against Bank unless Bank had notice of it at the time Bank took the note. See UCC § 3-601(b)(“Discharge of the obligation of a party is not effective against a person acquiring rights of a holder in due course of the instrument without notice of discharge.”). Bank could not have had notice of the payment to Neighbor because the payment occurred after Bank acquired the note. Maker must pay Bank even though Maker already has paid Neighbor. See Lambert v. Barker, 348 S.E.2d 214 (Va. 1986).

FAMILY LAW ANALYSIS

(Family Law IV. A, IV.B, IV.E, VI.F)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Under what circumstances will a parent be deemed to have abandoned her child so the child could be adopted by a third-party custodian without the parent's consent?
- (2) In a custody dispute between a parent and a third party with whom the child has lived for a number of years, to whom is the court likely to award custody?
- (3) Would a third party who has developed a substantial relationship with a child be awarded visitation rights over the objections of the child's parent?

DISCUSSION

Point One (35-45%)

In some states, a parent cannot be found to have abandoned her child so long as she subjectively intends to maintain a relationship with the child; in other states, if a parent has failed to express substantial interest in her child, she may be found to have abandoned the child, regardless of her subjective intent.

Under the traditional law of adoption, to establish "abandonment" courts required proof that the parent subjectively intended to abandon the relationship; proof of behavior that objectively suggests a fixed loss of interest in the child was not sufficient. E.g., In re Adoption of Walton, 123 Utah 380, 259 P.2d 881 (1953). In a state that uses the subjective test, Mother has not abandoned Daughter because (1) Mother insists that she never intended to terminate her relationship with Daughter, and (2) she asked Caretaker to keep Daughter only until Mother "got her life back together." Accordingly, Caretaker could not adopt Daughter because Mother has not abandoned Daughter and will not consent.

On the other hand, some states use an objective test for abandonment under which a court might find that Mother had abandoned Daughter. The inquiry under this test is whether the parent has acted in ways that indicate a commitment to maintaining the parent-child relationship, and includes factors such as whether the parent paid support or visited the child. See, e.g., In the Matter of the Appeal in Pima County Juvenile Severance Action No. S-114487, 179 Ariz. 86, 876 P.2d 1121 (1994)(en banc). Here, a court might well find that Mother's failure to pay even a minimal amount of support and her very infrequent visits constituted abandonment, though her recent efforts to reestablish her relationship with Daughter cut against this finding. If Mother is found to have abandoned Daughter, then Daughter would be available for adoption, and Caretaker would probably be able to adopt her.

Point Two (35-45%)

In a custody contest between a parent and a third party, custody in the parent is presumed to be in the best interest of the child. To rebut this presumption, the third party must generally prove either that the parent is unfit or that granting custody to the parent would be highly detrimental to the child. In some states, however, the court may award custody to the third party upon finding that doing so would be in the child's best interest.

In custody cases between two parents, the standard is the best interest of the child. However, in most states this standard is not used in parent vs. third party disputes. Instead, there is a strong presumption that a child should be in the custody of the parents; therefore, Caretaker has the burden of proving that she should have custody of Daughter. H. Clark, THE LAW OF DOMESTIC RELATIONS § 19.6 at 821 (1988). In many jurisdictions, as long as the parent is considered fit, the court will not even consider whether third-party custody would be better for the child. Clark, supra § 19.6 at 823. Therefore, in such a jurisdiction, Mother would almost certainly receive custody of Daughter. She is currently fit, has employment, is attending Alcoholics Anonymous (and has been for six months), and has not lost contact with her child (i.e., no abandonment). In those jurisdictions, the court would not consider Daughter's strong attachment to Caretaker to mitigate Mother's claim.

In other jurisdictions, however, the presumption in favor of parental custody can be overcome by showing that awarding custody to the parent would be very detrimental to the child. See, e.g., Painter v. Bannister, 258 Iowa 1390, 140 N.W.2d 152 (1966), Guardianship of Phillip B., 139 Cal. App. 3d 407, 188 Cal. Rptr. 781 (1983). Under this standard it is not unusual for courts to find that breaking a long-term, stable, parent-child bond between the child and the third-party caretaker will be harmful to the child, at least when expert testimony to this effect is presented. In our case, the expert would testify that the strength of Daughter's attachment to Caretaker means that a disruption would be harmful to her psychologically. This might be sufficient to overcome the preference for Mother. Daughter has lived four of her five years with Caretaker (almost her entire life), and has seen her mother only occasionally. For courts less focused on parental rights, these would be critical facts. See, e.g., Ortner v. Pitt, 187 W. Va. 494, 419 S.E.2d 907 (1992).

A minority of states use the best interest test in all custody contests including those between parents and nonparents. See, e.g., In re Custody of C.C.R.S., 892 P.2d 246 (Colo. 1995)(en banc). Under the best interest test, a court would probably award custody to Caretaker because she has become Daughter's psychological mother.

An examinee might receive extra credit for noting that awarding custody to Caretaker might raise a question of unconstitutional interference with Mother's parental rights. See Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000). Although Troxel concerned visitation and not custody (see Point Three), the plurality in Troxel held that there is a presumption that fit parents act in their children's best interest, and that courts must award "special weight" to a parent's decisions. Prior to Troxel, the C.C.R.S. court rejected the argument that the best interest standard violates parents' constitutional rights. The court reasoned that the Supreme Court cases on parental rights, e.g., Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745 (1982); Lassiter v. Dept. of Soc. Serv., 452 U.S. 18 (1981), all concerned permanent termination of parental status. A custody ruling, the court said, is less drastic and therefore constitutionally permissible when supported by good reasons (the child's best interest). Other courts, however, might find that the best interest standard unconstitutionally infringes on parental rights if it denies parental custody in favor of a nonparent in cases where the parent is legally "fit." See Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000).

In most states, a court cannot award visitation rights to a third party without statutory authority, but in a minority of states, courts may make such an award if it is in the child's best interest, at least to parties who have stood in loco parentis to the child.

In some states, statutes authorize courts to order visitation for a nonparent who has a substantial relationship with a child if visitation is in the child's best interest. E.g., Or. Rev. Stat. § 109.119; Cal. Fam. Code § 3100(a); Alaska Stat. § 25.24.150(a). In the absence of such a statute, courts generally lack jurisdiction to enter such orders because they are inconsistent with the parents' custodial rights, which include determining with whom a child will associate. See Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000). Some courts, however, have held that they have inherent authority to make visitation orders in a child's best interest. See, e.g., Spells v. Spells, 250 Pa. Super. 168, 378 A.2d 879 (1977)(awarding visitation to a former stepparent); Simpson v. Simpson, 586 S.W.2d 33 (Ky. 1979)(adopting the in loco parentis approach in holding that visitation with a surrogate parent may be in the child's best interest); Gribble v. Gribble, 583 P.2d 64 (Utah 1978); Rhinehart v. Nowlin, 111 N.M. 319, 323, 805 P.2d 88, 92 (1990)(holding that the trial courts are given "exclusive jurisdiction of all matters relating to the guardianship, care, custody, maintenance and education of the children," which includes "the granting of visitation rights to a person or persons who the trial court determines are significant and important to the welfare of the children" (emphasis in original)); Looper v. McManus, 581 P.2d 487 (Okla. App. 1978); Wills v. Wills, 399 So. 2d 1130 (Fla. App. 1981); Evans v. Evans, 302 Md. 334, 488 A.2d 157 (1985).

If a court had the authority to grant nonparental visitation, the facts of this case might support such an order. Arguably, it would be in Daughter's best interest to continue visiting Caretaker, rather than having their relationship abruptly terminated. A court must, however, give "special weight" to Mother's opposition. See Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000). Moreover, the court might conclude that it would be better not to allow visitation if it found that Daughter would be adversely affected by the animosity between Caretaker and Mother.

NOTE: Troxel does not affect the outcome of this question, as it is distinguishable from the facts here. In Troxel, grandparents who never had custody of the grandchildren, sought visitation contrary to the wishes of the children's custodial parent. Here, Caretaker had custody of Daughter for most of Daughter's life prior to bringing her petition. In these circumstances, the court would most likely find that granting Caretaker visitation rights would not violate the mother's constitutional rights.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure IV.F, IV.D)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did the federal district court abuse its discretion when it ordered Bus to participate in settlement discussions and cited it for contempt for violating that order?
- (2)(a) What standard governs a motion to amend pleadings and to amend a pretrial order to allow a litigant to introduce a new issue during trial?
- (2)(b) Should a party be permitted to amend a pretrial order to introduce evidence that the party did not mention or disclose during discovery or the pretrial conference?

DISCUSSION

Point One (35-45%)

A federal district judge has explicit authority under Fed. R. Civ. P. 16 to order litigants to participate in settlement discussions, although sanctions to compel participation should be used with caution.

Until the 1993 amendments of Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the question of whether federal courts could order litigants to participate in settlement talks was in dispute. See, e.g., G. Heileman Brewing Co. v. Joseph Oat Corp., 871 F.2d 648 (7th Cir. 1989)(en banc 6-5 split decision)(holding that district judges have inherent authority to order represented parties to appear at pretrial settlement conferences); C.A. Wright, A.R. Miller, M.K. Kane, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 1525.1 (1990 & 2000 Supp.). In the 1993 amendments to Rule 16, the drafters added the following language to Rule 16(c):

If appropriate, the court may require that a party or its representative be present or reasonably available by telephone in order to consider possible settlement of the dispute.

As explained in the Advisory Committee Notes, the change was intended, in part, to make it clear that courts may issue orders designed to facilitate settlement. There is, therefore, no question that the court had authority to require a corporate representative of Bus to be present or available for settlement discussions.

The judge also had authority to hold Bus in contempt for failing to attend the conference. Rule 16(f) explicitly provides that “if no appearance is made on behalf of a party at a scheduling or pretrial conference . . . , or if a party or a party’s attorney fails to participate in good faith, the judge, upon motion or the judge’s own initiative, may make such orders with regard thereto as are just, and among others, any of the orders provided for in Rule 37(b)(2)(B),(C),(D).” Rule 37(b)(2)(D) permits the court to treat “as a contempt of court the failure to obey any orders.”

Because Bus failed to attend the conference and failed to participate in settlement negotiations in good faith, the court did not abuse its discretion under Rules 16 and 37 by holding Bus in contempt.

The Advisory Committee Notes to Rule 16 caution that settlement talks will be unproductive if a party is uncooperative. Bus, then, has a reasonable argument on appeal that the district judge should not have imposed the contempt sanction once Bus's counsel made it clear that Bus was recalcitrant about settlement and that discussions would be pointless. It is not likely, however, that the district court's decision was an abuse of discretion sufficient to warrant reversal. There is no evidence that the order for party participation imposed great hardship on Bus, and the court may have believed that Bus's recalcitrance was merely posturing that could be overcome by serious discussion. Thus, although a case for reversal can be made, it does not seem likely to succeed on these facts.

Point Two (a)(45-55%)

Under Rule 16, a final pretrial order may be modified only to prevent manifest injustice. That standard supersedes the more liberal policy governing amendment of pleadings under Rule 15.

In the fact pattern, the defendant has sought to introduce the issue of a "waiver of liability" at trial, without having raised that issue in the pleadings or having included it in the pretrial order. Ordinarily, when evidence is objected to at trial on the ground that it is not within those issues raised by the pleadings, Rule 15(b) authorizes the court to allow an amendment of the pleadings at trial and directs the court to "do so freely when the presentation of the merits of the action will be subverted thereby and the objecting party fails to satisfy the court that the admission of such evidence would prejudice the party in maintaining the party's action or defense upon the merits." An amendment allowing Bus to raise the waiver as a defense would subvert the presentation of the merits. Any prejudice that Victim might suffer presumably could be minimized by granting an extension to permit Victim to meet the new evidence. Thus, an examination of Rule 15(b) alone suggests that the court abused its discretion in declining to permit Bus to amend its answer and to offer the ticket stub at trial.

But Rule 15(b) cannot be read in a vacuum. Under Rule 16(e) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, "[t]he order following a final pretrial conference shall be modified only to prevent manifest injustice." According to the Advisory Committee Notes, pretrial orders should not be changed lightly, but total inflexibility is undesirable. In determining whether to admit evidence and to allow issues that were not identified in the pretrial order, the courts have discretion to consider such factors as the prejudice to the opposing party, the extent to which introduction of the new evidence would disrupt the orderly presentation of the trial, and the possible bad faith of the party seeking to disregard the pretrial order. See, e.g., Morfeld v. Kehm, 803 F.2d 1452 (8th Cir. 1986); C.A. Wright, A. R. Miller, M.K. Kane, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 1527 (1990 & 2000 Supp.). Thus, Rule 16 imposes a heavy burden on a party seeking to amend a pretrial order, but the trial court has such discretion when the danger of prejudice is slight and the failure to amend might result in an injustice. On the other hand, if the evidence or issue was within the knowledge of the party seeking modification at the time of the pretrial conference, the argument for amending the order is considerably weakened. Id.

On the given facts, Bus does not have a strong argument that the trial court abused its discretion in barring introduction of the evidence of a waiver of liability. It is difficult to imagine that “manifest injustice” would result from denying Bus the opportunity to present evidence on a defense that the court could reasonably conclude has been available to it from the beginning. Bus likely knew that the terms of its ticket included a waiver. It apparently had the ticket stub in its possession throughout the proceedings. Moreover, introduction of the new issue of waiver would probably prejudice Victim unless a continuance were granted, and that would result in trial delay. In short, any harm caused to Bus by restricting it to the evidence and claims allowed by the pretrial order does not appear to be a “manifest injustice.”

How should one resolve the tension between Rule 15(b), on the one hand, and Rule 16(e), on the other? It appears that the Rule 16(e) amendment standard should apply because, according to the Rule itself, the pretrial order “shall control the subsequent course of the action.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(e). One should note, however, that “several courts have permitted pretrial orders to be amended by concluding that Rule 16 must be read in conjunction with Rule 15(b).” 6A C. A. Wright, A. R. Miller & M. K. Kane, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 1527 at 290 (1990); see, e.g., Phaneuf v. Tenneco, Inc., 938 F. Supp. 112 (N.D.N.Y. 1996). Thus, while it appears that the district court did not abuse its discretion in declining to amend the final pretrial order, one could make a reasonable argument that the more liberal Rule 15(b) standard should have been applied.

However, even if that argument is successful, it appears that the court properly barred Bus from offering the ticket stub into evidence as a sanction for failing to produce it pursuant to Rule 26(a)(1). See Point Two (b), infra.

Point Two (b)(5-15%)

If a party fails to produce a document that should have been disclosed under the mandatory disclosure provisions of the federal discovery rules, the party ordinarily will not be permitted to use the document as evidence at trial.

Bus’s failure to disclose the ticket stub pursuant to its mandatory disclosure obligation provides an additional reason for the court to bar introduction of the evidence. Under Rule 26(a), a party must provide a copy or description of “all documents . . . that are relevant to disputed facts alleged with particularity in the pleadings.” Rule 26(a)(1)(B), Fed. R. Civ. P. Here, the waiver of liability contained on the tour ticket is relevant because it would tend to defeat Victim’s claim for recovery. The trial court’s decision to prevent Bus from using the evidence is an appropriate sanction for non-disclosure of the ticket. “A party that without substantial justification fails to disclose information required by Rule 26(a) . . . shall not, unless such failure is harmless, be permitted to use [such information] as evidence at a trial.” Rule 37(c)(1), Fed. R. Civ. P.

TRUSTS ANALYSIS

(Trusts IE, I.I)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Can judgment claims against the income beneficiary for his failure to pay debts be paid by a trustee to the judgment creditor from either trust income or principal under these facts?
- (2) Can claims against the income beneficiary of a trust for unpaid alimony be paid by a trustee to the former spouse of the income beneficiary from either trust income or principal under these facts?
- (3) Can the income beneficiary of a trust be compelled to use trust income actually distributed to the beneficiary to pay judgment claims where the trust contains a spendthrift clause?
- (4) Are dividends paid to a trustee in stock, rather than cash, allocable to the income or principal accounts for trust accounting purposes?

DISCUSSION

Point One (30-40%)

Most likely, Creditor will not be able to compel Bank to distribute trust income to it in satisfaction of its claim against Son because the trust instrument includes a spendthrift clause. Creditor also will not be able to compel distributions to it from the principal of the trust because Son is not entitled to any share of trust principal.

The creditors of the beneficiary of a trust have no greater rights in the trust property than the beneficiary has; however, they can have fewer rights. The trust instrument makes no provision for the distribution of trust principal to Son. Accordingly, because he has no right to receive trust principal, his creditors have no right to reach trust principal. If Son's creditors could reach trust principal, they would infringe on the property rights of the remainder beneficiaries of the trust.

Son, on the other hand, is entitled to trust income and, thus, absent a spendthrift clause in the instrument, his creditors would be able to attach that interest. However, if the governing instrument, as here, contains a spendthrift clause prohibiting a beneficiary's creditors from attaching the beneficiary's interest, the beneficiary's creditors usually cannot reach the beneficiary's trust interest in satisfaction of their claims. Most courts uphold spendthrift clauses, at least when applied against the claims of most creditors of a beneficiary, although a minority of states hold that spendthrift clauses are unenforceable. See generally George Bogert, TRUSTS § 40 (6th ed. 1987).

In the minority of states that bar the enforcement of spendthrift clauses, Creditor could compel Bank to pay its claim against Son from trust income. However, in the large majority of states that uphold spendthrift clauses, Creditor could not compel payment of the claim from trust income while in the hands of Bank. Creditor stands on a different footing than Wife (See Point Two), and to date no state that generally upholds spendthrift clauses has found a countervailing public policy exception for the kind of claim Creditor has against Son.

Point Two (30-40%)

Wife will not be able to compel distributions to her from the trust principal. Most likely, however, Wife will be able to compel Bank to distribute trust income to her in satisfaction of her unpaid alimony claims against Son notwithstanding the spendthrift clause in the trust.

Wife cannot reach the trust principal because Son has no interest in trust principal. See Point One.

However, she may be entitled to distributions from trust income. Even in the large majority of states that uphold spendthrift clauses, if the particular creditor's claim is for unpaid alimony, the policy of effectuating the settlor's intent by generally upholding spendthrift clauses runs afoul of a stronger public policy favoring the payment of alimony and child support. See, e.g., Bacardi v. White, 463 So. 2d 218 (Fla. 1985). Today, most state courts hold that the policy favoring the payment of alimony and child support trumps the policy of generally supporting spendthrift clauses. In those states a trust beneficiary is not permitted to enjoy trust income while failing to support his children and former spouse. See generally RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 157. Hence, Wife should be able to compel Bank to satisfy her claim for alimony from the trust's income.

In a small minority of states, spendthrift clauses continue to be valid even as against unpaid alimony. See, e.g., Erickson v. Erickson, 266 N.W. 161 (Minn. 1936). In such states, Wife could not compel a distribution of trust income in payment of her claim.

Point Three (10-20%)

Son can be compelled to use trust income distributed to him from the trust to pay judgment claims against him even though the trust contains a spendthrift clause.

Spendthrift clauses in a trust do not operate to bar a trust beneficiary's creditors from reaching the distributed income or principal once it has actually been paid to the beneficiary. See Bogert, supra § 40 at 150. If Grantor had tried to restrain Son's ability to alienate the trust income once distributed to Son, that would have been an invalid restraint on alienation. Thus, once trust income is actually paid to Son, Wife and Creditor are entitled to reach that income in satisfaction of their claims by resorting to the customary legal processes for the enforcement of judgments.

Point Four (10-20%)

Bank should hold the dividend paid in stock as part of the trust principal for ultimate distribution to Son's children when Son dies.

Trusts Analysis

The Uniform Principal and Income Act treats distributions of stock, whether characterized as a stock dividend or as a stock split, as principal. See Unif. Prin. Inc. Act § 6(a). The Revised Act adopts the same position. Rev. Unif. Prin. Inc. Act § 401(c)(1).

The Revised Act gives Bank a limited power to allocate the stock dividend between income and principal in cases where the distributing corporation had made no distributions to shareholders except in the form of dividends paid in stock. In such cases, Bank might be justified in allocating some of the stock dividend to income to effectuate Grantor's intent to provide Son with trust income. However, the facts do not support such an allocation in this case.

In the absence of a statute, the law varies. In some states, dividends paid in the stock of the distributing corporation are income; in others, principal. Some states allocate the dividend between income and principal under the so-called "intact value" rule.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Under what circumstances would Henry, as beneficial owner but not record owner of 20 shares, be entitled to vote at the Acme annual meeting?
- (2) Was there a quorum present for shareholder action at the Acme annual meeting?
- (3) Did Candace, Fran, and David receive sufficient votes to be elected as directors of Acme meeting?

DISCUSSION

Point One (25-35%)

Without having obtained a proxy, Henry was not entitled to vote at the annual meeting because only shareholders of record are entitled to vote.

Generally only shareholders of record are entitled to vote at a meeting of shareholders. See Model Bus. Corp. Act § 1.40(22)(1984)(definition of shareholder); Del. Gen. Corp. Law. § 219 (stating that the share ledger is the only evidence as to who are the shareholders entitled to vote, in person or by proxy, at any meeting of shareholders). A mere beneficial owner of shares is not entitled to vote at a meeting of shareholders. Salgo v. Matthews, 497 S.W.2d 620, 628 (Tex. Civ. App. 1973)(stating that beneficial ownership of shares does not carry with it the right to vote without having the shares transferred on the corporate books).

Where corporate shares are transferred between the record date for a meeting of shareholders and the date of the meeting, the transferee is not entitled to vote the shares at the meeting. Wick v. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co., 46 Ohio App. 253, 188 N.E. 514, 517-18 (1932)(holding that election inspectors did not err in permitting voting of shares by shareholders as of record date, regardless of subsequent transfers of the shares), petition dismissed, 127 Ohio St. 379, 189 N.E. 4 (1933). The corporation is not required to determine the “true” owners of corporate shares on the day of the meeting. Rather, the corporation is entitled to rely on its share ledger as of the record date for the meeting in determining who is entitled to vote.

The establishment of a record date is for the convenience of the corporation. McDonough v. Foundation Co., 7 Misc. 2d 571, 155 N.Y.S.2d 67, 68 (1956). A transferee of shares after the record date who wants to vote at a scheduled shareholder meeting should obtain a proxy from his or her transferor to vote the shares. Wick, 188 N.E. at 518.

Point Two (25-35%)

A quorum was present for shareholder action at the Acme annual meeting.

Neither the articles of incorporation nor the bylaws of Acme contain a provision relating to the quorum for a meeting of shareholders. Consequently, a quorum is a majority of the votes entitled to be cast by the voting group. See Model Bus. Corp. Act § 7.25(a)(1984); Del. Gen. Corp. Law § 216. The voting group in this case consisted of all the common shareholders of Acme.

A shareholder may vote his or her shares either in person or by proxy. Candace and Fran were present at the meeting in person. Brenda granted a proxy appointment to George to vote her shares, as is the right of a shareholder, and, thus, was present by proxy. A proxy should be accepted as valid if on its face it appears to be “free from all reasonable grounds of suspicion of its genuineness and authenticity.” In re Election of Directors of the St. Lawrence Steamboat Co., 44 N.L.J. 529, 534 (N.J. Sup. Ct. 1882). The facts do not suggest that the proxy from Brenda was suspicious on its face. Consequently, 60 shares entitled to vote were present at the annual meeting of Acme. Since, as discussed above, Henry (as a mere beneficial owner) was not entitled to vote, his shares are not counted as present for quorum purposes.

There were 100 shares entitled to vote at the Acme annual meeting. A majority of 100 is 51. Since, as discussed above, there were 60 shares entitled to vote present at the Acme annual meeting, a quorum was present for shareholder action even though only two of the five shareholders owning only 40 of the 100 shares were physically present at the meeting.

Candace, Fran, and David each received sufficient votes to be elected as directors at the Acme annual meeting.

In most states the election of directors requires only a plurality vote of the shares entitled to vote at a meeting at which a quorum is present. See Model Bus. Corp. Act § 7.28(a)(1984); Del. Gen. Corp. Act § 216(2). As discussed above, a quorum was present at the Acme annual meeting.

The plurality vote requirement for directors simply means “that the individuals with the largest number of votes are elected as directors up to the maximum number of directors to be chosen at the election.” Model Bus. Corp. Act Ann. § 7.28 Official Comment (3rd ed. 1996). Three directors were to be elected at the Acme annual meeting of shareholders. Candace, Fran, and David each received 40 votes, which was more than any other candidates received. George, Brenda, and Henry only received 20 votes each. Consequently, Candace, Fran, and David were elected as directors.

In a minority of states, directors must be elected by a majority of the shares entitled to vote at a meeting of shareholders at which a quorum is present. Model Bus. Corp. Act Ann. § 7.28 annot. (3rd ed. 1996). A majority of the 60 shares present and entitled to vote was 31. (As discussed above, Henry was not entitled to vote at the meeting.) Since 40 shares voted for the election of Candace, Fran, and David, they received enough votes to be elected as directors even in those few states requiring a majority vote.

In voting his or her shares, each shareholder can cast no more than 20 votes for each directorship to be filled unless cumulative voting is authorized. If cumulative voting is authorized (which it is not here), then each shareholder has a number of votes equal to the number of shares owned times the number of directorships to be filled and the shareholder can allocate those votes among any of the persons running for director.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP ANALYSIS

(Agency & Partnership II, IV)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is a principal bound when an agent who has actual authority enters into an obligation apparently for the benefit of the principal but in fact for the benefit of a third party?
- (2) Is a principal bound when an agent who has actual authority enters into an obligation in violation of an undisclosed limitation placed on the agent's authority by the principal?
- (3) Is a principal bound when an agent whose actual authority has been terminated but who continues to have apparent authority enters into an obligation on behalf of the principal?

DISCUSSION

Point One (25-35%)

Principal is liable to Bellseller for the church bell. Principal is bound by Agent's purchase of the church bell apparently on Principal's behalf, even though Agent was in fact operating on Greta's behalf, since Bellseller was unaware of that fact.

There is no doubt that Principal is liable. However, different jurisdictions are likely to reach this result based on different theories.

First, some jurisdictions would conclude that Agent had actual authority to bind Principal to the contract with Bellseller because Agent was expressly authorized by Principal to purchase the bell and the price that Agent agreed to pay was within the range authorized by Principal. Moreover, because the contract entered into by Agent disclosed that Principal was Agent's principal, Bellseller knew that Agent was acting as agent for a third party. This makes Principal a disclosed principal who is "subject to liability upon a contract purported to be made on his account by an agent authorized to make it for the principal's benefit, although the agent acts for his own or another's improper purposes, unless the [third] party has notice that the agent is not acting for the principal's benefit." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 165. See also U.S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. Anderson Constr. Co., 260 F.2d 172 (9th Cir. 1958). Here, Bellseller had no knowledge that Agent was not acting for Principal's benefit, and as a result, Principal is liable to Bellseller for the price of the church bell. (In some jurisdictions, this same reasoning would be used to hold Principal liable on an "inherent authority" rationale. See Comment a to RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 165.) Agent, on the other hand, could be liable to Principal for breach of fiduciary duty.

Agency & Partnership Analysis

Other jurisdictions would conclude that Agent did not have actual authority. Agent did not make the purchase for Principal, he made the purchase for Greta and his act of purchasing the bell for Greta was NOT within the actual authority given by Principal: Principal only authorized agent to make the purchase for the benefit of Principal. See Draft, RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 2.01, comment e (an “act that would be within the agent’s actual authority had the agent acted to serve the interests of the principal . . . falls outside actual authority [if] the agent acted to serve the agent’s own purposes or other improper purposes.”) Thus, although he purported to be acting for Principal, Agent probably lacked actual authority to make this purchase for Greta, though he would have had authority to purchase for Principal. Consequently, Principal would probably not be bound simply on the basis of actual authority.

Nevertheless, jurisdictions that conclude that Agent lacked actual authority would probably also conclude that Agent had apparent authority to make this purchase. Apparent authority is created “by written or spoken words or any other conduct of the principal which, reasonably interpreted, causes the third person to believe that the principal consents to have the act done on his behalf by the person purporting to act for him.” See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 27. See also Mohr v. State Bank of Stanley, 241 Kan. 42, 734 P.2d 1071, 1076 (1987); Lewis v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 463 A.2d 666 (D.C. 1983). The principal must “be responsible for the information which comes to the mind of the third person,” but this can occur if the principal provides “documents or other indicia of authority” to the agent that are subsequently shown to the third party. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 27, comment a.

In this case, Principal provided Agent with written credentials which, when they were shown to Bellseller, caused Bellseller to believe that Agent was authorized to purchase the bell on behalf of Principal. Agent then purported to act within the scope of this apparent authority, and Bellseller believed him to be so acting. Consequently, Principal is liable for the contract made by Agent within the scope of his apparent authority. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 159.

In any event, the basic justification for imposing liability on Principal is simply that Principal created a situation where Bellseller reasonably relied on Agent’s claims to be acting for Principal. Agency law typically protects third parties who act in reliance on appearances created by a purported principal, and a court is likely to protect Bellseller for this reason, whether the result is explained on grounds of apparent authority, inherent authority, or estoppel. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 8, comments d, e & f; § 8A.

Point Two (25-35%)

Agent acted with actual authority to purchase the book, and with apparent authority because Tomeseller was unaware of Principal’s price limitation. Therefore, Principal is liable even though Agent exceeded the terms of his authorization.

Principal specifically authorized Agent to buy the book, so Agent had actual authority to purchase the book on Principal’s behalf. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 26. However, Agent exceeded the limitation on price imposed by Principal, and therefore exceeded the scope of his actual authority. Although Agent is liable to Principal for breach of duty to obey instructions, Principal will nevertheless be liable to Tomeseller.

Agent showed the written authorization to Tomeseller, and the purchase contract identified Principal as the principal, so Principal was a disclosed principal, and Agent had apparent authority. Apparent authority is created “by written or spoken words or any other conduct of the principal which, reasonably interpreted, causes the third person to believe that the principal consents to have the act done on his behalf by the person purporting to act for him.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 27. See also Mohr v. State Bank of Stanley, 241 Kan. 42, 734 P.2d 1071, 1076 (1987); Lewis v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 463 A.2d 666 (D.C. 1983). When Agent presented Tomeseller with the written authorization, which did not include the limitation, Tomeseller reasonably understood that Agent was authorized to purchase the book on Principal’s behalf, creating apparent authority on behalf of Agent.

Because the price limitation was not included on the written authorization shown to Tomeseller, she was unaware of the limitation. “A disclosed or partially disclosed principal authorizing an agent to make a contract, but imposing upon him limitations as to incidental terms intended not to be revealed is subject to liability upon a contract made in violation of such limitations with a third person who has no notice of them.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 160. See also Hunt v. Davis, 387 So. 2d 209 (Ala. Civ. App. 1980)(holding that secret limitations on an agent’s authority do not bind third parties); Wittlin v. Giacalone, 171 F.2d 147 (D.C. Cir. 1948). Therefore, Principal remains liable to Tomeseller for payment of the book.

Point Three (25-30%)

Because Agent was acting with apparent authority, even though Principal had terminated all actual authority, Principal is liable to Lampseller for the purchase of the lamp.

Principal had terminated the agency relationship by delivery of the letter to Agent, so Agent did not have actual authority to buy the lamp. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 119. Agent did, however, continue to have apparent authority. Once apparent authority is created, it can be terminated only when the third party has notice of termination or when the authority is terminated due to impossibility or lack of capacity. Reuschlein & Gregory, THE LAW OF AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP § 46 at 95, (2d ed. 1990); RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 125.

When Principal engaged Agent, Principal gave Agent credentials and form contracts used to buy antiques on Principal’s behalf. Agent showed Lampseller the credentials and used Principal’s form to purchase the lamp, so Lampseller could reasonably have understood that Agent had authority from Principal to buy antiques, including the lamp. When Principal entrusted Agent with “indicia of authority,” Principal became obliged to give notice of any termination of that authority to third persons who relied upon Agent’s possession of the credentials. Since Lampseller had no notice that Agent’s credentials were no longer valid, the apparent authority continued as to Lampseller and, as a result, Principal is liable for payment to Lampseller for the $5,000 purchase price.

TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS ANALYSIS

(Trusts & Future Interests IB, I.C, IF, I.H)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is a promise to create a trust in the future legally enforceable if the promise is supported by consideration?
- (2) Is an oral trust of intangible personal property valid?
- (3) Did the trust terminate at Harry's death because there was then no trustee?
- (4) What is the effect of Wanda's disclaimer of the income interest and should the principal be immediately distributed (a) to Wanda and Charles, as Harry's heirs, (b) to Charles, as the implied remainder beneficiary of the trust, or (c) to Mary and Pat, as remainder beneficiaries of the trust?

DISCUSSION

Point One (30-40%)

Harry's promise to create a trust of property he might inherit from his mother was legally enforceable.

A promise to create a trust in the future is unenforceable unless the promise is supported by consideration sufficient for the formation of a contract. See generally SCOTT ON TRUSTS § 30 (4th ed.); Bogert, TRUSTS § 24 (6th ed. 1987). Thus, if Harry had merely promised to create a trust of property he might later inherit from his mother, that promise would be unenforceable. Here, however, Harry's promise was incorporated into a prenuptial agreement in which the promise to create the trust was made in consideration of Wanda's waiver of alimony rights. This waiver is sufficient consideration to support Harry's promise to create the trust in the future, just as it is sufficient to support the validity of the prenuptial agreement.

Point Two (30-40%)

A trust of intangible personal property may be declared orally. No writing is required. Thus, the trust for Wanda was validly created.

In order to create a trust, the grantor must have intended to create the trust and there must be a trust res (property), one or more trust beneficiaries, and a trustee. The intent to create a trust can be found in both the grantor's words and deeds. See generally SCOTT ON TRUSTS § 24.2 (4th ed.). Here, the evidence is clear that Harry intended to create a trust.

At the time of the declaration of trust there was also trust property ($1 million), one or more beneficiaries, and a trustee (Harry). Thus, the only possible remaining issue relating to whether the trust was validly created is whether an oral declaration of trust is valid. Most states require a writing to create an inter vivos trust of land. At common law, an inter vivos oral trust of personalty was valid. See Bogert, supra § 21. Generally, state statutes of frauds do not change this common-law rule. Thus, the trust was validly created even though created orally.

Point Three (5-10%)

A trust will not fail for want of a trustee. Thus, even though no trustee is acting at Harry's death, the trust is valid and a court of equity can appoint a successor trustee.

A trust will not fail for want of a trustee. See generally Bogert, TRUSTS § 30 (6th ed. 1987). Thus, even if the sole individual acting as trustee dies, the trust does not terminate if the grantor intended the trust to continue beyond the death of the trustee. Id. Rather, the court of equity having jurisdiction over the trust can appoint another to act as a successor trustee. Id. Here, Harry's intent is clear—that the trust continue for Wanda's lifetime, not that the trust terminate at his death. This intent is evidenced not only by the provision that Wanda's income interest terminates at her death but also by the language of the orally declared trust specifically contemplating the appointment of a successor trustee. Thus, it is entirely appropriate for the court to appoint a successor trustee.

If the trust terminates as a result of Wanda's disclaimer (See Point Four), it would still be necessary to appoint a successor trustee to prepare the necessary accounting and distribute the trust principal to the correct beneficiaries. However, a court may simply direct the personal representative of Harry's estate to assume these duties.

Because Wanda has validly disclaimed her income interest in the trust, it is appropriate to accelerate the distribution of the trust principal under these facts and make an immediate distribution to the persons entitled to the trust principal without awaiting Wanda's death. However, it is unclear whether there is an implied gift to Harry's issue (Charles in this case). If so, Charles is entitled to the trust principal. If not, the trust principal is distributable to Harry's heirs (i.e., one-third to Wanda and two-thirds to Charles).

Under the doctrine of acceleration, if the income beneficiary of a trust disclaims his or her interest, the trust principal becomes immediately distributable to the presumptive remainder beneficiaries of the trust provided no one would be harmed by making a distribution to them earlier than it would have been made had the income beneficiary not disclaimed. See generally Ohio National Bank of Columbus v. Adair, 54 Ohio St. 2d 26, 374 N.E.2d 415 (1978). See also Simes, THE LAW OF FUTURE INTERESTS § 110. For example, a remainder might not accelerate if to do so would result in the class gift to the remainder beneficiaries closing earlier than it otherwise would.

In this case, however, no one would be harmed by an acceleration because the identity of the persons entitled to the trust principal is not dependent on whether the distribution of the remainder accelerates or must await the death of Wanda. Rather, the ultimate identity of the takers of the trust principal depends on whether there is an implied gift to Harry's issue who survived Harry. At the time the trust was created, Harry clearly specified what was to happen if he died without issue. He stated that in such case the principal should be distributed to his nieces and nephews—Mary and Pat. Thus, their interest could vest only if Harry died without issue. Because Harry died with issue, the gift to the nieces and nephews clearly fails.

Harry, however, failed to state who would take the trust property under the circumstances that actually occurred—if he died with issue. In such a case, the courts have split between inferring a gift to the issue (i.e., construing the trust to mean “upon [Wanda’s] death, to Harry’s issue but if Harry dies without issue, to Harry’s surviving nieces and nephews”) or finding that the gift of the remainder interest failed, resulting in the trust property reverting to the grantor’s estate as undisposed of property. Theoretically, the controlling principle in construing the ambiguous instrument is to give effect to Harry’s intent. Often, however, the grantor’s intent is not readily determinable.

Some courts in these cases infer a gift to issue because “it is difficult to see why the [grantor] has made no provision for [his] issue although he has expressly provided for [his] death without issue.” Simes, supra § 100. Thus, the court assumes that the intended gift to issue was inadvertently omitted and, therefore, constructs the gift to accomplish the grantor’s presumed intent.

Other courts hold that the trust property is distributed to the successors of the grantor’s estate on the theory that the grantor retained a reversion and that to construct a gift to issue is tantamount to writing a trust for the grantor and making a gift that is wholly speculative. If the trust property is distributable through Harry’s estate by way of a reversion, it passes to his heirs via intestate succession, and it is distributable one-third to Wanda and two-thirds to Charles. Because Wanda’s disclaimer was limited to her interest in the trust property, the disclaimer did not apply to any property distributable to her as part of Harry’s estate.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS ANALYSIS

(Secured Transactions IV.C, IV.F, III.C, IB)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) What is the relative priority of the security interests of Arcade's three creditors?
- (2) Does Oscar, as a buyer in the ordinary course of business, take free of security interests created by Arcade?

DISCUSSION

Point One (60-70%)

Under the first-to-file-or-perfect rule, Bank would have priority over Finance and Supplier. However, Supplier's security interest qualifies for priority because it is a purchase money security interest (PMSI) and Supplier complied with the requirements of UCC § 9-312(3) [Revised 9-324(b)]. Accordingly, Supplier has priority, followed by Bank, then Finance.

As between secured creditors, the general priority rule is UCC § 9-312(5)(a) [Rev. 9-322(a)(1)] — the first to file or perfect has priority. Bank filed on February 12 although it did not perfect until July 1 when Arcade signed a security agreement on Bank's behalf. See UCC § 9-203, UCC § 9-303 [Rev. 9-308] (noting that perfection requires attachment and that attachment typically requires a signed security agreement). Pursuant to the general rule, however, February 12 is Bank's priority date.

Finance filed and perfected on June 5 since its security interest had previously attached (i.e., on June 1, Arcade had rights in its existing inventory, Finance gave value through its loan, and Arcade signed a security agreement). See UCC § 9-203, UCC § 9-303 [Rev. 9-308]. Thus, June 5 is Finance's priority date. Bank, therefore, beats Finance in the remaining inventory. (Both have an after-acquired property clause in their security agreements that gives rise to a security interest in any new inventory that Arcade purchases.)

Supplier filed and perfected on August 21, assuming that Arcade had some rights in the collateral as of the purchase date of August 20. For example, the actual pinball machines that were the subject of the sale were identified on that date. See UCC § 2-501. In any event, perfection would occur no later than possession by Arcade on August 31. See UCC § 9-201, 9-203. Pursuant to the general rule, Supplier's priority is behind both Bank and Finance. Supplier, however, may take advantage of an exception to the general rule for purchase money security interests (PMSIs) in inventory. Section 9-312(3) of the UCC [Rev. 9-324(b)] states that a perfected PMSI in inventory has priority over a conflicting security interest in the same inventory if the PMSI is perfected at the time the debtor receives possession of the inventory, and if the conflicting security interest holders receive proper notice within five years before the debtor receives possession of the inventory. See UCC § 9-312(3)(a)-(d) [Rev. 9-324(b)(3)].

Supplier did take a PMSI because Supplier took a security interest to secure all or part of the price of the pinball machines that it sold to Arcade. See UCC § 9-107(a) [Rev. 9-103]. In addition, it is a PMSI in inventory because Arcade is a seller of pinball arcade games; thus, the machines purchased by Arcade are presumably “held by [Arcade] who holds them for sale . . .” See UCC § 9-109(4) [Rev. 9-102(a)(48)] (defining “inventory”). Indeed, the facts of the problem state that the machines were placed in Arcade’s showroom “for sale to customers.” Thus, the pinball machines are properly characterized as “inventory” of Arcade. See UCC § 9-109(4) [Rev. 9-102(a)(48)].

As mentioned, Supplier filed and probably perfected on August 21, which indicates that the PMSI was perfected “at the time [Arcade] receive[d] possession of the inventory” on August 31. UCC § 9-312(3)(a) [Rev. 9-324(b)(1)]. Finally, the facts of the problem indicate that “proper notice of [Supplier’s] security interest [was sent] to all relevant creditors, including Bank and Finance,” and that such notice was received before Arcade got possession of the machines on August 31. Thus, the notice requirements of UCC § 9-312(3)(b)-(d) [Rev. 9-324(b)(2)-(4)] are met. (The facts of the problem state that “proper” notice was sent so there is no need to discuss whether the content of the notice was correct.) Because the requirements of UCC § 9-312(3) [Rev. 9-324(b)] are met, Supplier has priority in the pinball machines over both Bank and Finance, as they hold “conflicting security interests” in the same inventory.” UCC § 9-312(3) [Rev. 9-324(b)]. (Note that Bank and Finance hold conflicting security interests because their after-acquired property clauses attached to the pinball machines as soon as Arcade had rights in the collateral, which would be no later than possession on August 31. See UCC §§ 9-203, 9-204.)

In summary, therefore, the order of priority in the two remaining pinball machines is (1) Supplier, (2) Bank, and (3) Finance.

Point Two (30-40%)

Because Oscar is a buyer in the ordinary course, he takes free of all security interests created by his seller (Arcade). Thus, Bank, Finance, and Supplier have no security interest to enforce in the pinball machine purchased by Oscar.

The general rule is that security interests are enforceable against purchasers of the collateral. See UCC § 9-201. Indeed, in general, security interests continue in collateral notwithstanding its sale, exchange, or other disposition. See UCC § 9-306(2) [Rev. 9-315(a)(1)]. Under UCC § 9-307(1) [Rev. 9-320(a)], however, a buyer in the ordinary course of business takes free of a security interest created by his seller even if the security interest is perfected and even if the buyer knows of the security interest. A buyer in the ordinary course means a person who, in good faith and without knowledge that the sale to him is in violation of the security interest of a third party, buys in the ordinary course from a person in the business of selling goods of that kind. See UCC § 1-201(9). Arcade is in the business of selling pinball arcade games. There are no facts suggesting that Oscar acted in bad faith. In addition, the problem states that Oscar “had no actual knowledge” of any security interests in the pinball machine he purchased.

Because Oscar’s purchase satisfies the requirements of UCC § 9-307(1) [Rev. 9-320(a)], Oscar takes the pinball machine free of all three security interests. Bank, Finance, and Supplier have no security interest to enforce in the pinball machine purchased by Oscar.

(Decedents' Estates II.D, II.F)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Was the bequest of the watch to Ben properly revoked, such that the watch passes to Chris?
- (2) Is Sarah entitled to receive the dining room table, the automobile, or neither?
- (3) Is Nicole entitled to the balance of Testator's tangible personal property under the doctrine of incorporation by reference?
- (4) To whom should the undisposed of property (the $10,000 bank account) be distributed?

DISCUSSION

Point One (25-30%)

The gift of the watch to Ben was not revoked by either physical act or cancellation. It was revoked, however, by a subsequent will since State A law permits testators to execute holographic wills. Thus, the watch passes to Chris.

State A law permits wills to be completely or partially revoked by the execution of a subsequent will or by physical act or cancellation. In this case, no physical act was done to the face of the will to evidence that either the entire will or any of its provisions were revoked. On the other hand, on the back of the will, Testator, in her own handwriting, stated: "I don't want Ben to have my watch. I want it to go to my first cousin, Chris." Because these words do not come into physical contact with the words of the will, they are not words of revocation. Thompson v. Royall, 175 S.E. 748 (Va. 1934). But see Unif. Prob. Code § 2-507 (permitting revocation by cancellation even though words of cancellation do not touch words of the will). However, under the laws of State A, these words can be construed as a holographic codicil.

In some states, the handwriting on the back of the will would not be a valid holographic will because of underlying state statutes requiring holographic wills to be signed. See, e.g., Unif. Prob. Code § 2-502(b)(requiring holographic wills to be signed). State A, however, has no signature requirement.

A holographic will can revoke an earlier typewritten will. See generally Mangum v. Fuller, 797 S.W.2d 452 (Ark. 1990). If the subsequently executed holographic will only disposes of a part of the estate disposed of in the typewritten will, then the typewritten will is revoked only to the extent that it is inconsistent with the provisions of the holographic will. See Gilbert v. Gilbert, 652 S.W.2d 663 (Ky. Ct. App. 1983). See also Unif. Prob. Code § 2-507(a)(1)(partial revocation by inconsistency). Here, the holographic will is inconsistent with the typewritten will only to the extent that it leaves the watch to Chris, rather than Ben. Thus, no other disposition in the typewritten will is revoked.

Point Two (35-50%)

The bequest of the dining room table to Sarah was revoked by physical act. Testator revoked the original bequest with the apparent intent of substituting for it a bequest of the automobile. However, the substituted bequest cannot be sustained as a holographic will because it was typewritten. Furthermore, the doctrine of dependent relative revocation is not likely to apply to prevent the bequest of the table from being revoked.

Under State A law, a bequest may be revoked by cancellation if the cancellation is accompanied by an intent to revoke. When a will is found with marks of cancellation upon it (here, the scratches through the phrase “dining room table”), a presumption arises that such marks were made by the testator with the intent to revoke. See generally W. McGovern, S. Kurtz, and J. Rein, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES § 5.2 (1988). Here, no facts suggest that such marks of cancellation could have been done by anyone but Testator and in light of the presumption, such marks were done by the Testator with the intent to revoke. However, typing the word “automobile” above “dining room table” suggests that Testator revoked the bequest of the dining room table in order to substitute for it a bequest of the automobile. Unfortunately, that typed bequest was neither signed nor witnessed and cannot be sustained as a valid holographic codicil because it was not in Testator’s handwriting. Thus, Sarah takes nothing unless the revocation of the bequest of the dining room table can be avoided under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation.

Under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation, a revocation can be deemed conditional on the validity of a subsequently executed will or codicil if that would accomplish the testator’s intent. W. McGovern, S. Kurtz, and J. Rein, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES § 5.3 (1988). Under this doctrine, if the subsequently executed will is invalid, then the revocation which was dependent upon it is ignored. Id. Typically, however, courts apply that doctrine only when there is a sufficiently close identity between the bequest that was revoked and the bequest that was expressed in the invalid subsequent will. Here, there is no such close identity between a dining room table and an automobile, and accordingly a court is unlikely to apply the doctrine of dependent relative revocation to prevent the bequest of the dining room table from being revoked. If, on the other hand, Sarah could find evidence that Testator’s revocation was conditional, then she would be entitled to the dining room table. See Point Three for disposition of the automobile and the dining room table.

Under the doctrine of incorporation by reference, Nicole should be entitled to the balance of Testator’s tangible personal property.

Under the doctrine of incorporation by reference, a will may refer to an unattested written document and incorporate its terms into the will so long as that written document was in existence at the time the will was signed and the evidence is clear that testator intended to incorporate its terms into her will. See, e.g., Smith v. Weitzel, 338 S.W.2d 628 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1960); W. McGovern, S. Kurtz, and J. Rein, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES § 6.3 (1988). See also Unif. Prob. Code § 2-510. Where such a document is incorporated the dispositive provisions in it are given the same effect as if they had been set forth in the duly attested will. Here, the letter referred to in Testator's will was dated May 17, 1997, the day before Testator signed her will. Thus, it was in existence on the date Testator signed the will. Testator's will specifically refers to the letter by date and reflects a clear intent that the disposition in the letter be given effect. Thus, Nicole should be entitled to all of Testator's remaining tangibles, and probably the specific tangibles ineffectively bequeathed to Sarah. See Point Two. (This presumes that item three of the will operates like a residuary clause but with respect to the tangibles only.) Some states have statutes that specifically authorize the bequest of tangibles in the manner used here and validate such bequests even if the memo was executed after the will. See, e.g., Unif. Prob. Code § 2-513.

The bank account should be distributed to Sarah and Ben as the sole heirs of Testator.

Where a testator's will fails to dispose of all of the testator's property, the undisposed of property passes to the testator's heirs. See, e.g., Levy v. Hebrew Technical Institute, 196 So. 2d 225 (Fla. Ct. App. 1967). Typically, the intestacy laws of the states provide that, absent descendants or a spouse, an intestate's property is distributed to (1) parents, (2) the descendants of the parents, (3) more remote ancestors, and (4) their descendants, in that order. Here, Testator's closest living relatives are Sarah and Ben and as such they are equally entitled to all of Testator's property not disposed of by Testator's will.

FAMILY LAW ANALYSIS

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is State B required to recognize the child support order of State A?
- (2) Does State B have jurisdiction to modify the child support order?
- (3) When will a court reduce a child support award due to changed circumstances, and can the reduction be made retroactive?
- (4) When will a court increase or extend a spousal support award due to changed circumstances?

DISCUSSION

Point One (20-30%)

State B is required to recognize the child support order of State A.

Under federal law, states are required to give full faith and credit to child support awards from other states. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1738B(a) each state: “(1) shall enforce according to its terms a child support order made consistently with this section by a court of another State.” Section 1738B is known as the Full Faith and Credit for Child Support Orders Act.

Section IV-D of the Social Security Act also requires a state, as a condition of participation in the federally funded child support programs, to have procedures that require that “any payment or installment of support under any child support order . . . [be] . . . entitled as a judgment to full faith and credit in such State and in any other State.” 42 U.S.C. § 666(a)(9). This amendment to the Social Security Act may also be called The Child Support Enforcement Act or the IV-D Program.

Hence, Father cannot evade the State A child support order by moving to State B. State B must recognize and enforce the State A order. It is no longer the case that child support orders are not entitled to full faith and credit.

The same result is mandated by the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA), legislation which states are required to adopt under federal law. Section IV-D of the Social Security Act requires that a state, as a condition of participation in the federally funded child support programs, have UIFSA in effect. 42 U.S.C. § 666(f). UIFSA provides a simple procedure for the registration of the child support order of another state. The order is then enforced in the same manner as an order issued by the registering state. UIFSA § 603. Mother can use UIFSA to enforce the State A order in State B.

State B does not have jurisdiction to modify the child support order.

State B does not have jurisdiction to modify the State A child support order. Under federal law, each state “shall not seek or make a modification of . . . [a child support] order except in accordance with subsection .” 28 U.S.C. § 1738B(a). (Full Faith and Credit for Child Support Orders Act). Subsection (e) of the Full Faith and Credit for Child Support Orders Act prohibits the modification of child support orders issued by a court with continuing exclusive jurisdiction, unless no contestant or child resides there, or unless each contestant has agreed in writing to allow another state to assert jurisdiction. Those requirements are not met here because Mother and children still reside in State A, and Mother has not consented to State B’s assuming jurisdiction to modify.

This same result is mandated by UIFSA. Section 205 of UIFSA confers continuing, exclusive jurisdiction on the state issuing the child support order unless no litigant or child resides there, or unless each party has consented to another state’s modification jurisdiction. State A continues to have jurisdiction, and State B cannot modify. Section 603(c) of UIFSA requires that states enforce without modification the child support orders of other states.

Point Three (35-45%)

A court will reduce a child support award when there has been a material and substantial change in circumstances; however, such a change in circumstances has not been demonstrated here. Further, a court cannot order a retroactive modification of a child support order.

In most jurisdictions, modifications of child support orders may be made only upon a showing of a substantial and continuing change in circumstances making the prior order unreasonable. Under the Uniform Marriage and Divorce Act (UMDA), modification of a child support order is allowed “only upon a showing of changed circumstances so substantial and continuing as to make the terms unconscionable.” Unif. Marriage and Div. Act § 316(a), 9A U.L.A. 102 (1987). However, modifications based on changed circumstances are allowed in most jurisdictions upon the less stringent showing of a material or substantial change of circumstances, although the burden on the party requesting the modification is still a heavy one. Donald T. Kramer, LEGAL RIGHTS OF CHILDREN § 4.07 (2d ed. 1994 and Supp. 1997). Under any standard, however, the changes must be more or less permanent, rather than temporary. Id. Although Father has been unemployed for three months, he did receive 50 percent of his annual salary in severance pay and other benefits at the time of his termination. Since his job prospects are good, it is likely that his unemployment will only be temporary. In addition, the stated reasons for Father’s move to State B provide some evidence of bad faith by Father. Therefore, it is unlikely that his child support payment will be reduced at this time. If, however, the court were to reduce Father’s child support obligation, the reduction would be calculated under the state’s child support guidelines and would not likely be the $1,000 that Father requests. If Father turns out to be unable to find a job after a lengthy period, the court would be more likely to reduce the amount of the payments.

The court could also impute income to Father, based upon his prior employment history, education, and efforts (or lack thereof) to find employment.

Moreover, under UMDA, a modification of support can be made retroactive only from the date of service of the motion to modify on the other party. Unif. Marriage and Div. Act § 316(a), 9A U.L.A. 102 (1987). Here, if the court were able to modify the child support obligation, the modification could only be made retroactive to the date of service on Mother and cannot be made six months retroactive. Therefore, Father will owe the full amount of the child support arrearage, which is $12,000.

Federal law requires the same result with respect to retroactive modification of child support orders. Section IV-D of the Social Security Act requires a state, as a condition of participation in the federally funded child support programs, to have procedures that require that “any payment or installment of support under any child support order . . . [be] . . . not subject to retroactive modification by such State or by any other State.” 42 U.S.C. § 666(a)(9).

An award of spousal support is modifiable only when there has been a substantial change in circumstances.

Modification of spousal support is allowed only upon a showing of a substantial and continuing change in circumstances making the prior order unreasonable. Under UMDA, a modification of spousal support is allowed “only upon a showing of changed circumstances so substantial and continuing as to make the terms unconscionable.” Unif. Marriage and Div. Act § 316(a), 9A U.L.A. 102 (1987). Most jurisdictions are not as stringent as UMDA, but most place a heavy burden on the party requesting the modification (e.g., requiring a “substantial change in circumstances that rendered the original award unreasonable and unfair.” Hecker v. Hecker, 568 N.W.2d 705 (Minn. 1997)). Courts consider whether the change in circumstances was anticipated at the time the original award was made and the good faith of the party asking for the modification. See, e.g., Pope v. Pope, 559 N.W.2d 192 (Neb. 1997).

A change in the payor’s ability to pay or in the recipient’s needs would be the type of change a court would consider. Mother now has increased need because her income has been reduced by one-fourth. Since her workload includes being the custodial parent of the parties’ two children, it seems very reasonable that she would follow her doctor’s orders not to resume full-time work. Her loss of income was unanticipated and may be permanent. There is no indication of bad faith on her part. Mother presents a sympathetic case for an extension and an upward modification of her maintenance award. However, Father’s circumstances have also changed. His circumstances are discussed under Point Three above.

Overall, it is debatable whether Mother would succeed in having her award increased, particularly in a jurisdiction that took as strong a stand against modification as reflected in UMDA. Although her income has been reduced by one-fourth, there is no indication of other, unexpected expenses. Since her original award was for five years, she will be receiving maintenance for four more years under the original award. Her age, work experience, and duration of the marriage were factors that would have been considered in making the original award and would have tended not to support an award of long-term maintenance since she has been employed, she is not near retirement age, and the marriage was not of extremely long duration. Therefore, it seems unlikely that the court would order an increase in the duration of the maintenance award at this time.

On the other hand, it is possible that the spousal support amount should be increased at this time because of the permanent decrease in her earnings. She seems unable to provide adequate self-support based on the change in her physical condition. It is probably premature, however, to ask for a change in duration.

COMMERCIAL PAPER/AGENCY ANALYSIS

(Commercial Paper IV.E, IV.D, V.A, V.K, VII.A / Agency IV.B)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Can Singer recover from Bank Two for conversion on the ground that Bank Two took the instrument with notice of a breach of Agent's fiduciary duty to Singer?
- (2) Was the instrument properly paid by Bank One?
- (3) Was Concert's obligation to Singer discharged by payment to Agent?

DISCUSSION

Point One (45-50%)

Singer may recover from Bank Two for conversion on the ground that because Bank Two took the instrument with notice that Agent had breached her fiduciary duty, Bank Two was not a holder in due course.

The facts state that the check was issued to "Agent, as agent for Singer," and was issued for money owed to Singer by Concert. As between Singer and Agent, Singer is the owner of the check, and is the principal in a principal-agent relationship with Agent. In UCC terms, Singer is a "represented person" (UCC § 3-307(a)(2)) and Agent is a "fiduciary" (UCC § 3-307(a)(1)).

When Agent convinced Bank Two to deposit the check into Agent's personal account and use the proceeds for Agent's personal benefit, Agent violated her fiduciary duty to Singer and misappropriated Singer's property. This misappropriation of the Concert check gives rise to a claim by Singer to the instrument or its proceeds based on Agent's breach of fiduciary duty. UCC §§ 3-306, 3-307(b)(iii).

Singer's claim to the instrument and its proceeds may be asserted against Agent and against subsequent takers of the instrument. Therefore, because Bank Two also misused Singer's property (by receiving payment of the check and using the proceeds to cover Agent's overdrafts and increase her personal account balance), Bank Two may be liable for converting Singer's property—the check and its proceeds. See UCC § 3-420. But, if Bank Two is a holder in due course, it takes free of such claim UCC § 3-306. If Bank Two is not a holder in due course, it will be subject to Singer's claim. UCC § 3-306.

To be a holder in due course, Bank Two must be a holder, and it must have taken the check in good faith, for value and without notice of any claims or defenses. In this case, Bank Two, as the depository bank of a check bearing a proper restrictive endorsement (UCC § 3-206 (c)), is a holder and it has given value, the extinguishment of the overdraft (UCC § 3-303(a)(3)). Bank Two appears to have acted in good faith, though it could be argued that the Bank Two manager failed to follow "reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing," when he allowed Agent to deposit the check into Agent's personal account, at clear variance with past practice with regard to checks written to Agent as Singer's agent. The more powerful argument for Singer, however, is that Bank Two had notice of Singer's claim to the instrument and for that reason could not be a holder in due course.

Section 3-307(b)(1) of the UCC provides expressly that a taker's "notice of a breach of fiduciary duty" by a fiduciary is "notice of the claim of the represented person." Thus, to the extent that Bank Two had notice of a breach of fiduciary duty, it cannot be a holder in due course because it will be treated as having notice of Singer's claim to the check.

To be charged with notice under UCC § 3-307(b)(1), the taker, here Manager on behalf of Bank Two, must have had knowledge of two facts. First, the taker must have knowledge of the fiduciary status of the fiduciary. UCC § 9-307(b)(ii). Second, the taker must know that the check payable to the fiduciary is being taken in payment of a personal debt of the fiduciary (UCC § 9-307(b)(2)(i)), or deposited to an account other than the account of the fiduciary, as a fiduciary. UCC § 9-307(b)(2)(iii). Manager clearly knew that Agent was the fiduciary of Singer, given that the check was payable to Agent in her fiduciary capacity and Manager knew that Agent had deposited similar checks in Singer's account. Manager also knew that the check was being deposited to extinguish the personal overdraft of Agent and was deposited in Agent's personal account. Thus, Bank Two had notice of the breach of the fiduciary duty of Agent and therefore had notice of the claim of the represented person UCC § 3-307(b)(1). Accordingly, Bank Two is precluded from holder in due course status because of such notice (UCC § 3-302(a)(2)(v)) and is, therefore, subject to the claim of Singer. UCC §§ 3-306, 3-420.

The check from Concert has long since been negotiated and paid by Bank One, so Singer no longer has any claim to the instrument. He does, however, have a claim to recover the proceeds against Bank Two as a converter of the instrument and its proceeds. Under UCC § 3-420, "The law applicable to conversion of personal property applies to instruments." The measure of Singer's recovery is presumed to be the amount payable on the instrument, here $20,000.

Point Two (25-35%)

Singer has no rights against Bank One because Bank One had no notice of Agent's breach of fiduciary duty or that the check was taken by Bank Two for Agent's debt.

Because the check was issued payable to the order of Agent and it was indorsed with Agent's signature, there was no forged indorsement. UCC § 3-110(c). Moreover, because Bank One did not take the instrument from Agent, it had no knowledge that the check had been taken for the debt of Agent.

Bank One is not liable to Singer in conversion because Agent was authorized to collect payment on behalf of Singer. Furthermore, the check was payable to the order of Agent, properly indorsed, and properly paid by Bank One upon presentment by Bank Two. Under UCC § 1-201(20), Bank Two was a "holder" and therefore a "person entitled to enforce the instrument." UCC § 3-301. This is true even though Bank Two was not a holder in due course.

Accordingly, Singer has no rights against Bank One.

Point Three (15-25%)

Singer has no rights against Concert because Concert had paid an agent authorized to receive payment, and payment of the check discharged all underlying obligations.

Agent was authorized to collect funds owed to Singer for Singer's performance. Payment to an agent authorized to receive payment on behalf of the principal is considered payment to the principal. As stated in the RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 178(1)(1957), "If an agent, authorized to receive only money in payment of a debt, receives a check or other thing from the debtor and obtains the amount of the debt from the negotiation or sale of the thing received, the debt is paid."

Under the UCC, issuance of the check to the authorized agent suspends Singer's right to collect on the underlying obligation, and payment of the check results in discharge of the underlying obligation to the extent of the amount of the check. UCC § 3-310(b)(1).

Here the debt Concert owed Singer was $20,000, and the amount of the check was $20,000. The check was indorsed by the payee, presented by the depository bank, a holder under these facts, and paid by Bank One. Therefore payment of the check by Bank One, which resulted in Agent's receiving the full amount, discharged the $20,000 debt owed by Concert to Singer. See UCC §§ 3-602, 3-310(b)(1).

Singer has no rights against Concert.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure VI E, VI, F)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) May a litigant who was not a party to a prior judgment invoke that judgment against another litigant who was a party in order to preclude relitigation of the identical issue previously decided?
- (2)(a) Is a federal district court's order refusing to grant summary judgment on collateral estoppel grounds a final judgment?
- (2)(b) Are there any exceptions to the final judgment rule that would permit review of an order refusing to grant summary judgment?

DISCUSSION

Point One (45-55%)

Plaintiff, a non-party to the SEC v. Silver action, may rely on the decision in that action to prevent Silver from relitigating the question of whether Silver's registration statement was false and misleading.

This question involves the scope of the doctrine of collateral estoppel and the right of a non-party to an action to use collateral estoppel offensively against a losing party in the action. If Silver is precluded by the SEC v. Silver judgment from relitigating the question of whether its registration statement was false or misleading, and if Plaintiff is entitled to assert that preclusive effect against Silver, then Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on that issue should have been granted.

The doctrine of collateral estoppel (or issue preclusion) generally prevents a litigant from relitigating issues that have been previously litigated and determined in a prior action. The traditional requirements for asserting collateral estoppel are: (1) a valid and final judgment was rendered in a prior action; (2) an issue of fact was actually litigated, determined, and essential to the judgment in the prior action; (3) the same issue arises in a subsequent action; and (4) the same parties are litigants in both actions. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF JUDGMENTS § 27 (1982).

The first three elements of this test are clearly satisfied. First, the judgment in the prior case (SEC v. Silver) was final according to the facts. Second, the issue of fact relating to the misrepresentation was actually litigated, determined, and essential to the judgment in the prior action. Here, Silver vigorously contested the misrepresentation claims in the SEC lawsuit. Moreover, the finding of misrepresentation in that lawsuit was the basis for a grant of both declaratory and injunctive relief. Thus, the factual misrepresentation issues were actually litigated, determined (e.g., declaratory judgment), and essential to the judgment enjoining Silver. Third, the misrepresentation issues in the prior action, SEC v. Silver, were identical to the misrepresentation claims in the subsequent action, Plaintiff v. Silver. Both actions revolved around whether the registration statement contained false and misleading representations of fact. However, the parties to the current action are not the same, and that fact alone would prevent collateral estoppel under traditional doctrine.

The modern approach to collateral estoppel, however, allows a non-party to the prior litigation (like Plaintiff) to invoke collateral estoppel against a party to the prior litigation, at least under certain circumstances. Section 29 of the RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF JUDGMENTS reflects the modern view in stating that “[a] party precluded from relitigating an issue with an opposing party, in accordance with Sections 27 and 28, is also precluded from doing so with another person unless the fact that he lacked full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue in the first action or other circumstances justify affording him an opportunity to relitigate the issue.” When § 29 applies, there is a new fourth element in place of the “same parties” requirement. The new fourth element is that the party to be precluded had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the same issue in the prior action.

In Parklane Hosiery Co. v. Shore, 439 U.S. 322 (1979), the U.S. Supreme Court adopted this approach, upholding the use of offensive collateral estoppel against Parklane, which had litigated the relevant misrepresentation issues in a prior action brought by the SEC. Shore, a non-party to the prior lawsuit, was allowed to use collateral estoppel against Parklane in a subsequent lawsuit to preclude Parklane from relitigating the same issue a second time. The Court held that Parklane was not unfairly prejudiced because it had had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issues in the earlier lawsuit. Thus, the Parklane case is consistent with the requirements of § 29, and it adopts offensive collateral estoppel as controlling federal law in federal courts.

Thus, while Plaintiff was not a party to the SEC lawsuit, and therefore could not have been bound if the SEC lawsuit judgment had been for Silver, Plaintiff is permitted to use collateral estoppel offensively in the subsequent lawsuit provided that Silver had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the same issue in the prior lawsuit. Here, Silver had that opportunity, and it vigorously litigated those issues. Accordingly, the trial judge erred in denying Plaintiff’s motion for summary judgment.

Point Two(a)(30-40%)

The appellate court should dismiss Plaintiff’s interlocutory appeal because there is no final judgment, and the appeal is premature.

The basic policy governing appeals from district court decisions is embodied in the final judgment rule, which prohibits appeals, with some exceptions, prior to entry of a final judgment by the trial court at the completion of the case in the trial court. This policy is designed to prevent the negative impact on trial and appellate courts that would occur if there were several appeals from rulings of the trial court during the course of the trial of a case. Frequent appeals would disrupt the trial court’s ability to move forward with the case and would strain the judicial resources of the appellate courts. The final judgment policy is embodied in Title 28 U.S.C. § 1291, which provides in relevant part that “the courts of appeals . . . shall have jurisdiction of appeals from all final decisions of the district courts of the United States.”

Plaintiff's appeal of the denial of the motion for summary judgment is clearly interlocutory and not final. Although the statute does not define "final decision," the courts hold that a "final decision is one that ends the litigation on the merits so that the only thing left for the district court to do is to execute the judgment." MOORE'S FEDERAL PRACTICE § 201.10 (3d ed. 1998). Here, the denial of Plaintiff's motion does not end the litigation; to the contrary, the trial on the merits will be more complex because of the decision. There was, accordingly, no final decision, and Plaintiff's appeal was premature under § 1291 unless an exception applies. See generally Cunningham v. Hamilton County, Ohio, 527 U.S. 198 (1999).

There are no exceptions to the final judgment rule that are likely to apply to these facts.

The applicants are asked to discuss the following exceptions to the final judgment rule: (1) the collateral order doctrine, Cohen v. Beneficial Life Insurance Co., 337 U.S. 541 (1949), and (2) mandamus review under 28 U.S.C. § 1651(a); Kerr v. U.S. District Court, 426 U.S. 394 (1976).

The collateral order doctrine allows review of final orders of district court judges when those orders are collateral to (or separate from) the merits of the lawsuit, and the orders are effectively unreviewable on appeal. Cunningham v. Hamilton County, Ohio, 527 U.S. 198 (1999); Cohen v. Beneficial Life Insurance Co., 337 U.S. 541, 546. Here, however, the order at issue (allowing relitigation of the issue of misrepresentation) is intimately connected with the merits of the lawsuit and is certainly subject to review on appeal of any final judgment. The collateral order doctrine is therefore inapplicable.

Plaintiff will not be able to rely on mandamus review because this requires a showing that the trial court decision is beyond its jurisdiction or violated a mandatory duty owed by the trial court. Will v. United States, 389 U.S. 90, 95 (1967); Kerr v. U.S. District Court, 426 U.S. 394 (1976). Although the trial court should have granted the motion for partial summary judgment, the fact that the trial court made an error of law does not warrant mandamus where there is otherwise no abuse of judicial authority. A wider use of mandamus to review legal errors would effectively eviscerate the final judgment rule, and appellate courts have accordingly been wary of a broad application of mandamus review. "A party may not use a writ of mandamus to correct ordinary error by the district court. . . . The burden is on the applicant to show intolerable error or misbehavior." MOORE'S FEDERAL PRACTICE § 201.44 (3d ed. 1998). The error in this case would not cross that high threshold, at least absent some evidence of extraordinary hardship to Plaintiff as a result of the error.

Preface

This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2002 and July 2002 Multistate Essay Examinations. Each test includes seven questions; most jurisdictions that use the MEE select the six questions their applicants will answer.

The model analyses to the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. These models are not an official grading guide. Some jurisdictions grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses as they wish, including the suggested weights given to particular points. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topic or topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by Roman numerals which refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that topic. For example, Question 1 on the February 2002 MEE tested Federal Civil Procedure I.A, subject matter jurisdiction, and I.E, venue. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet and can also be found at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE is a three-hour examination consisting of six questions. The examination is administered in one continuous three-hour time period. Applicants are expected to spend approximately thirty minutes answering each of the questions. The areas of law covered by the questions in the examination are: Agency and Partnership, Commercial Paper, Conflict of Laws, Corporations and Limited Liability Companies, Decedents' Estates, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Sales, Secured Transactions, and Trusts and Future Interests. Some questions include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You will have three hours in which to write your answers to six of the seven questions contained in this booklet; you will be told which of the questions you are to answer. Each question is designed to be answered in thirty minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts which are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show: an understanding of the facts; a recognition of the issues included; the applicable principles of law; and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Some jurisdictions instruct applicants to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

Question 1

Teacher lived in State A, where he taught in the public schools for eight years. Toward the end of his eighth year, Teacher was offered a lucrative teaching position in State B. Teacher decided to accept the offer and to move to State B. Teacher notified his school principal that he was leaving and put his State A home up for sale.

The day he sold his house, Teacher packed his belongings, rented a truck from Rentco, a State C corporation with its principal place of business in State A, and began the long drive to State B. While speeding on a State A highway toward State B, Teacher came upon a slow-moving car and applied the brakes in an effort to avoid an accident. The brakes failed, and Teacher rear-ended the slow-moving car. Passenger, a citizen of State A who was riding in the slower car, suffered severe back and neck injuries in the collision. After the State A police prepared a report of the accident, Teacher continued on to State B. Shortly after he arrived there, he purchased a home and began his new job.

Nine months after the accident, Passenger filed suit against Teacher in the United States District Court for the District of State A, alleging that Teacher's negligence caused Passenger serious personal injury. Passenger's complaint sought damages in excess of $100,000.

Teacher timely moved to dismiss the complaint on the grounds that the court lacked subject matter jurisdiction and that venue was improper. While the motion to dismiss was pending, Teacher filed a third-party complaint against Rentco, seeking indemnification and claiming that the accident occurred because the brakes on the rental truck were defective. Before Teacher's motion could be heard, Passenger amended her complaint to state a claim directly against Rentco for negligence.

1. How should the federal district court rule on Teacher's motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction? Explain.
2. How should the federal district court rule on Teacher's motion to dismiss for improper venue? Explain.
3. If the district court were to deny Teacher's motion to dismiss on both grounds, would it have subject matter jurisdiction over Passenger's direct claim against Rentco? Explain.

Question 2

On January 2, Bank loaned Debtor $5,000 and took a security interest in Debtor's "equipment now owned or hereafter acquired." On that date, Debtor signed a valid security agreement and financing statement that properly described the collateral. The security agreement contained a proper future advance clause. On January 3, Bank filed the financing statement in the correct locations.

On February 1, Seller sold a $10,000 computer to Debtor on credit for use in Debtor's business. To secure payment of the purchase price, Seller took a security interest in the computer. Also on February 1, Debtor signed a valid security agreement and financing statement for Seller that properly described the collateral. Seller, however, did not file the financing statement. Debtor received possession of the computer on February 12 and began using it in her business on that same day.

On February 14, the sheriff lawfully seized the computer pursuant to a writ of execution obtained by Larry, a judgment creditor of Debtor, and sent notice of the levy to Bank. Bank received the notice on February 16. On February 17, Bank advanced Debtor $12,000.

On February 20, Seller learned of Larry's levy. That same day, Seller filed in the correct locations the financing statement it had received from Debtor on February 1.

On March 1, Debtor defaulted on her obligation to Bank and on her obligation to Seller.

1. As between Bank and Seller, which has the superior security interest in the computer? Explain.
2. As between Seller and Larry, which has a superior interest in the computer? Explain.
3. Is Bank's security interest in the computer as collateral for the $12,000 advance superior to Larry's claim? Explain.

Question 3

Several years ago, Bill, Carl, Donna, and several other participants formed a limited partnership named Transitions L.P., which operated a career counseling business. The limited partnership was properly formed, a written limited partnership agreement was properly executed, and all required filings were made in the proper state offices. The Certificate of Limited Partnership and the Limited Partnership Agreement do not modify any default provisions of the Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act.

Bill is the sole general partner in Transitions. Carl, Donna, and the remaining partners are limited partners. Although the career counseling industry has experienced a rapid boom in the past few years, Transitions' business has not been financially successful and no distributions of profits have been made to the limited partners. As a result, several of the limited partners, including Carl and Donna, are unhappy with Bill's management of Transitions.

Carl decided that the limited partners should reach a consensus on how Transitions' day-to-day business should be conducted and then force Bill to follow their instructions. Carl went to Bill asking questions about the business operations of the limited partnership and asking to see Transitions' limited partnership records, including a list of the names and addresses of the other partners. Bill refused to answer any of Carl's questions, to allow Carl to examine any limited partnership records, and to provide him with information about the other partners. Bill claims that even if the limited partners all agree to change the way Transitions' business is run, Bill has no obligation to listen to them.

Donna does not believe that Transitions will be able to succeed in business if Bill remains in control. When Carl tells Donna that Bill does not intend to give up management of Transitions, Donna sells her interest in the limited partnership to Edward. Donna informs Bill that she has sold her interest to Edward and that Edward is now a limited partner in Transitions. Bill tells Donna that he doesn't approve of the sale and that Edward has no rights in the limited partnership and is not a partner.

1. Can Carl and the other limited partners decide how the day-to-day business of Transitions is to be conducted? Explain.
2. What rights, if any, does Carl have to obtain information from Bill about the business operations and records of Transitions? Explain.
3. What rights, if any, did Edward acquire as a purchaser of Donna's interest in Transitions? Explain.

Question 4

Testator duly executed a will dated March 1, 1998. Among other things, the will stated:

1. I direct that all of my just debts and expenses be paid by my executor.
2. I give my family home to my daughter, Daughter.
3. I give my 24-carat gold watch to my son, Son.
4. I give the rest of my estate, including any property over which I may have a power of appointment, to Trustee to hold in trust for the primary benefit of Son and Daughter, with the remainder to their children.

Testator was the income beneficiary of two separate testamentary trusts, one created by Testator's mother, Mary, the other by Testator's father, Frank.

Testator had a special testamentary power of appointment exercisable in favor of Testator's issue over the testamentary trust created by Mary. Mary's will provided that Testator could exercise the power only by a specific reference to the power of appointment created by Mary's will.

Testator had a general testamentary power of appointment over the testamentary trust created by Frank.

Both Mary and Frank died in 1990. They were survived by Testator, Son, and Daughter.

At Testator's death in October 2001, Testator owned (a) the family home on which Testator was personally liable for a $50,000 mortgage, (b) an insurance policy that specifically insured Testator's 24-carat gold watch, which had been stolen from Testator five days before Testator died, and (c) a portfolio of stocks and bonds. Testator owned no other assets.

Bank was appointed executor of the estate. Trustee was named trustee of the trust created in paragraph 4 of Testator's will. Bank collected the value of the stolen watch from the insurance company.

1. Did Testator effectively exercise the two powers of appointment he had at the time of his death? Explain.
2. Should the $50,000 mortgage on Testator's home be paid out of the assets of Testator's residuary estate? Explain
3. Should the insurance proceeds for the stolen watch be distributed to Son, as legatee of the watch, or to Trustee? Explain.

Question 5

Seven months ago, Husband and his wife, Wife, were driving on a highway. Their daughter, Daughter, age 10, was in the backseat. While driving, Husband negligently turned the wheel of the car to the right and hit Frank's car. Frank had parked his car on the shoulder, turned on the emergency flashing lights, and was changing a flat tire. The accident caused Frank's car to hit and kill Frank. Frank's fiancée, Emily, was with Frank, but was not physically injured. However, she witnessed the accident and held Frank in her arms as he died.

Wife was seriously injured in the accident. She was hospitalized for a month with broken bones and internal injuries and is still undergoing physical therapy six months later. Wife and Husband have remained married.

After the accident, Husband took Daughter to the doctor to be examined. Although Daughter was not injured in the accident, the doctor found that she was suffering from an incipient bone disease brought on by calcium deficiency from an imbalanced diet.

Frank and Emily had lived together during their two-year engagement, and Frank died one week before their planned wedding date. Since Frank's death, Emily has suffered from depression because she misses his companionship and intimacy. Consequently, she has been under psychiatric care.

Wife has brought a lawsuit against Husband for his negligence. Emily has also sued Husband for his negligence. Daughter has sued both Husband and Wife for their failure to provide her with a diet richer in calcium.

There is no guest statute in this jurisdiction.

1. Assuming Wife can prove a prima facie case of negligence, is Husband liable to Wife? Explain.
2. Are Husband and Wife liable to Daughter for their failure to provide Daughter with a diet richer in calcium? Explain.
3. On what theory or theories arising from her relationship with Frank might Emily reasonably base claims for damages against Husband, and what would be the likely outcome of each claim? Explain.

Question 6

On March 1, Lender lent $10,000 to Borrower in exchange for a promissory note from Borrower. The promissory note was a form note Borrower had obtained from a stationery store. Borrower signed the note as maker and filled in the “date due” line to provide that payment was due September 1 of the same year.

Borrower and Lender had agreed that the amount due on the note would be $10,500, representing both principal and interest on the loan. However, Borrower neglected to fill in the blank space on the form note for the amount due and also neglected to fill in the name of the payee in the blank space following the “pay to the order of” language. Despite these two omissions, the language of the form note did contain an unconditional promise to pay and did not contain any other promise or undertaking by Borrower.

A week after Lender accepted the note in exchange for the loan proceeds, Lender realized that both the amount and the payee lines had been left blank. Lender filled in his own name as payee and wrote “$10,500” as the amount due.

On August 25 of that same year, Lender’s home was burglarized by Robber, who stole the note. Lender did not realize at that time that the note was missing. Robber then forged Lender’s indorsement on the note and sold the note on August 26 to Innocent, a good-faith purchaser for value, who paid $10,350 for the note.

On September 1, Lender realized for the first time that the note was missing.

On September 2, Innocent presented the note for payment to Borrower, who paid $10,500 in good faith to Innocent without knowledge of the forged signature or the theft of the note from Lender’s home.

1. After Lender filled in the blank amount and payee lines on the note, was the note enforceable against Borrower as completed? Explain.
2. Assume the note was enforceable and that Lender, unable to produce the note, demanded payment from Borrower on September 1 before Borrower had paid Innocent. What would be the rights and obligations of Lender and Borrower on the note? Explain.
3. Assuming the note was enforceable, did Borrower’s payment to Innocent discharge Borrower’s obligation to Lender on the note? Explain.
4. After Borrower paid Innocent, did Borrower have any rights of recovery against Innocent? Explain.

Question 7

The articles of incorporation of Ergo, Inc. authorize the issuance of 400,000 Class A Common Shares and 1,000,000 Class B Common Shares, all of which are issued and outstanding. Dart owns all of the Class A shares and none of the Class B shares. Ergo's Articles provide that Ergo has seven directors elected by straight voting, with Class A shares to elect four directors and Class B shares to elect three directors.

Several months ago, Ergo's board of directors properly approved an expansion plan for the business that would require $5 million of additional capital. At their regular February 1 meeting, the directors discussed possible sources to fund the expansion plan. One Class B director suggested that Ergo borrow the funds from a bank.

Dart, who had elected herself as one of the Class A directors, suggested that Ergo issue a new class of shares that Dart would purchase for $5 million. The new class of shares (Class C Preferred) would be entitled to a cumulative preferred dividend. In support of this alternative, Dart presented an opinion from an independent investment bank that stated:

- (1) $5 million would be a fair value for the Class C Preferred, and
- (2) in the long run, payment of the proposed preferred dividend would be less costly to Ergo than interest payments on a loan.

After one hour of spirited discussion of these alternatives, all seven directors voted to recommend to the shareholders that Ergo's Articles be amended to authorize the issuance of the Class C Preferred as proposed by Dart. A special meeting of the shareholders was properly called for the purpose of voting on the proposed amendment to the Articles.

Prior to that meeting, a proxy statement was issued to all shareholders disclosing all relevant information about the plan to issue the Class C Preferred to Dart. However, the proxy statement did not disclose the alternative funding method the Class B director initially proposed. At the shareholders meeting, a quorum was present, and the amendment to the Articles was adopted by the following vote:

	In Favor	Opposed
Class B Shares	720,000	100,000

Following shareholder approval, the Ergo board of directors met to consider the issuance of the newly authorized Class C Preferred. All seven directors voted to issue the Class C Preferred to Dart for $5 million in cash.

A Class B shareholder filed a derivative action against the directors to enjoin the issuance of the Class C Preferred to Dart. The Class B shareholder alleged (a) that the directors erred in deciding to issue the Class C Preferred rather than borrow the money from the bank; (b) that the directors had breached their duty of care to Ergo; and (c) that Dart had breached her duty of loyalty to Ergo.

February 2002, Question 7

Considering the Class B shareholder's allegations and all possible defenses, who is likely to prevail? Explain.

July 2002

Debtor bought a motor home from Uptown RV Sales on credit. Debtor signed a security agreement granting Uptown a security interest in the motor home. Two years later, Debtor lost her job and then defaulted on her loan by failing to make several monthly payments. Without sending any notice of default to Debtor, Uptown dispatched Ernest, one of its employees, to take possession of the motor home.

Ernest located the motor home parked on a public street. When he opened the door with a duplicate key, he found Debtor inside and told her that he was there to repossess the motor home. Debtor began yelling at him, "Get out of my home or I'll throw you out! This is the only place I have to live, and, anyway, you don't have any right to take my clothes and other stuff." Ernest departed without the motor home.

Two weeks later, the owner of Uptown sent Ernest back, this time to post a coupon on the windshield of the motor home fictitiously advertising a free steak dinner at the grand opening of a local restaurant on Friday evening. Debtor fell for the ploy. She went to the restaurant on Friday evening, parked the motor home in the lot at the rear of the restaurant, and went inside to see about her free dinner. She had left the door to the motor home unlocked.

Ernest, who had followed Debtor, waited for Debtor to get inside the restaurant, entered the motor home through the unlocked door, "hot-wired" the engine, and drove the motor home back to Uptown's garage. Debtor came out of the restaurant to find her motor home was gone.

Uptown's owner had arranged with a uniformed deputy sheriff to stand by in case it became necessary to keep the peace. The deputy sheriff observed the events from her patrol car parked some distance away but did not otherwise assist in the repossession.

1. Did Uptown have the right to repossess the motor home without sending notice of default to Debtor and without judicial process? Explain.
2. What arguments might Debtor reasonably make, based on the facts, that Uptown failed to carry out the repossession in a lawful manner? Explain.

Question 2

On February 10, 2000, Testator signed her last will, which was witnessed by two witnesses—Testator’s nephew, Nephew, and Testator’s next-door neighbor. Testator died on May 10, 2000, after a brief hospitalization.

During the six months before she died, Testator experienced frequent episodes of forgetfulness. For example, Testator often missed appointments with her physicians and her bank trust officer. Testator had also become increasingly forgetful about matters of personal hygiene. On the other hand, throughout that six-month period, Testator maintained all of her financial records and visited in person and by telephone with each of her 20 living relatives, all of whom she easily recognized and identified. On April 3, she contacted her broker to advise him to sell her shares in Able Corporation because she had lost complete faith in the corporation’s management following the release of its poor quarterly earnings report.

Testator’s will bequeathed $100,000 to Nephew and the residue of her estate to Charity, a charitable organization with which Testator had been associated for more than 35 years. Nephew had no knowledge of the $100,000 bequest until after Testator died. She left no bequest to her three nieces, who are Nephew’s three sisters. None of Testator’s other living relatives was as closely related to her as Nephew and her three nieces.

Contemporaneous with the execution of her last will, Testator signed a durable health care power of attorney designating Nephew as her agent to make all health care decisions for her in the event she could no longer make them for herself. Nephew and Testator’s next-door neighbor also witnessed this document.

One week before she died, Testator was admitted into a local hospital following a massive stroke causing severe brain damage. The following day, she lapsed into a coma and was connected to a life-support system. Four days later, Testator’s physician advised Nephew that there was nothing medical science could do for Testator. After considering this advice, Nephew directed the physician to remove Testator from all life-support systems. The following day, Testator was removed from the life-support system and she died. She left an estate in excess of $1 million.

Testator’s three nieces argue that Testator’s durable health care power was not valid and that as a result Nephew should be liable in wrongful death for causing Testator’s death because Nephew directed Testator’s physician to withdraw Testator’s life-support systems. Furthermore, they claim that either Testator’s will is invalid or that, at minimum, the bequest to Nephew should be forfeited.

1. Is Nephew liable in wrongful death for causing Testator’s death? Explain.
2. Is Testator’s will invalid because of incapacity? Explain.
3. Assuming Testator’s will is valid, is the bequest to Nephew valid? Explain.

Question 3

Seller manufactures vending machines at a facility located in State A, where Seller is incorporated and has its principal place of business. Buyer, a German company with its principal place of business in Munich, Germany, contracted to purchase 1,000 vending machines from Seller for a total price of $500,000.

The contract was carefully negotiated during lengthy discussions held in Germany. Early in the negotiations, each side insisted that the contract should be governed by its own law and that disputes should be resolved in its own courts. In the end, however, the parties agreed on contract clauses that provided: (1) “the substantive rights and remedies of the parties to this contract shall be governed by the Commercial Code of State N”; (2) “any and all litigation brought concerning this contract shall be brought in the state or federal courts of State N”; and (3) “Seller and Buyer hereby consent to venue, jurisdiction, and service of process by courts in State N.” Apart from these clauses, there is no connection between State N and the parties or the transaction. State N is located on the eastern seaboard of the United States. The parties chose State N because it has convenient air links to Germany and a widely respected judiciary that is regarded as expert in commercial law matters.

Seller shipped the vending machines to Germany, but Buyer refused the shipment after discovering that the goods had been seriously damaged during the ocean voyage and arrived in Germany in a worthless condition. Seller then sued Buyer in federal district court in State A, properly invoking the court’s subject matter jurisdiction and seeking recovery of the $500,000 contract price on the ground that the risk of damage to the goods during transport was on Buyer throughout the ocean voyage. In responding to Seller’s complaint, Buyer moved to transfer the case to the federal district court in State N, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) and the forum-selection clause in the contract. Seller resisted Buyer’s transfer request on the grounds that (a) State A was a more convenient forum for Seller, and (b) the forum-selection clause was unenforceable under State A law, which declares such clauses to be “void as a matter of public policy.”

While the transfer motion was pending, Seller delivered a notice of deposition to Buyer, demanding that Buyer’s chief executive officer appear for a deposition. Buyer responded by asking the court for a protective order on the ground that its “officers, directors, and managing agents” are all in Germany and are therefore beyond the subpoena power or other authority of the court.

Assume that there are no applicable international law principles or treaties.

1. Should the federal district court in State A transfer the action to State N? Explain.
2. Irrespective of how the court rules on the transfer motion, should Buyer’s request for a protective order be granted? Explain.

Question 4

On May 10, Driver contracted to buy a sports car from Motors for $25,000. The car was a popular model in high demand, and there was a four-month waiting period. Motors promised to deliver the car in September, and Driver promised to pay for the car at delivery using a cashier's check.

To make sure he had the money to pay for the car in September, Driver immediately bought the necessary $25,000 cashier's check, payable to Motors, from First Bank. The cashier's check was dated May 11. Driver paid for the cashier's check by negotiating to First Bank a $25,000 check that Driver had obtained from a lender called Auto-Loans.

On September 15, Motors delivered the sports car to Driver and took in exchange the $25,000 cashier's check. Motors immediately presented the cashier's check to First Bank for payment.

First Bank refused to pay the cashier's check because the Auto-Loans check that Driver had negotiated to First Bank was dishonored. First Bank's refusal to pay the cashier's check surprised both Motors and Driver because neither of them knew of any problem with the Auto-Loans check. Driver has retained the sports car and has refused to make good on the cashier's check, claiming that his transfer of the cashier's check to Motors discharged his obligation under the contract.

What rights, if any, does Motors have against First Bank and Driver under Article 3 of the Uniform Commercial Code? Explain.

Question 5

Ann and Bert, a married couple, were unable to have biological children because Bert was infertile. They decided to try artificial insemination by an anonymous donor. Their doctor performed the procedure after obtaining written consent from both Ann and Bert. As a result of the artificial insemination, Ann became pregnant.

During the last months of Ann's pregnancy, she and Bert argued constantly, and Ann moved out of the family home into her own apartment. The baby, Daughter, was born while Ann and Bert were living apart. Bert visited Ann and Daughter in the hospital and paid their medical expenses. He tried to convince Ann to reconcile with him, but Ann refused, leaving the hospital with Daughter and returning to her apartment. Bert continued to visit them and contributed to Daughter's support.

Shortly after Daughter's birth, Ann began an affair with Walt. Walt also spent some time with Daughter and grew fond of her. When Daughter was one year old, Ann discovered she was pregnant by Walt. When Walt learned Ann was pregnant, he became very upset and began to abuse Ann verbally and physically. Ann immediately broke off the relationship with Walt. Shortly thereafter, she reconciled with Bert.

Ann, Bert, and Daughter were living together when Ann's baby, Sonny, was born. Walt, Sonny's biological father, contacted Ann, apologized for his past abusive behavior, and requested to see Sonny. He also offered to pay the expenses of Sonny's birth and to contribute to Sonny's support. Ann rejected both his request and his offer.

When Sonny was six months old and Daughter was two years old, Ann was killed in an automobile accident. She left a valid will stating that if she died while her children were minors, she wanted Bert to be named custodian and guardian of both of them.

Walt has sued Bert, seeking to establish himself as Sonny's legal father and requesting custody of both children. Bert claims that he is the legal father of both Daughter and Sonny and wants to maintain physical custody of both children. Under the law of the jurisdiction, both parties have standing to raise these issues.

How should the court rule on Walt's and Bert's claims? Explain.

Question 6

Sunrise Lodge is a corporation that develops and operates luxury resort hotels. Sunrise recently began constructing a hotel in East Beach, a beach town on the Atlantic coast of the United States. Sunrise hoped to give the East Beach hotel a local flavor by using local sources for materials.

Sunrise hired Adam to be its interior design agent on the East Beach project. The contract between them, which was for a one-year term, included the following language:

Adam has the discretion to make selections for interior floor and wall coverings, works of art, furniture, plumbing fixtures, and lighting fixtures for East Beach hotel, provided that (a) the cost of such purchases does not exceed the budgeted amounts listed in Exhibit A, (b) all purchases will be made from local vendors, and (c) the items selected are within the quantity and style guidelines described in Exhibit B. Adam shall inform vendors that purchases are for Sunrise East Beach and should arrange for Sunrise to be billed on a 30-day net basis.

The style guidelines in Exhibit B include a comprehensive list of themes and styles typical of an Atlantic fishing village like East Beach, including lighthouses, whitewashed wood, lobster traps, wicker furniture, and sailboats.

After hiring Adam, Sunrise sent a letter to prospective local suppliers on Sunrise stationery signed by the Sunrise president, announcing Adam's appointment as follows:

Sunrise Lodge is delighted to announce the appointment of Adam, a well-known local interior designer, to act on its behalf in the selection of interior floor and wall coverings, works of art, furniture, and plumbing and lighting fixtures for the Sunrise East Beach hotel. We are confident that—working only with local suppliers—Adam will exercise a wonderful creative flair in coming up with just the right look for this exciting project. Know that you deal with Sunrise when you deal with Adam on this project.

During the first months of Adam's one-year term, Adam entered into the following transactions with suppliers who had received Sunrise's letter.

First, Adam contracted with Tahini for the main lobby area of the hotel to be decorated entirely in a Tahitian theme. The items for the Tahitian decor are within the budget and are from a local supplier. However, they are not within the Exhibit B style guidelines.

Second, Adam contracted with Moby for the guest rooms to be decorated using authentic themes from the Atlantic seaboard region as required by Exhibit B. The decor selections are within budget and are from local suppliers, but the Sunrise officials do not like the design.

Sunrise has refused to pay either vendor and has terminated Adam's contract.

1. On what agency principles, if any, is Sunrise liable to Tahini and Moby on their respective contracts? Explain.
2. Is Adam liable to Sunrise as a result of the contracts with Tahini and Moby? Explain.
3. May Sunrise terminate Adam's agency before the end of their one-year contract term without incurring liability to Adam? Explain.

Question 7

On February 5, 1999, Testator created a revocable inter vivos trust. This trust was validly executed. Bank was designated trustee of the revocable trust.

Under the terms of the trust, Testator retained all income for life. The trust then provided in Article II that "upon my death the principal shall be held in further trust with the income payable to my wife, Wanda, for life, remainder to my children."

Contemporaneous with the creation of the revocable trust, Testator validly executed a will devising Testator's entire probate estate to the trustee of the revocable trust to be disposed of as part of that trust. The will further provided that, if the trust was revoked prior to Testator's death, Testator's entire estate should pass to Wanda.

On March 1, 2000, Testator sent a validly executed trust amendment to Bank revoking Article II of the revocable trust and substituting for it a new Article II. This new article stated that "upon my death the principal shall be held in further trust with the income payable to my wife, Wanda, for the immediate two years after my death, and, at the end of the two-year period, the trust principal shall be distributed to my surviving children."

In March 2001, Testator and Wanda were divorced.

In March 2002, Testator died, leaving a probate estate of $100,000. The revocable trust had not been funded prior to Testator's death. Testator was survived by Wanda and by their three children, Adam, Ben, and Carrie.

Two months later, both Wanda and Adam died in an automobile accident. Under Wanda's probated will, her entire estate passed to a charitable institution, Hope, and under Adam's probated will, his entire estate passed to University. Ben and Carrie are alive. They each have one child who also survived Testator. Adam never had any children.

1. Which instruments control the disposition of the property included in Testator's probate estate? Explain.
2. Upon Testator's death, what interest, if any, did Wanda have under the revocable trust? Explain.
3. Assuming that Wanda had an interest under the trust, what rights, if any, do Hope and University have under the revocable trust upon the deaths of Wanda and Adam? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE I.A, I.E

Question 1 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1) Were the requirements of the diversity jurisdiction statute met here, even though at the time of the accident Passenger, the plaintiff, and Teacher, the defendant were citizens of the same state?
- (2) Were the requirements of the venue statute met here, given that Passenger filed in her home state, which was where the accident occurred?
- (3) Is supplemental jurisdiction available over Passenger's claim against Rentco, the third-party defendant, given that they are citizens of the same state?

DISCUSSION

Point One:

(35-45%)

Because Passenger and Teacher were citizens of different states when the complaint was filed and the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000, Passenger properly invoked federal diversity jurisdiction. It is irrelevant that the plaintiff and the defendant were citizens of the same state at the time of the accident.

The court should deny Teacher's motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The requirements for federal diversity jurisdiction have been established in this case.

Passenger's complaint states only a state-law negligence claim, so federal question jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331 is unavailable. Diversity jurisdiction is available under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(1) only if Passenger and Teacher are citizens of different states and the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000, exclusive of costs and interest. An individual is a citizen of the state in which he or she is domiciled. In order to change one's domicile, one must be physically present in the new place with the intent to make that place one's permanent home. See, e.g., Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians v. Holyfield, 490 U.S. 30, 48 (1989).

The problem states that Passenger is a citizen of State A. At the time of the accident, Teacher had sold his home in State A, quit his job in State A, and accepted a new job in State B. Teacher was, however, still a domiciliary of, and hence a citizen of, State A because he had not yet reached State B after having formed the requisite intent to change his domicile. Had the suit been filed the day of the accident, diversity jurisdiction would have been unavailable because both the physical and mental elements must be present for a change of domicile. Jack H. Friedenthal et al., CIVIL PROCEDURE 30 (3d ed. 1999)

It is well settled, however, that the availability of diversity jurisdiction is determined as of the date the suit is commenced. 13B Charles Alan Wright, Arthur R. Miller & Edward H. Cooper, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 3608 (2d ed. 1984 & Supp. 2001). Having purchased a home in State B and begun his new job shortly after his arrival there, Teacher had established a new domicile in State B. Hence, at the time suit was filed in this case, nine months after the accident, Teacher had become a domiciliary and citizen of State B. Thus, diversity of citizenship existed between Passenger and Teacher.

In addition to diversity of citizenship, the amount in controversy must exceed $75,000, exclusive of costs and interest. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a). Because Passenger's complaint seeks damages in excess of $100,000, the amount in controversy requirement is met.

The motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction should be denied: there is diversity of citizenship, and the amount in controversy requirement is satisfied.

Point Two:

(15-25%) Because venue is proper in a diversity case in the judicial district in which a "substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred," and because the accident occurred in State A, venue is proper in the federal district court of State A.

The court should deny Teacher's motion to dismiss for improper venue. The requirements of the venue statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1391, are met.

Venue is a geographical concept that localizes lawsuits in places that are connected either to the parties or to the events giving rise to the action. Stephen C. Yeazell, CIVIL PROCEDURE 191-92 (4th ed. 1996). Under 28 U.S.C. § 1391(a), which applies to civil actions in which jurisdiction is founded solely on diversity of citizenship (as is the case here), venue is proper in "(1) a judicial district where any defendant resides . . ., [or] (2) a judicial district in which a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred . . ." 28 U.S.C. § 1391(a). Here, Teacher resides in State B. However, the accident itself occurred in State A. Thus, a substantial part of the events giving rise to the claim occurred in State A, and venue in State A is proper under § 1391(a)(2).

NOTE: Some examinees might suggest that venue is proper in the federal district court of State A because the plaintiff, Passenger, resides there. Although under the pre-1990 version of the venue statute, venue in diversity cases was proper in the district "where all plaintiffs . . . reside," that language was eliminated by enactment of the Judicial Improvements Act of 1990. Thus, under current law, the plaintiff's residence in State A is irrelevant to venue.

Point Three:

(40-50%) Although Passenger's claim against Teacher and her claim against third-party defendant Rentco derive from a common nucleus of operative fact and hence are part of the same case for purposes of Article III of the Constitution, supplemental jurisdiction is statutorily unavailable over claims by plaintiffs against persons made parties under Rule 14.

The district court cannot exercise subject matter jurisdiction over Passenger's direct claim against Rentco. There is no independent basis for jurisdiction (neither diversity nor federal question), and supplemental jurisdiction is not available for this type of claim.

Rule 14(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permits a defendant to bring a third party into an action if the defendant believes the third party “may be liable” to defendant for all or part of any judgment against defendant in the action. Pursuant to this rule, defendant Teacher brought Rentco into the action as a third-party defendant. Passenger sought thereafter to amend the original complaint to state a claim directly against Rentco. The issue is whether the court has jurisdiction over Passenger’s direct claim against Rentco. For reasons explained below, the court cannot take jurisdiction over Passenger’s claim.

In the first place, there is no independent basis for federal jurisdiction over this claim. Plaintiff Passenger and third-party defendant Rentco are both citizens of State A, so diversity jurisdiction is not available for Passenger’s claim against Rentco. Under § 1332(c)(1), a corporation is deemed a citizen of both its state of incorporation and the state in which it maintains its principal place of business. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1). Hence, Rentco is a citizen of both State A and State C. Because Passenger is a citizen of State A as well, there is no independent basis for diversity jurisdiction over Passenger’s direct claim against third-party defendant Rentco. Further, because Passenger’s claim against Rentco is a state-law negligence claim, there is no federal question jurisdiction.

Supplemental jurisdiction is also not available. Section 1367(a) provides that in a civil action of which the district court has original jurisdiction, the court has supplemental jurisdiction over “all other claims that are so related to claims in the action within such original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution.” 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a). In United Mine Workers of America v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 725 (1966), the U.S. Supreme Court held that two claims will have that requisite connection if they “derive from a common nucleus of operative fact.” Here, Passenger’s claim against Teacher and Passenger’s claim against third-party defendant Rentco derive from a common nucleus of operative fact: the failure of the brakes, the accident, and Passenger’s resultant injuries. Without regard to their federal or state character, we would expect plaintiff to bring these claims together in a single action. Id.

However, Congress created statutory exceptions to supplemental jurisdiction. One of those exceptions, 28 U.S.C. § 1367(b), applies here to prevent the court from taking jurisdiction. Section 1367(b) provides that supplemental jurisdiction in diversity cases shall not extend to “claims by plaintiffs against persons made parties under Rule 14. . . .” 28 U.S.C. § 1367(b). Because Passenger’s claim against Rentco is a claim by a plaintiff against a person made a party under Rule 14 (Rentco was brought into the suit when Teacher filed a third-party complaint against it under Rule 14), supplemental jurisdiction is unavailable. Passenger could proceed directly against Rentco only if there were an independent basis for jurisdiction (e.g., diversity), and there is none.

Because there is no independent basis for jurisdiction over this claim and because supplemental jurisdiction is unavailable, the district court should dismiss Passenger’s claim against Rentco

Question 2 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does a purchase money security interest perfected later than a general security interest prevail over the earlier perfected general security interest?
- (2) Does an initially unperfected purchase money secured creditor prevail over a later lien creditor?
- (3) Does a lien creditor prevail over a secured creditor with respect to a post- lien future advance?

DISCUSSION

Point One:

(30-40%)

Because Seller perfected a purchase money security interest (PMSI) within 20 days after Debtor received possession of the computer, Seller prevails over Bank by virtue of the PMSI exception in UCC § 9-324(b) (2000).

As between two secured creditors, the general priority rule is found in UCC § 9-322 (2000)—first to file or perfect has priority. Bank filed on January 3 and it perfected on that date as well, since its security interest had previously attached (i.e., on January 2, Debtor had rights in its existing equipment, Bank gave value through its loan, and Debtor signed a security agreement). See UCC § 9-203 (2000); § 9-308 (2000). Seller, however, did not file and perfect until February 20. Thus, under the general “first to file or perfect” rule, Bank would have priority over Seller.

There is, however, an exception to the general rule. Under UCC § 9-324(b) (2000), a PMSI in collateral other than inventory has priority over a conflicting security interest in the same collateral if the PMSI is perfected at the time the debtor receives possession of the collateral or within 20 days thereafter. Seller did take a PMSI because Seller took a security interest to secure all or part of the price of the computer that it sold. See UCC § 9-103(b) (2000). In addition, it is a PMSI in “collateral other than inventory” because the problem states that the computer is “for use in Debtor’s business.” Thus, the computer is properly characterized as “equipment” of Debtor. See UCC § 9-102(33) (2000). Finally, as mentioned, the PMSI was perfected on February 20—within 20 days after Debtor received possession of the computer, because Debtor received possession on February 12. Thus, pursuant to the PMSI exception, UCC § 9-324(b) (2000), Seller has priority over Bank. (Note that Bank does hold a conflicting security interest because its after-acquired property clause attached to the computer as soon as Debtor had rights in it, which was no later than February 12, when Debtor took possession. See UCC § 9-203 (2000); § 9-204 (2000).)

Point Two:

(30-40%) Because Seller filed within 20 days after Debtor received possession of the computer, Seller prevails over Larry by virtue of the PMSI exception in UCC § 9-317(e) (2000).

Larry qualifies as a lien creditor because he acquired his lien on Debtor's computer by way of the sheriff's levy on February 14. UCC § 9-102 (2000). As between a secured creditor and a lien creditor, the general priority rule is found in UCC §§ 9-317(a)(2), 9-323 (2000)—a perfected security interest prevails over a lien creditor whose lien arises after the time of perfection. Under the majority rule, Larry became a lien creditor on February 14—the date of the sheriff's levy. See Lynn M. Lopucki & Elizabeth Warren, SECURED CREDIT: A SYSTEMS APPROACH 572 (2d ed. 1998). Another way of viewing it is to say that "The unperfected security interest is subordinate to the rights of a lien creditor." UCC § 9-317(a)(2) (2000). Seller did not perfect until February 20 (see above discussion). Thus, under the general rule, Larry would prevail over Seller.

There is, however, an exception to this general rule as well. UCC § 9-317 (2000) notes that a secured party who files with respect to a PMSI within 20 days after the debtor receives possession of the collateral takes priority over the rights of a lien creditor that arise between the time the security interest attaches and the time of filing. As previously explained, Seller's interest is a PMSI, and Seller filed within the 20-day period after Debtor received possession (filing on February 20; Debtor's possession on February 12). Moreover, Larry's lien arose on February 14, which is between the time of Seller's attachment (February 12) and the time of filing (February 20). Thus, under the UCC § 9-317(e) (2000) exception, Seller prevails over Larry.

Point Three:

(20-30%) Because Bank's future advance was made within 45 days of Larry's becoming a lien creditor, Bank has priority in the future advance.

The general rule for contests over future advances between lien creditors and secured creditors is found in UCC § 9-323(b)(2000). That section provides that lien creditors are subordinate to perfected security interests only to the extent that the interest secures advances made (1) before the lien arose; (2) within 45 days of the lien; (3) without knowledge of the lien; or (4) pursuant to a commitment entered into without knowledge of the lien.

The problem is somewhat complicated because the facts indicate that Bank had knowledge of the lien on February 16—one day before the future advance was made. Some applicants may believe, therefore, that Bank's knowledge of the lien precludes it from gaining priority in the future advance. Pursuant to UCC § 9-323(b)(2000), however, future advances made within 45 days of the lien, even if the secured creditor is aware of the lien's existence, take precedence over the lien. As previously explained, the lien arose on February 14. The advance was made on February 17—well within the 45-day window of UCC § 9-323(b)(2000). Thus, Bank's security interest prevails over Larry's lien as to the future advance.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP X.C

Question 3 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1) Can the limited partners decide how the day-to-day business of a limited partnership is to be conducted?
- (2) What rights does a limited partner have to obtain information from the general partner about the limited partnership's affairs?
- (3) What rights does a purchaser of a limited partnership interest have in the limited partnership if such purchase is not approved by the partnership?

DISCUSSION

Point One:

(35-45%) Carl and the other limited partners have no right to determine how the day-to-day business of Transitions is to be conducted. Management of the business is vested exclusively in Bill, the general partner.

A limited partnership is a partnership which has one or more general partners and one or more limited partners. Revised Unif. Ltd. Partnership Act (RULPA) § 101(7). A general partner of a limited partnership generally has the powers and the liabilities of a partner in a general partnership. RULPA § 403. Management of a limited partnership is entrusted to the general partners, who are personally liable for the obligations of the business. Life Care Centers of America, Inc. v. Charles Town Assoc. Ltd. Partnership, 79 F.3d 496, 503 (6th Cir. 1996) (dictum); United States v. Heffner, 916 F. Supp. 1010, 1012 n.2 (S.D. Cal. 1996) ("general partner controls the business of the limited partnership to the exclusion of the limited partners"); Duke & Benedict, Inc. v. Wolstein, 826 F. Supp. 1413, 1415 (M.D. Fla. 1993) ("The defendant is the general partner of this partnership and has complete control over the management and affairs of this business.").

By comparison, limited partners generally have no control over how the day-to-day business of the limited partnership is conducted. Duke & Benedict, Inc., 826 F. Supp. at 1415 ("The plaintiff is the limited partner, who has no say or control as to how the partnership is run."); In re the Cincinnati, Ltd., 143 B.R. 108, 110 (S.D. Ohio 1992) (holding that limited partner was not entitled to have provision included in limited partnership agreement giving it voice in selection of manager; limited partners "do not have statutory right to exercise control of the partnership's decisions"). The role of limited partners in a limited partnership is generally passive, with only limited rights to vote on extraordinary events of the partnership, such as dissolution or sale of substantially all of the partnership's assets.

Therefore, Bill, as the sole general partner, has exclusive control over the daily management of Transitions, and Carl and the other limited partners cannot decide how the day-to-day business of Transitions is to be conducted.

Point Two:

(10-20%) Carl, as a limited partner, has the right to inspect various records of Transitions and to obtain information about the affairs of Transitions from Bill, the general partner.

A limited partnership is required to keep specified records at its office, including the names and addresses of each partner, any income tax returns or reports for the three most recent years, and any financial statements for the three most recent years. RULPA § 105. Upon reasonable request, any limited partner may inspect and copy during ordinary business hours any of the records required to be kept by the limited partnership. RULPA §§ 105(b), 305. In addition, any limited partner has the right to obtain from the general partners upon reasonable demand “true and full information regarding the state of the business and financial condition of the limited partnership” and “other information regarding the affairs of the limited partnership as is just and reasonable.” RULPA § 305.

Therefore, Carl has the right to inspect the records that Transitions is required to keep and the right to obtain from Bill, the general partner, true and full information regarding the business and financial condition of Transitions.

Point Three:

(30-40%) Edward’s purchase of Donna’s limited partnership interest in Transitions did not result in Edward’s becoming a limited partner, although Edward did obtain Donna’s financial rights in Transitions.

A limited partnership interest is personal property and, except as provided in the partnership agreement, is freely assignable in whole or in part. RULPA §§ 701, 702. However, assignment of a limited partnership interest does not entitle the assignee to become a limited partner or to exercise any of the rights of a limited partner. RULPA §§ 301, 702. Instead, assignment only entitles the assignee to receive (to the extent assigned) any distributions to which the assignor would be entitled. Id. In other words, a limited partner may only assign his or her economic rights in the limited partnership. See generally IV Alan R. Bromberg & Larry E. Ribstein, BROMBERG AND RIBSTEIN ON PARTNERSHIP §§ 13.04(e), 13.06(e)(2)-(f) (1988).

An assignee of a limited partnership interest may be admitted as a limited partner to the partnership only if all partners have consented to such admission, unless the partnership agreement expressly gives the transferring partner the right to admit a new partner without approval of the other partners. RULPA § 704. The facts indicate that Bill disapproves of the sale and there is no indication that the other partners approved the admission of Edward as a limited partner. Edward therefore did not become a limited partner in Transitions upon Donna’s sale of her limited partnership interest to Edward. As a result, Edward cannot exercise any of the rights of a limited partner, such as the right to inspect records (RULPA §§ 105, 305), the right to obtain information regarding the limited partnership (RULPA § 305), the right to seek a judicial dissolution (RULPA § 802), or the right to bring a derivative action (RULPA § 1001).

On the other hand, the assignment of Donna’s limited partnership interest to Edward did transfer Donna’s economic rights in Transitions to Edward. Consequently, Edward is entitled to any distributions from Transitions to which Donna would have been entitled.

Question 4 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Did Testator's will, which included a general residuary clause purporting to exercise all of the donee's powers of appointment (a so-called "blanket exercise" clause), effectively exercise the special testamentary power of appointment that was created in Mary's will?
- (1)(b) Did Testator's will, which included a blanket exercise clause, effectively exercise the general testamentary power of appointment created in Frank's will?
- (2) Does Daughter, the devisee of specifically devised encumbered property, take that property subject to the mortgage where the will contains a clause directing that the decedent's debts be paid by the executor?
- (3) Is Son, the specific legatee of the watch, entitled to the insurance proceeds on the watch that were payable as a result of the theft of the watch shortly before Testator's death?

DISCUSSION

Point One(a):

(15-25%) The "blanket exercise" clause in Testator's will did not effectively exercise the power of appointment given to Testator by Mary's will because Mary's will required Testator to refer specifically to the power when exercising it.

In most states, a general residuary clause in a will (e.g., "I give all of my estate. . .") does not exercise powers of appointment. The situation is different if the general residuary clause is coupled with what is called a "blanket exercise" clause (e.g., "including all property over which I have a power of appointment"), as is the case here. Under these circumstances, any power of appointment held by the donee is exercised, unless the donor of the power of appointment specifically required the donee to refer to the instrument creating the power when exercising the power. See generally Unif. Probate Code § 2-608. See also Restatement (Second) of Property §§ 17.1-.2 (1984). Accord Holzbach v. United Virginia Bank, 216 Va. 482, 219 S.E.2d 868 (1975).

Here, Mary, the donor of Testator's special power, expressly required that Testator specifically refer to her will in which the power was created if Testator, as donee of the power, sought to exercise the power. Testator's will contained only a blanket exercise clause, which failed to satisfy a condition on the exercise of the power imposed by the donor. Thus, the power was not effectively exercised.

Point One(b):

(10-15%) Testator's general testamentary power created by Frank's will was effectively exercised by a blanket exercise clause.

No facts indicate that Frank imposed a specific reference requirement with respect to the general testamentary power that Frank, as donor, granted Testator, as donee. Therefore, under the rule that a blanket exercise clause is effective to exercise powers absent a specific reference requirement (see Point One(a)), Testator's will effectively exercised the general testamentary power of appointment.

Point Two:

(20-30%) At common law, Daughter takes the family home free of the mortgage. Under the law of most states today, Daughter takes the home subject to the mortgage on which Testator was liable at the time of his death. The mortgage is not payable from the assets of Testator's estate.

Under the common-law doctrine of exoneration, the specific devisee of encumbered real property was entitled to have the mortgage on the property paid from the estate as a debt of the decedent unless there was evidence of a contrary intent on the part of the testator. See, e.g., Martin v. Johnson, 512 A.2d 1017 (D.C. 1986).

On the other hand, many states have adopted statutes contrary to this common-law rule of exoneration. For example, the Uniform Probate Code provides that "a specific devise passes subject to any mortgage interest existing at the date of death, without right of exoneration, regardless of a general directive in the will to pay debts." Unif. Probate Code § 2-607. In states with statutes of this type, the specific devisee of encumbered property takes subject to the mortgage notwithstanding the fact that the will contained a clause directing the executor to pay the decedent's debts.

Courts have also held that a general directive to pay debts is insufficient to evidence an intent to exonerate the devisee of specifically devised property. See, e.g., Griffin v. Gould, 72 Ill. App. 3d 747, 391 N.E.2d 124 (1979). Depending on the underlying state law, Daughter takes either subject to the mortgage or free of the mortgage.

Point Three:

(25-35%) The insurance proceeds payable as a result of the theft of the watch shortly before Testator's death should pass to Son as the specific devisee of the watch. There is, however, contrary authority.

Under the doctrine of ademption, if the subject matter of a specific devise is not in the probate estate at the time of the testator's death, the bequest to the devisee adeems (or fails). See generally William H. McGovern, Jr. & Sheldon F. Kurtz, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES 295 (2d ed. 2001). However, if the property was destroyed by fire or lost by theft and proceeds of insurance are paid to the executor of the estate in settlement of claims against the insurance company, some courts hold that the insurance proceeds are payable to the specific devisee as a substitute for the specifically devised property. See White v. White, 105 N.J. Super. 184, 251 A.2d 470 (1969); accord In re Estate of Wolfe, 208 N.W.2d 923 (Iowa 1973); Unif. Probate Code § 2-606.

However, some state courts have held to the contrary, finding that the insurance proceeds pass as part of the testator's residuary estate. In re Estate of Wright, 7 N.Y.2d 365, 197 N.Y.S.2d 711, 165

N.E.2d 561 (1960). They find that the insurance policy is a separate and distinct asset from the property subject to the specific devise and that the proceeds, as specifically undisposed property, pass to the residuary legatees under the will.

It seems that the majority rule stated in Wolfe, 208 N.W.2d 923, as well as in the Uniform Probate Code and some other state codes is the better rule because it is more likely to accord with the reasonable expectations of a testator

FAMILY LAW V, VI.C, VI.E

Question 5 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1) If a wife sues her husband for injuries resulting from her husband's negligence, is such action barred by spousal immunity?
- (2) If a child sues her parents for negligence in an area of parental discretion, is the action barred?
- (3) May a bystander who is an unmarried cohabitant and who witnesses her fiancé's death recover for negligent infliction of emotional distress or for loss of consortium, or is such recovery limited only to close family members?

DISCUSSION

Point One:

(25-35%) In the great majority of jurisdictions, negligence suits between husbands and wives are no longer barred by spousal immunity.

For many years, husbands and wives could not sue each other for negligence. The usual reasons for such immunity were that such suits would be destructive of marital harmony and would encourage fraud and collusion against insurance companies. Homer Harrison Clark, THE LAW OF DOMESTIC RELATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES § 11.1 (2d ed. 1987).

In the vast majority of jurisdictions, however, interspousal immunity has been abolished as courts have dismissed fears of disrupting familial harmony and of collusion. John DeWitt Gregory et al., UNDERSTANDING FAMILY LAW § 6.02 (2d ed. 1993). In these jurisdictions, if Wife can prove that Husband's negligence caused her injuries (as it appears from the facts that it did), then she may receive compensation for her injuries.

Point Two:

(30-40%) The majority of courts have abolished absolute immunity for most parent-child lawsuits. However, in areas dealing with the exercise of ordinary parental discretion, no suit would be allowed.

Historically, just as husbands and wives could not sue each other, and for comparable concerns about family harmony, minor children could not sue their parents for personal injury torts. Many jurisdictions, probably a majority, have abolished this absolute immunity. Clark, supra, § 11.2.

Even though parents are not absolutely immune from suits by their children, they have substantial discretion in making decisions concerning their children's upbringing. Because of this discretion, children cannot recover for acts that might otherwise result in liability. Courts are reluctant to substitute their judgment for that of parents (to act in loco parentis) and to interfere in the arena of family privacy. Matters falling within the exercise of parental discretion include providing food. (This is clearly not a case of true child neglect, where Daughter's parents have failed to provide sufficient food at all.) Clark, supra. Therefore, it is unlikely that Daughter could successfully maintain a lawsuit against her parents for not giving her more calcium in her diet.

Point Three:

(30-40%) Both a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress and a claim for loss of consortium are likely to fail because Emily was not married to Frank at the time of the accident.

In many jurisdictions, when a bystander witnesses an accident which kills or seriously injures a close family member, and the bystander suffers from severe emotional distress, there may be a cause of action against the tortfeasor for negligent infliction of emotional distress. See W. Page Keeton & William L. Prosser, PROSSER & KEETON ON TORTS § 54 (5th ed. 1984); Dillon v. Legg, 441 P.2d 912 (Cal. 1968). In this situation, Emily witnessed the accident, which was due to Husband's negligence. After Frank's death (which occurred while she was holding him), she suffered the severe distress required to pursue a tort action.

The problem for Emily's recovery, however, is that she was not Frank's wife. At the time of his death, they were engaged and were cohabiting.

A majority of jurisdictions would be unlikely to expand liability, even to a cohabiting fiancée. This reluctance is based on the difficulties of determining which cohabitants should be allowed to recover and problems of proving the importance of the relationship. See Elden v. Sheldon, 758 P.2d 582 (Cal. 1988). Some courts might also take the position that recognition of cohabitants' rights in this cause of action would undermine the strong public policy in support of marriage. Harry D. Krause, FAMILY LAW IN A NUTSHELL § 6.5 (3d ed. 1995).

On the other hand, some jurisdictions have allowed engaged cohabitants to recover in a tort suit of this type. See, e.g., Dunphy v. Gregor, 642 A.2d 372 (N.J. 1994); Krause, supra, § 6.3. Emily would argue that her claim should be recognized. Her relationship with Frank was like that of a husband and wife. They lived together and were to be married in a week. Witnessing his death was emotionally devastating to her. She had strong emotional ties to Frank, and she should receive compensation for her severe loss.

Emily might also try to bring a loss of consortium claim. This tort, which is recognized in almost all U.S. jurisdictions, is intended to compensate a spouse for loss of such things as the other spouse's companionship, sexual relations, and affection. See Millington v. Southeastern Elevator Co., 239 N.E.2d 897, 899 (N.Y. 1968); Laura M. Raisty, Note, Bystander Distress and Loss of Consortium: An Examination of the Relationship Requirements in Light of Romer v. Evans, 65 Fordham L. Rev. 2647, 2650-51 (1997). While originally only the husband could recover for loss of consortium, the right was extended to wives during the mid-twentieth century. See, e.g., Hitaffer v. Argonne Co., 183 F.2d 811 (D.C. Cir. 1950). Compensation for loss of consortium typically is available only to the legally recognized spouse of the injured party, not to a fiancée or cohabitant. Raisty, supra, at 2652. Thus, Emily would not have a claim for loss of consortium because she and Frank were not yet married.

Note: Emily might also try to bring a suit for wrongful death, a statutory tort unrecognized at common law. It is intended to compensate family members for the death of a relative, typically a spouse, child, parent, etc. Again, however, since Emily and Frank were not married, Emily would not have a claim worth pursuing.

COMMERCIAL PAPER II.D; IV.A, G; V.H; VII.A

Question 6 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is an instrument that is not negotiable because of omissions still enforceable if the payee fills in the blanks consistent with the payee's underlying agreement with the maker?
- (2) Can a person without physical possession of an instrument still enforce the instrument in a case where the instrument has been stolen?
- (3) Is the obligor on an instrument discharged by paying the instrument in good faith where there has been a forgery of the payee's signature?
- (4) Does the obligor on an instrument who pays the instrument that has a forged payee's signature have any rights of recovery against the party that presented the instrument for payment?

DISCUSSION

Point One:

(15-25%) Because Lender filled in the two blanks according to his actual agreement with Borrower, the note is enforceable as completed.

Before Lender filled in the blank lines on the note form, the note that Borrower gave Lender was not negotiable. That is because one of the requirements of negotiability under Article 3 of the Uniform Commercial Code is an unconditional promise to pay a fixed amount of money. UCC § 3-104(a) (1991). In this case, the amount due line was left blank by Borrower, the issuer of the note. Therefore, the note was an "incomplete instrument" under § 3-115(a). It is an instrument because Borrower signed the note and issued it to Lender; it is incomplete because the two lines for payee and amount due were left blank.

Section 3-115(b) indicates that an instrument that is not negotiable because of omissions is still enforceable "according to its terms as augmented by the completion." However, if the words or numbers were added to the incomplete instrument without the authority of the signer, the instrument is treated as an altered instrument and special rules apply.

In this case, although there was no mention of specific authority given by Borrower to Lender to fill in the blanks, the burden would be on Borrower to show lack of authority. UCC § 3-115(d). Because Lender did fill in the blanks consistent with the actual agreement of the parties, it seems likely that authority would be presumed. See Official Comment 2 to § 3-115 (1991). ("If the payee completes the note by filling in the due date agreed to by the parties, the note is payable on the due date stated.") (Emphasis added.)

(By leaving the payee space blank, Borrower made the note a bearer instrument, which the bearer could convert to an order instrument by filling in his name. 2 James J. White & Robert S. Summers, UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE § 17-3 (4th ed. 1995). Failure to include a payee does not diminish the negotiability or enforceability of the instrument.)

Point Two:

(25-35%) Because Lender was entitled to enforce the instrument at the time it was stolen, Lender would still be able to enforce it if Lender can prove the terms of the note and provide adequate assurance to Borrower against the risk of possible loss for future claims.

Even though Lender no longer has physical possession of the note, Lender would still be able to qualify as a “person entitled to enforce” the instrument under UCC § 3-301 (1991). Section 3-301(iii) specifically refers to a person who is not in possession of an instrument as nevertheless being entitled to enforce the instrument under § 3-309. Section 3-309(a) contains three requirements that enable a person not in possession of an instrument to enforce it. In this case, Lender satisfies all three requirements: (1) Lender was the person entitled to enforce the instrument when loss of possession occurred; (2) Lender’s loss of possession was not the result of his own transfer or of a lawful seizure; and (3) the whereabouts of the note are unknown to both parties, at least before Borrower paid Innocent.

Section 3-309(b) requires that Lender prove both the terms of the instrument and his right to enforce it. Neither should be problematic in this case. Lender would have to give Borrower assurances against double payment because Borrower, by the terms of § 3-309(b), would be entitled to demand adequate protection against possible loss from future claims on the missing note.

Point Three:

(25-35%) Given the forgery of the payee’s signature, Innocent did not qualify as a person entitled to enforce the instrument, and thus Borrower was not discharged by paying Innocent.

Under UCC § 3-602(a) (1991), the obligor on an instrument is ordinarily discharged by paying a person entitled to enforce the instrument. Borrower will not get the benefit of a discharge in making the payment to Innocent because Innocent does not qualify as a “person entitled to enforce” the instrument. In order for Innocent to be a person entitled to enforce the instrument under § 3-301, Innocent must be either a holder or a person who has the rights of a holder.

Innocent cannot be a holder because the chain of good title was broken by Robber’s forged indorsement of the payee’s (Lender’s) signature. UCC § 3-201(b) (1991) provides that, “If an instrument is payable to an identified person, negotiation requires transfer of possession of the instrument and its indorsement by the holder” (emphasis added). See also UCC § 1-201(20) (1989) (A “holder” of a negotiable instrument means “the person in possession if the instrument is payable to bearer or, in the case of an instrument payable to an identified person, if the identified person is in possession.”) Nor will Innocent qualify as a nonholder entitled to enforce the instrument because Innocent inherits only the rights of Robber, which are nonexistent because of the theft and forgery. Accordingly, Innocent was not a person entitled to enforce the note, and Borrower’s payment to Innocent does not discharge Borrower.

Point Four:

(15-25%) Because Innocent was not entitled to enforce the instrument, Borrower may recover from Innocent for breach of presentment warranty.

Even though Innocent knew nothing about either the theft or the forgery, Innocent nevertheless breached a presentment warranty to Borrower under UCC § 3-417(d)(1) (1991). At the time Innocent presented the note to Borrower for payment, Innocent was warranting to Borrower that Innocent was “a person entitled to enforce the instrument or authorized to obtain payment on behalf of a person entitled to enforce the instrument.” Id. As noted above, Innocent cannot be a person entitled to enforce the instrument because of Robber’s forgery of a necessary signature in the chain of title. Therefore, under § 3-417(d)(2), Innocent will be liable to Borrower for the amount that Borrower paid Innocent plus interest and expenses resulting from the breach of the presentment warranty.

CORPORATIONS IV.B, VI.A, VI.B

Question 7 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1) What is the applicable legal standard when a shareholder brings a derivative action based on breach of a director's fiduciary duties?
- (2)(a) Do directors violate their duty of care to the corporation when they vote to recommend action after only one hour of discussion?
- (2)(b) Does a director violate her duty of loyalty to the corporation when she votes to issue herself shares of the corporation?
- (3) If the court finds sufficient evidence of a breach of a fiduciary duty to overcome the Business Judgment Rule (BJR), can the director prevail with a defense of (i) disinterested director approval, (ii) shareholder approval, or (iii) fairness?

DISCUSSION

Summary:

The Class B Shareholder is unlikely to prevail in this derivative action. Ordinarily, the Business Judgment Rule (BJR) would preclude the court from second-guessing the board of directors on an issue of this sort (i.e., how best to finance a business expansion). In this case, however, even though the directors did not breach their duty of care to the corporation, Dart clearly did breach the duty of loyalty by voting to cause the corporation to enter into a transaction that provided her with a financial benefit. Because of the breach of the duty of loyalty, the BJR does not immunize the transaction from scrutiny. Nevertheless, the court would not enjoin the transaction because it was carried out in a manner that removes the taint of the breach of loyalty.

Point One:

(5-10%)

In a shareholder derivative action, decisions of the board on business issues are presumptively correct under the Business Judgment Rule (BJR).

In order to prevail in this derivative action to enjoin the issuance of Class C Preferred, the Class B shareholder must overcome the BJR. The BJR is a legal presumption. Absent a showing that the directors have violated a fiduciary duty to the corporation or committed fraudulent or illegal acts, the court will not second-guess their judgments. See Davis v. Louisville Gas & Electric Co., 142 A. 654, 659 (Del. Ch. 1928) (court refused to enjoin the directors from amending the certificate of incorporation, stating "it is not [the court's] function to resolve . . . questions of policy and business management. The directors are chosen to pass upon such questions and their judgment unless shown to be tainted with fraud is accepted as final.")

If the Class B shareholder puts forth sufficient evidence to demonstrate that the directors breached a fiduciary duty to Ergo, the BJR will no longer apply.

Point Two(a):

(25-35%) Although the directors discussed the matter for only one hour, they did not violate their duty of care to Ergo when they voted to recommend to shareholders the amendment to the Articles.

Directors owe a duty of care to Ergo; they must act on an informed basis, in good faith in the honest belief that the action taken is in the best interest of the corporation. See Aronson v. Lewis, 473 A.2d 805, 812 (Del. 1984). Under the Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA), directors are required to discharge their duty “in good faith and in a manner the director reasonably believes to be in the best interests of the corporation.” RMBCA § 8.30(a). When becoming informed to make a decision, directors must discharge their duty “with the care that a person in a like position would reasonably believe appropriate under similar circumstances.” RMBCA § 8.30(b). The duty of care is procedural (process oriented), not substantive.

The facts do not support an argument for lack of good faith or failure to act “with the care that a person in a like position would reasonably believe appropriate under similar circumstances.” RMBCA § 8.30(b). Even if the other funding alternatives might have been better for Ergo, directors are not liable for bad decisions so long as they follow the appropriate procedures, which they did here. See Kamin v. American Express Co., 383 N.Y.S.2d 807 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1976), aff’d, 387 N.Y.S.2d 993 (N.Y. App. Div. 1976).

The directors spent only one hour considering and deciding the issue. In Smith v. Van Gorkom, two hours was held insufficient for a major corporate decision. See Smith v. Van Gorkom, 488 A.2d 858 (Del. 1985) (Duty of care violated when directors approved a merger after a 20-minute oral presentation without reviewing the documents or assessing the valuation at a meeting that was called without much notice.) However, courts are generally concerned with major corporate decisions, like the sale of control in Van Gorkom. See Cede & Co. v. Technicolor, Inc., 634 A.2d 345, 370 (Del. 1993). In Ergo’s case, the issue was only the source of funding, as the directors had already properly approved the expansion plan.

(10-20%) Dart violated her duty of loyalty to Ergo when she voted to issue the Class C Preferred to herself.

The duty of loyalty requires a director to put the interests of the corporation before the director’s own interests. If a director enters into a transaction with the corporation that provides the director with financial benefit, it is a violation of the duty of loyalty. The purchase of the Class C Preferred by Dart is a transaction with Ergo that provides Dart with a financial benefit. Therefore, Dart violated her duty of loyalty to Ergo when she voted to issue the Class C Preferred to herself. This was also a conflicting interest transaction under the RMBCA because Dart knew she could benefit. RMBCA § 8.60.

Dart has a conflicting interest transaction because, at the time she voted to issue the Class C Preferred to herself, she knew she had a significant financial interest.

Point Three:

(35-45%) Although the directors did not violate their duty of care to Ergo, Dart violated her duty of loyalty. Regardless, the court would not enjoin the issuance of the Class C Preferred because Dart could show the transaction was (1) approved by a majority of disinterested directors after full disclosure, (2) approved by a majority of shareholders after full disclosure, or (3) fair to Ergo.

Even though the directors did not violate their duty of care, Dart violated her duty of loyalty to Ergo, and that fact prevents the application of the BJR. Nonetheless, the court would NOT enjoin the issuance of the Class C Preferred if Dart could demonstrate that the sale of Class C Preferred to her was (1) approved by a majority of disinterested directors after full disclosure, (2) approved by a majority of shareholders after full disclosure, or (3) fair to Ergo. See Robert C. Clark, CORPORATE LAW § 5.2 (1986); Revised Model Bus. Corp. Act (RMBCA) §§ 8.61-.63. In this case, Dart can demonstrate all three.

Disinterested Director Approval: All seven directors voted to offer the Class C Preferred to Dart after full disclosure of all material facts relating to the transaction. Disclosure of all material facts constitutes full disclosure. Approval must also be by a majority of disinterested directors. Dart is interested because she is a party to the transaction. The three remaining Class A directors are arguably interested because their positions as Ergo directors are dependent upon election by Dart, the sole Class A shareholder. If they failed to support Dart, Dart could remove them from their positions as directors. The three Class B directors, however, are disinterested directors. They all voted in favor of issuing the shares to Dart. Therefore, a majority (indeed all three) of the disinterested directors approved the offering of the Class C Preferred to Dart. Under the RMBCA (and most state statutes), the three disinterested directors who voted are sufficient to constitute a quorum when voting on a conflicting interest transaction.

Shareholder Approval: According to the facts, the proxy solicitation provided full disclosure of all relevant information regarding the plan to issue the Class C Preferred to Dart for $5 million. The fact that the directors did not disclose that they had considered and discarded other financing options is unimportant because information on other options was properly considered and discarded. All Class A shares voted in favor of the transaction, as did a majority of Class B shares (720,000 of 820,000 shares). Therefore, a majority of shareholders approved the transaction after full disclosure. Note that there is no requirement that the shareholders be disinterested.

Fair: Alternatively, Dart can show that the transaction was fair to Ergo at the time the Class C Preferred shares were issued. In assessing fairness, directors may rely on expert opinions. See RMBCA §8.30(e). To demonstrate that the price was fair to Ergo, Dart would offer the opinion of the independent investment bank stating that (1) $5 million would be fair value for the Class C Preferred, and (2) in the long run, payment of the Class C Preferred dividend would be less costly to Ergo than interest payments on a loan.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS V.A

Question 1 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does a secured party have the right to a self-help repossession without prior notice of default to the debtor and without judicial process?
- (2) Under the circumstances of this case can it be reasonably argued that the repossession was carried out in breach of the peace?

DISCUSSION

Summary:

After a debtor's default, a secured party may take possession of the collateral without notice and without judicial process. However, this right to self-help repossession exists only if the repossession can be accomplished without a "breach of the peace," a standard that the UCC leaves to the courts to define. Because the "breach of the peace" standard is open-ended and subject to judicial interpretation, the outcome of this case cannot be definitively stated. But the facts provide a basis for Debtor to make a reasonable argument that Uptown should have abandoned its attempt at self-help repossession and relied on judicial process to enforce its claim. First, Debtor had made it clear to Uptown that she would resist non-judicial repossession, and Uptown relied on trickery to avoid that resistance. A number of courts disfavor such "fraudulent" conduct by creditors. Second, the repossession was arguably done by an unauthorized entry into Debtor's "home," required "hot-wiring" of the motor home (ordinarily the act of a thief), and involved the incidental (but intentional) seizure of possessions of Debtor to which Uptown had no lawful claim. Such "trespassory" conduct may also be disfavored. In addition, the creditor's use of a police officer (without securing judicial approval) is also treated by courts as improper, though the police officer did not actually effect this repossession.

Point One:

Following default, a secured party has the right to take possession of the collateral without prior notice of default and without judicial process.

The secured party's right to repossess the collateral arises on the debtor's default. UCC § 9-609. There is nothing in the Code that requires the secured party to give either notice of default or notice of intent to repossess. Repossession can be through self-help and without the need to commence judicial proceedings. Id. The only limitation is that the repossession must be accomplished without a breach of the peace. Id.

Under the facts, Debtor, having missed “several monthly payments,” was clearly in default. Accordingly, Uptown was free to proceed with the self-help remedy of repossession.

Point Two:

(70-80%) Debtor could argue that Uptown’s repossession was in breach of the peace because it involved an unconsented entry into Debtor’s place of residence, it was accomplished by “hot-wiring” the vehicle, it enlisted the aid of a law enforcement officer, and it was carried out over the verbal protests of Debtor.

UCC § 9-609 authorizes the secured party to engage in self-help “without judicial process if this can be done without breach of the peace. . . .” See Point One. The term “breach of the peace” is not defined in the Code. Rather, the drafters relied on pre-Code case law to prescribe the parameters of permissible conduct. Particularly important facts include (1) whether the creditor has entered upon the premises of the debtor and (2) whether the debtor has consented to the entry and repossession. White & Summers, UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE § 34-7 (4th ed. 1995). Moreover, it is the potential for violence and not necessarily the occurrence or imminence of violence that defines a breach of the peace. Ordinarily, repossession of a vehicle from a driveway or public street or parking lot would not be found, without more, to be in breach of the peace. The matter is complicated in this case, however, because the motor home could be viewed as Debtor’s residence.

Most courts would find that an unauthorized entry into the residence of a debtor would, in and of itself, constitute a breach of the peace. Id. In this situation, if the motor home is viewed as Debtor’s home, it is likely that unauthorized entry would be held to be trespassory and a breach of the peace. The fact that Debtor lived in the motor home and it contained Debtor’s “clothes and other stuff” supports Debtor’s claim that the motor home was her residence, so that the unauthorized entry would be a breach of the peace. Any effort to take the motor home in that manner probably would be considered a breach of the peace.

Debtor might also argue that her initial objection was enough to preclude any further attempts at self-help repossession without her consent. Under this view, the fact that the repossession occurred a couple of weeks later and under circumstances where there was little potential for violence probably would not change the outcome. It was clear that Debtor opposed the repossession and would have resisted had she known that the motor home was about to be taken. On the other hand, it can be argued that the passage of time served to cool down the threat of violence. See Wade v. Ford Motor Credit Corp., 668 P.2d 183, 189 (Kan. Ct. App. 1983). If so, Debtor’s initial objection to repossession is irrelevant to an evaluation of the later action.

Even though Uptown’s entry into the motor home was accomplished without force, the fact that Ernest, the employee, “hot-wired” the engine might arguably be found to be a breach of the peace. See, e.g., General Electric Credit Corp. v. Timbrook, 291 S.E.2d 383 (W.Va. 1982)(breaking lock to debtor’s mobile home in order to gain entry constituted breach of peace); Martin v. Dorn Equipment Co., 821 P.2d 1025 (Mont. 1991)(cutting locked chain on ranch gate constituted breach of peace).

The fact that the repossession was accompanied by trickery (i.e., the fictitious coupon) may matter. The courts go both ways. See, e.g., F.A. North & Co. v. Williams, 13 A. 723 (Pa. 1888) (trickery is not a breach of the peace); Ford Motor Credit Co. v. Byrd, 351 So. 2d 557 (Ala. 1977) (trickery is a breach of the peace). The fact that the deputy sheriff was standing by does not contribute to a finding of breach of the peace because the deputy did not participate or serve to intimidate Debtor. White & Summers, supra. There is no evidence that Debtor saw the deputy or was at all affected by the deputy's presence.

The argument could go either way. On balance, however, a court would probably find a breach of the peace under the circumstances and that the repossession was unlawfully carried out

Question 2 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is Nephew liable in wrongful death for causing Testator's death?
 - (a) Was Testator's durable health care power of attorney validly executed?
 - (b) Was Nephew, a beneficiary under Testator's will and a witness to Testator's health care power of attorney, prohibited from acting as an agent?
- (2) Can the nieces successfully challenge the will because Testator lacked the mental capacity to execute her will?
- (3) Does Nephew forfeit the bequest under the interested witness statute?

DISCUSSION

Summary:

Nephew would not be liable in wrongful death if, as it appears, he acted under a valid durable health care power of attorney and in good faith. His decision to direct the withdrawal of life support was entirely consistent with the doctor's medical advice.

Testator's will appears to have been validly executed. Arguments that Testator lacked mental capacity should fail because the facts show that she knew both the objects of her bounty and the nature and extent of her property.

Lastly, Nephew would not forfeit his share under typical state interested witness statutes because the will bequeathed him a share less than what would have been his intestate share. Likewise, under the UPC, he would take his share as that statute has no interested witness forfeiture statute.

Point One: (35-40%)

Under the typical durable health care power of attorney statute, if Nephew acted under a valid durable health care power and in good faith, he would be shielded from civil liability that might otherwise arise as a result of his directing the withdrawal of the life-support systems.

The typical durable health care power of attorney statute immunizes the agent of the principal from civil liability for health care decisions made in good faith. See, e.g., Unif. Health Care Decisions Act

§ 9(b)(1993). Health care decisions include the decision to withhold or withdraw life-sustaining treatment, including food and hydration. See Unif. Health Care Decisions Act § 1(6).

Agents act within the scope of the statute when they act pursuant to a properly executed durable health care power of attorney. State laws vary, however, on whether the person designated as the agent can be a witness to the durable health care power of attorney. For example, under the Uniform Health Care Decisions Act, the designated agent is not prohibited from being a witness. In fact, under the Uniform Act, no witnessing of the power is required. On the other hand, in many states, the person designated as the agent cannot be a witness to the power.

Even if Nephew was not legally constituted as Testator's agent, he may nonetheless have acted appropriately under so-called "family consent" laws. These laws permit close family members (typically in the order listed in the statute) to act as a surrogate decision maker for a patient where there is no properly authorized agent acting under a durable power. For example, under § 5 of the Uniform Health Care Decisions Act, Nephew could act as a surrogate decision maker since there are no more closely related relatives and Nephew is an adult "who exhibited special care and concern for the patient."

Whether Nephew was acting as a properly constituted agent or as a surrogate under the family consent law, ultimately the issue of civil liability most likely depends on whether Nephew acted in "good faith." Here the facts suggest that he did. Testator had suffered a massive stroke and had lapsed into a coma, and Nephew's direction to withdraw Testator's life support appears to be consistent with sound medical advice to the effect that more care would be futile. While the fact that Nephew is named in Testator's will as a beneficiary may create the appearance of impropriety, this fact alone is not sufficient evidence of bad faith; empirically most agents and surrogates are persons who are both close to the principal and named as beneficiaries under the principal's will.

Point Two:

(35-40%) Testator's will is valid notwithstanding that Testator was sometimes forgetful, as the facts support the conclusion that Testator had the mental capacity to execute a will.

In order to validly execute a will, Testator must have "mental capacity." A testator has mental capacity if the testator knows (1) the nature and extent of the testator's property, (2) those persons who are the natural objects of the testator's bounty, (3) the nature of the instrument that the testator is signing, and (4) the disposition that is being made in the will. See generally William H. McGovern & Sheldon F. Kurtz, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES 272 (2d ed. 2001).

Here Testator was forgetful, which at first blush suggests the absence of mental capacity. But simply relying on that fact is insufficient to determine whether Testator had mental capacity since the criteria that determine mental capacity for purposes of validating a will look specifically to Testator's understanding of her property interests, her beneficiaries, and her disposition. On these issues, the facts suggest that Testator did have mental capacity.

Testator appears to have been actively involved in the management and administration of her property affairs, suggesting that she knew the nature and extent of her property. She knew those persons who might be the objects of her bounty as evidenced by the fact that she frequently visited with her 20 relatives, including those not mentioned in her will. Furthermore, the bulk of her estate is bequeathed to Charity, an organization with which she had had a long association. Thus, the will does not reflect a disposition that would likely be inconsistent with Testator's testamentary intent. Given that the burden of proof to establish the lack of testamentary capacity rests on the contestants, it is most unlikely that they could sustain that burden on these facts.

(20-30%) Nephew would not forfeit any of his bequest under the will.

Under the Uniform Probate Code, Nephew would not forfeit his bequest even though Nephew was a witness to the will because the Code does not have an interested witness statute barring interested witnesses from taking under a will.

At common law, if a will was not witnessed by two disinterested witnesses the will was invalid. See McGovern & Kurtz, supra, at 177. In the United States, this harsh rule has been replaced by statutes in most states barring the interested witness from taking the bequest but not invalidating the will. Id.

The typical interested witness statute, however, contains one or two important exceptions. The first is that if the will is witnessed by three or more persons such that the will would have been valid without the witnessing by the interested witness, the interested witness does not forfeit the bequest. Id. That exception would not apply here as Testator's will was witnessed only by two persons.

The second exception is that if the interested witness also would have been an heir of the testator, the witness forfeits only so much of the bequest as exceeds what would have been that witness's intestate share. Under that exception, Nephew forfeits nothing, as the bequest to Nephew of $100,000 is less than what his intestate share would have been. Nephew's intestate share would have been in excess of $250,000, as the estate is valued at more than $1 million and there are four heirs.

In light of the discussion under Point One, there is no reasonable basis on which to argue that Nephew's bequest is invalid under the slayer statutes.

Likewise, the facts state that Nephew was wholly unaware of the will provision in his favor. Thus, there is no basis to invalidate the will on undue influence grounds.

NOTE: If the will is valid, the nieces would probably have no standing to raise the interested witness issue. If the interested witness statute applied and the bequest, or some portion of it, were forfeited, the forfeited portion would pass to Charity as the residuary legatee under Testator's will.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE IE, II.A, IV.D; CONFLICT OF LAWS II.B, II.D

Question 3 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) What effect should the federal district court give to the forum-selection clause?
- (1)(b) Is the court likely to transfer the case to State N in these circumstances?
- (2) Can a foreign-based party to U.S. litigation refuse to make its officers available for depositions on the ground that they are “beyond the subpoena power” of the court?

DISCUSSION

Summary:

A motion for transfer of a case from one federal venue to another should be granted if a transfer would serve the convenience of the parties and the witnesses, if it would be in the interests of justice, and if the transferee court would have been a proper venue in the first instance. All of these requirements are satisfied here. The existence of a freely and fairly negotiated forum selection clause favoring State N is strong evidence that State N is a convenient forum, and the facts support the conclusion that State N is generally convenient for both parties, although State A is more convenient for plaintiff. Justice also favors upholding the expectations of the parties when they have freely selected State N as an appropriate forum. The action could also have been brought in State N initially.

When a corporate party is properly before a court (and no objection to personal jurisdiction was made here), the opposing party may depose an appropriate officer or director to speak for the corporation. The deposing party does not need to rely upon the court’s subpoena power for the exercise of authority over the officer or director. A protective order is proper only if there is some other basis to oppose the deposition (e.g., the party that noticed the deposition did not proceed in accordance with the federal rules governing the timing of discovery).

Because Buyer is seeking to transfer the case from one federal court to another federal court, the motion to transfer is governed by 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a). State A’s policy against forum-selection clauses is irrelevant, and the forum-selection clause is an important factor the court should consider in deciding whether to grant the motion to transfer.

Motions to transfer cases from one federal court to another are governed by 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a), which provides:

For the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice, a district court may transfer any civil action to any other district or division where it might have been brought.

Under this statute, motions to transfer are determined by weighing a number of factors, including the “convenience of witnesses and parties,” and “public-interest factors of systemic integrity and fairness.” Stewart Org., Inc. v. Ricoh Corp., 487 U.S. 22, 29-31 (1988).

When a venue-transfer motion is predicated on the existence of a forum-selection clause in a contract, the forum-selection clause “will be a significant factor that figures centrally in the district court’s calculus.” Id. at 29. This is because “the presence of a forum-selection clause,” bears upon the “convenience of [the proposed] forum,” given the parties’ expressed preference for that venue. Thus, the court must evaluate the fairness of the proposed transfer in light of the forum-selection clause. Id. Further, the existence of a state law rule invalidating the forum-selection clause does not excuse the court from considering the clause as one factor bearing on the propriety of a venue transfer.

Although the forum-selection clause must be treated as a “significant factor” when the district court evaluates Buyer’s transfer motion, the Supreme Court has said that the existence of a forum-selection clause is not “dispositive.” Id. For instance, an inequality of bargaining power between the parties may warrant giving less effect to the forum-selection clause. Similarly, litigating in the proposed forum may impose significant and unusual hardships on one of the parties. Absent such special factors, however, many courts hold that transfer motions under § 1404(a) should always be granted when doing so will give effect to a freely negotiated and fair forum-selection clause. See, e.g., REO Sales, Inc. v. Prudential Ins. Co., 925 F. Supp. 1491 (D. Colo. 1996); Riviera Finance v. Trucking Serv., Inc., 904 F. Supp. 837 (N.D. Ill. 1995).

Point One(b):

(45-55%) The federal district court in State A should grant the motion to transfer because the transfer would uphold the parties’ expectations and provide them with the neutral and experienced forum for which they bargained.

Applying the factors set out in Point One(a) should lead to transfer of this action. The forum-selection clause in this case was a bargained clause in a contract between parties of apparently equal bargaining power. State N appears to be a neutral forum, and State N courts are well known for their expertise in commercial matters. Although State N does not appear to be an especially convenient forum, the parties’ decision to select that forum in their contract indicates that each party believed State N to be a reasonably convenient alternative to less desirable options, including the option of litigating in either party’s home jurisdiction. Absent some evidence to suggest that a transfer to State N would result in special hardship or a denial of justice to either party, the court is likely to take the view that the parties’ decision to select the State N forum was ample evidence of the general superiority of that forum to State A.

This conclusion is bolstered by the fact that this is an international case. In M/S Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore Co., 407 U.S. 1 (1972), the Supreme Court adopted the view that a forum-selection clause in an international contract “should control absent a strong showing that it should be set aside.” According to the Court, the need for a neutral forum, the desirability of avoiding uncertainty about where litigation might occur, and the need for a forum with expertise in the subject matter all justify giving deference to the parties’ choice of forum when that choice is made in “a freely negotiated private international agreement, unaffected by fraud, undue influence, or overweening bargaining power.” Bremen, 407 U.S. at 12.

NOTE: Although M/S Bremen was an admiralty case, the Supreme Court has described the decision as “instructive” for other cases, including motions under § 1404(a) to transfer diversity actions. See generally C. Wright, A. Miller & R. Marcus, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 3803.1 (1995).

A transfer under § 1404(a) must be to a “district or division” where the case “might have been brought” initially. Here, it might be argued that the case could not have been brought in State N because there are no connections with State N sufficient to give State N courts jurisdiction over the defendant. However, personal jurisdiction can be based on consent, and both parties clearly consented to State N jurisdiction in their contract. Pre-lawsuit contractual consent serves as a basis for State N service of process on the defendant corporation, and would therefore have been an adequate basis for personal jurisdiction and venue had the action been brought in State N originally. See American Airlines, Inc. v. Rogerson ATS, 952 F. Supp. 377 (N.D. Texas 1996). In addition, because the defendant corporation is an alien corporation, venue in a suit brought against it would be proper in any district in the U.S., including in a federal district court in State N. See 28 U.S.C. § 1391(d); Naegler v. Nissan Motor Co., Ltd., 835 F. Supp. 1152 (W.D. Mo. 1993).

Point Two:

(20-30%) Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 30, Seller has the right to compel the deposition of an officer of Buyer without resorting to the court’s subpoena power.

A party to an action may secure the deposition of another party simply by providing notice to the other party. No subpoena of a party deponent is necessary, and a party is subject to sanctions for failing to provide a deponent, even if the party would be beyond the reach of the court’s subpoena power if the party were a non-party witness. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 30(b)(1), 37(b)(2), 37(d)(1). See generally Wright, Miller & Marcus, supra, §§ 2103, 2112 (1995).

As a corporate party, Buyer cannot speak for itself but requires a natural person to speak for it. Seller could have noticed Buyer’s deposition and required Buyer to nominate a representative to be deposed. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 30(b)(6). Alternatively, Seller can do what it did here—it can identify an officer or director of Buyer to be deposed as Buyer’s representative. See, e.g., Triple Crown America, Inc. v. Biosynth AG, 1998 WL 227886 (E.D. Pa. 1998). If the person fails to appear, sanctions are authorized by Rule 37(d)(1). See generally Wright, Miller & Marcus, supra. Hence, Buyer’s argument that its officers are “beyond the court’s subpoena power” does not present a valid reason to prevent the deposition of an officer. Buyer, as a party to the litigation, is obliged to produce its officers for deposition. Accordingly, Buyer’s request for a protective order should be denied, unless Buyer can offer sound reasons for resisting the deposition other than the simple claim that its CEO is beyond the reach of the court’s subpoena power.

NOTE: If the court had no personal jurisdiction over defendant corporation, the claim that the officers and directors are beyond the court’s subpoena power might be a colorable basis to resist the notice of deposition. The facts, however, suggest that personal jurisdiction is not a real issue. First, any problem with the State A federal court's personal jurisdiction over defendant Buyer was waived when Buyer responded to Seller's complaint without raising the personal jurisdiction issue. (See Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(h)(1).) Second, if the case is transferred, the federal court in State N would have personal jurisdiction over defendant Buyer because of its contractual consent to the jurisdiction of that court.

COMMERCIAL PAPER IV.C, IV.H, V.H

Question 4 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is Motors' claim against First Bank subject to the defense of failure of consideration?
- (2)(a) Did Motors' taking of the cashier's check discharge Driver's obligation to pay for the sports car under the sales contract?
- (2)(b) May Motors recover from Driver for breach of transfer warranty?

DISCUSSION

Summary:

First Bank is liable as issuer of the cashier's check to pay a person who is entitled to enforce the check. Motors is the holder of the cashier's check and is entitled to enforce it. However, Motors is not a holder in due course because the check was overdue on its face when Motors took it from Driver. Thus, First Bank can assert defenses to payment against Motors, including the defense of failure of consideration as a result of the dishonor of the check it received in payment for its cashier's check.

Driver's obligation to pay for the car was discharged when Motors accepted a cashier's check as payment. Moreover, Driver apparently was not a party to that check and did not indorse it, so Driver has no direct liability on the check, even if Bank dishonors it. However, Driver did transfer the check to Motors and therefore warranted that the check was not subject to any defenses. That warranty was breached, and Motors can recover from Driver for the breach of warranty.

Point One:

(40-50%) Motors' claim against First Bank is subject to the defense of failure of consideration. Motors had notice that the cashier's check was overdue and therefore Motors is not a holder in due course.

Motors is the holder of the cashier's check because the cashier's check is payable to Motors and Motors is in possession of it. See UCC § 1-201(20) (definition of holder). As a holder, Motors has a right to enforce the cashier's check against First Bank. See § 3-301(i) (holder's right to enforce); § 3-412 (obligation of issuer of a cashier's check).

First Bank, however, may assert a defense of failure of consideration because the Auto-Loans check that First Bank took in exchange for the cashier's check was dishonored. See § 3-303(b) (defense of failure of consideration); § 3-305(a)(2) (right of a holder to enforce is subject to ordinary defenses, such as failure of consideration). See, e.g., Laurel Bank & Trust v. City National Bank, 365 A.2d 1222 (Conn. Super. App. 1976) (bank refused to pay cashier's check because checks tendered to purchase the cashier's check were dishonored).

A holder in due course would not be subject to the defense of failure of consideration. See § 3-305(b) (defenses applicable to a holder in due course). Motors has met many of the requirements for becoming a holder in due course because Motors took the cashier's check in good faith, for value, and without notice of First Bank's defense. See UCC § 3-302(a) (requirements for holder in due course status). Motors, however, is not a holder in due course because Motors had notice that the cashier's check was overdue. See UCC § 3-302(a)(2)(iii) (holder in due course must not have notice that the instrument is overdue). Checks become overdue after 90 days. See UCC § 3-304(a)(2) (overdue instruments). A cashier's check is a "check" under UCC § 3-104(f). Motors should have known that the cashier's check was more than 90 days old on September 15 because the cashier's check was dated May 11 and thus was 126 days old.

Point Two(a):

(40-50%) Motors' taking of the cashier's check from Driver discharged Driver's obligation & (b) to pay the purchase price of the car under the sales contract. However, Driver is liable to Motors for breach of a transfer warranty because the cashier's check is subject to a defense or a claim in recoupment.

If a cashier's check is taken for an obligation, the obligation is completely discharged. See § 3-310(a) (effect of instrument on obligation). Accordingly, Driver's obligation to pay the purchase price of the car under the sales contract was discharged when Motors took the cashier's check in payment. (Note: At common law, this rule was referred to as the "doctrine of merger" because the underlying debt was said to be "merged" into the negotiable instrument.)

Driver is not liable on the cashier's check as a party because he did not sign or indorse it. Nothing in the problem's facts suggests that Driver indorsed the cashier's check. Accordingly, Motors could not enforce the check against Driver based on an indorsement. See § 3-415(a) (liability of indorser upon dishonor of an instrument) However, he did transfer the instrument. See § 3-203(a). When Driver transferred the cashier's check to Motors in exchange for the sports car, Driver warranted that the instrument was not subject to a defense or claim in recoupment. See § 3-416(a)(4) (transfer warranty). (See § 3-305(a), comment 3, for an explanation of claim in recoupment.) Driver breached this warranty because First Bank could have asserted a claim against Driver for the purchase price of the cashier's check after the Auto-Loans check was dishonored. See § 3-310(b)(1) (rights when an ordinary check taken for an obligation is dishonored, i.e., Driver's obligation to pay for the cashier's check is suspended until Auto-Loans' check was dishonored). Motors could recover the amount of the check in damages from Driver. See § 3-416(b).

FAMILY LAW IV.A, V.B, VI.F, VIII.A

Question 5 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is the husband of a married woman who conceives a child by artificial insemination regarded as the legal father of the child if the artificial insemination was performed by a medical doctor with the husband's written consent?
- (2) If a married woman conceives a child by a man other than her husband, who is the child's legal father?
- (3) Under what circumstances can the presumption favoring custody in the legal parent be overcome?

DISCUSSION

Summary:

A child's legal parent is presumptively entitled to custody both because parental rights are protected by common-law and constitutional principles and because parental custody is typically consistent with a child's best interest. Under the presumption, Bert is Daughter's legal father because he consented to his wife's artificial insemination and the procedure was performed by a doctor. Bert, as Ann's husband, is also presumptively Sonny's father but this presumption is rebutted by the fact that Walt is Sonny's biological parent. Presumptively the legal parent is entitled to custody. On the facts, however, Bert may be able to rebut the presumption that Walt should have custody of Sonny. The third point considers whether, on the facts given, the presumption favoring custody in a legal parent could be rebutted.

Point One:

(10-20%) Bert is the legal father of Daughter because he consented in writing to Ann's artificial insemination, and the procedure was performed by a doctor.

Even though Bert is not the biological father of Daughter, he is regarded as her legal father in virtually all American jurisdictions because he consented to his wife's artificial insemination. The leading case is People v. Sorensen, 68 Cal. 2d 280, 66 Cal. Rptr. 7, 437 P.2d 495 (1968). The 1973 Uniform Parentage Act provides that a child conceived by artificial insemination by donor is the legal child of the mother's husband if he consented in writing and if the insemination was performed by a medical doctor. Uniform Parentage Act of 1973 § 5. Statutes in many states contain similar provisions. Both these conditions are satisfied here, and Bert is, therefore, the legal father of Daughter.

Bert, as Ann's husband, is presumed to be Sonny's father. In most jurisdictions, the presumption is rebuttable. Here, Walt, the biological father of Sonny, can rebut the presumption.

At common law and under the statutes or case law of most states, a child born to a married woman is presumed to be her husband's child. Homer H. Clark, Jr., THE LAW OF DOMESTIC RELATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES § 4.4 at 191 (2d ed. 1988); Uniform Parentage Act of 1973 § 4; Uniform Parentage Act of 2000 § 204(a)(1). The presumption could generally be rebutted by proof of the husband's infertility or his lack of access to his wife. See Clark, supra.

In those states that would allow the presumption of paternity in the mother's husband to be rebutted, Walt could rebut the presumption because Bert is infertile, and because he and Ann were living apart at the time of Sonny's conception.

Because Walt can show that he is Sonny's biological father, Walt will have all the legal rights of a married father in many states. E.g., Uniform Parentage Act of 1973 § 2; In the Interest of B.G.C., 496 N.W.2d 239 (Iowa 1992); In re Petition of Kirchner, 649 N.E.2d 324 (Ill. 1995). However, in some states, Walt may still be denied the status of legal father if Walt has not attempted to assume his parental responsibilities. Cf. In re Raquel Marie X, 570 N.Y.S.2d 604 (App. Div. 1991) (finding father's consent to the adoption of his child was unnecessary because father's conduct did not demonstrate intent to pursue a meaningful relationship with child). Walt has offered to pay the expenses of Sonny's birth and to support Sonny, even though his offers were rejected. He also informally acknowledged paternity upon Sonny's birth, although he did not file suit or assert his paternity in a registry before Ann's death. On balance, Walt has attempted to exercise his parental responsibilities, and it would arguably violate Walt's due process rights to accord him fewer legal rights than other biological fathers. Cf. John S. v. Kelsey S., 4 Cal. Rptr. 2d 615 (Cal. 1992) (invalidating California statute that allowed mother to unilaterally thwart father's efforts to become "presumed father," thereby allowing father's rights to be terminated on best interest grounds).

In some jurisdictions, however, courts have authority to exclude evidence that would rebut the presumption favoring paternity in the wife's husband if rebutting the presumption would be contrary to the child's best interest. E.g., Ban v. Quigley, 812 P.2d 1014 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1990); Turner v. Whisted, 607 A.2d 935 (Md. 1992); B.H. v. K.D., 506 N.W.2d 368 (N.D. 1993). Bert might argue that rebutting the presumption that he is Sonny's father is inconsistent with Sonny's best interest for essentially the same reasons discussed in Point Three below.

Bert will argue that, as the legal father of Daughter, he is presumptively entitled to custody of her. The man who is determined to be the legal father of Sonny will argue that he is presumptively entitled to Sonny's custody. The presumption of custody in the legal father can be rebutted, although what is required to rebut the presumption varies from state to state. Bert would be likely to rebut the presumption, but Walt would not be likely to rebut the presumption.

A child's fit legal parent is presumptively entitled to custody as against a nonparent. See Homer H. Clark, Jr., THE LAW OF DOMESTIC RELATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES 811 (2d ed. 1988). In most jurisdictions, to rebut the presumption favoring custody in the legal parent, a third party must show that awarding custody to the legal parent will be detrimental to the child. E.g., Painter v. Bannister, 140 N.W.2d 152, 156 (Iowa 1966); Guardianship of Phillip B., 188 Cal. Rptr. 781,788 (Cal. App. 1983). This standard is clearly intended to be more favorable to the legal parent than is the best interest of the child test, which is used in custody disputes between parents and does not imply a preference in favor of either claimant. Some states, however, apply a best interest test to custody disputes between third parties and parents, although this test typically applies when the nonparent is living with the child and functioning as a parent. An application of the best interest standard in other situations arguably raises constitutional concerns. Cf. Troxely. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 69-70 (2000) (invalidating application of visitation statute where lower court gave no weight to the presumption that fit parents act in their children's best interest).

The presumption of parental fitness applies to the man deemed to be the legal father. Bert, Daughter's legal father, benefits from this presumption, and he will undoubtedly be awarded custody of Daughter. There is no evidence that he is not the fit and proper person to have custody of her. The fact that Walt has spent "some time" with Daughter and is fond of her is not enough to rebut the presumption. Walt's best argument is that if he is awarded custody of Sonny, he should also be awarded custody of Daughter because separating Daughter from Sonny would be detrimental to Daughter. Yet, on balance, this argument would not succeed as Bert can make the same argument (and more persuasively) in the context of Sonny's custody.

It is less clear who will be awarded custody of Sonny. The presumption of parental fitness applies to the man deemed to be the legal father. See Points One and Two above. Bert has a realistic chance of rebutting the presumption if Walt is Sonny's legal father. Walt has virtually no chance of rebutting the presumption if Bert is Sonny's legal father.

Assuming Walt is Sonny's legal father, Bert will argue that it would be detrimental to award Sonny to Walt. Bert is a fit and proper parent; Ann named him as guardian in her will; Sonny is currently living with him and Daughter; and separating siblings is generally disfavored. Moreover, Bert will argue that Walt's history of physical and mental abuse present a question of his fitness for custody. Assuming Bert is Sonny's legal father, Walt will have difficulty arguing that an award of custody to Bert would be detrimental to Sonny. There are no facts given that would support this argument.

Therefore, Walt's best hope of obtaining custody of Sonny is if he is Sonny's legal father and the court rejects Bert's arguments that an award of custody to Walt would be detrimental to Sonny.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP 11.A, 11.B, V.

Question 6 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Did Adam act with either actual or apparent authority in contracting for the Tahitian lobby decorations?
- (1)(b) Did Adam act with either actual or apparent authority in contracting with Moby for the guest room furnishings?
- (2) Does Sunrise have a claim for indemnification from Adam for either of the contracts for which Sunrise is liable?
- (3) Can Sunrise terminate Adam's agency prior to the expiration of the one- year term, and if so, is Sunrise liable to Adam for damages based on the early termination?

DISCUSSION

Summary:

Adam acted with apparent but not actual authority with respect to the contract with Tahini. Adam acted with apparent authority because Sunrise advised Tahini of the agency agreement but not of the limitations on Adam's authority. On the other hand, Adam acted with actual authority with respect to the Moby contract which was consistent with all of the terms of the agency contract between Sunrise and Adam. Thus, Sunrise is liable to both Tahini and Moby, albeit on different theories. Sunrise can seek indemnification from Adam for its liability under the Tahini contract but not under the Moby contract. Because Adam materially breached the agency contract, Sunrise can terminate that contract prior to the end of the fixed term in the contract without any liability to Adam.

Point One(a):

Adam had no actual authority to purchase the Tahitian lobby items on Sunrise's behalf. Under the Restatement (Second) of Agency, actual "authority to do an act can be created by written or spoken words or other conduct of the principal which, reasonably interpreted, causes the agent to believe that the principal desires him so to act on the principal's account." Restatement (Second) of Agency § 26. Sunrise made it clear to Adam that the items had to be within the style guidelines described in Exhibit B. The Tahitian items were inconsistent with the guidelines, and thus Adam had no actual authority to purchase them.

On the other hand, Adam did have apparent authority to purchase the Tahitian lobby items on Sunrise's behalf. Under the Restatement, "apparent authority to do an act is created as to a third person by written or spoken words or any other conduct of the principal which, reasonably interpreted, causes the third person to believe that the principal consents to have the act done on his behalf by the person purporting to act for him." Restatement (Second) of Agency § 27. Sunrise had sent a letter to Tahini appointing Adam "to act on its behalf in the selection of interior floor and wall coverings, works of art, furniture, and plumbing and lighting fixtures for the Sunrise East Beach hotel." The Sunrise letter emphasized Adam's authority by stating: "Know that you deal with Sunrise when you deal with Adam on this project." Sunrise did not indicate to Tahini that there were any restrictions on Adam's scope of discretion or authority, and the facts do not suggest that Tahini had knowledge of any limitations through other means. As a result, it was reasonable for Tahini to conclude that Adam acted with authority when he ordered the decorations. Since Adam acted with apparent authority, Sunrise is liable to Tahini. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 140(b).

Point One(b):

(10-20%) Adam acted with actual authority in contracting with Moby for the guest room furnishings and therefore Sunrise is liable on the contract.

When Adam contracted with Moby for the guest room furnishings, he was within the budget and style limitations required by Sunrise and Moby was a local supplier. Therefore, he acted within the scope of the actual authority granted by Sunrise. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 26. Because Adam acted within the scope of the grant of actual authority, Sunrise is liable on the contract to Moby for the guest room furnishings. In addition, Adam also acted with apparent authority because Moby received the letter from Sunrise. See Point One(a) above.

Point Two:

(10-20%) Sunrise has a claim against Adam for the amount of Sunrise's liability to Tahini but does not have a claim against Adam for its liability to Moby for the guest room furnishings.

Sunrise has a claim against Adam for the amount of its liability to Tahini because Adam did not act within the scope of his actual authority and, therefore, breached his duty to follow directions. Restatement (Second) of Agency §§ 399, 401.

Sunrise has no claim against Adam for reimbursement of its liability to Moby for guest room furnishings because Adam acted within the scope of his grant of authority. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 399. He followed directions and fulfilled his fiduciary obligations.

Point Three:

(20-30%) Sunrise can terminate Adam's agency at any time and end Adam's authority to bind Sunrise. Early termination of Adam's agency may expose Sunrise to liability for damages to Adam, but in this case Sunrise has a defense to such a claim.

Although the general rule is that authority conferred for a specific time terminates at the expiration of the period, Restatement (Second) of Agency §§ 105 and 118 provide that: "[a]uthority terminates if the principal . . . manifests to the [agent] dissent to its continuance.” Therefore, Sunrise may terminate Adam as its agent at any time, including before the end of the one-year term.

The principal has the power to terminate the agency even in violation of the agency contract: “The principal has power to revoke . . . although doing so is in violation of a contract between the parties . . .” Restatement (Second) of Agency § 118 cmt. b. However, the principal “has a duty not to repudiate or terminate the employment in violation of the contract of employment.” Restatement (Second) of Agency § 450. In such a situation, the principal may be liable to the agent for damages. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 455.

Given Adam’s deviation from the terms of his contract with Sunrise, Adam is not likely to recover from Sunrise for early termination. First, if a termination is based upon the agent’s breach of contract, then the principal has an offset against the agent’s damages. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 456. Second, “[a] principal is privileged to discharge before the time fixed by the contract of employment an agent who has committed such a violation of duty that his conduct constitutes a material breach of contract.” Restatement (Second) of Agency § 409(1). That appears to be the case in this situation.

Question 7 Analysis

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Can Testator's probate estate be disposed of according to the terms of a revocable inter vivos trust that was not executed in accordance with the Statute of Wills?
- (1)(b) Assuming the probate estate assets can be disposed of as a part of the revocable trust, do the terms of the trust in existence at the time the will was executed, or rather those as reflected in the subsequent amendment, apply?
- (2) Are the terms of the trust in favor of Wanda, Testator's former wife, revoked by operation of law because of their divorce?
- (3) Assuming the terms of the trust amendment apply, what is Hope's interest under the revocable trust?

DISCUSSION

Summary:

The disposition of Testator's estate is governed by the will and the terms of the revocable trust as amended. Absent a governing statute or case law to the contrary, divorce does not revoke the provisions of a revocable trust in favor of a former spouse. Furthermore, if that interest is alienable and devisable (as is here the term interest in income), upon Wanda's death it would pass to Hope, the legatee under Wanda's will. As for Adam's interest in the remainder, which is limited to "surviving children," if governing law requires him to be alive when Wanda's two-year term ends, his interest fails since he died before the term ended. The remainder, thus, passes wholly to Testator's surviving children, Ben and Carrie.

Point One(a):

(15-20%) Under the Uniform Testamentary Additions to Trust Act, a will may pour over the probate estate assets to the trustee of an unfunded inter vivos trust even if the trust instrument was not executed in accordance with the Statute of Wills.

At common law, the terms of the revocable trust could control the disposition of the testator's probate estate under the doctrine of incorporation by reference. Under this doctrine, if the will referred to an unattested document that was in existence at the time the will was signed, the terms of that document could be given effect in the same manner as if it had been properly executed. See generally State Street Bank & Trust Co. v. Reiser, 389 N.E.2d 768 (Mass. 1979).

This doctrine is no longer necessary to validate the so-called “pour over” will because of the almost universal enactment of the Uniform Testamentary Additions to Trust Act (1983) (UTATA). Unif. Prob. Code § 2-511. Under UTATA, a trust, even an unfunded trust, as here, can be the beneficiary of the testator’s probate estate so long as the trust is identified in the testator’s will and its terms are set forth in a written instrument. The validity of the pour over arrangement is unaffected by the fact that the trust was amended after the execution of the will.

Point One (b):

(15-20%) Under the Uniform Testamentary Additions to Trust Act, the disposition of the probate estate assets are governed by the terms of the revocable trust, including all amendments to the trust.

Under the incorporation by reference doctrine, the terms of the amended revocable trust would not apply to the disposition of the probate estate assets as that amendment was not in existence when the will was executed. Under the Uniform Testamentary Additions to Trust Act, however, the amendment applies. Unif. Prob. Code § 2-511(b). Thus, as of Testator’s death, the probate estate assets are to be held by Bank in trust to pay the income to Wanda for two years, and then to distribute the trust principal to Testator’s surviving children.

Thus, the will and amended trust govern the disposition of Testator’s estate.

Point Two:

(20-30%) Under the laws of most states today, Wanda’s two-year term interest is not revoked by the divorce. Therefore, the trustee should hold the trust property and pay her the income for the next two years in accordance with the amended trust terms.

Many probate codes provide that if, subsequent to the execution of a will, the testator and the spouse are divorced, provisions in a will in favor of the former spouse are automatically revoked by operation of law. In such case, the property that would have passed to the spouse is disposed of as if the spouse had predeceased the decedent. If Testator had created a testamentary trust, then under such a statute, Wanda’s two-year income interest would have been revoked by operation of law.

Here, however, Wanda’s interest is created under the terms of the revocable trust. Typically, state statutes affecting a divorced spouse’s interest under a will are inapplicable to interests created under a revocable trust and, therefore, Wanda’s interest is not revoked.

However, the law in this regard is slowly changing. For example, § 2-804 of the Uniform Probate Code would cause Wanda’s two-year interest in the revocable trust to be revoked upon her divorce from Testator. Some states have judicially reached that result by viewing the will and revocable trust as integrated estate planning documents and treating the probate statute’s revocation of the spouse interest upon divorce as reaching the trust as well. See Clymer v. Mayo, 473 N.E.2d 1084, 1093 (Mass. 1985). See also Unif. Trust Code § 112. Of course, if her interest is revoked, then nothing passes to Wanda under the trust after Testator’s death.

Assuming Wanda had an interest in the trust, it would pass under her will to Hope since an interest for a two-year term does not terminate at death. Whether University has an interest in the trust depends on whether the phrase “surviving children” means surviving Testator or surviving the two-year period set aside to pay the income to Wanda.

Trust interests are alienable, devisable, and descendible unless the terms of a trust expressly or impliedly provide otherwise.

Here, Wanda has a two-year term, which is devisable in the event she were to die within that period. Since Wanda has died prior to the expiration of the two-year term, her interest passes to Hope, the sole beneficiary of her estate. See Point Two.

University has an interest only if Adam had an interest. Whether Adam had an interest depends on whether the word “surviving” in the gift to Testator’s “surviving children” means “surviving Testator” or “surviving the two-year period.”

The preferred rule is to construe the word to mean surviving to the time of distribution. Under this rule, only those children of Testator alive two years after his death are entitled to the trust principal. See generally Simes & Smith, THE LAW OF FUTURE INTERESTS § 577 (3d ed. 1956). This would, of course, exclude Adam; if Adam has no interest to devise, then University, the beneficiary under Adam’s will, would have no interest in the trust either.

On the other hand, in some states, surviving refers to surviving Testator. Under this interpretation, each of Testator’s three children—Adam, Ben, and Carrie—had vested interests in the trust principal as of Testator’s death. Vested interests are not forfeited even if the beneficiary dies within two years of Testator. Given that trust interests are devisable, the vested interest of Adam would pass under his will solely to University, at least under the common law. Construing “surviving” to mean surviving Testator results in the trust remainder vesting at the earliest time.

Under the Uniform Probate Code, the analysis would be somewhat different. Section 2-707(b)(3) provides that the word “surviving” does not evidence any intent that § 2-707 not apply, as that word often does under anti-lapse statutes on which § 2-707 is modeled. Under § 2-707(b), if a class gift is limited in favor of a class of children, only those children alive at the time of distribution are entitled to possession of the property (Ben and Carrie). However, if a deceased child left surviving issue, such issue would take the deceased child’s share. Here, because Adam had no such descendants, the general rule applies and only those children of Testator alive at the time of distribution (Ben and Carrie) are entitled to possession. Under the Code, therefore, University would have no interest.

Preface

This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2003 and July 2003 Multistate Essay Examinations. Each test includes seven questions; most jurisdictions that use the MEE select the six questions their applicants will answer.

The model analyses to the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. These models are not an official grading guide. Some jurisdictions grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses as they wish, including the suggested weights given to particular points. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topic or topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by Roman numerals which refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that topic. For example, Question 4 on the February 2003 MEE tested Agency and Partnership I, agency relationships, II.B, apparent authority, and III, vicarious liability of principal. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet and can also be found at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE is a three-hour examination consisting of six questions. The examination is administered in one continuous three-hour time period. Applicants are expected to spend approximately thirty minutes answering each of the questions. The areas of law covered by the questions in the examination are: Agency and Partnership, Commercial Paper, Conflict of Laws, Corporations and Limited Liability Companies, Decedents' Estates, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Sales, Secured Transactions, and Trusts and Future Interests. Some questions include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You will have three hours in which to write your answers to six of the seven questions contained in this booklet; you will be told which of the questions you are to answer. Each question is designed to be answered in thirty minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts which are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show: an understanding of the facts; a recognition of the issues included; the applicable principles of law; and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Some jurisdictions instruct applicants to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

FEBRUARY 2003

Questions

Question 1

Testator was an 80-year-old mentally alert widow. Testator retained Lawyer to prepare her will naming Charity, a charitable organization, as the sole beneficiary of her estate. One week later, Testator received a photocopy of a proposed will that Lawyer had prepared for her.

A few days later, on October 1, 1998, Lawyer called Testator to inquire whether the proposed will conformed with her wishes. When Testator responded that it did, Lawyer suggested that Testator make an appointment to come to his office so that she could execute the original, which was in his possession. Testator responded that, because of her arthritic condition, it would not be convenient for her to do so, and she told him, "Just go ahead and sign the will for me." Lawyer said, "OK."

Later that day, Lawyer inserted "October 1, 1998" as the date of execution on the original will and signed Testator's name on the will in front of three secretaries who acted as witnesses. The secretaries then signed their names in the spaces provided on the will. All of them saw Lawyer sign Testator's name, and each of them saw the others sign their own names. Lawyer then called Testator and told her the will had been signed and witnessed. Testator replied, "Good, now it's done. Please keep the will for me."

A year later, Testator decided that she wanted to change the will to give her diamond ring to her niece, Nora. Deciding to make the change herself, she asked a friend to type up a document, which was identified as "a codicil to my existing last will." This document was then validly executed and stated, "I leave my diamond ring to my niece, Nora. In all other respects I hereby affirm my existing last will, executed on October 1, 1998."

A year later, Testator had a falling out with Nora. Remembering that she had devised her diamond ring to Nora, she gave the ring to another niece, Betty, as a gift. Testator died a few months later. Her closest surviving relatives were her two nieces, Nora and Betty. At the time of her death, her only asset was a parcel of real estate known as "Blackacre."

Who is entitled to Blackacre and to the diamond ring? Explain.

Question 2

Mariner owned several large fishing nets that required repairs. In January 2002, he took the nets to Chandler, who sells and repairs all kinds of new and used fishing equipment, including nets. Chandler agreed to repair and return the nets for $4,000 payable in 45 days. Mariner issued a valid, negotiable promissory note to Chandler promising to pay $4,000 to the order of Chandler on March 1, 2002.

Chandler repaired the nets, but did not return them to Mariner. Instead, on February 27, 2002, without Mariner's knowledge or permission, Chandler sold the nets as used goods to Trawler. At the time of the sale, Trawler was shopping for nets in Chandler's store and believed the nets belonged to Chandler.

When Mariner's note became due on March 1, 2002, he refused to pay Chandler because Chandler had not returned the nets.

On March 10, 2002, Chandler indorsed the note and sold it to Financier for $3,500. However, Chandler did not tell Financier anything about his dealings with Mariner and Trawler. In negotiating the note to Financier, Chandler wrote the words "without recourse" above his indorsement. When Financier later presented the note to Mariner and demanded payment, Mariner refused to pay.

Despite repeated requests, Trawler has refused to return the fishing nets to Chandler or to Mariner.

1. What rights, if any, does Financier have on the note against Mariner? Explain.
2. What rights, if any, does Financier have on the note against Chandler? Explain.
3. What rights, if any, does Mariner have against Trawler for recovery of the nets? Explain.

Question 3

Husband and Wife married in State X in 1992 and resided there for the following 10 years. They have three children, ages 5, 7, and 9.

In early February 2002, Husband told Wife that he wanted a divorce and was moving to State Z for a new job. He asked Wife to let him take the children. Wife refused. The next day, Husband moved to State Z without the children.

In March 2002, six weeks after arriving in State Z (the minimum period of residence for divorce in State Z), Husband filed an action for divorce. In this action, he also sought primary custody of the three children, asserting that Wife had been violent and abusive toward him throughout their marriage.

Wife was served with the summons and complaint in Husband's action at the family home in State X. Wife, who has never been to State Z, did not answer or appear in Husband's divorce proceeding.

In July 2002, the State Z court granted Husband a default judgment granting Husband a divorce, dividing their property, awarding him primary custody of the three children, and giving Wife "reasonable visitation." Husband served Wife with the judgment.

In August 2002, Wife allowed the children to go to State Z for a two-week visit with Husband, whom they had not seen for nearly five months. This was the children's first time in State Z. At the end of the two-week period, Husband notified Wife that he would not return the children to Wife.

Wife immediately filed an action in State X for divorce, property division, and custody.

Husband appeared in Wife's State X action and contested her claims. He sought enforcement of the State Z judgment awarding him custody. He also argued that Wife's other claims were precluded by Husband's State Z judgment of divorce.

1. Is the State X court required to enforce the State Z custody decree? Explain.
2. Are Wife's claims for divorce and property division precluded by Husband's State Z judgment? Explain.

Question 4

Lessor owns and manages apartment buildings in the town of Utopia.

Handy is the sole proprietor and only employee of a small business called “Rapid Repairs.” Most of the income from this business is generated by making small household repairs for homeowners and apartment dwellers in Utopia. Handy has a good reputation for performing quality work and charging reasonable rates.

One year ago, Lessor contracted for an indefinite period with Handy to perform repair work at several apartment units that Lessor owns in Utopia. The tenants of these units are told to make requests for repairs by calling a telephone number listed as “Lessor’s Repair Line.”

Under the Lessor/Handy contract, any call to “Lessor’s Repair Line” actually rings directly through to Rapid Repairs. Handy is obligated to investigate any tenant’s request for repair within 24 hours. Before actually making any repair, however, Handy is required to contact Lessor, describe the nature of the repair, and seek authorization to proceed. Once authorized to make the repair, Handy must make it within 24 hours. Lessor is obligated to pay Handy $50 per hour for any work done pursuant to the contract (including investigating repair requests) and, in addition, to reimburse Handy’s out-of-pocket expenses.

The Lessor/Handy contract further provides that Handy:

- may perform similar work on other apartment buildings, but may not perform work “on the side” for Lessor’s tenants in Lessor’s buildings;
- must provide his own tools;
- may not perform any electrical work, but must subcontract it to a licensed electrician, approved by Lessor, who will work under Handy’s supervision.

Last month, Tenant called “Lessor’s Repair Line.” Handy answered. Tenant said he had a cracked sink drainpipe. Handy immediately investigated. After obtaining permission from Lessor to repair the sink, Handy returned to make the repair. While Handy was making the repair, Tenant asked Handy to install an electrical outlet in the apartment for Tenant’s computer. Despite his contract with Lessor, Handy agreed to do so, but told Tenant there would be a charge of $200 as it was an improvement to the apartment, not a repair covered under the lease. Tenant agreed to pay $200 for a new outlet. Tenant assumed that the money would go to Lessor, but Handy intended to keep it for himself.

Handy was negligent in installing the electrical outlet. The outlet caused a fire, which destroyed Tenant’s personal property. Tenant never paid for the installation work.

On what alternative theories should Tenant argue that Lessor is liable for Handy’s negligence, and what is the likely outcome on each theory? Explain.

Question 5

Acme Corporation, a citizen of State X, manufactures widgets. Acme widgets are distributed to retailers throughout the United States by Widgets, Inc., a citizen of State Y. Plaintiff, a citizen of State Y, purchased an Acme widget from a retailer in her hometown. Shortly after purchasing the widget, Plaintiff was seriously injured when the widget overheated and exploded.

Plaintiff sued Acme in the federal district court located in State Y, properly invoking the court's diversity jurisdiction. Plaintiff sought $100,000 in damages on two state-law tort theories: (1) failure to warn, and (2) sale of a dangerously defective product.

Under the applicable state law, a manufacturer's duty to warn is fully discharged if a proper warning is affixed to the product at the point of delivery to its distributor. A distributor's duty is fully discharged if the warning is affixed at the point of delivery to the retailer. State law further provides that both manufacturers and distributors may be held separately and strictly liable for selling a "dangerously defective" product, even if they have given adequate warning of the risks. Plaintiff's complaint alleged both that Acme had failed to affix a warning label to the product and that Acme's widgets had a dangerous propensity to overheat.

After extensive discovery, Acme filed a motion for summary judgment on the failure to warn claim. It attached to its motion the supporting affidavits of employees of both Acme and Widgets attesting that a proper warning label had been affixed to the widget both at the time of delivery to Widgets and at the time of distribution to the retailer who sold the widget to Plaintiff. While conceding that the warning label usually provided with the product did give adequate notice of the danger of overheating and explosion under certain circumstances, Plaintiff nevertheless contested the motion for summary judgment with her own affidavit, in which she stated that there had been no warning label affixed to her widget when she purchased it from her local retailer.

The federal court granted Acme's motion for summary judgment on the failure to warn claim and entered judgment on that claim against Plaintiff. No appeal was taken. Soon afterward, Acme and Plaintiff settled the dangerous defect claim for an undisclosed amount.

Shortly after the conclusion of the federal litigation, Plaintiff filed suit in the state court of State Y, asserting against Widgets, Inc., the same two claims she had asserted against Acme in federal court: failure to warn and sale of a dangerously defective product. Widgets answered and then moved to dismiss on grounds of claim and issue preclusion.

1. In Plaintiff's suit against Acme, did the federal court properly grant Acme's motion for summary judgment on the failure to warn claim? Explain.
2. Should the State Y state court give preclusive effect to the federal court judgment and dismiss Plaintiff's claims against Widgets? Explain.

Question 6

Decedent died one year ago. Decedent's duly probated will created a $1 million trust. Trustee is the trustee of this trust. The trust provides that:

Trust income shall be payable annually to my son Adam for 10 years. Adam's interest shall be free from control, debts, liabilities, and assignments by Adam and shall not be subject to execution or process for the enforcement of judgments or claims of any sort against Adam. After 10 years, I direct that the income be paid for 5 years to Charity, a charitable organization. After this 5-year period, the trust will terminate and the principal shall be paid to my daughter Beth.

Decedent was survived by Adam and Beth. Adam had a history of lavish spending, which Decedent deplored. Beth was very careful in her financial dealings.

Three months ago, Susan, Adam's former spouse, gave Trustee a copy of a judgment for alimony she had obtained against Adam and proof that Adam had failed to pay her the required $5,000. Susan demanded that Trustee pay her $5,000, which was less than the trust's annual income.

Two months ago, Beth gave Trustee a copy of a tort judgment that John had obtained against Beth. She then requested that Trustee pay John $10,000, the amount of that judgment, from the trust principal.

Last month, Adam, Beth, and Charity commenced an appropriate judicial action to terminate the trust and have the trust assets distributed to them. Trustee has filed appropriate objections in this action.

1. Is Susan entitled to be paid $5,000 from the trust income? Explain.
2. Can Trustee properly pay John $10,000 from the trust principal? Explain.
3. Should the court terminate the trust and distribute the trust assets to Adam, Beth, and Charity? Explain.

Question 7

Corn Corp was properly incorporated in 1980 with $500,000 of initial capital. Its shares are owned equally by Alan, Bruce, and Kathy, who are also the sole directors and officers. Corn Corp produces and sells corn under the brand name “Super Corn.” Until 2000, it was a profitable corporation.

In the late 1990s, Kathy, who has a Ph.D. in genetics and is in charge of product development, was experimenting with genetically engineered corn. She created a new strain of corn that was more resistant to disease than regular corn. Corn Corp patented the new strain of corn. In order to be the first to bring genetically engineered corn to market, Kathy, without the knowledge of Alan and Bruce, negligently omitted several tests that would normally be applied to a new strain of corn, including tests to establish whether it would cause allergic reactions.

Alan, president of Corn Corp, was concerned that some food processors might not want genetically engineered corn. Therefore, on December 31, 1999, Corn Corp properly incorporated Gen-Corn, Inc. (GCI), a wholly owned subsidiary, to produce and sell the new strain of corn. In exchange for all of GCI’s stock, Corn Corp contributed to GCI the patent to the new strain of corn and $6,000, just enough to produce the seed for the first crop. Alan, Bruce, and Kathy were the sole directors and officers of GCI.

In 2000, GCI, operating out of the offices of Corn Corp, started marketing the genetically engineered corn under the name “Super Corn Plus.” While Kathy scrupulously maintained minute books for Corn Corp, she kept no minute books for GCI. Corn Corp kept meticulous records of all of its business transactions, but GCI did not keep separate records. Although each corporation had its own bank account, Corn Corp often made informal “emergency loans” to GCI to help with cash flow problems. Unfortunately, GCI never became profitable.

Shortly after the first harvest of “Super Corn Plus,” Stuart, a young business executive, died from an allergic reaction after eating cornbread made from “Super Corn Plus.” GCI immediately pulled “Super Corn Plus” from the market and soon after filed for bankruptcy. Because of the similar product names, Corn Corp’s sales of “Super Corn” plummeted, and Corn Corp can no longer pay its bills.

Assuming Stuart’s estate obtained a wrongful death judgment against GCI, can it recover the judgment from Corn Corp or any of Corn Corp’s shareholders? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES, WILLS

Question 1 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Was Testator's October 1, 1998, will properly executed?
 - (2) Did Testator's codicil effectively incorporate her earlier will by reference?
 - (3) Did Testator's gift of the diamond ring to Betty adeem the codicil's bequest of the ring to Nora?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Although Testator's will was not validly executed because it was signed in her name but outside of her presence, it was validly incorporated by reference into Testator's duly executed codicil, which expressly referred to it by date. Thus, the will, as incorporated by reference into the codicil, is valid to pass title to Blackacre to Charity, the beneficiary under the will.

Because the bequest of the ring in the codicil to Nora adeemed by virtue of Testator's gift of the ring to Betty, Nora is not entitled to the ring.

Point One: (35-45%) Testator's October 1, 1998, will was not effectively executed because Lawyer, while signing it at Testator's direction, did not sign it in her presence.

Will execution statutes commonly provide that another person may sign a testator's will if it is done at the testator's direction and in the testator's conscious presence. See, e.g., Uniform Probate Code (UPC) § 2-502(2). A few statutes additionally require that persons who sign for the testator must also sign their own names and sometimes also give their addresses. See Restatement (Second) of Property: Donative Transfers, Statutory Note to § 33.1. Many wills statutes require one or both of the following additional requirements: (1) that the testator declare the instrument to be his or her will to the witnesses, or (2) that the testator ask the individuals selected as witnesses to witness his or her execution of the instrument.

In this case, Lawyer signed Testator's name at her direction, but the question is whether he did so in her presence. The likely answer is that he did not. Courts have used two tests to determine presence: the majority "line-of-sight" test and the minority "conscious presence" test. Under the "conscious presence" test, the will execution is sufficient "if it was done in the testator's conscious presence, i.e., within the range of the testator's senses such as hearing." See Unif. Prob. Code § 2-502 cmt.

Lawyer clearly did not satisfy the “line-of-sight” test because Testator did not see Lawyer signing the will on her behalf. Under the “line-of-sight” test, the testator should be capable of seeing the witnesses and the person who is signing the will on the testator’s behalf actually sign the will. In those cases where the testator must specifically ask the witnesses to act as such, the witnesses should be capable of hearing that request. Matter of Jefferson’s Will, 349 So. 2d 1032 (Miss. 1977). Even under the more liberal “conscious presence” test (which the UPC expressly adopts), it is very unlikely that the court will conclude that the presence requirement was satisfied. In the analogous situation where a testator acknowledges her signature to witnesses over the telephone, courts have held that this does not satisfy the “conscious presence” requirement. See In re Estate of McGurkin, 743 P.2d 994 (Idaho Ct. App. 1987). There is too much room for fraudulent or mistaken substitution of one document for another under these circumstances to permit the will to be admitted to probate.

The defect with the signature requirement is itself sufficient reason to conclude that the will was defectively executed. Additionally, since Testator did not sign the will, acknowledge her signature, acknowledge the will to the witnesses in their presence (under either test), or ask them to act as witnesses, there was defective execution with respect to the witnessing requirements of the will statutes in most states.

The Uniform Probate Code’s harmless error provision, UPC § 2-503, would not likely allow the October 1, 1998, writing to be admitted as a will. There are two defects here, signature and attestation, and the Comment to § 2-503 provides that the greater the departure from the required formalities of execution, the less likely that the provision will cure the defects. This is especially true with respect to defects in the signature requirement. See UPC § 2-503 cmt.

Point Two: The validly executed codicil incorporated the October 1, 1998, will by reference, (25-35%) and therefore the October 1, 1998, will can be given legal effect even though it was defectively executed. Therefore, Charity is entitled to Blackacre.

The codicil is Testator’s only duly executed will. A properly executed codicil can incorporate by reference an earlier will that was defectively executed, as here. See Allen v. Mattock, 14 Eng. Rep. 757 (P.C. 1858); Jesse Dukeminier & Stanley Johanson, WILLS, TRUSTS, AND ESTATES 303 (6th ed. 2000). Therefore, if the jurisdiction recognizes the doctrine of incorporation by reference, the court should give effect to the October 1, 1998, will as an incorporated extrinsic writing.

The doctrine of incorporation by reference is recognized in most states. Either by statute (e.g., UPC § 2-510) or by judicial decision, several requirements must be met in order for a properly executed will to incorporate an extrinsic writing by reference. The usual requirements are: (1) the extrinsic writing must in fact have been in existence at the time the incorporating will was executed; (2) the incorporating will must refer to the extrinsic writing as having been in existence at the time of execution; (3) the incorporating will must refer to the extrinsic writing in such a way as to reasonably identify it; and (4) the incorporating will must manifest the testator’s intent to incorporate the extrinsic writing. See Wagner v. Clauson, 78 N.E.2d 203 (Ill. 1948). All four of the requirements were met here. The codicil’s reference to the existing October 1, 1998, will is sufficiently clear, as is the intention to incorporate the earlier writing. Therefore, Charity is entitled to Blackacre.

Note: If the jurisdiction does not recognize the incorporation doctrine, the probate court should not give any effect to the October 1, 1998, writing. Specifically, the doctrine of republication by codicil cannot be used to republish an earlier will that was defectively executed. The republication requirement can be used to give effect to an earlier will that was invalid for reasons other than defective execution. The October 1, 1998, will was invalid solely because it was defectively executed, so republication is not available here. If the will was not incorporated by reference, Blackacre would pass to Nora and Betty equally as Testator's heirs.

Point Three: The bequest of the diamond ring to Nora was adeemed by Testator's gift of the (25-35%) ring to Betty. Therefore, Nora is not entitled to the ring and Betty keeps it.

The doctrine of ademption by extinction provides that if the subject matter of a specific bequest is not part of the estate at the testator's death, the bequest is adeemed. The doctrine applies only to specific bequests. The bequest here was specific because the will referred to a specific asset. Under the traditional approach to ademption—the so-called “identity theory”—the testator's intent as to ademption is irrelevant. All that matters is whether or not the specifically bequeathed asset is part of the estate at death. Accordingly, Testator's gift of the ring to Betty caused the bequest to Nora to adeem.

Even under the Uniform Probate Code's non-ademption provision, UPC § 2-606(a)(6), which adopts the so-called “intent theory” of ademption, the result would be the same. In the Comment to § 2-606, the drafters provide a hypothetical problem with facts similar to those of this case. The Comment states, “G's deliberate act of giving away the specifically devised property is a fact and circumstance indicating that ademption of the devise was intended.” Therefore, § 2-606(a)(6) would yield the same result as the traditional ademption doctrine, particularly because the facts state that Testator gifted the ring to Betty in order to ensure that Nora did not take under the codicil.

Question 2 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) May Financier enforce the note against Mariner despite Mariner's defense that Chandler did not return the nets?
 - (2) May Financier recover from Chandler for breach of transfer warranty because the note was subject to a defense when Chandler transferred it?
 - (3) Did Trawler acquire good title to the fishing nets when Trawler purchased them from Chandler?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Financier, the holder of the note, cannot recover against Mariner, the maker of the note, because Mariner has a valid defense: Chandler, the original payee of the note, breached his contract to repair and return the nets. Financier is not a holder in due course because the note was overdue on its face when Financier took it from Chandler.

Financier can, however, recover from Chandler. Although Chandler endorsed the note "without recourse," that language only limits Chandler's liability as an indorser. In addition to indorsing the note, Chandler transferred it for value, thus making certain transfer warranties, including a warranty that the note was not subject to any defenses. Because Chandler breached that warranty (as the note was in fact subject to Mariner's breach of contract defense), Financier can recover its loss ($4,000) from Chandler.

Mariner may not recover his nets from Trawler because Mariner entrusted them to a merchant who deals in fishing nets (Chandler) and Trawler purchased them from Chandler in the ordinary course of business. In this case, the UCC protects the purchaser, even though Chandler had no right to sell the nets.

Point One: Mariner is not liable to Financier on the note because Mariner has a defense to (35-45%) payment that it may assert against Financier.

Chandler negotiated the note by indorsing it and delivering it to Financier. Uniform Commercial Code § 3-201(b). Financier became the holder of the note when he took the note from Chandler with Chandler's indorsement. UCC § 3-201(a) (specifying consequence of negotiation).

The holder of a note is a person entitled to enforce the note against its maker. UCC § 3-301. Accordingly, Financier is a person entitled to enforce the note against Mariner. Mariner, however, has a defense to payment because Chandler breached the contract to repair and return the nets. Mariner may assert this defense against Financier, unless Financier is a holder in due course. See UCC § 3-305(a)(2) (permitting the maker to assert contract defenses); § 3-305(b) (limiting the assertion of defenses against a holder in due course).

To be a holder in due course, among other requirements, a holder must take a note without notice that the note is overdue. UCC § 3-302(a)(2)(iii). In this case, the note was payable on March 1 and therefore became overdue after that date. UCC § 3-304(b)(2) (specifying when a note becomes overdue). Financier took the note after it was due. Financier had notice on the face of the note that it was overdue. Financier therefore is not a holder in due course and Mariner may assert against Financier the breach of contract defense Mariner has against Chandler.

Point Two: Chandler is liable to Financier for breach of transfer warranty because the note (35-45%) was subject to a defense to payment when Chandler transferred it.

A person who transfers a note for consideration warrants that the instrument is not subject to a defense to payment. UCC § 3-416(a)(4). Chandler is deemed to have made this warranty to Financier when Chandler transferred the note and Financier paid $3,500 to Chandler in consideration for it. UCC § 3-303(b) (defining consideration). The warranty was violated because, as explained in Point One, Mariner was entitled to assert Chandler's breach of contract as a defense to payment.

For breach of warranty, a person who took the instrument in good faith may recover damages from the warrantor in an amount equal to the loss suffered as a result of the breach. UCC § 3-416(b) (specifying the measure of damages). In this case, Financier appears to have taken the instrument in good faith because Chandler did not tell Financier anything about the origin of the note. See UCC § 3-103(a)(4). The amount of Financier's loss equals the difference between what the note is worth and what it would have been worth if it had been as warranted. See William D. Hawkland, 6 HAWKLAND UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE § 3-416:10 (2001). In this case, the note has no value to Financier because Mariner has a defense to payment. If the note had been as warranted, it would have been worth $4,000 to Financier because Mariner would have had to pay that amount. Accordingly, Financier may recover $4,000 from Chandler, not just the $3,500 he paid for the instrument.

Ordinarily upon dishonor, one who indorses a note is liable for payment based on the indorsement. UCC § 3-415(a). In this case, however, Chandler is not obliged to pay the note based on his indorsement because he indorsed the note "without recourse." UCC § 3-415(b). Financier therefore cannot enforce the note against Chandler based on Chandler's indorsement. Financier's claim against Chandler is limited to the breach of warranty claim. The indorsement "without recourse" is not effective to disclaim warranties. UCC § 3-416 cmt. 5.

Point Three: Trawler owns the fishing nets and may retain them because Mariner entrusted the (15-25%) nets to Chandler, a merchant who deals in goods of the kind, and Chandler sold them in the ordinary course of business to Trawler.

A seller who does not have title to goods generally may not transfer title to the buyer. UCC § 2-403(1). This general rule, however, contains an important exception that sometimes permits a seller to transfer title to goods that the seller does not own. In particular, “[a]ny entrusting of possession of goods to a merchant who deals in goods of that kind gives him the power to transfer all rights of the entruster to a buyer in the ordinary course of business.” UCC § 2-403(2).

In this case, Chandler is a merchant with respect to the fishing nets because he deals in all kinds of fishing equipment. UCC § 2-104(1). Mariner entrusted the fishing nets to Chandler when Mariner left them to be repaired. UCC § 2-403(3) (specifying that entrusting includes “any delivery and acquiescence in retention of possession”); Hawkland, supra, § 2-403:7 (citing the leaving of goods for repair as a typical example of entrusting). Trawler purchased the goods in the ordinary course of business because Chandler regularly sells used goods and because Trawler believed that Chandler owned the fishing nets. Accordingly, Chandler had the power to transfer to Trawler good title to the fishing nets. Trawler now has title to the fishing nets and may retain them.

FAMILY LAW III.B, IV.A, IV.E
CONFLICT OF LAWS

Question 3 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA), the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), or the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (PKPA), must the State X court enforce the State Z decree awarding custody to Husband?
 - (2) Should the State X court give preclusive effect to Husband's State Z judgment and therefore bar Wife's claims for divorce and property division?

DISCUSSION

Summary: The State X court is not required to enforce the State Z decree awarding custody to Husband. Although the custody provision entered by the State Z court was the first custody order entered, the State Z court lacked jurisdiction under both the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA) and Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA). Consequently, a court in State X applying the UCCJA or UCCJEA need not recognize or enforce the custody provision in the State Z decree. Also, the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (PKPA) would not require that the State X court give the State Z decree full faith and credit. The assertion of jurisdiction by State Z was not consistent with the requirements of the PKPA.

The State X court should give preclusive effect to Husband's State Z judgment of divorce. The State Z court had jurisdiction to adjudicate the divorce, given Husband's domicile. However, the State X court should adjudicate Wife's claim for property, since the State Z court lacked in personam jurisdiction over Wife to adjudicate that claim, and since the State X court has such jurisdiction over Husband.

Point One: The State X court is not required under the UCCJA, the UCCJEA, or the PKPA to (45-55%) enforce the State Z decree awarding custody to Husband.

Every state has adopted either the UCCJA or the UCCJEA. These acts require that states recognize and not modify sister state custody judgments that were based upon jurisdictional requirements similar to those found in the UCCJA or UCCJEA.

The UCCJA and UCCJEA both set forth four bases upon which a state court may assert jurisdiction to make an initial child custody determination. A court has jurisdiction to make an order if (1) the state is the home state of the child at the time of the commencement of the proceeding (i.e., home state jurisdiction); (2) the child and at least one contestant have a “significant connection” with the state (i.e., significant connection jurisdiction); (3) the child is physically present in the state and has been abandoned or subject to abuse (i.e., emergency jurisdiction); or (4) no other state appears to have jurisdiction under the Act, or the state with jurisdiction has declined to exercise it, and it is in the best interest of the child for the court to assert jurisdiction (i.e., default jurisdiction).

State Z did not have jurisdiction on any of these bases. The children had resided in State X since they were born, so State Z was not the children’s home state. The children had never been to State Z, so there was no basis for “significant connection” jurisdiction. State Z also lacked “default” jurisdiction because State X could have exercised “home state” or “significant connection” jurisdiction, and State X had not declined to exercise jurisdiction. Finally, the children were not present in State Z when the court issued its custody decree, nor was there any evidence that they were in danger, so the State Z court lacked emergency jurisdiction. See UCCJA § 3.

Note: Although § 204 of the UCCJEA deals more directly than does the UCCJA with issues of emergency jurisdiction in situations of spousal abuse, the UCCJEA still requires that the child be present in the state issuing the emergency order.

Therefore, under both the UCCJA and UCCJEA, the State Z court lacked jurisdiction to adjudicate custody and the State X court need not enforce this aspect of the State Z decree.

Nor does federal law require that the State X court enforce the State Z decree. The federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (28 U.S.C. § 1738A) dictates the circumstances in which the courts of one state must give full faith and credit to an earlier custody decree from a sister state. The PKPA contains provisions that are substantially similar to those of the UCCJA and UCCJEA. First, under 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(c)(1), the issuing court must have had jurisdiction under its own state laws. Here, State Z surely did not. Second, under 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(c)(2), even if State Z had jurisdiction under its own law, the PKPA requires enforcement only if the initial assertion of jurisdiction was consistent with the jurisdictional standards set out in the PKPA, which are very similar to the standards required by the uniform acts.

Note: The principal difference between the jurisdictional requirements of the PKPA and the UCCJA is that the PKPA permits jurisdiction to be based upon a “significant connection” only if the child does not have a “home state.” For the reasons noted above, State Z’s assertion of jurisdiction was not consistent with those standards. Since neither prong (c)(1) nor (c)(2) is satisfied here, the decree need not be enforced.

Accordingly, under all three statutes, State Z lacked jurisdiction to award Husband custody, and therefore, State X need not enforce the custody decree.

Point Two: The State X court must give preclusive effect to Husband's State Z judgment of (45-55%) divorce, but not to the State Z determination respecting property division.

The principle of “divisible divorce” provides that the jurisdictional basis for termination of marriage is different from the jurisdictional basis for deciding the incidents of marriage such as alimony, property division, and child support. Estin v. Estin, 334 U.S. 541 (1948); Vanderbilt v. Vanderbilt, 354 U.S. 416 (1957). Divorce jurisdiction is based on “domicile” or some equivalent long-term connection between at least one of the parties to the marriage and the forum state. Id.

In this case, it appears that Husband had changed his domicile from State X to State Z. He had moved to State Z and his new job there demonstrated his intent to remain there for the foreseeable future. Thus, State Z was his new domicile at the time he filed for and obtained his default divorce decree. Williams v. North Carolina (I), 317 U.S. 287 (1942).

Because Wife neither answered nor otherwise appeared in Husband's State Z divorce action, she now may collaterally attack that judgment in State X. However, Wife may challenge only the jurisdictional basis for the State Z divorce decree, not the merits. Williams v. North Carolina (II), 325 U.S. 226 (1945). Unlike the situation in Williams (II), where the deserting spouses stayed only temporarily in Nevada to get divorced and then immediately returned to their previous home state, Husband has remained in State Z and has accepted a new job there. Because there is substantial evidence that State Z became the bona fide domicile of Husband when he moved there, Wife's collateral attack on the validity of the State Z divorce decree obtained by Husband will fail. Thus, the State Z dissolution of the marriage must be recognized and will preclude Wife's action for divorce.

On the other hand, Husband's claim that the State Z judgment precludes Wife's claim in State X for property division should be rejected. The jurisdictional basis for such claims is in personam. Estin, 334 U.S. 541; Vanderbilt, 354 U.S. 416. No factual basis for in personam jurisdiction over Wife by the State Z court has been shown. As Wife had never been in State Z, and did not answer the divorce petition, there were no “minimum contacts” sufficient to support the assertion of in personam jurisdiction in State Z over Wife with respect to property division. See Kulko v. Superior Court of California, 436 U.S. 84 (1978). Thus, the State Z judgment would have no preclusive effect on Wife's property division claim in State X. Estin, 334 U.S. 541; Vanderbilt, 354 U.S. 416.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP I, II.B, III

Question 4 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) Does Lessor exercise sufficient control over Handy to establish Handy as Lessor's "servant" so that Lessor is liable for Handy's torts?
 - (1)(b) If Handy is Lessor's servant, is Handy's conduct within the scope of employment?
 - (2) If Handy is not a servant, did Tenant reasonably rely upon Handy's apparent authority to install an electrical outlet so that Lessor is nonetheless liable for Handy's tort?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Lessor may be held liable for Handy's tortious conduct under either of two theories. First, if the Lessor-Handy relationship is one of master and servant, Lessor is liable for Handy's torts if Handy was acting within the scope of his employment when he committed them. See Restatement (Second) of Agency § 219. Second, even if the relationship between Lessor and Handy does not rise to the level of a master-servant relationship, Lessor will be liable for Handy's tort if Tenant relied on statements or conduct by Handy that were within Handy's apparent authority. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 265.

Point One(a): The relationship between Handy and Lessor may be a master-servant relationship (30-40%) such that Lessor is liable for torts committed by Handy while acting within the scope of his employment.

A master is liable for the torts of the master's servants committed while acting in the scope of their employment. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 219(1). Handy is clearly an agent as he agreed to work for, and subject to the control of, Lessor. The more difficult question is whether Handy would be considered to be Lessor's servant.

Note: The Restatement (Third) of Agency has adopted "Employer-Employee" language in place of the traditional "Master-Servant" terminology and applicants may of course use this newer terminology.

Whether Handy performed the work for Tenant as Lessor's "servant" or as an independent contractor agent depends on the degree of control exercised by Lessor over Handy's activities. The Restatement (Second) of Agency § 2(2) provides that a "servant is an agent employed by a master to perform service in his affairs whose physical conduct in the performance of the service is controlled or is subject to the right to control by the master." Conversely, the Restatement

(Second) of Agency § 2(3) provides that “an independent contractor is a person who contracts with another to do something for him but who is not controlled by the other nor subject to the other’s right to control with respect to his physical conduct in the performance of the undertaking.” The Restatement (Second) of Agency § 220(2) lists factors used to determine whether an agent is a servant. These factors are:

- (a) the extent of control which, by the agreement, the master may exercise over the details of the work;
- (b) whether or not the one employed is engaged in a distinct occupation or business;
- (c) the kind of occupation, with reference to whether, in the locality, the work is usually done under the direction of the employer or by a specialist without supervision;
- (d) the skill required in the particular occupation;
- (e) whether the employer or the workman supplies the instrumentalities, tools, and the place of work for the person doing the work;
- (f) the length of time for which the person is employed;
- (g) the method of payment, whether by the time or by the job;
- (h) whether or not the work is a part of the regular business of the employer;
- (i) whether or not the parties believe they are creating the relation of master and servant; and
- (j) whether the principal is or is not in business.

In Handy’s case, the facts permit a persuasive argument on either side. Several factors suggest that Handy should be considered a servant of Lessor. First, Lessor exercises significant control over Handy, in insisting that any repair be approved by Lessor. Second, the relationship appears to be long term, not a temporary arrangement for a small number of repair jobs; it has already lasted for a year. Third, payment is by time worked, not by the particular job. Finally, the work performed is a necessary part of Lessor’s business of owning and operating apartment buildings.

On the other hand, several factors support an argument for classifying Handy as an independent contractor. First, Handy, as a repairman, is engaged in a distinct occupation and business that requires some degree of special skill. Second, Handy provides his own tools. Third, Handy has his own separate repair business and appears to have taken on Lessor’s work in the course of operating that separate business. Fourth, Lessor approves repairs to his properties but does not specify the methods that Handy must use.

Note: Either analysis of the servant issue is plausible. The point is that Lessor is only liable under the theory of respondeat superior if Handy is a servant.

Point One(b): If Handy is a servant, his actions were within the scope of employment because, (15-25%) although not authorized, adding an electrical outlet was incidental to authorized conduct.

Conduct is within the scope of employment if the conduct is of the “same general nature authorized or incidental to the conduct authorized.” Restatement (Second) of Agency § 229(1).

Factors examined in determining whether conduct is within the scope of employment include whether the conduct is the kind the servant is employed to perform; whether it occurs substantially within the authorized time and space; and whether it was performed, at least in part, to serve the master. See Restatement (Second) of Agency § 228.

In this case, Handy was not authorized to add the electrical outlet as Handy's contract with Lessor expressly prohibited him from doing electrical work. It also prohibited him from doing work "on the side" for a tenant. However, even forbidden activity can be within the scope of employment. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 230.

The Restatement (Second) of Agency § 229(2) sets forth factors to consider in determining whether an action is incidental to the authorized conduct so that it comes within the scope of employment. These factors include:

- (a) whether or not the act is one commonly done by such servants;
- (b) the time, place and purpose of the act;
- (c) the previous relations between the master and the servant;
- (d) the extent to which the business of the master is apportioned between different servants;
- (e) whether or not the act is outside the enterprise of the master or, if within the enterprise, has not been entrusted to any servant;
- (f) whether or not the master has reason to expect that such an act will be done;
- (g) the similarity in quality of the act done to the act authorized;
- (h) whether or not the instrumentality by which the harm is done has been furnished by the master to the servant;
- (i) the extent of departure from the normal method of accomplishing an authorized result; and
- (j) whether or not the act is seriously criminal.

A key fact that points to the conclusion that adding the electrical outlet was incidental to the scope of employment is the fact that Handy did the electrical work while providing Tenant with authorized services.

Point Two: Even if Handy is not a servant, or is a servant not acting within the scope of employment, Lessor is liable if Tenant reasonably believes Handy was Lessor's agent and relied on what appeared to be authority for Handy to perform the work.

Restatement (Second) of Agency § 265 sets out the general rule: "(1) A master or other principal is subject to liability for torts which result from reliance upon, or belief in, statements or other conduct within an agent's apparent authority." Section 265(2) conditions this liability upon reliance.

An agent is clothed with apparent authority when a principal "by written or spoken words or any other conduct of the principal which, reasonably interpreted, causes the third party to believe that the principal consents to have the act done on his behalf by the person purporting to act for him."

Restatement (Second) of Agency § 27. The facts indicate that Lessor clothed Handy with apparent authority by advising tenants to call the “Lessor’s Repair Line” when they needed repairs, and then using Handy’s business phone number as the “Lessor’s Repair Line.” The act of using Handy’s number reasonably caused Tenant to believe that Handy was authorized by Lessor to act on Lessor’s behalf. There are no facts to suggest that Tenant knew or could expect to know that a person authorized to make general repairs was prohibited by contract from adding an electrical outlet.

With respect to reliance, the facts permit a persuasive argument on either side. Arguably, Tenant did not reasonably rely on Handy’s apparent authority because Tenant was told that adding an electrical outlet was an improvement, not a repair, and Handy made repairs. Further, Handy indicated that there was a charge for the electrical work.

However, the alternative argument could also be made. Lessor arranged to have “Lessor’s Repair Line” ring directly to Handy’s office. Tenant knew that Handy was working for Lessor; in fact Handy was present doing work on behalf of Lessor. It is not unreasonable to believe that the same person designated to make repairs would also make improvements. Further, the facts indicate that Tenant believed the payment for the work ($200) was to go to Lessor.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE II.A, IV.E, VI.E

Question 5 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56, should summary judgment be granted to a defendant who supports his motion with evidence negating the plaintiff's claim when the plaintiff's response fails to directly controvert that evidence?
 - (2)(a) Does claim preclusion arising from a prior federal suit against a product's manufacturer bar a subsequent suit against the product's distributor?
 - (2)(b) In this case, may the distributor successfully invoke issue preclusion against the plaintiff?

DISCUSSION

Summary: In the federal court action, defendant Acme's motion for summary judgment was premised on the claim that a proper warning label was attached to its widget at the time the widget was delivered to the distributor. Under the applicable state law, Acme's duty to warn was fully discharged if that fact were true. To support its claim, Acme provided affidavits of witnesses who said the label was present at the relevant time. In the face of this evidence, Plaintiff had a duty to present evidence of "specific facts" showing that there was a genuine issue for trial. Plaintiff's affidavit, which asserted only the absence of a label when she purchased the widget, did not contradict Acme's evidence that a label was present when it delivered the widget to the distributor. Hence, summary judgment was appropriate on that issue.

Nothing that happened in the federal court action should preclude Plaintiff from proceeding with the state court action. Claim preclusion is inappropriate because there is no mutuality of estoppel: the defendant in the state court action was not the same as, or in privity with, the federal defendant and would not have been precluded or otherwise affected by the result in the federal action. Issue preclusion is inappropriate because the only issue actually decided in the federal action (whether a warning label was present when the manufacturer delivered the widget to the distributor) is not an issue in the state action, where the question is whether a warning label was present when the widget was delivered to the retailer.

Point One: Because Plaintiff's response to Acme's motion for summary judgment failed to (30-40%) demonstrate a genuine issue of material fact as to Acme's supported assertion that a warning label was affixed to the product at the time of delivery to the distributor, the court properly granted summary judgment to Acme on the failure to warn claim.

A motion for summary judgment should be granted in favor of a party if "there is no genuine issue as to any material fact" and the party is "entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). A defendant on a claim may move for summary judgment by attacking any necessary element of the plaintiff's case. See Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317 (1986). In determining whether there are any genuine issues of material fact, the court should construe all factual matters in the light most favorable to the non-moving party. However, where the moving party presents evidence of facts that would defeat the non-moving party's claim, the non-moving party "may not rest upon the mere allegations" of her pleading. The non-moving party has a responsibility to offer, "by affidavits or as otherwise provided" in Rule 56, evidence of "specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e).

On the facts of this problem, the court properly granted Acme's motion for summary judgment on the failure to warn claim. The law of State Y (which the federal court is obliged to apply under the Erie doctrine in this diversity case) states that a manufacturer fully discharges its duty to warn if adequate warning labels are affixed to the product at the time of delivery to its distributor. Thus, to win on her failure to warn claim, Plaintiff must prove that no proper warning label was affixed to the widget at the time of delivery to the distributor.

Defendant Acme's summary judgment motion alleged that adequate warning labels were, in fact, affixed to the product at the relevant time, and that allegation was supported by affidavits attesting to the presence of the warning label at the time of delivery to the distributor. This properly supported motion therefore negates a key element of Plaintiff's claim, thereby discharging Acme's duty to support its summary judgment motion under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e).

At this point, the burden shifted to Plaintiff to come forward with controverting evidence. Plaintiff responded to the summary judgment motion with her own affidavit, in which she attested that no warning label had been present on her widget when she purchased it. This does not directly controvert Acme's motion, since it does not contend that the warning label was missing at the point of delivery to the distributor, the critical moment for manufacturer liability under applicable state law. Consequently, Plaintiff failed to meet her burden to produce evidence controverting Acme's version of the facts. See Jack H. Friedenthal, Mary Kay Kane & Arthur R. Miller, CIVIL PROCEDURE 461 (3d ed. 1999).

Thus, Acme has demonstrated that no genuine issue of material fact exists on a key element of Plaintiff's claim, and that it is, therefore, entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c).

Point Two (a): Because Widgets was not a party to the prior action, it probably cannot bar (20-30%) Plaintiff's action against it on claim preclusion grounds.

Note: Even though the current suit is in state court, the effect of the Acme judgment is governed by federal law because the judgment came from a federal court. A state court is required to give to a federal judgment the same preclusive effect that the judgment would have in federal court. See generally Eugene F. Scoles & Peter Hay, CONFLICT OF LAWS § 24.2 (2d ed. 1992). The preclusive effect of a judgment by a federal court sitting in diversity ordinarily would be determined by the preclusion rules of the state in which the federal court sits. Semtek Int'l, Inc. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 531 U.S. 497 (2001).

In order to bar a plaintiff's subsequent lawsuit on claim preclusion grounds, a defendant must show (1) that the prior judgment is final, valid, and on the merits (which is true here), (2) that the present claims are within the scope of the prior judgment, as measured by the same transaction test (also true here), and (3) that there is mutuality of estoppel (i.e., that the defendant urging preclusion is the same as, or in privity with, the defendant in the prior suit). Although the first two elements of claim preclusion are easily satisfied on the facts of the problem, Widgets' claim preclusion argument will probably fail on the final prong: mutuality of estoppel.

Here, there are no facts to suggest that Widgets had such a close relationship with Acme that Widgets would have been bound by the prior judgment had that decision gone against Acme. Widgets apparently did not control or participate in the Acme litigation. Nor are Widgets and Acme in any agency or representative relationship that would warrant treating Acme's actions as binding on Widgets. In short, there is nothing to suggest that Widgets bore such a close relationship to the first suit or to Acme that it would be proper to treat the first action as binding on Widgets. Under the circumstances, the usual rule that a judgment operates only against parties to the first suit seems fully applicable. See Charles A. Wright, Arthur R. Miller & Edward H. Cooper, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 4406.

Where, as here, a plaintiff brings separate suits against alleged joint tortfeasors whose liability is joint and several (and not derivative), the courts traditionally hold that the plaintiff is entitled to maintain separate actions and that a judgment in a case involving one tortfeasor does not preclude the bringing of a claim for the same harm against another tortfeasor. See Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 49, cmt a. See, e.g., Drescher v. Hoffman Motors Corp. 585 F. Supp. 555, 558 (D.C. Conn. 1984); U.S. v. Manning Coal Corp., 977 F.2d 117, 122 (4th Cir. 1992); Levy v. Verser, Inc., 882 F. Supp. 736, 740 (N.D. Ill. 1995). But see Meshulam v. General Motors Corp., 995 F.2d 192, 194 (11th Cir. 1993) (under Florida law, the manufacturer, the wholesale distributor, and the retailer of an allegedly defective product are treated as identical parties for res judicata purposes and an action against a retailer is a bar to a subsequent action against the manufacturer on product liability grounds).

Note: Although the doctrine of mutuality of estoppel has been widely abandoned in relation to issue preclusion, it is still largely operative in the context of claim preclusion. See, e.g., Sidag A.G. v. Smoked Food Products Co., 776 F.2d 1270, 1275 (5th Cir. 1985). The traditional rule requiring mutuality of estoppel for claim preclusion purposes appears to be undergoing some modification in federal courts. Wright, Miller and Cooper report that increasing numbers of federal courts now allow claim preclusion against a party to a prior action by litigants who would not themselves have been bound by the results of the prior case if there are "good reasons why [the new defendant] should have been joined in the first action and the old party cannot show any good reasons to justify a second chance.” Wright, supra, § 4464 (2000 Supp.) In the present case, however, there is no evidence of a good reason why Plaintiff ought to be required to sue both Acme and Widgets at the same time.

Point Two(b): Widgets will not be able to assert issue preclusion against Plaintiff because the (20-30%) issues in Plaintiff’s suit against Widgets are not the same as the issues that were actually litigated in Plaintiff’s prior suit against Acme.

Widgets’ attempt to invoke issue preclusion will also fail. The problem for Widgets is that none of the issues involved in Plaintiff’s suit against it were actually decided in Plaintiff’s suit against Acme. As to the failure to warn issue, although evidence was presented in Acme’s suit on whether the required warning was present at the time Widgets delivered the product to the retailer (in the form of the employee affidavits), the court did not need to use that evidence to decide the summary judgment motion, since the key point there was whether the label was affixed at the point of delivery to the distributor, not the retailer. As to the dangerous defect issue, the settlement in Acme’s case obviated any actual litigation on the point. The settlement also precluded any actual litigation as to the amount of Plaintiff’s damages. It is well settled that a judgment entered pursuant to a settlement cannot serve as the basis for issue preclusion in a later case. See generally Jack H. Friedenthal, Mary Kay Kane & Arthur R. Miller, CIVIL PROCEDURE § 14.11 (3d ed. 1999).

Because issue preclusion essentially exports the factual findings of one case into another, any issue to be precluded must be precisely the same one that was actually litigated, decided, and necessary to the judgment in the prior suit. Here, that is not the case.

TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS I.E, H

Question 6 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Should Trustee distribute $5,000 from the trust income to Susan in payment of her unpaid alimony claim?
 - (2) Should Trustee distribute $10,000 from the trust principal to John in payment of his tort judgment against Beth?
 - (3) Should the court terminate the trust and distribute the trust assets to Adam, Beth, and Charity?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Generally, an income interest subject to a spendthrift clause is not available for payment of claims against the income beneficiary. However, many states, for public policy reasons, do not apply this rule to unpaid alimony claims. In such states, Trustee should pay Susan's $5,000 claim. On the other hand, Trustee cannot pay John's claim from the trust because Beth is not entitled to any principal until the trust terminates and a payment to John would harm both Adam and Charity. Lastly, the court should refuse to terminate the trust because termination would be inconsistent with Decedent's intent as evidenced by the presence of a spendthrift clause in the trust instrument.

Point One: Trustee should distribute $5,000 from trust income to Susan in payment of her (30-40%) unpaid alimony claim notwithstanding that Adam's interest is subject to a spendthrift clause.

The testamentary trust created by Decedent contains language that clearly indicates Decedent's intention to subject Adam's 10-year term interest to a spendthrift restriction. Spendthrift clauses are widely recognized. See generally Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 152(1) and Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 58 (Tent. Draft No. 2). The effect of a spendthrift clause is to bar a creditor from reaching the beneficiary's interest in satisfaction of the creditor's claim.

However, there are exceptions to the general rule for public policy purposes. A well-established exception enables a former spouse with an unpaid alimony judgment to reach a spendthrift trust interest of his or her former spouse. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 157(a); Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 59(a)(Tent. Draft No. 2); Uniform Trust Code § 503(b). This exception recognizes a strong public policy against allowing a trust beneficiary to enjoy a trust interest while neglecting to pay the court-ordered support of the beneficiary's former spouse. Accordingly, Trustee should pay Susan $5,000 to satisfy her unpaid alimony judgment against Adam.

Note: Even though Susan is entitled to receive $5,000 from the trust income, Trustee, as a practical matter, should not make that distribution to her without an authorizing court order. This protects Trustee from any possible liability for having made an inappropriate distribution to Susan. Also, if the jurisdiction does not adhere to the alimony exception, Trustee should distribute nothing from the trust to Susan.

Point Two: Trustee cannot properly pay $10,000 to John from the trust principal in payment (30-40%) of his tort judgment against Beth because Beth's interest is a remainder interest.

The testamentary trust created by Decedent contains no language evidencing Decedent's intent to subject Beth's remainder interest to a spendthrift restriction. Absent such a restriction, Beth's interest would generally be alienable and reachable by her creditors. See generally Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§ 132 & 157 and Restatement (Third) of Trusts §§ 51 & 57 (Tent. Draft No. 2).

However, because Beth is a remainder beneficiary and not an income beneficiary, she has no immediate right to the possession and enjoyment of any trust property. Rather, she must await the termination of the trust to receive any trust property. John, as her creditor, can have no greater rights in the trust property than she had. As her creditor he simply steps into her shoes. Thus, he cannot obtain possession of her share any earlier than she could have obtained possession of it. Payment of trust principal to him at this time, therefore, would be premature.

Furthermore, if Trustee gave John any trust principal at this time, the rights of both Adam and Charity would be adversely affected since the income to which they are and will be entitled is generated from the principal. Any payment to John, therefore, would reduce the future income flow from the trust.

Accordingly, Trustee should not pay John's $10,000 claim from the trust principal.

Point Three: The court should refuse to terminate the trust and should not distribute the (30-40%) trust assets to the beneficiaries.

It is a well-established rule that a testamentary trust can be terminated by a court upon the request and consent of all trust beneficiaries unless a material purpose remains to be accomplished. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 337. The bar against termination when a material purpose remains is referred to as the Claflin doctrine and is based on the seminal nineteenth-century case, Claflin v. Claflin, 20 N.E. 454 (Mass. 1889). The Claflin doctrine assures that a trust will not be terminated when termination would be inconsistent with the grantor's intent.

Accordingly, the question is whether there is a material purpose of the trust that would be defeated if the trust were to terminate. The traditional view is that a material purpose remains if any trust interest is subject to a spendthrift restriction that bars alienation of the spendthrift interest. Termination is inappropriate because, if trust assets are distributed to a beneficiary of a spendthrift interest, the beneficiary could later alienate the property. Under this view, the court should refuse to terminate the trust and should not order Trustee to distribute the trust assets to the beneficiaries.

Even under the third Restatement, the court should refuse to terminate the trust. This Restatement rejects the per se prohibition on trust termination where there is a spendthrift clause. It requires a finding that the trust grantor really intended the spendthrift provision to bar premature trust termination. Under this test, a spendthrift clause inserted in a trust as mere boilerplate might not bar a requested termination when all trust beneficiaries consent to the termination. Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 65, comment e (Tent. Draft No. 3). See also Uniform Trust Code § 411(c) (spendthrift clause is not presumed to constitute a material purpose of the trust). Here, however, the facts clearly indicate that Decedent would not have wanted Adam to prematurely reach his interest due to Decedent's unhappiness with Adam's lavish spending, and therefore the court should not terminate the trust.

CORPORATIONS III, V.C.2, VIII

Question 7 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Can a judgment creditor “pierce the corporate veil” of a wholly owned subsidiary corporation to recover the creditor’s judgment from the parent corporation shareholder?
 - (2) Assuming that a judgment creditor can pierce the corporate veil of a wholly owned subsidiary corporation, can it further pierce the parent corporation’s corporate veil to recover its judgment from the parent corporation’s shareholders?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Stuart’s estate will probably be able to pierce the corporate veil to hold Corn Corp liable for the estate’s judgment against GCI. Whether a court will pierce the corporate veil depends heavily on the facts of a particular case, and here the facts support holding Corn Corp liable. In the first place, the usual facts supporting veil- piercing are present here: the business records of Corn Corp and GCI were completely intermingled, GCI did not observe the formalities of a separate corporate existence, GCI was inadequately capitalized, and GCI’s business (selling Super Corn Plus) was held out to the public as a mere extension of Corn Corp’s business. In addition, the activities that led to the judgment against GCI were the result of decisions made and directed by an officer of Corn Corp at a time when Super Corn Plus was still a Corn Corp product.

It is less likely that a court would pierce the corporate veil of Corn Corp in order to hold its shareholders liable to pay Stuart’s estate’s claim. There is nothing to suggest that the shareholders used Corn Corp as a “mere instrumentality” or their “alter ego.” They respected corporate formalities, and Corn Corp appears to have been adequately capitalized.

Point One:
(50-60%) Stuart’s estate will likely be able to pierce GCI’s corporate veil and recover its judgment from Corn Corp, the “parent” corporation, because GCI failed to maintain a formal separate existence as evidenced by its inadequate capitalization and failed to maintain corporate formalities, and because justice requires piercing to prevent Corn Corp from insulating itself from its wrongdoing.

Shareholders generally are not liable for the corporation’s debts. See Revised Model Business Corporation Act § 6.22. A court, however, will “pierce the corporate veil” when circumstances indicate that the privilege has been misused or when necessary to do justice. See Pepper v.

Litton, 308 U.S. 295, 310 (1939). The decision to pierce the corporate veil will be based on a determination of the facts.

While a parent corporation is expected to exert some measure of control over a subsidiary corporation, the subsidiary corporation is expected to be separate, at least in form. When a parent corporation so dominates a subsidiary corporation that the subsidiary has no real separate existence, and justice so requires, a court will disregard the corporate form and hold the parent corporation personally liable for the subsidiary's debts.

One basis for piercing the corporate veil is fraud or illegitimate purpose. In the absence of fraud or illegitimate purpose, a court may still pierce the corporate veil when justice so requires if (a) the parent and subsidiary intermingle their respective business transactions, accounts, and records; (b) the subsidiary fails to observe the formalities of separate corporate procedures; (c) the subsidiary is not adequately financed in light of its foreseeable normal obligations; or (d) the parent and subsidiary do not hold themselves out to the public as separate enterprises. See Harry Henn & John R. Alexander, LAWS OF CORPORATIONS § 148 (1983).

Based on the facts, GCI is a wholly owned subsidiary of Corn Corp. Corn Corp had a legitimate purpose for organizing GCI. Creating a separate entity for marketing reasons (because some food processors might not have wanted genetically engineered corn) is an acceptable business reason. Despite this legitimate purpose, a court might still pierce the corporate veil because GCI did not formally maintain a separate existence from Corn Corp (internally or externally). GCI did not formally maintain corporate formalities and was not initially adequately capitalized.

Corn Corp and GCI intermingled their assets and business transactions. GCI operated out of the offices of Corn Corp and had exactly the same directors and officers. GCI did not keep separate records of its business transactions. Additionally, while the two corporations each had separate bank accounts, the fact that GCI received "informal" loans from Corn Corp is further evidence of the blurred boundaries between the parent and subsidiary.

GCI did not observe corporate formalities. It did not keep separate minute books. Additionally, Corn Corp did not adequately finance GCI in light of its foreseeable normal obligations. Corn Corp funded GCI with only the patent, which was new and of speculative value, and $6,000, which was only enough to produce the seed for the first crop. The inadequate initial capitalization was further evidenced by GCI's need for "emergency loans" from Corn Corp to meet day-to-day cash flow needs.

Finally, Corn Corp and GCI marketed products with very similar names (Super Corn and Super Corn Plus). These similar product names could be reasonably interpreted by the public to be from the same entity. The decline in sales experienced by Corn Corp after Stuart's death seems to indicate that the public viewed Corn Corp as the same entity as GCI. Further, as discussed above, both Corn Corp and GCI operated from the same location, which could lead the public to conclude that the businesses were not distinct.

Justice requires piercing because Super Corn Plus was developed by Corn Corp, and an officer and director of Corn Corp negligently rushed it to market without the proper testing. Corn Corp should not now be able to use a wholly owned subsidiary that did not maintain a separate existence to insulate itself from liability.

Point Two: The facts do not support piercing Corn Corp's corporate veil to hold Alan, Bruce, (40-50%) and Kathy, as shareholders, liable for Stuart's estate's judgment. Kathy, however, might be liable for her negligent acts.

While the facts support piercing the corporate veil to hold Corn Corp liable for the judgment against GCI, this will not help Stuart's estate because the facts indicate that Corn Corp cannot pay its bills (so it will be unable to pay the judgment). Therefore, Stuart's estate would like to recover the judgment against GCI from the shareholders of Corn Corp (Alan, Bruce, and Kathy). However, the facts do not support a claim to recover from Alan, Bruce, or Kathy in their capacity as shareholders of Corn Corp.

Shareholders generally are not liable for the corporation's debts. See RMBCA § 6.22. Courts generally respect the corporate form and shield shareholders from liability unless the shareholders use the corporation as a "mere instrumentality" or "alter ego" to carry out an improper or illegal purpose (e.g., to perpetrate fraud, to evade the law, to escape obligations). "[W]here corporate formalities are substantially observed, initial financing reasonably adequate, and the corporation not formed to evade an existing obligation or a statute or to cheat or to defraud, even a controlling shareholder enjoys limited liability." See Henn and Alexander, LAWS OF CORPORATIONS § 146 (3d ed. 1983).

There are no facts to support a conclusion of an illegal or improper purpose when Corn Corp was incorporated. There is also no suggestion that Corn Corp was inadequately capitalized when it was incorporated. Corn Corp had $500,000 of initial capitalization and had been profitable for 20 years. The fact that Corn Corp cannot currently pay its bills is irrelevant to this determination.

Further, there is no evidence that the shareholders did not respect the corporate formalities. For example, Kathy scrupulously kept Corn Corp's minute books. Nor is there any evidence that Alan, Bruce, or Kathy ignored the "separateness" of Corn Corp. In summary, there are no facts to indicate that any of the shareholders of Corn Corp treated Corn Corp as their "alter ego" or a "mere instrumentality," and the interests of justice do not require piercing the corporate veil in this case.

Although the facts do not support a holding that Kathy is liable in her capacity as a shareholder of Corn Corp, Stuart's estate could bring a separate action against Kathy for her negligent acts as the head of Corn Corp's product development.

Questions

Question 1

Corp owns 95% of the outstanding stock of Sub. Pat and Dale own the remaining 5% of Sub stock, and they are also two of the three directors of Sub. Both Corp and Sub are properly incorporated and have only one class of stock outstanding. Corp's board of directors is composed of five directors; none of them is Pat or Dale.

Corp's board of directors voted unanimously, for valid business reasons, to merge Sub into Corp and to adopt a plan for a cash-out merger. Pursuant to the plan of merger, each Sub shareholder would receive $20 per share, which is $4 per share above the current book value. No changes to Corp's articles of incorporation are required as a result of this merger, and Corp shareholders will not experience a change in their shareholder rights. Corp did not submit the plan of merger to its shareholders for a vote.

At a regularly scheduled meeting of Sub's board of directors, Corp announced its intent to merge with Sub. Sub's board voted against the merger by a 2 to 1 vote, with Pat and Dale voting against it. Corp decided to proceed with the merger in spite of the vote against it by Sub's board and subsequently filed articles of merger with the Secretary of State. Shortly thereafter, Pat and Dale each received a check for $20 per share, a copy of the plan of merger, and a notice including all other statutorily required information.

Pat and Dale sued to unwind the merger. They claim the merger was improper because (a) Sub's board of directors did not approve the merger, (b) Corp's shareholders did not vote on the merger, and (c) Sub's shareholders did not vote on the merger.

Further, Pat and Dale claim that, even if the merger stands, they are entitled to receive more than the $20 per share paid by Corp. They claim the true value of their shares is $25 per share. Pat and Dale base this valuation on their knowledge of the financial condition of Sub, which they acquired while serving as directors of Sub, and the advice they received from an independent financial advisor. The independent financial advisor is willing to testify that the value of Sub is between $21 and $26 per share.

1. Should the court unwind the merger for any of the reasons asserted by Pat and Dale? Explain.
2. Assuming that the merger is allowed to stand, do Pat and Dale have any legal basis for asserting the right to receive more than the $20 per share offered by Corp? Explain.

Question 2

In 1988, Testator duly executed a will devising Blackacre to Adam, $100,000 to Carrie, and the residue of her estate to Doris. However, in 1992, Testator telephoned her lawyer, Lawyer, who had possession of the 1988 will, and asked her to destroy it because Testator had changed her mind. Lawyer agreed. Immediately after hanging up the phone, Lawyer found the will, shredded it, and threw it away.

In 1996, Testator signed and dated a wholly handwritten document that stated: "I devise Blackacre to Earl and $2,500,000 to my good friend, Fred."

Testator died in 2002, a domiciliary of State A. She was survived by Greg, age 30, who was her child and only heir. Adam, Carrie, Doris, Earl, and Fred also survived Testator. There was no surviving spouse. Testator's net probate estate (after taxes, debts, and expenses) consisted of $5,000,000 plus Blackacre.

The 1996 document, together with an unexecuted copy of the 1988 will, the original of which Lawyer had shredded, were found among Testator's valuable papers. Both documents were offered for probate.

Under State A law, holographic wills are valid.

1. Which documents, if any, govern the distribution of Testator's estate? Explain.
2. What are the respective shares, if any, in Testator's estate of each of the following: Adam, Carrie, Doris, Earl, Fred, and Greg? Explain.

Question 3

Garden Shop borrowed $10,000 from Finance Co. to finance its current operations. The parties agreed that Garden Shop would repay the loan in 90 days by making a single payment of $10,450. The additional $450 represented interest at a lawful rate.

Finance Co. issued a $10,000 check to Garden Shop. In exchange, Garden Shop delivered to Finance Co. a signed and dated promissory note stating: "In 90 days, Garden Shop promises to pay to the order of Finance Co. $10,000.00 (Ten thousand four hundred fifty and 00/100 dollars)." Neither party noticed the inconsistency between the numerically expressed amount as "$10,000.00" and the written "Ten thousand four hundred fifty and 00/100 dollars."

On the 90th day, Finance Co. demanded payment from Garden Shop but could not produce the note, which, despite a diligent search, Finance Co. could not find. Finance Co. could not remember whether it had indorsed the note.

1. If Finance Co. later finds the note, can Finance Co. enforce it and, if so, in what amount? Explain.
2. If Finance Co. does not produce the note and Garden Shop nonetheless pays Finance Co., would Garden Shop's obligation on the note be discharged as against all persons? Explain.
3. If Garden Shop refuses to pay because Finance Co. cannot produce the note, what must Finance Co. prove and what conditions must it satisfy in order to obtain a judgment against Garden Shop? Explain.

Question 4

Farmer brought a class action lawsuit in federal district court in State A, alleging that the defendant, Truckco, marketed a line of pickup trucks with defective shock absorbers. Farmer's complaint identified the members of the class as 100,000 individuals nationwide who had bought the trucks from 1995-2000 and suffered losses as a result of the defective shock absorbers. The alleged losses ranged from the $250 cost of replacing the shock absorbers to serious personal injuries suffered in accidents alleged to have been caused by the defective shock absorbers. The only claim personal to Farmer was the $250 replacement cost claim. Farmer properly asserted that federal jurisdiction was based on a breach of warranty claim under a recently enacted federal automobile safety statute.

Farmer moved to certify the class. Opposing this motion, Truckco submitted court papers from lawsuits brought by individual owners who claimed to have suffered a wide variety of personal injuries as a result of accidents said to have resulted from the failure of the defective shock absorbers during the years in question. Truckco also noted that Farmer had previously filed (and still has pending) a class action against Truckco in a state court in State Z. In the State Z case, which was premised on state-law warranty claims, Farmer sought relief similar to the relief sought in the federal action and asked to represent the same class of plaintiffs. Finally, Truckco pointed out that Farmer's lawyer in both actions was a recent bar admittee who had not previously handled class action litigation.

In addition to arguing against certification of the class, Truckco asked the federal district court to abstain from adjudicating the class action in light of the pendency of the state court class action.

The federal district court first denied Truckco's motion for abstention. The court then denied Farmer's motion for class certification, finding that class certification was "inappropriate under the circumstances."

1. Was the court's ruling on Truckco's motion for abstention correct? Explain.
2. Was the court's ruling on Farmer's motion for class certification appropriate? Explain.

Question 5

Adam, Barbara, and Carl are partners in a beverage distribution business. They have no written partnership agreement. The partnership distributes alcoholic and nonalcoholic beverages to bars and restaurants throughout State A. Jane owns one of these bars. She also owns a number of pinball and video game machines, which are located in many of the same bars and restaurants served by the partnership. In past dealings with the partnership, Jane has dealt exclusively with Carl.

A number of beverage distribution businesses have expanded into the pinball and video game machine business. To capitalize on this trend, Jane decided to sell her pinball and video game machines. At about the same time, Adam, Barbara, and Carl decided that their partnership should consider expanding into the pinball and video game machine business. The partners agreed that Carl would approach Jane to obtain information about the number of machines she had for sale, their locations and condition, and the associated revenues and expenses. However, because the opportunity represented a new line of business, Adam and Barbara instructed Carl not to finalize a deal with Jane without first discussing the terms with them.

When Carl met with Jane, she said that she owned 127 machines located in 72 bars and restaurants. After they visited 50 bars and saw 98 machines, Carl decided he had seen enough. Carl told Jane he would go back to the office to “run some numbers” and would call her soon.

Based on Jane’s representations and his observations of 98 machines, Carl decided to offer $225,000 for all of Jane’s 127 machines. Jane accepted the offer and signed the contract Carl had drafted. Carl signed the contract on behalf of the partnership. At no time, however, did Carl consult with Adam or Barbara before finalizing the deal. Adam and Barbara later discovered that the revenue generated by the machines was insufficient to justify the contract price.

1. Is the partnership bound by the contract that Carl signed? Explain.
2. Can the partnership recover from Carl any loss on the contract with Jane? Explain.

Question 6

NOTE: Applicants answering this question in a community property state should use community property principles. For this purpose, the phrase “marital property” means community property.

On July 1, 1990, Ann and Burt got married in State X, where they have lived all their lives.

At the time of their marriage, Ann and Burt were each 22 years old. Burt had graduated from high school and had been working for one year as a data entry technician, earning $30,000 annually. Ann had graduated from high school and had worked since graduation as a grocery store cashier, earning $27,000 annually. Ann had a trust fund that she acquired when she was 18 years old. The trust fund was worth $200,000, and Burt knew all about it. Neither had any other property or debts. Ann knew that Burt planned to become a lawyer, and Burt knew that Ann intended to be a homemaker.

Three months prior to the marriage, Burt told Ann that he would not marry her unless they signed a premarital agreement. Ann was surprised because Burt had never told her this was a precondition to their marriage. She reluctantly agreed, and they immediately went to the office of Burt's lawyer, Lawyer. Lawyer showed Ann and Burt a draft agreement under which both Ann and Burt would waive all rights to separate and marital property titled solely in the other's name if they divorced. They would also waive any right to claim child support if they divorced.

Lawyer told Ann that by signing the agreement she would be waiving her rights to marital property and child support. Lawyer also told Ann that he represented only Burt, and not her, and that she should retain her own lawyer. Ann decided not to retain her own lawyer because she trusted Burt. Ann read the agreement the next day and expressed no reservations about signing it. Ann and Burt then both signed the agreement.

After the marriage, Burt became a very successful lawyer. Ann became a homemaker and had no out-of-home employment. The value of the property acquired from Burt's earnings during the marriage is $900,000. The value of Ann's trust fund, managed at all times by her father, is now over $800,000. Ann and Burt have two children, currently ages seven and ten.

Ann now sues Burt for divorce in State X. Ann and Burt agree that Ann will have custody of the children. However, the parties cannot agree on the division of property.

Ann seeks property division and child support under the marital dissolution statute. Burt argues that (a) the court should enforce the premarital agreement, and (b) if the court invalidates the premarital agreement, that Ann's trust fund is marital property subject to distribution.

Ann concedes that the premarital agreement was and is substantively fair. Nonetheless, she argues that it is unenforceable (a) because she lacked legal counsel, and (b) because it addresses property distribution and child support upon divorce. She also argues that (c) regardless of the premarital agreement's validity, her trust fund is not subject to division.

1. How should the court rule on Ann's and Burt's arguments regarding the premarital agreement? Explain.
2. How should the court rule on Ann's and Burt's arguments regarding the trust fund? Explain.

Question 7

Debtor, the sole proprietor of a small restaurant, borrowed $20,000 from Bank. The loan was used to purchase kitchen equipment for Debtor's business, including a stove unit, a large refrigerator, two freezers, and a commercial microwave oven. Debtor signed a promissory note and a security agreement granting Bank a security interest in the items purchased. The security agreement contained clauses (1) waiving Debtor's right of redemption should default occur, and (2) providing that, if Debtor failed to make any regular installment payment, "the entire unpaid obligation due from Debtor to Bank shall, without further notice, immediately become due and payable." Bank properly perfected its security interest in the collateral.

Debtor missed four monthly installment payments. When Debtor was approximately $1,600 in arrears, Bank's representative drove a large truck to the alley behind the restaurant. Bank's representative was accompanied by two movers. The time was 11:10 p.m., shortly after the restaurant's closing time. Bank's representative pounded loudly on the locked back door, which was opened by one of the restaurant's employees. "We're here to repossess the kitchen equipment," stated Bank's representative. "Well, my boss isn't here, and I don't think I should let you in," replied the employee. Without further discussion, Bank's representative and the two movers walked right past the employee and began moving the kitchen equipment out to the truck. At first, the employee objected loudly, but soon he shrugged and watched quietly as they removed the equipment.

The next day, Debtor went to Bank and offered to pay the $1,600 arrearage in monthly payments. Bank refused the tender, reminding Debtor the entire balance was now due. When Debtor then offered to pay the entire balance due including Bank's repossession expenses, Bank told Debtor that it would not allow him to redeem because he had waived his right of redemption. Thereafter, Bank sent Debtor a notice of public sale and then duly held the sale, the terms of which were commercially reasonable. Bank now has threatened to sue Debtor for a deficiency judgment of $4,000, the difference between Debtor's unpaid loan obligation and what Bank recovered in the sale.

Debtor has had to close the restaurant because the kitchen equipment was repossessed.

What are Debtor's rights, remedies, and liabilities under the Uniform Commercial Code? Explain.

Question 1 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) In a parent-subsidary merger, does the board of directors of the subsidiary corporation have to approve the merger?
 - (1)(b) In a parent-subsidary merger, do the shareholders of the parent corporation have to approve the merger?
 - (1)(c) In a parent-subsidary merger, do the shareholders of the subsidiary corporation have to approve the merger?
 - (2) In a parent-subsidary merger, if the subsidiary's minority shareholders believe that the parent corporation is paying less than fair value, can they force the parent corporation to pay more money?

DISCUSSION

Summary: None of the objections presented by Pat and Dale will suffice for unwinding this merger. Corp's ownership of 95 percent of Sub's shares gives it the power to merge Sub into itself without securing the approval of Sub's board of directors and without holding any vote of Corp's or Sub's shareholders. However, Pat and Dale are entitled to receive the fair value of their shares, provided they properly invoke their appraisal rights.

Point One(a): The approval of Sub's board of directors is not required for this parent-subsidary merger.

A merger between two corporations is normally effectuated by adoption of a plan of merger by the board of directors of both corporations. Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA) § 11.04(a) (1999 Rev.). However, when a parent owns at least 90 percent of the outstanding shares of each class of stock of a subsidiary, the parent may merge the subsidiary into itself without the approval of the subsidiary's board of directors. See RMBCA § 11.05 (1999 Rev.). The rationale for this rule is that the parent owns sufficient shares of the subsidiary to remove any members of the board of directors voting against the merger and replace them with members who would vote in favor of the transaction.

The facts of this problem present such a parent-subsidary situation. Because Corp owns 95 percent of Sub, approval of the merger by the Sub board of directors is not necessary. Thus, Corp could proceed with the merger despite the Sub board's negative vote on the plan of merger, and the negative vote provides no basis for unwinding the merger.

Note: Some state's parent-subsidary merger statutes require that the parent corporation own at least 95 percent (e.g., Arkansas), while other states require only 80 percent (e.g., Alabama).

Point One(b): Approval by the shareholders of Corp is not required for this parent-subsidary (20-30%) merger.

A plan of merger usually must be submitted to shareholders for their approval. See RMBCA § 11.04 (1999 Rev.). However, RMBCA § 11.04(g) provides that approval by shareholders of the surviving corporation is not required when the merger will not result in a fundamental change in the corporation or the ownership rights of its shareholders. In particular, no shareholder approval is required if

(1) the corporation will survive the merger . . . ; (2) . . . its articles of incorporation will not be changed; (3) each shareholder of the corporation whose shares were outstanding immediately before the effective date of the merger . . . will hold the same number of shares, with identical preferences, limitations, and relative rights, immediately after the effective date of change; and (4) the issuance in the merger . . . of shares or other securities . . . does not require a vote under § 6.21(f).

RMBCA § 11.04(g)(1999 Rev.).

The facts presented satisfy the requirements for this exception insofar as Corp's shareholders are concerned. First, Corp will survive the merger because Sub is being merged into it. Second, Corp's articles of incorporation will not change as a result of the merger. Finally, no vote to issue shares is required because this is a cash-out merger (the Sub shareholders are receiving cash, not securities). The cash-out nature of the merger also means that no Corp shareholder will experience a change in the number of shares owned or the rights and preferences of those shares. Therefore, the fact that the Corp shareholders did not vote does not constitute a basis to unwind the merger.

Note: Prior to the RMBCA 1999 revision, approval by Corp's shareholders would not have been required simply because this was a short-form merger (parent's subsidiary). See old RMBCA § 11.04. Under the revised act, the analysis is more elaborate but the result is the same.

Point One(c): The shareholders of Sub are also not required to approve this parent- subsidiary (20-30%) merger.

As noted above, shareholder approval of a plan of merger is generally required. See RMBCA § 11.04(b)(1999 Rev.). However, parent-subsidary mergers are an exception to this rule when the parent owns at least 90 percent of the outstanding shares of each class of the subsidiary. See RMBCA § 11.05 (1999 Rev.). Shareholder approval is not required in these circumstances because the parent corporation owns a sufficient number of shares to ensure that the plan of the merger will be adopted. In our problem, because Corp owns 95 percent of Sub, it would easily prevail in any shareholder vote and, accordingly, the law does not require a vote by the shareholders of Sub for the merger to proceed. Therefore, the failure of the Sub shareholders to approve the transaction does not constitute a basis to unwind the merger.

Point Two: Pat and Dale are entitled to exercise appraisal rights and seek the “fair value” of (30-40%) their shares.

Appraisal rights (also referred to as dissenter’s rights) allow shareholders to force the corporation to pay fair value for their shares in the event of certain fundamental changes, including a parent-subsidiary merger for which shareholder approval is unnecessary. See RMBCA § 13.02 (a)(1)(ii) (1999 Rev.). Thus, Pat and Dale, as minority shareholders of Sub, are entitled to exercise appraisal rights in connection with this merger. As Pat and Dale believe that each share is worth $5 more than Corp paid them in the merger, they will exercise their appraisal rights. Assuming that they follow the procedure established by the applicable statute (including notifying the corporation of their assertion of appraisal rights and demanding payment), they will be entitled to receive the fair value of their shares.

If Corp and Pat and Dale cannot agree on fair value, a court will decide the matter. In the court proceeding, Pat and Dale would offer the testimony of the independent financial advisor, stating the fair value of Sub shares to be between $21 and $26 per share, to support their contention. They might not get $25 per share, but based on this independent evaluation, they would probably get more than $20 per share.

Question 2 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Was the 1988 will that was destroyed by Testator's lawyer outside of Testator's presence legally revoked by physical destruction?
 - (2) Is Testator's 1996 handwritten will entitled to be probated, and if so, as a subsequent testamentary instrument, did it revoke Testator's 1988 will?
 - (3) Is Greg entitled to any share of the estate as a "pretermitted heir"?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Blackacre is distributable to Earl under the terms of the valid holographic will and the balance of the estate is distributed as follows: $100,000 to Carrie under the 1988 will, $2,500,000 to Fred under the 1996 will, and the residue to Doris under the 1988 will. Adam and Greg take nothing. This distribution results from the fact that the 1988 will was not wholly revoked by destruction but only partially revoked by the inconsistent provisions of the codicil. Furthermore, Greg is not entitled to a forced share because he was alive when the wills were signed.

Point One: (25-30%) The 1988 will was not revoked because it was physically destroyed by someone other than the testator and not in the testator's presence.

Most states require that a revocatory act (such as physical destruction of a will) by someone other than the testator be done in the testator's presence, or at least in the testator's "conscious presence," and at the testator's request. See, e.g., Uniform Probate Code (UPC) § 2-507. Therefore, in most states, the 1988 will would not have been legally revoked. Testator asked Lawyer to destroy the will, but the destruction did not occur in Testator's presence.

Although the 1988 will was physically destroyed, it was not revoked and the unexecuted copy is available to prove its content.

Point Two: (35-45%) Because holographic wills are valid in State A, the 1996 will can be probated. The 1988 will was revoked by the 1996 holographic will only to the extent that it was inconsistent with the later holographic will.

The 1996 document is a holographic will because it is entirely in Testator's handwriting; under the laws of State A holographic wills are valid and therefore the 1996 will is entitled to be probated. The fact that the 1996 will is entitled to be probated, however, does not preclude the possibility that the 1988 will can also be probated so long as it was not revoked. Wills may be revoked either by physical destruction, accompanied by an intent to revoke, or by the execution of a subsequent will. Typically, if a will has been executed and then another will is executed, the latter will revokes the former will only to the extent that they are inconsistent, unless, of course, the latter will has an express revocation clause. See generally UPC § 2-507(a)(1). Here, the 1996 will did not have an express revocation clause. Because it did not have a residuary clause (it contained only a specific bequest and a general bequest), its terms are not wholly inconsistent with the terms of the 1988 will. In fact, the only inconsistency between them is the disposition of Blackacre. Under the 1988 will, Blackacre was bequeathed to Adam; under the 1996 will, it was bequeathed to Earl. Since the later will trumps the earlier will, Blackacre is distributable to Earl.

Assuming that both documents can be probated for the reasons stated, the probate estate should be distributed as follows: Blackacre to Earl, $100,000 to Carrie, and $2,500,000 to Fred; Doris, the residuary legatee under the 1988 will, takes the remaining $2,400,000. Adam takes nothing.

Point Three: Greg, Testator's child and only heir, is not entitled to any share of Testator's (20-25%) estate because he is not a pretermitted heir.

In most jurisdictions, pretermitted heir statutes have been enacted permitting children of a testator under certain circumstances to claim a share of the estate even though they were omitted from the deceased testator's will. Typically, these statutes apply only if the child was born or adopted after the execution of the will. See generally UPC § 2-302. Here, Greg was alive when both the 1988 will and the 1996 will were executed. Thus, Greg would not be entitled to a "forced share" under the typical pretermitted heir statute. However, if the statute protects children born before the will was executed who were not expressly disinherited, then Greg would take the entire estate.

COMMERCIAL PAPER II.B, II.C, II.F, IV.A, IV.G

Question 3 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) When a negotiable instrument contains contradictory terms, is it enforceable and, if so, which terms prevail?
 - (2) When does payment discharge a negotiable instrument?
 - (3) What does one who loses a negotiable instrument have to show and do in order to enforce the note?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Finance Co. can enforce the note for $10,450. The rule is that words prevail over numbers. If Garden Shop paid the missing note, whether the payment discharged its obligation would depend on whether Finance Co. had already indorsed or negotiated the note. In either of those cases, it is possible that a “holder in due course” could later appear and enforce the note against Garden Shop. To avoid this contingency, a court would require Finance Co. to prove that it had lost the note and provide adequate security to Garden Shop against double liability before the court would order Garden Shop to pay.

Point One: The enforceability of the note is not affected by the inconsistency in its terms.
(15-25%) The amount of the note is $10,450 because words prevail over numbers.

If Finance Co. can find the note, it can enforce it in the amount of $10,450. Despite the inconsistency as to the amount payable between the numbers and the words of the note, the note is still negotiable. The note contains an unconditional promise to pay a fixed amount of money to the order of a specific party at a definite time, with no other promises stated by the maker other than to pay. Uniform Commercial Code § 3-104(a). As payee, Finance Co. qualifies as a person entitled to enforce the instrument under § 3-301. Garden Shop’s obligation as the issuer of the note under § 3-412 would be to pay the note according to its terms to a person entitled to enforce the instrument.

Section 3-114 covers the situation where there are contradictory terms within an instrument. Under § 3-104(b), this promissory note qualifies as an “instrument” because it is a negotiable instrument. The rule under § 3-114 is that in a case of contradiction such as this one, words prevail over numbers. Therefore, this note is enforceable for $10,450 rather than for $10,000.

Note: The note will be overdue if Finance Co. finds it and presents it at a later time (i.e. after the due date) but this fact will not affect Finance Co.’s right to enforce the note. Finance Co. might not be able, however, to collect any interest that accrues after the due date. With respect to possible third party holders, any holder that took the note after the due date (and therefore with notice that it was overdue) could not be a holder in due course. But a holder who took the note before the due date could be a holder in due course and could enforce the note even after it became overdue. Therefore, the fact that the note becomes overdue will not affect this part of the analysis or either of the other two basic points.

Point Two: Because Finance Co. cannot produce the note, if Garden Shop pays Finance Co., (35-45%) it would discharge its obligation to pay against all persons as long as Finance Co. has not negotiated or indorsed the note.

If Garden Shop pays Finance Co. despite the loss of the note, Garden Shop's obligation on the note is discharged as against all persons unless Finance Co. had voluntarily transferred the note or had indorsed the note in blank prior to losing it. Section 3-602(a) says that a party obligated to pay the instrument is discharged on the instrument when it makes payment to a person entitled to enforce the instrument. Section 3-601(b), however, states that discharge of a party is not effective against a person acquiring the rights of a holder in due course of the instrument who has no notice of the discharge. However, if Finance Co. did indeed lose the note and had not indorsed the note in blank prior to losing it, then no other party could become a holder, much less a holder in due course. See UCC § 3-201(b) and § 3-301, discussed in Point One above, and Official Comment to § 3-309. On the other hand, if Finance Co. had voluntarily transferred the instrument rather than losing it, then payment to Finance Co. does not discharge Garden Shop because Finance Co. would not be a person entitled to enforce the instrument. See UCC § 3-309(a).

Alternatively, if Finance Co. indorsed the note in blank prior to losing it, the note would now be bearer paper. Thus, a third party in possession of the note would be a holder. See UCC § 3-201(a) (negotiation may occur even by means of an involuntary transfer) and Official Comment 1 to § 3-201 ("For example, if an instrument is payable to bearer and it is stolen by Thief or is found by Finder, Thief or Finder becomes the holder of the instrument when possession is obtained.") If that third party then negotiated the note for value to a good-faith purchaser who had no notice of any defense or discharge, that purchaser would be a holder in due course under § 3-302(a)(2) and would not be subject to Garden Shop's discharge defense under § 3-601(b).

Point Three: Finance Co. must prove that it lost the note and must provide adequate protection (35-45%) against double liability before a court can enter judgment against Garden Shop.

If Finance Co. sues on the note without producing it, it can obtain a judgment against Garden Shop only if it meets the conditions set out in UCC § 3-309. First, Finance Co. must qualify under § 3-309(a) as a person entitled to enforce the instrument even though it is not in possession of the instrument. In order to do this, Finance Co. must show that (1) it was in possession of the instrument and entitled to enforce it at the time of its loss, (2) the loss was not the result of a transfer by Finance Co. or a lawful seizure, and (3) the instrument's whereabouts cannot be determined.

Second, Finance Co. must prove the terms of the instrument.

Third, Finance Co. must provide adequate protection to Garden Shop against loss that might occur to Garden Shop by reason of a claim by another person to enforce the instrument. The court must decide what protection to require. A surety bond is a common source of protection. If Finance Co. can convince the court that it lost the note and never indorsed it, then the need to provide protection is diminished because, without an indorsement by Finance Co., no later party could be a holder of the note. Thus, Garden Shop would not face a credible risk of being forced to pay the note again. See Point Two above and Official Comment to UCC § 3-309 (“On the other hand if the instrument was payable to the person who lost the instrument and that person did not indorse the instrument, no other person could be a holder of the instrument. In some cases there is risk of loss only if there is doubt about whether the facts alleged by the person who lost the instrument are true.”)

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE IV.B, IV.C, VI.F

Question 4 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Does the pendency of a parallel state court proceeding in State Z require the federal district court to abstain from adjudicating the class action?
 - (2) Is class certification appropriate in this case under the guidelines set forth in Fed. R. Civ. P. 23?

DISCUSSION

Summary: The court's refusal to abstain was correct. The court is not required to abstain merely because the federal litigation is duplicative of state litigation. The facts do not present any other basis for abstention.

The district court properly denied class certification because Farmer's breach-of-warranty claim is not typical of the claims of those class members who have suffered personal injuries. In addition, Farmer is not an adequate representative of the class because his interests differ significantly from the interests of the personal injury claimants and Farmer's attorney is inexperienced with this kind of litigation.

Point One: Although duplicative federal and state court litigation is wasteful, no federal rule (30-40%) requires abstention simply on the basis of duplication. The court's denial of abstention was correct because no existing federal abstention rule would support abstention in this case.

In general, parties may proceed to judgment in a federal district court action without regard to the pendency of state proceedings that seek similar relief. See Kline v. Burke Construction Co., 260 U.S. 226 (1922). Indeed, a federal district court has a "duty . . . to adjudicate a controversy properly before it," and it may abstain "only in the exceptional circumstances where the order to the parties to repair to the State court would clearly serve an important countervailing interest." Colorado River Water Conservation District v. United States, 424 U.S. 800, 813 (1976).

The facts of this problem do not support abstention under any established abstention rule. Pullman abstention, see Railroad Comm'n of Texas v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496 (1941), operates only when the state court's resolution of unsettled state law issues may obviate the necessity of resolving a difficult federal law issue. Burford abstention is appropriate only if federal adjudication would interfere with the state's administration of a complex regulatory scheme, Burford v. Sun Oil Co., 319 U.S. 315 (1943), and Younger abstention is limited to cases where the federal court is asked to enjoin the actions of state officials, Younger v. Harris, 401

U.S. 37 (1971). Nothing in this problem implicates any of these standard abstention doctrines.

There is an argument that the district court should dismiss the action under the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Colorado River, 424 U.S. 800. Viewed expansively, the Colorado River doctrine, which is based on "principles of federalism, comity, and conservation of judicial resources," could be said to warrant federal court restraint when parallel state proceedings mean that pursuit of federal proceedings will waste judicial resources and potentially involve federal resolution of issues also pending before state courts. See Black Sea Investment, Ltd. v. United Heritage Corp., 204 F.3d 647, 650 (5th Cir. 2000). Such an argument could be bolstered by observing that dismissal under Colorado River is not governed by a "hard and fast rule," but by the application of an elaborate balancing test. See Moses H. Cone Mem. Hosp. v. Mercury Const. Corp., 460 U.S. 1, 16 (1983).

However, Colorado River does not justify abstention in this case. In Colorado River, the Supreme Court emphasized that the dismissal of the federal action in that case (in favor of parallel state proceedings) was an "extraordinary and narrow exception," 424 U.S. at 813, to the "virtually unflagging obligation of the federal courts to exercise the jurisdiction given them." 424 U.S. at 817.

The mere fact of duplicative litigation, which is all that appears to justify abstention on our facts, is not enough to justify abstention under Colorado River. See Black Sea Investment, Ltd., 204 F.3d at 650. ("Duplicative litigation, wasteful though it may be, is a necessary cost of our nation's maintenance of two separate and distinct judicial systems.") There must be evidence of other factors that militate against federal litigation, such as the risk of inconsistent rulings with respect to a particular piece of property or clear evidence of a federal policy favoring unitary adjudication of the claims at issue. In conducting the necessary balancing inquiry, moreover, "the balance [is] heavily weighted in favor of the exercise of jurisdiction." Cone Mem. Hosp., 460 U.S. at 16. In our case, there appears to be no special state interest to protect, no federal policy supporting unified state court adjudication of these product liability claims, and no apparent risk of inconsistent adjudications. It thus appears that the court's ruling was correct, as the class action here falls under the general rule of no abstention, rather than the narrow exception in Colorado River.

Point Two: The district court was justified in ruling that class certification was unwarranted (60-70%) because the facts suggest the absence of claim typicality and adequate representation.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure Rule 23(a) identifies the prerequisites that must be satisfied before any class may be certified. Rule 23(a) requires evidence that:

- (1) the class is so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable, (2) there are questions of law or fact common to the class, (3) the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class, and (4) the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class.

If the Rule 23(a) prerequisites are satisfied, a class action may be certified if it falls within one of the categories specified in Rule 23(b). Of particular relevance to this case is Rule 23(b)(3), which also requires that “questions of law or fact common to the members of the class predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and . . . a class action is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy.”

For a number of reasons, the district court’s refusal to certify Farmer’s class action was appropriate. While Farmer has satisfied a few of the prerequisites specified in Rule 23(a), he has not satisfied all of them. With respect to the few, the 100,000 members of the class easily satisfy the numerosity requirement, and there are issues of law and fact common to the members of the class. In particular, there are the questions whether the shock absorbers are defective and, if so, whether relief is appropriate under federal warranty law.

Farmer has not likely, however, satisfied the typicality and adequacy of representation requirements. As for typicality, the claims of representatives and class members are typical when they stem from a single event or are based on common legal theories. Rall v. Medtronic, 1986 WL 22271 (D. Nev. 1986). Here, Farmer’s individual claim seeks to recover for out-of-pocket losses resulting from replacement of the shocks. While Farmer’s claim is “typical” of other class members’ claims to the extent that all the claims involve the question of the defectiveness of the shock absorbers, Farmer’s warranty claim otherwise differs significantly from claims for personal injuries, which some members of the class have here. Personal injury claims are highly individualized, involving issues of causation, extent of damages, contributory negligence, etc., that are not present with respect to Farmer’s breach-of-warranty claim. Because of differences of this sort, federal courts have been reluctant to grant class certification where the claims of injured persons will be represented by class representatives who have no personal injury or where personal injury claims are lumped with claims that do not involve personal injury. Moreover, personal injury claimants have a strong interest in individually controlling the prosecution of their claims and in making individual decisions on whether to settle. A class action is designed for situations where individual claims are too small to warrant individual prosecution. See, e.g., Walsh v. Ford Motor Co., 106 F.R.D. 378, 404-408 (D.D.C. 1985). See generally Amchem Products, Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 615-619 (1997). Consequently, a typicality problem arises here. Cf. Hanlon v. Chrysler Corp., 150 F.3d 1011 (9th Cir. 1998) (class certification proper because class limited to economic loss claimants; personal injury claimants excluded).

The adequacy of representation requirement involves a two-part inquiry. First, the court must ask whether the representative’s interests are aligned closely enough with other class members to ensure fair representation of the absentee class members. Second, the court must ensure that class counsel is experienced and qualified to carry out the litigation in order to fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class. Both requirements pose problems in this case. See, e.g., Gen. Tel. Co. of the Southwest v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 157 n. 13 (1982); Emig v. American Tobacco Co., Inc., 184 F.R.D. 379, 387 (D. Kan. 1998). The difference between the nature of the contract and warranty claims of Farmer and those of the personal injury victims presents a potential conflict of interest that raises doubts about Farmer’s adequacy as a representative of the interests of the personal injury claimants. Farmer might be more willing to accept a modest settlement than would the personal injury claimants in the class. This adequacy of representation problem is magnified in view of the lawyer's inexperience with class litigation. There is a real question as to whether a new bar admittee is appropriate counsel for such complex litigation.

Even if the district court were satisfied that the Rule 23(a) prerequisites were satisfied, these same concerns would warrant denial of class certification pursuant to Rule 23(b). As noted above, the court may certify the class action only if common questions predominate over questions affecting individual members of the class. Given the existence of personal injury claimants in the class, some of whom have already filed independent claims, and given the existence of questions about the adequacy of the representation being provided by Farmer for the class, it was certainly within the scope of the court's discretion to conclude that the efficiency to be had by litigating "common questions of law and fact" in a class action would be overwhelmed by the problems posed by the presence of litigants with diverse personal injury claims, raising non-common issues of fact and law. See, e.g., Amchem, 521 U.S. at 622-25. In this regard, the personal injury claimants probably have a strong interest "in individually controlling the prosecution . . . of [their] separate actions." Georgine v. Amchem Products, Inc., 83 F.3d 610, 633 (3d Cir. 1996). Moreover, given the potential variability in the nature of the claims asserted by the class members, and the inexperience of class counsel, the "difficulties likely to be encountered in the management" of an action involving such diverse claims would probably significantly reduce the efficiencies stemming from class litigation. Id.

Accordingly, although the class is large and there are some common issues of law and fact, given the wide discretion residing with the court, it appropriately refused to certify the class.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP II, IV, VII, VIII.B

Question 5 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Under the theory of apparent authority, is a partnership bound by a contract entered into by a partner when that partner lacked actual authority?
 - (2) Is a partner liable to the partnership for breach of fiduciary duties when the partner enters into a contract against the other partners' instructions and without providing complete information to his partners?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Carl lacked actual authority to bind the partnership by signing the contract. In this three-person partnership, Adam and Barbara had expressly limited his authority when they told him "not to finalize a deal with Jane without first discussing the terms with them." The partnership, however, may be bound by the contract if Carl had apparent authority. Whether Carl had apparent authority depends on (a) whether expanding into the pinball and video game machine business could be considered "carrying on in the ordinary course" of this partnership's business, and (b) whether Jane viewed Carl as authorized to negotiate and sign the contract on behalf of the partnership. These issues can be resolved by a fact-based analysis.

Carl is liable to the partnership for any loss arising from the contract because he is an agent of the partnership and violated his fiduciary duties to the partnership: Carl violated express instructions when he entered into the contract without first consulting with Adam and Barbara; he also failed to make adequate disclosure to Adam and Barbara.

Point One: Although Carl lacked actual authority to enter into the contract, the partnership is bound by the contract if Carl had apparent authority to act on the partnership's behalf on this matter.

Carl's Actual Authority (10-20%): Each partner is entitled to participate equally "in the management and conduct of the partnership business." Uniform Partnership Act (UPA) § 18(e), Revised Uniform Partnership Act (RUPA) § 401(f). The rules of partnership management provide for majority rule on matters arising in the ordinary course and unanimous rule on matters arising out of the ordinary course of business. UPA §18(h), RUPA § 401(j).

Carl lacked actual authority to sign the contract binding the partnership because Adam and Barbara expressly instructed Carl “not to finalize a deal with Jane without first discussing the terms with them.” The express instruction from Adam and Barbara “not to finalize” restricted Carl’s actual authority. In this three-partner partnership, Carl lacked unanimous or majority approval to proceed beyond investigating the opportunity. Therefore, Carl lacked actual authority and the partnership is not bound on an actual authority basis.

Carl’s Apparent Authority (40-50%): As a partner, Carl is an agent of the partnership. “An act of a partner . . . for apparently carrying on in the ordinary course the partnership business or business of the kind carried on by the partnership binds the partnership, unless the partner had no authority to act for the partnership in the particular matter and the person with whom the partner is dealing knew . . . the partner lacked authority.” RUPA § 301 (1997). See also UPA § 9(1) (1914). There is no suggestion that Jane was aware of any limitation on Carl’s authority. Thus, two questions arise: (a) whether Carl had apparent authority to enter into purchase agreements on behalf of the partnership, and (b) whether the purchase of pinball and video machines was within the ordinary course of the partnership’s business. These questions are appropriately viewed from Jane’s perspective. See Luddington v. Bodenvest, Ltd., 855 P.2d 204, 209 (Utah 1993). See also Smith v. Dixon, 386 S.W.2d 244 (Ark. 1965) (look to custom and past dealings between the parties or with the particular partnership).

With respect to the first question, it would be perfectly reasonable for Jane to believe that Carl had the authority to enter into a purchase agreement without consulting his partners and there is no evidence that she knew that he lacked authority in this instance. The facts state that Carl represented the partnership in past dealings with Jane, negotiating and signing contracts without input from Adam or Barbara. Thus, from Jane’s perspective, when Carl signed the contract with Jane, he was carrying on business “in the usual way” in which it was always carried on for the partnership. See RNR Investments Limited Partnership v. Peoples First Community Bank, 812 So. 2d 561 (Fla. Ct. App. 2002) (“apparently carrying on in the ordinary course” means that partnership business must have been carried on “in the usual way”).

With respect to the second question, the issue is whether the purchase of pinball and video game machines would appear to be a carrying on of “the partnership business or business of the kind carried on by the partnership.” RUPA § 301 (emphasis added). The partner’s act must not only be an act carrying out business “in the usual way,” but it must also be an act the public would “reasonably conclude is directly and necessarily embraced within the partnership business as being incident or appropriate to such business according to the course and usage of conducting it.” Merrill v. O’Bryan, 93 P. 917 (Wash. 1908). The act must be “apparently within the nature of the business” of the partnership. Cummings v. Nordmark, 438 P.2d 605, 606 (Wash. 1968). See also Luddington v. Bodenvest Ltd., 855 P.2d at 210 (act must be “within the ordinary and apparent scope of the partnership business”).

In this case, the partnership was engaged in the beverage distribution business. An argument could be made that Carl’s purchase of pinball and video game machines was neither “partnership business” nor “business of the kind carried on by the partnership.” RUPA § 301. Ownership of pinball and video games is not “directly and necessarily embraced” within the scope of a beverage business, nor is it obviously “incident or appropriate to such business.” Merrill v. O’Bryan, 93 P. 917.

On the other hand, other beverage distribution businesses in the same geographic area as this partnership have been expanding into the pinball and video game machine business. Thus, even if the business of this partnership had been limited to beverage distribution, it is arguable that the supply of other goods and services to bars and restaurants, including game machines, is a “business of the kind carried on by the partnership” and is therefore within the “nature of the business” of this partnership. See Cummings v. Nordmark, 438 P.2d 605. Moreover, Jane, who was aware of the trend of beverage distributors expanding into the pinball and video game business could view this partnership’s expansion as being “incident or appropriate to [its] business according to the course and usage of conducting it [in her area].” Merrill v. O’Bryan, 93 P. 917. Cf. Florida Revised Uniform Partnership Act § 301(1) (scope of partnership business is determined with reference to acts of such businesses “in the geographic area in which the partnership operates.”).

The apparent authority arguments could go either way. The important task for applicants is to recognize the issue and apply the test appropriately. There is also an argument that even if Carl lacked authority to enter the contract, the partnership ratified the partnership contract when it presumably accepted the machines and began operating them.

Point Two: Carl is liable to the partnership for any loss arising from the contract with Jane (40-50%) because Carl breached his fiduciary duty to the partnership by signing this contract in violation of the instructions from Adam and Barbara, and without providing full disclosure to Adam and Barbara.

A partner is an agent of the partnership and owes duties to the partnership and the other partners. When a partner violates a duty, the partner is liable to the partnership and other partners for the resulting loss. Carl violated his duties to the partnership and the other partners when he entered into the contract in violation of his instructions and without discussing the terms with Adam and Barbara. Although the rationale differs under the UPA and the RUPA, under either statute, Carl is liable to the partnership for the loss resulting from his breach of duty.

Carl breached several duties to the partnership. First, under the common law and the UPA, Carl is an agent of the partnership and owes a duty of obedience to his other partners, including a duty to follow reasonable instructions. See Restatement (Second) of Agency § 385 (1958); UPA § 4(3). Carl breached this duty by failing to follow Adam and Barbara’s instruction that he not enter into any contract with Jane unless he first discussed the terms with them. (In a jurisdiction where the RUPA is applicable, one could also argue that this failure to follow instructions was “intentional misconduct” and a breach of Carl’s duty of care. See RUPA § 404(c).)

Second, Carl had an obligation to provide full information to Adam and Barbara. That obligation was imposed by their express instruction to him “not to finalize a deal with Jane without first discussing the terms” with them. See UPA § 20 (“[p]artners shall render on demand true and full information of all things affecting the partnership to any partner”). In addition, courts have interpreted the UPA to require full disclosure of information material to partnership affairs even in the absence of an explicit demand, and the RUPA specifically imposes such an obligation. See Griva v. Davison, 637 A.2d 830 (D.C. 1994); Silverberg v. Colantuno, 991 P.2d 280 (Colo. App. 1998); RUPA § 403(c).

Finally, it is arguable that Carl breached his duty of care by failing to thoroughly investigate the facts before entering into the contract with Jane. The amount of money involved was substantial, and Carl arguably should have visited all 72 bars and checked all 127 machines, not just 50 bars and 98 machines, before entering the contract. The common law, the UPA, and the RUPA all impose on partners a general duty of care, including a duty to act in good faith when carrying out partnership business. See generally RUPA § 404.

However, the duty of care is generally violated only by “grossly negligent or reckless conduct, intentional misconduct, or a knowing violation of the law.” See RUPA § 404(c). Although Carl may have been negligent in failing to inspect all machines and was clearly wrong in failing to consult with Barbara and Adam before finalizing the deal, these omissions may not rise to the level of gross neglect (or worse) necessary to violate the duty of care. See Duffy v. Piazza Construction, Inc., 815 P.2d 267 (Wash. Ct. App. 1991). From all that appears, Carl acted in the good faith belief that he was making a good deal for the partnership, he undertook an extensive (if incomplete) examination of the relevant information before agreeing to purchase the pinball machines, and his failure to consult with Adam and Barbara, while a violation of instructions, was consistent with the way the partnership had done business in the past. Under the circumstances, a breach of the duty of care may be difficult to establish.

There is no evidence of any self-interest in the transaction, and thus there is no duty of loyalty problem.

In summary, Carl likely did not breach his duty of care. He did, however, breach his duty of obedience and his duty to provide full information. He is therefore liable to the partnership for the losses resulting from either breach.

Question 6 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) Should the State X court enforce the premarital agreement even though the party challenging the agreement lacked legal counsel?
 - (1)(b) Should the State X court uphold the provisions that waive the right to marital property and child support upon divorce?
 - (2) Is Ann's trust fund subject to distribution as marital property?

NOTE: Applicants answering this question in a community property state should use community property principles. For this purpose, the phrase "marital property" means community property.

DISCUSSION

Summary: The court will probably enforce the premarital agreement's provisions regarding property division. Ann appears to have voluntarily entered the agreement despite the fact that she lacked legal counsel. Although the absence of legal counsel would be a factor a court would consider in assessing voluntariness, the other facts suggest that the agreement was voluntarily entered into. However, the court will not enforce the premarital agreement's provision waiving child support because parents cannot waive a child's right to support. If the premarital agreement is upheld, then consistent with the terms, Burt cannot reach Ann's trust fund. If the premarital agreement is invalid, in most states Burt will not be able to obtain Ann's trust fund because it is separate property. The entire amount is separate property because the base amount was acquired before marriage and the appreciation in the fund is not the result of spousal labor.

Point One (a): The court in State X will probably enforce the premarital agreement, except for (40-50%) the provision on child support (see Point One(b)), because the agreement was voluntarily entered into.

Today in all states premarital agreements are enforceable and not void as "contemplating divorce." However, the premarital agreement will not be enforceable against Ann if she can prove that she involuntarily entered the agreement. American Law Institute, PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF FAMILY DISSOLUTION: ANALYSIS AND RECOMMENDATIONS § 7.04 cmt. b (2001) [hereinafter ALI PRINCIPLES] (both case law and statutes generally require that consent to a premarital agreement be voluntary); see also Uniform Premarital Agreement Act § 6(a)(1), 9B U.L.A. 373 (1987) [hereinafter UPAA]. Here no facts support duress, oppression or unfair surprise. See generally ALI PRINCIPLES, supra, § 7.04 cmt. b; see Ira Mark Ellman, Paul M. Kurtz & Elizabeth S. Scott, FAMILY LAW: CASES, TEXT, PROBLEMS 800-01 (1998).

The fact that Ann did not have a lawyer will probably not affect the court's determination of whether Ann entered into the agreement voluntarily. Neither any state nor the UPAA mandates the assistance of independent counsel. Courts generally have not required independent counsel as a precondition to enforcing an agreement against an objecting party. See ALI PRINCIPLES, supra, § 7.04 cmt. e, reporter's note. Moreover, the lack of independent counsel is probably not enough to invalidate the agreement here. Ann was advised to obtain a lawyer, she had plenty of time before the marriage to do so, and her trust fund and job gave her the resources to do so.

Factors suggesting that the agreement was entered into voluntarily include the length of time between the date the premarital agreement was presented and the wedding (three months), and the fact that Ann's background permitted her to read and understand the agreement (she had a high school education); the factual history also indicates that Ann read the agreement, that she did not express any reservations about signing it, that Burt's lawyer told her of the agreement's exact effect, and that she had more assets than Burt when entering the marriage. The facts, on the whole, suggest that Ann voluntarily entered into the agreement.

Point One (b): A premarital agreement can address property division upon divorce but cannot (15-25%) bind a court on matters of child support.

In virtually all states, premarital agreements can include provisions about the disposition of property upon marital dissolution. See, e.g., UPAA § 3(a)(3). See also ALI PRINCIPLES, supra, § 7.04 cmt. a. Therefore, the provisions on property division are not objectionable because of their subject matter.

However, almost all states agree that a child's right to support cannot be adversely affected by a premarital agreement. See UPAA § 3(b); Ellman, Kurtz & Scott, supra, at 839 ("The traditional rule is that a contract between prospective spouses cannot bind a court in deciding child support.").

The fact that the child support provision is probably invalid does not preclude enforcement of the rest of the agreement. Even if the court declares one or more provisions of the premarital agreement to be unenforceable, the remaining provisions may be valid and enforceable. Typically, if an agreement contains some unenforceable terms (such as an impermissible waiver of child support), the remaining terms may be enforced if the parties intended them to be enforceable even without the unenforceable terms. 17A C.J.S. CONTRACTS § 332, p. 309-310; Arnold H. Rutkin, 5 FAMILY LAW & PRACTICE § 59.04(4) (1999) ("The standard rules of contract law apply to antenuptial agreements."). See, e.g., Rogers v. Yourshaw, 448 S.E.2d 884, 887 (Va. Ct. App. 1994). Here there is no provision specifying whether the contract is entire or severable, and in all likelihood, the court would find it is severable and uphold the rest of the agreement.

Point Two: (15-25%) If the premarital agreement is valid, then it would independently shield the trust fund from Burt's claim. If the premarital agreement is valid, Burt will probably not be entitled to any of Ann's trust fund because it was separate property.

If the premarital agreement is valid (see Point One(b)), Burt waived his rights in Ann's separate property and would not be entitled to any part of the trust fund.

Even if the agreement were not enforced, property acquired before marriage is generally considered separate property. See ALI PRINCIPLES, supra, § 4.03 cmt. b. Therefore, Ann's trust fund of $200,000 is her separate property. Typically, separate property is not subject to division in an equitable distribution or a community property regime.

Regarding the additional $600,000 that represents the appreciation in the value of the trust fund, the general rule is that appreciation of separate property remains separate property if the appreciation is not attributable to spousal labor. ALI PRINCIPLES, supra, § 4.04 cmt. a. Since the facts state that Ann's father solely managed the trust, the property would be considered separate. About fourteen states, however, make all property subject to division upon divorce. See Uniform Marriage and Divorce Act (UMDA) § 307, Alternative A, 9 U.L.A. (Part I) 288 (1988). But even in these states, there is little to support Burt's contribution to the appreciation of the asset or his claim of need, the two factors primarily considered by courts in distributing property.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS V.A., V.B.

Question 7 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) When will a repossession be invalidated as having been conducted in breach of the peace?
 - (2) What are the requirements for a valid waiver of the right of redemption, and what must the debtor tender if the security agreement contains an acceleration clause?
 - (3) What are a debtor's remedies if a secured party fails to comply with the debtor's rights of redemption and seeks to recover a deficiency judgment?

DISCUSSION

Summary: It is debatable whether the repossession, which Bank had the right to carry out, was or was not conducted without a breach of the peace. In any case, Bank's refusal of Debtor's tender of the entire balance violated Debtor's rights because the right of redemption cannot be waived in the security agreement. Given that the repossession was unlawfully carried out because of Bank's refusal to accept Debtor's tender of redemption, Debtor is entitled to recover any damages caused by Bank's failure to comply with the rules relating to the repossession. This might include damages for loss of business. Debtor can also challenge Bank's claim for a deficiency, but, since the sale was commercially reasonable, it is unlikely that Debtor will prevail on his challenge.

Point One: Debtor can argue that Bank's repossession of the collateral was conducted in (30-35%) breach of the peace. Bank equally can assert that its repossession was peaceable.

Section 9-609 of the Uniform Commercial Code provides that "after default, a secured party may take possession of the collateral," and may proceed without judicial process if this can be done "without breach of the peace." This "self-help repossession" is a significant right accruing to the secured party under Article 9's default provisions, and it may be exercised without giving prior notice to Debtor. Because Debtor was in default in its monthly payments in the amount of $1,600, Bank was within its rights in repossessing the kitchen equipment, so long as Bank did so without a breach of the peace. UCC § 9-609.

"Breach of the peace" is not defined in Article 9. White and Summers suggest that claims of breach of the peace be analyzed with a "crude two-factor formula of creditor entry and debtor response . . . refined by a consideration of third-party response, the type of premises entered and possible creditor deceit in procuring consent.” James J. White & Robert S. Summers, UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE, 5th ed. § 25-7, at 219 (2000).

Applicants should discuss a number of facts in considering whether the repossession was carried out without a breach of the peace. First, the repossession took place on business property, rather than in a private home. The courts are most sensitive to unauthorized entries into a debtor’s residence. See White & Summers, supra, § 25-7, at 220. Here, because the repossession took place at a business rather than at a home, the public policy against intrusion upon a debtor’s solitude and safety is less compelling.

Second, although Debtor was not present, Debtor’s employee was and Debtor’s employee objected to the repossession. White and Summers state: “An opposition to the entry or seizure, however slight and even though merely verbal, normally results in a breach of the peace. The law should not make a debtor physically confront a reposessor in order to sustain a claim of breach of the peace.” White & Summers, supra, § 25-7, at 221. On the other hand, some courts have held that oral protest alone does not unequivocally preclude self-help repossession. See Clarin v. Minnesota Repossessors, Inc., 40 UCC Rep. Serv. 2d 316 (8th Cir. 1999) (no breach of peace where repossession took place in parking lot of debtor’s place of work, notwithstanding debtor’s initial oral protest). The Eighth Circuit in Clarin acknowledged that the “[c]ourts are divided on the issue of whether an unequivocal oral protest amounts to a breach of the peace.” Id. at 318. Moreover, the employee’s protest was less significant than the debtor’s own protest would have been.

Apart from the oral protest, the facts do not suggest that entry was otherwise obtained by a breach of the peace. The reposseors did not attempt repossession during regular business hours; they did not pick the lock or break a door down or otherwise damage Debtor’s business; the reposseors walked past the employee through an open door; the employee at first objected loudly, but later was quiet as the repossession proceeded; the employee did not physically attempt to halt the repossession or call law enforcement authorities; there was no threat of violence; Bank’s representative did not use a ruse or stealth to gain entry, but honestly stated the purpose of the visit.

Point Two: The right of redemption cannot be waived in the security agreement, and Debtor (30-35%) was entitled to redeem the collateral by tendering fulfillment of all obligations before Bank had disposed of the collateral. Debtor had to tender the entire loan balance due because the security agreement contains an acceleration clause. Bank’s refusal to accept a tender of the full balance due violated Debtor’s rights.

Section 9-623 of the UCC provides that a debtor may redeem collateral “at any time before a secured party has disposed of collateral or entered into a contract for its disposition under Section 9-610.” To redeem the collateral, debtor must tender “fulfillment of all obligations secured by the collateral” as well as the expenses reasonably incurred by the secured party in retaking, holding and preparing the collateral for disposition.

The right to redeem collateral is a mandatory right that may not be waived in the security agreement. See UCC § 9-602(11). As a result, the clause in the security agreement purporting to waive Debtor's right of redemption is ineffective. A waiver of Debtor's right to redeem is effective only if it is done "by an agreement to that effect entered into and authenticated after default." UCC § 9-624(c). There was no such agreement here. Thus, Debtor was entitled to redeem the collateral at the time he attempted to do so, because it was "before [the] secured party had disposed of the collateral . . . under Section 9-610." UCC § 9-623.

To redeem the collateral, a debtor must "tender fulfillment of all obligations secured by the collateral." UCC § 9-623. (emphasis added). Where, as here, the security agreement contains an acceleration clause, this would include the entire balance due on the loan. In addition, the redemption amount must include "the expenses reasonably incurred by the secured party in retaking, holding and preparing the collateral for disposition, in arranging for the sale, and to the extent provided in the agreement and not prohibited by law, [the secured party's] reasonable attorneys' fees and legal expenses." UCC § 9-623.

In this case, Debtor's initial tender of the amount of his arrearage in monthly payments was inadequate to redeem the collateral. When Debtor later offered to tender the full amount due, Bank made it clear that it would not accept any redemption. Bank based its refusal on the redemption waiver clause in the security agreement. But Part 6 of Article 9 deems such clauses unenforceable. In short, Bank's refusal to allow Debtor to redeem was a violation of Debtor's rights.

Point Three: Debtor is entitled to the remedies provided in UCC Sections 9-625 and 9-627.
(30-35%) Debtor may be able to recover damages if the repossession is found to be unlawful. It may also be able to challenge the imposition of a deficiency judgment.

Sections 9-625(a) and (b) of the UCC provide: "If it is established that a secured party is not proceeding in accordance with this article, a court may order or restrain . . . disposition of collateral. . . . A person is liable for damages in the amount of any loss caused by a failure to comply with this article."

A commercially reasonable sale under § 9-610 has already taken place. Thus, Debtor now must seek to recover from Bank for "any loss caused by a failure to comply" with Article 9. Presumably, this would include any loss attributable to the failure of Bank to allow Debtor to redeem and may include any loss attributable to improper repossession (assuming that Debtor can prove a breach of the peace was committed).

The collateral in this case—stove, refrigerator, freezers, and microwave oven for use in Debtor's restaurant business—would be classified as "equipment" ("used or bought for use primarily in business") under § 9-102(33). In the case of business equipment, Article 9 provides no clear guidance on the question of measuring damages for "any loss caused by a failure to comply with this article." White and Summers state that a debtor's "loss" for these purposes "is probably the difference between the net amount actually realized on resale and the amount that would have been realized had the creditor complied with the Code's requirements." James J. White & Robert S. Summers, UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE § 25-11, at 931 (4th ed. 1995) (interpreting old § 9-507). The new Code states expressly, however, that damages should also include, in appropriate cases, such consequential losses as those caused by the "debtor's inability to obtain . . . alternative financing." UCC § 9-625(b). Some commentators endorse the possibility of punitive damages. See B. Clark, THE LAW OF SECURED TRANSACTIONS UNDER THE UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE ¶ 4.12[2], at 4-175 (1988).

In addition, UCC § 9-626 authorizes denial of a deficiency judgment when the creditor has failed to comply with Article 9's rules concerning the "collection, enforcement, disposition or acceptance" of collateral. Article 9 adopts the so-called "rebuttable presumption" rule: Where the creditor has violated a relevant rule, the creditor will not be allowed to obtain a deficiency judgment unless the creditor proves that the amount that "would have been realized" if the creditor had acted properly "is less than" the amount to which the creditor was entitled. UCC § 9-626(a)(4). However, reduction of a deficiency appears to preclude a debtor from also recovering actual damages. See UCC § 9-625(d).

In this case, Debtor might argue that consequential damages should include damages for loss of business opportunity, because Bank's wrongful repossession and/or refusal to permit redemption resulted in the closure of Debtor's business. Consequential damages must be reasonably foreseeable under the traditional rule of Hadley v. Baxendale, 156 Eng. Rep. 145 (1854). It is arguably foreseeable to the creditor that an improper refusal to allow redemption of essential kitchen equipment may result in substantial business losses to a restaurant operation. In addition, Debtor might argue that Bank's refusal to allow redemption interfered with Debtor's ability to secure alternative financing because it deprived Debtor of the collateral necessary for an alternative loan.

On the other hand, apart from these consequential damages, it will be difficult for Debtor to establish any loss. The sale of the kitchen equipment was commercially reasonable, and there is no evidence that Bank's wrongful conduct affected the price it received for the equipment. Consequently, Bank may well be able to establish that it is entitled to a deficiency judgment, despite its violations of Article 9.

Debtor had the absolute obligation to mitigate his damages. If he had enough money to pay off the balance and Bank's expenses, then he naturally had enough money to appear at Bank's foreclosure sale and buy the equipment back at the sale. Debtor would still have damages for interim loss of business, his own expenses, attorneys' fees, etc., but Debtor may be unable to recover for permanent loss of business.

Preface

This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2004 and July 2004 Multistate Essay Examinations. Each test includes seven questions; most jurisdictions that use the MEE select the six questions their applicants will answer.

The model analyses to the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. These models are not an official grading guide. Some jurisdictions grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses as they wish, including the suggested weights given to particular points. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topic or topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by Roman numerals which refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that topic. For example, Question 4 on the February 2004 MEE tested Agency and Partnership I, agency relationships, II.B, apparent authority, and III, vicarious liability of principal. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet and can also be found at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE is a three-hour examination consisting of six questions. The examination is administered in one continuous three-hour time period. Applicants are expected to spend approximately thirty minutes answering each of the questions. The areas of law covered by the questions in the examination are: Agency and Partnership, Commercial Paper, Conflict of Laws, Corporations and Limited Liability Companies, Decedents' Estates, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Sales, Secured Transactions, and Trusts and Future Interests. Some questions include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You will have three hours in which to write your answers to six of the seven questions contained in this booklet; you will be told which of the questions you are to answer. Each question is designed to be answered in thirty minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts which are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show: an understanding of the facts; a recognition of the issues included; the applicable principles of law; and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Some jurisdictions instruct applicants to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

February 2004
Questions

Question 1

In 1995, Testator, age 85, executed a will in the presence of two witnesses. Immediately before signing the document, Testator's attorney asked Testator if she declared the instrument to be her will. Testator responded: "You bet it is. I want Charity to have everything. My family has enough." Then the attorney had Testator sign the document on the line provided for her signature. The two witnesses signed immediately below Testator's signature without any further direction or comment from Testator.

When Testator executed this will, she was suffering from cancer and her medications made it very difficult for her to remember facts. For example, when she executed her will she knew, correctly, that her estate was worth $500,000 and that she had previously made large gifts to her child and some of her grandchildren. However, she could neither remember the name of her stockbroker nor recount the names of her stocks under her stockbroker's management. Also, she had no difficulty correctly naming her child and all of her grandchildren, but she could not recall that she had a great-grandchild. She also knew she owned both a home and a condominium but could not recall the precise street address for either residence.

Testator died in 2002 survived by her only child, Mary, and by three grandchildren and one great-grandchild, all of whom are descendants of Mary. Testator's will, which devised her entire estate to Charity, was timely offered for probate by Bank, the executor named in the will. Mary and one of her children, Grandchild, have initiated a timely contest of the will.

Governing state law provides that a will is properly executed if the testator signs the will in the presence of two witnesses after having (a) declared the instrument to be her will, and (b) requested the witnesses to act in such capacity.

1. Do Mary and Grandchild each have standing to contest Testator's will? Explain.
2. On what theory or theories, other than undue influence, might a person with standing contest Testator's will, what defenses might Bank, as executor, assert, and what is the likely outcome? Explain.

Question 2

Bill purchased a used car from Sally and paid her $15,000 with a check drawn on his account at Local Bank. The check was payable to the order of Sally and was certified by Local Bank. Sally accepted the certified check and gave Bill the car and its paper title.

Before Sally had a chance to deposit the check, it was stolen by Thief. Thief forged Sally's indorsement on the check, then indorsed the check with his own signature underneath Sally's forged signature and deposited the check into his own bank account at Depositary Bank.

Depositary Bank provisionally credited Thief's account for $15,000 and forwarded the check for payment to Local Bank, which made final payment. Thief then withdrew $15,000 from his checking account at Depositary Bank and disappeared.

In the meantime, Sally contacted Bill and asked him to stop payment on the certified check. Before Bill could contact Local Bank, however, it had already made final payment on the check.

Sally now demands payment from Bill, who refuses on the ground that he has already paid her. Sally is also demanding $15,000 from both banks.

1. What rights of recovery, if any, does Sally have against Bill? Explain.
2. What rights of recovery, if any, does Sally have against Depositary Bank and/or Local Bank as a result of the payment made to Thief for the amount of the certified check?
3. If Local Bank paid Sally the amount of the certified check, what rights would Local Bank have against Depositary Bank? Explain.

Question 3

NOTE: Applicants answering this question in a community property state should use community property principles. For this purpose, the phrase “marital property” means community property

Harold is the CEO and sole owner of a real estate business that he began about 25 years ago, shortly after he married Wendy. Wendy quit her job when they married and has ever since been a full-time homemaker. Last year, Harold became romantically involved with Carol, an employee of his real estate business. Wendy recently discovered this affair and also learned that Harold had bought expensive gifts for Carol, including a house purchased in Carol's name. Wendy sued Harold for divorce, based on his adultery with Carol.

Wendy would agree that she has never been a good housekeeper. The house was often dirty until the weekly visit by a cleaning company. Meals were often brought in from local restaurants. Wendy spent much of her time tending to the couple's two children, who are now adults, although a live-in nanny helped her until both children entered school. At Harold's request, Wendy occasionally entertained Harold's clients.

Harold has sole title to the real estate business and a private vested pension to which he has contributed since beginning his real estate business. Harold and Wendy have joint title to their family home and a bank account. These assets were acquired with funds Harold earned during the marriage. Wendy has sole title to 1,000 shares of stock she inherited shortly after she married Harold.

1. Are the real estate business, Harold's pension, the jointly titled family home, the joint bank account, and the stock subject to division at divorce? Explain.
2. What effect, if any, would Harold's affair with Carol and his gifts to her have on any property division? Explain.
3. What arguments regarding property division are available to Harold and Wendy based on Wendy's role as a mother and homemaker? Explain.

Question 4

Motorist was driving his automobile in the northbound lane on a highway in State X. Exceeding the posted maximum speed limit by 10 miles per hour, Motorist was gaining on a slow-moving U.S. Army truck convoy traveling in the same lane. At the same time, a motorcycle, driven by Husband with Wife as a passenger, was approaching the convoy from the opposite direction. Husband was operating the motorcycle at the posted speed limit and was traveling in the proper (southbound) lane.

The soldier driving the last truck in the convoy was feeling drowsy because he had not slept the night before. Suddenly, realizing that he had driven his truck far too close to the Army truck just ahead of him, he slammed on his brakes. Motorist, who had nearly overtaken the convoy, reacted to the sight of the truck's brake lights by frantically swerving his automobile into the southbound lane, where he sideswiped Husband's motorcycle. Husband was thrown to the pavement and seriously injured. Wife, however, miraculously avoided physical injury.

At the time of the accident, Husband and Wife were citizens of State Y, but a few months later they moved permanently to State X. Motorist was at all times a citizen of State X.

Shortly after moving to State X, Husband and Wife filed an action in the United States District Court for the District of State X seeking to recover for the injuries they suffered as a result of the accident. In the action, Husband claimed $50,000 in damages for his injuries, and Wife claimed $5,000 for her loss of Husband's consortium. They named as defendants both the United States of America and Motorist. Their claims against the United States are based on the Federal Tort Claims Act, which provides that federal district courts have exclusive jurisdiction over tort claims against the United States government. Their claims against Motorist are based on the tort law of State X, where the accident occurred.

1. Can Husband and Wife, as plaintiffs, join their respective personal injury and loss of consortium claims in a single action in the U.S. district court? Explain.
2. Can Husband and Wife join their respective claims against the United States and Motorist, as defendants, in a single action in the U.S. district court? Explain.
3. Does the U.S. district court have subject matter jurisdiction over the state law claims of Husband and Wife against Motorist? Explain.

Question 5

PC is a professional law corporation formed by Ted and Teresa. In 2002, PC obtained a $100,000 line of credit from First Bank, and PC authenticated a security agreement that granted First Bank a security interest in “all of PC’s equipment, now owned or hereafter acquired.”

Although PC did not specifically authorize it, First Bank promptly filed a financing statement in the appropriate state offices. The financing statement, which PC had not signed, recited erroneously that First Bank had a security interest in “all of PC’s equipment, inventory, and accounts receivable.” PC knew that First Bank had filed a financing statement but was unaware that the financing statement covered collateral not mentioned in the security agreement.

In 2003, PC entered into contracts to provide legal services to a number of municipalities, one of which was the City of Eden. To perform these contracts, PC decided to expand its operation by hiring an additional attorney, adding office staff, and increasing its office space. When First Bank refused to increase PC’s line of credit to finance the expansion, PC approached Second Bank about obtaining a separate business expansion loan.

Second Bank agreed to loan PC $100,000, provided the loan was secured by a first security interest in PC’s accounts receivable. However, the arrangement fell through when Second Bank discovered that First Bank had already filed a financing statement covering PC’s accounts receivable. First Bank ignored repeated requests from PC to terminate or amend the financing statement, and Second Bank was unwilling to make a loan until First Bank’s filing was changed. As a result, PC was not able to secure financing from Second Bank.

Because of its inability to secure this financing, PC was unable to hire additional staff and could not adequately perform the contracts. After PC’s attorneys failed to attend two important city council meetings because they were occupied with other duties, the City of Eden terminated its contract with PC, a contract that PC had expected to generate $250,000 in revenue over two years.

Also in 2003, Luke, a former employee of PC’s, sued PC and won a judgment for $50,000. Luke immediately obtained a judicial lien against all of PC’s assets, including its equipment and accounts receivable.

1. As between Luke and First Bank, who has the superior claim to PC’s equipment? Explain.
2. As between Luke and First Bank, who has the superior claim to PC’s accounts receivable? Explain.
3. What claims, if any, does PC have against First Bank under the Uniform Commercial Code? Explain.

Question 6

One year ago, Randy and Sandy formed a partnership to manufacture widgets. They did not enter into a written partnership agreement. Randy contributed $10,000, and Sandy contributed $5,000 to the partnership. They participated equally in the management of the partnership and shared the profits equally.

The widget market has since declined, and business has been slow. Last Monday, Randy told Sandy, "I don't want to do this anymore. I am quitting this partnership." Randy then left town on an extended vacation. At that time, the partnership still had some short-term widget contracts to fulfill and owed trade creditors $30,000.

The next day, Barney, a widget broker, met with Sandy at the widget factory. Barney knew about Randy and Sandy's partnership but had not previously done business with the partnership. For over a month, Sandy had been soliciting a long-term contract to produce widgets for Barney. Without telling Barney about Randy's statement the previous day, Sandy, on behalf of the partnership, entered into a contract with Barney to produce 500,000 widgets a year for three years.

After Randy's departure, Sandy, using her own funds, paid the $30,000 owed to trade creditors.

1. What is the effect of Randy's statement, "I don't want to do this anymore. I am quitting this partnership"? Explain.
2. Is the partnership bound by the contract with Barney? Explain.
3. What contribution, if any, can Sandy claim from Randy for Sandy's $30,000 payment to trade creditors? Explain.

Question 7

Testator, a widower, died one year ago at the age of 86 survived by his only two children, Angela and Brian (ages 40 and 45), twelve grandchildren (ranging in age from 17 to 27), and six great-grandchildren (ranging in age from 2 to 7). Testator's will bequeathed his entire estate to his "great-grandchildren living when my will is probated." Testator's will was probated two months after Testator died.

Before he died, Testator created a revocable trust with Friend as trustee. Friend was a longtime confidante of Testator and his family, with intimate knowledge of all of their financial and personal affairs. The trust provided that upon Testator's death the trust income could be paid to and among Testator's issue in such shares as Friend determined, with any unpaid income to be accumulated. It also provided that upon the death of Angela and Brian, the trust would terminate, and the corpus would be distributed to Testator's then living issue.

The trust contained no provisions relating to its administration. Because Friend was not very experienced in the administration of trusts and particularly in selecting appropriate trust investments, she interviewed a number of possible bank trust officers to assist her in administering the trust. Then she contracted with Bank, an institution wholly unfamiliar with Testator's family, to make all determinations regarding the distribution of trust income and how the trust's assets should be prudently invested.

Bank immediately sold all of the trust assets and reinvested all of the proceeds in XYZ Corporation, a telecommunications company whose shares are publicly traded. Bank paid $60 per share for this stock. Today, however, each share is worth only $21. The loss in value is due to the general decline in the telecommunications industry and not to any inherent weaknesses in XYZ.

Twice, after contracting with Bank, Friend called Bank to see how things were going. On these two occasions Friend was advised that "all is well." Friend never made further inquiries.

The common-law Rule Against Perpetuities, as modified by the wait-and-see doctrine, applies in this jurisdiction.

1. To whom should Testator's probate estate be distributed? Explain.
2. What fiduciary duties, if any, did Friend breach with respect to the trust? Explain.

DECEDENT'S ESTATES II.A, II.J

Question 1 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Do Mary and Grandchild each have standing to contest Testator's will?
 - (2) Can Testator's will be successfully contested on the grounds of:
 - (a) lack of mental capacity?
 - (b) lack of due execution?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Mary has standing to contest the will because, if the will were denied probate, she would be Testator's sole heir. On the other hand, Grandchild lacks standing to contest the will because if the will were denied probate, Grandchild would not be entitled to any share of Testator's estate. Mary, who is entitled to contest the will, is not likely to be successful on the ground of lack of mental capacity but might prevail on the ground of lack of due execution in states applying the strict compliance doctrine.

Point One: (20-30%) Mary has standing to contest the will. However, Grandchild does not have standing to contest the will.

Wills can be contested only by persons who would be better off financially if the will were denied probate than they would be if the will were admitted to probate. See generally William M. McGovern & Sheldon F. Kurtz, WILLS, TRUSTS, AND ESTATES 464 (2d ed. 2001). If the rule were otherwise, wills would be subject to suits by persons seeking to extort money from legitimate beneficiaries who want to avoid litigation.

Under the laws of all states, an intestate's children take to the exclusion of their own descendants. Thus, if Testator's will were denied probate, Testator's entire estate would pass to Mary; nothing would pass to the grandchildren or great-grandchild. Mary, therefore, would have standing to contest the will because as Testator's only child she would be her only heir if the will were denied probate. On the other hand, Grandchild would not be financially better off if the will were denied probate and, thus, would lack standing to contest the will.

Point Two (a): (30-40%) Testator probably had the mental capacity to execute a will at the time she executed it.

In order to execute a will, a testator must have mental capacity. A testator meets this requirement if the testator knows (1) the nature and extent of her property, (2) the persons who are the natural objects of the testator's bounty and have the highest moral claims to the testator's property, (3) the disposition the testator is attempting to make, and (4) the interrelationship of these items in connection with the testamentary plan formulated in the will. See generally Jesse Dukeminier & Stanley M. Johanson, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES 163 (6th ed. 2000).

All persons are afforded the presumption that they have mental capacity. As a result, the burden of proving that the testator lacks mental capacity rests on the contestant to the will. Here, there are two arguments to support a will contest on mental incapacity grounds, although Bank has good responses to both arguments.

First, Testator arguably did not know the nature and extent of her property. Testator could not identify the stocks that she owned or name the stockbroker who managed them. Also, she could not recall the addresses of her two residences. On the other hand, she did know what she was worth and she did know that she owned two residences. Thus, whether she lacked mental capacity on this ground may ultimately depend on how precise a testator must be regarding the nature and extent of her property. Courts often are very lenient and uphold the wills of elderly testators who at least grasp the big picture about their financial affairs. Furthermore, because of the burden of proof, in a very close case the contestant will lose.

Second, Testator could not identify one of the persons with a high moral claim to her property, namely her great-grandchild. On the other hand, Testator could identify her more closely related relatives, and in particular Mary, whom she was intending to disinherit. Her failure to recall whether she had a great-grandchild probably would not be dispositive of her mental capacity. Courts have not required elderly testators to know the number of their remote descendants, particularly in a mobile society where people may have infrequent contacts with grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Point Two (b): Testator's will was not duly executed under the strict compliance doctrine but (30-40%) could be upheld as valid if the court either adopts the substantial compliance doctrine or infers that Testator requested the witnesses to sign.

At common law, if the execution of a will did not strictly adhere to the required formalities, the will would be invalid and the testator would have died intestate. The facts state that under the governing law, a properly executed will must be signed by the testator in the presence of two witnesses after the testator has declared the instrument to be her will and has requested that the witnesses act in such capacity. Here, the signing, witnessing, and declaration requirements have been satisfied, but the facts state that Testator did not specifically request the witnesses to act as such. Thus, courts adhering to the strict common-law approach (known as the strict compliance doctrine) would invalidate the will. See generally McGovern & Kurtz, supra, at 170-72.

On the other hand, statutes in some states and a judicial decision in at least one state have tempered the harsh consequences of the common-law rule by adopting a "substantial compliance" approach to determining whether a will has been validly executed. See generally John H. Langbein, Substantial Compliance with the Wills Act, 88 HARV. L. REV. 489 (1975).

Under this approach, if the execution of a will substantially complies with most of the formalities, or at least the most important of them, the will is valid. See, e.g., In re Will of Ranney 124 N.J. 1, 589 A.2d 1339 (1991) (will valid even though witnesses only witnessed the self-proving will affidavit and did not witness the actual will).

Similarly, ' 2-503 of the Uniform Probate Code (UPC) grants a court a so-called “dispensing power” under which a court can probate a will when its execution failed to comply with all of the execution formalities so long as the evidence is clear and convincing that the decedent intended the document to be her will. In this case, the failure to request that the witnesses act as such when they signed in the physical presence of Testator can easily be ignored under this statute if, as the facts suggest, Testator clearly intended Charity to take under her will. The statement, “My family has enough” is evidence of Testator’s intent.

It might also be argued from the context and surrounding circumstances that Testator implicitly asked the witnesses to sign even if she did not do so expressly. She saw them sign, and she declared the instrument to be her will. At least one court has adopted that approach and thus avoided an all-out adoption of the substantial compliance theory. See Matter of Graham’s Estate, 295 N. W.2d 414 (Iowa 1980).

COMMERCIAL PAPER III.B, IV.H, V.E., V.G, V.H, V.K

Question 2 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Does the payee of a certified check have rights against the drawer when the check is stolen and payment is received by a person not entitled to enforce the instrument?
 - (2) Does the payee of a stolen certified check have rights against the banks that collect or pay the stolen check when the payee's indorsement was forged and the check is paid to a person not entitled to enforce it?
 - (3) Does a bank that pays a forged-indorsement check have the right to recover the amount of payment from a bank that presented the check for payment?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Sally cannot recover from Bill because he has no liability on a certified check, and his underlying obligation was discharged when Sally took the certified check from him in satisfaction of that obligation. Sally does have a conversion claim against both banks because they allowed Thief, a person not entitled to enforce the check, to receive payment on it. As between the banks, Local Bank can recover from Depository Bank, which should bear the loss because it took the check from Thief and breached a warranty (no unauthorized indorsements) when it presented the check to Local Bank for payment.

Point One: (30-35%) Because Bill paid Sally with a certified check, his underlying obligation to pay for the car was discharged when Sally accepted the check. Moreover, Bill's obligation as drawer of the check was discharged when the check was certified by Local Bank.

When Sally accepted a certified check from Bill in payment for the car, Bill's underlying obligation to pay for the car was discharged "to the same extent discharge would result if an amount of money equal to the amount of the instrument were taken in payment." See UCC ' 3-310(a). The certified check is treated as the equivalent of cash. Sally's acceptance of the certified check fully discharges Bill's obligation on the underlying transaction.

Bill's obligation as drawer of the check was fully discharged by Local Bank's certification of the check. See UCC ' 3-414(c). This is because the certified check is an obligation of Local Bank, see UCC ' 3-413, and the Code assumes that the holder of a certified check takes or holds the check in reliance on the certifying bank's obligation rather than on the drawer's obligation. UCC ' 3-414, cmt. 3.

Point Two: As the owner of the check, Sally has a conversion claim against both Depository (30-35%) Bank and Local Bank.

UCC ' 3-420(a) provides that a bank that makes or obtains payment for a person not entitled to enforce the instrument is liable for conversion of the check. The liability runs in favor of the true owner or the person entitled to enforce the instrument, and is "presumed to be the amount payable on the instrument." UCC ' 3-420(b).

Sally is the owner of the check. In addition, Sally is the only person entitled to enforce the instrument because the check was payable to Sally at the time of the theft. See UCC " 3-201(a) & (b), 3-301. Absent Sally's indorsement, Thief could not become a person entitled to enforce the check. Thus, when Local Bank made final payment on the check for Thief's benefit, it became liable in conversion to Sally, the true owner of the check. UCC ' 3-420(a). Similarly, Depository Bank, which ultimately gave Thief final credit for his deposit of the check, is liable in conversion to Sally because it obtained payment for a person not entitled to enforce the check (i.e., Thief).

Sally's damages for conversion against either of the two banks would be $15,000, the face amount of the check, under UCC ' 3-420(b). She can recover no more than $15,000.

Point Three: Local Bank may recover from Depository Bank because Depository Bank (30-35%) breached a presentment warranty.

As the first party to pay Thief, Depository Bank will bear the loss if Thief is not found. The reason for this result is the operation of the warranty rules in Article 3 of the UCC. Under UCC ' 3-417(d)(1), any party (including a bank) that presents a certified check for payment warrants to the person making payment that the person obtaining payment is entitled to enforce the instrument or is acting on behalf of someone entitled to enforce the instrument. That warranty was breached by Depository Bank because Sally was the only person entitled to enforce the instrument (the check was payable to her and she had not indorsed it). Depository Bank clearly was not acting on Sally's behalf. It presented the check on behalf of Thief and credited the amount of the check to Thief's account after receiving payment from Local Bank. Section 3-417 (d)(1) is "in effect . . . a warranty that there are no unauthorized or missing indorsements." See Comment 2 to ' 3-417. Because the check included an unauthorized indorsement, the warranty was breached and Depository Bank is liable to Local Bank.

The amount recoverable for this breach of warranty is the amount Local Bank paid on the check plus expenses and loss of interest resulting from the breach. UCC ' 3-417(d)(2). Here the recovery from Depository Bank would be at least the face amount of the check, $15,000.

FAMILY LAW III.D

Question 3 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) What property is subject to division on divorce?
 - (2) Will a court consider Harold's adultery or his gifts to Carol in dividing property upon divorce?
 - (3) Will a long-term homemaker's role be relevant to a determination of that spouse's share of the property upon divorce?

NOTE: Applicants answering this question in a community property state should use community property principles. For this purpose, the phrase "marital property" means community property.

DISCUSSION

Summary: The real estate business, the joint bank account, the jointly titled family home, and the pension are all subject to division as "marital property" because they were acquired with funds earned by a spouse during the marriage. In most states, Wendy's stock would not be subject to division because it was acquired by inheritance and is Wendy's separate property. However, a minority of states allow courts to divide even this separate property.

Most states would not consider Harold's affair with Carol relevant to the division of property but would consider Harold's large gifts to Carol as relevant.

All equitable distribution statutes require consideration of both need and contribution. Wendy's homemaking services would be relevant because they provide a basis for arguments about both her need and contribution. Wendy and Harold will make very different arguments about how Wendy's role as a homemaker and mother should affect property distribution. Ultimately, it is impossible to predict the weight the court would place on Wendy's contribution or her need in making the overall property award.

Point One:
(25-35%) All of Harold and Wendy's assets that were acquired with funds earned by Harold during the marriage are marital property subject to division on divorce. Wendy's stock, which was acquired by inheritance, would be subject to division only in those states that authorize the division of all property.

A majority of states require the court to first classify the property held at the time of the divorce as marital or separate and authorize the court then to divide the marital property. In the eight community property states, community property is treated much the same as marital property. Definitions of marital and community property are nearly identical. Homer H. Clark, Jr. & Ann L. Estin, DOMESTIC RELATIONS: CASES AND PROBLEMS 732 (6th ed. 2000). As a result, all states will allow the court to distribute marital or community property, which includes all property derived from earnings during the marriage. See American Law Institute, PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF FAMILY DISSOLUTION ' 4.03, Proposed Final Draft, Part I (1997).

All of the property, except Wendy's stock, will be considered marital property in a common-law state or community property in a community property state. The real estate business, the pension, the jointly titled family home, and the joint bank account were acquired with spousal earnings. How the assets are titled is irrelevant.

Wendy's stock will not be subject to division in the majority of states. It is Wendy's separate property because Wendy inherited it. See ALI PRINCIPLES, supra, ' 4.03. An inheritance is the separate property of the spouse who inherits it, even if the spouse acquires it during the marriage. Id.

A minority of states (about fourteen) authorize the courts to divide all the property held by the spouses at the time of divorce without regard to when, how, or by whom the property was acquired or how the title was held—the so-called “hotchpot” approach. See Uniform Marriage and Divorce Act (UMDA) ' 307, Alternative A, 9 U.L.A. (Part I) 288 (1988). In those states, the stock will be subject to division.

Point Two: In the majority of jurisdictions, adultery is not relevant to division of property at divorce, but dissipation of assets is relevant. Harold's large gifts to Carol would qualify as dissipation.
(20-25%)

The majority of states do not allow for consideration of adultery in the division of property. Harry Krause, FAMILY LAW 163 (2d ed. 1996). A minority of states could consider Harold's adultery when making a division of property. See Ira Mark Ellman, Paul M. Kurtz & Elizabeth S. Scott, FAMILY LAW: CASES, TEXT, PROBLEMS 284 (3d ed. 1998) (citing those few states in which the courts will consider adultery as a factor in property division). Therefore, in most jurisdictions the fact that Harold had an affair would not be relevant to the property distribution.

In virtually all states, however, “economic” fault, including dissipation of marital assets, is relevant to property distribution. See Ellman, Kurtz & Scott, supra, at 414 (mentioning “general agreement that dissipation of assets is a relevant factor in the equitable distribution of property”). See also Uniform Marriage and Divorce Act (UMDA) ' 307, Alt. A. (directing a court to divide property “without regard to marital misconduct,” yet to consider, inter alia, “the contribution or dissipation of each party in the acquisition, preservation, depreciation, or appreciation in the value of the respective estates”).

Dissipation is generally thought to be “the use of marital property for the sole benefit of one of the spouses for a purpose unrelated to the marriage at a time that the marriage is undergoing an irreconcilable breakdown.” In re Marriage of O’Neill, 563 N.E.2d 494, 497 (Ill. 1990). Harold’s expenditures on Carol were large, were for a nonmarital purpose, inured solely to the benefit of Harold, and were made during the breakdown of the marriage. Therefore, these expenditures would be relevant in dividing the property. The remedy would be either to include the value of the gifts to Carol in the marital estate or to consider the dissipation when making the ultimate distribution of the remaining property. Ellman, Kurtz & Scott, supra, at 416.

Point Three: In most jurisdictions, Wendy’s role as a homemaker and parent would be (20-25%) relevant to equitable property distribution, both as a contribution to the marriage and as an indicator of need.

In all equitable distribution states, spousal contribution and need are the primary factors in property division. Homemaking and parenting are recognized forms of spousal contribution. These same services, when they substitute for paid employment over a lengthy period, will also evidence a spouse’s need. See ALI PRINCIPLES. Therefore, Wendy’s services would provide the basis for two different types of property distribution arguments.

Most states do not assign any particular value to homemaking services and would permit Harold to argue that Wendy’s contribution was minimal, given her modest homemaking skills and heavy reliance on paid help. See Ferguson v. Ferguson, 639 So. 2d 921 (Miss. 1994); In re Betz, 880 S.W.2d 618 (Mo. Ct. App. 1994); Williams v. Massa, 728 N.E.2d 932, 942 (Mass. 2000). But some equitable distribution states have a presumption that a homemaker’s contribution is equal to a breadwinner’s and that an equal division is most just. See, e.g., Brown v. Brown, 914 P.2d 206, 209 (Alaska 1996); Or. Rev. Stat. ‘ 107.105(1)(f). Whether such a presumption can be rebutted by evidence that the contribution of the homemaker was not equal to that of the breadwinner varies by state. Compare Wis. Stat. Ann. ‘ 767.255(3)(d) with Hammond v. Brown, 1995 WL 546903, *2 (Ohio App. 8 Dist., Cuyahoga County, Sep. 14, 1995).

Wendy will likely argue that her homemaking contributions played a significant role in the acquisition of the marital property. She would emphasize the fact that her role as a full-time homemaker and parent freed Harold to devote time to building his business. She would also emphasize her services in entertaining Harold’s clients.

Wendy will also argue that her role as a long-term homemaker has greatly increased her need for marital property by reducing her capacity for self-support and asset accumulation. This claim would be difficult for Harold to rebut.

Given that equitable property distribution is highly discretionary, it is impossible to estimate how much weight the court would place on Wendy’s need as compared to her contribution. It is also impossible to determine how the court would evaluate Wendy’s and Harold’s contribution-based arguments.

In the small minority of states that require equal division of marital property, arguments about Wendy’s contribution and need would, of course, be unavailable to both parties.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE I.A, IV.C

Question 4 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Can Husband and Wife join their respective personal injury and loss-of-consortium claims in a single action in the U.S. district court?
 - (2) Can Husband and Wife join their respective claims against the United States and Motorist in a single action in the U.S. district court?
 - (3) Does the U.S. district court have subject matter jurisdiction over the state law claims?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Rule 20(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permits Husband and Wife to assert their federal and state law claims against the United States and Motorist because their claims arose out of the same transaction. Although the court would not have diversity jurisdiction in an action by Husband and Wife against Motorist if such an action were brought on its own, the court has supplemental jurisdiction over that claim because it shares a “common nucleus of operative fact” with Husband and Wife’s federal question claim against the United States.

Point One: Federal Rule 20(a) permits Husband and Wife to join their respective personal (15-25%) injury and loss-of-consortium claims in a single action.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 20(a) permits plaintiffs to join their claims in a single action when those claims arise out of a single event and share at least one common issue of law or fact. The rule provides, in relevant part: All persons may join in one action as plaintiffs if they assert any right to relief jointly, severally, or in the alternative in respect of or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences and if any question of law or fact common to all these persons will arise in the action.

Again, the requirements of Rule 20(a) are clearly met on these facts. The claims of each plaintiff against the United States and Motorist arise out of the same occurrence and involve at least one common issue of fact or law (for example, the extent of Husband’s injuries). When this is so, the Federal Rules permit (but do not require) a party to join two or more defendants in a single action.

NOTE: Rule 20(a) does not confer subject matter jurisdiction on the U.S. district court to hear the respective claims of the plaintiffs. It simply provides the mechanism for joining claims over which the Constitution and the Congress have given it subject matter jurisdiction. Accordingly, the joinder of Husband and Wife as party plaintiffs is proper, provided the U.S. district court has subject matter jurisdiction over the claims by each plaintiff. See Point Three below.

Point Two: Federal Rule 20(a) permits Husband and Wife to join their respective claims (15-25%) against the United States and Motorist in a single action.

Just as Rule 20(a) permits plaintiffs to join in an action, it permits a plaintiff or plaintiffs to join defendants where the plaintiff(s)' claims against each defendant arise from a single transaction and share a common issue of fact or law. The rule provides, in relevant part:

All persons . . . may be joined in one action as defendants if there is asserted against them jointly, severally, or in the alternative, any right to relief . . . arising out of the same . . . occurrence . . . and if any question of law or fact common to all defendants will arise in the action.

Again, the requirements of Rule 20(a) are clearly met on these facts. The claims of each plaintiff against the United States and Motorist arise out of the same occurrence and involve at least one common issue of fact or law (for example, the extent of Husband's injuries). When this is so, the Federal Rules permit (but do not require) a party to join two or more defendants in a single action.

NOTE: As is the case with joinder of plaintiffs, this rule does not confer subject matter jurisdiction on the federal court to hear a claim against a joined defendant. Thus, joinder may be defeated where the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over the joined claim. See Point Three, below.

Point Three: Even though the federal court lacks diversity jurisdiction over Husband's and (50-60%) Wife's claims against Motorist, it has "supplemental jurisdiction" over those claims.

Federal courts are tribunals with limited subject matter jurisdiction in civil cases. Basically, they may decide only "federal question" and "diversity" cases. The claims of Husband and Wife against Motorist do not involve a federal question; they are state tort law claims. Nor do their claims against Motorist qualify for diversity jurisdiction. First, diversity is determined on the date the suit is filed. Although Husband and Wife were citizens of a different state than Motorist on the day of the accident, they were all citizens of State X on the date that suit was filed. Second, their claims do not satisfy the amount in controversy requirement. Neither claim is for an amount in excess of $75,000, so an effort to pursue their claims in a federal court under its diversity jurisdiction would fail.

However, a state cause of action may be heard in a federal court under supplemental jurisdiction (formerly termed "ancillary" or "pendent" jurisdiction). Where a party has both a federal question claim and a state law claim and both claims arise out of a common nucleus of operative fact, it has long been recognized that the federal court may, in the interest of the economical and efficient administration of justice, decide both the federal and the state claims in a single action. See United Mine Workers v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715 (1966).

Subsection (a) of Section 1367 of the Judicial Code authorizes a federal court to exercise “supplemental jurisdiction” over any state law claim that has a nucleus of operative fact in common with a claim that is itself within the subject matter jurisdiction of the federal court. The statute not only codifies the “pendent claim” jurisdiction as formulated in the Gibbs case, but the final sentence of subsection (a) expands supplemental jurisdiction expressly to include “pendent party” jurisdiction. “Such supplemental jurisdiction,” the statute reads, “shall include claims that involve the joinder or intervention of additional parties.”

Accordingly, since the State X tort claims of Husband and Wife against Motorist arise out of the same occurrence as their federal question claims against the United States, the federal court in State X has supplemental jurisdiction over these State X claims. The claims against Motorist share a “common nucleus of operative fact” with the claims against the United States, and it is reasonable to expect them to be resolved in one action. Under such circumstances, the courts have routinely held that 21 U.S.C. ' 1367(a) confers supplemental jurisdiction over such claims. See, e.g., Roche v. John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co., 81 F.3d 249 (1st Cir. 1996); Spiegel v. City of Chicago, 920 F. Supp. 891 (N.D.Ill. 1996) (supplemental jurisdiction appropriate when disparate tort claims arise from same basic occurrence). Thus, even though the state law claims, standing alone, would be outside the court’s subject matter jurisdiction, they may be joined to the case against the United States, over which the court has exclusive jurisdiction pursuant to the Federal Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C. ' 1346(b).

NOTE: The statute gives the court discretion to reject claims on prudential grounds, including when the pendent claims raise novel issues of state law, when they substantially predominate over the claims over which the federal court has original jurisdiction, when the claims over which the court had original jurisdiction have all been dismissed, or in other “exceptional circumstances.” However, none of these prudential reasons for denying supplemental jurisdiction is present on our facts.

Question 5 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did First Bank properly perfect its security interest in PC's equipment so that it has priority over a subsequent lien creditor?
 - (2) Does First Bank's financing statement claiming a security interest in PC's accounts receivable give it a claim to those accounts when the security agreement does not mention those accounts and the financing statement was filed without PC's authorization?
 - (3) Is First Bank liable for any damages PC sustained as a result of First Bank's filing of an overbroad financing statement and its subsequent refusal to terminate or amend the statement?

DISCUSSION

Summary: First Bank will prevail over Luke, the subsequent lien creditor, if First Bank had a prior, perfected security interest in the disputed equipment. First Bank had a prior, perfected interest in PC's equipment, but not in PC's accounts receivable. Thus, First Bank prevails as to the equipment, but not as to the accounts receivable. Luke prevails as to the accounts receivable. Moreover, because First Bank improperly filed a financing statement covering PC's accounts, First Bank is liable to PC for any damages caused by that improper filing.

Point One: (25-35%) Because PC had authenticated a security agreement granting First Bank a security interest in PC's equipment, First Bank perfected its security interest by filing, even though PC did not specifically authorize First Bank to file a financing statement. To that extent, First Bank had priority over Luke as to PC's equipment.

As between a lien creditor and a secured party, the secured party has the superior claim to a debtor's assets if the secured party has a perfected security interest that predates the judicial lien. In this case, First Bank obtained a security interest in PC's equipment, filed a financing statement covering the equipment, and advanced funds to PC on the strength of that arrangement. As a result, First Bank had a perfected security interest in PC's equipment. Moreover, these steps were taken before Luke acquired a lien against PC's assets. Consequently, First Bank has the superior claim to PC's equipment. Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) ' 9-201 (except as otherwise provided in the UCC, a security agreement is effective against other creditors of the debtor); ' 9-317(a)(2) (a lien creditor prevails over a secured party only if the lien creditor obtains an interest before security interest is perfected).

It makes no difference that PC did not sign or expressly authorize the filing of the financing statement. Under the old version of Article 9, financing statements were required to be signed by the debtor. Under new Article 9, the debtor's signature is not necessary. See UCC ' 9-502(a) and comment 3. Although filings must still be authorized by the debtor, see UCC ' 9-509(a), the debtor's authentication of a security agreement covering particular collateral is ipso facto an authorization for the secured party to file a financing statement covering that collateral. UCC ' 9-509(b)(1) and comment 4. Because PC authenticated a security agreement granting First Bank a security interest in equipment, First Bank was entitled to file a financing statement covering equipment, which was effective to perfect First Bank's interest.

Point Two: Luke has a superior claim to PC's accounts because First Bank had no security (25-35%) interest in the accounts and the inclusion of the accounts in its financing statement was unauthorized and ineffective.

First Bank has no security interest in PC's accounts. To obtain a security interest in a debtor's assets, a creditor must receive the debtor's agreement to grant such an interest. In general, no security interest will attach to collateral unless "the debtor has authenticated a security agreement that provides a description of the collateral." UCC ' 9-203(b)(3)(A). Here, First Bank has absolutely no claim to a security interest in PC's accounts because the PC-First Bank security agreement did not include accounts receivable in the description of collateral, but mentioned only equipment. There is nothing in the facts to suggest that there was any intention to include accounts. To the contrary, the facts suggest that the security interest was intentionally limited to equipment.

If no security interest has attached, it cannot be perfected no matter what the creditor does. See UCC ' 9-308(a). Here, no security interest ever attached to the accounts. Because First Bank has no security interest in the accounts and no other basis for claiming a property interest in the accounts, Luke's interest prevails.

The financing statement does not help First Bank in this regard because it is not a security agreement and, also, because it was overbroad. First Bank did not have the right to file a financing statement covering additional collateral unless PC authorized such a filing, which PC did not. A financing statement is effective "only to the extent that it was filed by a person that may file it." UCC ' 9-510. Because First Bank was not entitled to file a financing statement covering PC's accounts receivable, the financing statement is not effective to cover those accounts. See UCC ' 9-317(a)(2). Thus, Luke has a superior claim to the accounts receivable.

Point Three: First Bank violated Article 9 by filing an overbroad financing statement and (25-35%) by refusing to correct that filing. As a result, it is liable to PC for any loss caused by those violations, including losses caused by PC's inability to secure financing from Second Bank.

Revised Article 9 provides generally that "a person is liable for damages in the amount of any loss caused by a failure to comply with this article." UCC ' 9-625(b) (emphasis added). Damages may be recovered by a person who is a debtor at the time of the failure of compliance with Article 9. UCC ' 9-625(c).

On our facts, First Bank filed an overbroad financing statement. The problem, as noted earlier, is that First Bank had no express authorization from the debtor to file the financing statement, and the authorization provided ipso facto by debtor's authentication of a security agreement extended only to the collateral mentioned in the security agreement, equipment. See UCC ' 9-509(a), (b). Hence, by filing an overbroad financing statement, First Bank violated its "duty to refrain from filing [an] unauthorized financing statement." UCC ' 9-625, cmt. 2. See UCC ' 9-509(a) (a secured party may file a financing statement only if authorized). Moreover, a secured party has a duty to terminate an unauthorized filing when termination is requested by the debtor. UCC ' 9-513(c)(4). First Bank also failed to comply with this duty.

First Bank is liable for any loss caused to PC by its breach of these duties. Recoverable losses include losses "resulting from the debtor's inability to obtain . . . alternative financing." UCC ' 9-625(b). In this case, those losses may be substantial. First Bank's overbroad financing statement made it impossible for PC to secure a loan from Second Bank. PC's inability to secure financing for its business expansion prevented it from adequately servicing its contracts. As a result, the City of Eden canceled its contract, which had been expected to yield significant revenue for PC. PC must, of course, establish both the amount of the loss and that the loss was caused by First Bank's failure to comply with the Code. Moreover, damages should be limited to an amount "reasonably calculated to put [PC] in the position that it would have occupied had no violation occurred." UCC ' 9-625, cmt. 3.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP II.A, II.B, VIII.A., IX.A, IX.B

Question 6 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Does the statement “I don’t want to do this anymore. I am quitting this partnership,” made by one partner, dissolve an “at will” partnership?
 - (2) May a partner bind a partnership to a contract made after dissolution?
 - (3) What is a partner’s liability for partnership obligations?

DISCUSSION

Summary: The effect of Randy’s “quitting” is to dissolve the partnership and to put it in a “winding up” period, at the conclusion of which it terminates. As the partnership had already dissolved, Sandy lacked actual authority to enter into the contract with Barney on behalf of the partnership. All the same, the partnership is bound by the contract with Barney because Sandy still had apparent authority to bind the partnership. Because they did not agree otherwise, Randy and Sandy share losses equally. Because Sandy paid the trade creditors, she is entitled to a $15,000 contribution from Randy.

Point One: (35-40%) Randy’s statement “I don’t want to do this anymore. I am quitting this partnership,” dissolves the “at will” partnership. This begins a period of winding up (liquidation) during which time the partnership affairs are settled. Once winding up is complete, the partnership terminates.

The facts do not indicate that the partnership had a definite term or limited undertaking. Therefore, this was an “at will” partnership. Any partner may dissolve an “at will” partnership by his or her express will.

Under the Uniform Partnership Act (UPA), dissolution occurs when the parties cease to associate in carrying on the business together. See UPA ' 29 (“The dissolution of a partnership is the change in the relation of the partners caused by any partner ceasing to be associated in the carrying on as distinguished from the winding up of the business.”). “On dissolution the partnership is not terminated but continues until the winding up of partnership affairs is completed.” UPA ' 30. Winding up is “the process of settling partnership affairs after dissolution.” Official Comment to ' 29. Once all partnership affairs have been settled, the partnership terminates.

When Randy told Sandy “I don’t want to do this anymore. I am quitting this partnership,” Randy dissolved the partnership. The partnership must now undergo a period of winding up (i.e., completing the remaining business and settling debts). Once this is done, the partnership is terminated.

Under the Revised Uniform Partnership Act (RUPA), Randy’s statement is an event of dissociation. Sandy has “notice of the partner’s express will to withdraw as a partner.” RUPA ‘ 601(1). Therefore, under RUPA ‘ 801(1) Randy’s statement dissolves the partnership and the business must be wound up. Pursuant to RUPA ‘ 802, “a partnership continues after dissolution only for the purpose of winding up its business. The partnership is terminated when the winding up of its business is completed.”

Point Two: The partnership is probably bound by Sandy’s contract with Barney, even (35-40%) though it occurred after dissolution, because Sandy had apparent authority to enter into the contract.

Under the UPA, upon dissolution, a partner’s actual authority to bind the partnership terminates except as is necessary to wind up the business. See UPA ‘ 33. The contract with Barney was for new business. When Randy dissolved the partnership (see Point One, above), Sandy’s actual authority to enter into a contract for new business ended.

Under the RUPA, upon dissolution, a “partnership is bound by a partner’s act after dissolution that . . . is appropriate for winding up the partnership business.” RUPA ‘ 804. As indicated above, the contract with Barney was for new business. There is an exception under RUPA ‘ 803(c) that permits a partner who has not wrongfully dissociated to preserve the partnership business as a going concern for a reasonable period of time. These facts do not come within this exception. To date, the business has existed for only a year and it only had short-term contracts remaining. The contract with Barney was a long-term contract (three years).

While Sandy lacked actual authority to contract with Barney, under both the UPA and the RUPA, Sandy likely had apparent authority to bind the partnership after dissolution, so long as Barney was not aware of the dissolution and reasonably believed that Sandy was authorized to act. See UPA ‘ 35(1) (“After dissolution a partner can bind the partnership . . . by any transaction which would bind the partnership if dissolution had not taken place, provided the other party to the transaction . . . though he had not so extended credit, had nevertheless known of the partnership prior to dissolution, and had no knowledge or notice of dissolution . . .”); RUPA ‘ 804(2) (“a partnership is bound by a partner’s act after dissolution that . . . (2) would have bound the partnership under ‘ 301 before dissolution, if the other party to the transaction did not have notice of the dissolution”). RUPA ‘ 301(1) provides a partner with apparent authority to carry on in the ordinary course the partnership’s business unless the other party to the transaction knows that there is no authority.

The facts support the conclusion that Sandy had apparent authority to enter into the contract. Even though Barney had not previously done business with the partnership, the facts state that he was familiar with the partnership. Sandy, on behalf of the partnership, had been soliciting a long-term contract from him for over a month. Sandy was acting in the ordinary course of the partnership's business when soliciting a contract for widgets. Further, Barney was not aware of the dissolution. Therefore, the partnership is probably bound by Sandy's contract with Barney.

Point Three: Because there is no agreement to the contrary, when Sandy paid $30,000 to the (15-25%) trade creditors, Sandy became entitled to a contribution of $15,000 from Randy.

When Sandy paid the entire $30,000 debt to the trade creditors, she became entitled to contribution of $15,000 from Randy. Among partners, unless the parties agree otherwise, profits are shared equally and losses are shared in the same ratio as profits. See UPA ' 18(a) ("Each partner shall . . . share equally in the profits . . . and must contribute towards the losses . . . according to his share in the profits."); RUPA ' 401(b) ("Each partner is entitled to an equal share of the partnership profits and is chargeable with a share of the partnership losses in proportion to the partner's share of the profits."). Regardless of the fact that Randy contributed twice as much capital ($10,000) as Sandy ($5,000) to the partnership, the facts indicate that they shared profits equally. Because they did not agree otherwise, Randy and Sandy would share losses in the same ratio as they shared profits.

TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS I.I, II.F

Question 7 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Does the bequest under Testator's will violate the Rule Against Perpetuities?
 - (2) Did Friend improperly delegate her duties to Bank?
 - (3) Did Bank, acting as agent of Friend, improperly invest the trust assets by failing to diversify the trust investments such that Friend, as trustee, is liable for any losses resulting from such failure?

DISCUSSION

Summary: The bequest to great-grandchildren under Testator's will is invalid under the common-law Rule Against Perpetuities but valid under the wait-and-see doctrine because it actually vested before the perpetuity period had expired. Friend, as trustee of the revocable trust, breached the duty not to delegate and the duty to diversify trust investments and is liable for the resulting losses.

Point One: (20-30%) The bequest under Testator's will would be void under the common-law Rule Against Perpetuities. However, the bequest is valid under the governing wait-and-see doctrine because it vested two months after Testator's death. Thus, the estate passes to Testator's great-grandchildren who are alive when the will is probated.

Under the common-law Rule Against Perpetuities, "no interest is good unless it must vest, if at all, no later than twenty-one years after some life in being at the creation of the interest." John C. Gray, RULE AGAINST PERPETUITIES ' 201 (4th ed. 1942). Furthermore, under the common-law rule, if there was any possibility, however improbable, that an interest might vest too remotely, that interest would be invalid even though in fact it actually vested in a timely manner.

For testamentary bequests, as here, the nonvested interest is deemed created at Testator's death. Thus, the testamentary gift to great-grandchildren is void if there is any possibility it could become possessory more than 21 years after the death of any of Testator's issue who survived him, a possibility that could occur here. For example, within one year after Testator died all of his issue who survived him except the 27-year-old grandchild could die. While that is improbable, it is certainly possible. Then the 27-year-old grandchild who survived Testator could have a child who would be a great-grandchild of Testator. And, then the 27-year-old grandchild could die. At this point, all of Testator's issue who survived him are dead, leaving only the later born great-grandchild. Then, 22 years later (more than 21 years after the death of all relevant lives) Testator's will could be probated. This would result (but for the Rule) in the gift vesting in Testator's great-grandchildren living when his will was probated. However, since this vesting occurs, as hypothesized, beyond the permissible period, the gift is invalid. It bears repeating that a nonvested interest is invalid if it might have vested too remotely even if, in fact, as here, that did not occur because Testator's will was probated two months after Testator died.

An invalid residuary gift is stricken from the will, and absent an alternative valid gift, the residue passes to the Testator's heirs, here Angela and Brian, his only two children.

This jurisdiction, however, has enacted the wait-and-see rule. Under the wait-and-see rule, the gift to the great-grandchildren is valid if it in fact vests within the perpetuity period. Here the will was probated two months after Testator died. Thus, the gift to the great-grandchildren vests in a timely manner. See generally Merchants National Bank v. Curtis, 97 A.2d 207 (N.H. 1953).

Point Two: (35-45%) A trustee is responsible for administering the trust. Accordingly, at common law it is a breach of trust to delegate to a third party significant and discretionary duties, such as the duties to make distributions and investments. Under one or more Uniform Acts, however, at least the trustee's investment duty is delegable to a third party, although a breach of trust for that delegation could nonetheless occur for failing to properly supervise the third party.

The selection by the settlor of a trust of another person to act as a trustee evidences the settlor's trust and confidence in the designated trustee to properly administer the trust, including deciding what, if any, discretionary distributions of trust property should be made to beneficiaries, and how trust assets should be invested. Flowing from this confidence is the duty to exercise due care and the duty not to delegate those duties that the trustee can reasonably be expected to perform. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS ' 171.

According to the Restatement, a trustee cannot "delegate to another power to select investments." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS, ' 171, cmt. h. According to Scott, "if . . . [the trustee] entrusts funds to the agent for this purpose and through the . . . negligence of the agent the funds are lost, the trustee is personally liable." SCOTT'S ABRIDGEMENT OF THE LAW OF TRUSTS ' 171.2 (1960).

Similarly, Friend, as trustee, cannot delegate such an important function as determining how the trust property shall be distributed among the named beneficiaries, because this is an act that, in light of all the circumstances, it would appear Testator expected Friend to perform. Thus, Friend's discretionary power, as trustee, to distribute trust principal to the income beneficiaries cannot be delegated to Bank. See generally RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS ' 171, cmt. d.

Under the Uniform Trust Code, however, a trustee can delegate such duties that "a prudent trustee of comparable skills could properly delegate under the circumstances." Unif. Trust Code ' 807. Accord RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS ' 171 (1992). Likewise, under ' 9 of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act and ' 3(2) of the Uniform Trustee's Powers Act, a trustee is given broad authority to delegate trust duties, effectively abrogating the common-law and Second Restatement nondelegation rule, at least where a delegation would be deemed prudent under the circumstances. Nonetheless, it is highly unlikely that a prudent trustee who was a longtime friend of Testator's family and who presumably best knew how to make discretionary distributions among Testator's issue would delegate that function to a corporate agent that had no familiarity with Testator's family.

On the other hand, the Uniform Trust Code and Uniform Prudent Investor Act clearly contemplate the complete delegation of the trustee's investment responsibilities so long as the trustee exercises reasonable care, skill, and caution in selecting the agent and "periodically . . . [reviews] the agent's actions in order to monitor the agent's performance and compliance with the terms of the delegation." Unif. Trust Code '807(a)(3). Accord RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS ' 171 (1992). Here, there may have been a proper delegation but there is also lack of supervision, which brings Friend outside of the protection of the Third Restatement's black letter rule. See also Point Three.

Point Three: Friend probably acted imprudently with respect to the trust investments by (35-45%) failing in her oversight responsibilities to require that the trust investments be diversified.

"A trustee shall diversify the investments of the trust unless the trustee reasonably determines that, because of special circumstances, the purposes of the trust are better served without diversifying." Unif. Prudent Investor Act ' 3. Accord RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS ' 228. This rule reflects the time-honored principle that it is inappropriate to put all of your eggs into one basket. While in a limited number of instances diversification may not be necessary, none of them appear relevant here.

The rationale for diversification is clear. "Diversification reduces risk . . . [because] stock price movements are not uniform. They are imperfectly correlated. This means that if one holds a well-diversified portfolio, the gains in one investment will cancel out the losses in another." Jonathan R. Macey, AN INTRODUCTION TO MODERN FINANCIAL THEORY 20 (American College of Trust and Estate Counsel Foundation, 1991).

Even though it was Bank that failed to diversify, Friend, as trustee, is liable for this failure because (1) Bank was Friend's agent and (2) Friend, as trustee, had a duty to oversee the acts of the agent, including the duty to assure that investments were made in a prudent manner. See Unif. Prudent Investor Act ' 9(a)(3) (trustee must exercise care, skill and caution in "periodically reviewing the agent's actions in order to monitor the agent's performance and compliance with the terms of the delegation"). Friend can be liable for the failure to diversify even though Friend committed no breach of trust by initially delegating her investment duties to Bank.

July 2004
Questions

Question 1

Five years ago, Settlor created an irrevocable trust (the “Settlor Trust”). The trust provided that Trustee should pay annually “all of the trust income to my son Zack for life, with Zack to use such income to send Zack’s children to college.” The trust instrument further provided that, upon Zack’s death, Trustee should “distribute the trust corpus in equal shares to Zack’s children, issue of any deceased child to take his or her parent’s share.”

When Settlor Trust was created, Zack was married to Spouse. Zack and Spouse had three living children, Abel, age 23; Brian, age 19; and Carrie, age 15. Abel had one living child, Grandchild. Neither Brian, a college student, nor Carrie, a high-school student, was married or had children.

Two years later, Zack and Spouse had another child, Debbie. Following Debbie’s birth, Zack stopped paying Brian’s college expenses and told Carrie that he would not pay her future college expenses.

Trustee distributed last year’s trust income to Zack. Shortly thereafter, Abel, Carrie, and Zack were all killed in an automobile accident. None of them had a will. Zack had not spent any of last year’s income distribution. Zack was survived by Spouse, Brian, Debbie, and Grandchild.

Under state law, Abel and Carrie are deemed to have predeceased Zack. State law also provides that an intestate’s estate passes to the intestate’s spouse and children in equal shares or, if there is no surviving spouse or children, to the intestate’s parents in equal shares or, if there is no surviving parent, to the intestate’s siblings.

1. Can Brian impress a trust upon the income distributed to Zack from Settlor Trust to pay for Brian’s college education? Explain.
2. To whom, and in what shares, should the principal of Settlor Trust be distributed? Explain.

Question 2

Zeta, Inc., is a corporation with 80,000 shares outstanding. Its articles of incorporation provide for a nine-person board of directors, with staggered three-year terms. Three directors are elected each year. Zeta's articles require cumulative voting. Therefore, when electing the three directors, each share is entitled to three votes, meaning that there are 240,000 votes eligible to be cast. Accordingly, a person who receives at least 60,001 votes would be elected a director. Neither the articles nor Zeta's bylaws contain any other provisions concerning elections, voting, or removal of directors.

Diane is one of Zeta's directors. Although Diane's term does not expire for another two years, at the request of a group of shareholders, Zeta has scheduled a special shareholders' meeting on September 1 to consider removing Diane from office. Proper notice of that meeting has been given to all of Zeta's shareholders.

Sam owns 16,000 of the 80,000 outstanding Zeta shares. On August 1, Sam gave Arnie a proxy to vote Sam's shares at the special meeting. The proxy signed by Sam stated that it was "irrevocable."

On August 15, Betty, another Zeta shareholder, convinced Sam that giving a proxy to Arnie was a mistake. Sam then signed another proxy, dated August 15, which revoked the proxy to Arnie and gave Betty the right to vote Sam's 16,000 shares.

At the special shareholders' meeting on September 1, the shareholders in favor of Diane's removal argued that Diane was too critical of the company's management at board meetings and was "rocking the boat." No one alleged any breach of duty or other wrongdoing by Diane. Both Arnie and Betty attempted to vote Sam's shares by proxy. Counting Arnie's vote of Sam's shares, the result was 117,000 votes to remove Diane and 123,000 votes not to remove her. Counting Betty's vote of Sam's shares, the result was 165,000 votes to remove Diane and 75,000 votes not to remove her.

Zeta's corporate secretary ruled that Diane was not removed as a director because: (1) no valid cause was shown for removing Diane and showing cause was required to remove her; (2) Arnie was entitled to vote Sam's shares and removal therefore failed by a vote of 117,000 votes to remove Diane and 123,000 votes not to remove her; and (3) even if Betty had the right to vote Sam's shares, the resulting vote of 165,000 votes to remove Diane and 75,000 votes not to remove her was insufficient to remove Diane.

Was each of these three rulings correct? Explain.

Question 3

Husband and Wife were married for 12 years. The couple had one child, Boy, age 7. Husband and Wife were both devoted parents.

Wife filed for divorce shortly after she learned that Husband and Secretary were having an affair. In the divorce action, Husband and Wife each sought sole custody of Boy.

The court appointed a child custody evaluator. Both parents told the evaluator they were not willing or able to share custody. Boy told the evaluator that he was very upset because his parents were getting a divorce and that he wanted to live with his father. Based upon the child custody evaluator's recommendation, the court awarded Husband sole custody of Boy and gave Wife liberal visitation rights. Neither party appealed this decree. Husband's and Wife's relationship has remained bitter and hostile.

Three months after the custody decree was filed, Secretary moved into Husband's house. Immediately thereafter, Wife filed a petition seeking to modify the custody decree and obtain sole custody of Boy.

At a hearing on Wife's petition, Boy testified, "I miss my mom and I am sad that my parents are divorced." Husband testified that there had been no change in Boy's behavior since Secretary moved into his home and that Boy got along well with Secretary. Wife testified that Boy should not be exposed to his father's nonmarital cohabitation. There was no other testimony. Neither Husband nor Wife sought joint custody.

The court modified the custody decree and awarded Husband and Wife joint custody. Under the modified decree, Boy will reside with each parent for alternating two-week periods and the parents will share decision-making responsibilities. The court held that "this arrangement will give Boy the best of both parents and allow each parent to counteract any negative influence on Boy by the other parent."

Husband appeals the court's determination.

1. Did the court err in modifying the custody decree? Explain.
2. Did the court err in awarding joint custody? Explain.

Question 4

Decedent and his only child, Clara, died as the result of an accident when Clara's car was struck from the rear by a truck. Clara was driving and Decedent was riding in the back seat directly behind her. The emergency medical team that arrived at the accident scene found no evidence that either of them was alive. The emergency room physician examined their bodies as they were being removed from the ambulance. She first pronounced Decedent dead and then pronounced Clara dead.

Clara was survived by her spouse, Son-in-Law, who was named as the sole beneficiary of her estate under her duly probated will. Clara had no descendants.

Decedent died intestate leaving an estate of approximately $300,000. Decedent left no surviving spouse. Decedent's parents had predeceased him by many years. Decedent's closest surviving relatives are:

1. a brother, Brother;
2. a half-sister, Half-Sister, who is related to Decedent through a common mother;
3. an adopted sister, Adopted-Sister, who was adopted by Decedent's parents; and
4. his paternal grandfather, Gramps.

Three years before Decedent died, he gave Brother a check for $90,000 to enable Brother to buy a new home.

Among Son-in-Law, Brother, Half-Sister, Adopted-Sister, and Gramps, who will share in Decedent's estate, and what is the value of the share each will receive? Explain.

Question 5

Best Care Hospital, one of five hospitals in City, operates the largest emergency room in City. Best Care advertises extensively about the quality of care provided in its emergency room. It has billboards strategically placed throughout City urging local citizens to come to Best Care “because Best Care’s emergency room doctors are the absolute best and will really care for you.” In fact, Best Care employs no doctors; instead it contracts with seven doctors in City to staff the emergency room on a 7-day, 24-hour basis. These contracts provide:

1. Each doctor is an “independent contractor,” not an “agent/employee,” and may conduct a private practice but may not work in any other emergency room;
2. Each doctor is responsible for the manner in which he or she provides medical care and for the purchase of malpractice insurance;
3. Each doctor is authorized to purchase supplies and equipment for Best Care’s emergency room from a list of approved vendors located in City and within Best Care’s price guidelines;
4. Each doctor is periodically reviewed by Best Care’s governing board to assure that each doctor provides quality care;
5. Each doctor independently bills patients for services provided; and
6. All emergency services are performed in the Best Care emergency room using supplies and equipment provided by Best Care.

Three months ago, Owen, a local orthopedist and one of the doctors with whom Best Care contracts, ordered a portable X-ray machine costing $25,000 from Vision, a company located in a town 450 miles from City. Vision is not on Best Care’s approved vendor list and Owen did not consult with anyone at Best Care before he placed the order. When Owen ordered the machine, which was to be custom-designed for Best Care, he truthfully told Vision that he was one of the seven emergency room doctors at Best Care and needed the machine for the emergency room. Owen also stated that he was acting on behalf of Best Care. Vision had had no previous dealings with Owen or Best Care and agreed to make the machine according to the custom specifications provided by Owen. When Vision shipped the X-ray machine, Best Care refused to accept delivery, even though the price for the machine was within its price guidelines. Best Care claimed that Owen had no authority to purchase the machine on its behalf. Vision filed an action for breach of contract against Best Care.

Last month, Anita was hit by a bus. When the ambulance arrived, Anita asked the ambulance driver to take her to Best Care, quoting the billboard claim that “Best Care’s emergency room doctors are the absolute best.” When Anita arrived at the emergency room, she was treated by Owen. Owen correctly told Anita that she needed immediate surgery. During the operation, Owen negligently severed one of Anita’s arteries, and she bled to death. Anita’s estate has filed a wrongful death action against Owen and Best Care for damages resulting from Owen’s negligence.

1. Is Owen an independent contractor or servant (employee) of Best Care? Explain.
2. Is Best Care liable to Vision for breach of contract? Explain.
3. Assuming Owen is an independent contractor, is Best Care liable to Anita's estate for Owen's negligence? Explain.

Question 6

Plaintiff, a domiciliary of State X, was severely injured in a car accident in State X. Tortfeasor, the uninsured owner and driver of the other vehicle involved in the accident, was also a citizen of State X. Before any litigation regarding the accident began, Tortfeasor died of a heart attack.

Following Tortfeasor's death, Plaintiff commenced an action against Executor, the legal representative of Tortfeasor's estate. Executor is a citizen of State Y. Plaintiff sued Executor in the federal district court of State Y. The complaint, which alleged that Tortfeasor's negligence caused the accident and Plaintiff's injuries, sought damages in excess of $500,000.

Executor answered the complaint, denying the allegations of negligence but admitting the court's subject matter jurisdiction. A year later, however, after extensive discovery, Executor moved to dismiss the complaint for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. After the submission of briefs and oral argument on the jurisdictional issue, the federal court denied Executor's motion to dismiss, ruling that "jurisdiction exists and, in any event, the motion was untimely." A trial was held and the jury rendered a verdict in Plaintiff's favor for $80,000.

The federal court entered judgment on the verdict. No appeal was taken.

When Executor declined to pay the judgment, Plaintiff commenced suit in a state court in State X to enforce the federal judgment. In the state suit, Executor challenged the validity of the judgment, claiming that the federal district court of State Y lacked subject matter jurisdiction.

1. Did the federal district court of State Y err in denying Executor's motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction? Explain.
2. Should the state court in State X enforce the federal judgment? Explain.

Question 7

Seller is in the business of selling new and used road construction equipment. On January 15, Buyer, a road builder, entered into a written purchase agreement with Seller for the sale of a used excavator for $100,000. The purchase agreement provided that Seller would add certain attachments to the excavator. The cost of the attachments was included in the purchase price. Buyer and Seller agreed that the specially equipped excavator would be ready for Buyer by April 5, in time for the start of the road construction season.

When Buyer signed the contract, Buyer gave Seller a $25,000 down payment. The remaining $75,000 was to be paid as follows: $25,000 on March 1; $25,000 on April 1; and $25,000 on May 1.

On January 20, Seller borrowed $1 million from Finance Co. to finance Seller's business operations. Finance Co. obtained a properly perfected security interest specifically assigning to Finance Co. all payments from Seller's accounts receivable and chattel paper.

On February 20, Seller failed to make a payment due on its loan from Finance Co. Finance Co. declared Seller in default. However, it informed Seller that it would not require immediate repayment of the full amount of the loan, but would instead begin collecting payments on all of Seller's outstanding accounts and chattel paper directly from the account debtors.

Finance Co. properly notified Buyer that Seller had assigned to Finance Co. the right to receive payment under the purchase agreement and that Buyer should make all future payments on the purchase agreement directly to Finance Co. However, Seller told Buyer to disregard Finance Co.'s notification and to continue to make payments directly to Seller. Buyer then sent its March and April payments directly to Seller.

On April 5, Buyer went to pick up the excavator from Seller. Buyer discovered that Seller had not equipped the excavator with any of the attachments required by their purchase agreement. Buyer informed Seller that it would take the excavator, despite its non-conformity with the contract, but that it would find and add the necessary attachments itself and would withhold from its final payment the cost of making the goods conform to the contract. Seller stated that it expected full payment but allowed Buyer to take the excavator.

On May 5, Finance Co. demanded that Buyer immediately pay Finance Co. $75,000, the full amount of the March, April, and May payments under the purchase agreement. Buyer refused, asserting that it made the March and April payments to Seller and that no remaining payment was due because the cost of bringing the excavator up to contract specifications exceeded $30,000, substantially more than the amount of the May payment.

How much, if anything, does Buyer owe Finance Co.? Explain.

Question 1 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did the language in Settlor Trust specifying that Zack “use . . . income to send Zack’s children to college” create a trust in favor of Zack’s children?
 - (2) Is Debbie, a child born to Zack after the creation of Settlor Trust, included in the class gift in favor of Zack’s children?
 - (3) Does the share of Settlor Trust that Abel would have taken had Abel survived Zack pass to Abel’s children or to the surviving members of the class?
 - (4) Does the share of Settlor Trust that Carrie would have taken had Carrie survived Zack pass to Carrie’s heirs or to the surviving members of the class?

DISCUSSION

Summary: If Settlor imposed a trust upon Zack to use trust income to send Zack’s children to college, Brian can impress a trust upon the funds distributed to Zack from Settlor Trust. There is a strong, but not conclusive, argument that Settlor did intend to impose a trust upon Zack. Upon Zack’s death, the trust corpus passed to Brian, Spouse, Debbie, and Grandchild. The trust created a vested remainder in a class of persons (Zack’s children) and that class remained opened until Zack’s death. Thus Debbie is included in the class. Class members’ interests were divested only if they failed to survive Zack and had issue who did survive him. Thus, Abel’s share was divested in favor of his issue (Grandchild). Carrie’s share was not divested and passes to her heir, Spouse, except in a state that has adopted § 2-707 of the 1990 Uniform Probate Code (UPC), or a like provision.

Point One: (30-40%) The language of Settlor Trust probably creates a trust for the benefit of Zack’s children in the income of the trust. Thus, Brian can impress a trust upon the income distributed to Zack from Settlor Trust. It can be argued, however, that the college expenses condition was precatory.

Settlor Trust provided that trust income be distributed to Settlor’s son Zack, with Zack “to use such income to send Zack’s children to college.” The question is whether this language merely expressed Settlor’s desire or imposed on Zack a binding obligation in trust. The answer depends on Settlor's intent: a trust is created "only if the settlor properly manifests an intention to create a trust relationship." RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 13.

In order to determine a settlor's intent, the courts consider:

(1) the specific terms and overall tenor of the words used; (2) the definiteness or indefiniteness of the property involved; (3) the ease or difficulty of ascertaining possible trust purposes and terms, and the specificity or vagueness of the possible beneficiaries and their interests; (4) the interests or motives and the nature and degree of concerns that may reasonably be supposed to have influenced the transferor; (5) the financial situation, dependencies, and expectations of the parties; (6) the transferor's prior conduct, statements, and relationships with respect to possible trust beneficiaries; (7) the personal and any fiduciary relationships between the transferor and the transferee; (8) other dispositions the transferor is making or has made of his or her wealth; and (9) whether the result of construing the disposition as involving a trust or not would be such as a person in the situation of the transferor would be likely to desire. Id.

In cases where courts find "precatory language" not evidencing a trust, the settlor has typically used words such as "like," "request," "hope," or "wish" when stating what should be done with the funds. Settlor Trust did not contain such precatory language; instead, it specified that Zack was to use trust income for college expenses. The beneficiaries, purpose, and funds to be used can all be easily identified from the trust instrument. Thus, there is a strong argument that a trust was imposed upon Zack to use trust income for his children's college expenses. If a trust was imposed on Zack, then Brian can impose a trust on the income distributed to Zack before Zack died. It can also be argued that in light of the language in Settlor Trust, Brian could impose a constructive trust on the income distributed to Zack; otherwise Zack would be unjustly enriched.

The question could be argued the other way. Settlor was vague as to the amount to be spent on college, the period for which college expenses were to be paid, etc. Furthermore, Zack was to receive all of the income for life, including the period after which he had no children in college. This might be evidence that the direction to use the income for the children's college education was precatory.

Point Two: Debbie was born before the class gift to Zack's children closed and thus is a (20-30%) member of the class entitled to share in the trust corpus.

Settlor created a class gift in the corpus of Settlor Trust with such gift to become possessory upon Zack's death. A class remains open and may admit new members until at least one class member is entitled to obtain possession of the gift. Because Settlor's class gift did not become possessory until Zack's death, Debbie is a member of the class and entitled to take a share of the corpus. See generally Cornelius J. Moynihan & Sheldon F. Kurtz, INTRODUCTION TO THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY 156 (3d ed. 2002). Debbie's share of the corpus is one-quarter for the reasons described in Points Three and Four.

Point Three: Abel's share of the trust corpus passes to Grandchild as provided by the terms (20-30%) of Settlor Trust.

Settlor Trust expressly provided that the "issue of any deceased child . . . take his or her parent's share." This language in a trust instrument is typically interpreted to mean that, when the life tenant is predeceased by a child who otherwise would have shared in the remainder and that child has issue who survive the life tenant, the deceased child's issue are to take the share that the deceased child would have taken had he survived the life tenant. See, e.g., In re Estate of Houston, 201 A.2d 592 (Pa. 1964). This interpretation seems consistent with Settlor's intent and would result in Grandchild taking Abel's share.

UPC § 2-707 (1990) and similar statutes achieve the same result by different means. Under the 1990 UPC, all future interests in trust, whether or not the gift explicitly requires survival to take, are treated as if they require survival; Abel's interest is thus contingent on Abel's surviving Zack. However, if, as here, the governing instrument creates an alternative gift, then the takers of the alternative gift (the issue of Abel) succeed to that interest despite the implied survival condition. UPC § 2-707(b)(4) (1990).

Point Four: Under the common law, Carrie's interest was vested. Her interest was not (20-30%) divested when she died before Zack because she had no issue who survived Zack.
 Since Carrie died intestate, her share passed to her mother, Spouse, who is her sole heir. Under the 1990 Uniform Probate Code, Carrie's interest would fail and go to Brian, Debbie, and Grandchild, the surviving members of the class.

Under the common law, a remainder interest to children that was not expressly conditioned on survival was not impliedly conditioned on survival. Here, the remainder to children was subject to a survival contingency, but that contingency applied only when the deceased child had issue who survived the life tenant. (See Point Three.) Thus in contrast to Abel's interest, Carrie's interest was not divested because the divesting condition was not applicable as to her. See In re Estate of Houston, 201 A.2d at 599. As Carrie died intestate, her one-quarter interest would pass to Spouse.

UPC § 2-707 (1990) and like statutes produce a different result. Under the 1990 UPC, Carrie's interest is impliedly conditioned on her being alive when Zack's estate terminated. Because she was not alive, her interest failed. And since she had no surviving issue, there is no alternative gift. Accordingly, the share to which Carrie would have been entitled had she survived Zack goes to Brian, Debbie, and Grandchild, in equal shares.

CORPORATIONS V.A.2

Question 2 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Must shareholders show cause to remove a director?
 - (2) May a shareholder revoke a proxy that states it is irrevocable by issuing a subsequent proxy?
 - (3) What vote is required to remove a director when cumulative voting is authorized by the corporation?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Zeta's shareholders may remove Diane without cause so long as they get the appropriate vote. Under cumulative voting, at least 60,001 votes would be sufficient to elect Diane as a director. Diane cannot be removed if the votes cast against removal would be sufficient to elect her as a director at an annual meeting to elect directors. Under either vote, there were sufficient votes cast against removing Diane and thus, she should not be removed.

Sam's proxy to Arnie was revoked when he issued a subsequent proxy to Betty. Even though the proxy stated it was irrevocable, words alone are not sufficient to create an irrevocable proxy. A proxy is only irrevocable if coupled with an interest, and there are no facts to indicate that this proxy was coupled with an interest.

Point One: Shareholders need not show cause to remove a director.
(35-45%)

Under the common law, shareholders had the inherent power to remove a director, but only for cause. See Frank v. Anthony, 107 So. 2d 136 (Fla. Ct. App. 1958); Toledo Traction, Light & Power Co. v. Smith, 205 F. 643 (N.D. Ohio 1913). Cause is defined as substantial grounds, such as directorial breach of duty or malfeasance in office. See Eckhaus v. Ma, 635 F. Supp. 873 (S.D.N.Y. 1986); Doolittle v. Morley, 292 P.2d 476 (Idaho 1956). "Rocking the boat" and being critical of management, as alleged here, do not constitute cause for removal.

However, most modern statutes, including the Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA), permit shareholders to remove a director without cause. See RMBCA § 8.08(a) ("The shareholders may remove one or more directors with or without cause unless the articles of incorporation provide that directors may be removed only for cause"); Mitchell v. Concerned Citizens of CVEC, Inc., 486 So. 2d 1283 (Ala.1986). As Zeta's articles of incorporation contain no special provisions concerning removal of directors, the shareholders may remove Diane without showing cause. Therefore, the first ruling was incorrect.

Point Two: By issuing a subsequent proxy to Betty, Sam revoked the proxy he issued to (35-45%) Arnie, even though the proxy stated it was irrevocable.

Under the common law and state corporation statutes, a proxy is revocable unless it expressly provides that it is irrevocable and the appointment of the proxy is "coupled with an interest." See RMBCA § 7.22(d); Stein v. Capital Outdoor Advertising, Inc., 159 S.E.2d 351 (N.C. 1968); In re Chilson, 168 A. 82 (Del. Ch. 1933). Thus, unless it was coupled with an interest, Sam could revoke the proxy he gave Arnie even though the proxy states it is irrevocable.

The concept of "coupled with an interest" is not completely clear, but, in general, the proxy holder must have "either (1) a charge, lien, or some property right in the shares themselves; or (2) a security interest given to protect the proxy holder for money advanced or obligations incurred." James D. Cox et al., CORPORATIONS 332 (1997). The RMBCA specifies various categories of people who qualify: (1) a pledgee; (2) a person who purchased or agreed to purchase the shares; (3) a creditor of the corporation who extended it credit under terms requiring the appointment; (4) an employee of the corporation whose employment contract requires the appointment; or (5) a party to a voting agreement created under RMBCA § 7.31.

Sam's proxy to Arnie was not coupled with an interest. The facts indicate only that Arnie was Sam's friend. Because the proxy to Arnie was not coupled with an interest, it was revocable in spite of the language to the contrary.

Where two or more revocable proxies have been given, the last given revokes all previous proxies. FLETCHERS CYCLOPEDIA OF PRIVATE CORPORATIONS § 2026. When Sam gave Betty a proxy on August 15, he revoked the proxy he had given to Arnie on August 1. Therefore, the second ruling was incorrect. Betty was entitled to vote Sam's shares.

Point Three: Under cumulative voting, a director is not removed if the number of votes cast (10-20%) against removal would be sufficient to elect the director at an annual meeting. Here, the number of votes cast against Diane's removal would have been sufficient to assure her election. Diane would not be removed under either vote.

In a corporation with straight voting, a shareholder vote removes a director if the number of votes for removal exceeds the number of votes against removal. RMBCA § 8.08(c). However, this corporation's articles require cumulative voting. "If cumulative voting is authorized, a director may not be removed if the number of votes sufficient to elect him under cumulative voting is voted against his removal." RMBCA § 8.08(c)(emphasis added). See Ark. Stat. Ann. § 4-27-808; Miss. Code Ann. § 79-4-8.08; Utah Code Ann. § 16-10a-808(3). Diane could have been elected a director with 60,001 votes, and more votes than that were voted against her removal (123,000 or 75,000, depending on how the proxies were counted). Therefore, the third ruling was correct. Diane could not have been removed.

NOTE: Directors are elected by a plurality of the votes cast, so the directors with the greatest number of votes are elected. According to Zeta's articles, the nine directors have staggered terms, and three directors are elected at each annual meeting. Therefore, under cumulative voting, each share is entitled to three votes (number of shares x number of directors up for election). See RMBCA § 7.28(c).

As stated in the facts, a director must receive at least 60,001 votes to assure election under the following formula:

$$\left(\frac{\text{number of votes eligible to be cast}}{\text{number of directors to be elected} + 1} \right) + 1$$

FAMILY LAW

Question 3 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Secretary's move into Husband's home and Boy's testimony about missing his mother constitute a substantial change of circumstances justifying reevaluation of the custody decree?
 - (2) Was joint custody in Boy's best interests given that his parents did not agree to joint custody and had a hostile relationship?

DISCUSSION

Summary: The trial court erred in modifying the custody order. A substantial change of circumstances that would justify custody reevaluation probably did not exist given the short time that had elapsed since entry of the original custody order. Although a custodial parent's nonmarital cohabitation might, in some states, constitute an unforeseen and substantial change of circumstances justifying custody reevaluation, Wife did not show that the cohabitation negatively affected Boy or his relationship with his father. Nor did Wife show that Boy's feelings of sadness were attributable to the cohabitation or even that they were new.

Assuming that a substantial change of circumstances existed, joint custody would not be in Boy's best interests: the parents did not agree to joint custody, they would not cooperate, and the mother already had liberal visitation.

Point One: (65-75%) Because the motion to modify was made within three months of the original custody order and the evidence did not show that either Secretary's move into Husband's home or Boy's feelings of sadness threatened his well-being, an appellate court would likely find that Wife had failed to establish a substantial change of circumstances.

Custody orders are invariably modifiable, but modification is impermissible unless there has been a change in circumstances since the order was entered. Most states require that the change in circumstances be substantial and unforeseen. For example, the Uniform Marriage and Divorce Act (UMDA), 9A U.L.A. 211 § 409(b) (1979) requires that there be "facts that have arisen since the prior decree or that were unknown to the court at the time of entry of the prior decree."

Most states also disfavor modification when sought shortly after a custody decree has been entered; the principle of res judicata and the belief that children's interests are served by stable custody arrangements both contribute to this view. Thus, if a modification petition is filed within two years of the original decree, UMDA § 409(a) authorizes a modification hearing only if the evidence suggests “there is reason to believe that the child’s present environment may endanger seriously his physical, mental, moral or emotional health.” In states that do not have statutory standards restricting early modification, case law typically disfavors it unless the evidence shows that the child is at risk. Because the modification petition was brought within three months of the original order and the evidence did not show any risk of harm to Boy, appellate courts in most states would likely find that there was an insufficient basis to modify custody.

In some states, appellate courts have held that a custodial parent’s post-decree nonmarital cohabitation represents a change of circumstances sufficient to warrant a modification hearing. See Todd v. Casciano, 569 S.E.2d 566, 570 (Ga. Ct. App. 2002); Word v. Remick, 58 S.W.3d 422, 427 (Ark. App. 2001). In these states, an appellate court would likely find that the trial court did not err in hearing evidence on modification. But, even in states that authorize a hearing in these circumstances, modification is typically disallowed unless the petitioner shows that the nonmarital cohabitation has an adverse impact on the children. See UMDA § 402 (“The court shall not consider conduct of a proposed custodian that does not affect his relationship to the child.”); Todd v. Casciano, 569 S.E.2d 571. Wife presented no evidence at the hearing to show such an impact nor did she even show that Boy’s feelings of sadness were attributable to Secretary’s presence in the home. In other states, however, the mere fact of cohabitation may disqualify a parent to have custody.

A child’s custody preference is relevant to a custody determination, and alteration of a child’s custody preference thus can constitute a substantial change of circumstance. See Butland v. Butland, 1996 WL 362038 (Ohio Ct. App. June 27, 1996). Here, Boy’s testimony does not clearly indicate any alteration of his custody preference; Boy testified that he missed his mother, not that he wanted to live with her. Nor did the evidence show that Boy’s feelings of sadness are attributable to living with his father instead of facing his parents’ divorce. But even if Boy’s testimony were interpreted to mean that he wants to live with his mother, the feelings of young children are typically given less weight than feelings of those who are mature. Consequently, it is highly unlikely that Boy’s statement would be sufficient to qualify as a substantial change of circumstance. See, e.g., Mulkey-Yelverton v. Blevins, 884 P.2d 41, 43-44 (Wyo. 1994); Butland, (whether child’s views qualify as a substantial change of circumstance depends upon the “depth, sincerity, and the extent they reflect changed circumstances within the parent-child relationship or relationship between the parties”).

Point Two: Because the parents did not agree to joint custody and had a high-conflict (25-35%) relationship, an appellate court would likely find that joint custody was not in Boy’s best interests.

Even if there is a substantial change in circumstances, a court may not modify a custody order unless the change will serve the child’s best interests. See UMDA § 409(b). It is generally understood that requiring hostile parents to share custody can be harmful to children. Thus, “[w]ith few exceptions, courts and commentators agree that joint custody is a viable option only for parents who are able and willing to cooperate with one another in making decisions for their child.” Taylor v. Taylor, 508 A.2d 964, 971 (Md. 1986). See also Braiman v. Braiman, 378 N.E.2d 1019, 1020-21 (N.Y. 1978); Word v. Remick, 58 S.W.3d at 426.

Most courts will not impose joint custody on unwilling parents. Even in states that do permit the imposition of joint custody over a parent's objection, a court may not order joint custody unless it finds that this arrangement is in the child's best interests. In making such an assessment, it would be reversible error if the court did not consider the extent of parental conflict and the likelihood of achieving both cooperation between the parents and a stable living situation for the child. See Annotation, Propriety of Awarding Joint Custody of Children, 17 A.L.R. 4TH 1013 (1982 & Supp.).

The joint custody order in this case also fails to address the basis for Wife's modification petition. Boy will still be living in the same home with Husband's nonmarital cohabitant for substantial periods of time.

An appellate court is thus likely to find that the trial court erred both in modifying the custody decree and in ordering joint custody.

DECEDENT'S ESTATES

Question 4 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Clara survive Decedent such that Decedent's estate passes under Clara's will to Son-in-Law?
 - (2) Is Half-Sister an heir of Decedent?
 - (3) Is Adopted-Sister an heir of Decedent?
 - (4) Does the $90,000 gift to Brother reduce Brother's share of Decedent's estate?
 - (5) Is Gramps entitled to any share of Decedent's estate?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Under the Uniform Simultaneous Death Act, Clara is deemed to have predeceased Decedent. Likewise, Clara predeceased Decedent under the 120-hour survivorship rule of the Uniform Probate Code(UPC). Therefore, Son-in-Law cannot claim any share of Decedent's estate. Decedent's heirs are his siblings: Brother, Half-Sister, and Adopted-Sister. However, their respective shares of Decedent's estate may differ depending upon underlying state law. The gift to Brother is not an advancement and thus does not reduce Brother's share of Decedent's estate. If Half-Sister takes an equal share, then Brother, Half-Sister, and Adopted-Sister are each entitled to $100,000. Gramps would take only in a state determining heirship under the civil law method of consanguinity, which very few states apply.

Point One: Under the Uniform Simultaneous Death Act, there is a presumption that Clara (30-40%) predeceased Decedent and there is no evidence here to rebut that presumption. Likewise, under the UPC's 120-hour survivorship rule, Clara predeceased Decedent because she did not survive him by 120 hours. Thus, Son-in-Law is not entitled to any share of Decedent's estate.

Son-in-Law, as the sole beneficiary under Clara's will, would be entitled to Decedent's estate only if Clara had been entitled to inherit Decedent's estate. Clara would be an heir of Decedent only if she survived Decedent, because an heir must be alive at the time of the intestate's death. However, in a situation such as this one, where the two decedents were killed in the same traffic accident, Clara is deemed to have predeceased Decedent if there is insufficient evidence that she and Decedent died other than simultaneously. Unif. Simul. Death Act § 2. Since the evidence here is insufficient to establish that they did not die simultaneously, under the Uniform Act, Clara is deemed to have predeceased Decedent.

While it might be argued that Clara survived because the truck hit her car from the rear and presumably hit Decedent first, it is also possible that the mere impact at the rear of Clara's car was sufficient to cause both their deaths. Furthermore, the only direct evidence of their deaths was that neither appeared to be alive at the scene of the accident. Thus, there is no direct evidence to establish that Clara survived Decedent. The fact that Decedent was declared dead first should not be controlling because the declarations of death were made simply in the order in which they were removed from the ambulance, and the factual evidence supports the conclusion that neither was alive when they were placed into the ambulance.

Under § 2-104 of the UPC, Clara is also not an heir of Decedent because she failed to survive him by 120 hours.

Point Two: Half-Sister is an heir of Decedent. Depending on state law, she is entitled (10-20%) either to the same share as a whole sibling or a lesser share.

Decedent's heirs will be the descendants of his deceased parents and perhaps Gramps. See Point Five. The issue therefore arises whether siblings of the half-blood and adopted siblings inherit along with siblings of the whole blood.

Half-Sister and Decedent are half-bloods because they share only one common parent. Under § 2-107 of the UPC, relatives of the half-blood inherit the same share as relatives of the whole blood. Thus, Half-Sister would take $100,000.

However, in some jurisdictions they inherit a smaller share. See, e.g., Iowa Code § 633.219.

Point Three: Adopted-Sister is an heir of Decedent. (20-30%)

At common law, an adopted child could not take from or through an adopting parent. Thus, at common law, Adopted-Sister would not be Decedent's heir. By the end of the twentieth century, motivated by a policy to treat the adopted child as part of the adopting parents' nuclear family, most state laws were changed to provide that an adopted child is treated as a biological child for purposes of inheritance. Thus, under the UPC, Decedent's estate is distributed equally to the descendants of his deceased parents. See UPC § 2-103(3). The descendants of Decedent's parents include both their biological and adopted children. See UPC § 2-114(b). Thus, Adopted-Sister would take $100,000.

Point Four: Decedent's lifetime gift to Brother is not an advancement and thus does not (20-30%) reduce Brother's share of Decedent's estate.

At common law, a lifetime transfer to a child who would be the transferor's heir was treated as a down payment on the child's intestate share. Under the common-law rule, the gift to Brother would not be an advancement as Brother is not Decedent's child. See generally Joel C. Dobris, Stewart E. Sterk & Melanie B. Leslie, ESTATES AND TRUSTS 155 (2d ed. 2003); see also 755 Ill. Comb. Stat. 5/2-5.

Many states have broadened the common-law rule to include transfers to any person who is an heir. However, most states also provide that a lifetime transfer to a person who would be the transferor's heir is presumptively a gift and not an advancement. See UPC § 2-109.

States differ in what it takes to rebut the gift presumption. Some states permit any competent evidence to be used to rebut the presumption. Others have a heightened evidentiary requirement. For example, under the UPC, the presumption that a lifetime transfer was a gift can be rebutted by a contemporaneous writing of either the decedent or the donee stating either that the gift was an advancement or that it was to be taken into account in computing the distribution of the decedent's estate. UPC § 2-109. Here, however, there is neither a writing nor any other competent evidence that Decedent intended an advancement when he made the transfer to Brother. Consequently, the transfer to Brother would be treated as a gift, not an advancement, and Brother would take $100,000 of Decedent's estate.

Lastly, in some states an advancement only occurs when the donee would have been an heir of the decedent at the time the transfer was made. See, e.g., Iowa Code § 633.224. If that rule applies here, the transfer could not be an advancement because at the time Decedent transferred the money to Brother, Clara was living and thus would have been Decedent's only heir.

Point Five: Gramps is not entitled to receive any share of Decedent's estate unless (5-15%) heirship in the state was determined under the civil law method of consanguinity.

Under the civil law method of consanguinity, Gramps as well as Decedent's siblings would be related to Decedent within the second degree of consanguinity and Gramps would share equally with the siblings in the estate. Most states have rejected this method of determining heirship. In those states, including all those that have adopted the UPC and those that follow the parentelic method of descent, Gramps would not be entitled to share in Decedent's estate.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP I.A, II.A, II.B

Question 5 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Is Owen an independent contractor or a servant (employee) of Best Care?
 - (2) Did Owen have actual or apparent authority to bind Best Care to the contract to purchase the X-ray machine?
 - (3) Is Best Care liable to Anita's estate for Owen's negligence on an apparent (ostensible) agency theory?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Whether Owen is an independent contractor or a servant (employee) is a question of fact. The degree of control is generally the distinguishing factor between an independent contractor and a servant (employee). Traditionally, Owen would have been an independent contractor because Best Care did not retain substantial control over how Owen was to practice medicine; however, recent opinions have moderated this position and look to the right to control rather than actual exercise of control.

Best Care is not liable on the Vision-Owen contract. Owen lacked actual authority to enter into the contract with Vision on behalf of Best Care because Vision was not a vendor in City. Further, Best Care had made no manifestations to provide Vision with a reasonable basis to believe that Owen was acting as an agent of Best Care.

Even if Owen is an independent contractor, he appears to the outside world—and to Anita in particular—to be an employee of Best Care as a result of Best Care's representations made on the billboards. Because of this apparent (ostensible) agency, Best Care would be estopped from denying liability for Owen's negligence and Anita's resulting death.

Point One: Owen was probably an independent contractor and not an employee of Best (35-45%) Care, but the facts could be argued differently.

Owen is either an independent contractor or a servant (employee). "An independent contractor is a person who contracts with another to do something for him but who is not controlled by the other nor subject to the other's right to control with respect to his physical conduct in the performance of the undertaking. He may or may not be an agent." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 2(3). “A servant [employee] is an agent employed by a master [employer] to perform service in his affairs whose physical conduct in the performance of the service is controlled or is subject to the right to control by the master.” Id. at § 2(2). A number of factors are relevant in distinguishing an independent contractor from a servant. The crucial factor is the extent of control that the employer may exercise over the details of the work. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 220. Traditionally, doctors were considered independent contractors because of their high level of skill and the use of their independent judgment. See McMurdo v. Getter, 10 N.E.2d 139 (Mass. 1937). However, in recent years, courts have placed greater emphasis on the employer’s “right to interfere or control rather than [the employer’s] actual interference or exercise of control.” See Knorp v. Albert, 28 P.3d. 1024 (Kan. Ct. App. 2001); Kelly v. Rossi, 481 N.E.2d 1340 (Mass. 1985). Other factors used to distinguish between a servant and an independent contractor are: (1) whether the one employed is engaged in a distinct occupation or business, (2) the skill required in the particular occupation, (3) who supplies the materials to perform and the place to perform the service, (4) method of payment, and (5) how the parties characterize the transaction. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 220 (2); Chapman v. Black, 741 P.2d 998 (Wash. App. 1987).

These facts could be argued either way. Here, most of the factors suggest that Owen is an independent contractor and not an employee or servant of Best Care. In particular items 1, 2, and 5 of the contract favor characterizing Owen as an independent contractor, while items 4 and 6 of the contract indicate some level of oversight and control on the part of Best Care. The self-labeling in item 1 is evidence, but is not decisive.

Point Two: Owen had neither actual nor apparent authority to bind Best Care to the (30-40%) contract to purchase the X-ray machine. Thus, Best Care is not liable to Vision for breach of contract.

Agency arises where one person consents that another shall act on his behalf and, at least as respects matters within the agency, subject to his control. See generally RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 1(1).

Actual authority arises where the principal communicates the authority to act to the agent. See generally RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 7; William A. Gregory, THE LAW OF AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP, 3d ed. § 14. A principal is bound by contracts entered into between an agent with actual authority and a third party. See generally RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 144.

Item 3 of the contract provides that “[e]ach doctor is authorized to purchase supplies and equipment for Best Care’s emergency room from a list of approved vendors located in City and within Best Care’s price guidelines.” This contract provision gave Owen actual authority to buy equipment for Best Care so long as it was within specified price guidelines from suppliers located in City for Best Care’s account. If Owen had acted within this authority, Best Care would be bound even if Vision was unaware of the authorization. However, Owen exceeded his authority by purchasing equipment from Vision, which was not an approved vendor and was located 450 miles away from City. Therefore, Best Care is not liable under the contract because Owen did not have actual authority.

Further, Best Care is not liable under the theory of apparent authority. Apparent authority is created as to a “third person by written or spoken words or any other conduct of the principal which, reasonably interpreted, causes the third person to believe that the principal consents to have the act done on his behalf by the person purporting to act for him.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 27. There are no facts to suggest that Best Care made any representations that would create a reasonable basis for Vision to believe that Owen was authorized to purchase the X-ray machine.

Point Three: Even if Owen is an independent contractor, Best Care is liable for Owen’s
(25-35%) negligence if Anita reasonably believed that Owen was acting as an agent of Best Care.

While a master is liable for the torts of its servant (employee) conducted within the scope of employment, a principal is not necessarily liable for the torts of its independent contractor agent. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY §§ 219, 250. A principal, however, may be estopped from denying liability for the torts of its independent contractor if the principal has created indicia of apparent authority. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 8B. This is sometimes referred to as the “holding out” theory or ostensible agency. See Adamski v. Tacoma General Hospital, 579 P.2d 970 (Wash. Ct. App. 1978) (The hospital may be liable under the “holding out” theory so long as the hospital acted in some way that leads the patient to a reasonable belief that he is being treated by a hospital employee).

RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 267 provides that “one who represents that another is his servant or other agent and thereby causes a third person justifiably to rely upon the care or skill of such apparent agent is subject to liability to the third person for harm caused by the lack of care or skill of the one appearing to be a servant or other agent as if he were such.” Here, Best Care publicly advertised, on billboards strategically placed throughout City, that people should come to its emergency room because “Best Care’s emergency room doctors are the absolute best and will really care for you.” Anita apparently saw and believed the slogan on the billboards because she expressly requested the ambulance driver to take her to Best Care because “Best Care’s emergency room doctors are the absolute best.” It would be reasonable for a prospective patient to conclude, based on the billboards, that all doctors in Best Care’s emergency room are employees of Best Care. As it was reasonable for Anita to believe that Owen was an agent of Best Care, under the general principle that a principal is liable for the torts committed by its agents Best Care would be liable to Anita’s estate for Owen’s actions (negligently severing an artery so that she bled to death).

NOTE: Most jurisdictions provide that a principal who hires an independent contractor to perform an “ultrahazardous” or “inherently dangerous” activity has a nondelegable duty to exercise due care to provide for the safety of persons who may be harmed by that activity. However, the usual tort and agency law definitions of ultrahazardous activity would not cover surgery, and there is no line of authority holding that a doctor’s performance of surgery falls within this rule.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE I.A CONFLICT OF LAWS IV.A, IV.B, IV.C

Question 6 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) Were the requirements for federal diversity jurisdiction satisfied, even though Plaintiff and decedent Tortfeasor were citizens of the same state?
 - (1)(b) Was Executor precluded from raising the issue of subject matter jurisdiction because it failed to raise the issue earlier in the case and, in fact, conceded jurisdiction?
 - (2) When suit is filed to enforce a federal judgment in a state court, may the defendant collaterally attack the federal judgment for lack of subject matter jurisdiction?

DISCUSSION

Summary: The federal district court of State Y should have dismissed the action for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The federal court lacked jurisdiction because there was no diversity. Defendant Executor's citizenship is deemed to be the same as decedent Tortfeasor's. Tortfeasor and Plaintiff were both citizens of State X. The lack of diversity defeats diversity subject matter jurisdiction and is not waivable. Defendant may raise subject matter jurisdiction at any time, and the federal court erred in denying the motion. But the issue of subject matter jurisdiction was fully litigated in federal court, so Defendant is precluded from raising it in a collateral attack on the judgment. The state court in State X must therefore enforce the federal judgment.

Point One(a): Even though Plaintiff and Executor were from different states, diversity (20-30%) jurisdiction was unavailable because, under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(2), "the legal representative of the estate of a decedent shall be deemed to be a citizen only of the same State as the decedent." Plaintiff and Executor's decedent, Tortfeasor, were both citizens of State X and consequently the requirements for diversity jurisdiction were not met.

Plaintiff's complaint included only a state-law negligence claim. The court, therefore, had subject matter jurisdiction only if diversity jurisdiction existed under 28 U.S.C. § 1332. To satisfy the diversity statute, the amount in controversy in the action must exceed $75,000 and the parties must be diverse.

Plaintiff's complaint alleged damages in excess of $500,000. The facts state that Plaintiff was severely injured and there is nothing to suggest that Plaintiff's damages claim was made in bad faith. Consequently, Plaintiff will be deemed to have satisfied the amount-in-controversy requirement of $75,000. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a).

The diversity of citizenship requirement, however, is not satisfied in this case. For purposes of determining citizenship, an individual is a citizen of the state in which he or she is domiciled. See, e.g., Mas v. Perry, 489 F.2d 1396, 1399 (5th Cir. 1974). Plaintiff and decedent, Tortfeasor, were both citizens of State X. Defendant, Executor, was a citizen of State Y. On the face of it, the plaintiff and defendant were citizens of different states, satisfying the diversity requirement. However, diversity jurisdiction should have been unavailable because Executor stands in the shoes of Tortfeasor and takes Tortfeasor's citizenship for purposes of diversity. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(2), "the legal representative of the estate of a decedent shall be deemed to be a citizen only of the same State as the decedent." Thus, because Executor was sued as a representative of Tortfeasor's estate, Executor was deemed to be a citizen of the same state as Tortfeasor, State X. Plaintiff, of course, is also a citizen of State X, so diversity jurisdiction should have been unavailable.

Accordingly, the district court erred in denying the motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction. The motion was proper when made, and it should have been granted because the parties were not diverse. (See Point One(b) below.)

Point One(b): Executor's motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction must be (15-25%) considered on the merits, even if it was raised a year after Executor answered and admitted jurisdiction.

Although the motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction was filed a year after Executor's answer to the complaint admitted the existence of jurisdiction, the court was nevertheless obliged to consider the motion on its merits. The defense of lack of subject matter jurisdiction is not waivable and may be raised "whenever it appears by suggestion of the parties . . . that the court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter." Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(h)(3) (emphasis added). Accordingly, the court was obliged to consider the merits of Executor's jurisdictional challenge.

Point Two: The state court is required to give the federal court judgment the same credit it
(50-60%) would receive in federal court. Because Executor litigated the issue of subject matter jurisdiction before the federal court, lost, and did not appeal, Executor is precluded from relitigating the issue of jurisdiction in state court.

State courts are required to give full faith and credit to the judgments of other states. U.S. Const. art. IV, §1. Likewise, state, federal, and territorial courts are required to give state court judgments the same credit that they would receive in the courts of the rendering state. 28 U.S.C. § 1738. Although neither Article IV nor the full faith and credit statute explicitly requires state courts to honor federal judgments, "it is well recognized that the same compulsion controls and thus state courts must treat federal judgments as those judgments would be treated by the federal courts themselves.” Jack Friedenthal et al., CIVIL PROCEDURE § 14.15 at 711 (3d ed. 1999) (footnote omitted); see also Stoll v. Gottlieb, 305 U.S. 165, 172 (1938).

In Durfee v. Duke, 375 U.S. 106, 111 (1963), the United States Supreme Court announced the “general rule that a judgment is entitled to full faith and credit even as to questions of jurisdiction when the second court’s inquiry discloses that those questions have been fully and fairly litigated and finally decided in the court which rendered the original judgment.” See also Treinies v. Sunshine Mining Co., 308 U.S. 66, 78 (1939). Here, Executor raised the lack of subject matter jurisdiction in the federal court action. The issue was briefed, argued, and decided. Although the court’s decision on the issue was mistaken, no appeal was taken and the court’s judgment became final. If the second suit had been filed in federal court, the doctrine of issue preclusion or collateral estoppel would bar the defendant from relitigating the issue of subject matter jurisdiction since the identical issue was fully and fairly litigated in the first suit. Full faith and credit requires that the federal judgment have the same effect in the state court. Thus, the state court should enforce the federal judgment notwithstanding the challenge to the federal court’s subject matter jurisdiction. If Executor had wished to continue the jurisdictional challenge, Executor should have filed an appeal from the decision of the federal district court.

NOTE: The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that the preclusive effect of the judgment of a federal court sitting in diversity should be determined by the law of the state in which the federal court sits. See Semtek Int’l, Inc. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 531 U.S. 497 (2001). Thus, the preclusion rules of State Y would determine whether the State X court should enforce the federal judgment. It is likely, however, that State Y would follow a rule of jurisdictional finality similar to the rule in Durfee v. Duke: if the question of subject matter jurisdiction was fully and fairly litigated, the judgment is not subject to collateral attack. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF JUDGMENTS § 12.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS II.D, IV.J, V.A.1; SALES VI.C, VII. B

Question 7 Analysis

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Finance Co.'s letter to Buyer informing it of the assignment of the purchase agreement to Finance Co. obligate Buyer to make future payments under the contract directly to Finance Co.?
 - (2) Can Buyer reduce the amount it owes Finance Co. by subtracting the expenses it incurred to add the attachments to the excavator?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Once Finance Co. notified Buyer of the assignment of the right to receive payment and demanded payment of the balance, Buyer was obligated to pay Finance Co., notwithstanding Seller's instruction to the contrary. However, Buyer had the right to offset against Finance Co. its damages for Seller's breach of contract, even though Buyer had accepted delivery of the excavator.

Point One: (45-55%) Once Finance Co. properly notified Buyer of the assignment of the purchase agreement and instructed Buyer to make payments directly to Finance Co., Buyer was obligated to make all payments under the contract to Finance Co.; Buyer's payments to Seller did not discharge that obligation.

As a result of the security agreement signed by Seller, Finance Co. had a security interest in all of Seller's accounts and chattel paper. Moreover, the security agreement expressly provided that payments arising from Seller's "accounts and chattel paper" had been assigned to Finance Co. Under Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code, a security interest in "accounts" covers any "right to payment of a monetary obligation, whether or not earned by performance, . . . for property that has been or is to be sold." UCC § 9-102(a)(2). Consequently, Finance Co.'s security interest covered the amount owed by Buyer to Seller pursuant to Buyer's agreement to purchase the excavator.

Article 9 gives a secured party or assignee of an account (i.e., Finance Co.) the right to collect directly from the account debtor (i.e., Buyer) in the event of a default by the debtor (i.e., Seller). UCC § 9-607(a)(1). To exercise that right effectively, Finance Co. must send an authenticated notification to the account debtor informing the account debtor that the amount due has been assigned and that payment is to be made to the assignee. The facts state that Finance Co. properly notified Buyer of the assignment of Seller's right to receive payment and directed Buyer to make future payments to Finance Co. See UCC § 9-406(a), cmt. 2. See generally James J. White & Robert S. Summers, UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE § 25-5 (5th ed. 2000).

Once an account debtor receives proper notification to make future payments directly to an assignee, the account debtor may discharge its payment obligation only by payment to the assignee. Payments made to the assignor do not result in discharge. UCC § 9-406(a).

The fact that Seller told Buyer to disregard the notice from Finance Co. is no defense. Proper notice from Finance Co. (assignee) is all that is required to obligate Buyer to make payment directly to Finance Co., and nothing in the UCC allows an assignor like Seller to interfere with the rights of the assignee in this way. Rather than ignoring the assignment and relying on Seller for instructions, Buyer should have demanded proof of the assignment from Finance Co. Had it done so, Buyer could have safely paid Seller until reasonable proof was offered. See UCC § 9-406(b)(c). What Buyer cannot do is what it did here—ignore the notification of the assignment and continue to pay Seller.

Consequently, Buyer was obligated to make the March and April payments to Finance Co., and it remains liable for those payments. Buyer was not discharged by reason of its payment to Seller. Buyer is also obliged to make the May payment to Finance Co., subject to an offset, as discussed below.

Point Two: Buyer can assert Seller's breach of contract as a defense to payment and offset (45-55%) its damages against the amount it owes Finance Co.

The rights of an assignee of an account (Finance Co.) are subject to “any defense or claim in recoupment arising from the transaction that gave rise to the contract.” UCC § 9-404(a)(1). The account debtor may, of course, waive the right to assert defenses against an assignee, but there is nothing in the facts to suggest that Buyer waived this right.

Here, the facts establish that Buyer has a defense against full payment of the contract price. Seller agreed to supply Buyer with an excavator that was specially equipped. Moreover, Seller agreed to supply the excavator by a particular date, when Seller knew that Buyer needed it to begin work. When that date arrived, the excavator had not been equipped as required by the contract. Buyer nevertheless took delivery of the excavator, despite its failure to conform to the contract.

When a buyer takes goods in spite of a known nonconformity with the contract, the buyer has accepted the goods for the purposes of sales law. UCC § 2-606. Acceptance ordinarily obligates a buyer to pay the contract price. UCC § 2-607. However, acceptance of nonconforming goods does not bar a remedy for breach, so long as the buyer notifies the seller of the breach within a reasonable time of its discovery. Here, Buyer notified Seller of the nonconforming nature of the excavator at the time it took possession of the equipment and told Seller it intended to offset its costs for the attachments. As a result, Buyer is entitled to assert its remedies for breach, despite its acceptance of the goods.

In general, Buyer's remedy is the recovery of damages for the nonconformity, defined as “the loss resulting in the ordinary course of events from the seller's breach as determined in any manner which is reasonable.” UCC § 2-714(1). Moreover, Buyer “may deduct all or any part of the damages . . . from any part of the price still due,” so long as Buyer notifies Seller of the intention to do so. UCC § 2-717. Here, Buyer notified Seller of its intention in this regard.

Buyer’s contract claims against Seller may be asserted against Finance Co., as assignee of the contract, to reduce the amount owed by Buyer. UCC § 9-404(b).

Under the contract, Buyer owes $75,000 to Finance Co. (the amount of the March and April payments, which Buyer improperly sent to Seller, and the amount of the upcoming May payment). Buyer claims $30,000 in damages from Seller’s breach, and it may deduct that amount from the amount owed under the contract. See generally James J. White & Robert S. Summers, UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE § 10-2 (5th ed. 2000)(techniques for measuring damages under UCC § 2-714). Consequently, Buyer owes Finance Co. $45,000.

Preface

This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2005 and July 2005 Multistate Essay Examinations. Each test includes seven questions; most jurisdictions that use the MEE select the six questions their applicants will answer.

The model analyses to the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. These models are not an official grading guide. Some jurisdictions grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses as they wish, including the suggested weights given to particular points. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topic or topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by Roman numerals which refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that topic. For example, Question 3 on the February 2005 MEE tested Federal Civil Procedure I.A.1., subject matter jurisdiction in federal courts, and I.E., venue. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet and can also be found at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE is a three-hour examination consisting of six questions. The examination is administered in one continuous three-hour time period. Applicants are expected to spend approximately thirty minutes answering each of the questions. The areas of law covered by the questions in the examination are: Agency and Partnership, Commercial Paper, Conflict of Laws, Corporations and Limited Liability Companies, Decedents' Estates, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Sales, Secured Transactions, and Trusts and Future Interests. Some questions include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You will have three hours in which to write your answers to six of the seven questions contained in this booklet; you will be told which of the questions you are to answer. Each question is designed to be answered in thirty minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts which are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show: an understanding of the facts; a recognition of the issues included; the applicable principles of law; and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Some jurisdictions instruct applicants to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

Questions

Question 1

Corp, a corporation validly incorporated in State A, manufactures computer desks and sells them to furniture stores in State A and several nearby states. The board of directors of Corp consists of three members. The board of directors appointed Presley as the president of Corp. The bylaws of Corp provide that “the president, as the chief executive officer of the corporation, shall manage the business of the corporation and perform such other duties as the board of directors may from time to time direct.”

Furniture Store (FS) owes Corp $11,000 for computer desks it purchased last year. Presley learned that FS was on the verge of bankruptcy and retained an attorney to file suit against FS to collect payment. The attorney filed suit as directed.

Presley believes that Corp should pay a dividend to its shareholders. Consequently, Presley sent a letter to all shareholders declaring a dividend of 10 cents per share to be paid at the end of the month.

Large Corp (Large), a large national furniture chain, contacted Presley and offered to sell its local manufacturing plant to Corp for what Presley considers a very reasonable price. Further, Large is willing to accept payment of the purchase price over 10 years. Acquiring this plant would triple Corp’s manufacturing capacity. Presley signed a purchase agreement for the plant on behalf of Corp without consulting the board.

1. Did Presley, as president, have the authority to retain an attorney to file suit against FS on behalf of Corp? Explain.
2. Did Presley, as president, have the authority to declare a dividend payable to Corp’s shareholders? Explain.
3. Did Presley, as president, have the authority to enter into a purchase agreement with Large to acquire its local manufacturing plant on behalf of Corp? Explain.

Question 2

Kit wanted to purchase a car that cost $4,800. Dealer agreed to loan Kit the money if she got someone to co-sign the loan.

Art agreed to co-sign the loan but only if Kit agreed to paint his house. On November 2, 2002, Kit signed a separate agreement with Art in which she promised to paint Art's house within 90 days.

On November 3, 2002, to cover the cost of the car and accumulated interest, Kit signed a promissory note that stated "On November 4, 2003, I promise to pay to the order of Dealer, $5,000." Art signed his name directly beneath Kit's signature.

Kit never painted Art's house. On November 4, 2003, without consulting Art, Kit went to see Dealer. Kit told Dealer that she currently had the money to repay the loan, but she had a rare opportunity to take a trip to the Far East and needed the money to pay for the trip. Kit offered Dealer a check for $2,000 and requested an extension of time to pay the remaining $3,000 on the loan. Dealer, sympathetic to Kit's situation, refused to accept the check and agreed to extend the entire loan until January 2, 2004. The next day Kit left on her trip. As of January 3, 2004, she had not returned, and neither Art nor Dealer can find her.

Dealer sues Art on the note for $5,000. Art defends on the following grounds: (1) The note is not a valid negotiable instrument because it was subject to the condition that Kit paint Art's house; (2) Dealer did not first try to collect from Kit; (3) Art was discharged when Dealer refused Kit's tender of $2,000; and (4) Art was discharged when Dealer extended the loan date without Art's consent.

Does each of Art's grounds of defense relieve him partly or completely of any obligation to pay Dealer? Explain.

Question 3

Buyer and Seller were both citizens of State X, where they attended State University. Just before they graduated, Buyer purchased Seller's car for $2,500. At the time, Seller told Buyer that the car was "in good working order" and that it was a "safe, reliable little car." Seller knew, however, that a local mechanic's inspection of the car had revealed that its brakes were so worn that they presented a significant safety hazard and required immediate replacement. Instead of informing Buyer of the danger, Seller showed Buyer the mechanic's bill and told him that the car "has just been checked out."

After graduation, Buyer decided to move permanently to Big City in State Y. Buyer decided to use the car he bought from Seller for the move. He believed that in a few round-trips he could transport all of his belongings to his new apartment in Big City. On his way back to his State X apartment after his first trip to his new apartment in Big City, Buyer was seriously injured in a one-car accident on a highway in State X. Friend, a citizen of State X and a passenger in Buyer's car, was the only witness to the accident. He and Buyer will testify that the accident happened when the brakes failed as Buyer attempted to negotiate a curve in the highway.

After weeks of hospitalization in State X, Buyer settled permanently in his apartment in Big City in State Y. Having discovered Seller's deceit, Buyer sued Seller in the U.S. District Court for the District of State X, seeking to recover $500,000 under State X tort law for his injuries and lost wages. In addition, Buyer claimed Seller's misrepresentations constituted a breach of warranty under State X contract law and sought recovery of the $2,500 paid for the car.

One week after the suit was filed, Seller also decided to relocate from State X to Big City, taking a job there and assuming State Y citizenship.

Seller has filed a motion to dismiss Buyer's two claims for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Seller has also moved for a change of venue to the U.S. District Court for the District of State Y.

1. Should the court dismiss Buyer's tort claim, Buyer's contract claim, or both for lack of subject matter jurisdiction? Explain.
2. How should the court rule on Seller's motion for a change of venue? Explain.

Question 4

Harold and Wendy were divorced in State A and awarded joint custody of their two children, John, age 5, and Amanda, age 3. Under the terms of the divorce decree, both parents were to share in decisions concerning the care, education, religion, medical treatment, and general welfare of the children, but Wendy was awarded primary physical custody, which, in this case, meant that the children would live with her except during alternate weekends and the month of July. Harold was also ordered to pay monthly child support in the amount of $500 per child until each child reached the age of 18.

Two years after the divorce, Wendy was offered a job in State B that would double her salary but necessitate a move to an area of State B located about 100 miles from Harold's home in State A. When Wendy told Harold of her desire to accept the job offer and move to State B, he objected that such a move would prevent him from exercising his visitation rights.

Harold petitioned the State A court to issue an order prohibiting Wendy from relocating with the children. The court found that Wendy's decision to move was motivated by a desire to improve her family's standard of living. It denied Harold's petition. Wendy then moved with the children to State B, where she began her new job, set up a new residence, and registered the child support order.

After Wendy and the children moved to State B, Harold stopped making child support payments. In response, Wendy sought enforcement of the State A support order in a State B court. Wendy also petitioned the State B court to extend Harold's obligation to pay child support until the children reach age 21, as authorized under the law of State B. Under the law of State A, there is no obligation to pay child support for children over the age of 18. She further petitioned the court to modify the State A custody order by eliminating the joint decision-making provision. Harold was personally served when he came to State B to take the children on vacation.

In response to Wendy's petition, Harold claimed that the State B court did not have jurisdiction to enforce or modify any of the State A orders.

1. Was the State A court's decision to allow Wendy to relocate with the children to State B correct? Explain.
2. May the State B court enforce the State A child support order? Explain.
3. May the State B court modify the State A child support order by extending the support obligation to age 21? Explain.
4. May the State B court modify the State A custody decree by eliminating the joint decision-making provision? Explain.

Question 5

In 1991, Testator validly executed a typewritten will. Its dispositive provision provided that:

1. I give $10,000 to Cousin.
2. I give Blackacre, my family home, to Sister.
3. I give the residue of my estate to University, my alma mater.

Three months after executing this will, Testator, desiring to increase the bequest to Cousin, scratched out Item 1 in its entirety and immediately above it wrote in by hand: "I give $100,000 to Cousin." This handwritten $100,000 bequest was not witnessed.

In 1994, Testator sold Blackacre, the family home, and reinvested the entire sales proceeds in Whiteacre, which became Testator's new family home.

In 1994, one month after buying Whiteacre and following a heated argument with Cousin, Testator validly executed two copies of a new typewritten will that left his entire estate to University. Testator then put both executed copies of the 1994 will in his safe deposit box, where the 1991 will was also located.

In 1999, Testator and Cousin reconciled. Immediately thereafter, Testator went to the safe deposit box and removed one of the executed copies of the 1994 will. In the course of reviewing it, Testator had second thoughts about leaving nothing to Cousin. However, rather than executing a new will, he tore up that copy of the 1994 will in the presence of his neighbor and stated: "I feel better now. Cousin is taken care of."

Last year, Testator, a domiciliary of State A, died leaving a substantial estate, including Whiteacre. Both the 1991 will with the handwritten changes and the remaining executed copy of the 1994 will were found in Testator's safe deposit box.

Both Cousin and Sister survived Testator. Under State A intestacy law, Sister would be Testator's only heir. State A also has a statute providing: "The revocation of a will that revoked an earlier will revives the earlier will in the absence of a contrary intention." State A does not permit holographic wills.

What, if anything, are Cousin and Sister entitled to receive from Testator's estate? Explain.

Question 6

Bill operated a restaurant in a building he owned. On March 1, he purchased a large oven on credit for $8,000 from Sal's Appliance Barn. On that same day, the oven was set aside in Sal's warehouse and marked with a tag reading, "Sold to Bill." Also on March 1, Bill signed a security agreement that gave Sal's a security interest in the oven to secure the unpaid purchase price of the oven.

On March 14, the oven was delivered and bolted permanently into a specially built niche in the kitchen in Bill's restaurant, thus becoming a fixture under local real estate law.

On March 26, the local sheriff came to the restaurant and announced that he was there to execute a levy to satisfy a $3,000 judgment against Bill in favor of Local Bank. The sheriff saw the new oven in the restaurant's kitchen and announced he was levying on the oven. He then physically disabled the oven by handcuffing it shut and placed a notice-of-levy sticker on it, which qualified as a valid levy under state law.

On March 28, after learning from Bill about what happened with the sheriff and the oven, Sal's filed its financing statement in the Secretary of State's office but not in the local real estate records office. Sal's financing statement properly described the oven.

On March 29, Bill obtained a $10,000 loan from Finance Company and gave Finance Company a mortgage on his building to secure repayment of the loan. On the same day, Finance Company properly perfected a valid lien against the restaurant building and accompanying fixtures by filing in the local real estate records office designated by state law.

1. As between Sal's and Local Bank, who has priority as to the oven? Explain.
2. As between Sal's and Finance Company, who has priority as to the oven? Explain.

Question 7

For many years, Ruth owned and operated a restaurant as a sole proprietorship doing business as (d/b/a) Ruth's Family Restaurant. In 2001, Ruth sold the assets of the restaurant to Scott. Ruth and Scott agreed that: (1) the restaurant would operate under the name "Ruth's Family Restaurant"; (2) Ruth would manage the restaurant for Scott but would have no ownership interest in the restaurant; (3) all necessary licenses would remain in Ruth's name; and (4) Ruth would hire all employees, but only on an at-will basis (as is customary in the restaurant business). No one other than Ruth and Scott was aware that Scott had bought the restaurant.

Prior to Scott's purchase of the restaurant, Ruth had purchased supplies from Wholesale Restaurant Supply Co. (Wholesale), always signing the contracts as "Ruth, d/b/a Ruth's Family Restaurant." Following Scott's purchase of the restaurant, Scott instructed Ruth in very clear terms not to make any purchases of restaurant supplies from Wholesale in the future. Ruth complied with this instruction for the next several months.

In 2003, Ruth hired Nora, her niece, as assistant manager of the restaurant under a written employment contract for a 20-year term. Ruth signed the contract as "Ruth, d/b/a Ruth's Family Restaurant."

Soon after Nora was hired, she pointed out to Ruth that Wholesale's prices were generally less than those of the other local supply company. Despite Scott's clear prohibition, Ruth resumed buying supplies from Wholesale, again signing all contracts as "Ruth, d/b/a Ruth's Family Restaurant."

When Scott discovered what Ruth had done, Scott took over management of the restaurant, discharged Nora and Ruth, and refused to pay thousands of dollars of invoices from Wholesale for restaurant supplies delivered to the restaurant.

Wholesale has sued Scott to recover on the outstanding invoices. Nora has sued Scott for breach of the employment contract.

Under agency law:

1. Is Scott liable to Wholesale? Explain.
2. Is Scott liable to Nora? Explain.

CORPORATIONS I.B; IV.C; V.C.1

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Presley, as president of Corp, have authority to retain an attorney to file suit against FS for payment of $11,000 on behalf of Corp?
 - (2) Did Presley, as president of Corp, have authority to declare a dividend payable to Corp's shareholders?
 - (3) Did Presley, as president of Corp, have the authority to enter into a purchase agreement with Large to acquire its local manufacturing plant for Corp?

DISCUSSION

Summary: According to the bylaws of Corp, Presley, as president, is the CEO and has authority to manage the business of the corporation. Therefore, Presley had authority to retain an attorney to file suit against FS to collect the $11,000 FS owed Corp so long as collecting on this type of obligation (an account receivable) was in the ordinary course of business and the lawsuit was filed to preserve corporate assets. Presley did not have authority to declare a dividend to Corp's shareholders. Dividends can be authorized only by the board of directors. Finally, Presley did not have authority to enter into a purchase agreement with Large to acquire its local manufacturing plant for Corp. The purchase of an additional manufacturing plant would be outside the ordinary course of business.

Point One: (30-40%) As president of Corp, Presley had authority to retain an attorney to file suit against FS to collect the $11,000 FS owed Corp because retaining an attorney to collect an account receivable was in the ordinary course of Corp's business. Further, as FS was on the verge of bankruptcy, Presley was attempting to preserve one of Corp's assets.

Corporations are managed by or under the direction of their boards of directors. See Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA) § 8.01. The board of directors generally delegates day-to-day management of the corporation's business to officers. See RMBCA §§ 8.40, 8.41. Traditionally, officers had only those powers conferred on them by the bylaws or resolutions of the board of directors. See Black v. Harrison Home Co., 99 P. 494 (Cal. 1909); Daniel Webster Council, Inc. v. St. James Assoc., Inc., 533 A.2d 329 (N.H. 1987). Today, most states presume that the president has the inherent power to act for the corporation so long as the matter is within the scope of its ordinary business. See, e.g., Lee v. Jenkins Bros., 268 F.2d 357, 365-66 (2d Cir. 1959); Belcher v. Birmingham Trust National Bank, 348 F. Supp. 61 (N.D. Ala. 1968); Gunter v. Novopharm USA, Inc., 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2117 (N.D. Ill. 2001).

Presley was appointed president of Corp by its board of directors. The bylaws provide that “the president, as the chief executive officer of the corporation, shall manage the business of the corporation and perform such other duties as the board of directors may from time to time direct.” Pursuant to the bylaws, Presley, as chief executive officer responsible for managing the business, had the authority to retain an attorney to file suit against FS for the following reasons: Corp manufactures computer desks and sells them to furniture stores like FS. FS purchased computer desks but has not paid for them. Presley was attempting to collect on an account receivable. Hiring an attorney to bring suit against a retailer for payment is part of Corp’s ordinary course of business.

Absent a prohibition contained in bylaws or imposed by the board of directors, Presley had authority to bring suit on behalf of Corp, so long as it was in the ordinary course of business. See Custer Channel Wing Corp v. Frazer, 181 F. Supp. 197, 200 (S.D.N.Y. 1959); West View Hills, Inc. v. Lizau Realty Corp, 160 N.E.2d 622, 624 (N.Y. 1959) (absent direct prohibition, a president has presumptive authority to prosecute suits in the name of the corporation). See generally 2A FLETCHER’S CYCLOPEDIA OF PRIVATE CORPORATIONS § 618 (discussing presidents’ authority to bring legal proceedings). There are no facts indicating that the board of directors has withheld authority from Presley to commence litigation on behalf of Corp.

Some case law indicates that the president may only commence litigation to preserve corporate assets or prevent dissipation. See Lloydona Peters Enterprises v. Dorius, 658 P.2d 1209, 1211 (Utah 1983). Even under this test, Presley had authority to sue FS. As FS was on the verge of bankruptcy, by retaining an attorney to file suit, Presley was attempting to preserve a corporate asset.

Point Two: Presley did not have authority to declare a dividend payable to Corp’s shareholders.
(25-35%) Corporate law reserves the authority to declare dividends to the board of directors.

Although the president of a corporation has the authority to bind the corporation by acts that are in the ordinary course of business (see Point One above), the president does not have the authority to declare or pay dividends to shareholders. Corporate law confers this authority only on the directors of the corporation. See RMBCA § 6.40(a); Del. Gen. Corp. Law. § 170(a). Consequently, only the board of directors has the power to declare a dividend. See 1 PRINCIPLES OF CORP. GOVERNANCE § 3.01 Reporter’s Note (“some matters, such as the declaration of dividends, are required by statute to be decided by the board”). Therefore, Presley, as an officer, did not have the authority to declare a dividend payable to Corp’s shareholders.

Point Three: Presley has no power, as president, to enter into a purchase agreement to acquire (30-40%) Large's local manufacturing plant on behalf of Corp because the transaction is extraordinary in nature.

The president of a corporation has the authority to bind the corporation by acts that are in the ordinary course of business, but does not have the authority to bind the corporation by extraordinary acts. See Point One above. While some acts are clearly ordinary or extraordinary, in many cases there is no bright line demarcation. "Any attempt at precision in drawing this line would almost certainly be futile, because the issue is highly dependent on the context in which it arises, and the types of business transactions that may arise are endlessly variable." See 1 PRINCIPLES OF CORP. GOVERNANCE § 3.01 Reporter's Note. Factors that a court might consider in determining whether a transaction is extraordinary include "the economic magnitude of the action in relation to corporate earnings and assets, the extent of the risk involved, the time span of the action's effect, and the cost of reversing the action." Id. See also Joseph Greenspon's Sons Iron & Steel Co. v. Pecos Valley Gas Co., 156 A. 350, 352-53 (Del. Super. 1931) (factors include "the character of the goods ordered, the amount thereof in relation to the size and condition of the company, the nature of the company, its purposes and aims").

The facts surrounding Presley's planned purchase of Large's local manufacturing plant do not provide numbers to calculate the economic impact of the purchase on the corporation, but they do suggest that the impact would be significant. Additionally, while Presley believes the price is "very reasonable," the payment process could span 10 years. Finally, it seems likely that it would be costly to reverse the transaction if it turned out not to be beneficial to Corp.

Consequently, it is very likely that entering into a purchase agreement to acquire Large's local manufacturing plant would be viewed as an extraordinary act. As such, Presley, as president, would not have actual authority to sign the purchase agreement without the approval of the board of directors.

Further, there are no facts that gave Large a reasonable basis to believe that Presley was authorized to enter into this purchase agreement. Therefore, Presley also lacked apparent authority to enter into the purchase agreement.

COMMERCIAL PAPER IIB, VJ, VIIB, VIID

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Is a promissory note a negotiable instrument if, in a separate document, the obligor promises to do an act in addition to paying money?
 - (2) Does a person entitled to enforce an instrument need to attempt recovery from the obligor before seeking recovery from an accommodation party that signed in the capacity of maker?
 - (3) Does tender of partial payment by the accommodated party discharge an accommodation party?
 - (4) Does an extension of time discharge an accommodation party?

DISCUSSION

Summary: The promissory note is a valid negotiable instrument. Kit's promise to paint Art's house is set forth in a separate document and is not referenced in the promissory note; therefore, the separate promise does not destroy the note's negotiability. Art is an accommodation party because he signed the instrument and did not receive any direct benefit from the loan proceeds. Art signed in the capacity of maker without any limiting language. Therefore, Dealer, a holder and a person entitled to enforce the instrument, may proceed directly against Art without first pursuing Kit.

However, Art is not obligated to pay Dealer anything. When Dealer refused Kit's tender of $2,000, Dealer released Art to the extent of $2,000. When Dealer extended Kit's time to pay without consulting Art, Art was released from his obligation to pay the remaining $3,000 because Art can demonstrate loss with respect to his right of recourse against Kit. Kit had the money on the day the loan was due, but currently cannot be found.

Point One: (20-30%) The promissory note is a valid negotiable instrument. Kit's promise in a separate agreement to paint Art's house does not affect the note's negotiability.

The promissory note satisfies the requisites of negotiability set forth in § 3-104 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). It is an unconditional promise to pay ("I promise to pay") a fixed amount of money ($5,000) payable at a definite time (November 4, 2003) and payable to order ("to the order of Dealer"). The promissory note does not contain any other undertakings or instructions. Kit's undertaking to paint Art's house constitutes compensation to Art for being an accommodation party. But because their separate agreement is not included or referenced in the note, it is not an additional undertaking or a condition that destroys negotiability. See UCC § 3-106.

Point Two: Dealer, a person entitled to enforce the instrument (UCC § 3-301), may collect from (20-30%) Art, an accommodation maker, without first proceeding against Kit.

Dealer is a holder of the instrument because the instrument was issued to him and he is the identified person in possession. UCC § 1-201(20). As a holder, he is a person entitled to enforce the instrument. UCC § 3-301. Art is an accommodation party because he signed the instrument and did not receive any direct benefit from the loan proceeds. UCC § 3-419(a). The loan proceeds were used to purchase Kit's car. Kit's promise to paint Art's house constitutes consideration for Art's agreement to guarantee the loan; it does not constitute a direct benefit from the loan proceeds.

An accommodation party "is obliged to pay the instrument in the capacity in which [he] signs." UCC § 3-419(b). When Art signed the promissory note directly under Kit's name, he signed in the capacity of maker. A maker is liable to pay the note "according to the terms at the time it was issued." UCC § 3-412. Art did not include any words unambiguously "guaranteeing collection rather than payment." Therefore Dealer, a person entitled to enforce the instrument, can proceed against Art, an accommodation maker, under UCC § 3-412 without first proceeding against Kit. See UCC § 3-419(d).

Point Three: When Dealer rejected Kit's tender of payment of $2,000, Art was discharged to the (20-30%) extent of the amount of tender. See UCC § 3-603(b).

"If tender of payment of an obligation to pay an instrument is made to a person entitled to enforce the instrument and the tender is refused, there is discharge, to the extent of the amount of the tender, of the obligation of an indorser or accommodation party having a right of recourse with respect to the obligation to which the tender relates." UCC § 3-603(b).

Art, as an accommodation party, has a right of recourse against Kit in the event Art pays the note. UCC § 3-419(e). Thus, when Kit tendered $2,000 to Dealer, a person entitled to enforce the instrument (See above), and Dealer rejected the payment, Art was released to the extent of the tender ($2,000).

Point Four: When Dealer extended Kit's time to pay without Art's consent, Art was discharged (20-30%) from his obligation to pay the remaining $3,000 because Art can prove the extension caused him loss with respect to his right of recourse against Kit.

"If a person entitled to enforce an instrument agrees, with or without consideration, to an extension of the due date of the obligation of a party to pay the instrument, the extension discharges an indorser or accommodation party having a right of recourse against the party whose obligation is extended to the extent the indorser or accommodation party proves that the extension caused loss to the indorser or accommodation party with respect to the right of recourse.” UCC § 3-605(c).

Dealer, a person entitled to enforce the promissory note (See Point Two above), granted Kit an extension of time from November 4, 2003, until January 2, 2004. As a result, Art, an accommodation party who has a right of recourse against Kit if he is obligated to pay the loan (See UCC § 3-419(e)), is discharged to the extent he can prove that this extension caused loss with respect to his right of recourse. Here, Art can show that the extension caused him a loss of the remaining $3,000. On the due date, Kit had the money necessary to pay the debt. Kit has since disappeared with the money. Accordingly, Art should be discharged from having to pay Dealer the remaining $3,000.

NOTE: If an applicant missed the tender of payment argument, the applicant could correctly conclude that Art was discharged from the entire $5,000 based solely upon this extension of time.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE I.A.1, I.E.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) Were the requirements for federal diversity jurisdiction satisfied as to the tort claim, given that Buyer and Seller were citizens of different states when the suit was filed but subsequently became citizens of the same state?
 - (1)(b) Does the federal district court have jurisdiction over Buyer's contract claim, even though it does not independently satisfy the jurisdictional amount-in-controversy requirement?
 - (2) May the court transfer a case to another district when venue did not lie in the other district at the time the suit was filed?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Because Buyer and Seller were citizens of different states at the time the suit was filed, the requirements for diversity jurisdiction were met with respect to the tort claim. Moreover, the contract claim was properly aggregated with the tort claim to satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement, and in any event there was supplemental jurisdiction over the contract claim because both claims derive from a common nucleus of operative fact. Transfer to the federal court in State Y would be inappropriate because the claim could not have been brought there in the first instance.

Point One(a): Buyer properly invoked federal diversity jurisdiction as to the tort claim because (30-40%) Buyer was a citizen of State Y and Seller was a citizen of State X when the complaint was filed, and the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000.

The court should deny Seller's motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction over the tort claim. The requirements for federal diversity jurisdiction have been established in this case.

Buyer's claims are based on state law. Therefore, to proceed in federal court, he must satisfy 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a), which establishes the requirements for federal subject matter jurisdiction based on diversity of citizenship. According to the plain terms of the statute, "the matter in controversy [must] exceed the sum or value of $75,000," and be between "citizens of different states." The courts have interpreted § 1332 as requiring the parties to be diverse at the time the suit is filed, and not at the time the cause of action arises. See, e.g., Gordon v. Steele, 376 F. Supp. 575 (W.D. Pa. 1974) (citing cases); Charles A. Wright, Arthur R. Miller & Edward H. Cooper, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 3608 (1998). Here the amount-in-controversy requirement has been met with regard to the claim for personal injury and lost wages ($500,000), and the only question is whether the diversity requirement is met.

In determining the citizenship of the parties, the courts look to the domicile of each party, examining “[t]he fact of residency . . . coupled with a finding of intent to remain indefinitely.” Gordon, supra, quoting cases; see also Mas v. Perry, 489 F.2d 1396 (5th Cir. 1974). A change of domicile is effected “by a combination of two elements: (a) taking up residence in a different domicile with (b) the intention to remain there.” Id. The important question is whether Buyer was a citizen of State Y at the time the suit was filed. Having completed his move to State Y at that time, and having the intent to remain in State Y, Buyer was then a State Y citizen. Buyer was therefore diverse from Seller, who was still a citizen of State X when the suit was filed.

Indeed, some applicants may conclude, based on Buyer’s rental of an apartment and his intent to remain in Big City, that he was already a citizen of State Y at the time of the accident (and hence before the time the suit was filed).

Because citizenship is determined at the time suit is filed, Seller’s post-filing move to State Y does not affect the court’s diversity jurisdiction. The parties were diverse at the time the suit was filed and changes in citizenship after filing are irrelevant, absent bad faith on the part of a party. Wright, Miller & Cooper, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 3608 (1998).

Point One(b): Although the $2,500 contract claim alone would not satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement for a diversity action, Buyer may aggregate the contract claim with his tort claim in order to satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement.

Buyer’s effort to join the small contract claim to his large tort claim can be analyzed in two ways. First, under traditional aggregation rules, a single plaintiff with “two entirely unrelated claims against a single diverse defendant” may bring them in federal court as long as the aggregate of the claims exceeds the $75,000 amount-in-controversy requirement. Charles Alan Wright, LAW OF FEDERAL COURTS 210 (5th ed. 1994). The rationale is that “the diversity statute confers federal jurisdiction over ‘civil actions’ satisfying the required minimum amount in controversy . . . not over counts, thus permitting the plaintiff to aggregate the stakes in his separate claims or counts to come up to the minimum.” Herremans v. Carrera Designs, Inc., 157 F.3d 1118, 1121 (7th Cir. 1998). Thus, because the aggregate of Buyer’s tort and contract claims exceeds $75,000, the court has jurisdiction to hear them all, including the contract claim for $2,500.

Second, under the federal supplemental jurisdiction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a), district courts “shall have supplemental jurisdiction over all claims that are so related to claims in the action within such original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy.” See also United Mine Workers v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715 (1966). The standard test is whether the claims “derive from a common nucleus of operative fact.” Id. In this problem, the tort and contract claims, which both derive from the sale of a car with defective brakes, are “so related” as to arise from the “same case or controversy,” and the district court may, accordingly, take supplemental jurisdiction over the contract claim. None of the exceptions in § 1367(b) apply.

Point Two: The State X federal district court cannot transfer the action to the federal court in (30-40%) State Y because venue would not have been proper in State Y at the time the action was first filed.

Seller's motion for a change of venue should be denied. In a diversity case, venue properly lies, and a civil action may only be brought, in a judicial district "where any defendant resides . . ." or "in which a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred . . ." 28 U.S.C. § 1391(a). At the time the case was commenced, Seller, the defendant, resided in State X. Moreover, all relevant events occurred in State X. Hence, at the time the suit was filed, venue was proper only in the State X federal district court.

Seller's subsequent move to State Y does not warrant a change of venue. The change of venue statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1404, permits a district court to transfer actions "for the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice." However, a change of venue is only permitted "to any other district or division where [the case] might have been brought." Id.

The relevant time frame under both the basic venue statute and the venue transfer statute is the time that the suit is filed. As a consequence, the court should deny Seller's motion for a change of venue. At the time Buyer's suit was brought, the only possible venue was State X. As noted above, State X was both Seller's residence and the place where a substantial part of the events giving rise to Buyer's claim—the sale of the car and the accident—occurred. There was little or no connection between State Y and the events giving rise to the action. Accordingly, because the case could not have been brought in State Y, the requirements of § 1404 are not met, and the motion for a change of venue must be denied. It is irrelevant that Seller now resides in State Y.

In addition, it is possible to argue that discretionary factors also would justify denial of a transfer. Because the events occurred in State X, and most, if not all, of the witnesses are from State X (the mechanic, those responding to the accident, the hospital employees treating Buyer, and Friend), it can be argued that "the convenience of the parties and witnesses, and . . . the interests of justice" are all best served by permitting the case to go forward in State X.

NOTE: While an answer that mentioned only the discretionary factors might lead to a correct result, it would not be an adequate answer. The key point, which controls the result, is that the action could not have been brought originally in State Y and therefore could not be transferred there.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) May a custodial parent relocate to another state when the move infringes on the noncustodial parent's right of visitation, and was it proper to allow relocation of the children in this case?
 - (2) May a court in a state other than that of the original child support order enforce the collection of child support in a case where the obligor still resides in the original state but has been personally served in the state where modification is sought?
 - (3) May a court in a state other than that of the original child support order modify the order based on its own law in a case where the obligor still resides in the original state but has been personally served in the state where modification is sought?
 - (4) May a court in a state other than that in which the original child custody order was entered modify a child custody decree when the parent-contestant still resides in the original state but has been personally served in the state where modification is sought?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Although the various states utilize a variety of decision-making standards in judging parental relocation requests that inhibit visitation with the noncustodial parent, a move sought in good faith that will serve the children's best interests ordinarily will be granted. Although State B obtained personal jurisdiction over Harold when he was personally served in State B, jurisdiction over the interstate enforcement and modification of child support orders is governed by the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA). Under that Act, State B would have jurisdiction to enforce the State A order as long as Wendy registers it, but because Harold is still a resident of State A, State B would not have jurisdiction to modify the order.

Jurisdiction over the interstate modification of a child custody order is governed by the federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (PKPA). Under the PKPA, as well as the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), the State B court would not have jurisdiction to modify the State A custody order decree because Harold is still a resident of State A.

Point One: If a custodial parent's relocation petition is made in good faith and not for the (30-35%) of defeating the other parent's visitation rights and if the move is in the best interests of the children, permission to move with the children will be granted.

In enunciating standards to govern relocation disputes, courts have balanced the impact on visitation by the noncustodial parent against the benefits of the move to both the children and the custodial parent. See Homer Clark, THE LAW OF DOMESTIC RELATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES § 19.4 at 814 (2d ed. 1988). Although the law in this area “has been unusually unstable, with some states having undergone rather significant shifts in their standards over recent years . . . , [t]he clear trend has been that of increasing leniency toward the parent with whom the child has been primarily living.” American Law Institute, PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF FAMILY DISSOLUTION § 2.17 cmt. d (2002). Some states now permit the custodial parent and child to move unless the parent's motives for moving are vindictive. See, e.g., Aaby v. Strange, 924 S.W.2d 623 (Tenn. 1996). Other states require the parent who wishes to relocate to show that the proposed move serves the child's best interests. See, e.g., Pollock v. Pollock, 889 P.2d 633 (Ariz. 1995). Yet others will permit the custodial parent to relocate unless the evidence shows that the move will be detrimental to the child. See, e.g., Marriage of Pape, 989 P.2d 1120 (Wash. 1999). Some courts have also emphasized the availability of an alternative reasonable visitation schedule; if such an alternative exists, the court will almost always grant the relocation request. See Schwartz v. Schwartz, 812 P.2d 1268 (Nev. 1991).

Under any of these approaches, Wendy should be permitted to relocate to State B. There is no evidence that Wendy's proposed move was aimed at defeating Harold's visitation rights, and the court found that her request was made in good faith. Wendy was offered a job in State B at a salary twice that of her job in State A, an improvement in her economic circumstances that would clearly benefit the children. There is no evidence that the move would adversely affect the children socially or educationally. Both are very young (ages 5 and 7) and thus highly unlikely to suffer from the loss of long-term relationships or the disruption of an academic program. Because Wendy's new home in State B is only 100 miles from Harold's, it is likely that a reasonable alternative visitation schedule that will fully protect the children's relationship with Harold can be worked out: the original visitation order called for visitation on alternate weekends and during the month of July; certainly the July visitation schedule could be preserved and some of Harold's alternate weekends could be replaced with longer visitation periods during school holidays; if Harold and Wendy were to share the job of transporting the children to Harold's home, weekend visits also seem quite plausible. Accordingly, the court was correct in allowing Wendy to relocate with the children.

NOTE: Applicants who analyze this issue on the basis of the constitutional right to travel should not receive credit. However, applicants who note that some courts use that right as a rationale for a consensual relocation standard might receive a modicum of extra credit.

Point Two: A registered child support order is enforceable in a nonissuing state.
(20-30%)

The interstate enforcement of child support is governed by UIFSA, which has been adopted by all states. Although the courts of State B have personal jurisdiction over Harold based on in-state personal service (See Burnham v. Superior Court of California, 495 U.S. 604 (1990)), personal jurisdiction is not enough to give a State B court jurisdiction to enforce or modify the State A support and custody decrees.

Under UIFSA § 603(b), a registered child support order issued in another state is “enforceable in the same manner and is subject to the same procedures as an order issued by a tribunal of this State.” Thus, the State B court may exercise personal jurisdiction over Harold and enforce the State A child support order because Wendy registered that order.

NOTE: Applicants could receive extra credit for noting that Wendy could still enforce the State A order through a State B court even if State B did not have personal jurisdiction over Harold. To do so, she would utilize UIFSA’s two-state procedures.

Point Three: The state that issued a child support order retains exclusive jurisdiction to modify (20-30%) that order as long as the support obligor continues to reside in that state.

The interstate modification of a child support order is also governed by UIFSA. Under UIFSA, the state that originally issued a child support order has continuing, exclusive jurisdiction to modify the order if that state remains the residence of the obligee, the child, or the obligor, and at least one of the parties does not consent to the jurisdiction of another forum. See UIFSA § 205. See also UIFSA § 603 (“A tribunal of this State shall recognize and enforce, but may not modify, a registered order if the issuing tribunal had jurisdiction.”). Harold continues to reside in State A and has not consented to the jurisdiction of another forum. Thus, a State B court does not have jurisdiction to modify the State A order. An extension of the child support obligation from 18 to 21 years would represent an impermissible modification because, under UIFSA, the law of the issuing state, State A, governs the support obligation, not the law of the enforcing state, State B. See UIFSA § 604. The fact that Harold was personally served in State B does not change this result. See Point Two above.

Point Four: Only the courts of the state that originally issued a child custody order may (20-30%) modify that order while the child or any contestant continues to reside in the issuing state.

The interstate modification of a child custody order is governed by the federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (PKPA). The joint decision-making provision that Wendy sought to modify is part of the State A custody order, and the PKPA provides that a state may not modify a custody order issued by another state if either the child or any contestant continues to reside in the issuing state and the issuing state’s courts do not decline to exercise jurisdiction. See 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(c)). State B’s personal jurisdiction over Harold does not alter this result. Under the Supremacy Clause, the PKPA takes precedence over any conflicting state law. See, e.g., Murphy v. Woerner, 748 P.2d 749 (Alaska 1988).

It is also unlikely that State B law would conflict with the PKPA, as the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), which in 2003 had been adopted in 31 states, contains custody-modification standards virtually identical to those of the PKPA. Under the UCCJEA, a state that properly issued a custody decree retains continuing, exclusive jurisdiction until all parties and the child have left the state, or an issuing state court has determined that there is no longer any significant connection between the child and the person remaining in the state and that substantial evidence is no longer available in that state. See UCCJEA § 202.

Since there are no facts to suggest that State A would decline to exercise jurisdiction, a State B court may not modify the State A custody decree. Thus, if Wendy wishes to modify the custodial arrangement, she will be required to institute proceedings in State A.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES II. F.1, 3; II. G.; II. I.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Does the physical destruction of one executed copy of the 1994 will, done with the intent to revoke, effectively revoke the 1994 will if the other executed copy has not been physically destroyed?
 - (2) Is the 1991 will revived by the revocation of the 1994 will?
 - (3) Assuming the 1991 will is revived, is Cousin entitled to $100,000, $10,000, or nothing?
 - (4) Assuming the 1991 will is revived, did the bequest to Sister adeem?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Testator's 1994 will was revoked by physical destruction even though only one of the two executed copies was physically destroyed because in doing so Testator intended to revoke the 1994 will. Under the State A statute, revocation of the 1994 will revived the 1991 will. Under the 1991 will, $10,000 passed to Cousin because the handwritten cancellation of that bequest was conditioned on the effectiveness of the $100,000 bequest. However, the $100,000 bequest cannot be given effect because it was not witnessed. Furthermore, while under the common law the bequest to Sister adeems, in some states Sister is entitled to Whiteacre, the replacement property for Blackacre. If an applicant concludes that the 1994 will was not revoked because there was one remaining executed copy, Cousin and Sister take nothing.

Point One: Testator's 1994 will was revoked by the physical destruction of one of two executed (25-35%) copies of that will.

All states permit the revocation of a will by physical destruction if that act is accompanied by an intent to revoke. See generally Uniform Probate Code (UPC) § 2-507. If Testator had not executed the 1994 will in duplicate, there would be no question that it was revoked because the facts evidence both a physical destruction and an intent to revoke.

However, the 1994 will was executed in duplicate, and the physical destruction of one copy may have been motivated either by a desire either to revoke the will or to revoke only the copy. While the matter has not been considered in all states, the prevailing view is that the revocation of one copy presumptively revokes the will. See, e.g., In re Betts' Will, 107 N.Y.S.2d 626 (N.Y. Sur. 1951); In re Estate of Mettee, 694 P.2d 1325 (Kan. Ct. App. 1985). The proponent of the copy of the will that was not destroyed must then prove that Testator did not intend to revoke the will. Here, Testator's statement accompanying the destruction of one copy as well as the other surrounding facts suggest that Testator intended to revoke the 1994 will for the purpose of reviving the 1991 will. Thus, Testator would not have intended the other copy of the 1994 will to remain in effect.

Point Two: Under the State A statute, the 1991 will was revived by the revocation of the 1994 will because there is no evidence that Testator did not intend a revival of the earlier will.
(5-15%)

The State A statute provides that "the revocation of a will that revoked an earlier will revives the earlier will in the absence of a contrary intention." Here, the facts support the conclusion that Testator, by revoking the 1994 will, intended to revive the 1991 will. In particular, when revoking the 1994 will, Testator made reference to the fact that by revoking the 1994 will Cousin would be taken care of. That result would only be true if the 1991 will were revived. Given that intent and the statutory directive, the 1991 will is revived.

Point Three: Under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation, Cousin is entitled to $10,000. Cousin is not entitled to $100,000 because that intended bequest was made by an unattested act.

On the assumption that the 1991 will was revived, the question arises whether Cousin takes $100,000 as Testator likely intended, $10,000 under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation, or nothing because the typewritten bequest to Cousin was revoked by cancellation.

While Testator may well have intended Cousin to take $100,000 as evidenced by the handwriting on the will and the statement accompanying the revocation of the 1994 will, since State A does not permit holographic wills, that writing cannot be given effect as a valid will or codicil because it was not witnessed. While the facts do not state what the State A statute requires for execution formalities, all states minimally require two witnesses to create a valid will unless they permit holographic wills.

Given that Cousin cannot take the $100,000, the issue arises whether Testator's scratching out of the $10,000 bequest to Cousin results in the revocation of that bequest under the typical revocation statute.

Under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation, the physical revocation of a bequest can be ignored if evidence exists to suggest that the testator revoked that bequest on the mistaken assumption that some other bequest would be effective. See generally William M. McGovern & Sheldon F. Kurtz, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES § 5.3 (2d ed. 2001). Such evidence appears here not only from the fact that immediately above the scratching out of the bequest appeared the words of the greater, albeit ineffective, bequest, but also from the statements Testator made to his neighbor regarding Cousin when the 1994 will was revoked. If the doctrine does not apply, however, then Cousin takes nothing because the $100,000 is ineffective as a bequest and the $10,000 bequest was revoked by cancellation.

Point Four: Under the common law, the bequest to Sister adeemed, although some states have (15-25%) statutes substituting the new home for the home that was sold.

An ademption of a bequest occurs when the subject of a specific devise has been sold by the testator between the time the will was executed and the time the testator dies. See generally McGovern & Kurtz, supra, § 8.1 (2d ed. 2001); In re Estate of Brown, 922 S.W.2d 605 (Tex. App. 1996) (devise of family home at specified address adeemed where home at time will was signed was not the home at time of testator's death). The theory behind ademption is that a testator, knowing of the disposition of the specifically devised property, could execute a new will to take account of that disposition if the testator wanted some substitute bequest to pass to the beneficiary. Absent the execution of a new will, Testator presumably does not intend the beneficiary to take any substituted property.

Some states, however, have adopted statutes that substitute so-called replacement property for the specific property disposed of by the testator. For example, § 2-606 of the Uniform Probate Code (UPC) provides that a specific devisee (here, Sister) is entitled to any property acquired by a testator as "replacement property" for the property that the testator sold. The facts support the conclusion that Whiteacre was acquired by Testator as a substitute for Blackacre. Thus, under the UPC, or a similar statute, Sister would be entitled to Whiteacre. Absent such a statute, Sister would be entitled to nothing under the common law.

In the absence of a statute, a court might also reach the same result by noting that the will reflects the intent to devise Sister the family home, arguably without regard to whether the family home was Blackacre or Whiteacre.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS IV. B, D, F, G

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Sal's purchase-money security interest in the oven, which involved a delayed filing, defeat Local Bank where Local Bank is an intervening judicial lien creditor?
 - (2) Did Sal's purchase-money security interest in the oven, filed only with the Secretary of State's Office, defeat Finance Company, a subsequent mortgage lender that has filed a lien on the building in which the oven is located in the appropriate local real estate records office?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Sal's extension of credit to Bill provided the purchase money for Bill to buy the oven. When Bill signed the security agreement on March 1 granting Sal's a security interest in the oven, which was "goods" at the time of the purchase, a purchase-money security interest attached in favor of Sal's. It was not perfected as against other creditors at that time because Sal's had not filed a financing statement. However, a purchase-money secured creditor has 20 days after delivery of the collateral to perfect by filing. If the creditor does so, the security interest is perfected retroactively to the date of attachment. Under these facts, Sal's perfected by filing on March 28, which was less than 20 days after the March 14 delivery to Bill.

Ordinarily, a lien creditor, such as Local Bank, would have priority over an earlier unperfected secured creditor. However, because of the retroactive effect of Sal's filing its purchase-money interest, which related back to March 1 (the day Sal's security interest attached), Sal's prevails over Local Bank as to the oven.

However, Sal's failure to effect a valid "fixture filing" produces the opposite result vis-à-vis Finance Company. The oven is clearly a fixture. In order to perfect its security interest in the oven as a fixture against persons with interest in the real estate, Sal's was required to file a record of its interest in the local real estate records office designated by state law. Because Sal's did not do this, Sal's interest was not perfected as against Finance Company. Finance Company, as an "encumbrancer" by virtue of the mortgage granted to it by Bill, perfected its security interest in the building (and therefore in the fixtures as well) by filing in the appropriate real estate records office. Thus, Finance Company's interest in the oven prevails over Sal's.

Point One: Because Sal's interest in the oven was a purchase-money security interest, Sal's had (55-65%) priority over Local Bank, an intervening judicial lien creditor, even though Sal's failed to file its financing statement until after the judicial lien arose.

Because Sal's extension of credit enabled Bill to purchase the oven, Sal's had a purchase-money security interest in "goods." Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) § 9-103(1)(b). The oven qualified as "goods" under UCC § 9-102(44) because it was "moveable" when the security interest attached on March 1. Although a judicial lien creditor would normally have priority over an unperfected secured creditor, UCC § 9-317(a)(2), in this case Sal's lien had priority over the interest of Local Bank because Sal's perfected a purchase-money security interest within the grace period provided for in UCC § 9-317(e).

UCC § 9-317(e) provides that, if a purchase-money secured creditor files its financing statement within 20 days after the debtor receives delivery of the collateral, then the secured creditor will take priority over the rights of a judicial lien creditor whose lien arose between the attachment of the purchase-money security interest and the filing of the financing statement. In this case, Sal's perfected its interest on March 28 when it filed its financing statement in the Secretary of State's Office. UCC §§ 9-308(a), 9-310(a) (attachment plus filing a financing statement will qualify as perfection). That date was more than 20 days after Sal's security interest in the oven attached on March 1. UCC § 9-203(b) (attachment occurs where the creditor has given value, the debtor has rights in the collateral, and the debtor has signed a security agreement). However, Sal's perfected within 20 days after Bill received delivery of the collateral on March 14. Therefore, Sal's perfected security interest in the oven relates back to the date of attachment, March 1, and takes priority over Local Bank's judicial lien, which became perfected on March 26.

Point Two: Because Sal's failed to file in the local real estate records, Finance Company has (35-45%) priority over Sal's; Finance Company is a subsequent mortgagee that perfected its interest in the restaurant building where the oven is located by filing in the local real estate records.

The oven in which Sal's has a purchase-money security interest is a "fixture" under Article 9 and applicable state law because it is "so related to particular real property that an interest in [it] arises under real property law." UCC § 9-102(41).

The general rule under Article 9 for priority in fixtures is that a security interest in the fixture will be subordinate to "a conflicting interest of an encumbrancer or owner of the related real property other than the debtor." UCC § 9-334(c). Here the related real property is the restaurant building, and Finance Company's mortgage in that building qualifies as an encumbrance on it. Thus, Finance Company is as an "encumbrancer . . . of the related real property."

UCC § 9-334 includes a number of exceptions to the general rule that security interests in fixtures are subordinate to a conflicting interest of an owner or encumbrancer of the related real property. The only exceptions that might have been available to Sal's in UCC § 9-334(d) (purchase-money priority exception) and (e)(1) (where the debtor had a record interest in the realty) would require, among other things, that Sal's had effected a proper "fixture filing." UCC § 9-102(30). A fixture filing must be recorded in the local real estate records office. UCC § 9-502(b). In this case, Sal's failed to file in the local real estate records office.

Because Finance Company is an encumbrancer of the related real property and because Sal's fails to qualify for any of the exceptions listed in UCC § 9-334, Finance Company has priority as to the oven even though Finance Company's security interest was created after Sal's perfected its interest in the oven by filing in the Secretary of State's office.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP I. B.; II. A, B, C

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) What is the nature of the legal relationship between Scott and Ruth?
 - (2) Does an agent have actual authority to bind an undisclosed principal to contracts that are made in violation of the principal's instructions to the agent?
 - (3) Does an agent have apparent authority to bind an undisclosed principal to contracts that are made in violation of the principal's instructions to the agent?
 - (4) Does an agent have inherent agency power to bind an undisclosed principal to contracts that are made in violation of the principal's instructions to the agent?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Ruth was Scott's agent for purposes of operating the restaurant. However, Ruth did not have actual authority to purchase supplies from Wholesale or to employ Nora for a 20-year term because these actions violated Scott's express instructions to Ruth. Ruth also lacked apparent authority to bind Scott because Scott was an undisclosed principal, and neither Wholesale nor Nora was aware that Ruth was acting in an agency capacity. Scott did nothing to manifest to Wholesale or Nora that Ruth had authority to act on his behalf.

Nevertheless, Ruth probably had inherent agency power to bind Scott to pay for the supplies purchased from Wholesale. The purchase of restaurant supplies is the kind of transaction usually performed by a restaurant manager, and the principal is appropriately held responsible for that transaction, even if Ruth violated Scott's orders in the way in which she carried it out. By contrast, hiring an assistant manager for a 20-year term is not the type of transaction one would ordinarily expect to be performed by a restaurant manager, and Ruth's inherent agency power probably did not extend to binding Scott to such a contract.

Point One: Ruth was Scott's general agent for the operation of the restaurant. Because the agency was not disclosed to persons dealing with Ruth's Family Restaurant, Scott was an "undisclosed principal."

Ruth and Scott agreed that Ruth would act as Scott's agent. Moreover, Ruth was a "general agent" for Scott, having been authorized, as manager of the restaurant, to conduct a series of transactions to ensure continuity of service for Scott, as owner of Ruth's Family Restaurant. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 3(1) (1958). However, neither party disclosed the agency relationship to outsiders. As a result, Scott was Ruth's "undisclosed principal." See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 4(3) (1958) (defining undisclosed principal).

As Scott's agent, Ruth could bind Scott to contracts with Wholesale or Nora if Ruth had actual authority, apparent authority, or inherent agency power to enter such contracts. The issue in this problem is whether an agent has the power to bind an undisclosed principal to contracts that the agent enters in violation of instructions from the principal.

Point Two: Because her actions violated Scott's express instructions, Ruth had no actual (20-30%) authority to purchase restaurant supplies from Wholesale or to hire Nora for a 20-year term.

Actual authority "to affect the legal relations of the principal" exists only if the agent's acts are "done in accordance with the principal's manifestations of consent." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 7 (1958). Thus, Ruth had actual authority to bind Scott only insofar as Ruth acted consistently with Scott's "manifestations of consent" to her.

Here, Ruth's acts were completely contrary to Scott's instructions. Ruth was told not to contract with Wholesale, yet she did so. Ruth was instructed to hire employees only on an at-will basis, yet she hired Nora for a 20-year term. Because these acts were done contrary to Scott's "manifestations of consent" to Ruth, they were not done with actual authority.

Point Three: Ruth had no apparent authority to bind Scott because Scott was an undisclosed (20-30%) principal, and neither Nora nor Wholesale was aware that Ruth was Scott's agent.

Apparent authority is created when a purported principal causes third persons to believe that the purported agent has the power to act on behalf of the principal. In other words, apparent authority depends on a person's manifestations to a third person "that another is his agent." See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 8 & comment a (1958).

Ruth could not have apparent authority to bind Scott because Scott made no manifestations to anyone that Ruth was his agent. In fact, no one other than Ruth or Scott was aware of their agency relationship. Furthermore, Scott and Ruth took pains to avoid disclosing the agency, even to the extent of Ruth's signing all contracts as "Ruth, d/b/a Ruth's Family Restaurant." "Apparent authority exists only with regard to those who believe and have reason to believe that there is authority; there can be no apparent authority created by an undisclosed principal." Id. Neither Nora nor Wholesale was aware that Scott was Ruth's principal.

Point Four: Scott might be liable to Wholesale on the theory that Ruth had inherent agency (25-35%) power to bind Scott to contracts for the purchase of restaurant supplies, but a court is unlikely to conclude that Ruth had inherent agency power to bind Scott to an extraordinary employment contract.

Even if Ruth lacked actual or apparent authority to bind Scott, as Scott's agent, Ruth might have had "inherent agency power" to bind Scott to transactions undertaken to benefit Scott that were similar to the types of activities authorized, even if those transactions were in violation of orders. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 8A and comment a (1958). The concept of "inherent agency power" provides a means for courts to protect persons dealing with agents even when the agent violates orders. The theory is that an agent is generally acting "in the principal's interests" and is "trusted and controlled" by the principal. When such an agent's disobedience causes a loss, it is "fairer" that the loss fall upon the principal than on a third party, at least if the agent is engaged in acts generally of a kind that would fall within his or her actual authority, but for the violation of instructions.

Inherent agency power has generally been found in precisely the kind of situation presented on these facts. Can an agent have been given general power to manage a business and has done acts for the principal's account, albeit in violation of instructions. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY §§ 161, 194-195 (1958).

Under the facts of this problem, Ruth probably did have inherent agency power to contract with Wholesale for the delivery of restaurant supplies. Ruth was a general agent and was authorized to purchase restaurant supplies. Purchasing restaurant supplies from the local supply company that offered the best prices would be a "usual" or ordinary transaction for an agent managing a restaurant. If Ruth somehow violated Scott's special instructions, Scott should nonetheless be liable to Wholesale, especially since Scott's business certainly benefitted by purchasing cheaper supplies from Wholesale. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 194 (1958).

On the other hand, Scott is not likely to be held liable to Nora. Ruth's entry into a contract to employ Nora as an assistant manager for a 20-year term was not a transaction that would be "usual" in the restaurant business. Although restaurant managers regularly hire and fire employees, at-will employment contracts are the norm. An employment contract specifying a 20-year term would be extraordinary and unusual in any business; certainly a 20-year term of employment is neither usual nor necessary in employing an assistant restaurant manager. A restaurant's business manager would not ordinarily have the power to enter such a contract. Therefore, Ruth had no inherent agency power to bind Scott to a 20-year employment contract with Nora.

Another fact to consider is that Nora was Ruth's niece, which suggests that the fairness concern that undergirds inherent agency analysis may, in fact, cut in Scott's favor here. It would seem unfair to hold Scott responsible for Ruth's violation of instructions when the violation was done to benefit a member of Ruth's family.

NOTE: The draft Third Restatement of Agency eliminates the concept of inherent agency power, but would reach the same results in the case of an undisclosed agency relationship under a theory that it calls "estoppel of undisclosed principal." See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY, TENTATIVE DRAFT No. 2, §2.06.

Questions

Question 1

Ten years ago, Testator purchased an insurance policy on his life from Insurer. The policy provided that Insurer would pay the proceeds only to the person named on a beneficiary form filed with Insurer. Testator filed such a form with Insurer, naming his son Sam as the sole beneficiary.

A year later, Testator, concerned about his failing physical health, opened Account #1 at Bank in the name of “Testator and Sam” as joint tenants with right of survivorship, not as tenants in common. Testator thereafter gave Sam checks that would enable him to withdraw funds from Account #1. Testator was the only person who deposited funds into Account #1, and he received all statements relating to it.

Five years ago, Testator duly executed a will containing the following dispositive clauses:

1. I give the proceeds of my Insurer life insurance policy to my daughter, Doris.
2. I give Account #1 at Bank to my daughter, Doris.
3. I give the balance of my estate to the children of my son Sam, to be divided equally among them.

Three months ago, Testator died and his will was duly probated. Testator was survived by Sam, Doris, and one of Sam’s three children. Two of Sam’s children predeceased Testator. One of the predeceased children, Ann, died seven years ago, and the other, Bill, died two years ago. Ann had a child who survived Testator, and Bill had a child who survived Testator.

Testator was a domiciliary of State A. State A law provides that, “if a beneficiary who is a descendant of the testator predeceases the testator, the beneficiary’s surviving issue take the share the deceased beneficiary would have taken had the beneficiary survived.”

To whom should the life insurance proceeds, Account #1, and the balance of Testator’s estate be distributed? Explain.

Question 2

Peg, an entrepreneur, decided to develop a widget manufacturing business. Widget production requires the use of a chemical called chromite. Because the market price for chromite has fluctuated between $150 and $200 per ton over the past year, the first thing Peg did was contact numerous chemical companies to find a long-term supplier for chromite.

On May 20, Peg received a quote from Chem Corp. stating that it could supply Peg's corporation with all of its chromite at $145 per ton for the next three years. Chem Corp. indicated that the quote would expire at the end of the week. Peg informed Chem Corp. that her corporation, to be called "Acme, Inc.," would not be formed by that time. Peg further indicated that, "The deal should be between Acme, Inc. and Chem Corp. If Chem Corp. does not care if I sign for a non-existent corporation, you have a deal." Chem Corp. responded: "No problem. We know with whom we are dealing and what the chromite's for. Do not waste our time. If you are serious, lock in the deal."

On May 26, Peg and Chem Corp. signed a three-year requirements contract for Chem Corp. to supply her soon-to-be-formed corporation with all of its chromite at a price of $145 per ton. Peg signed the contract "Peg, as agent for Acme, Inc., a corporation to be formed." The requirements contract was valid under state law. It contained a valid and substantial liquidated damages clause in the event Acme purchased chromite from any other supplier.

On August 1, Peg formed Acme, Inc. Peg was a shareholder, but not an officer or a director. Neither the board of directors nor the officers of Acme, Inc. formally reviewed or approved the contract with Chem Corp.

On August 15, Chem Corp. made its first delivery of chromite to Acme, Inc. at the contract price of $145 per ton. Vic, an Acme employee, acting pursuant to the direction of Acme's board of directors, accepted delivery and approved payment of the invoice after checking the contract and determining that the invoice agreed with the contract price. Acme, Inc. immediately began widget production.

In September and October, Chem Corp. made deliveries of chromite to Acme and charged Acme according to the contract. Acme promptly paid each invoice.

During the fall, the market price for chromite fell. By November, the market price for chromite was $100 per ton. The Acme board of directors, seeking a cheaper supply of chromite, entered into an agreement with Supply, Inc. to provide Acme with its monthly requirements of chromite at $95 per ton.

Acme immediately contacted Chem Corp. and instructed it not to ship Acme any more chromite. When Chem Corp. demanded payment under the liquidated damages clause, Acme refused.

1. Is Peg personally liable to Chem Corp. under the contract? Explain.
2. Is Acme, Inc. liable to Chem Corp. under the contract? Explain.

Question 3

On August 1, 2003, Builder, a construction company, borrowed $2 million from Lender to finance the purchase of a heavy-duty construction crane. Shareholder, a very wealthy shareholder of Builder, personally guaranteed the loan. Builder signed an agreement granting Lender a security interest in the new crane to secure the loan. However, Lender neglected to file a financing statement reflecting its security interest.

Due to severe cash flow problems, Builder stopped making scheduled loan payments four months ago, leaving a balance of $1.5 million on the loan.

In response to Builder's failure to make the scheduled loan payments, Lender hired a repossession service to recover the crane. Employees of the repossession service visited Builder's unprotected job site and, without notice to Builder, took the crane away. This occurred on Sunday, June 5, 2005, when no one from Builder was present and thus no dispute erupted.

On June 7, 2005, Lender mailed a notice to Builder announcing that Lender was going to sell the crane at an auction on June 21, 2005. Lender did not send separate notice of the auction to Shareholder. On the announced auction date, Lender sold the crane to Dealer, the highest bidder at the auction, for $1 million. Shareholder knew about the auction but did not bid at it. It can be proved that if Shareholder had bid, the bid would have been $1.2 million.

Builder asserts that: (a) Lender's actions amounted to a conversion of the crane because Lender's security interest was not perfected, and (b) Lender handled the repossession and sale improperly. Builder sues Lender for $1.7 million, which Builder says is the fair market value of the crane.

Lender counterclaims for the $500,000 deficiency, which it says is still owed by Builder on the loan after taking into account the proceeds received by Lender from the sale of the crane.

1. Did Lender have the right to repossess and sell the crane? Explain.
2. Did Lender's handling of the repossession, foreclosure, and sale comply with all legal requirements, and is Lender entitled to recover the $500,000 deficiency from Builder? Explain.

Question 4

Husband and Wife married and lived together in State X. While married to Husband, Wife had an affair with Fred and gave birth to Fred's child, Child. Both Husband and Fred knew that Fred was Child's biological father.

After Child's birth, Husband and Wife separated. Wife and Child immediately moved in with Fred and stayed with him for three months. During those three months, Fred supported Wife and Child and told friends and neighbors that Child was his son.

At the end of this three-month period, Wife reconciled with Husband. She and Child left Fred's home and resumed living with Husband. Husband held Child out as his son and supported Child. Although Fred no longer supported Child, he communicated with Child approximately twice a year.

When Child was four years old, Fred filed a petition claiming paternity of Child under the law of State X. State X law provides that "a proceeding brought by an individual, other than the child, to adjudicate the parentage of a child having a presumed father must be commenced not later than two years after the birth of the child." The court dismissed Fred's petition, holding that the two-year statute of limitations barred his action.

Shortly after Fred's paternity claim was dismissed, Husband, Wife, and Child moved to another city in State X, and Fred could not locate them.

Two years later, Wife sued Husband for divorce. In her divorce action, she sought custody of Child and child support. Husband objected to Wife's child support claim on the ground that Fred, Child's biological father, should be required to pay support instead of Husband. A State X court awarded Wife custody of Child and ordered Husband to pay child support.

Shortly after the divorce was final, Fred located Wife and Child. Fred filed a visitation petition under a State X statute permitting "any person to petition for visitation at any time" and authorizing a court to grant visitation whenever "visitation serves the best interests of the child." The trial court granted Fred's petition over Wife's objection, holding, as a matter of law, that "it is always in a child's best interests to know his or her biological parents, regardless of the custodial parent's views about the child's needs."

1. Did the court violate Fred's substantive due process rights under the U.S. Constitution by dismissing his paternity petition? Explain.
2. Did the court properly order Husband to pay child support? Explain.
3. Did the court violate Wife's substantive due process rights under the U.S. Constitution by granting Fred visitation? Explain.

Question 5

Vendor recently decided to dispose of some unneeded commercial printing equipment. Two local printers named Ben and Frank entered into a written contract to buy the equipment on credit from Vendor for its appraised value or $10,000, whichever was less.

Vendor transferred title to the equipment to Ben and Frank. In exchange, Ben and Frank gave Vendor a negotiable promissory note. The note, which they both signed, said: "We promise to pay to the order of Vendor $10,000." Notwithstanding the terms of the note, but consistent with the contract, Vendor understood that Ben and Frank would pay only the appraised value of the equipment if the appraised value was less than $10,000. An independent appraiser promptly determined that the equipment was worth $7,000, a value that everyone accepts as reasonable.

Ben paid Vendor $4,000. Vendor then gave the note as a gift to Cousin, who was having financial troubles. Vendor did not indorse the note. Cousin had no knowledge of the contractual provision relating to the appraised value.

1. What is the amount still due on the note and from whom, if anyone, may Cousin recover it? Explain.
2. May Ben recover from Frank any part of the $4,000 already paid to Vendor? Explain.

Question 6

Drugco, a State B corporation with its principal place of business in State B, employs sales representatives and assigns them to work in exclusive geographical areas. The Drugco sales representatives provide pharmacists in their areas with product literature, pricing information, and highly confidential sheets (known as “chem sheets”) listing the chemical composition of each drug. The chem sheets ensure that the pharmacists understand how each Drugco drug interacts with other commonly prescribed drugs.

Drugco hired Claire, a resident of State A, under an employment agreement that contained a “non-compete” clause barring her, for one year following the termination of her employment with Drugco, from soliciting any pharmacists in her territory (defined as Elm, Maple, and Cherry counties of State A) or from engaging in any other activity competitive with Drugco’s business within her territory. The agreement also included a trade-secrets clause, which required Claire to return to Drugco all pricing information and chem sheets in her possession upon termination of her employment.

The laws of State A and State B provide that: (1) chemical formulas and drug pricing information are trade secrets and (2) non-compete clauses in employment agreements are valid so long as they are reasonable in duration and geographical scope.

Claire was an excellent sales representative for Drugco, and she quickly developed strong working relationships with the pharmacists in her territory. Eighteen months after she began working for Drugco, Claire tendered her resignation to Drugco and the next day began working for Medico, a competing pharmaceuticals firm. Claire, who had retained a number of Drugco chem sheets, was contacting the same pharmacists in the same geographical area that she had covered for Drugco. Moreover, she was selling Medico products that were in direct competition with Drugco products.

Drugco has properly invoked diversity jurisdiction and has sued Claire in federal district court in State A for breach of contract.

Drugco seeks to enforce the non-compete clause in Claire’s employment contract and to bar her from soliciting the pharmacists with whom she developed relationships while working for Drugco. Drugco fears that it may take more than a year to litigate the case to final judgment and wants to bar Claire from soliciting these pharmacists now. Drugco also wants to compel Claire to return immediately all Drugco chem sheets and pricing information within her possession.

What provisional remedies might Drugco seek to enforce the non-compete and trade-secrets clauses immediately and during the pendency of the lawsuit, and what is the likelihood that the court will grant each such remedy? Explain.

Question 7

Two years ago, Testator died. By her duly probated will, Testator created two separate trusts naming First Bank as the trustee of each trust.

1. Testator left $100,000 to Friends' Trust and directed First Bank "to distribute the income annually among my friends in equal shares. At the end of ten years, this trust shall terminate and the trust corpus shall be added to the principal of Residuary Trust created under this will."
2. Testator left $500,000 to Residuary Trust and directed First Bank "to pay the income to Carrie for life and to distribute the principal, during Carrie's life or upon her death, to any or all of Carrie's issue as she appoints by deed or will and, in the absence of such appointment, to my alma mater, University, upon Carrie's death."

Last week, First Bank received two instruments in the mail. The first was a letter from George seeking a distribution of income from Friends' Trust and correctly claiming that he was a close friend of Testator.

The second was a deed labeled "Appointment" from Carrie directing First Bank to hold the $500,000 Residuary Trust in a new trust and to distribute income to Carrie's son, John, during his life. This deed further provided that upon John's death, First Bank should distribute the trust principal to Charity, a charitable organization, instead of to University as directed by Testator in her will.

1. Can First Bank distribute income from Friends' Trust to George? Explain.
2. Did Carrie validly appoint an interest in Residuary Trust to her son John? Explain.
3. In light of Carrie's deed of appointment, what, if any, are the interests of Charity and University in the new trust? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES II.K.2; II.K.4; I.B.1

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems: will?
- (1) Can an insured change a life insurance beneficiary designation by will?
 - (2) Does a joint tenant who deposited all funds into a joint tenancy bank account retain the right to bequeath this asset to an individual who is not the surviving joint tenant?
 - (3) With respect to the state lapse statute:
 - (a) Does it apply to class gifts? If yes,
 - (b) Does it apply to class members who died before the testator executed his will?
 - (c) Does it apply to class members who predeceased the testator but were alive when his will was executed?

DISCUSSION

Summary: The life insurance proceeds should probably be distributed to Sam because a beneficiary designation cannot, in most states, be changed by will. The joint tenancy bank account should be distributed to Sam unless it is established that, in creating the joint tenancy, Testator intended to give Sam check-writing privileges instead of an ownership interest. In some states, evidence of such intention would be sufficient to void the joint tenancy. Sam's surviving child is clearly entitled to share in Testator's estate; whether Sam's deceased children also share depends on whether the state lapse statute applies to class gifts and, if so, whether it extends to class members who died before Testator's will was executed.

Point One: (10-20%) In most states, a life insurance beneficiary designation cannot be changed by will. Thus the insurance proceeds are probably payable to Sam.

In most jurisdictions, life insurance proceeds are payable to the beneficiary named in the beneficiary-designation form filed with the insurance company even if the insured names a different beneficiary in a later-executed will. This rule is typically justified as a matter of contract: as in this case, life insurance policies generally provide that policy proceeds will only be paid to a beneficiary named on an appropriate form filed with the insurance company; other possible methods of changing a beneficiary are thus viewed as being excluded by the insurance contract. See generally Cook v. Equitable Life Assurance Society of the U.S., 428 N.E.2d 110 (Ind. 1981).

However, some courts have rejected the majority rule on the grounds that the requirement that a beneficiary change be evidenced by a form filed with the insurance company is for the exclusive benefit of the company. These courts permit an insured to change a beneficiary designation by will if his insurance company does not object. See, e.g., Burkett v. Mott, 733 P.2d 673 (Ariz. 1986). If State A has adopted this minority approach, the insurance proceeds would pass to Doris under the terms of Testator's will.

NOTE: An applicant need not describe both the majority and minority approaches to receive credit. The revocability of a life insurance beneficiary designation by will does not appear to be addressed by any state statute.

Point Two: The surviving tenant of a joint bank account is ordinarily entitled to the account (30-40%) balance on the death of the other tenant. Some states would distribute the account balance as part of the deceased tenant's probate estate if the evidence shows that the deceased tenant created the joint tenancy for his own convenience and had no intent to give the surviving tenant an ownership interest.

Ordinarily, a bank account in the name of "A and B" as joint tenants creates a right of survivorship. Upon the death of one tenant, the survivor takes the entire account balance. See Unif. Probate Code (UPC) § 6-212 (amended 2003).

Where a joint tenancy was created merely for a depositor's convenience, for example, to give the other co-tenant check-writing privileges, some courts will set aside the joint tenancy if the evidence shows that the depositor intended to convey only a power of attorney to write checks. The UPC has adopted this approach. See UPC § 6-212 cmt. Other courts invariably affirm a joint tenancy, relying on the parol evidence rule to exclude evidence of the depositor tenant's intentions. See William M. McGovern Jr. & Sheldon F. Kurtz, Wills, Trusts, and Estates § 6.3 (3d ed. 2004); Bielecki v. Boissel, 715 A.2d 571 (R.I. 1998). And even among courts that permit a joint tenancy to be set aside, some require clear and convincing evidence of the depositor tenant's intentions. See Franklin v. Anna National Bank of Anna, 488 N.E.2d 1117 (Ill. App. 1986).

In this case, there is no direct evidence that Testator intended to convey only check-writing privileges in Account #1. That Testator made all deposits and received all statements demonstrates nothing about his intentions, nor does the fact that Testator was concerned about his physical health. However, one might infer an intention to create a convenience account from Testator's belief that he could bequeath this asset by will. Thus, Sam would prevail in a state that disallows evidence of depositor intentions and in a state that requires clear and convincing evidence to overturn a joint tenancy designation; it is possible that Doris would prevail in a state that permits a joint tenancy designation to be overturned by a preponderance of the evidence.

A constructive trust theory has sometimes been utilized to award a joint tenancy bank account to the beneficiary named in the depositor tenant's will. Under a constructive trust approach, Sam would take the account but would hold the balance in the account in trust for Doris. However, the imposition of a constructive trust ordinarily requires evidence of misconduct, and there is no evidence of wrongdoing by Sam. Id.

Point Three: The children of Ann and Bill can share in the residuary estate only if the shares they (30-40%) would have taken had they survived Testator pass to their issue under the governing lapse statute. This determination will depend on statutory interpretation.

The State A lapse statute provides that, “if a beneficiary who is a descendant of the testator predeceases the testator, the beneficiary’s surviving issue take the share the deceased beneficiary would have taken had the beneficiary survived.” The statute is silent regarding its application to class gifts and, if it applies to class gifts, whether it also applies to persons who died before the execution of the will creating a class gift.

At common law, a gift to a class (such as a group of persons related to each other through a common ancestor) implied a survivorship condition, with the result that only those class members who survived the testator shared in the gift. Under the common law approach, only Sam’s surviving child would take the balance of Testator’s estate. Some states with lapse statutes that do not specify whether they apply to class gifts utilize the common law approach.

Most state lapse statutes, either expressly or by judicial construction, do apply to class gifts. In these states, Bill’s child would take the share that Bill would have taken had Bill survived Testator because Bill was alive when Testator’s will was executed. See McGovern & Kurtz, supra § 8.3 at 332. However, even when a lapse statute applies to class gifts, some states, by statute or case law, refuse to extend its reach to persons, like Ann, who predeceased both the testator and the execution of the testator’s will. The theory behind such a limitation is that, because the testator would have known that such person was dead when the testator executed his or her will, the testator would not have intended to include either the deceased person or that person’s issue in the class gift, unless the testator specifically made such a bequest in his will.

The 1990 UPC takes a different approach; anti-lapse protection is extended even to potential class members who died before the class gift was created. See UPC § 2-603(b)(2). The UPC approach is based on the view that testators would not typically want to exclude the family line of a deceased class member. Under this approach, the children of both Ann and Bill would share in Testator’s residuary estate.

CORPORATIONS II.A

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Is Peg, as promoter of a corporation to be formed, personally liable on the contract with Chem Corp.?
 - (2) Is Acme, Inc., liable on the contract with Chem Corp.?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Peg, as a promoter, is personally liable on the contract unless the parties did not intend for her to be personally liable. This is a question of fact, which an applicant could argue either way. Acme, Inc., is liable on the contract with Chem Corp. if it adopted the contract. Although Acme did not expressly adopt the contract, by accepting delivery of and paying for the chromite, it impliedly adopted the contract with Chem Corp.

Point One: Under the contract, Peg, as a promoter, is personally liable unless the parties, as (45-55%) evidenced by their words and actions, did not intend for Peg to be liable.

Peg is a “promoter.” A promoter is someone who “forms a corporation and procures for it the rights, instrumentalities and capital to enable it to conduct its business.” Stap v. Chicago Aces Tennis Team, Inc., 379 N.E.2d 1298 (Ill. App. 1 Dist. 1978). See 1A William Meade Fletcher et al., Fletcher Encyclopedia of The Law Of Private Corp. § 189 (perm. ed., rev. vol. 2002).

Generally, a promoter who signs a contract in the name of a proposed corporation is personally liable on that contract unless the parties agree otherwise. See Revised Model Bus. Corp. Act § 2.04 (2003); Spence v. Huffman, 486 P.2d 211 (Ariz. App. 1971); Restatement (Second) of Agency § 326, cmt. b (1958). This is true even if the contract does not mention the promoter’s liability. Subsequent adoption by the corporation does not relieve the promoter of liability unless the third party and the corporation expressly or impliedly enter into a novation, by which they agree to relieve the promoter from personal liability on the contract. See Malisewski v. Singer, 598 P.2d 1014 (Ariz. App. 1979). Therefore, absent a novation, Peg ordinarily would be personally liable to Chem Corp. for the liquidated damages.

However, if a party who contracts with a promoter knows that the corporation has not yet been formed and agrees to look only to the corporation for performance, the promoter is not liable. The facts clearly state that Chem Corp. knew that Acme, Inc. had not yet been formed. The facts, however, do not indicate that Chem Corp. agreed to look only to the future corporation or that the contract expressly relieved Peg of liability. Peg signed the contract “as agent for Acme, Inc., a corporation to be formed.” However, Peg cannot act on behalf of a nonexistent principal. See Restatement (Second) of Agency § 326 (one who acts for a nonexistent principal is himself liable on the contract). Therefore, Peg would be personally liable for the liquidated damages unless she can show that Chem Corp. did not intend to hold Peg liable. This is a fact-based analysis, which an applicant could argue either way.

Chem Corp.’s statement, “No problem. We know with whom we are dealing and what the chromite’s for. Do not waste our time. If you are serious, lock in the deal,” could be interpreted to support either argument. It could be interpreted as an indication that Chem Corp. planned only to look to the corporation for payment, in which case Peg bears no personal liability for the contract. See Quaker Hill, Inc. v. Parr, 364 P.2d 1056 (Colo. 1961). Alternatively, the statement “if you are serious” could be interpreted to mean “if you, Peg, are willing to be personally liable.”

The fact that Peg signed the contract as an agent for the corporation to be formed is ineffective to eliminate personal liability, as a matter of agency law. However, it does evidence her belief that she was not signing in her personal capacity and that Chem Corp. would look to the corporation, not to her, for performance on the contract.

The facts do not suggest an express novation of the contract. However, some jurisdictions imply novation upon formation and adoption by the corporation. In such a jurisdiction, Peg might argue that she is not liable because Acme adopted the contract (see Point Two below).

Point Two: Acme, Inc., is liable under the contract if it expressly or impliedly adopted it. While (45-55%) there was no express adoption, by receiving and paying for chromite for three months, Acme, Inc., implicitly adopted the contract.

A contract with a promoter is not a contract with the subsequently formed corporation. The newly formed corporation is not automatically bound by the contracts executed by its promoter prior to formation. The newly formed corporation is only liable on such a contract if: (1) a statute mandates liability, (2) charter documents mandate liability, or (3) the contract is adopted or ratified by the corporation. See Bishop v. Parker, 134 P.2d 180 (Utah 1943); 1A Fletcher et al., supra § 207.

NOTE: Although there are technical differences between the terms “adoption” and “ratification,” many courts use them interchangeably.

Adoption of a contract can be either express or implied. Express adoption requires the unequivocal action by someone, with knowledge of all material facts, who would have had the authority to bind the corporation to this type of contract. The fact that “[n]either the board of directors nor the officers of Acme, Inc., formally reviewed or approved the contract with Chem Corp.” indicates that Acme never expressly adopted the contract.

A corporation can impliedly adopt a contract so long as it is done with knowledge of all material facts by someone who would have had the authority to bind the corporation to this type of contract. Implied adoption requires that the corporation receive some benefit or accept some service. See Stolmeier v. Beck, 441 N.W.2d 888 (Neb. 1989); Fortune Furniture Mfg. Co., v. Mid-South Plastic Fabric Co., 310 So. 2d 725 (Miss. 1975). This test is clearly satisfied. Acme received three shipments of chromite at the contract price and paid each invoice promptly. Because Vic acted pursuant to the direction of Acme's board of directors, he had the authority to bind the corporation to this type of contract (raw materials needed for production). Vic approved the invoice after checking that the invoice price agreed with the contract price. Because Acme received a benefit after Vic checked the material facts, Acme, Inc., adopted the contract and is liable to pay the liquidated damages.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) What are the necessary requirements for attachment of an enforceable security interest and were they met in this case?
 - (1)(b) May a secured party exercise self-help repossession and foreclosure remedies even if its security interest is unperfected?
 - (2)(a) Were the repossession, foreclosure, and sale of the crane handled properly when Lender failed to give notice of any of these actions to a guarantor of the loan?
 - (2)(b) What effect does a violation of UCC Article 9's notice rules have on the debtor's liability for a deficiency?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Lender has a security interest in the crane and is entitled to enforce that interest against Builder, even though the interest is unperfected. It can enforce through self-help repossession, as it did here, so long as there is no breach of the peace. However, Lender should have given notice to both Builder and Shareholder before it sold the crane. Because of Lender's failure to give proper notice of the sale, Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) creates a rebuttable presumption that a proper sale would have generated enough money to entirely pay off Builder's debt. Thus, Lender is not entitled to recover any deficiency unless it can prove that even in a proper sale the crane would have sold for less than the amount outstanding on the loan. Moreover, Lender is liable for any damages that can be shown to have resulted from its failure to give notice (though the facts of this problem do not support a damages claim).

Point One(a)(b): (35-45%) Lender's security interest is unperfected, but Lender nonetheless has the right to exercise self-help remedies after the debtor's default.

Lender can assert rights in the crane as collateral if lender has a security interest that has attached to the crane. On the facts of this problem, the requirements for attachment are satisfied. First, Builder signed an agreement granting Lender a security interest in the crane. Second, Lender gave value to Builder. Finally, Builder apparently had rights in the crane, as the facts indicate that the money was borrowed to purchase the crane and the crane was in Builder's possession. The security interest accordingly attached to the crane, and Lender has the right to enforce that interest against Builder.

Because Lender failed to file a financing statement, Lender's security interest is unperfected. See UCC § 9-310(a). However, a secured party may use Article 9's self-help remedies after default, regardless of the secured party's perfected or unperfected status. See UCC § 9-601(a). These self-help remedies include repossession and sale of the collateral and are inherent in a security interest. See UCC §§ 9-609, & 9-610. Here, Builder was clearly in default, having missed three payments in a row. Thus, Lender was entitled to repossess and sell the collateral.

Point Two(a): A secured party need not give notice or follow any established process in (35-45%) repossessing the collateral, so long as the repossession occurs without a breach of the peace. However, it must give advance notice of a foreclosure sale to the debtor, including any guarantor, and its failure to do so renders the foreclosure sale improper.

Article 9's self-help remedies include repossessing the collateral. See UCC § 9-601(a)(1). No notice is required before repossession. See Id. The only substantial restriction on self-help repossession is that no "breach of the peace" can result. See UCC § 9-609(b)(2). In this case, the facts indicate that there was no breach of the peace. The crane was repossessed from an unsecured job site and under circumstances where there was no opposition to the repossession and no dispute of any sort. Consequently, the repossession was conducted in a manner that complied with Article 9.

However, Lender's sale of the collateral did not fully comply with Article 9. Before conducting a foreclosure sale, a secured party must send reasonable notification to certain persons. See UCC § 9-611(b). These persons include not only the debtor, whom Lender did notify here, but also "any secondary obligor." See UCC § 9-611(c)(1), (2). Shareholder, as a guarantor of the secured debt, was a secondary obligor to whom notice should have been given. See UCC § 9-102(a)(71) and comment 2.a. Accordingly, Lender's failure to notify Shareholder of the foreclosure auction was a violation of the notice provisions of Article 9.

Shareholder's actual knowledge of the auction probably does not alleviate the sending-of-notice violation. Even though Shareholder's actual knowledge provided Shareholder with the opportunity to make a bid, thus serving the purpose of generating a more competitive auction, the statute plainly requires the sending of a notice, and the statute does not provide for actual knowledge to be a substitute for the sending of notice. In part, this is to avoid disputes over what information the debtor or secondary obligor did or did not have. Indeed, the statute requires that the notification be "authenticated," precisely to overturn earlier cases holding that oral notifications were sufficient. See UCC § 9-611 and comment 5.

In all other ways, Lender properly complied with the notice requirement. First, regarding the timing of the notice to Builder, the notice was sent more than 10 days before the auction, and it therefore falls within the timing safe-harbor provided by UCC § 9-612(b). Second, regarding the contents of the notice sent to Builder, the notice specifies that the sale will be by auction on a certain date, and it therefore satisfies the requirements of UCC § 9-613(1)(C) and (E) that the notice state the method and date of disposition.

Point Two(b): When the secured party fails to comply with Article 9's foreclosure rules and the case does not involve a consumer transaction, the debtor's liability for a deficiency is wholly eliminated, except to the extent that the secured party can prove that a deficiency would have existed even in a complying foreclosure.

Article 9 clarifies the rules on the availability of deficiency judgments in cases other than consumer transactions (that is, cases other than those in which the debt and collateral have personal rather than business purposes, see UCC § 9-102(a)(26)). Resolving a split of authority, Article 9 adopts the “rebuttable presumption rule” as its primary approach to evaluating deficiency claims in these situations. Under the rebuttable presumption rule, the court must rebuttably presume that, had the secured party complied with the foreclosure rules, the foreclosure sale would have generated enough money to fully discharge the secured debt. See UCC § 9-626(a)(3), (4).

In this case, the court will presume that a complying foreclosure sale would have generated $1.5 million (the amount of the debt), thus eliminating Builder's liability for the remaining $500,000 owed on the loan. The presumption that a compliant disposition would have generated $1.5 million is rebuttable. If Lender can prove that even a fully complying disposition (that is, one in which proper advance notice had been sent to Shareholder) still would have resulted in a deficiency of some amount, then Builder will be liable for that amount. The burden of proof is on Lender. See UCC § 9-626(a)(4).

NOTE: Some applicants will continue the analysis by examining whether Lender is likely to be able to rebut the presumption noted above. The two sides of this debate are fairly subtle and difficult, so applicants should get credit regardless of their conclusions on this point, so long as their conclusions are well-supported.

On the one hand, Shareholder's actual advance knowledge of the auction, though irrelevant in Point Two, might be important here. Since Shareholder declined to bid despite actual knowledge, Lender can make a strong argument that Shareholder would also have declined to bid even if Lender had sent Shareholder the statutorily required notice. In other words, there is apparently no reason to think that Lender's full compliance with the notice rules would have led to a smaller deficiency, and so the full $500,000 would be recoverable.

On the other hand, if Lender had sent notice to Shareholder and that notice had arrived earlier than the point at which Shareholder in fact gained actual knowledge, then Shareholder may have been able to react earlier and have arranged to make a substantial bid. If Builder can make a good enough case on this point to defeat Lender's burden of proof, then the deficiency to which Lender is entitled should be reduced by the amount by which Shareholder's participation would have increased the sale price of the cranes. Because Shareholder's bid would have been for up to $1.2 million ($200,000 more than the sale price), Lender's deficiency entitlement would be reduced by up to $200,000, leaving Builder liable for only the remaining $300,000.

FAMILY LAW V. B, III.F

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Are a biological father's parental rights under the U.S. Constitution violated if he has only two years after the child's birth to establish that he is the father of a married woman's child?
 - (2) Is a husband who was married to a child's mother at its birth obligated to support a child who is not biologically related to him if he has failed to challenge his paternity in a timely manner and has induced reliance on his continued parental support?
 - (3) Are a mother's parental rights violated by granting visitation to a biological father when the mother's ex-husband is the child's legal father and the court grants no deference to the mother's views on visitation?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Fred's parental rights were not violated when the State X court dismissed his untimely petition. Although unwed fathers who have established a significant relationship with their biological children have a substantive due process right entitled to protection, it is unlikely that Fred could show such a relationship given his limited contact with Child and his failure to file a paternity action when he was entitled to do so. Moreover, even if Fred were found to possess the requisite relationship because his attempts to establish contact with Child were thwarted by Wife, Fred's rights would be limited?? because Husband is presumed to be Child's father. The statute of limitations that restricts Fred's ability to challenge the paternity of Wife's husband is a more lenient provision than the conclusive presumption of legitimacy that was upheld against a substantive due process challenge in Michael H. v. Gerald D., 491 U.S. 110 (1989).

Husband is obligated to pay child support for Child. He will be estopped from denying his paternity because he induced reliance on his continued support and failed to challenge his paternity within the two-year statute of limitations.

Wife's constitutionally protected parental rights were violated by granting visitation to Fred when the court gave no deference to Wife's assessment of Child's best interest.

Point One: The statute of limitations in State X’s paternity statute does not violate the substantive due process rights of Fred, the biological father, under the U.S. Constitution.
(40-50%)

Under the U.S. Constitution, an unwed biological father who has a significant relationship with his biological child has a substantive due process right in that relationship. See Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645 (1972); Quilloin v. Walcott, 434 U.S. 246 (1978); Caban v. Mohammed, 441 U.S. 380 (1979); Lehr v. Robertson, 463 U.S. 248 (1983). But the Supreme Court has also held that it is only “[w]here an unwed father demonstrates a full commitment to the responsibilities of parenthood by ‘[coming] forward to participate in the rearing of his child,’ [that] his interest in personal contact with his child acquires substantial protection under the Due Process Clause.” Lehr, 463 U.S. at 249. Fred lived with Child for only three months and communicated with him only twice a year thereafter. He paid no support and did not offer to do so. He could have established his paternity when Wife moved out, but chose to wait until Child was four years old. Consequently, a court would almost certainly hold that Fred lacked the type of relationship warranting substantive due process protection.

Even if Fred could establish a significant parental relationship with Child, the fact that Husband is Child’s presumed father would limit Fred’s constitutional rights. Under the common law, if a mother was married at the time she gave birth, her husband was presumed to be her child’s father. Like State X, most U.S. jurisdictions generally retain, in statutory form, some version of the common law presumption of legitimacy. See, e.g., Uniform Parentage Act § 204(a)(1) (2002). In Michael H. v. Gerald D., 491 U.S. 110 (1989), the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a California statute that precluded a biological father from bringing a paternity action when the mother of his child was married and she did not join in his paternity petition. In a plurality decision, the Court held that, because of the state’s interest in protecting the marital family and the lack of any established tradition recognizing an extramarital father-child relationship, there was no substantive due process violation even though the father wishing to establish his paternity had had a significant residential relationship with his child. If an unmarried father whose child has a presumed father can be completely foreclosed from unilaterally establishing his paternity, a two-year statute of limitations is certainly constitutional.

In the wake of the Michael H. opinion, many states have enacted statutes which give an unmarried father no more than two years to establish his paternity when his alleged child has a presumed father. See Cal. Fam. Code § 7541(b) (1994); Unif. Parentage Act § 607(a) cmt. (2002) (“a two-year period allows an adequate period to resolve the status of a child within the context of an intact family unit; a longer period may have severe consequences for the child in that circumstance”).

NOTE: An applicant may erroneously discuss procedural due process or equal protection. If the above points are made within the context of a procedural due process or equal protection analysis, an applicant should get credit. However, an answer concluding that a two-year statute of limitations is per se unconstitutional is incorrect. While the U.S. Supreme Court has struck down one- and two-year paternity statutes of limitation (see, e.g., Mills v. Habluetzel, 456 U.S. 91 (1982); Pickett v. Brown, 462 U.S. 1 (1983)), these cases involved the right of a child to establish a parental relationship and obtain a support order. Here, by contrast, Husband is liable for Child’s support. See Point Two, below.]

Point Two: Husband is conclusively presumed to be Child's father and is estopped from (10-20%) denying his child support obligation.

Husband could have challenged the presumption of legitimacy within two years of Child's birth, but chose not to do so even though he knew he was not Child's biological father. Instead, he held Child out as his own and supported him. He encouraged or, at the very least, acquiesced in Wife's decision not to establish Fred's paternity within the statutory period and in her termination of Fred's visits with Child.

Even if the State X paternity statute permitted Husband to challenge his paternity, here he would be obliged to pay child support. When a nonparent consents to act as a parent and the child's interests would be harmed by termination of the parental relationship, the nonparent is estopped from disclaiming parental responsibilities. See, e.g., W. v. W., 779 A.2d 716 (Conn. 2001) (stepparent); L.S.K. v. H.A.N., 813 A.2d 872 (Pa. Super. 2002) (same-sex partner who encouraged mother to utilize artificial insemination to bear a child). Courts have often applied the estoppel principle when, as here, a mother's husband who knew her child was not his induced detrimental reliance on his continued willingness to act as a parent. See, e.g., Watts v. Watts, 337 A.2d 350 (N.H. 1975). Wife is now statutorily barred from seeking support from Fred, and Child has had no meaningful paternal relationship except with Husband. By assuming the rights of a parent, Husband also assumed the responsibilities of parenthood: he is now Child's father for all purposes.

Point Three: Wife's due process rights were probably violated when the court granted Fred (30-40%) visitation without any deference to her determination of what is in Child's best interest.

The State X statute is similar to the Washington statute that was held unconstitutional, as applied, in Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000). In its plurality decision, the Troxel Court noted that the statute "effectively permits any third party seeking visitation to subject any decision by a parent concerning visitation of the parent's children to state-court review," id. at 67, and that the state court had given no deference to the parent's decision that visitation was not in her child's best interest. The Court held that, before "a fit parent's [visitation] decision . . . becomes subject to judicial review, the court must accord at least some special weight to the parent's own determination." Id. at 71.

Here, the State X court accorded Wife's decision no weight at all. Instead, it ruled, as a matter of law, that "it is always in a child's best interests to know his or her biological parents, regardless of the custodial parent's views about the child's needs."

Although some state courts have held that Troxel is inapplicable to visitation petitions from a nonparent who lived with the child and acted as a "de facto" parent, it is highly unlikely that Fred could establish such a relationship with Child. See, e.g., Rubano v. DiCenzo, 759 A.2d 959 (R.I. 2000). Fred lived with Child for only three months after Child's birth and thereafter saw Child on only a handful of occasions. Child may not even remember Fred.

Nor can Troxel be distinguished because Fred is a biological parent. A child has only one legal father. See Michael H. v. Gerald D., 491 U.S. 110 (1989). Fred's opportunity to establish parental rights was foreclosed with the dismissal of his paternity suit. Therefore Fred is a "third party" and has no more rights to visitation than any other "third party."

NOTE: An exceptional answer might try to distinguish Troxel from the case at hand based on the fact that, given Husband's attempt to disclaim paternity of Child, Child may not have a meaningful opportunity to enjoy a paternal relationship unless Fred's visitation petition is granted. It could be argued that this fact makes Fred different from the typical third-party visitation petitioner and more like the de facto parents to which some state high courts have refused to apply the Troxel standard.

It is difficult to determine how a court would rule on this argument. Fred is Child's biological parent and appears to be more interested at this point in maintaining a relationship with Child than does Husband, Child's legal father. But to award Fred visitation would perhaps undercut the policies that underlie the paternity statute of limitations. In addition, Fred's earlier relationship with Child was insubstantial.

COMMERCIAL PAPER II.G, II.H, IV.A

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) What right, if any, does Cousin have to enforce the note?
 - (2) Who is liable on the note?
 - (3) How much are Ben and Frank liable for on the note?
 - (4) To what extent does Ben have a right of contribution from Frank?

DISCUSSION

Summary: Ben and Frank are jointly and severally liable as co-makers of the note, so a person entitled to enforce the note can recover the amount due from either of them. Cousin is a person entitled to enforce the note because Vendor transferred his rights to Cousin. However, Cousin is not a holder in due course both because Vendor did not indorse the note and because Cousin did not pay value for it. Accordingly, Cousin is subject to all defenses Ben and Frank might have and those defenses will reduce the amount due on the note.

Ben's payment of $4,000 to Vendor reduces the amount Cousin can recover. The outstanding balance for which Ben and Frank are liable is $3,000 because the contract provided that Ben and Frank would pay Vendor the lesser of $10,000 or the amount of the appraisal, which came in at $7,000.

Finally, Ben is entitled to contribution of $500 from Frank because Ben paid $500 more than his share of the debt.

NOTE: The National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL) has approved amendments to articles 1 and 3 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). These amendments will take effect only if and when state legislatures enact them. These amendments do not change the substance of any provisions applicable to this question. The amendments, however, alter the text and numbering of a few sections in articles 1 and 3. In the following discussion, citations in brackets refer to the amended versions of these articles. For more information on the amendments to the UCC, see NCCUSL's website at <http://www.nccusl.org>.]

Point One: Cousin is entitled to enforce the note but will be subject to any applicable defenses

(20-30%) because Cousin is not a holder in due course.

Cousin's right to recover on the note and the amount Cousin may recover depend on whether Cousin is a holder in due course of the note. To be a holder in due course, Cousin must be a holder of the note and must have taken it for value, in good faith, and without notice of any defenses to the note. UCC § 3-302(a).

On these facts, Cousin is not a holder in due course for two reasons. First, when Vendor gave the note to Cousin as a gift, Vendor did not indorse it. The lack of an indorsement left the note payable to Vendor, and Cousin did not become its holder. UCC § 1-201(20). Second, Cousin did not take the note for value. See § 3-303 (defining value).

Nonetheless, Cousin is entitled to enforce the note. Under the "shelter rule," Vendor's transfer of the note to Cousin was also a transfer of all of Vendor's rights on the note, including Vendor's rights as a holder. UCC § 3-203(b). A non-holder in possession with the rights of a holder is entitled to enforce a note. See §§ 3-301(ii); § 3-203 cmt. 2 ("If a transferee is not a holder because the transferor did not indorse, the transferee is nevertheless a person entitled to enforce the instrument under Section 3-301 if the transferor was a holder at the time of transfer."). However, the "shelter rule" only permits Cousin to assert the same rights that Vendor had to enforce the note, and Vendor held the note subject to Ben's and Frank's defenses.

Because Cousin is not a holder in due course, Cousin took the note subject to those same defenses. See § 3-305(a) & (b) and Point Three below. As explained in Point Three, Ben and Frank have defenses based on their separate agreement with Vendor and on the partial payment by Ben.

Point Two: Ben and Frank, as co-makers, are jointly and severally liable for the outstanding (10-20%) balance of the note.

Ben and Frank are co-makers of the note because they both signed it. As a result, they are jointly and severally liable on the note. See § 3-116(a). Their joint and several liability means that a person entitled to enforce the note, such as Cousin, may recover the entire outstanding balance of the note from either Ben or Frank.

Point Three: Ben and Frank's outstanding liability on the note is $3,000.

Although the original amount of the note was $10,000, Ben and Frank have two defenses to payment that limit their outstanding liability to $3,000. Cousin is subject to these defenses. (See Point One above.)

The first defense comes from the sales contract with Vendor. The contract limited Ben and Frank's total liability to the appraised value of the equipment if that value was less than $10,000. The appraised value turned out to be $7,000, which of course is less than $10,000. The UCC permits parties to assert defenses to payment based on separate agreements. See id. § 3-117 (specifying that “the obligation of a party to an instrument to pay the instrument may be modified . . . by a separate agreement of the obligor and a person entitled to enforce the instrument, if the instrument is issued . . . as part of the same transaction giving rise to the agreement”). Accordingly, Ben and Frank’s liability before payment was limited to $7,000.

Ben and Frank also have a defense based on Ben’s payment of $4,000 to Vendor. As explained above (Point One), Vendor was a holder of the note at the time of payment, and was entitled to enforce it. Payment to a person entitled to enforce a note discharges liability on the note to the extent of payment. See § 3-602(a)(ii) [rev. § 3-602(a)]. The $4,000 payment by Ben to Vendor thus reduced Ben and Frank’s liability on the note from $7,000 to $3,000.

Point Four: Ben has a right to contribution from Frank for $500.
(25-35%)

A co-maker may recover from other co-makers to the extent permitted by the law of contribution. See § 3-116(b). The law of contribution says that a co-maker who pays more than his or her proportionate share of a debt may recover the excess payment from other co-makers. See Restatement of the Law of Restitution § 85 cmt. e (1937) (“If in partial satisfaction one [co-debtor] pays less than the entire amount but more than his share, he is entitled to recover from any [other co-debtor] who has not paid his share such excess up to the amount of the unpaid share of the other”); 12 Am. Jur. 2d Bills and Notes § 440 (“if one of two or more . . . makers of a note pays the note or an amount greater than his or her proportionate share, the maker is entitled to proceed against his or her comakers for contribution”).

As explained above (in Point Three), Ben and Frank’s total liability on the note before payment was $7,000. The proportionate share of this liability for each of them was $3,500. In paying $4,000 to Vendor, Ben paid $500 more than his proportionate share. Ben therefore has a right to recover $500 from Frank.

If Ben pays additional sums to Cousin in the future, Ben also will be able to recover these additional sums from Frank under a theory of contribution. Frank can have no right to contribution from Ben because Ben already paid more than Ben’s proportionate share.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE III

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Does the federal district court have authority immediately and during the pendency of the lawsuit to enjoin Claire from violating the non-compete provision in the contract and/or from retaining the chem sheets and pricing information?
 - (2) Is the federal district court likely to enjoin Claire from violating the non-compete clause throughout the pendency of the lawsuit?
 - (3) Is the federal district court likely to compel Claire to return to Drugco the chem sheets and pricing information throughout the pendency of the lawsuit?

DISCUSSION

Summary: The district court has the power to issue a temporary restraining order, followed by a preliminary injunction, prohibiting Claire from soliciting customers in violation of her contract with Drugco. In determining whether to grant an injunction, the court will consider Drugco's likelihood of winning the lawsuit, the possibility of irreparable injury if the injunction is not granted, the balance of hardships between the parties, and any relevant public interest factors. The court will also consider the same factors in determining whether to issue a preliminary injunction ordering Claire to return Drugco's chem sheets and pricing information. On the facts of this problem, the court is likely to grant both preliminary injunctions.

Point One: (10-20%) The district court in State A has authority under Rule 65 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to issue a temporary restraining order prohibiting Claire from violating the non-compete provision in her contract, but such an order must expire within a few days and Drugco must seek a preliminary injunction.

A preliminary injunction is an equitable remedy that enjoins a person from engaging in specified behavior, or requires a party to engage in specified behavior, during the pendency of the action. A temporary restraining order (TRO) is an equitable remedy that may be issued ex parte (without notice) to prevent irreparable harm until the court has an opportunity to rule on a motion for a preliminary injunction. Rule 65 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure governs the issuance of both TROs and preliminary injunctions by federal district courts. Although the Federal Rules permit the issuance of a TRO without notice and on an ex parte basis, all TROs must expire within ten days, and courts generally set an earlier expiration date for TROs issued ex parte. Moreover, local rules may require that notice be given prior to the issuance of a TRO. See generally Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(b). Rule 65(c) requires an applicant seeking either a TRO or a preliminary injunction to post bond or provide some other security in the event that a party is later “found to have been wrongfully enjoined or restrained.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(c).

Point Two: The district court may grant a preliminary injunction to enjoin Claire from violating (45-55%) the non-compete provision in the contract during the pendency of the lawsuit if it finds that Drugco is likely to succeed on the merits of the lawsuit, that Drugco is likely to suffer irreparable injury if an injunction is not granted, and that the potential injury to Drugco is greater than any harm that Claire would suffer as a result of an injunction.

The substantive prerequisites for a preliminary injunction derive from traditional principles of equity jurisdiction. See 11A Charles Alan Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 2941 (2d ed. 1995). Courts generally consider four factors in deciding whether or not to grant a preliminary injunction: (1) the risk of irreparable harm to the plaintiff if the preliminary injunction is not granted; (2) the likelihood that the plaintiff will succeed on the merits; (3) the likelihood that the harm the plaintiff will suffer in the absence of preliminary injunctive relief outweighs the harm the defendant will suffer if the injunction is granted; and (4) the public interest. Id. The first two factors are the most important.

In assessing irreparable harm in the preliminary injunction context, courts ask whether the threatened harm would impair the court’s ability to grant an effective remedy at the conclusion of the case. 11A Wright et al., supra § 2948.1. Numerous courts have granted preliminary injunctions to enforce non-compete clauses in employment agreements, concluding that an employer would suffer irreparable harm if a former employee solicited its customers. See, e.g., Safety-Kleen Sys., Inc. v. Hennkens, 301 F.3d 931, 935-36 (8th Cir. 2002); JAK Prods., Inc. v. Wiza, 986 F.2d 1080, 1084 (7th Cir. 1993). “[W]hen the failure to grant preliminary relief creates the possibility of permanent loss of customers to a competitor or the loss of goodwill, the irreparable injury prong is satisfied.” Multi-Channel TV Cable Co. v. Charlottesville Quality Cable Operating Co., 22 F.3d 546, 552 (4th Cir. 1994) (citation omitted).

In assessing whether the plaintiff is likely to prevail on the merits, courts most commonly ask whether the plaintiff has demonstrated “a reasonable probability of success. . . . All courts agree that plaintiff must present a prima facie case but need not show that he is certain to win.” 11A Wright et al., supra § 2948.3 (footnotes omitted). In this case, both States A and B enforce non-compete clauses as long as they are reasonable in geographical scope and duration. Since Claire’s contract with Drugco barred her from competing only within a three-county area of State A and only for one year, and since there is strong evidence that she is breaching the contract, a court is likely to conclude that Drugco will prevail on the merits.

In balancing the relative hardships, courts not only consider the injuries that the parties are likely to suffer, but also consider the likelihood of success on the merits. Thus, the stronger the showing on the merits, the less weight is given to the harm the defendant will suffer if the injunction is issued erroneously. Here, the harm to the plaintiff—the loss of customers—has already been discussed. The potential harm to the defendantCloss of her job or at least the inability to continue to work for Medico in the same geographical area for the remainder of the yearCis likewise significant. But if the plaintiff demonstrates a substantial likelihood of success on the merits (as here), the preliminary injunction will be issued even if the harm factor favors the defendant. See 11A Wright et al., supra § 2948.3.

Finally, courts consider the public interest or policy considerations that militate in favor of or against issuance of the preliminary injunction. The decision here is not likely to have a significant impact on strangers to the litigation, so this factor is not likely to influence the outcome of the motion for preliminary injunctive relief.

On balance, it is likely that a court would issue a preliminary injunction to enjoin Claire from violating the non-compete provision in the contract during the pendency of the lawsuit. It is far less important that applicants reach this conclusion, however, than that they discuss intelligently Rule 65 and the factors that would guide the court’s analysis.

Point Three: The district court in State A is likely to issue a preliminary injunction to compel (35-45%) Claire to return the chem sheets and pricing information to Drugco during the pendency of the lawsuit.

Just as Rule 65 allows a federal district court to issue an injunction restraining Claire’s action, it also permits the court to issue an injunction compelling Claire to engage in particular acts (a “mandatory injunction”) if the four-part test for a preliminary injunction is satisfied. On our facts, the four factors favor an order compelling Claire to return the chem sheets and pricing information.

First, the chem sheets, which reveal the chemical composition of the drugs sold by Drugco, are trade secrets, and their disclosure would give rise to irreparable harm. See, e.g., Myers v. Williams, 819 F. Supp. 919 (D. Or. 1993). Second, pricing information is highly confidential and Drugco’s competitive position would be compromised if its pricing structure were available to a competitor. See, e.g., Patio Enclosures, Inc. v. Herbst, 39 Fed. Appx. 964, 968-69 (6th Cir. 2002). Such harm could not be remedied at the conclusion of the case, so preliminary relief is warranted.

Given that the chem sheets and pricing information are trade secrets under state law and given that the employment agreement required Claire to return them to Drugco upon termination of her employment, it is quite likely that Drugco will succeed on the merits of its claim to obtain the return of this data. Because neither Medico nor Claire is entitled to retain this information, the balance of hardships tips decidedly in favor of Drugco, and the public interest (as embodied in the law of States A and B) favors the preservation of trade secrets. Thus, it is likely that a court would issue a preliminary injunction to require Claire to return the chem sheets and pricing information during the pendency of the lawsuit.

NOTE: In addition to its authority to grant a preliminary injunction, the court also has authority to grant any preliminary remedy for the seizure of property that would be available under state law. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 64. In some states, for example, a pre-judgment writ of replevin to secure the return of property is available to a movant who demonstrates a superior right of possession to the property and a likelihood of success on the merits of the underlying claim to possession. See, e.g., Center Capital Corp. v. Burmac Metal Finishing Co., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14872 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 13, 2002) (describing Illinois statute). Graders should consider awarding extra credit to applicants who note the possibility of pursuing state law replevin remedies as an alternative approach to recovering the chem sheets and pricing information.

TRUSTS AND FUTURE INTERESTS I.B.2; II.D.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Is Friends' Trust invalid for failure to have "definite beneficiaries"?
 - (2) Can the donee of a special power of appointment exercisable in favor of the donee's issue exercise the power by appointing:
 - (a) only a life estate to a permissible object of the power?
 - (b) an interest in the property to a charitable organization?
 - (3) If a donee of a special power of appointment limited in favor of issue appoints assets subject to the power to an impermissible object of the power, who succeeds to the interest that was invalidly appointed?

DISCUSSION

Summary: A trust for "friends" is invalid because it does not have "definite beneficiaries." Thus, First Bank should make no distribution to George. Carrie's appointment of income to her son John is valid. Although Testator did not expressly state that appointments in further trust are permissible, the majority view is that, if the donee can appoint trust assets outright, the donee can also create lesser interests in permissible objects of the power. However, Charity is an impermissible object of Carrie's special power; thus Carrie made an ineffective appointment of the remainder. That interest will pass at John's death to University, the taker in default of appointment designated by Testator.

Point One: A trust for "friends" is probably invalid for want of definite beneficiaries.
(25-35%)

In order to create a valid trust, there must be intent, delivery, and acceptance. Additionally, there must be trust property, a trustee, and one or more beneficiaries. The Friends' Trust has a trustee, First Bank, and property, $100,000. The question is whether there is a beneficiary.

A trust for indefinite beneficiaries is invalid. This rule derives from the principle that trust beneficiaries must be able to enforce the terms of the trust. See Restatement of Trusts (Third) § 46 (2003); George Gleason Bogert, Trusts § 34 (6th ed. 1984). A trust for the benefit of "friends" is a trust with indefinite beneficiaries. See Restatement of Trusts (Third) § 46, General Comment.

The Restatement of Trusts (Third) takes the position that a trust for friends may be valid if "some ascertainable group of friends . . . was intended . . . or . . . an implied term of the trust authorizes . . .

[the trustee] to determine who the friends . . . are. . . .” Id. at Illustration 1. However, there are no facts to support such a finding in this case. The disposition cannot be saved by characterizing Friends’ Trust as a power of appointment because a power that must be exercised (a so-called “imperative power”), as here, also requires definite beneficiaries. See Clark v. Campbell, 133 A. 166 (N.H. 1926). A discretionary power, vesting in the trustee the power both to select beneficiaries and to determine distributions, is valid and would permit a trustee to distribute to friends. But here the instrument creating Friends’ Trust did not give First Bank discretion to select beneficiaries or determine distributions.

Point Two(a): The donee of a special power of appointment exercisable in favor of the donee’s (10-20%) issue can exercise the power by appointing only a life estate to a permissible object of the power. Thus, the appointment to John is valid.

The language of Residuary Trust does not specify whether appointments in further trust (rather than outright) are permissible. In light of the language in Testator’s will, applicants could argue that Carrie can appoint only principal to John. This argument, however, is rejected by the Restatement of Property and the weight of the modern case law, which take the position that, if a donee can appoint trust assets (principal) outright, then the donee can also create more limited interests unless the evidence shows that the donor intended otherwise. See Restatement of Property § 358(e) (1936); Restatement of Property (Second) § 19.3 and accompanying comments (1986). Likewise, the Restatement permits donees to appoint property in trust for objects of the power. Therefore, the appointment of only a life estate to John is valid.

NOTE: Local law may contain contrary authority.

Point Two(b): Carrie’s purported exercise of her power in favor of Charity is invalid because (10-20%) Charity is an impermissible object of the power.

The donee of a special power of appointment (a power that excludes the donee, the donee’s creditors, and the donee’s estate as permissible objects) can only exercise the special power in favor of objects designated by the donor of the power. Here, the objects of the power were limited by Testator, the donor of the power, to Carrie’s issue. Thus, Carrie’s attempted appointment to Charity is invalid. See Restatement of Property (Second) §§ 19.3, 20.1.

Point Three: Because of Carrie’s partially ineffective exercise of the special power, the remainder (15-25%) of the new trust at John’s death will pass to University, the taker in default under Testator’s will.

Carrie exercised her special power of appointment by attempting to appoint to both permissible (John) and impermissible (Charity) objects. As a general rule, “the ineffectiveness of the appointments to the non-objects does not affect the appointments to the objects. . . .” Restatement of Property (Second) § 20.1 cmt. g. Thus, the purported appointment to Charity does not invalidate the otherwise effective appointment to John in trust. (See Point Two(a).) Where a power has been ineffectively exercised, the property subject to the power not effectively exercised passes to the so-called “taker in default of appointment” designated by the donor of the power (here Testator). Testator’s will specifies that University is the taker in default of appointment and that University takes to the extent that its interest has not been divested by an exercise of Carrie’s special power. Here, University has been divested of the life estate effectively appointed to John but not the remainder interest ineffectively appointed to Charity. Thus, upon creation of the new trust John has a life estate and University has the remainder. Charity has no interest in this trust.

Preface

This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2006 and July 2006 Multistate Essay Examinations. Each test includes seven questions; most jurisdictions that use the MEE select the six questions their applicants will answer. Beginning with the July 2007 MEE, jurisdictions will have their choice of nine MEE questions. For more information, see the MEE Information Booklet available at www.ncbex.org.

The model analyses to the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. These models are not an official grading guide. Some jurisdictions grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses as they wish, including the suggested weights given to particular points. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topic or topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by Roman numerals which refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that topic. For example, Question 3 on the February 2006 MEE tested Federal Civil Procedure I.A.1., subject matter jurisdiction in federal courts, I.B., jurisdiction over parties, and I.E., venue. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet which can be found at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE is a series of essay questions, any of which a jurisdiction may select to include as a part of its bar examination. Applicants are expected to spend approximately thirty minutes answering each MEE question administered. The areas of law covered by the questions in the February 2007 MEE are: Agency and Partnership, Commercial Paper, Conflict of Laws, Corporations and Limited Liability Companies, Decedents' Estates, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Sales, Secured Transactions, and Trusts and Future Interests. For the July 2007 MEE and later MEEs, the areas of law covered will include Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law,* Contracts,* Criminal Law and Procedure,* Evidence,* Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Real Property,* Torts,* Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests) and Uniform Commercial Code (Commercial Paper; Secured Transactions). Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You will have thirty minutes in which to write each of your answers to the MEE questions you are to answer. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts which are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show: an understanding of the facts; a recognition of the issues included; the applicable principles of law; and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Some jurisdictions instruct applicants to answer MEE questions according to the law of jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

Questions

MEE Question 1

Seven years ago, Settlor announced at a dinner party:

“I am hereby creating the Settlor’s Family Trust and naming myself as trustee. In about three years, I expect to sell some stock and to fund this trust with the sale proceeds. I reserve the power to pay to myself trust income and principal for my support at any time. When I die, all remaining trust assets are to be distributed to my daughter, Dawn. Neither my creditors nor Dawn’s creditors can reach the trust assets to satisfy their claims, and neither of us is free to sell or otherwise transfer our respective trust interests. Please join me in a toast as I sign this cocktail napkin on which I have written the terms of the trust.”

Five years ago, Settlor’s sister-in-law, In-Law, executed a will leaving her entire $300,000 estate to the Settlor’s Family Trust.

Four years ago, Settlor sold some stock and deposited the $100,000 sale proceeds into an account at First Bank in the name of “Settlor, as Trustee of the Settlor’s Family Trust.”

Two months ago, In-Law died. Had In-Law died intestate, her estate would have passed to her brother, Bill. Both Settlor, as trustee of the Settlor’s Family Trust, and Bill claim In-Law’s estate.

One month ago, Victim obtained a $75,000 tort judgment against Settlor because of injuries sustained as a result of Settlor’s negligence. Victim immediately sought to collect that judgment from the First Bank account, notwithstanding Settlor’s claims that this account was beyond the reach of his judgment creditors. Before this dispute could be resolved, Settlor died.

1. Was the Settlor’s Family Trust validly created? Explain.
2. Who is entitled to In-Law’s estate? Explain.
3. Can Victim reach the assets of the First Bank account to satisfy Victim’s claim against Settlor? Explain.

MEE Question 2

Rich, who lives in Smalltown, recently bought a sports utility vehicle (SUV) from Dealer in Capital City, which is located approximately 60 miles from Smalltown. Rich asked if Dealer would have the SUV delivered to him in Smalltown. Rich offered to pay the driver $75. Dealer does not ordinarily deliver SUVs to its customers. Nonetheless, Dealer agreed to have Sales, a full-time salesperson employed by Dealer, deliver the SUV to Rich's house because Dealer was eager to please Rich. At the end of the normal workday, Dealer gave Sales directions to Rich's house in Smalltown. As Sales prepared to drive off in the SUV, Dealer told him, "Drive straight to Rich's house, no detours. Drive carefully and no speeding. I don't want any dents in that SUV."

On his way to Rich's house, Sales stopped to visit Friend, who was in the process of moving. Friend was distraught because the movers had not shown up. Friend asked Sales if he would like to earn $200 by transporting "a few loads" in the SUV. Sales agreed and transported many of Friend's belongings in the SUV. Friend paid Sales $200.

Helping Friend took several hours, so Sales was running late. In his rush to Rich's house, Sales negligently ran over Ped, who was trying to cross the street. Ped was seriously injured.

Dealer learned that Sales had used the SUV to help Friend move and demanded the $200 Friend had paid Sales.

1. Can Ped recover from Dealer for Sales's negligence? Explain.
2. Must Sales give Dealer the $200 he earned helping Friend move? Explain.

MEE Question 3

Defendant is a political commentator and free-lance journalist who moved from his home state of State A to State B approximately three years ago. Defendant has told his family and friends that he still considers State A “home” and intends to return “someday,” but that “I’m happy in State B for now.” Defendant votes, pays taxes, and owns property only in State B.

Defendant publishes an online newsletter called “Nothing But the Truth” that is accessible over the Internet from his website, www.NBT.com. Viewers can access www.NBT.com and download articles, but they cannot post their messages through the site. The central computer that people access when they view the website is located in State B.

The political commentary and journalism posted on the www.NBT.com website focus almost exclusively on people and events in State A—Defendant’s old stomping grounds and the region where he is best known as a political reporter. Indeed, Defendant’s website receives so many hits from people in State A that most of the advertisers on the website are State A firms seeking to attract customers who live in State A.

Plaintiff is a resident and domiciliary of State A who previously worked as a high-level State A government employee. In a recent story posted on his website, Defendant reported on rumors he had heard concerning Plaintiff’s alleged acceptance of kickbacks for the award of State A contracts.

Shortly after Defendant published this story on his website, Plaintiff was dismissed from employment with State A. Plaintiff maintains that the allegations contained in Defendant’s article about Plaintiff are patently false. Plaintiff contacted Defendant shortly after the initial publication, asking Defendant to retract the story. Defendant refused and insisted that he was protected by the First Amendment of the United States Constitution, even if the story was false, so long as he had not acted maliciously.

Plaintiff has filed a lawsuit against Defendant in the United States District Court for the District of State A. Her complaint alleges that the story published on Defendant’s website defamed Plaintiff under applicable state law. In addition, the complaint asserts that the First Amendment does not shield Defendant from the defamation claim under these circumstances. The complaint alleges facts establishing damages for Plaintiff in the amount of $200,000. Convinced that Defendant acted maliciously, Plaintiff also seeks punitive damages in the amount of $1,000,000. The complaint alleges that jurisdiction is proper on both federal question and diversity grounds.

The State A long-arm statute provides that the courts of State A may exercise jurisdiction over absent defendants to the “full extent permitted by the due process clause of the United States Constitution.”

In lieu of an answer to the complaint, Defendant has filed a motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter and personal jurisdiction.

MEE Question 3

1. On what basis, if any, would a federal district court have subject matter jurisdiction over the lawsuit by Plaintiff against Defendant? Explain.
2. Would the United States District Court for the District of State A have personal jurisdiction over Defendant? Explain.

MEE Question 4

Herb petitioned for divorce from Ann after a 20-year marriage. One year later, the court entered a decree of divorce based on irreconcilable differences. The court also awarded Ann a share of the marital property and $1,000 per month in spousal maintenance until her death or remarriage.

After Herb's petition was filed but before the court issued a final decree, Herb married Betty. Betty believed that Herb's divorce was final. After the court issued a final decree, Ann married Charles. Herb then stopped paying spousal maintenance to Ann.

After her marriage to Charles, Ann learned that Charles had misrepresented the value of his stock. Charles said that he owned stock worth "millions." In fact, Charles's stock was worth only $300,000. Ann has filed for annulment of her marriage to Charles. In a separate action, she seeks reinstatement of the spousal maintenance she was awarded in her divorce from Herb.

Betty has petitioned for divorce from Herb. Herb has filed a motion to dismiss the divorce petition on the ground that he and Betty were not lawfully married.

1. If Ann is granted an annulment of her marriage to Charles, can she obtain reinstatement of the spousal maintenance she was awarded in her divorce from Herb? Explain.
2. Can Ann obtain an annulment of her marriage to Charles based on Charles's misrepresentation of his assets? Explain.
3. Can Herb obtain dismissal of Betty's divorce petition based on the claim that he and Betty were not lawfully married? Explain.

MEE Question 5

Green Corporation (Green) was properly incorporated in State A. Green's articles of incorporation authorize 100 shares of common stock (Common) and 300 shares of Class A non-voting cumulative preferred stock (Class A Preferred). Each Class A Preferred share is entitled to a quarterly dividend of $1. Green's articles provide that, if Green fails to pay this dividend for four consecutive quarters, each Class A Preferred share becomes entitled to one vote on all matters voted on at shareholders' meetings until all arrearages have been paid.

Deb owns all 100 shares of the Common and 100 shares of the Class A Preferred. Ed owns the remaining 200 shares of the Class A Preferred. Neither Deb nor Ed is a director or officer of Green.

Green has been experiencing financial difficulties for some time and has not paid the Class A Preferred dividends for more than four consecutive quarters. On September 2, Green's board unanimously adopted a proposal to dissolve the corporation. The board then called a special meeting of the shareholders to vote on this proposal. The notice of the special meeting indicated that a special meeting would be held at the corporation's principal office on October 15. The notice did not state the purpose of the meeting. The notice was sent to Deb. She received it on September 10.

On October 13, two days before the special meeting, Deb and Ed met for dinner. At dinner, Deb asked Ed to serve as her proxy at the special meeting because she could not attend. Ed was surprised because he had not received any notice of the special meeting from Green. Nonetheless, Ed told Deb that he would attend the meeting and vote her shares.

On October 15, at breakfast before the meeting began, Ed first learned of the proposed dissolution of Green. Ed immediately called Deb to inform her of the proposal. Deb directed Ed to vote all of her shares in favor of the proposal. Ed went to the meeting, voted Deb's shares in favor and his own shares against the proposal to dissolve Green.

1. Was the special shareholder meeting called to dissolve Green properly held? Explain.
2. Was the proposal to dissolve Green properly adopted by its shareholders? Explain.

MEE Question 6

Specialty Audio, Inc. (Specialty) manufactures high-quality stereo speakers worth about $2,000 each. Because its business is fairly small, Specialty has no showroom or sales staff of its own.

Specialty entered into a consignment arrangement with Giant Electronics Store (Giant). Pursuant to the written consignment agreement, Specialty delivers speakers to Giant, and Giant displays those speakers on its showroom floor and sells them on behalf of Specialty. When a customer buys a pair of speakers, Giant keeps a commission as compensation for Giant's effort and pays the rest of the customer's purchase price to Specialty. At any given time, Giant has about two dozen pairs of Specialty's speakers on hand.

Specialty holds title to the speakers until they are sold. However, as far as any third party can discern, the speakers are part of Giant's own inventory. There is no indication that Specialty is the owner of the speakers. Moreover, Giant does not generally engage in the sale of goods for others and is not known by its creditors to do so.

After establishing the consignment relationship with Specialty, Giant borrowed $1 million from Bank to open new stores. As security for its obligation to repay the money, Giant granted Bank a security interest in "all inventory, whether now owned or hereafter acquired." Bank properly perfected its security interest by filing a financing statement in the appropriate state office.

Giant defaulted on its loan from Bank. Bank peaceably repossessed all of Giant's goods, including all the Specialty speakers Giant had on display and, after providing proper notice, sold everything at a commercially reasonable sale.

1. Did Bank have the right to repossess and sell the Specialty speakers even though, under the consignment agreement, they belonged to Specialty and not to Giant? Explain.
2. What rights, if any, does Specialty have against Bank to recover the proceeds from the sale of the speakers? Explain.
3. What action might Specialty have taken to protect its interest in the speakers more completely? Explain.

MEE Question 7

Dorothy had three children, Abel, Brandon, and Carrie. Abel had two children, Grandchild 1 and Grandchild 2; Brandon had three children, Grandchild 3, Grandchild 4, and Grandchild 5; and Carrie had one child, Grandchild 6.

Following the deaths of all three of her children, Dorothy was judicially appointed the guardian of all six grandchildren. Dorothy raised all of the grandchildren in her home and loved them all equally.

Five years ago, Dorothy gave $60,000 to Grandchild 6 to help Grandchild 6 buy a new home. The only statement Dorothy ever made regarding this payment was a contemporaneous statement to Grandchild 6: "This is for you because I love you." Dorothy made no other transfers to her grandchildren.

One year ago, Dorothy executed a valid will providing: "I give my entire estate to my heirs, said heirs to take the same shares thereof that they would have taken had I died intestate."

Three months ago, Dorothy was visiting Grandchild 1's home. While Dorothy was working in the front yard, Grandchild 1 backed a car out of the garage and, inadvertently, albeit negligently, struck Dorothy. Dorothy later died from the injuries.

Dorothy's only survivors are all six grandchildren and one great-grandchild, who is a child of Grandchild 1. Dorothy left a probate estate of $120,000.

To whom should Dorothy's $120,000 probate estate be distributed, and what is the amount of each person's share? Explain.

TRUSTS AND FUTURE INTERESTS I.B, I.C.1, I.C.4, I.E.3

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Settlor create a valid trust?
 - (2) Was In-Law's pour-over bequest to the Settlor's Family Trust valid?
 - (3) Did Settlor effectively shield trust assets from creditors when he created a support trust with a spendthrift clause and named himself as the sole income beneficiary?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Settlor did not create a valid trust when he made a declaration of trust because the trust lacked assets. The trust became valid when Settlor deposited funds in the First Bank account and re-manifested his intention to create a trust by opening the account in the name of Settlor, as Trustee of the Settlor's Family Trust. In-Law's pour-over bequest was valid because the trust was clearly identified in In-Law's will and its terms were incorporated in a writing that predated that will. Victim can reach trust assets in the First Bank account because the spendthrift provision is ineffective, both because the trust was self-settled and, in some states, because it would be deemed revocable.

Point One: (30-40%)

Settlor's Family Trust became a valid trust when the First Bank account was opened in the name of Settlor, as trustee. The trust had both a trustee and beneficiaries and, once the account was opened, trust assets.

A trust of personal property is valid if it has a trustee, a beneficiary, and trust property. See, e.g., UNIF. TRUST CODE § 407; RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 20 (writing not necessary to create an enforceable inter vivos trust). After Settlor made his announcement and signed the napkin memorializing his intentions, the Settlor Family Trust had a trustee, Settlor, and two named beneficiaries, Settlor and Dawn. But it lacked assets because the stock sale proceeds that Settlor declared as trust assets did not yet exist. The announcement and napkin thus evidenced nothing more than the intent to create a trust in the future, and a promise to create a trust in the future is typically unenforceable without consideration.

However, the $100,000 deposit into the First Bank account three years later was sufficient to create a valid trust at that time. If a trust that is invalid for lack of assets is later funded, a trust arises at that time if the settlor re-manifests the intention to create the trust. By depositing $100,000 into an account at First Bank in the name of Settlor, as Trustee of the Settlor's Family Trust, Settlor re-manifested an intention to create a trust with the terms described in Settlor's original declaration. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS §§ 26 & cmt. e, 86 cmt. c. Thus, while the trust was not valid when Settlor made his announcement, it was valid after the deposit into the First Bank account.

Point Two: (25-35%)

The pour-over bequest is valid because the trust was clearly identified in In-Law's will and the trust's terms were incorporated in a writing antedating that will.

Under the UNIFORM TESTAMENTARY ADDITIONS TO TRUST ACT and UNIFORM PROBATE CODE, a person may bequeath assets to a trust created during the testator's lifetime, by the testator or another, so long as the trust is identified in the testator's will and its terms are incorporated in a writing executed before or concurrently with the execution of the testator's will. Under these acts, such a bequest is valid even if the trust is unfunded, revocable, and amendable. See UNIF. TESTAMENTARY ADDITIONS TO TRUST ACT § 1(a); UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-511(a). In-Law clearly identified the "Settlor's Family Trust" in her will, and its terms were incorporated in a writing, the cocktail napkin, predating the execution of that will. As the acts do not require a formal document, the napkin satisfies the writing requirement. One of the uniform acts or a like statute has been enacted in all states. Therefore, In-law could pour her estate over to the Settlor's Family Trust.

The common law incorporation-by-reference doctrine, under which a testator may direct the distribution of his probate assets in accordance with the terms of another instrument that exists when the testator's will was executed and which is specifically referred to in the will, would also permit a court to distribute In-Law's estate in accordance with the provisions of the Settlor's Family Trust. See William H. McGovern & Sheldon F. Kurtz, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES § 6.2. Thus, under either the common law or modern uniform acts, Settlor, as trustee, would take In-Law's estate.

Point Three: (25-35%)

The judgment creditor can reach trust assets to the extent the assets of this self-settled trust could be reached by Settlor.

Because the Settlor's Family Trust is a self-settled trust, its spendthrift provisions are not enforceable on behalf of the trust settlor. See UNIF. TRUST CODE § 505 (a)(2); RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 58(2) & cmt. e (Tent. Draft No. 2); RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 156. The fact that Settlor's right of withdrawal is limited to funds "for my support" makes no difference; when the settlor of a trust is also a trust beneficiary, his creditors are entitled to the maximum amount that could be distributed from the trust to the settlor, even when withdrawals are discretionary or limited by a support standard.

Settlor's creditors might also argue that trust assets can be reached because the Settlor's Family Trust is revocable. Many states provide that creditors of the settlor of a revocable trust can reach trust assets in satisfaction of their claims. See UNIF. TRUST CODE § 505(a); RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 25 cmt. e. Contrary to the common law, some states now presume that a self-settled inter vivos trust is revocable. See UNIF. TRUST CODE § 602; RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 63 cmt. c. In other states, the creditors might argue that Settlor's retained power to distribute income and principal to himself is effectively a power of revocation. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 330.

[NOTE: Applicants should not receive credit for the conclusion that the spendthrift provision is invalid because the creditor is a tort victim. A few state courts have refused, on public policy grounds, to enforce spendthrift provisions against the claims of tort victims who can show gross negligence or intentional misconduct. See, e.g., Sligh v. First Nat'l Bank, 704 So. 2d 1020 (Miss. 1997). But the facts here do not show gross negligence or an intentional tort and only a handful of courts have adopted this position. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 59 Reporters' Notes; UNIF. TRUST CODE § 504 cmt.]

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP III, IV.B

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Is Dealer vicariously liable for Sales's negligence?
 - (a) Do Dealer and Sales have a master-servant relationship?
 - (b) Was Sales acting within the scope of his employment?
 - (2) Has Sales violated his fiduciary duty to Dealer such that he must give Dealer the $200 that Friend paid him?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Dealer is vicariously liable for Sales's negligence. Dealer and Sales have a master-servant relationship because Dealer employed Sales to perform services on behalf of Dealer, and Dealer had the right to control the physical conduct of Sales's performance. When Sales negligently injured Ped, Sales was acting within the scope of his employment as he had been assigned the task of delivering the SUV to Rich in Smalltown.

Sales, as an agent, is a fiduciary. Sales violated his fiduciary duty to Dealer by failing to obey instructions and failing to act solely for the benefit of Dealer. Sales must give all profits arising from the agency relationship to the principal. Therefore, Sales must give the $200 to Dealer.

Point One: (5-15%)

Dealer is vicariously liable for Sales's negligence if there is a relationship between Dealer and Sales that qualifies as master and servant (see Point One(a)), and Sales was acting within the scope of his employment when he negligently injured Ped (see Point One(b)).

Masters are liable for the torts of their servants committed while acting in the scope of their employment. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 219(1). Therefore, Dealer is vicariously liable for Sales's negligence if (a) Dealer and Sales created an agency relationship that rises to the level of master-servant, and (b) Sales was acting within the scope of his employment when he negligently injured Ped.

Point One(a): (25-35%)

Dealer and Sales created a master-servant relationship.

Agency is a fiduciary relationship “which results from the manifestation of consent by one person to another that the other shall act on his behalf and subject to his control, and the consent by the other so to act.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 1(1).

Sales is a full-time employee of Dealer. Although (1) Dealer did not generally deliver SUVs, (2) Sales was employed as a salesperson, not a driver, (3) delivery was made after the normal workday, and (4) Rich agreed to pay Sales $75 for delivery, Sales was still an agent, acting on behalf of Dealer and subject to Dealer’s control, when he delivered the SUV to Rich. Sales delivered the SUV at the request of Dealer. The delivery was for the benefit of Dealer. Dealer agreed to make the delivery because Dealer “was eager to please Rich.” Sales made the delivery subject to Dealer’s control. Dealer provided directions to Rich’s house and instructions regarding the drive (“Drive straight to his house, no detours. Drive carefully and no speeding. I don’t want any dents in that SUV.”). Overall, the facts support a conclusion that an agency relationship existed between Dealer and Sales.

This agency relationship between Dealer and Sales rises to the level of master-servant. “A master is a principal who employs an agent to perform services and who controls or has a right to control the physical conduct of the [agent’s] performance.” Restatement (Second) of Agency § 2(1). This is a fact-based analysis. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 220 specifies factors to be considered in determining whether an agent is a servant or, instead, an independent contractor. The most important factor is the extent of control that Dealer may exercise over the details of the work. See Binsau v. Garstin, 177 A.2d 639, 641 (Del. 1962); Miller v. Component Homes, Inc., 356 N.W.2d 213, 217 (Iowa 1984). Dealer provided Sales with instructions regarding speed and route, which indicates the power to control the manner in which Sales performed the work in question.

Other factors that support a master-servant relationship include the following: Delivering SUVs is not a distinct occupation for Sales. Delivering SUVs is not work done by a specialist without supervision. Delivering SUVs does not require special skills or equipment. Further, Sales is a full-time employee of Dealer, and Dealer did not pay Sales any extra money for this work.

[NOTE: There are some factors that support an argument that Sales was acting as an independent contractor rather than servant. Delivering SUVs was not a regular part of Dealer’s business. This was an ad hoc assignment, not a regular part of Sales’s duties. Sales was paid separately for this work ($75 by Rich). Further, Sales delivered the SUV after his regular hours of employment. While overall, it is likely that a court would conclude that the agency relationship between Dealer and Sales rises to the level of a master-servant relationship, an applicant should receive credit for a cogent argument either way.]

Point One(b): (25-35%)

Sales was acting in the scope of his employment when he negligently injured Ped.

For Dealer to be held vicariously liable for Sales’s negligence, the tort must have been committed within the scope of Sales’s employment. Conduct is “within the scope of employment if, but only if” it is conduct that the person was employed to perform, it occurs substantially within the authorized time and space limits, and it is done to serve the master. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 228. Additionally, conduct is “within the scope of employment” if it is “of the same general nature as that authorized, or incidental to the conduct authorized.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 229(1).

An applicant might argue that delivering the SUV was not “within the scope of employment.” Although Sales delivered the SUV to serve Dealer, Sales was employed as a salesperson. Additionally, the delivery was performed after the normal workday and in Smalltown, not Capital City, where the dealership was located.

However, scope of employment is determined by the manifestations of the master. It “includes only acts of the kind authorized, done within limits of time and space which approximate those created by the authorization.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 228 cmt. a. Dealer specifically authorized Sales to deliver the SUV to Smalltown after work. Therefore, this act was authorized and within the scope of employment.

While the escapade with Friend might be a “frolic” that exceeded the scope of Sales’s employment, the accident occurred after any “frolic” had ended and while Sales was completing the delivery of the SUV pursuant to Dealer’s instructions.

Point Two: (20-30%)

Sales violated his fiduciary duty to Dealer and therefore must give the $200 to Dealer.

As an agent (see Point One(a) above), Sales owes a fiduciary duty to Dealer, his principal, with respect to matters within the scope of the agency. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 13. This includes the duty to obey reasonable instructions and the duty to act solely for the benefit of the principal with respect to matters within the scope of his agency. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY §§ 385, 387. When Sales made a detour to help Friend move, Sales violated his duty to obey the reasonable instruction “Drive straight to his house, no detours. Drive carefully and no speeding.” By using the SUV for his own benefit, Sales also violated his duty to act solely for the benefit of Dealer as he used the SUV to make a personal profit. As a result, Sales is liable to Dealer for the $200. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY §§ 403 (agent who makes a profit in violation of his duty of loyalty is liable to principal for that profit), 404 (agent who, in violation of his duty, uses principal’s assets for his own gain is subject to liability for that profit).

Further, even if an applicant were to argue that Sales had not violated his duty to Dealer, Sales would still be obligated to give Dealer the $200. An “agent’s primary function is to make profits for the principal, and his duty to account includes accounting for any unexpected and incidental accretions whether or not received in violation of duty.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 388 cmt. a.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE I.A.1, I.B, I.E

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) Does a federal district court have federal question jurisdiction over a claim based on the state law of defamation when the plaintiff's complaint alleges that an anticipated First Amendment defense is invalid?
 - (1)(b) Does a federal district court have diversity jurisdiction when the defendant previously resided in the same state as the plaintiff, still considers that state "home," and plans to return someday?
 - (2) Can a federal district court in State A assert personal jurisdiction over a defendant whose activities occurred outside State A when those activities included posting allegedly defamatory material concerning a State A plaintiff on a website viewable by State A residents and when the defendant knows that the website is viewed by State A residents and derives revenue as a result of that fact?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Federal question jurisdiction is not available in this case because the complaint asserts a tort claim under state law. The well-pleaded complaint rule governs here; thus the negation of the federal defense in the complaint would not create federal question jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331.

Whether the court has diversity jurisdiction over the case depends on whether Defendant is considered to have established a domicile in State B. If he is domiciled in State B, the parties are diverse and the amount in controversy is sufficient for jurisdiction. If he is still a State A domiciliary, then diversity is defeated. The matter can be argued either way, but the facts appear to support a conclusion that Defendant's current domicile is in State B because his intent is to remain and live there for the time being.

The question of personal jurisdiction over Defendant based on his publication of an alleged defamation over the Internet asks whether Defendant had sufficient contact with State A to justify the assertion of personal jurisdiction. Under the approach of most courts, this will turn on the degree to which Defendant targeted State A readers and the State A-based Plaintiff and published the story with knowledge that it might cause harm to Plaintiff in State A. A consideration of the "fairness/reasonableness" factors would also be necessary.

Point One(a): (10-20%)

The federal district court does not have federal question jurisdiction because the complaint alleges a state law tort claim and federal issues exist only as a possible defense.

Plaintiff's complaint does not raise a federal question but, instead, asserts a tort claim under state law. According to the well-pleaded complaint rule, a plaintiff's anticipation of a federal defense in the complaint does not create federal question jurisdiction. Louisville & Nashville R.R. Co. v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149 (1908). Thus, Plaintiff's allegation that Defendant has no defense under the First Amendment does not, in itself, create subject-matter jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a).

Point One(b): (30-40%)

The federal district court will have subject-matter jurisdiction based on diversity of citizenship under 28 U.S.C. § 1332 only if Defendant is considered a domiciliary of State B.

The complaint states a claim well in excess of the $75,000 jurisdictional threshold required for diversity jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a). Thus, the question is whether there is complete diversity between Plaintiff and Defendant. See Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 7 U.S. 267 (1806) (establishing the rule of "complete diversity"). Plaintiff is a citizen of State A by virtue of her residence and domicile in State A. If Defendant is a citizen of State B, there is diversity. If Defendant is still a citizen of State A (where he lived until three years ago), then there is no diversity between Defendant and Plaintiff, and the court lacks jurisdiction.

For purposes of the diversity statute, a person is considered a citizen of the state in which he is domiciled. A person's domicile is his or her permanent home, the place where a person intends to remain indefinitely, and the place to which the person intends to return when temporarily absent. See Mas v. Perry, 489 F.2d 1396 (5th Cir. 1974).

Under the facts, there is a strong argument that State B has become Defendant's new domicile. He has lived there for three years; he votes, pays taxes, and owns property there. The center of his life appears to be State B, and he appears to intend to establish his permanent home there for the time being at least.

One might argue, on the other hand, that Defendant's expressed intent to return to State A someday and his statement that he views State A as his home mean that his domicile is still in State A; State B is but a temporary sojourn. While such an argument is plausible, the facts that Defendant's residence in State B has some permanence, that he treats it as his current permanent home for all purposes, and that he has no intention of returning to State A at any definite future time, make it most likely that a court would conclude that his domicile is in State B and that he has become a State B citizen for diversity purposes.

Point Two: (40-50%)

Defendant may be subject to personal jurisdiction in State A because he appears intentionally to have targeted State A readers from his State B-based website.

Under Rule 4(k)(1) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the federal district court can assert jurisdiction over a defendant who could be subjected to jurisdiction in the state courts of State A. Because of State A's long-arm statute (which is a general long-arm statute that extends to the constitutional limits), the only inquiry here is the constitutionality of the assertion of personal jurisdiction.

The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment permits a court to exercise general personal jurisdiction over a foreign defendant when that defendant maintains substantial, continuous, and systematic contacts with the forum state. See Helicopteros Nacionales v. Hall, 466 U.S. 408 (1984). Where such contacts exist, the state may assert jurisdiction whether or not the claim is related to the defendant's contacts. Alternatively, a state may exercise specific personal jurisdiction where a nonresident defendant has purposefully availed itself of the benefits and protections of the forum state through minimum contacts, the claim arises out of or relates to those contacts, and the exercise of jurisdiction does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310 (1945).

Although the United States Supreme Court has not yet addressed the question of personal jurisdiction for Internet-based contacts, many lower courts have grappled with the question. Since websites on the Internet can be viewed everywhere, most courts have been reluctant to hold that the maintenance of a website alone is sufficient to subject the owner of the site to jurisdiction everywhere. One of the leading opinions is Zippo Mfg. Co. v. Zippo Dot Com, Inc., 952 F. Supp. 1119 (W.D. Pa. 1997). Zippo suggested that the more interactive a website, the more likely courts should be to uphold personal jurisdiction, and that a purely passive website would not be sufficient to establish jurisdiction. Here, because Defendant's website, www.NBT.com, is passive, that is, it does not enable viewers to interact by posting their own messages, general jurisdiction based solely on the newsletter's accessibility across the United States would be unlikely.

However, Defendant did more than simply maintain a website that was accessed by State A residents. Defendant's website was largely devoted to commentary and reporting on events in State A, and Defendant knew (and profited from) the fact that many of his readers came from that area. In Calder v. Jones, 465 U.S. 783 (1984), the U.S. Supreme Court held that a California court could exercise jurisdiction over a Florida writer and a Florida editor of a defamatory article about a California resident's conduct in California. The Court reasoned that the defendants knew that their magazine (the National Enquirer) had its largest circulation in California and that the injury would be felt by the plaintiff in her home state. Under those circumstances, the defendants must have reasonably anticipated being haled into court in California when sued for the defamatory nature of their article. Lower courts have applied the logic of Calder to uphold jurisdiction where defamatory communications over the Internet intentionally targeted readers in the plaintiff's home state. See Young v. New Haven Advocate, 315 F.3d 256, 258 (4th Cir. 2002) (rejecting jurisdiction where Internet posting did not manifest intent to target audience in forum state); Wagner v. Miskin, 660 N.W.2d 593 (N.D. 2003) (upholding jurisdiction where Internet communication did target forum resident).

In this case, the facts likewise suggest a targeting of State A readers and a State A plaintiff in such a way that Defendant could "reasonably anticipate" being haled into State A courts to answer a complaint by Plaintiff against him. Not only did Defendant know that State A readers were likely to view his website, but Defendant could reasonably predict that the impact of the article would be felt by Plaintiff in State A. In addition, Defendant's commentary concerned actions taken in part in State A.

Although Defendant has not engaged in any physical conduct in State A, his targeting of a State A resident, the commercial benefits he derives from serving State A readers, and the large State A readership he has all add up to a strong case for specific personal jurisdiction over Defendant for purposes of this action. State A has a strong interest in the case, Plaintiff has a strong interest in having it tried in State A, and the needs of interstate commerce would be served if defendants who cause harm through instruments of commerce (e.g., the Internet) were subject to being held to account where foreseeable harm occurs, at least if the defendant's primary business activity is directed at the forum state. Cf. Asahi Metal Industry Co. v. Superior Court, 480 U.S. 102 (1987) (unreasonable to exercise jurisdiction in absence of forum interest, when defendant had no commercial or other ties to forum apart from product ending up there through stream of commerce). On the other hand, the proper reach of state court jurisdiction in Internet cases has not been definitively decided, and courts may be reluctant to extend jurisdiction to reach a defendant who, like Defendant, does not actively reach out to State A readers but simply maintains a passive website to which State A readers can direct their web browsers should they so choose.

FAMILY LAW I.E, III.C, III.G, III.H

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Will a husband's alimony obligation that terminated upon his former wife's remarriage be reinstated if the former wife's new marriage is annulled?
 - (2) Can an annulment be obtained based on a spouse's misrepresentation of that spouse's assets?
 - (3) Is a marriage void if contracted after the filing of a divorce petition but before the final decree is entered?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The court is unlikely to reinstate a spousal maintenance award based on the annulment of the recipient spouse's remarriage. Although an annulment legally "erases" a marriage, the weight of modern authority does not permit reinstatement of alimony based on annulment of the marriage that terminated the alimony obligation. The court is also unlikely to grant an annulment based on misrepresentation of the value of a stock portfolio. Fraud is a basis for annulment only if it goes to the "essentials" of the marriage, and courts typically have not found asset misrepresentation to meet this test. Finally, the court is likely to declare Herb's bigamous marriage valid based on one or another curative doctrine and thus deny Herb's motion to dismiss.

Point One: (30-40%)

The court is not likely to reinstate a spousal maintenance award that terminated upon remarriage even if the remarriage is annulled.

When a marriage has been annulled, it is typically declared invalid from the date of its inception. By contrast, divorce terminates a marriage upon the date of the divorce. Because an annulment legally "erases" a marriage, most courts have held that alimony may not be granted in annulment cases without statutory authority; it seems illogical to say that a marriage never existed and then impose a duty that arises only from a valid marriage. The same logic would support reinstatement of a prior spousal maintenance award. If the award terminates on remarriage and no remarriage occurred, then it would seem that the alimony entitlement still exists.

Some of the older cases apply the "logic of annulment" doctrine and order reinstatement of prior alimony awards. But, recognizing the payor's interest in certainty as to the termination of his obligations, the vast majority of the modern cases deny petitions to revive alimony entitlements that were terminated by an annulled marriage. See Homer H. Clark, THE LAW OF DOMESTIC RELATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES 144 n. 25 (2d ed. 1988) (collecting cases). Modern statutory standards typically follow this “no-revival” approach. See, e.g., UNIF. MARRIAGE & DIVORCE ACT § 208 (providing that the court granting an annulment may, in the interests of justice, make the decree prospective only and thus equivalent to a divorce decree).

Some modern courts have reinstated alimony awards when the equities strongly favor the former alimony recipient. For example, in In re Marriage of Weintraub, 167 Cal. App. 3d 420, 213 Cal. Rptr. 159 (1985), the wife alleged that her second marriage took place only because she was abducted and physically coerced into marriage; the court held that proof of an involuntary marriage was enough to support reinstatement. Here, there are no facts that justify reinstatement: Ann chose to marry Charles; although Charles misrepresented his assets, he could have suffered financial reverses even had he told the truth. Ann is neither disabled nor infirm. Moreover, Ann could have divorced Charles and thus preserved her entitlement to obtain alimony from him. In many jurisdictions, statutory law today permits the spouse who obtains an annulment to also seek alimony.

Point Two: (20-30%)

Fraud is a basis for annulment only if it goes to the “essentials” of the marriage, and asset value is not generally considered an essential.

In most states, a marriage is voidable and may be annulled based on fraud. Even in states without explicit statutory authority, courts have often found that their inherent equity power permits the grant of a fraud-based annulment. Although some case law permits annulment based on a “material” misrepresentation, most courts have “required fraud going to the ‘essentials of the marriage.’” Krause et al., FAMILY LAW: CASES, COMMENTS, AND QUESTIONS 561 (4th ed. 1998).

The line between fraud going to the “essentials” and lesser misrepresentation is not always easy to discern. The cases are fact-based, and some jurisdictions have interpreted the materiality requirements more liberally than others. But even in “liberal” annulment states, “false representations regarding one’s character, social standing, or fortune do not constitute fraud sufficient to annul a marriage. While such factors constitute a species of fraud, they do not afford a basis for destruction of the marriage.” 4 AM. JUR. 2D, Annulment of Marriage § 24.

Annulment is particularly unlikely here as Charles seems to have misrepresented only the value of his stock. The case is simply one in which a spouse thought her intended was wealthier than he actually was. Such a situation could arise as a result of market forces as well as misrepresentation. Therefore, Ann is highly unlikely to obtain an annulment of her marriage to Charles based on his misrepresentation of his stock portfolio’s value.

Point Three: (30-40%)

For purposes of ascertaining the validity of a subsequent marriage, curative doctrines are likely to prevail over the argument that Herb’s marriage to Betty is void for bigamy because it was entered prior to a final decree of divorce.

If Herb's divorce from Ann was not final at the time he married Betty, his marriage to Betty was bigamous. A bigamous marriage is void ab initio; it has no legal effect.

However, public policy favors finding a marriage to be valid: "the law presumes morality and not immorality." Hynes v. McDermott, 91 N.Y. 451 (1883). Betty might rely on either of two "marriage-saving" doctrines to avoid the conclusion that her marriage to Herb is void:

1. There is a presumption that the latest of a series of marriages is valid. The presumption is "one of the strongest presumptions known to the law" and can be rebutted only by "strong . . . evidence that the prior marriage still subsists or by cogent and conclusive evidence." Clark, supra, § 2.7. The presumption is designed to protect the parties' expectations; some cases thus hold that its strength increases with the lapse of time and the birth of children.

In some jurisdictions the presumption of validity could be rebutted by evidence that Herb was still married to Ann when he married Betty, even though his divorce from Ann was later granted. The fact that Herb's marriage to Betty was short might also lead a court to find the presumption rebutted. But because the presumption is essentially an equitable doctrine, many courts would estop Herb from rebutting the presumption of validity based on his "unclean hands," Betty's innocence, and the fact that Ann will not be harmed by a finding that the marriage to Betty is valid because she has been divorced from Herb for a period of time.

[NOTE: This issue can be argued either way. Applicants should receive credit for correctly stating the legal principles and making a cogent argument.]

2. Removal of the impediment (the divorce) renders the subsequent marriage valid. Under the Uniform Marriage & Divorce Act § 207(b), parties to "a marriage prohibited under this section who cohabit after removal of the impediment are lawfully married as of the date of the removal of the impediment."

Using one or the other or some combination of these marriage-saving doctrines, it is probable that the court would find that Herb was married to Betty, and therefore deny Herb's motion to dismiss the divorce petition.

CORPORATIONS V.A.1, V.A.2, VII.F

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Was the special shareholder meeting to vote on the proposal to dissolve Green properly called?
 - (2) Could the Class A Preferred shares vote at the special shareholder meeting called to vote on the proposal to dissolve Green?
 - (3) Did Deb properly appoint Ed as her proxy?
 - (4) If Ed was permitted to represent both his own and Deb's shares, was there a quorum present at the special shareholder meeting so that a vote could be taken, and, if so, what vote was necessary to approve the proposal to dissolve Green?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Green's board of directors has the authority to call a special shareholder meeting to vote on the proposal to dissolve the corporation. The corporation must provide proper notice of the meeting. The notice for this special meeting was defective for two reasons. First, the notice of the meeting failed to specify the purpose of the meeting. Second, Ed, a shareholder entitled to vote on the proposal, was not given notice. Although Ed waived his objection to failure to receive notice when he attended the meeting without objection, this objection was not waived by Deb because neither she nor her valid proxy attended the meeting. Thus, the meeting was not properly held. Even if the meeting were deemed to have been properly held, the proposal failed.

At the meeting, Ed properly voted his 200 shares of Class A Preferred because the articles of incorporation of Green provided that these shares were entitled to voting rights if the corporation failed to make dividend payments for four successive quarters and had outstanding arrearages. Ed, however, could not vote Deb's shares as Deb did not properly appoint Ed as her proxy. A valid proxy must be evidenced by a signed writing or verifiable electronic transmission.

If Ed had been permitted to represent both his own and Deb's shares at the meeting, a quorum was present and the vote could occur. However, the proposal could not be adopted. The vote would be a tie and therefore there would be no majority (the minimum requirement to approve the action).

Point One: (35-45%)

While the board of directors may call a special meeting to vote on the proposal to dissolve Green, this special meeting was not properly called for two reasons. First, the notice for the special meeting did not specify the purpose of the meeting. Second, all shareholders entitled to vote at a special shareholder meeting are entitled to notice of the meeting, and Ed was not given notice.

A proposal to dissolve the corporation adopted by the board of directors must be submitted to a shareholder vote. See REVISED MODEL BUSINESS CORPORATION ACT (“RMBCA”) § 14.02(a). For this purpose, the board of directors has the authority to call a special meeting. See RMBCA §§ 7.02(a)(1), 3.04 (board of directors will always be empowered to call a special meeting). After the Green board unanimously agreed to recommend dissolution of the corporation, they sought to call a special meeting to submit the proposal to a shareholder vote. However, as discussed below, the meeting was not properly called.

The corporation must provide proper notice of the special meeting. Furthermore, notice of the special meeting must include a full description of its purpose. RMBCA § 7.05(c). The notice providing for this meeting did not include a statement of purpose. While Deb discovered the purpose of the meeting during Ed’s phone call to her, she did not waive the notice impropriety because neither she nor her duly appointed proxy attended the meeting.

In order to properly call a meeting, the corporation also is obligated to notify all shareholders entitled to vote at the special meeting in a timely manner. RMBCA § 7.05(a) (more than 10 and less than 60 days before the meeting); Gray v. Bloomington & N. Ry., 120 Ill. App. 159 (1905) (meeting held under written waiver of notice). Here, notice for this special meeting was deficient because, although Deb was given timely notice, Ed was not. Ed learned of the meeting accidentally two days prior to the meeting during his dinner conversation with Deb. However, Ed, unlike Deb, waived his objection to lack of notice by attending the meeting without objection. See RMBCA § 7.06(b)(1); In re P.B. Mathiason Mfg. Co., 99 S.W. 502 (Mo. App. 1907); Germer v. Triple-State Natural Gas & Oil Co., 54 S.E. 509 (W.Va. 1906); FLETCHER CYCLOPEDIA OF THE LAW OF PRIVATE CORPORATIONS § 1999.

[NOTE: An exceptional answer might add that under the RMBCA, even if the Class A Preferred shares were not entitled to voting rights at this time (see Point Two), they would still be entitled to notice of this special meeting because all shareholders are entitled to notice of a meeting to consider fundamental corporate change, including dissolution. RMBCA § 14.02(d).]

Point Two: (5-15%)

Ed was entitled to vote his 200 Class A Preferred shares because under Green’s articles of incorporation these shares were entitled to voting rights as Green had missed more than four successive dividend payments and there were arrearages outstanding.

Unless the articles of incorporation provide otherwise, each outstanding share, regardless of class, is entitled to one vote on each matter voted on at a shareholders’ meeting. See RMBCA § 7.21(a). Green’s articles of incorporation provided that the Class A Preferred shares were non-voting shares unless certain conditions were fulfilled. Therefore, absent the occurrence of those certain conditions, the Class A Preferred shares were not entitled to vote on a proposed dissolution, though in an RMBCA jurisdiction they were entitled to notice of the vote. RMBCA § 14.02(d).

Under these facts, Ed was entitled to vote his 200 Class A Preferred shares because the conditions specified in the articles of incorporation had occurred. Green had missed four successive dividends and there were arrearages outstanding.

Point Three: (20-30%)

Ed could not vote Deb's shares because Deb did not properly appoint Ed as her proxy.

A shareholder may vote in person or by proxy. RMBCA § 7.22(a). Therefore, Deb was entitled to appoint Ed as her proxy to vote her shares at the special meeting when she was unable to attend. However, an oral proxy appointment is not sufficient. To appoint a valid proxy, Deb must sign an appointment form or make a verifiable electronic transmission. RMBCA § 7.22(b). In this case, Deb orally asked Ed to serve as her proxy. This appointment was insufficient.

Point Four: (30-40%)

The proposal to dissolve Green was not properly approved because the meeting was not properly held. Even if the meeting had been properly held, the votes cast in favor of dissolution were insufficient to adopt the dissolution proposal because Ed did not have a valid proxy and no majority was cast in favor of the proposal.

First, as noted above, the special meeting was not properly held as it was not called in the proper manner, and the impropriety was not effectively waived. Furthermore, even if the meeting had been properly called, there was no quorum. Unless the articles of incorporation provide otherwise, a quorum is usually a majority of votes entitled to be cast on a matter. RMBCA § 7.25(a). As no dividend had been paid in more than four consecutive quarters, the Class A Preferred shares were entitled to vote. See Point Two above. Therefore, there were 400 shares entitled to vote on the proposal to dissolve Green. Thus, at least 201 votes must be represented in order to establish a quorum. If Ed had been permitted to represent all of Deb's and his own shares at the special meeting, all 400 shares would have been present and the quorum satisfied. However, Ed was not entitled to vote Deb's shares. Because only 200 shares were represented at the meeting, no quorum was present, and the dissolution proposal failed.

Even if the special meeting had been properly held, the votes cast in favor of dissolution were insufficient to adopt the dissolution proposal because Ed did not have a valid proxy and no majority was cast in favor of the proposal. The vote required to approve the proposal to dissolve depends on the jurisdiction. Under the RMBCA, the proposal will be approved if, of the votes represented at a properly held meeting, more votes are cast in favor of the proposal than against. Under the older Model Business Corporation Act standard, the proposal to dissolve must be approved by a majority of shareholders entitled to vote. Any other applicable statute would require an even greater vote in favor of the proposal.

Thus, regardless of the standard applied, the proposal to dissolve Green, even assuming the meeting was properly held and Ed had properly cast Deb's votes, would fail because, if Ed had voted Deb's 200 shares (100 Common, 100 Class A Preferred) in favor of the proposal and his 200 Class A Preferred shares against, there would have been a tie vote, and neither a super-majority or even a majority in favor of the proposal.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS II.H

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Does a secured party's collateral include property that has been consigned to the debtor?
 - (2) What is the priority between the unperfected security interest of a consignor and the perfected security interest of an inventory lender, and how does that priority affect the consignor after foreclosure?
 - (3) How can a consignor achieve priority over an inventory lender?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The effect of Specialty's consignment of the speakers to Giant and Giant's grant of a security interest in "inventory" is that Bank acquired a security interest in the speakers. It does not matter that Specialty retained title to the speakers.

Specialty's interest in the speakers is a purchase money security interest under Article 9. Because Specialty did not file a financing statement to perfect its interest, the interest is junior to Bank's.

Specialty's interest could have been made senior to Bank's security interest if Specialty had filed a financing statement when it delivered the speakers to Giant.

Point One: (35-45%)

Bank's collateral includes the Specialty speakers, even though they are not owned by Giant, because Giant is deemed to have all the rights and title in the speakers that Specialty has, and Giant gave Bank a security interest that covered the speakers.

Bank had a security interest in Giant's inventory. Ordinarily, Bank's security interest would only attach to property in which the debtor (Giant) had rights, and it would only be effective to the extent of Giant's rights. See UCC § 9-203(b)(2). Under the terms of the consignment arrangement, the Specialty speakers are not owned by Giant (Specialty retains title), and accordingly, Giant would not ordinarily have ownership rights in them for purposes of attachment. However, UCC § 9-319(a) provides that, for purposes of determining the rights of a creditor of a consignee (e.g., the rights of Bank in this case), the consignee of goods under a consignment governed by Article 9 is "deemed to have rights and title to the goods identical to those [of] the consignor." Thus, if this consignment is governed by Article 9,

Giant will be treated as having had the full ownership interest that Specialty had in the speakers, and Bank's security interest will attach to the speakers.

On these facts, the Giant-Specialty transaction created an Article 9 consignment. Under UCC § 9-102(a)(20), an Article 9 consignment exists where goods are delivered to a merchant (other than an auctioneer) for the purpose of sale, the merchant deals in those goods under a name other than the name of the consignor, the goods are not consumer goods immediately before their delivery to the merchant, the value of the goods exceeds $1,000, and the transaction does not otherwise create a security interest. Here, goods valued over $1,000 were delivered to Giant (a merchant dealing in goods of that kind under its own name). Although destined to be sold to consumers, the goods were not consumer goods before delivery; they were part of Specialty's inventory. Compare § 9-102(a)(23) (consumer goods are goods used or bought for "personal, family, or household purposes") with § 9-102(a)(48) (inventory means goods held for sale). There is no indication that the Specialty-Giant transaction otherwise created a security interest. In short, the transaction is a consignment governed by Article 9, and Giant will be treated as having right and title to the speakers for Article 9 purposes.

As a result, Bank's security interest attaches to the Specialty speakers. Now that Giant has defaulted on its debt, Bank has the right to repossess the speakers, sell them within the guidelines of Article 9, and be repaid on its debt from the proceeds. See UCC § 9-610(a). Specialty would have no cause of action against Bank for doing so unless Bank conducted its sale in a commercially unreasonable manner or otherwise violated the dictates of Article 9's foreclosure provisions.

[NOTE: The facts don't indicate any Article 9 violations by Bank, and the question does not invite applicants to hypothesize such violations. Points can be given for short mentions of violations that would actually result in monetary harm to Specialty, but the main thrust of answers should be that there is nothing inherently wrongful in Bank's proceeding against Specialty's property, due to the consignment and attachment rules discussed above.]

Point Two: (25-35%)

Specialty is treated as having a security interest in the speakers, and this interest is unperfected. Accordingly, Specialty's interest is junior to Bank's perfected security interest, and it is therefore extinguished upon Bank's foreclosure.

Although Specialty is the outright owner of the speakers, Article 9 treats Specialty as if its interest in the speakers were a purchase-money security interest in inventory. See UCC §§ 9-102(a)(72)(c), 9-103(d). So the question is whether Specialty's purchase-money security interest in inventory has priority over Bank's ordinary security interest in the speakers as inventory of Giant such that Specialty can recover the proceeds of the sale of the speakers.

On these facts, Bank's interest clearly prevails. Bank perfected its interest by filing a financing statement, whereas Specialty's interest is unperfected. Perfection of a purchase-money security interest in inventory would normally require Specialty to file a financing statement. See UCC § 9-310(a). There is no indication in the facts that Specialty took this step. Indeed, there is no hint that Specialty did anything to alert third parties to its interest, and the facts say explicitly that “as far as any third party can discern, the speakers are part of Giant’s own inventory.”

A perfected security interest in inventory has priority over an unperfected security interest in the same inventory, even if the unperfected interest is a purchase-money interest. UCC § 9-322(a)(2). This priority over the inventory extends to the proceeds of that inventory. See UCC 9-322(b)(1). Thus, Bank has priority over Specialty as to the proceeds of the sale of the speakers.

Point Three: (25-35%)

Specialty could have achieved priority over Bank by promptly filing a financing statement against Giant.

As noted above, Article 9 treats Specialty’s ownership of the speakers as if it were a purchase-money security interest. See UCC § 9-103(d). Specialty could have protected its interest in the speakers had it filed a financing statement to perfect that interest. Had Specialty perfected its interest before Bank, Specialty would have achieved priority. See § 9-322(a)(1). Moreover, because Specialty’s interest is treated as a “purchase-money security interest in inventory,” it could have prevailed over Bank even if it perfected after Bank perfected, so long as it (1) filed a financing statement against Giant by the time Giant received the speakers, and (2) sent a notification to all holders of conflicting security interests in Giant’s inventory explaining that Specialty was keeping a purchase money security interest in the consigned speakers.

[NOTE: Had Specialty achieved priority over Bank, Bank would technically still have had the right to foreclose on Specialty’s speakers (because any junior party is free to foreclose, see UCC § 9-610(a)), but Specialty’s senior security interest would not be discharged by such a foreclosure. See UCC §§ 9-617(a)(3), 9-201(a). In other words, Specialty’s interest would attach to the proceeds of the sale. Moreover, Specialty’s interest would follow the speakers into the hands of anyone who bought them at Bank’s foreclosure sale, and Specialty would be able to take the speakers back from the buyer since they are, after all, Specialty’s property. See UCC § 9-601(g).]

DECEDENTS' ESTATES I.B, I.D, II.I.6

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Is the lifetime gift of $60,000 to Grandchild 6 an advancement?
 - (2) Is Grandchild 1 barred from sharing in Dorothy's estate by a "slayer statute"?
 - (3) To whom should the probate estate be distributed and what is each person's share?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The transfer to Grandchild 6 is presumptively a gift, not an advancement. Grandchild 1 is not barred from sharing in the estate because Grandchild 1 did not feloniously take Dorothy's life. Thus, Dorothy's estate is distributable to her surviving grandchildren. The shares they take will depend on whether they take per stirpes or per capita under the applicable intestacy statute.

Point One: (30-40%)

There are potentially two reasons the gift to Grandchild 6 is not an advancement. First, the advancement doctrine is inapplicable when the decedent dies with a will. Second, under a typical advancement statute, lifetime gifts are not an advancement absent evidence that the transferor intended them as such.

The doctrine of advancements usually applies only to intestate succession. See William H. McGovern & Sheldon F. Kurtz, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES § 2.6 at 66 (2001). In states that follow this rule, the $60,000 gift to Grandchild 6 would be ignored when computing the "heirs" share of Dorothy's estate. However, there is some authority for the proposition that the doctrine of advancements would apply if, as here, a will leaves property to the testator's heirs. Id. Furthermore, here Dorothy has expressly directed an intestate-style distribution. Whether the $60,000 would be taken into account in determining Grandchild 6's share of Dorothy's estate would depend on the applicable advancement statute.

Under the common law, a lifetime transfer to an heir was presumptively treated as a down payment on the heir's intestate share. In most, if not all, states today, a lifetime transfer is presumed to be a gift and is ignored in computing the heir's intestate share unless there is evidence to show a contrary intent. See generally UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-109. Here, there is no evidence that Dorothy intended the $60,000 to be an advancement.

Point Two: (15-25%)

Grandchild 1 should not be barred from sharing in Dorothy's estate under the typical slayer statute because Grandchild 1 did not act with felonious intent.

Under the typical slayer statute, an heir or beneficiary is barred from taking from the decedent if the heir or beneficiary feloniously and intentionally killed the decedent. See, e.g., UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-803(b). The typical slayer statute excludes accidental killings even if they amount to manslaughter. Here, Grandchild 1 acted both inadvertently and negligently and thus is not barred by the slayer statute.

[NOTE: If an applicant concluded that Grandchild 1 would be barred by the slayer statute, Grandchild 1's forfeited share of Dorothy's estate would be disposed of as if Grandchild 1 predeceased Dorothy. Here, that would mean that Grandchild 1's share would pass to Great-Grandchild, Grandchild 1's child.]

Point Three: (40-50%)

Assuming both Grandchild 1 and Grandchild 6 share in Dorothy's estate, all six grandchildren take equal shares if the estate is distributed to them per capita. If the estate is distributed per stirpes, the same six grandchildren receive the entire estate but in different amounts. Under either system, Great-Grandchild takes nothing.

Dorothy's will incorporates by reference the state intestacy scheme. Thus, the distribution of the estate is determined as if Dorothy died intestate. State laws differ regarding the distribution among issue where the decedent died intestate. Many states make the initial division of shares by computing the number of the decedent's children who had either survived the decedent or who left issue who survived. In such states, the initial division would be into thirds (per stirpes system). In many other states, including Uniform Probate Code states, the initial division is made by counting the number of heirs at the generational level at which there is at least one living member (per capita per generation system). Here, that would be six, since the first level at which there are surviving descendants of Dorothy is the grandchild level.

Taking the latter (Uniform Probate Code approach) first, since no advancement was made to Grandchild 6 (see Point One) that grandchild shares in the estate. In addition, Grandchild 1 is not barred by the typical "slayer statute" because he did not intentionally take Dorothy's life. (See Point Two.) Thus, under the latter approach, all six grandchildren take equal $20,000 shares of Dorothy's estate.

In those states that initially divide the estate into thirds, Dorothy's estate would be divided into three $40,000 shares. Abel's two children would be entitled to split 1/3 of the estate, taking $20,000 each. Each of Brandon's three children would be entitled to 1/3 of a $40,000 share and Carrie's $40,000 share would pass entirely to Grandchild 6. Great-grandchild (the child of Grandchild 1) takes nothing because Grandchild 1 is entitled to take a share of Dorothy's estate and in all states a remote descendant is excluded from inheriting when that descendant's ancestor survives.

[NOTE: The foregoing discussion assumes that no advancement was made to Grandchild 6 and that Grandchild 1 was not barred by a slayer statute. If an applicant made other assumptions, the applicant should be expected to have a different analysis to Point Three.]

Questions

MEE Question 1

Consumer bought a sofa from Department Store for $2,000 with her Department Store charge card. Shortly after purchasing the sofa, Consumer lost her job and could no longer afford the monthly payments on the sofa. Unwilling to lose the sofa but unable to pay the $1,800 she knew she still owed, Consumer sent a check for $100 to Department Store's charge card operations, conspicuously writing "Payment in Full for All Amounts Owed" on both the memo line on the front of the check and on the back of the check. Department Store received the check and deposited it. The check cleared Consumer's checking account a week later.

When her next statement from Department Store arrived, it showed a $100 credit for the payment Consumer had made and a balance of $1,700 still owed for the sofa. Consumer promptly wrote a letter to Department Store claiming that she no longer owed any money for the sofa. She mailed the letter at the post office and then stopped for lunch at a local restaurant. Consumer left her handbag unattended on a table in the restaurant while she visited the restroom. Consumer's handbag was stolen by Thief, a woman who closely resembles Consumer. Consumer's checkbook and driver's license were in the handbag.

As soon as she realized her handbag was missing, Consumer reported to her bank, Bank, that her checkbook had been stolen. Meanwhile, using one of Consumer's checks, Thief wrote a check for $150 to Grocer. The signature appeared to be Consumer's but had actually been forged by Thief. Grocer gave Thief $150 in groceries for the check in the reasonable but mistaken assumption that the check and identification Thief had shown him really belonged to Thief.

One day after Consumer notified Bank of the theft, Grocer stopped in at Bank to cash the check Grocer had received from Thief. Bank refused to cash the check. Following Bank's refusal, Grocer contacted Consumer and demanded that she pay the $150 face amount of the check.

1. Does Consumer still owe $1,700 to Department Store? Explain.
2. Must Consumer pay Grocer $150? Explain.

MEE Question 2

Two years ago Nephew asked Uncle for a loan to purchase a tire dealership. Uncle agreed. Nephew decided to name the new business “Monster Tires” and to focus on selling oversized tires made by Big Rubber, Inc. Uncle agreed to accept 50% of the profits generated by Monster Tires, instead of a fixed payment, until the loan was fully repaid.

One year after Monster Tires was established, Nephew approached Friend, who had a knack for sales and marketing and was well-connected in the trucking business. Friend agreed to join Monster Tires in exchange for a one-third share of all of its profits. Friend and Nephew approached Uncle to renegotiate the repayment of the loan. Uncle was excited by Friend’s ideas to expand the business and agreed to forgive the loan and instead accept a one-third share of all of the profits of Monster Tires. Uncle also offered to let Monster Tires use one of his properties rent-free so that Monster Tires could open a second location.

Nephew and Friend both worked full time at Monster Tires. Friend began an aggressive sales campaign and spent a significant amount of time entertaining potential customers. Uncle was not involved in the day-to-day operations of Monster Tires.

Nephew, Uncle, and Friend were all present when Monster Tires opened its second store. The store was packed with potential customers, but Uncle was dismayed by the sparse inventory. When a representative of TireCo asked Uncle about placing its line of tires in the stores, Uncle agreed and signed a large purchase order for TireCo tires without consulting either Nephew or Friend.

After the store opening, Uncle, Nephew, and Friend went out to celebrate. Friend suggested that Monster Tires should buy a yacht for entertaining. Nephew agreed because he wanted to expand to a third location near the beach. Uncle vehemently protested and said: “We can’t afford a yacht. I forbid you to purchase one.” Two weeks later, Friend signed a contract with Custom Yachts to purchase a yacht for Monster Tires.

Monster Tires is now refusing to pay both TireCo and Custom Yachts.

1. Is Monster Tires liable to TireCo for the tires Uncle ordered? Explain.
2. Is Monster Tires liable to Custom Yachts for the yacht Friend ordered? Explain.
3. Are Uncle, Nephew, and Friend personally liable on either of the contracts? Explain.

MEE Question 3

In 1995, Husband and Wife duly executed a joint will which provided, in relevant part:

Each of us agrees that, when one of us dies, all of our property shall be distributed to the survivor. Furthermore, upon the death of the survivor we agree that: (1) $1,000 shall be distributed to the person who is then the pastor of the First Avenue Church; (2) $1,000 shall be distributed to the person named in a memorandum that the survivor shall leave in our safe deposit box at the Main Street Bank; and (3) at the survivor's death, the remainder of the survivor's property, however acquired, shall be distributed to our child, Child.

When this joint will was executed, George was the pastor of the First Avenue Church.

In 2000, Husband died. His estate of $150,000 was distributed to Wife pursuant to the joint will.

In 2001, Wife inherited $200,000 from her sister.

In 2002, Wife duly executed a new will providing in relevant part:

Upon my death I give: (1) $1,000 to the person who is then the pastor of the First Avenue Church; (2) $1,000 to the person named in a memorandum to be left in my safe deposit box; (3) $100,000 to my child, Child; and (4) the balance of my estate to my boyfriend, John, who has provided me with loving companionship since my late husband died.

In late 2003, Wife died leaving an estate valued at $400,000. A memorandum, dated February 2, 2003, and signed by Wife, was found in Wife's safe deposit box directing that $1,000 be distributed to her friend, Robin. Wife was survived by John, Robin, Child, George, and Ted, who had been appointed pastor of the First Avenue Church one week before Wife died. Wife's 2002 will was duly admitted to probate.

To whom should Wife's estate be distributed? Explain.

MEE Question 4

Ten years ago, Matt Smith, a musician, and Wendy Jones, a business executive, began living together in State A. One year later, they invited fifty friends and relatives to a “ceremony of commitment” at which they publicly vowed to “treat each other as an equal owner of all worldly goods acquired during our life together” and to “forsake all others” until “death do us part.” Matt and Wendy did not obtain a marriage license. After the ceremony, Matt and Wendy consistently referred to each other as “my companion.” They also opened a joint bank account and rented a house as “Wendy Jones and Matt Smith.”

Five years ago, Matt and Wendy moved to State B, where Wendy gave birth to Child. Matt and Wendy thereafter shared child-care responsibilities and spent relatively equal amounts of time with Child.

One year ago, Wendy left Matt and married Steve in State B. After the wedding, Wendy and Child moved to Steve’s home, and Wendy began to work part time.

Since her marriage to Steve, Wendy has allowed Matt to visit Child infrequently and only at her home. Matt has tried to give Wendy money for Child’s support, but Wendy has refused to take it.

Matt has filed a petition in State B seeking to establish his paternity and obtain joint custody of Child. In a separate State B action, Matt seeks a share of Wendy’s property acquired during the time they lived together. Wendy and Steve have filed an adoption petition seeking Child’s adoption by Steve. Matt opposes this petition. All of these actions have been consolidated for trial.

Pretrial discovery has established that Matt is Child’s biological parent, that Wendy has assets worth $300,000, all obtained from income earned while she lived with Matt, and that Matt has assets worth $1,500. Matt and Wendy each currently earn about $30,000 per year.

A common law marriage can be contracted in State A but not in State B.

1. May the State B court award Matt a share of Wendy’s property? Explain.
2. May the State B court grant Steve’s adoption petition over Matt’s opposition? Explain.

MEE Question 5

Until early this year, Parensco, Inc. (Parensco) owned 75% of the outstanding shares of Subco Corp. (Subco). The remaining 25% of the outstanding shares of Subco were held by numerous other shareholders. The president of Parensco is Carr, who is also a director of Parensco.

Several months ago, the president of Aster, Inc. (Aster) approached Carr, expressed an interest in acquiring control of Subco, and stated that Aster would consider a purchase price in the range of $200 per Subco share. After Carr's conversation with Aster, the board of directors of Parensco decided to merge Subco into Parensco. The purchase price for the 25% of the outstanding shares of Subco not owned by Parensco was set at $120 per share.

After its board duly authorized this transaction, Parensco issued the following press release:

The board of Parensco announced today that it seeks to acquire the 25% of Subco that it does not own. Subject to the approval of the Subco board, Parensco will pay $120 for each share of Subco in a cash-out merger, for a total cost to Parensco of $200 million.

Shortly after this press release was issued, the board of directors of Subco (Subco board), consisting solely of officers and directors of Parensco, but not including Carr, met to consider the merger offer. At the meeting, the Subco board heard a brief presentation from Carr and reviewed a report from Banker, an investment banker. Banker's report advised that, after undertaking a review of Subco, a fair valuation of Subco was $800 million and the price of $120 per share was generous for a minority interest in the corporation. Neither the Subco board nor Banker was aware of the discussion between Carr and Aster. After hearing Carr's presentation and reviewing Banker's report, the Subco board voted to approve the merger after a brief discussion and without any further investigation.

Parensco and Subco then issued a proxy statement to the Subco shareholders, which was complete and accurate except for its failure to mention the Aster proposal.

The merger was approved by a vote of 90% of the outstanding Subco shares, consisting of the 75% of the outstanding shares held by Parensco and 15% of the outstanding shares held by minority shareholders. The merger was then consummated and Parensco sent checks to the Subco shareholders in payment for their stock. A few months later, Parensco announced the sale for $3 billion of the division of its business consisting almost exclusively of assets acquired in the Subco merger.

1. Did Parensco breach any of its fiduciary duties by failing to disclose the Aster proposal to the minority shareholders of Subco? Explain.
2. Did the Subco board breach its duty of care in approving the merger? Explain.
3. Did Parensco breach any duty to the minority shareholders of Subco by offering them only $120 per share? Explain.

MEE Question 6

Pat, a State A resident, was driving in State B when her car was struck by a truck driven by Driver. A sign on the truck's door read "Smith Brothers Transport Co." The police accident report correctly listed Driver's name and license number, but mistakenly identified the truck's owner as Smith Brothers Trucking Company, Inc., instead of the correct owner, Smith Brothers Transport Company, Inc. Smith Brothers Trucking and Smith Brothers Transport are both owned and operated by Robert and William Smith. The two companies share office space. The Smith brothers are careful, however, to maintain the two corporations as separate and distinct legal entities, following all legal requirements to avoid any alter ego problems. Both companies are incorporated in and have their principal places of business in State B. Both companies identify Robert Smith as agent for service of process.

Two days before the deadline for filing suit under the applicable statute of limitations, Pat filed a proper diversity action in federal court in State B, alleging damages exceeding $75,000 against both Driver and Smith Brothers Trucking (the incorrect defendant). The summons and complaint were promptly served on Robert Smith, as agent for Smith Brothers Trucking.

Five days after filing her complaint and before any responsive pleading had been served, Pat's attorney realized that she had incorrectly named Smith Brothers Trucking as defendant. She promptly amended her complaint to name Smith Brothers Transport as defendant and served that amended complaint and an amended summons on Robert Smith, as agent for Smith Brothers Transport.

Two days later, Smith Brothers Transport moved to dismiss the amended complaint on the ground that the applicable statute of limitations had run before the amended complaint was filed. The court denied this motion and refused Smith Brothers Transport's request for certification of the matter as appropriate for an immediate appeal.

Following the filing of responsive pleadings, the judge directed the attorneys for all parties to appear before her for a pretrial conference to discuss the possibility of settlement. The attorneys for Pat and Smith Brothers Transport appeared, but the attorney for defendant Driver did not appear. Instead, Driver's attorney left a message for the judge, stating that he would not appear because Driver was not prepared to engage in settlement discussions.

The judge noted Driver's attorney's nonappearance and conducted the pretrial conference between the attorneys representing Pat and Smith Brothers Transport. The judge also ordered Driver's attorney to appear before her to explain why she should not impose sanctions on Driver for his attorney's non-attendance at the pretrial conference. Driver's attorney appeared and argued that he did not attend the pretrial conference because his client had no intention of negotiating a settlement and had directed him (the attorney) not to "waste my money" by attending. The judge, angry at this apparent disregard of her authority, ordered that Driver's answer be stricken and that a post-answer default judgment be entered against Driver.

1. Did the trial court err in refusing to dismiss the amended complaint against Smith Brothers Transport? Explain.

MEE Question 6

2. May Smith Brothers Transport immediately appeal the denial of its motion to dismiss? Explain.
3. Did the trial court err in striking Driver's answer and ordering the entry of a default judgment as a sanction for the failure of Driver's attorney to participate in a pretrial conference? Explain.

MEE Question 7

Joe purchased a boat for use by his family from Dealer. Dealer extended credit for the purchase and retained a security interest in the boat as collateral for payment of the balance due. Joe failed to make a number of the payments, and, on May 1, Dealer peacefully repossessed the boat as Dealer was entitled to do under the UCC.

On May 3, Dealer mailed Joe a letter that stated the following: the balance due on the boat was $10,000; Dealer had credited Joe with $7,500, Dealer's good faith estimate of the boat's value, leaving a deficiency balance due of $2,500; Dealer had disposed of the boat by purchasing it for use as a rental boat in Dealer's marina; and Dealer had saved Joe money by disposing of the boat in this way because, if Dealer had publicized the availability of the boat for sale to third parties, Joe would have had to pay the additional cost of the publicity. The letter also demanded that Joe pay the $2,500 deficiency.

This letter was the only communication between Dealer and Joe after the peaceful repossession of the boat.

Used boats are typically sold through privately negotiated sales or in occasional dealer auctions. There is no recognized market on which they are customarily sold. Moreover, used boats are not subject to standardized price quotations. Quoted pricing is widely variable, with used boats of the same age and model being subject to different prices depending on their condition and features. Sale prices are also heavily influenced by the negotiating skills of the parties to the transaction. Nonetheless, the $7,500 value that Dealer placed on Joe's boat was in the middle of the range of prices for which used boats of that age and model have sold in the area over the past year.

1. Did Dealer properly dispose of the collateral under the UCC? Explain.
2. On these facts, what are Joe's rights, remedies, and obligations under the UCC? Explain.

COMMERCIAL PAPER IV.H, V.A, V.C

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Was Consumer's attempt at an accord and satisfaction effective?
 - (2)
 - (a) Was Thief's forgery of Consumer's signature on the check effective as Consumer's signature?
 - (b) Did Consumer act negligently in leaving her handbag unattended on a table in a restaurant and thereby contribute to the forgery of her signature?
 - (c) If Consumer was negligent, could Grocer bring a claim against Consumer for $150 following the bank's dishonor of the check?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Consumer's attempted accord and satisfaction was ineffective because Consumer acted in bad faith in attempting to avoid a debt about which there was no dispute. As to the forged check, Consumer probably has no liability because she never signed it. She would be liable on the check only if it were concluded that she was sufficiently negligent in leaving her handbag unattended on the restaurant table so that she should be estopped from denying the validity of the signature.

[NOTE: Although a bank is involved in the fact pattern, this question does not raise any questions under UCC Article 4. The check payable to Grocer was presented for payment over the counter and dishonored immediately, so there was no "collection" of the check. Article 4 is not included in the commercial paper specifications for the MEE, and references to UCC Article 4 in answers to this question are not on point.]

Point One: (30-40%)

Consumer's attempt at an accord and satisfaction is not effective because there is no bona fide dispute about the amount owed.

A person tendering an instrument in payment of a claim may use the instrument to resolve a dispute surrounding the claim by an accord and satisfaction. UCC ' 3-311. If there is a proper accord and satisfaction, then the claim is discharged. To achieve an accord and satisfaction, the following requirements must be met: (i) the person against whom the claim is asserted must in good faith tender an instrument to the claimant as full satisfaction of the claim; (ii) the claim must have been unliquidated or subject to a bona fide dispute; (iii) the instrument must contain a conspicuous written statement to the effect that it is tendered in full satisfaction of the claim; and (iv) the claimant must obtain payment of the instrument. UCC § 3-311(a) & (b).

In this case, requirements (iii) and (iv) are clearly satisfied. Department Store obtained payment on the instrument when it cleared Consumer's account. Also, Consumer clearly marked the check "Payment in Full for All Amounts Owed," which is a conspicuous statement to the effect that the instrument is tendered in full satisfaction of the claim. UCC § 3-311(b).

Nonetheless, there is no accord and satisfaction because neither requirement (i) nor (ii) is met. First, Consumer did not act in good faith in tendering the full payment check. She wanted to keep the sofa without actually paying for it. There are no facts to suggest that she thought she didn't actually owe the money to Department Store. Her attempted "accord and satisfaction" was a bad faith effort to avoid a proper debt, not a good faith effort to resolve a dispute. For the same reason, the second requirement is not met. There was no bona fide dispute about the amount owed. There is no evidence that the sofa was defective or that Consumer thought the amount stated on her monthly statement was incorrect for any reason. UCC § 3-311(a).

[NOTE: Article 3 contains a special rule allowing organizational creditors like Department Store to avoid inadvertent accord and satisfaction by requiring their debtors to send accord and satisfaction checks to an address other than the one used to collect routine payments. See UCC § 3-311(c). Some examinees may suggest that Department Store could raise this as an issue, but there are no facts in the question to indicate that the defense is available. Moreover, it is clear there was no sufficient accord and satisfaction in any event.]

Point Two(a): (30-40%)

Thief's signature is not effective as Consumer's signature because it was made without Consumer's authorization, so it is effective only as Thief's signature.

The general rule in Article 3 is that no one is liable on an instrument unless that person signed the instrument or authorized someone to sign on his or her behalf. UCC § 3-401(a). There is no evidence that Consumer authorized Thief to sign her check. The signature on the check will be effective as Thief's signature, not Consumer's. See UCC § 3-403. Accordingly, Consumer will not be liable on the check unless she is precluded from proving that the signature is a forgery. (See Point Two(b).)

Point Two(b): (15-25%)

Consumer's carelessness in leaving her unattended handbag with her checkbook in it on a table in a restaurant probably would not preclude her from raising a claim of forgery in defense of Grocer's attempt to enforce the check.

UCC § 3-406 provides that anyone whose "failure to exercise ordinary care substantially contributes" to the making of a forged signature on an instrument is precluded from asserting the forgery against a person who, in good faith, takes the instrument for value.

It is unlikely that Consumer's carelessness in leaving her handbag unattended on her table at the restaurant would preclude her from asserting that her signature had been forged. First, the comments to § 3-406 suggest that the preclusion rule in that section is primarily aimed at behavior that makes it relatively easy for a bad actor to commit the physical act of forgery, such as leaving the signature stamp readily available to an employee who is not authorized to endorse a check. To justify preclusion, negligence must "substantially contribute" to the "making of" the forgery

Section 3-406 has not been interpreted to impose any special duty on individuals to guard their checkbooks from theft by forgers. Even if Consumer were deemed to have been negligent in leaving her handbag unattended, a court is not likely to view that as the sort of negligence that satisfies the requirement of § 3-406 that the negligent act "substantially contribute" to the "making of a forged signature."

In addition, there is a good argument that Consumer's carelessness does not rise to the level of a "failure to exercise ordinary care." Thief's behavior in snatching Consumer's handbag was unlawful, and Consumer is not obliged by Article 3 to constantly be on the alert for any kind of unlawful behavior that might deprive her of possession of her checkbook. There is nothing in the fact pattern to indicate that this was a particularly dangerous neighborhood or that Consumer should have known there was a significant risk her handbag would be stolen.

Point Two(c): (5-15%)

If Consumer failed to exercise ordinary care and that failure contributed to the making of the forgery, then Grocer has a claim against Consumer for $150 because Bank dishonored the check when Grocer presented it.

If Consumer is found to have been negligent in having left her handbag where it could be stolen, and if that negligence substantially contributed to the making of the forgery, then she would be precluded from asserting the forgery of her signature as drawer as a defense to a claim by Grocer for $150. UCC § 3-406. If Consumer is precluded from asserting the forgery, then the signature is treated as her signature and she is the drawer of the check. As the drawer, she would be obliged to pay the amount of the check to a person entitled to enforce it if the check was dishonored. UCC § 3-414(b). Because Grocer is the payee of the check, Grocer is entitled to enforce the instrument. UCC § 3-301. The check was dishonored by Bank. UCC § 3-502. Thus, Consumer would be liable to Grocer for the amount of the check if the forged signature were treated as Consumer's signature.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP II, V.A, VI

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) (a) Is Uncle a co-owner of a business for profit and therefore a partner of Monster Tires?
 - (b) Did Uncle have authority to bind Monster Tires when he ordered tires from TireCo?
 - (2) Did Friend have authority to bind Monster Tires when he purchased the yacht?
 - (3) Are the partners personally liable for the obligations of the partnership?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Monster Tires is liable to TireCo for the tires Uncle ordered. Uncle is a partner of Monster Tires because he is a co-owner of a business for profit. As a partner, Uncle had at least apparent authority to bind the partnership to transactions in the ordinary course of business. Monster Tires is not liable to Custom Yachts for the yacht Friend ordered. Because the purchase of the yacht was not in the ordinary course of business of the partnership, all partners must authorize the purchase for it to become an obligation of the partnership. The partners are personally liable on the TireCo contract because partners in a general partnership are jointly and severally liable for all partnership obligations. Only Friend is personally liable on the Custom Yachts contract.

Point One(a): (20-30%)

Uncle did not become a partner at the time he originally lent Nephew money, but he later became a partner when he agreed to accept a one-third share of all the profits.

A partnership is defined as an association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners of a business for profit whether or not the persons intend to form a partnership. REVISED UNIF. PARTNERSHIP ACT (RUPA) § 202(a). Uncle originally loaned money to Nephew so Nephew could buy the tire dealership. Loaning money to Nephew does not make Uncle a partner, nor does the fact that Nephew repaid the loan on the basis of 50% of the profits of the business. RUPA § 202(c)(3) (a person who shares profits is presumed to be a partner “unless the profits were received in payment . . . of a debt . . . or of interest or other charge on a loan”).

Uncle’s status changed, however, when Uncle agreed to forgive the loan in return for a one-third share of the profits. Now Uncle falls under the partnership presumption and Uncle is a partner.

This conclusion is strengthened by the fact that Uncle at the same time also agreed to provide rent-free space to the business, something a co-owner might do for a business.

[NOTE: Better applicants should recognize that Uncle and Nephew did not initially create a partnership because Uncle did not agree to participate in a business for profit.]

Point One(b): (20-30%)

As a partner, Uncle is an agent of the partnership. He can bind the partnership to the contract to buy tires from TireCo because this is the kind of business carried on by the partnership.

Every partner is an agent of the partnership for the purposes of its business. RUPA § 301(1). If Uncle was a partner at the time of the second store opening, his act of ordering the tires bound the partnership because it was an act apparently for carrying on the ordinary course of partnership business. As a partner, Uncle had at least apparent authority to place orders with Big Rubber, Inc., TireCo, or another manufacturer. See id. This would be so even if Uncle did not usually order tires and, indeed, even if he was not ever involved in the day-to-day operations of the business. While it does not appear that Uncle had actual authority from his other two partners to order the tires, he could still bind the partnership unless the TireCo representative knew or had received notification prior to the time Uncle placed the order that Uncle lacked authority to do so. Id. Therefore, Monster Tires is liable to TireCo.

Point Two: (20-30%)

Monster Tires is not liable to Custom Yachts because Friend had no authority to purchase the yacht.

Although Friend was a partner at the time he ordered the yacht, this purchase is not apparently for carrying on the ordinary course of the tire dealership business. This is so, even though Friend regularly entertains in the course of business, because the purchase of a yacht is an extraordinary transaction. Friend therefore binds the partnership only if his act was authorized by all the other partners. RUPA § 301(2). The facts indicate that Nephew and Friend agreed that Friend should purchase the yacht, but that Uncle was opposed to buying it. Because an act outside the ordinary course of business of a partnership may be undertaken only with the consent of all of the partners, RUPA § 401(j), Friend had no actual authority to buy the yacht.

Friend also did not have apparent authority to buy the yacht because Custom Yachts could not reasonably believe that buying a yacht was in the ordinary course of business of a tire dealership. Therefore, Monster Tires does not have to pay Custom Yachts.

[NOTE: Applicants who fail to see that the purpose of a yacht is not in the ordinary course of the partnership's business could conclude that Friend had actual, or apparent, authority to purchase the yacht and bind the partnership.]

Point Three: (10-15%)

Uncle, Nephew, and Friend are jointly and severally liable on the contract with TireCo because that contract is an obligation of the partnership, but only Friend is liable on the Custom Yachts contract.

All partners are jointly and severally liable for all obligations of the partnership. RUPA § 306(a). The association of Uncle, Nephew, and Friend is a general partnership because the partners took no steps to create a limited partnership. The obligation to TireCo is one that occurred in the ordinary course of business. Therefore, Uncle, Nephew, and Friend are each personally liable to TireCo. However, in order to recover from them individually, TireCo must secure a judgment against both the partnership and the named partners. Furthermore, TireCo must first seek recovery from the assets of the partnership before it can attempt to levy execution against individual partners. RUPA § 307.

Only Friend is liable on the Custom Yachts contract because Friend had no authority to purchase the yacht for the partnership (See Point Two). Under agency law, when an agent acts without authority, a third party (here, Custom Yachts) can recover from the agent. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY §§ 329-30.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Husband and Wife have a contractual will such that Child is entitled to receive the portion of Wife's estate bequeathed to Child under that joint will?
 - (2) Does either the doctrine of facts of independent significance, or the rule that wills "speak at the time of death," apply to save the bequest in the 1995 will to the pastor?
 - (3) Is Robin entitled to the $1,000 bequest notwithstanding that her status as a beneficiary was evidenced by an unattested writing?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Wife's estate should be distributed as follows: $1,000 to Ted, pastor of First Avenue Church, and the residue to Child. Child is a contract creditor of the Wife's estate because Wife and Husband signed a contractual will in 1995. Robin is entitled to nothing because the attempted bequest to her was evidenced by an unattested writing.

John, who would have been entitled to the bulk of Wife's estate under the 2002 will, takes nothing because Wife's entire estate is exhausted by the claims of Ted and Child. John would take from Wife's estate only if the 1995 will was not contractual and the 2002 will could not be successfully contested.

Point One: (30-40%)

The joint will executed by Husband and Wife constituted their contract that the survivor would not change their joint plan for distribution of their assets. As a result, Ted and Child can enforce the provisions of the 1995 will without contesting the 2002 will.

Although the existence of a joint will does not by itself establish the existence of a contract between the two testators to dispose of their property in a certain way, a will contract is created when the joint will includes material provisions of the contract or has language in it that refers to a contract between the testators. UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-514. Here, the language of the joint will "each of us agrees" should be more than sufficient to establish the existence of a contract between Husband and Wife to dispose of the property in a certain way.

The contract became irrevocable upon the death of Husband. See 1 William J. Bowe & Douglas W. Parker, PAGE ON THE LAW OF WILLS ' 10.2 (1960) [hereinafter "PAGE ON WILLS"] ("On the death of one party, leaving in effect a will which contains the provisions prescribed by the contract, the transaction is said to become an irrevocable contract as to the survivor.”); see also Estate of Wiggins, 360 N.Y.S.2d 129 (App. Div. 1974). Because the terms of the contract mandated that Wife, the survivor, distribute all of “her property” in accordance with the joint plan of distribution, Wife was obligated to distribute not only the couple’s joint property, but also the property she acquired after Husband’s death, in accordance with the will contract as reflected in the 1995 joint will.

The will contract does not by itself invalidate Wife’s 2002 will. Instead, the will contract makes the beneficiaries under the joint will contract creditors of Wife’s estate. See 1 PAGE ON WILLS § 10.3. Here, the contract required distribution of the entire estate to the beneficiaries of the joint will. As a result, although the 2002 will would properly be admitted to probate, the beneficiaries under that will would take nothing; rather, the entire estate would be paid to the creditors, Child and Ted (see Point Two), under the prior will.

If applicants conclude that the phrase “each of us agrees” does not sufficiently state contractual intent, then the 1995 will would not be contractual and would be revoked by the 2002 will to the extent they were inconsistent. Therefore, Ted would take $1,000. (See Point Two.) Child would take only $100,000 under the 2002 will and John would take the residue.

Point Two: (20-30%)

Under either the doctrine of facts of independent significance, or the general rule of construction that wills “speak at the time of death,” Ted, the current pastor of First Avenue Church, takes $1,000.

In general, a testator must identify beneficiaries in the will itself; a testator may not change will beneficiaries without testamentary formalities. The doctrine of facts of independent significance, however, gives effect to a will provision that disposes of property “by reference to acts and events that have significance apart from their effect upon the dispositions made by the will.” UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-512; see also 2 PAGE ON WILLS § 19.34. The principle behind the doctrine is that the possibility of undue influence or fraud is reduced when the change in beneficiary has significance apart from the change in the testator’s will. Hence, since the church was unlikely to choose its pastor in order to assure that the pastor chosen would inherit $1,000 from the estate of Husband and Wife, that factCthe pastor’s identityChas significance apart from the bequest. Hence, the doctrine would give effect to the $1,000 bequest to the then-current pastor, which was Ted, not George.

By contrast, the memorandum in the safe deposit box directing that $1,000 be distributed to Robin cannot be given effect under this doctrine because that memorandum had no purpose independent of an attempt to make a bequest. See 2 PAGE ON WILLS § 19.34 at 122; see also Point Three.

The bequest to the pastor also is effective under the general rule of construction that a will “speaks” as of the time of death and at that time Ted is the only person qualifying for the bequest to the pastor of the First Avenue Church.

[NOTE: Applicants could reach the same result using the so-called “plain meaning” rule. Under this rule, Ted takes because the words in the will are unambiguous that the bequest passes to the church pastor who survives Wife.]

Point Three: (20-30%)

The $1,000 bequest to Robin is invalid because it is not evidenced by a testamentary instrument.

While a will may incorporate an attempted bequest in a document not executed with the formalities required of a will, here the attempted bequest to Robin in such a document is invalid because the incorporation by reference doctrine requires that the document to be incorporated be in existence at the time the will was signed. Here the document to be incorporated was executed after both the 1995 and the 2002 wills were executed.

Furthermore, even if the jurisdiction had adopted a statute like Unif. Probate Code § 2-513, the bequest would still be invalid. That statute permits tangible personal property to be disposed of in accordance with the terms of an unattested memorandum without regard to when it was executed. However, § 2-513 applies only to tangibles; here, Wife attempted to bequeath Robin money, which is not a tangible.

Lastly, this bequest cannot be sustained under the doctrine of independent significance because the memorandum’s only significance was to make a testamentary gift.

[NOTE: Applicants who assume that the memorandum is in Wife’s handwriting and that holographic works are valid under state law could conclude that the $1,000 gift to Robin was valid. However, no facts state that the memorandum was in Wife’s handwriting.]

FAMILY LAW I.E, V.A, VII.C; CONFLICT OF LAWS III.C.6

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) (a) Must a state that does not permit common law marriage recognize a common law marriage that was valid in the state where contracted?
 - (b) Did Wendy and Matt enter into a valid common law marriage?
 - (2) Did Wendy and Matt enter into an enforceable agreement to share property?
 - (3) Should the court grant Steve's adoption petition over Matt's objection?

DISCUSSION

Summary

If Matt and Wendy entered into a valid common law marriage in State A, it would be recognized in State B even though State B law does not permit common law marriage. However, Matt and Wendy did not enter into a valid common law marriage in State A. Although the "ceremony of commitment" might arguably represent an agreement to be married, Matt and Wendy did not publicly hold themselves out as a married couple. Thus, Matt may not claim a spousal entitlement to a share of Wendy's property acquired during their relationship.

However, if State B recognizes oral cohabitation agreements, the court could find that Matt's and Wendy's agreement to "treat each other as an equal owner of all worldly goods acquired during our life together" was enforceable and award Matt a share of Wendy's property acquired during the period they cohabited. Many states recognize such oral agreements.

The court may not grant Steve's adoption petition over Matt's opposition. Although the U.S. Supreme Court has upheld restrictions on the right of an unmarried father to veto his child's adoption, it has also required the states to give fathers who have been committed parents the opportunity to veto a stepparent adoption.

Point One(a): (5-15%)

A common law marriage that is valid where contracted is also valid in a state that does not permit common law marriage.

Under universally accepted conflict-of-laws principles, a marriage valid under the law of the place in which it was contracted will be valid elsewhere unless it violates a strong public policy of the state that has the most significant relationship to the spouses and the marriage. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONFLICT OF LAWS § 283. Perhaps because the vast majority of states once permitted common law marriage, courts in states that do not recognize common law marriage have consistently held that, if a man and woman are domiciled in a state that permits common law marriage and their conduct meets the requirements of that state's law for establishing such a marriage, recognition of the marriage does not violate a strong public policy. Thus, if Matt and Wendy entered into a valid common law marriage in State A, it would be recognized by a State B court.

Point One(b): (25-35%)

The court may not find that Wendy and Matt entered into a common law marriage because they did not hold themselves out as a married couple.

A common law marriage creates marital obligations and rights identical to those flowing from a ceremonial marriage, including the equitable distribution of marital property. To establish a common law marriage, the proponent must show: (1) capacity to enter a marital contract, (2) a present agreement to be married, (3) cohabitation, and (4) "holding out" a marital relationship to the community. The evidence here clearly establishes capacity and cohabitation. Arguably, the commitment ceremony shows an agreement to be married as it involved an exchange of "vows" much like those made in a traditional marriage ceremony. (A court might also find that there was no agreement to marry because the ceremony did not include any references to marriage or use the terms "husband" and "wife.") But Matt and Wendy did not hold themselves out to the public as a married couple; they consistently referred to each other as "companion" rather than husband and wife, and Wendy retained her own name.

Point Two: (15-25%)

The court may find that Matt's and Wendy's mutual vows to share "our worldly goods" constituted an enforceable agreement to share property acquired during their relationship if state law permits a cohabitant to recover based on a verbal cohabitation agreement.

Agreements between cohabitants creating property or support rights were once unenforceable because they were made in the context of a "meretricious relationship." But since the California Supreme Court's landmark decision in Marvin v. Marvin, 557 P.2d 106 (Cal. 1976), many states have abandoned this approach and declared cohabitation agreements enforceable as long as they do not involve the explicit exchange of money for sex. See Joel E. Smith, Annotation, Property Rights Arising from Relationship of Couple Cohabiting Without Marriage, 3 A.L.R. 4th 13 (1979 & Supp.) (surveying state laws). Again following Marvin and in contrast to the approach applied to premarital agreements, most courts in states that permit enforcement of cohabitation agreements do not require such agreements to be in writing or even to be clear and specific; oral agreements that vaguely require the cohabitants to share or "do right by" each other have been held to create enforceable claims to post-relationship property division and/or support. See, e.g., Morone v. Morone, 413 N.E.2d 1154 (N.Y. 1980). Many states, yet again following Marvin, will even imply an agreement from the parties' behavior.

Because Matt and Wendy vowed at their “ceremony of commitment” to “treat each other as an equal owner” of goods acquired during the relationship, Matt would not face the evidentiary problems that many cohabitants confront; the “agreement” was made before fifty guests, all of whom are now potential witnesses. The fact that Matt and Wendy thereafter had a child together, jointly participated in the child’s care, pooled their earnings in a joint bank account, and remained together in a stable relationship for nearly a decade provides further behavioral evidence of an agreement to share property.

If applicants find that a valid common law marriage existed, then their discussion should address equitable principles of property division and/or community property principles if applicable in their jurisdictions.

[NOTE: Applicants who recognize the alternate theories of constructive trust, quantum meruit, partnership, or partition may receive additional credit. See, e.g., Tapley v. Tapley, 449 A.2d 1218 (N.H. 1982) (limiting cohabitant’s quantum meruit recovery to compensation for business services); Tarry v. Stewart, 649 N.E.2d 1 (Ohio Ct. App. 1994) (disallowing cohabitant’s quantum meruit claim for improvements to house because of benefit received from living in house during the relationship).

Point Three: (35-45%)

The court may not grant Steve’s adoption petition over Matt’s opposition because Matt has been an involved father who lived with his child for a substantial portion of the child’s life and who wishes to maintain an active, custodial relationship with the child.

Although the U.S. Supreme Court has upheld state statutes that grant the unmarried father only a limited opportunity to object to his child’s adoption (see, e.g., Lehr v. Robertson, 463 U.S. 248 (1983); Quilloin v. Walcott, 434 U.S. 246 (1978)), it has also stated that, “[w]hen an unwed father demonstrates a full commitment to the responsibilities of parenthood by ‘[coming] forward to participate in the rearing of his child,’ his interest in personal contact with his child acquires substantial protection under the Due Process Clause.” Lehr, 463 U.S. at 261 (internal citation omitted). Applying this standard, the Supreme Court upheld a statute authorizing a court to dispense with the requirement of the unmarried father’s consent to the adoption of his child, at least when the father had “never shouldered any significant responsibility with respect to the daily supervision, education, protection, or care of the child.” Quilloin, 434 U.S. at 256. By contrast, the Court struck down a statute dispensing with the requirement of the unmarried father’s consent as applied to a man who had maintained joint custody of his children from the time of their birth until they were two and four years old. Caban v. Mohammed, 441 U.S. 380 (1979). Both Quilloin and Caban involved stepparent adoptions like that sought by Steve and Wendy.

The evidence unequivocally shows that Matt has demonstrated “a full commitment to the responsibilities of parenthood.” Not only did he live with Child for most of Child’s life, but the evidence suggests that he was an equal participant in Child’s care. Moreover, since Wendy’s marriage, Matt has consistently visited Child despite Wendy’s rigid visitation restrictions. Matt has volunteered to pay child support, and he took the initiative to establish his paternity and obtain joint custody.

Because Matt is a committed father entitled to protection under the due process clause, his parental rights cannot be severed without his consent or a showing of parental unfitness. As there is no evidence of abuse, neglect, or other grounds for termination, the adoption petition must be denied.

[NOTE: Examinees could receive extra credit for noting that the Supreme Court's decision in Michael H. v. Gerald D., 491 U.S. 110 (1989), upholding a statute that denied an unmarried father the opportunity to establish his paternity over the combined opposition of the mother and her husband, does not alter this result. The statute at issue in Michael H. applied only when the mother was married to the husband at the time she gave birth; the Court relied heavily on the state's interest in preventing disruption of intact marital families in its analysis. Those applicants who find that a common law marriage existed could discuss the presumption of paternity because Child was born in wedlock. However, because the common law marriage was not registered, they should still go on to analyze Matt's rights under the unmarried father principles as discussed above in concluding that Steve's adoption petition must be denied.

ANALYSIS

- Legal problems:
- (1) Did Parensco breach any of its fiduciary duties by failing to disclose the Aster proposal to the minority shareholders of Subco?
 - (2) Did the Subco board breach its duty of care to the Subco shareholders in approving the merger?
 - (3) Did Parensco breach any duty owed to the minority shareholders of Subco by offering to pay them only $120 per share?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Parensco probably did breach its fiduciary duties by failing to disclose the Aster proposal to the minority shareholders of Subco. A majority shareholder has a duty to disclose information if it is material and if non-disclosure will cause a loss to minority shareholders. The Subco board probably did breach its duty of care by approving the merger after only brief discussion. Parensco probably did breach its fiduciary duty of fair dealing because it did not offer a fair price and did not engage in a fair process when it failed to make full disclosure of the Aster proposal.

Point One: (45-55%)

Parensco probably breached its fiduciary duties to the minority shareholders of Subco by failing to disclose the Aster proposal.

As majority shareholder, Parensco has a duty to disclose any information that it knew or should have known if that information was material. Here, Parensco will be found to have breached this duty to disclose if the information regarding the Aster proposal was material, and the nondisclosure caused a loss to the minority shareholders.

As to the materiality of the nondisclosure, the minority shareholders would argue that the information regarding Aster went to the fairness of the price that Parensco was offering and, therefore, a reasonable shareholder would consider it important in deciding how to vote on the transaction. See Rosenblatt v. Getty Oil Co., 493 A.2d 929, 944 (Del. 1985). Although the $200 per share price arose in the context of a preliminary conversation, and may not have been a firm offer, the shareholders would argue that they are capable of assessing the importance of the information, and they can take into account that any further discussions regarding the proposal might have broken down or the deal might not have been consummated. See Basic Inc. v. Levinson, 485 U.S. 224 (1988).

Parensco will counter that the price offered by Aster was immaterial for two reasons. First, the price offered by Aster was preliminary in nature and there is no obligation to disclose a preliminary conversation. Second, the price that Aster might have offered for control of Subco bears little relationship to a fair price for a minority interest, which is what Parensco was offering to acquire in the merger. Aster was negotiating to buy control of Subco, something that the minority shareholders could not sell. The question of materiality is a close one, but on balance it appears that the information was material.

Assuming that the information was material, the next question is whether its nondisclosure caused any loss to the minority shareholders. Parensco would argue that the nondisclosure caused no loss; it had sufficient votes to approve the transaction without any of the minority shareholders' votes. The minority will counter that, although the merger could have been approved without their vote, had they had the disclosure, the minority shareholders could have exercised their rights under the state appraisal statute. See Alabama Farm Bureau Mut. Cas. Co. v. American Fid. Life Ins. Co., 606 F.2d 602, 614 (5th Cir. 1979) (minority shareholders need only demonstrate that nondisclosure deprived them of a state remedy that would otherwise have been available). As the merger has now been consummated, this remedy is foreclosed. Thus, they would argue that the nondisclosure caused them loss.

Point Two: (25-30%)

The Subco board appears to have breached its duty of care to the Subco shareholders in approving the merger.

Ordinarily the Subco board's action would be protected by the business judgment rule. Here, however, even though the facts are not extensive on this point, they do suggest that the Subco board was only minimally involved in the approval of the merger, and failed to exercise due care. The Subco board relied solely on a report of an investment banker and a presentation from Carr, the president of Parensco, and voted to approve the deal after a "brief discussion." The nature of the transaction, resulting in a cash-out of the minority shareholders, called for high degree of care by the directors. They apparently failed to undertake much of an investigation. See Smith v. Van Gorkom, 488 A.2d 858 (Del. 1985). While their reliance on Banker's report appears to be justified, it might not be enough to discharge their duty of care.

The Subco board might argue that the approval by the minority shareholders "cured" any breach of the duty of care and that since this approval was by a majority of the minority shareholders, the burden of proof shifts to the complaining minority shareholders to prove that the merger was unfair. In fact, however, the approval by the minority shareholders is without legal effect because there was not full disclosure, as noted above.

Point Three: (15-25%)

Parensco probably breached its fiduciary duty of fair dealing when it offered to pay the minority shareholders of Subco only $120 per share.

When a majority shareholder purchases the interest of the minority, it has a duty of fair dealing. Weinberger v. UOP, Inc., 457 A.2d 701 (Del. 1983). The transaction is reviewable to determine whether the majority shareholder discharged this duty. Under the facts of this case, it is doubtful that Parensco did. Parensco bears the burden of demonstrating that the process it employed was fair and that the price that it selected was fair. See id. at 710-11. As to the former, the discussion above in Points One and Two demonstrates that Parensco failed to engage in a fair process. As to the latter, the negotiations with Aster and the subsequent sale of Subco assets for $3 billion, not $800 million, so soon after the acquisition of the minority shares for only $120 each, suggest that the minority shares of Subco were worth more than Parensco was offering in the merger. As a result, Parensco probably breached its fiduciary duty of fair dealing.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE I.D, IV.A, IV.F, VI.F

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Can Smith Brothers Transport assert a statute-of-limitations bar to an action when it was added to the action by an amended complaint filed after the applicable statute of limitations had run?
 - (2) May a defendant immediately appeal a judge's denial of a motion to dismiss when the defendant claims that an action against it is barred by the statute of limitations?
 - (3) Does the trial court have the power to dismiss a party's defense and enter default judgment against the party because the party's attorney failed to appear at a pretrial conference?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Pat's amendment of her complaint to name the proper defendant, Smith Brothers Transport, meets the requirements necessary for the amendment to relate back to the date of the original pleading. Thus, Pat's action against Smith Brothers Transport should be treated as timely filed, notwithstanding that Smith Brothers Transport was not added to the action until after the limitations period had run. The trial judge therefore correctly denied the motion to dismiss.

Smith Brothers Transport may not immediately appeal the denial of its motion to dismiss. The denial of a motion to dismiss is not a final judgment, and the judge's order in this case does not fall within any of the exceptions to the final judgment rule. Thus, the decision may be appealed only after the trial is concluded and the judgment is final.

Driver's attorney failed to appear as ordered at the pretrial conference because Driver didn't wish to discuss settlement. Although a trial judge has the power to sanction such behavior, including by entering a default judgment, the sanction in this case was probably so harsh as to be an abuse of discretion, at least absent other misbehavior by Driver or evidence that a lesser sanction would have been ineffective in securing future adherence to the judge's orders.

Point One: (30-40%)

Because Pat's amended complaint was served on Smith Brothers Transport within the time for original service of process under Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(m), and because Smith Brothers Transport knew or should have known of the mistaken identity and would not be prejudiced by the delay, the court properly allowed the amended complaint to relate back to the date of the original filing.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a) allows a complaint to be amended “once as a matter of course at any time before a responsive pleading is served.” Thus, Pat’s complaint was properly amended. See 6 Charles Alan Wright, et al., FEDERAL PRACTICE & PROCEDURE 2d ed. §§ 1484 & 1487 (1990) [hereinafter “FEDERAL PRACTICE & PROCEDURE”].

Not only can Pat amend her complaint to name the proper defendant, Smith Brothers Transport, but her amendment will “relate back to the date of the original pleading” if certain requirements are met. An amendment that “changes the party or the naming of the party against whom a claim is asserted” relates back to the date of the original pleading when:

- the claim asserted in the amended pleading “arose out of the conduct, transaction, or occurrence set forth or attempted to be set forth in the original pleading,” and
- within 120 days of the original filing of the action (the normal time limit for service of the summons and complaint under Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(m)), the new party “has received such notice of the institution of the action” that it will “not be prejudiced in maintaining a defense on the merits,” and the new party
- “knew or should have known that, but for a mistake concerning the identity of the proper party, the action would have been brought against” it.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(c).

Each of these requirements for relation back is met here. The amended complaint asserted the same claim, arising out of the same occurrence, as had been originally asserted against Smith Brothers Trucking, thus satisfying the first requirement. As to the second requirement, the facts suggest that both the original summons and complaint and the amended summons and complaint were served within the 120-day summons period. Given that Smith Brothers Trucking and Smith Brothers Transport have common owners, common premises, and the same agent for service of process (Robert Smith), either service of the summons and complaint would have given Smith Brothers Transport sufficient “notice of the institution of the action” that it would “not be prejudiced in maintaining” its defense.

Robert Smith received notice of the commencement of the original action and at that point he “should have known” that a lawsuit was being filed for Pat’s accident and that a mistake had been made as to the proper defendant. Even if he did not know at that point, he surely knew when the amended complaint was served. Thus, the amendment naming Smith Brothers Transport relates back to the date of the original filing, and the motion to dismiss on statute of limitations grounds should be denied. See Roberts v. Michaels, 219 F.3d 775 (8th Cir. 2000); Bowles v. Reade, 198 F.3d 752 (9th Cir. 1999); VKK Corp. v. Nat’l Football League, 244 F.3d 114 (2d Cir. 2001). See also 6A FEDERAL PRACTICE & PROCEDURE § 1498 at 22-23 (2004 Supp.).

Point Two: (30-40%)

Because defendant Smith Brothers Transport’s appeal does not fall within any of the exceptions to the final judgment rule, the denial of the motion to dismiss may be appealed only after the trial is concluded and the judgment is final.

In most cases, a party may appeal only from a final judgment. See Larry L. Tepley & Ralph U. Whitten, CIVIL PROCEDURE 930-32 (3d ed. 2004). A final judgment is a controlling and dispositive order that “ends the litigation on the merits and leaves nothing for the court to do but execute on the judgment.” Catlin v. United States, 324 U.S. 229, 233 (1945). In addition, Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(b) allows a trial judge to sever portions of a multi-claim case for appeal with a finding that “there is no just reason for delay” and with a direction for the entry of judgment on the decided claim(s) or defense(s). But unless this is done, early decided claims must ordinarily await final judgment as to all claims before they are eligible for appeal. Under either the standard final judgment rule or Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(b), Smith Brothers Transport cannot appeal the denial of its motion to dismiss. Rather than ending the litigation on the merits or terminating a particular claim, the trial judge’s decision allowed the litigation to continue. Smith Brothers Transport was joined to the action and now faces trial.

This issue also does not qualify for any of the statutory exceptions to the final judgment rule. It is not an interlocutory appeal from an order granting or dissolving an injunction, see 28 U.S.C. § 1292(a), and it does not qualify as a certified appeal because the trial judge refused to certify the question, see 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b).

The judge-made collateral order exception to the final judgment rule is also inapplicable. The collateral order rule allows an immediate appeal from an order that (1) “finally determine[s]” a “claim of right,” (2) that is separable from, and collateral to, the rights asserted in the main action, and (3) that is “too important to be denied review.” Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 546 (1949). The Court restated the doctrine in Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay: “To come within the ‘small class’ of decisions excepted from the final judgment rule by Cohen, the order must conclusively determine the disputed question, resolve an important issue completely separate from the merits of the action, and be effectively unreviewable on appeal from a final judgment.” 437 U.S. 463, 468 (1978). The denial of Smith Brothers Transport’s motion to dismiss fails on all counts. It does not conclusively determine the disputed question (whether the statute of limitations has run), the issue is not completely separate from the merits, but is instead intertwined with the merits, and the question is reviewable on appeal.

[NOTE: A writ of mandamus may sometimes be used to secure review of a trial court’s action. Mandamus is a drastic remedy, to be used only when justice demands and less extraordinary remedies are unavailable. Kerr v. United States, 426 U.S. 394, 402 (1976). Mandamus is generally used by an appellate court “to prevent a district court from acting beyond its [subject matter] jurisdiction, or to compel it to take action that it lacks the power to withhold.” 16 FEDERAL PRACTICE & PROCEDURE § 3932 at 472, citing Will v. United States, 389 U.S. 90 (1967). On the facts of this problem, mandamus is inappropriate because the trial court’s decision in no way involved action beyond the court’s power. To the contrary, the trial court clearly has the power under the Federal Rules to permit an amendment of a complaint to relate back to the date of the original complaint for statute-of-limitations purposes. Thus, there was no abuse of power here.]

Point Three: (30-40%)

The trial judge may have abused her discretion in entering a default judgment against Driver for his attorney’s failure to appear at the pretrial conference, at least absent any other instances of misbehavior by Driver or his attorney or any evidence that lesser sanctions would not work.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 16 authorizes a district judge to convene pretrial conferences for the purpose of ensuring that cases are processed effectively and efficiently. Although courts are not required to hold a pretrial conference, see FED. R. CIV. P. 16(a), once a conference is ordered, appearance is compulsory. See Identiseal Corp. v. Positive Identification Sys., Inc., 560 F.2d 298, 301-02 (7th Cir. 1977). The scheduling and running of pretrial conferences is largely within the trial court's discretion. Moreover, the court has the power to sanction a party or the party's attorney if "no appearance is made on behalf of [the] party at a . . . pretrial conference." FED. R. CIV. P. 16(f). Possible sanctions include any order authorized under Fed. R. Civ. P. 37(b)(2)(B), (C), & (D), including "[a]n order striking out pleadings . . . or dismissing the action . . . or rendering a judgment by default against the disobedient party."

Thus, the trial judge had the power to sanction Driver for the nonappearance of Driver's attorney. Moreover, the sanction imposed (striking Driver's pleading and rendering judgment against him) is authorized by the rules. Nonetheless, Driver may prevail on appeal if he can show that the trial judge abused her discretion in light of the facts and the severity of the sanction. See Link v. Wabash R.R. Co., 370 U.S. 626 (1962).

Driver's attorney stated that he did not attend the pretrial conference because Driver was unwilling to settle the case and, accordingly, did not want the attorney to waste money by attending an unnecessary hearing. This explanation of non-attendance is plainly inadequate. Pretrial conferences have multiple purposes. In addition to facilitating settlement, they are used to establish early court control over an action to ensure good case management and to discourage "wasteful pretrial activities." Driver's assessment that his attorney's attendance at the conference would be a "waste" does not justify the disregard of the court's order.

Nonetheless, the court's sanction against Driver was probably so harsh as to be an abuse of discretion. Dismissal of an action or the entry of a default judgment are the most severe sanctions available to a district court and are usually appropriate "only when [a party's] misconduct is serious, repeated, contumacious, extreme, or otherwise inexcusable." Bachier-Ortiz v. Colon-Mendoza, 331 F.3d 193, 195 (1st Cir. 2003). Lesser sanctions should be utilized before the more extreme sanctions, absent reason to believe that lesser sanctions would be ineffective to secure compliance with court orders. See Berry v. CIGNA/RSI-CIGNA, 975 F.2d 1188 (5th Cir. 1992). Absent additional facts showing repeated defiance of the court or the likely ineffectiveness of lesser sanctions, the trial judge's decision to enter a default judgment in this case was probably an abuse of her discretion to "make such orders [with regard to the attorney's failure to attend the conference] as are just." FED. R. CIV. P. 16(f).

SECURED TRANSACTIONS V.A, V.B

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Dealer properly dispose of the collateral?
 - (2) What remedies are available to Joe as a result of Dealer's failure to properly enforce Dealer's security interest?
 - (3) Is Joe responsible for the $2,500 deficiency?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Dealer was required to dispose of the collateral in a "commercially reasonable" manner, which involves giving Joe reasonable advance notice of a public sale after adequate publicity preceding the sale. Here, Dealer's purchase of the boat for Dealer's own use without such advance notice and in a private sale did not satisfy the requirements for a commercially reasonable sale.

Where there has been a noncomplying disposition of consumer goods (the boat was purchased for Joe's family use, which makes it a consumer good), the consumer is entitled to recover actual damages and, in any event, a minimum statutory damage recovery. Because Dealer is still in possession of the boat, a court might also order Dealer to dispose of it through a proper public sale or even to permit Joe to redeem it.

Joe may or may not have the obligation to pay the deficiency. In consumer transactions, there is no "Code" rule. Some courts follow the absolute bar rule, under which a noncomplying sale completely bars recovery of a deficiency. Other courts adopt a rebuttable presumption that a complying sale would have produced proceeds sufficient to pay the existing debt, but the creditor is entitled to a deficiency judgment if it can rebut the presumption and prove that a complying sale would have produced less than the amount due.

Point One: (30-40%)

Dealer's disposition of the collateral failed to comply with UCC requirements in two respects. First, Dealer purchased the boat in a private sale, which was inappropriate under the circumstances. Second, Dealer failed to give Joe advance notice of the sale.

Under the UCC, every aspect of a disposition must be commercially reasonable. UCC § 9-610(b). In addition, the UCC sets out some specific standards governing the disposition of collateral. One of these standards is the rule that a secured party may purchase the collateral only if the secured party buys it

- (1) at a public disposition; or

(2) at a private disposition only if the collateral is of a kind that is customarily sold on a recognized market or the subject of widely distributed standard price quotations. UCC § 9-610(c). Neither requirement was met here.

First, Dealer purchased the collateral in a private, not a public, disposition. Public dispositions are those with some form of advertisement or public notice preceding the sale and where the public has access to the sale. Id. at cmt. 7. There is no suggestion that Dealer sought any third-party bids for the boat or made any public offer to sell it. Second, used boats are not sold under circumstances that would make a private sale appropriate. The facts make clear that used boats are not sold on a recognized market or pursuant to standard price quotations. To the contrary, boat prices fluctuate based on many factors and are subject to individual bids and negotiations. Thus, Dealer's private purchase of the boat was improper.

Dealer's disposition was also improper because Dealer did not inform Joe of the disposition until after it had occurred. The UCC requires a secured party to provide notice to the debtor before disposing of collateral. UCC § 9-611. A proper notice must describe the intended disposition and must be sent within a reasonable time before the disposition. UCC § 9-613. Under the facts, Joe was never informed of the impending disposition. The only notice he received was after the fact. This failure to notify was also a violation of the UCC.

[NOTE: The facts state that Dealer "disposed of the boat by purchasing it," which is one manner of disposition of collateral under UCC § 9-610. The problem is designed to force applicants to discuss the standards for disposition of collateral and whether Dealer met them. However, some applicants may incorrectly treat Dealer's actions as an "acceptance of collateral in full or partial satisfaction of the obligation," rather than as a disposition. See UCC § 9-620. Those applicants could receive some credit if their critique of Dealer's actions addresses the central problems of lack of notice and the commercial unreasonableness of Dealer's purchasing this type of collateral from itself in a private sale.]

Point Two

Joe has a number of potential remedies, including actual damages, statutory damages, and the possibility of a court-ordered alternative disposition of the collateral.

Point Two(a): (5-15%)

Joe may recover any actual damages.

Dealer is liable for actual damages in the amount of any loss caused by failing to comply with the UCC rules for notice of disposition and a commercially reasonable disposition. UCC § 9-625(b). Damages are "those reasonably calculated to put an eligible claimant in the position that it would have occupied had no violation occurred." Id. at cmt. 3. The most likely measure of Joe's actual loss is the difference between the amount credited to Joe by Dealer and the amount that would have been obtained in a sale that complied with UCC requirements. Under these facts, however, Joe would probably have trouble proving that a proper sale would have yielded a significantly better price for the boat.

Point Two(b): (5-15%)

Because this is a consumer transaction, Joe may recover “statutory damages” even if he suffered no actual damages.

Where the collateral is consumer goods, as here, the debtor is guaranteed a minimum recovery of “statutory damages” in an amount not less than the credit service charge (the interest payable on the loan) plus 10 percent ($1,000) of the principal amount of the loan. UCC § 9-625(c)(2). The purpose of this remedy is to “ensure that every noncompliance [with UCC requirements relating to the disposition of collateral] in a consumer goods transaction results in liability, regardless of any injury that may have resulted.” Id. at cmt. 4.

Point Two(c): (5-15%)

Given that Dealer is still in possession of the collateral, a court could order Dealer to dispose of the collateral by a proper sale or even allow Joe to exercise his right of redemption.

Where a secured party is disposing of collateral improperly, a court “may order or restrain . . . disposition on appropriate terms and conditions.” UCC § 9-625(a). Given the absence of any third-party purchaser of the collateral, a court might void Dealer’s improper sale to itself and order Dealer to sell the collateral by a proper public disposition.

In addition, Joe has a right to redeem repossessed collateral by paying all amounts owed along with Dealer’s repossession expenses. This redemption right is usually extinguished by a proper disposition of collateral. See UCC § 9-623. But a court might allow Joe to redeem under these circumstances (if he wishes to do so and can pay the required amounts), given the impropriety of the private sale by Dealer to itself and the fact that the boat is still in Dealer’s possession.

Point Three: (25-35%)

Joe’s liability for a deficiency depends on whether the jurisdiction adopts the absolute bar rule or the rebuttable presumption rule.

Although ordinarily the secured party may recover a deficiency remaining after disposition, UCC § 9-615(d), Joe has several arguments to reduce or eliminate the claimed deficiency of $2,500.

Under UCC § 9-626(b), the impact of noncompliance with Article 9 on recovery of a deficiency in a consumer goods transaction is left to the court to determine. Courts tend to follow two approaches in consumer transactions. Under the so-called “absolute bar” rule, the creditor’s noncompliance bars recovery of any deficiency. Under the “rebuttable presumption” rule (adopted in UCC § 9-626 for commercial transactions), the creditor’s noncompliance results in a presumption that a complying disposition would have realized an amount of proceeds sufficient to cover the entire debt and expenses (and hence that there is no deficiency), but the creditor is given the opportunity to rebut this presumption by proving that even a complying sale would have realized less than the full amount due.

If the absolute bar rule is followed, Joe owes nothing to Dealer. If the rebuttable presumption rule is followed, Joe may be liable for a deficiency if Dealer can prove that a proper disposition of the collateral would have yielded less than what Joe owed (plus expenses). The facts state that the price the Dealer credited to Joe was within a range of likely prices, so it is possible that Dealer could show that even a proper sale would have yielded less than the amount owed on the boat.

[NOTE: It is possible that Joe would be permitted both to recover his statutory damages and to have any deficiency eliminated through the application of one of these rules. Although double recovery or over-compensation of this sort is forbidden in a non-consumer context, the Code “is silent as to whether a double recovery or other over-compensation is possible in a consumer transaction.” UCC § 9-625, cmt. 3. Some courts have therefore concluded that denial of deficiency does not preclude a consumer from also recovering statutory damages. See Coxall v. Clover Commercial Corp., 781 N.Y.S.2d 567 (N.Y. City Civ. Ct. 2004).]

Preface

This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2007 and July 2007 Multistate Essay Examinations. Each test includes seven questions; most jurisdictions that use the MEE select the six questions their applicants will answer.

The model analyses to the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. These models are not an official grading guide. Some jurisdictions grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses as they wish, including the suggested weights given to particular points. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topic or topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by Roman numerals which refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that topic. For example, Question 3 on the February 2007 MEE tested Federal Civil Procedure I.A.1., subject matter jurisdiction in federal courts, and I.E., venue. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet and can also be found at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE is a three-hour examination consisting of six questions. The examination is administered in one continuous three-hour time period. Applicants are expected to spend approximately thirty minutes answering each of the questions. The areas of law covered by the questions in the examination are: Agency and Partnership, Commercial Paper, Conflict of Laws, Corporations and Limited Liability Companies, Decedents' Estates, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Sales, Secured Transactions, and Trusts and Future Interests. Some questions include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You will have three hours in which to write your answers to six of the seven questions contained in this booklet; you will be told which of the questions you are to answer. Each question is designed to be answered in thirty minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts which are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show: an understanding of the facts; a recognition of the issues included; the applicable principles of law; and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Some jurisdictions instruct applicants to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

February 2007
Questions

MEE Question 1

Uncle owns a chain of sandwich shops. Nephew has worked for Uncle for several years, first as a line cook in various sandwich shops and then as a sandwich shop manager. Uncle recently sold Nephew the sandwich shop that Nephew had been managing.

Nephew paid for the shop with $10,000 cash and a $10,000 negotiable demand note made payable to the order of Uncle. Nephew signed the note as a maker. To show her faith in her son, Nephew's mother, Mom, signed the note with the words "Mom, as guarantor." Her signature appears on the front of the note, immediately below Nephew's signature and under the additional word "Guaranteed."

The note provided that all parties to it waived presentment and notice of dishonor. When they signed the note, Uncle, Nephew, and Mom orally agreed that Uncle would not seek payment of the note until the shop was making a good profit and that he would negotiate the note only with Nephew's and Mom's consent.

Three months after the note was signed and before any payment had been made, Uncle indorsed the note and sold it to Acme Finance Co. for $9,000 cash. Uncle did not obtain Nephew's or Mom's consent to this sale. Acme had no knowledge of the oral agreement among Uncle, Nephew, and Mom.

When Acme sought payment from Nephew, Nephew persuaded Acme that any effort to collect full payment from him would be futile. Acme therefore gave Nephew a written release from his obligations under the note in exchange for a payment of $1,000.

Acme has sued Mom for payment of the $9,000 still due on the note.

What rights, if any, does Acme have against Mom under Article 3 of the Uniform Commercial Code? Explain.

MEE Question 2

Testator died three years ago. His duly probated will provided that:

1. I give $100,000 to Trustee to hold in trust and to distribute the trust income equally among those persons who are my friends at my death. After 10 years, the trust shall terminate and the trust property shall be distributed equally between my son, Sam, and the Fine Arts Program at State University. In no event shall this trust terminate earlier than 10 years after my death.
2. I give the rest of my estate to my daughter, Donna.

Both Sam and Donna survived Testator.

Walter and Janice, two neighbors of Testator, correctly claim they were good friends of Testator at the time of his death and demand that Trustee pay the income from the $100,000 trust to them. Claimant, who has a tort judgment against Sam, demands that Trustee immediately pay Claimant $25,000 from the trust to satisfy the judgment.

Two years after Testator died, State University closed as a result of a state budget crunch and the legislature's determination that the programs at State University, including its fine arts program, were largely duplicative of the programs at State Polytech, the other public university in the state.

1. To whom should the income from the $100,000 trust be distributed? Explain.
2. Should Trustee immediately pay $25,000 from the trust to Claimant? Explain.
3. To whom should Trustee pay the trust principal at the end of the 10-year period? Explain.

MEE Question 3

Transit Authority, Inc. (Transit Authority) operates a bus system in Big City. Last month, a Transit Authority bus collided with a passenger car driven by Tourist. The accident occurred when Tourist suddenly veered into the bus operator's lane at a major intersection. The bus operator was unable to stop the bus in time to avoid the collision, and Tourist was injured. Immediately after the accident occurred, the bus operator telephoned his supervisor to report the accident. Then, following Transit Authority's standard procedures, the bus operator completed an "Operator's Report of Accident" form. The completed form included the date, time, and place of the accident, the road conditions, the names of witnesses, a brief description of how the accident occurred, and a description of the personal injuries and property damage caused by the accident.

When a Transit Authority supervisor arrived twenty minutes after the accident occurred, she took a statement from the bus operator and recorded that statement on a "Supervisor's Investigative Report" form. Then she interviewed Tourist and recorded Tourist's statement on the "Supervisor's Investigative Report" form. The supervisor noted all witnesses' names, addresses, and telephone numbers in her report. She took photographs of the accident scene, including the position of each vehicle. Finally, she drew a diagram of the scene on the last page of the "Supervisor's Investigative Report" form.

Tourist has filed a personal injury action against Transit Authority in federal court, properly invoking the court's diversity jurisdiction. Tourist alleges that the bus operator, Transit Authority's employee, was driving negligently. She further alleges personal injury and property damage in a total amount exceeding $200,000. Transit Authority has filed an answer denying the claim of negligence and asserting contributory negligence.

Tourist served two requests for production of documents on Transit Authority. One request was for "any and all accident reports, diagrams, photographs, and any other documents which relate in any way to the collision between the bus and the car." A second request was for the bus operator's "entire personnel file that is maintained by Transit Authority, including disciplinary actions, safety records, and driving records." Transit Authority has refused to produce the accident reports that the operator and the supervisor created on the grounds that the reports were "prepared in anticipation of litigation." In addition, Transit Authority refuses to produce the bus operator's personnel file because the information that it contains "is not relevant."

Tourist has made a motion to compel production of the accident reports and the bus operator's "entire personnel file."

Should Tourist's motion be granted in whole or in part? Explain.

MEE Question 4

Twelve years ago, Husband and Wife married in State A. Their marriage appeared to be happy and stable. However, one year ago, without warning, Husband left Wife and moved to State B, 500 miles away. Husband obtained a new job in State B and rented an apartment there. He has told Wife that he never intends to return to State A.

Last week, Wife was personally served in State A with a copy of Husband's State B divorce petition. The petition requests the State B court to grant a divorce on grounds of a six-month separation and irreconcilable differences. The petition also requests the State B court to award Husband the following assets, all of which are titled solely in Husband's name:

1. The marital home in State A, which Husband purchased five years before the marriage. During the marriage, Husband made mortgage payments on the home with his employment income.
2. Stock, which Husband inherited from his grandmother during the marriage.
3. Bonds, which Husband purchased with his employment income during the marriage.

All of these assets appreciated significantly in value during the marriage. Wife has no assets titled in her name alone or held jointly with Husband.

Wife is determined to fight this divorce. She has never visited State B, knows no one there, and does not believe she should have to defend a divorce action there. At the same time, she wishes to save her marriage. She has called Husband several times urging him to return to State A and enter marriage counseling, but he has refused. Wife is convinced that Husband is going through a "mid-life crisis" and would "return to his senses" with proper counseling and support. She believes she can get him that support and counseling if he returns to State A. Finally, if there must be a divorce, Wife believes that she should receive a share of the assets owned by Husband.

1. Does the State B court have jurisdiction to grant Husband a divorce and award Husband property acquired during the marriage? Explain.
2. Can Wife prevent Husband from obtaining a divorce on the grounds that she does not consent to the divorce and that the marriage might yet be saved? Explain.
3. Without regard to any jurisdictional issues, would Wife, in the event of a divorce, be entitled to a share of any of Husband's assets? Explain.

MEE Question 5

In 2000, Testator executed a valid will. The will provided:

1. I give my 100 shares of stock in XYZ Company to Brother.
2. I give $3,000 to Sister.
3. I give $5,000 to Uncle.
4. I give $10,000 to Cousin.
5. I give the residue of my estate to my alma mater, Polytech.

In 2001, XYZ Company issued its annual dividend in stock. For each 100 shares held, the dividend was 6 shares of XYZ stock.

In 2002, Testator gave $5,000 to Uncle on Uncle's birthday.

In 2005, Testator died, survived by Brother, Sister, Uncle, and Cousin. Testator's estate consists of the following assets: 106 shares of XYZ Company stock (worth $1 per share) and $9,000. Sister made a valid disclaimer of her interest in Testator's estate.

How should Testator's estate be distributed? Explain.

MEE Question 6

Astoria Limited Partnership (Astoria) is a properly formed limited partnership. The general partner of Astoria is Baker, an individual. The limited partners are Tim, Uma, and Vivian, who are also individuals. Under the limited partnership agreement, distributions and voting rights in the limited partnership are allocated to Baker (10%), Tim (30%), Uma (30%), and Vivian (30%).

The limited partnership agreement of Astoria gives the limited partners the right to remove Baker as the general partner—with or without cause—if the holders of 60% of the voting rights concur.

Three weeks ago, articles appeared in the business press raising questions about Baker's management of Caldonia Limited Partnership (Caldonia). While the articles did not specifically mention Astoria, the misconduct documented in the articles—contracts between Caldonia and a janitorial company owned by Baker that charged greatly inflated fees for its services—raised concerns on the part of Astoria's limited partners. Tim wrote Baker requesting that Baker, in his capacity as the general partner of Astoria, provide: (1) copies of any contracts between Astoria and any entities related to or controlled by Baker, (2) copies of any contracts for janitorial services between Astoria and any entity, (3) copies of Astoria's federal and state tax returns for the past three years, and (4) copies of all correspondence between Astoria and any other parties for the past five years. Alternatively, Tim requested access to Astoria's records in order to secure copies of the documents himself.

Baker responded by refusing all four of Tim's requests. Thereupon, Tim contacted Uma and Vivian to request their votes that Baker be removed as the general partner. Tim also proposed that the three limited partners, Tim, Uma, and Vivian, agree in writing to jointly run Astoria until a suitable replacement for Baker could be found.

1. Did Baker act wrongfully in refusing to provide Tim the information and documents he requested? Explain.
2. If the limited partners do no more than remove Baker as general partner of Astoria, will they be liable to persons who transact business with Astoria? Explain.
3. If the limited partners remove Baker and run Astoria until a replacement general partner can be found, under what circumstances will they be liable to persons who transact business with Astoria? Explain.

MEE Question 7

Nine months ago, Feagle Construction Company, Inc. (Feagle), which does business under the trade name of On Top Roofing, obtained a $150,000 loan from National Bank. To secure the loan, Feagle assigned to National Bank “all rights to payment owed to Feagle Construction Company, Inc. by Hotel Corporation for the roofing construction project on its Broadway Street Hotel.” The Broadway Street Hotel roofing project was by far the largest of Feagle’s fifteen roofing projects and represented its largest account receivable.

National Bank promptly filed a financing statement with this same collateral description, using the trade name of On Top Roofing for the debtor. The financing statement was filed in the appropriate location, and indexed only in the name of On Top Roofing.

Three months after these events, Feagle needed additional monies. It approached State Bank for a loan of $100,000. State Bank conducted a search of the filing office’s records for financing statements relating to “Feagle Construction Company, Inc.,” but its search did not retrieve National Bank’s financing statement. Accordingly, State Bank granted the $100,000 loan and obtained a written agreement from Feagle granting State Bank a security interest in “all Feagle Construction Company, Inc.’s accounts, whether now owned or hereafter acquired.” State Bank filed a financing statement in the appropriate location in the name of “Feagle Construction Company, Inc.” as debtor.

Another six months later, mounting financial stress forced Feagle to default on its loans to both National Bank and State Bank. Feagle has about $75,000 worth of outstanding accounts receivable. In particular, Hotel Corporation still owes Feagle $50,000 for the hotel roofing project. In addition, Feagle is owed about $25,000 on a total of ten other roofing projects it has recently completed. Both National Bank and State Bank are seeking to recover some of what Feagle owes them by collecting from Hotel Corporation the amount it still owes Feagle.

Does National Bank or State Bank have first priority in the money owed to Feagle by Hotel Corporation? Explain.

Analyses

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS IV.A., D., V.J., VII.B., D.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) To what extent is a “guarantor” of a note liable to the holder of the note?
 - (2) Is Acme’s claim against Mom subject to the defense that Uncle negotiated the note contrary to his agreement and without authorization?
 - (3) May Mom raise a defense against Acme based on Acme’s discharge of Nephew, the principal obligor on the instrument?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Acme can recover the $9,000 still due on the note from Mom. Although Mom has a defense against payment based on Uncle’s violation of his promise not to negotiate the note without Nephew’s and Mom’s consent, this defense is not good against Acme because Acme is a holder in due course. A holder in due course can enforce the note free of any personal defense of this sort. See UCC § 3-305(b).

Even though Acme discharged Nephew, Mom’s liability is intact. Mom signed as a guarantor or “accommodation party.” An accommodation party remains liable on a note, even if the creditor discharges the primary obligor. See UCC § 3-605. Mom’s liability is of course reduced by the amount paid on the debt by Nephew. See UCC § 3-419(e).

Point One: (35-45%)

Mom signed the note in the capacity of a maker of the note and is liable to Acme in that capacity, even though she signed for accommodation only, unless she has a valid defense.

Mom signed the front of the note, immediately under Nephew’s signature, and under the word “guaranteed.” She also clearly indicated that she was signing as “a guarantor.” Moreover, it is clear, in UCC terms, that Mom signed the note only for the purpose of incurring liability on it; she was not a direct beneficiary of the value given for the note, as Nephew, not Mom, received an interest in the sandwich shop. Thus, Mom signed the instrument “for accommodation,” see UCC § 3-419(a), and the language she used (“as guarantor” and “guaranteed”) gave notice that she had signed only for accommodation, see UCC § 3-419(c).

An accommodation party is “obliged to pay the instrument in the capacity in which the accommodation party signs.” UCC § 3-419(b). Mom signed on the front of the note as a person undertaking to pay and thus signed in the capacity of a maker. UCC § 3-103(a)(7). As a maker, she would be obliged to pay the instrument to a holder. UCC § 3-412. Moreover, this obligation to pay arises even if the person seeking to enforce the instrument has notice of the party’s accommodation status. UCC § 3-419(c). Thus, unless Mom has some other valid defense to payment (see Points Two and Three, below), the fact that she signed for accommodation will not relieve her of her obligation to pay the instrument according to its terms to a person entitled to enforce it.

Acme is a holder of the note because Uncle indorsed the note to Acme, which took possession of it. See UCC § 1-201(20) (definition of holder). As a holder, Acme has a right to enforce the note against any party who signed it. See UCC §§ 3-301 (right of party to enforce an instrument), 3-401(a) (effect of signature). Thus, Mom has an obligation to pay Acme unless Mom can assert a valid defense to payment that is good against Acme.

[NOTE: The analysis and result are unchanged under the 2003 Revisions to Article 3-419. See Revised Article 3, § 3-419(e).]

Point Two: (30-40%)

Acme is not subject to Mom’s defense of unauthorized negotiation. Acme had no notice of the oral agreement among Uncle, Nephew, and Mom regarding a limitation on Uncle’s power to negotiate the note. Acme gave value for the note in good faith. Thus, Acme is a holder in due course and can enforce the note against Mom free of any defense she could have asserted against Uncle.

Mom has a defense based on Uncle’s breach of his agreement not to enforce or negotiate the note. See UCC § 3-117 (separate agreement modifying an obligation in a note can provide a defense to payment). The problem for Mom is that Acme appears to be a holder in due course of the note. Acme gave value for the note, taking it in good faith (from all that appears in the facts). The agreement restricting Uncle’s right to negotiate the note does not appear on the face of the note, and Acme had no notice of that oral agreement. So Acme gave value in good faith and without notice of any defenses to the note. It is therefore a holder in due course. As a holder in due course, Acme took the note free of ordinary defenses, including Mom’s defense of unauthorized negotiation. See UCC §§ 3-302(a) (requisites of holder in due course status), 3-305(b) (defenses applicable to a holder in due course).

[NOTE: The analysis is unchanged under Revised Article 3.]

Point Three: (20-30%)

Mom’s liability on the note was not discharged by Acme’s release of Nephew’s liability.

As an accommodation party, Mom is liable to Acme if Nephew does not pay the full amount of the note, and this liability survives even if Acme discharges Nephew. Section 3-605(b) of the UCC expressly provides that an intentional voluntary discharge of the principal obligor by a person entitled to enforce a note “does not discharge the obligation of an . . . accommodation party” Mom has a right of recourse against Nephew, and she can seek reimbursement from Nephew to the extent she pays on the note. See UCC § 3-419(e). Mom is, of course, only liable to Acme for $9,000, the amount of the note that remains unpaid.

[NOTE: Revised Article 3 includes significant changes to § 3-605. Those changes would dramatically alter the analysis and result on this issue. This note details the revised analysis.

Because Mom is an accommodation party, she qualifies as a “secondary obligor” on the instrument signed by Nephew. UCC Revised § 3-103(a)(17). As a secondary obligor, Mom has the defenses set out in Revised § 3-605. In particular, when, as here, a person entitled to enforce the instrument releases the obligation of the principal obligor to pay the instrument, then “the secondary obligor is discharged to the same extent as the principal obligor from any unperformed portion of its obligation on the instrument.” UCC Revised § 3-605(a)(2). The person entitled to enforce the instrument could retain rights against the secondary obligor by so specifying in the release, but absent such an explicit retention of rights, the secondary obligor is discharged.

Thus, when Acme accepted $1,000 and released Nephew from his obligation to pay the remaining amount due on the note, Mom was discharged. There is nothing in the facts to indicate that Acme expressly retained its rights against Mom.]

TRUSTS AND FUTURE INTERESTS I.B.2., II.A., B.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Does Testator's gift of trust income to friends fail for lack of definite beneficiaries?
 - (2) Does Claimant, as a judgment creditor of Sam, have a right to immediate payment of $25,000 from the trust?
 - (3) Should the gift to State University fail because State University ceased to exist shortly after Testator's death, or should it be paid to another charity?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The trust's income should be paid to Donna, the residuary legatee under Testator's will, because the gift of the income fails for want of definite beneficiaries. As to the principal, nothing should be paid to Claimant before the trust terminates because Claimant's rights cannot exceed those of Sam, the trust beneficiary, and Sam only has a right to receive trust principal after 10 years. When the trust terminates, one half of the corpus should pass to Sam and the other half, in all likelihood, to State Polytech, as a result of the probate court's exercise of its cy pres power.

Point One: (35-45%)

Trustee should pay the trust income to Donna, the residuary taker, because the gift of income to Testator's friends fails for want of definite beneficiaries.

It is a well-established trust law principle that a private express trust must have definite beneficiaries. See UNIF. TRUST CODE (UTC) § 402(a)(3). The term "friends" is indefinite because it is impossible to determine the precise number of persons who fit this description. Clark v. Campbell, 133 A. 166 (N.H. 1926) (a leading case invalidating a trust where the trustee had the discretion to select among friends). Although the modern trend would allow a trustee to select a beneficiary from an indefinite class (see UTC § 402(c)), this liberalized position does not apply if the trustee must distribute equally to all members of an indefinite class. See WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN JR. & SHELDON F. KURTZ, WILLS, TRUSTS, AND ESTATES at 377-79 (3d ed. 2004). Here the trust instrument requires Trustee to distribute income equally among all of Testator's friends. Thus, the income portion of the trust fails for want of definite beneficiaries. The fact that Walter and Janice may have been friends of Testator's does not entitle them to any distribution because the income must be distributed equally among all of Testator's friends.

Where an attempt to create a trust fails, the trustee holds a resulting trust for the settlor or the settlor's successors in interest. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 8. Where a testamentary trust, as here, fails, the residuary legatee succeeds to the property interest. See id. Donna, the residuary legatee under Testator's will, would be Testator's successor-in-interest of the resulting trust. Accordingly, Trustee should pay over trust income to Donna during the trust term.

It could be argued that the income for the first ten years either should be accumulated for ultimate distribution to the remainder beneficiaries or, alternatively, should be distributed to the presumptive remainder beneficiaries currently. An applicant could reasonably argue in favor of accumulating trust income for ultimate distribution to the remainder beneficiaries when the trust terminates. However, because the trust prohibited a distribution to Sam and State University earlier than 10 years after Testator's death, the trust should not terminate under the acceleration of remainder doctrine. This fact makes the alternative of current income distribution to the remainder beneficiaries less likely.

Point Two: (30-40%)

Trustee should not immediately pay over $25,000 to Claimant because, as a creditor of a trust beneficiary, Claimant's rights cannot exceed those of Sam, the beneficiary, and Sam has only a right to half of the principal in 10 years.

A creditor may reach a beneficiary's interest in a trust if the trust does not contain a spendthrift provision. See UTC § 501. But a beneficiary's creditor can have no greater rights in trust assets than the beneficiary, and a beneficiary of trust principal is not entitled to trust principal until the termination of all preceding estates. See RESTATEMENT OF PROPERTY § 156 (remainder as future right to property); RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 2, cmt. d (trust beneficiaries have equitable estates). Thus, Claimant would not be entitled to any trust principal until the trust terminates. Indeed, if the trust principal were reachable during the 10-year period, then the rights of any income beneficiaries would be adversely affected because their rights are based on income derived from the entire principal.

Therefore, Claimant is not entitled to receive $25,000 of trust principal. Claimant can only reach what Sam had—a right to receive trust principal after 10 years. Of course, Claimant would be entitled to a $25,000 distribution from Trustee when the trust terminates, assuming that the judgment against Sam is still outstanding and that his interest in the trust at that time is at least $25,000.

Point Three: (25-35%)

At the end of the 10-year period, one-half of the trust principal should be distributed to Sam. The other half should be distributed, in all likelihood, to State Polytech in lieu of State University by application of the court's cy pres power.

The trust provides that, at the end of ten years, the trust principal shall be distributed equally to Sam and State University. Sam is entitled to half the principal at that time, subject to a possible $25,000 reduction to pay Claimant. (See Point Two.)

The other half of the principal is payable to State University, but this gift cannot be paid because State University no longer exists. However, State University is a charity. It is a well-established principle of trust law that, when a charitable purpose cannot be carried out, the court should determine whether to exercise its cy pres power and redirect the charitable gift to another like charity. See UTC § 413; RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 67.

The cy pres doctrine requires an initial inquiry into the settlor's intent: if the court determines that the settlor had a specific charitable intention limited to the stated charitable purpose, the gift goes to the residuary legatee, in this case Donna. However, if the court determines that the settlor had a general charitable intention, it should substitute for the named charity another charity that is consistent with the settlor's intentions. Id. Both the UTC and Restatement (Third) of Trusts presume that a settlor has a general charitable intent. Id.

Given the presumption of general charitable intent, there is a strong argument that the court should exercise its cy pres power and substitute the fine arts program at State Polytech for that at State University. The will evidences a desire to benefit a fine arts program. It evidences no intention of limiting that benefit to the program at State University. Testator could not have known that State University would cease to exist after his death. The state legislature has already determined that State University's fine arts program largely duplicates that at State Polytech. Substituting State Polytech for State University would maintain Testator's commitment to the fine arts and public education in his state of residence. Cf. RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 67 cmt. e (providing that, if the testator leaves money to a particular university to teach courses in dianetics, and the university refuses to accept the funds on that basis, the court may permit the legacy to be applied to the establishment of such a course in another university, assuming the settlor has not provided otherwise).

If the court does not apply the cy pres doctrine, the gift to charity fails and the share State University was intended to receive either passes wholly to Sam as the only remainder beneficiary or wholly to Donna, the residuary legatee under Testator's will.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE IV.D.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Are accident and investigative reports discoverable when they are prepared in the ordinary course of business and not in anticipation of any immediately pending litigation?
 - (2) Is information in a bus operator's personnel file about the operator's driving record, safety record, and disciplinary record discoverable in an action against the bus operator's employer that alleges the bus operator was driving negligently?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The motion to compel should be granted in part and denied in part. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 37(a) provides that a party may be compelled to provide discovery. Here, the accident and investigative reports are not trial preparation materials that are protected under Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(3). They are routine reports that were not prepared in anticipation of litigation. Records in the operator's personnel file regarding his driving and safety record are relevant and discoverable under Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(1). That information is related to his driving skills and his employer's potential liability. On the other hand, the operator's disciplinary records may not be discoverable. While some disciplinary information may relate to the issues in the case, other disciplinary information may have nothing whatever to do with the bus operator's driving skills, and its disclosure would serve simply to harass and embarrass the bus operator. A court may order an in camera review to excise irrelevant material before allowing release of the personnel file.

Point One: (35-45%)

The motion to compel production of the accident and investigative reports should be granted because they were not prepared in anticipation of litigation.

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(1), a party "may obtain discovery regarding any matter, not privileged, that is relevant to [a] claim or defense" in the action. Relevant information is discoverable even if it would be inadmissible at trial, so long as "the discovery appears reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence." FED. R. CIV. P. 26(b)(1). There is no question that the bus operator's accident report and his supervisor's investigative report satisfy this relevancy requirement.

On the other hand, Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(3) protects trial preparation materials from discovery. Materials “prepared in anticipation of litigation or for trial by [a] party” are discoverable only if the party seeking discovery can show a “substantial need” for the materials and an inability “without undue hardship to obtain the substantial equivalent of the materials by other means.” FED. R. CIV. P. 26(b)(3).

Thus, the crucial question is whether the accident reports that the bus operator and the supervisor completed were “prepared in anticipation of litigation” within the meaning of this rule. Broadnax v. ABF Freight Sys., Inc., 180 F.R.D. 343, 346 (N.D. Ill. 1998). On the facts of this problem, they were not. Both the bus operator’s report and the supervisor’s report appear to be standard Transit Authority business records that are routinely prepared in the event of an accident. The facts say that the bus operator was following standard procedure when he called his supervisor and when he completed the “Operator’s Report of Accident” form. Similarly, the supervisor was following standard procedure when she went to the accident scene and completed the “Supervisor’s Investigative Report” form. While Transit Authority may honestly claim that it has such procedures precisely because it “anticipates” that there may be litigation whenever there is an accident, routinely prepared records that are completed in the regular course of business do not become trial preparation materials merely because the business anticipates that they might be useful in litigation.

The timing for completion of the reports supports the conclusion that they were not prepared in anticipation of litigation. The bus operator began to complete his report immediately after the accident occurred. The supervisor completed the investigative report on the same day of the accident and within one hour of the time that the accident occurred. Accident and investigative reports like the ones described here are protected from discovery only when they are prepared in response to a threat of imminent litigation. Id.; Wikel v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 197 F.R.D. 493 (N.D. Okla. 2000). There was no threat of litigation when these reports were completed. Therefore, these materials are discoverable. Id.; see also FED. R. CIV. P. 26(b)(3) (Advisory Committee’s note).

Point Two: (55-65%)

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(1), the bus operator’s driving and safety records are relevant because they address his driving skills and care in a case that involves his alleged negligent driving, but his disciplinary record may not be relevant. Thus, the court is likely to order disclosure of the personnel file, but it may restrict disclosure or use of the information in some fashion.

As noted above, parties to an action “may obtain discovery regarding any matter, not privileged, which is relevant to the claim or defense of any party.” FED. R. CIV. P. 26(b)(1). Even if not directly relevant to a claim or defense, a matter that is relevant to the general “subject matter involved in the action” may be discovered if the court determines that there is good cause for such discovery. Hill v. Motel 6, 205 F.R.D. 490, 492 (S.D. Ohio 2001). The facts and the circumstances of each particular case determine the relevancy of information that a party seeks during discovery. Id. Accordingly, in its discretion, and in light of the facts of each case, the court decides whether the requested information is relevant. Coleman v. American Red Cross, 23 F.3d 1091, 1096 (6th Cir. 1994).

Personnel records are discoverable, Goldman v. Checker Taxi Co., 325 F.2d 853 (7th Cir. 1963), despite frequent claims that they should be protected for privacy reasons, Gohring v. Case Corp., 43 F.3d 340, 342-43 (7th Cir. 1994). Where discovery is resisted, the court must balance the interest of the party seeking discovery against any alleged privacy interest that would be infringed by disclosure. Eckstein Marine Serv., Inc. v. M/V Basin Pride, 168 F.R.D. 38 (W.D. La. 1996).

Here, Tourist has alleged that the bus operator was negligent. To the extent that the driving and safety records in the personnel file include material about this accident, they are clearly relevant to Tourist's claim. The bus operator's more general driving and safety records are a closer question. If they reveal a pattern of poor driving, they might be relevant to the claim against Transit Authority.

Even if it cannot be shown that the driving and safety information is directly relevant to the specific claim in this case, this seems a good case for showing good cause to compel production of the information because it is relevant to the subject matter of the lawsuit. An investigation of the bus operator's driving and safety record might lead to information of direct benefit to Tourist's case. Therefore, information in the bus operator's personnel file about his driving skills, including his driving record and any other accident reports, is discoverable. The motion to compel production of the personnel file should be granted, with respect to the driving records.

Regarding the bus operator's disciplinary records, the discovery request is much more troubling. The personnel record may well contain disciplinary information about the bus operator that could be entirely irrelevant to the action and that would be embarrassing and damaging to the bus operator if disclosed (e.g., that he has been disciplined for sexual harassment). On the other hand, it is conceivable that the records might include evidence that could bolster Tourist's case, such as evidence of disciplinary action taken against the bus operator for driving-related behavior.

Under these circumstances, a court may limit Tourist's access to the bus operator's personnel files by restricting access to those portions deemed clearly relevant to the action. See Rintchen v. Walker, 1996 WL 238701 at *4 (E.D. Pa. 1996) (requiring defendants in an action alleging driving negligence to make available information in a personnel file including driving records and disciplinary records related to his driving skills, but forbidding disclosure of other information). Alternatively, a court might order an in camera review of the records to determine whether they contain anything of "a particularly sensitive or private nature" that warrants protection. See Eckstein Marine Serv., 168 F.R.D. at 40-41. Or, a court may order release of the entire file but enter a confidentiality order restricting access to the file to attorneys and parties reviewing it for purposes of the litigation. Id.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) (a) Does a court have jurisdiction to grant a divorce when one spouse has no contacts with the forum state?
 - (b) Does a court have jurisdiction to divide marital property when one spouse has no contacts with the forum state?
 - (2) May a spouse who did not consent to a separation and believes that reconciliation is possible successfully oppose a divorce petition brought on grounds of separation and irreconcilable differences?
 - (3) When are assets owned by one spouse subject to division at divorce?

DISCUSSION

NOTE: Applicants answering this question in a community property state should use community property principles. For this purpose, the phrase “marital property” means community property.

Summary

A court that lacks personal jurisdiction over one spouse may grant a divorce, but may not issue a binding property division or support order. On the facts of this case, Husband could secure a divorce without Wife’s consent and despite Wife’s claim that the marriage could be saved if Husband entered counseling.

In all states, a court may divide marital property regardless of which spouse holds title. Property acquired during the marriage with employment income is marital property subject to division; inherited property and property acquired before marriage are separate property that is typically not subject to division. If the value of a separate asset is increased through marital funds or significant spousal labor, it may be apportioned into separate and marital components.

Point One(a): (15-25%)

A court that lacks jurisdiction over one spouse may grant a divorce.

Jurisdiction over both spouses is not necessary to dissolve a marriage. If the plaintiff spouse is a domiciliary of the forum state, courts of that state have jurisdiction to dissolve the plaintiff’s marriage. In Williams v. North Carolina, 317 U.S. 287 (1942) (“Williams I”), the United States Supreme Court likened a divorce action to an in rem proceeding in which the res is marital status. The court found that each spouse “carried” the marital status to the forum state when he or she established a new domicile in that state; thus a state court may grant its domiciliary’s divorce petition as long as he or she has satisfied the state’s jurisdictional requirements.

Domicile—residence with the intent to remain indefinitely—is a question of fact. See Williams v. North Carolina, 325 U.S. 226, 229-30 (1945) (“Williams II”). On these facts, Husband is almost certainly a domiciliary of State B. Husband moved to State B one year ago; he rented an apartment and obtained employment there; he has indicated that he never intends to return to State A. State B could thus grant Husband a divorce.

Point One(b): (15-25%)

A court that does not have jurisdiction over both spouses may not issue a binding property division order.

In an ex parte divorce, the court’s jurisdiction extends only to the marriage itself. Unless the court also has personal jurisdiction over the defendant spouse, it may not issue a binding order affecting personal rights such as property division. The divorce decree is thus “divisible.” See Estin v. Estin, 334 U.S. 541 (1948).

Unless the defendant is personally served within the forum state, a court does not have personal jurisdiction over a defendant who lacks “minimum contacts” with the state. See Kulko v. Superior Court, 436 U.S. 84 (1978). Wife was served with Husband’s divorce petition in State A. She has never been to State B; indeed, she knows no residents of State B except Husband. A State B court thus may not issue a binding support or property division order.

[NOTE: An applicant could receive extra credit for noting that a State B court could issue a binding property division order if Wife decided to participate in the State B divorce action. When both spouses participate in the divorce proceeding, principles of preclusion apply; because the participating spouse could have raised the jurisdictional issue in the forum state, he or she is bound by the forum state’s determination on this issue. See Sherrer v. Sherrer, 334 U.S. 343 (1948).]

Point Two: (20-30%)

A court may order a divorce based on separation and irreconcilable differences even if the separation was nonconsensual and one spouse believes that reconciliation is possible.

In virtually all states, a spouse may obtain a divorce without a showing of fault or consent of the other spouse. The typical basis for a no-fault divorce is irreconcilable differences, a minimum period of separation, or both. See HARRY E. KRAUSE ET AL., FAMILY LAW: CASES, COMMENTS, AND QUESTIONS 557, 566 (5th ed. 2003).

Today, a no-fault divorce may be granted without any attempt at reconciliation. Even if one spouse establishes that marital discord arose from a curable condition (for example, addiction or profligate spending), the fact that one spouse believes that the marriage can be saved is not an adequate basis to deny the other spouse a divorce. See, e.g., Hagerty v. Hagerty, 281 N.W.2d 386 (Minn. 1979); Eversman v. Eversman, 496 A.2d 210 (Conn. App. Ct. 1985).

In states that require a minimum period of separation as the basis for a no-fault divorce, separation need not be consensual. See, e.g., HOMER H. CLARK, THE LAW OF DOMESTIC RELATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES 517-18 (2d ed. 1988). The mandated period of separation is usually one year or less.

Thus, any effort by Wife to prevent the divorce would be unsuccessful. The parties have been separated for a year, Husband appears determined to secure the divorce, and Wife's belief that the marriage can be saved is legally irrelevant.

Point Three: (30-40%)

Assets acquired before marriage or by inheritance are separate, not marital, property. In most states, neither separate property nor appreciation in its value is subject to division at divorce. However, the use of marital funds to add value or obtain increased equity in separate property creates marital property. Property acquired during the marriage with marital funds is marital property.

In all states, marital property is divided at divorce without regard to how that property is legally titled. Thus, the fact that the marital home, the stock, and the bonds are titled in Husband's name alone is not determinative of how the assets should be divided.

In a majority of states, "marital property" may be divided between the spouses, but "separate property" remains the property of the owning spouse. In a minority of "hotchpot" jurisdictions, the court may divide all assets, whenever or however acquired; a few states permit the division of separate property in special circumstances, such as hardship.

An asset is marital property if it was acquired during the marriage by any means other than gift, descent, or devise. An asset that is initially separate property may be transformed into marital property if marital funds or significant effort by the owner-spouse during the marriage enhances its value or build equity. The fact that a separate asset appreciates in value during the marriage does not in itself transform that asset into marital property. See KRAUSE ET AL., supra, at 752, 763-64.

If State A is a majority jurisdiction, Husband's stock would be classified as separate property, the bonds as marital property, and the marital home as partly separate and partly marital. The stock was inherited, and there is no evidence that its value has been enhanced by Husband's efforts or with marital funds. The bonds, on the other hand, were purchased with marital property (money Husband earned during the marriage) and are therefore marital property. The marital home was purchased before the marriage, but with a mortgage; employment income was used to reduce the mortgage indebtedness and obtain additional equity in the house. In most states, such equity-building payments create marital property. See J. THOMAS OLDHAM, DIVORCE, SEPARATION AND THE DISTRIBUTION OF PROPERTY § 7.05 (2006) (describing apportionment principles and noting that, in a few states, installment payments create only a marital lien against the value of the separate asset).

Thus, Wife is entitled to have a court make an equitable division of the bonds and the post-marriage increase in Husband's home equity. In most states, however, Husband's stock would be separate property, not subject to division upon divorce.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) How many shares of XYZ Company stock is Brother entitled to claim?
 - (2) What is the effect of Sister's disclaimer?
 - (3) Does the inter vivos gift of $5,000 satisfy the bequest to Uncle?
 - (4) Given that there are insufficient assets to carry out all of Testator's directions, how should the bequests abate?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Sister's disclaimer effectively deletes her bequest from the will. The treatment of the remaining bequests turns on their classification. The specific bequest to Brother entitles him to 100 shares under the common law view and 106 shares under the Uniform Probate Code and like statutes. The general bequest to Uncle is not satisfied by the inter vivos gift. The general bequest to Uncle and the general bequest to Cousin will be abated pro rata. There are insufficient assets to satisfy the residuary bequest to Polytech. If Brother is not entitled to the six additional shares, two of them go to Uncle and four of them to Cousin in payment of their general legacies.

Point One: (20-30%)

Whether Brother is entitled to 100 or 106 shares of XYZ stock depends on whether state law allocates stock dividends to a specific legatee.

The bequest to Brother of "my 100 shares" is a specific bequest. Many states hold that a stock dividend, like a cash dividend, is a property interest distinct from stock given by specific bequest. In these states, Brother is entitled only to 100 shares of XYZ stock. See Note, Rights to Stock Accretions Which Occur Prior to Testator's Death, 36 ALB. L. REV. 182, 188-192 (1971); Annotation, Change in Stock or Corporate Structure, or Split or Substitution of Stock of Corporation, as Affecting Bequest of Stock, 46 A.L.R.3d 7 §§ 8, 9 (1972).

In states that have adopted Uniform Probate Code § 2-605 or a like statute, a stock dividend is treated like a stock split instead of a cash dividend. Under this approach, which aims to maintain the legatee's percentage of ownership in the corporation, Brother is entitled to all 106 shares.

Point Two: (20-30%)

The effect of Sister's disclaimer is that the property passes as if Sister had failed to survive Testator.

At common law and under the Uniform Probate Code, Sister's disclaimer causes Testator's property to pass as if Sister had failed to survive Testator. See UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-1106 (current version, incorporating the 1999 Uniform Disclaimer of Property Interests Act); UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-801 (earlier versions). Because Sister has no descendants who survive Testator, the state's anti-lapse statute will not be applicable to the bequest to Sister. The $3,000 bequest to Sister lapses.

Point Three: (20-30%)

The inter vivos gift of $5,000 does not satisfy the bequest to Uncle.

The bequest of $5,000 to Uncle is a general pecuniary bequest. Under the common law, an inter vivos gift made after a will's execution can satisfy a general bequest, but only if the testator so intends. Here, there is no evidence of such intention. Moreover, no presumption of such intention exists where, as here, the testator does not stand in loco parentis to the legatee. See THOMAS E. ATKINSON, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF WILLS § 133 (2d ed. 1953). Uniform Probate Code § 2-609 produces the same result because none of the statutory bases for satisfaction of a bequest by inter vivos gift have been met: the will does not provide for deduction of the gift, and neither the testator nor the legatee has declared in a contemporaneous writing that the gift is in satisfaction of the bequest.

Point Four: (20-30%)

The bequests abate according to their classifications, hence in the following order: first the residuary gift to Polytech, then the general gifts to Uncle and Cousin, pro rata, and last, the specific gift to Brother.

Under both the common law and the Uniform Probate Code, the shares of distributees abate in the following order: (1) property not disposed of in the will, (2) residuary gifts, (3) general gifts, and (4) specific gifts. Abatement within each category is pro rata. See UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 3-902; WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN JR. & SHELDON F. KURTZ, WILLS, TRUSTS, AND ESTATES § 8.2 (3d ed. 2004). Thus, the residuary gift to Polytech abates first; Polytech receives nothing. The general gifts to Uncle and Cousin abate next and pro rata, meaning that the 1-to-2 ratio of Uncle-to-Cousin is maintained. Thus, Uncle and Cousin receive $3,000 and $6,000, respectively, plus (under the majority view but not under the Uniform Probate Code) two and four shares, respectively, of XYZ Company stock. Finally, Brother receives the XYZ Company stock to which he is entitled: 100 shares under the common law view and 106 shares under the Uniform Probate Code and like statutes.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP IX.A., B.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Is a limited partner entitled to (a) copies of contracts between the limited partnership and entities related to or controlled by the general partner, (b) copies of contracts generally between the limited partnership and other entities, (c) copies of the limited partnership's federal and state tax returns, and (d) copies of all correspondence between the limited partnership and all other parties for a five-year period?
 - (2) If the limited partners remove the general partner, are they by that act alone liable to persons who transact business with the partnership?
 - (3) If the limited partners, after removing the general partner, run the limited partnership until a replacement general partner can be found, are they liable to persons who transact business with the partnership?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Limited partners have a right to obtain from the general partner "upon reasonable demand" information regarding the state of the business and financial condition of the limited partnership, copies of tax returns, and such other information regarding the partnership's affairs as is just and reasonable. In this case, the tax returns are clearly required to be disclosed, the contracts are required to be disclosed under both the financial condition requirement and the other information requirement, and the correspondence is probably required to be disclosed under the other information requirement (although a court could conclude that the request is unreasonably broad).

Limited partners have the right to remove a general partner without that act being treated as an exercise of "control" of the limited partnership and without becoming liable for the limited partnership's obligations.

If, following removal of the general partner, the limited partners choose to run the partnership's business, then they will be exercising control over the limited partnership and each limited partner will be liable to persons who reasonably believe, based upon the limited partner's conduct, that the limited partner is acting as a general partner. Aggressive disclosure of the limited partners' status as limited, but not general partners, could limit such liability.

Point One: (40-50%)

A limited partner is absolutely entitled to copies of tax returns and is entitled to such copies of contracts and correspondence as is just and reasonable.

Under the Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act (RULPA), a limited partner has a right to “inspect and copy” partnership records that are required to be kept pursuant to § 105 of the Act, and, in addition, to obtain from the general partner “upon reasonable demand”:

“true and full information regarding the state of the business and financial condition of the limited partnership,” RULPA § 305(2)(i);

“promptly after becoming available, a copy of the limited partnership’s federal, state, and local income tax returns for each year,” RULPA § 305(2)(ii); and “other information regarding the affairs of the limited partnership as is just and reasonable.” RULPA § 305 (2)(iii).

In some jurisdictions, the reasonableness of a demand will depend, in part, on the purpose for which the limited partner is seeking disclosure. See, e.g., Madison Ave. Inv. Partners, LLC v. America First Real Estate Inv. Partners, LP, 806 A.2d 165 (Del. Ch. 2002). Where, as here, the limited partner has substantial reason to suspect mismanagement of the limited partnership and wishes to obtain partnership documents to investigate the matter, the limited partner has a right to access those documents. Id.; Somerville S Trust v. USV Partners, LLC, 2002 WL 1832830 (Del. Ch. 2002).

Baker probably acted improperly in refusing to provide information in response to Tim’s request for “copies of contracts between the limited partnership and entities related to or controlled by the general partner.” This request should be covered under the first subsection of the Act because such information relates to the “business and financial condition of the limited partnership.” In addition, where there is a suggestion that a general partner is engaged in self-dealing, a limited partner’s request for specific information that would confirm or disprove that suggestion is surely “just and reasonable.”

Tim’s demands for “copies of contracts generally between the limited partnership and other entities” are also probably covered under the first and third subsections for the same reasons. Such information is potentially relevant both to the general “business and financial condition” of the partnership and to the possibility that Baker has been self-dealing.

The request for copies of the limited partnership’s federal and state tax returns is specifically covered under the second subsection of the statute. In addition, tax returns are documents that the limited partnership is required to keep and that a limited partner may inspect and copy at any time. RULPA § 305(2)(ii).

Tim’s request for “copies of all correspondence between [the limited partnership] and any other parties for the past five years” may go too far. This request must be honored, if at all, only if the request is “just and reasonable” under the third subsection of the statute. Whether a demand for copies of all correspondence is “just and reasonable” is certainly debatable. Under the circumstances, Tim would claim that it is a reasonable demand that would provide information useful in determining whether Baker was properly managing the business. Baker would claim that the request goes far beyond what is reasonable, and is essentially an effort to delve into all the files of the business on a fishing expedition for evidence of wrongdoing.

Point Two: (20-30%)

Limited partners are not liable as general partners simply for removing a general partner.

A limited partner is generally not liable for the obligations of a limited partnership. RULPA § 303(a). See, e.g., Zeiger v. Wilf, 755 A.2d 608 (N.J. Super. App. Div. 2000). However, a limited partner can become so liable if “in addition to the exercise of his [or her] rights and powers as a limited partner, he [or she] participates in the control of the business.” RULPA § 303(a). Thus, the question as to whether the limited partners would be liable for partnership obligations were they to remove Baker as general partner would be resolved by determining whether the act of removing the general partner would be “participat[ion] in the control of the business.” Id.

Because of the inherent “difficulty of determining when the ‘control’ line has been overstepped,” RULPA (and the parallel laws of most states) specifically enumerates certain activities in which a limited partner may engage “without being deemed to have taken part in control of the business.” § 303(b), official cmt. This so-called “safe harbor” list of activities that do not constitute the exercise of control provides specifically that a “limited partner does not participate in the control of the business” for purposes of incurring liability under § 303(a) “solely by . . . proposing [or] voting [on the] . . . removal of a general partner.” § 303(b)(6)(v). Thus, the limited partners in Astoria may remove Baker as general partner without incurring liability for the limited partnership’s obligations.

In states that have adopted the 2001 Uniform Limited Partnership Act, the situation is even clearer. Limited partners are “not personally liable, directly or indirectly, by way of contribution or otherwise, for an obligation of the limited partnership solely by reason of being a limited partner, even if the limited partner participates in the management and control of the limited partnership.” 2001 UNIF. LTD. P’SHIP ACT § 303. The new Act provides the limited partners a “full, status-based liability shield” akin to the protection given corporate shareholders. Id., official cmt.

Point Three: (20-30%)

Limited partners who participate in the control of the business can be held liable for the obligations owed by the limited partnership, but only to those persons who transact business with the limited partnership in the reasonable belief that the limited partner is a general partner.

Limited partners can become liable for the obligations of the limited partnership if they participate in the control of the business in ways not within the safe harbor exceptions in RULPA § 303(b). In particular, Tim’s suggestion that Tim, Uma, and Vivian jointly “run the limited partnership” after removing Baker from the role of general partner appears to contemplate a degree of involvement in the business of the partnership that exceeds what is permitted by any of the safe harbor exceptions. Moreover, the facts suggest that this management and control of the business would necessarily constitute “participat[ion] in the control of the business,” as the removal of Baker would leave no one but the limited partners in control.

Participation in the control of the business can make a limited partner liable for the obligations of the limited partnership, but that liability extends only to “persons who transact business with the limited partnership reasonably believing, based upon the limited partner’s conduct, that the limited partner is a general partner.” RULPA § 303(a). Thus the limited partners could attempt to limit their liability when running the business by giving all the parties with which the limited partnership does business notice that they are limited, not general, partners. See, e.g., Folgers Architects, Ltd. v. Kerns, 612 N.W.2d 539, 550-51 (Neb. Ct. App. 2000), rev’d in part and aff’d in part on other grounds, 633 N.W.2d 114 (Neb. 2001).

In some jurisdictions, however, liability could be imposed, even without third-party reliance, if “a limited partner’s control activities are so extensive as to be ‘substantially the same as’ those of a general partner.” Zeiger v. Wilf, 755 A.2d 608, 618 (N.J. Super. App. Div. 2000). In these jurisdictions, Tim, Uma, and Vivian would be well-advised to make their limited role clear and to search diligently for a replacement general partner to make clear that their temporary control did not amount to taking on a role “substantially the same” as that of a general partner.

As noted earlier, the 2001 Uniform Limited Partnership Act “renders the control rule extinct.” 2001 UNIF. LTD. P’SHIP ACT § 303, official cmt. Under this Act, Tim, Uma, and Vivian would have no liability for partnership obligations even if they participated directly in the management and control of the limited partnership.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS II.D., IV.B., IV.F.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Was the financing statement filed by National Bank sufficient to perfect its security interest in the monies owed to Feagle by Hotel Corporation?
 - (2) Was National Bank's security interest in the monies owed to Feagle by Hotel Corporation perfected automatically because National Bank did not receive a "significant part" of Feagle's accounts?
 - (3) As between National Bank's unperfected interest and State Bank's perfected interest, whose interest prevails?

DISCUSSION

Summary

National Bank's financing statement was insufficient to perfect its interest in the Hotel Corporation account because the financing statement was filed under Feagle's trade name rather than under its true corporate name. Moreover, the facts suggest that the Hotel Corporation account constituted a significant part of Feagle's accounts, thus precluding National Bank's interest from being perfected automatically. By contrast, State Bank filed a proper financing statement and had a perfected security interest in Feagle's accounts, including the Hotel Corporation account. State Bank's perfected security interest has priority over National Bank's unperfected interest, even though State Bank acquired its interest three months after National Bank.

Point One: (35-45%)

Security interests in accounts may be perfected by a financing statement that complies with Code requirements; a filing in the name of a debtor's trade name instead of its official corporate name is not effective unless the trade name is so similar that it is not seriously misleading.

National Bank obtained a security interest in the monies owed by Hotel Corporation to Feagle by having Feagle sign an agreement granting National Bank an interest in the specified collateral. That collateral—the monies owed to Feagle by Hotel Corporation—is an "account" for purposes of Article 9 of the UCC. See UCC § 9-102(2) (a "right to payment . . . for services rendered or to be rendered" is an "account"). A security interest in accounts must ordinarily be perfected by filing a proper financing statement in the appropriate government office. UCC § 9-310(a).

In this problem, National Bank filed a financing statement, but the financing statement was ineffective. In order to be effective, a financing statement must sufficiently provide the name of the debtor. UCC § 9-502(a)(1). Where the debtor is a registered organization such as a corporation, the financing statement must use the official registered corporate name of the debtor. UCC § 9-503(a)(1). A financing statement that provides only the debtor's trade name does not sufficiently provide the name of the debtor. UCC § 9-503(c).

Although the UCC forgives minor errors that do not render the financing statement seriously misleading, UCC § 9-506(a), an error in the debtor's name is seriously misleading unless a search of the records under the debtor's correct name (Feagle Construction Company, Inc.) using the filing office's standard search logic would disclose the financing statement. UCC § 9-506(b), (c). Because of the complete dissimilarity between the trade name (On Top Roofing) under which the financing statement was filed and the debtor's correct name (Feagle), this financing statement would be found ineffective and National Bank's security interest will not be perfected by filing.

Point Two: (35-45%)

A security agreement in accounts may be perfected automatically if the assignment of accounts did not transfer a significant part of the assignor's outstanding accounts to the creditor. Given that the Hotel Corporation account appears to constitute a significant portion of all Feagle's outstanding accounts, and considering that National Bank is a professional lender, not a casual or isolated lender, National Bank's security interest will probably not be considered to have been automatically perfected.

In addition to providing for perfection of a security interest in accounts by filing, the UCC provides for perfection upon attachment (known as automatic perfection) for assignments of accounts that do not "transfer a significant part of the assignor's outstanding accounts" to the secured party. UCC § 9-309(2). Under the facts given, National Bank received an assignment of only one of Feagle's several outstanding accounts. However, the single Hotel Corporation account was, at the time of default, worth more than all Feagle's other accounts combined. The question, then, is whether this assignment of a single account was a transfer of "a significant part" of Feagle's outstanding accounts.

The UCC gives no guidance on the meaning of "significant part," but National Bank will have a difficult time arguing that an account amounting to more than 50 percent of the total value of Feagle's accounts is not significant. Moreover, the comments to UCC § 9-309(2) suggest that its purpose is to protect "casual or isolated assignments . . . which no one would think of filing," and that persons who "regularly" take assignments should file. National Bank took the assignment from Feagle as a part of a normal secured financing arrangement; it was a standard business transaction of the sort that almost always includes the filing of a financing statement. Indeed, National Bank did file (albeit ineffectively).

On these facts it is highly likely that a court would conclude that National Bank's interest was not automatically perfected.

Point Three: (10-20%)

State Bank has first priority because its interest is perfected while National Bank's is not.

A perfected security interest has priority over a conflicting unperfected interest. UCC § 9-322(a). Because National Bank's interest was unperfected (see Points One and Two) and State Bank's interest was perfected, State Bank has priority under the UCC.

[NOTE: If an applicant mistakenly concludes that National Bank's interest was perfected either by filing or automatically, then the applicant should conclude that National Bank would have priority over State Bank under the "first to file or perfect" rule. UCC § 9-322(a). Consider giving full credit for Point Three in this circumstance, at least if the applicant's answer shows a full understanding of the priority rules and is wrong only because the applicant erroneously concluded that National Bank's interest was perfected.]

Questions

MEE Question 1

Baker is a renowned pastry chef. Café, a sole proprietorship, is a well-known restaurant in need of hiring a pastry chef. Baker and Café's Owner had extensive conversations regarding Baker coming to work at Café. On May 1, a week after those conversations occurred, Baker sent Café a signed letter dated May 1 stating: "I will work for Café as head pastry chef for two years for an annual salary of $100,000."

On the morning of May 7, Café's Owner telephoned Baker and said: "The $100,000 is pretty stiff. Could you possibly consider working for less?" Baker replied: "I am a renowned pastry chef. I will not work for any less!"

Later that morning, Café's Owner sent Baker a signed letter by regular mail stating: "You obviously think you are too good for my restaurant. I am no longer interested in hiring you to work at Café."

Later that afternoon, Café's Owner had a change of heart and sent Baker a registered, express-mail signed letter stating: "Okay, if you really won't work for less, I agree to pay you the $100,000 a year you demand to work as head pastry chef at Café for two years."

On May 10, the registered, express-mail letter was delivered to Baker's office. The regular-mail letter containing the rejection was still on its way. Baker accepted delivery of the registered, express-mail letter from the postal carrier and placed it on his desk without opening it.

On May 11, before Baker read the registered, express-mail letter on his desk, he accepted an offer to work for Restaurant. As a courtesy, Baker called Café's Owner and said, "Sorry, I just took a job at Restaurant. Too bad you couldn't afford me." Café's Owner responded, "You can't work for Restaurant, I already accepted your offer to work at Café for $100,000 a year."

Does Café have an enforceable contract with Baker? Explain.

MEE Question 2

Al is a citizen and domiciliary of State A. While Al was visiting his parents in State B, he was involved in an automobile accident. Al's sports car was demolished in the accident, but he was miraculously unhurt. He returned to his home in State A shortly after the accident. Bert, a citizen and domiciliary of State B who was the driver of the other automobile involved in the accident, was not so lucky. Bert was seriously injured in the accident and was hospitalized for several weeks.

Shortly after Bert's release from the hospital, Al sued him in the federal district court for State B. Al's complaint properly invoked the court's diversity jurisdiction, alleged that the collision had been caused by Bert's negligence, and sought $90,000 in damages (the value of Al's demolished sports car).

Bert, who was uninsured and unemployed, failed to answer Al's complaint and did not defend the action, despite having been properly served and having received notice of the action. The court entered a default judgment against Bert for $90,000. The judgment was not paid, and Al took no steps to enforce it.

One year after the accident, Al died at his home in State A. His estate is being administered by Executor, who is a citizen of State B.

Bert recently filed a timely lawsuit against Executor, as administrator of Al's estate. The lawsuit, filed in state court in State B, alleges that Al's reckless driving was the cause of the accident and that Bert is permanently disabled by the injuries he suffered in the accident. Bert is seeking $3 million in damages from Al's estate.

Executor filed a timely notice of removal of the state action with the federal district court in State B. She then served the notice on Bert and filed a copy with the State B state court. She also arranged for copies of all records and proceedings in the state court action to be filed with the clerk of the federal district court in State B. Executor then filed a timely motion with the federal district court to dismiss Bert's case with prejudice on the grounds that it was barred by the prior default judgment awarded to Al in his earlier suit against Bert.

Bert has filed a timely motion with the federal court asking it to remand the action to state court on the ground that the requirements for removal are not met on these facts. Alternatively, in the event the federal court retains the action, Bert has asked it to deny Executor's motion to dismiss.

1. Was removal of Bert's claim to federal district court appropriate? Explain.
2. If the federal court retains the action, should it grant Executor's motion to dismiss Bert's suit? Explain.

MEE Question 3

Husband and Wife married eleven years ago when both were age 19 and college students. Husband planned to go to medical school and Wife planned to become an accountant. They decided that Wife would defer her educational plans in order to provide support while Husband completed his medical studies. Accordingly, Wife dropped out of college, took a job as a file clerk, and did all of the household chores in order to allow Husband more time to study. This arrangement continued while Husband completed his remaining three years of college, four years of medical school, and a three-year medical residency. Wife expended all of her earnings to support Husband and herself. Husband made minimal financial contributions to the marriage.

Throughout the marriage, Husband was verbally abusive to Wife and occasionally hit her. Husband was always contrite after these incidents and attributed his behavior to stress resulting from his studies.

Three months before Husband completed his medical residency, he and Wife had an argument. During the argument, Husband assaulted Wife and broke her arm. Wife left Husband and filed a petition for divorce.

Husband suggested to Wife that they meet with a divorce mediator, Mediator. Wife agreed to this proposal. Husband and Wife both gave Mediator information about their assets and incomes. Husband indicated that his post-residency salary would be $150,000 per year, listed no assets, and listed school debts totaling $50,000. Wife indicated that her salary was $30,000 per year and listed no assets. Wife also indicated that she intended to return to college in the fall and that her income would then decline.

Last month, Husband and Wife met with Mediator. Mediator did not explain anything about the mediation process or divorce law, nor did she inform Husband and Wife that they could obtain independent legal advice about any agreement reached through mediation. Instead, Mediator asked Husband for a settlement proposal. Husband proposed that each spouse keep his or her personal property and that Husband bear responsibility for his educational loans. Mediator responded, "That sounds like a fair settlement. I'll prepare the paperwork unless Wife objects." Within the view of Mediator and Wife, Husband tightened his fist and gave Wife a menacing look. Wife said, "I have no objection."

After signing the agreement prepared by Mediator, Wife learned that Mediator was an attorney who had represented Husband's family for many years and that Husband had talked to Mediator about the settlement shortly before their meeting.

No divorce judgment has yet been entered.

Wife has petitioned the trial court to set aside the settlement agreement she and Husband had signed and to award her spousal maintenance of $25,000 per year for three years.

MEE Question 3

1. On what grounds, if any, could the court set aside the settlement agreement? Explain.
2. If the settlement agreement is set aside, is Wife entitled to spousal maintenance? Explain.

MEE Question 4

Talker is a persuasive salesperson, Fixer is a talented carpenter, and Manager is an experienced small business manager. The three are friends and often discussed going into business together. Two months ago they orally agreed to form a cabinet restoration business and to share profits equally.

The three friends began doing business under the name TFM Restored Cabinets (TFM). Manager collected accounts receivable, paid all bills, and distributed the profits equally among the three. Fixer restored the cabinets, and Talker marketed them. The three friends operated independently in performing their respective duties, but they met periodically to discuss and decide other business matters.

Everything went smoothly until Fixer announced that he intended to hire Crafty to help with the restoration work because there was more work than one carpenter could handle. Talker and Manager opposed hiring Crafty. They believed that most of TFM's customers were attracted by Fixer's reputation and that the business would be harmed if Crafty performed restoration work. Despite their objections, Fixer hired Crafty.

One month later, Crafty quit after Manager refused to pay for the work that Crafty had performed.

1. What is the legal relationship of Talker, Fixer, and Manager? Explain.
2. Did Fixer have authority to hire Crafty on behalf of TFM? Explain.
3. Under what circumstances, if any, could Crafty collect from Talker the wages TFM owes Crafty? Explain.

MEE Question 5

Defendant and Friend were on a hunting trip together. One evening, while watching television in their hunting cabin, Defendant decided to scare Friend, who had fallen asleep in his chair. Defendant loaded his rifle and aimed it at a lamp that was on a table just behind the chair in which Friend was sleeping. Just as Defendant pulled the trigger to shoot the lamp, Friend suddenly sat up and moved into the line of fire. Defendant's bullet hit Friend in the shoulder and seriously wounded him.

Defendant loaded Friend into his car and sped off toward the nearest hospital, which was 15 minutes away. En route, Defendant hit a pothole, lost control of his car, and collided with a telephone pole. Defendant was seriously injured, and Friend suffered further injuries. The accident occurred on a lightly traveled country road, and no other vehicle passed by for 45 minutes.

By the time help arrived, Friend was dead. An autopsy established that Friend bled to death as a result of the combined impact of the gunshot wound and the injuries suffered in the car crash. The coroner concluded that the gunshot wound alone would not have been fatal had Friend received medical treatment within a half hour of the shooting.

Murder is defined as "a killing with malice aforethought." In this jurisdiction, second-degree murder is "all murder that is not deliberate or premeditated." Defendant has been charged with second-degree murder on account of his shooting Friend and Friend's subsequent death.

Is Defendant guilty of second-degree murder? Explain.

MEE Question 6

Owen owned vacant land (Whiteacre) in State B located 500 yards from a lake and bordered by vacant land owned by others. Owen, who lived 50 miles from Whiteacre, used Whiteacre for cutting firewood and for parking his car when he used the lake.

Twenty years ago, Owen delivered to Abe a deed that read in its entirety:

Owen hereby conveys to the grantee by a general warranty deed that parcel of vacant land in State B known as Whiteacre.

Owen signed the deed immediately below the quoted language and his signature was notarized. The deed was never recorded.

For the next eleven years, Abe seasonally planted vegetables on Whiteacre, cut timber on it, parked vehicles there when he and his family used the nearby lake for recreation, and gave permission to friends to park their cars and recreational vehicles there. He also paid the real property taxes due on the land, although the tax bills were actually sent to Owen because title had not been registered in Abe's name on the assessor's books. Abe did not build any structure on Whiteacre, fence it, or post no-trespassing signs.

Nine years ago, Abe moved to State C. Since that time, he has neither used Whiteacre nor given others permission to use Whiteacre, and to all outward appearances the land has appeared unoccupied.

Last year, Owen died intestate leaving his daughter, Doris, as his sole heir. After Owen's death, Doris conveyed Whiteacre by a valid deed to Buyer, who paid fair market value for Whiteacre. Neither Doris nor Buyer knew of the Owen-to-Abe deed. Both Doris and Buyer believed that Owen was the owner of Whiteacre at the time of his death. Buyer promptly and properly recorded the deed from Doris and immediately went into possession of Whiteacre.

Last month Abe returned to State B. When he discovered Buyer in possession of Whiteacre, he sued Buyer for possession.

State B has enacted the following statutes:

1. Actions to recover possession of real property shall be brought within ten years after the cause of action accrues.
2. No conveyance or mortgage of real property shall be good against subsequent purchasers for value and without notice unless the same be recorded according to law.

Who is entitled to possession of Whiteacre? Explain.

MEE Question 7

Sam worked as an administrative assistant to the president of Corporation. In this capacity, Sam had responsibility for opening all of Corporation's mail. If the mail contained any checks, Sam was supposed to secure the indorsement of the president in the name of Corporation and deposit the checks in Corporation's bank account.

One day, Corporation received a $3,000 check. When the check arrived at Corporation's offices, Sam secretly took it from the mail, concealed it in his coat pocket, and took it home. That night, Sam fraudulently indorsed the check in the name of Corporation. Sam then mailed the check to Lender with instructions to cover a $3,000 mortgage payment on Sam's home.

Acting in good faith, Lender applied the amount of the check to reduce Sam's indebtedness on his mortgage by $3,000. Before Lender could deposit the check, Corporation learned of Sam's actions. Corporation told Lender that it owned the check and demanded that Lender return it.

Must Lender return the check to Corporation? Explain.

MEE Question 8

Settlor, age 60, consulted an attorney, Attorney, about the creation of a trust. Settlor gave Attorney a memorandum containing the following information about his family:

Family Members	Relationship	Age
1. Wife	Spouse	48
2. Son	Child	21
3. Daughter 1	Child	16
4. Daughter 2	Child	10
5. Grandchild	Grandchild (Son's child)	1

Settlor also outlined his goals in creating the trust:

1. I want to fully control trust assets and enjoy all trust income until I die.
2. After I die, I want trust assets used to ensure that Wife is comfortably provided for. I also want Wife to be able to use trust assets to reward, in her will, whichever children have been most helpful to her. I don't want Wife to be a trustee; she doesn't have the financial background.
3. After Wife dies, I want my children to get the remaining trust assets. But, of course, if Son dies before Wife, I'd want his share to go to Grandchild.
4. I'm planning to fund the trust with cash and stocks. I may want to add some other assets later, but I'm not sure.

Based on the information provided by Settlor, Attorney drafted the following trust instrument:

SETTLOR TRUST AGREEMENT

1. I appoint Bank as trustee of the Settlor Trust.
2. I direct Bank to hold all assets listed on Schedule A in trust, and I direct Bank to dispose of these assets as follows:
 - a. Bank shall pay all trust income to Settlor during Settlor's lifetime.
 - b. After Settlor's death, Bank shall pay trust income and principal to Wife in such amounts as Bank, in its sole discretion, deems appropriate.
 - c. After Wife's death, Bank shall distribute all remaining trust assets equally among Settlor's surviving children, share and share alike.
3. Bank accepts and agrees to faithfully carry out the terms of this trust.
[Signatures, dates, and acknowledgments are omitted]

SCHEDULE A

12,000 Shares of XYZ Corporation, common stock
$150,000 (cash)

How would you revise the Settlor Trust Agreement to more fully meet Settlor's stated goals? Explain.

MEE Question 9

Last July Art, Brett, and Chad formed LeaseAll, Limited Liability Company (LLC), to lease personal property to individuals and businesses. Art, Brett, and Chad had equal ownership interests in LLC and entered into a written operating agreement (OA). Under the OA, only Art had authority to manage the business, to hire and fire employees, and to buy and sell real and personal property. Art contributed a business plan and his expertise to the leasing business, and Brett and Chad each contributed $50,000 to the capital of LLC.

Over the next year, Brett and Chad did not participate in the business. No meetings were held, and Art did not provide Brett or Chad with any information about LLC. In accordance with the business plan, Art purchased, in the name of LLC, a building and inventory for the leasing business.

Things have not gone well for LLC. Its initial capital is exhausted, and the cash generated by operations is inadequate to allow it to pay its debts as they come due. Additionally, one of LLC's customers, Peter, was badly injured when a chainsaw he rented from LLC malfunctioned. Peter sued LLC and obtained a judgment of $500,000. LLC does not have liability insurance because Art forgot to sign the check when he sent the premium payment to the insurance company and, as a result, the company did not issue the policy. LLC cannot pay Peter's judgment from its current capital.

1. If Brett and Chad bring an action against Art to recover damages claiming that Art mismanaged LLC, should that action be direct or derivative and what corporate law requirements must they meet before bringing an action? Explain.
2. Did Art breach his fiduciary duty in managing LLC? Explain.
3. Can Peter recover the $500,000 judgment against LLC from Art, Brett, and/or Chad personally? Explain.

CONTRACTS I.A., V.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) Did Baker's letter of May 1 constitute an offer?
 - (1)(b) Did Café Owner's oral response on the morning of May 7 constitute a counteroffer?
 - (2) Did Café accept Baker's offer?
 - (3) Did the contract between Baker and Café satisfy the Statute of Frauds?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A valid contract requires an offer, an acceptance and, when as here, the contract cannot be performed within one year, a writing that satisfies the Statute of Frauds. Here, Baker made an offer to work for Café that was accepted when Café's Owner sent an acceptance by express mail to Baker. It is irrelevant that Baker did not read the acceptance. The fact that an earlier rejection was mailed is also irrelevant because a rejection, unlike an acceptance, is effective only upon receipt, and Baker did not receive the rejection before receiving the acceptance. When both a rejection and an acceptance are sent, whichever is received first is effective. Lastly, the writings, being signed, satisfy the requirements of the Statute of Frauds. Therefore, Café has an enforceable contract.

Point One(a): (20-30%)

Baker's signed letter of May 1 to Café agreeing to work as a pastry chef for Café is a valid offer.

A person makes an offer when the person communicates to another a statement of "willingness to enter into a bargain, so made as to justify" the other person who hears the statement "in understanding that his assent to that bargain is invited and will conclude it." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 24 (1981). Here, Baker's letter of May 1 to Café was an offer because an objective recipient of the letter, such as Café, would reasonably conclude that assent would create a contract.

An offer cannot ripen into a contract by acceptance unless its terms are reasonably certain. Id. § 33(1). Here, the terms were clear and certain and identified the parties, the subject matter, and the price.

Point One(b): (20-30%)

Café Owner's phone call to Baker on the morning of May 7 asking if he would possibly work for less was not a counteroffer but merely a request for changed terms.

A counteroffer is a statement from the offeree to the offeror, relating to the same subject matter as the original offer but suggesting a substituted bargain from the original terms. Id. § 39(1). Generally, if an offeree makes a counteroffer, the offeree can no longer accept the original offer. Id. § 39(2). Here, Café's Owner said to Baker "The $100,000 is pretty stiff. Could you possibly consider working for less?" This utterance is not a counteroffer because it did not offer substitute terms to Baker and did not indicate any unwillingness to conclude the bargain on Baker's terms if Baker would not accept an alternative salary. All Café's Owner did was ask Baker if he could possibly work for less. Café's Owner proposed no alternative salary. Because Café's Owner's call to Baker was not a counteroffer, but merely a request for unspecified changed terms, it did not preclude Café's later acceptance of Baker's offer.

Point Two: (25-35%)

Although Café's Owner initially rejected Baker's offer in writing, he later accepted the offer. Because Baker received the acceptance before he received the rejection, Baker's offer is deemed accepted.

A rejection is a manifestation of intent not to accept an offer. Id. § 38(2). A rejection terminates the offeree's power to accept an offer. Id. § 38(1). However, a rejection does not extinguish the offeree's right to accept an offer until the rejection is received by the offeror. Id. § 40. Here, Café's Owner's letter stating "I am no longer interested in hiring you" clearly manifests an intent not to go forward with the bargain and constitutes a rejection of Baker's offer.

However, Café's Owner's second letter, in which Café agreed to Baker's terms, was an acceptance because it was a manifestation of assent to the terms of an offer made in a manner invited by the offer. Id. § 50(1). The question then becomes which of the two letters sent by Café's Owner is effective, the rejection or the acceptance.

An acceptance is effective upon dispatch under the so-called "mailbox rule." Id. § 63. A rejection is effective only upon receipt. But when an acceptance is sent after a rejection (that is, both the acceptance and the rejection are sent), whichever gets to the recipient first is effective. Id. § 40. Here, Café's letter of acceptance was received by Baker first, while the letter containing the rejection was still on the way to Baker. See id. § 68 (a communication is received when it comes into the possession of the person to whom it is addressed). The fact that Baker did not read the letter does not alter this result. Because the acceptance was the first communication received, it is effective. Therefore, Café accepted Baker's offer to work for Café, and a contract was created.

Point Three: (25-35%)

If a contract cannot be performed within a year, it must meet the requirements of the Statute of Frauds. Here the contract satisfies that statute and, therefore, is enforceable.

A contract must satisfy the Statute of Frauds if it cannot be fully performed within one year. Id. § 130. Here, the two-year employment requirement cannot be completed in one year, and therefore the contract is within the purview of the Statute of Frauds and must satisfy the requirements of the Statute of Frauds to be enforceable.

A contract within the Statute of Frauds satisfies that statute and is enforceable if it is evidenced by a writing signed by “the party to be charged,” which (a) reasonably identifies the subject matter of the contract; (b) is sufficient to indicate that a contract has been made; and (c) “states with reasonable certainty the essential terms” of the contract. Id. § 131.

Here, each party signed a writing that is sufficient under these criteria as it identifies the position, person, term, and salary. Therefore, the Statute of Frauds is satisfied and the employment contract is enforceable. Because this is a personal services contract, if Baker refuses to work for Café, Café can sue Baker for damages, but cannot get specific performance.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE I. A., B., E.; IV. C.; VI. E.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) What are the requirements for an action to be removed from a state court to a federal court?
 - (1)(b) Are those requirements met in a suit against a decedent's estate executor who is a citizen of the same state as the plaintiff but the decedent was not?
 - (2)(a) Can the default judgment against Bert have preclusive effect in subsequent cases even though Bert never appeared to defend himself?
 - (2)(b) Is Bert's claim against Al so closely related to Al's original claim that Bert is barred from raising it in a subsequent action?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Bert's tort action against Al's estate raises a state law claim and may be removed to federal court only if the federal court would have had diversity jurisdiction over the action had it originally been filed in that court. Moreover, the case cannot be removed if any defendant is a citizen of the state in which the case is pending. In this case, removal was proper. The amount in controversy clearly exceeds the $75,000 threshold. Although Executor is a citizen of State B and not diverse from Bert, she is a party to the action only in her capacity as a representative of Al's estate, and for diversity and removal purposes she is "deemed to be a citizen only of the same state as the decedent." Thus, Executor is treated as a State A citizen, the diversity requirements are met, and removal is appropriate.

Bert's action is barred by the default judgment in the prior suit between Bert and Al and should therefore be dismissed by the federal court. A default judgment is conclusive and binding on the parties if, as here, the rendering court had jurisdiction over the subject matter and the parties. Bert's claim against Al arose out of the same transaction or occurrence as Al's original claim, and the same evidence would have been relevant to the disposition of both claims. Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 13(a), Bert's claim was a compulsory counterclaim which Bert was required to raise in the initial action and, under standard rules of preclusion, Bert is barred from bringing a subsequent action asserting that claim.

Point One(a): (25-35%)

Removal of a case from a state court is appropriate if the federal court in that state would have original jurisdiction over the action and the defendant is not a citizen of that state.

An action filed in state court may be removed to the federal district court of the district where the state action is pending if the district court has “original jurisdiction” over the action. 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a). The federal court would have jurisdiction over Bert’s state law tort action against Al only if the requirements of diversity are met. The amount in controversy must exceed $75,000 and the parties must be diverse (citizens of different states). 28 U.S.C. § 1332. In addition, removal by a defendant is prohibited if the defendant is a citizen of the state where the action is pending. 28 U.S.C. § 1441(b).

Point One(b): (25-35%)

Because Executor is “deemed to be a citizen only of the same state as the decedent,” the parties to the state court action were diverse and the case was properly removable to the federal court pursuant to the court’s diversity jurisdiction.

The requirements for removal are met here. Bert’s complaint seeks damages of $3 million for personal injuries leading to permanent disability. This clearly exceeds the required amount in controversy, and there is nothing to suggest that the damage claim is not made in good faith. The parties are diverse because diversity depends on the citizenship of Bert and the decedent, Al, not the citizenship of Bert and Executor. Although Executor is the named defendant, for diversity purposes Executor is “deemed to be a citizen only of the same state as the decedent,” the person whose interest she represents. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(2). The decedent, Al, was a citizen of State A and therefore was diverse from Bert, a State B citizen. The requirements of diversity jurisdiction were therefore satisfied and the case is removable.

Moreover, although the removal statute forbids a defendant from removing a case to federal court on the basis of diversity jurisdiction if the defendant is a citizen of the state where the action is pending, see 28 U.S.C. § 1441(b), the rule that an executor or administrator of an estate is deemed to be a citizen only of the state in which the decedent was a citizen is applicable here as well. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(2). Because Executor is treated as a State A citizen, removal was appropriate.

Point Two(a): (15-25%)

A default judgment is entitled to preclusive effect, subject only to the requirements that the rendering court had subject matter jurisdiction and personal jurisdiction over the defendant and that the defendant had notice of the action and an opportunity to appear and defend himself. Those requirements are met here.

A default judgment rendered by a court is entitled to preclusive effect so long as the court had subject matter and personal jurisdiction over the action and the parties. See Sewell v. Merrill Lynch, 94 F.3d 1514 (11th Cir. 1996); Orca Yachts LLC v. Mollicam Inc., 287 F.3d 316, 318 (4th Cir. 2002). Although Bert did not appear and defend himself in the original action, the federal court clearly had jurisdiction over the action and over Bert. The parties were diverse (Bert was from State B and Al from State A) and the amount in controversy (the value of Al's automobile) exceeded $75,000. Moreover, as Bert was a citizen of the state in which the action was pending, and was domiciled in the state at the time, the court had personal jurisdiction over him. The facts also state that Bert was properly served and had notice of the action.

Point Two(b): (25-35%)

The judgment in the prior suit between Al and Bert precludes Bert from asserting his personal injury claim because that claim was a compulsory counterclaim that should have been raised in the original action.

Because the judgment in Al's suit against Bert was rendered by a federal court sitting in diversity, its judgment will be given the same preclusive effect as would be given under State B law to a State B state court judgment (because State B is the state in which the judgment-rendering court was located). See Semtek Int'l Inc. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 531 U.S. 497 (2001). The precise preclusive effect that should be given to a default judgment is subject to some variance among the states, see, e.g., RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF JUDGMENTS § 22 and comments (1982), but on this issue there is substantial uniformity. It is widely accepted that a default judgment bars the losing party from asserting defenses that could have been raised in the action or claims that were subject to a compulsory counterclaim statute or rule in the original action. See generally 3 MOORE'S FEDERAL PRACTICE § 13.14 (3d ed.).

The federal compulsory counterclaim rule, Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 13(a), would have required Bert to bring his claim against Al in the first action, had Bert actually defended that action. Rule 13(a) requires a defendant to "state as a counterclaim any claim" that he or she has against the plaintiff if the claim "arises out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter" of the plaintiff's claim. Here, Bert's claim against Al for damages arises out of the same occurrence (the traffic accident) as Al's previous claim against Bert. Moreover, key issues of law and fact raised by both claims would be the same as both claims involve the basic question of who was at fault in the accident. Much of the evidence that would support or refute Al's claim against Bert is likely to be relevant to Bert's claim against Al. In short, the two claims are logically, factually, and transactionally related. These are precisely the circumstances under which the federal rules require Bert to assert his claim as a counterclaim. See generally Tank Insulation Int'l, Inc. v. Insultherm, Inc., 104 F.3d 83, 85-86 (5th Cir. 1997). Because Bert's claim for damages was a compulsory counterclaim that should have been raised in the original action, the judgment in that original action bars the claim. It does not matter that Bert did not actually litigate in the prior case but merely allowed a default judgment to be entered against him.

[NOTE: Because the question of the preclusive effect of this judgment involves the effect of the federal counterclaim rule, some applicants might argue that the preclusion issue is governed by federal law and not by state preclusion rules. Cf. Semtek, 531 U.S. 497, 508 (state law governs the preclusive effect of a diversity judgment absent substantial federal concern). But it does not really matter whether an applicant concludes that state or federal preclusion rules apply. The basic rule—that a default judgment bars the defendant from raising in future litigation a claim that was subject to a compulsory counterclaim statute or rule in the original litigation—is well established in state and federal practice.]

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) Does Husband's conduct provide a basis for setting aside the divorce settlement agreement?
 - (1)(b) Does Mediator's conduct provide a basis for setting aside the divorce settlement agreement?
 - (2) Is Wife entitled to spousal maintenance?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A spouse's fraud, duress, or coercive behavior provides a basis for setting aside a settlement agreement that is unfair. In this case, there is evidence to support findings of unfairness and impermissible misconduct by Husband. Additionally, a mediator's substantial misconduct is a basis for setting aside a settlement agreement. Such substantial misconduct is clearly evident in this case. Wife has a strong spousal maintenance claim given her disproportionate contributions to the marriage and to Husband's education, the substantial disparity in Husband's and Wife's economic circumstances, and the duration of the marriage.

Point One(a): (15-25%)

A divorce settlement agreement may be set aside when a spouse's fraud, duress, or coercive behavior results in an unfair agreement. Husband's collusion with Mediator, his implicit threats against Wife, and his failure to disclose his relationship with Mediator provide a basis for setting aside the settlement agreement.

When a divorce settlement agreement is attacked before a final judgment of divorce is entered, the court generally "has great freedom . . . to reject the agreement, to accept it, or to accept it with modifications." HOMER H. CLARK, THE LAW OF DOMESTIC RELATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES 760 (2d ed. 1988). Although the case law is far from uniform and often relies heavily on the facts of the case at hand, courts in most states have held that an agreement may be set aside based on fraud, duress, or coercive behavior that results in an agreement substantively unfair to one of the parties. See id. at 761; UNIF. MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE ACT (UMDA) § 306(b) (1982) (written separation agreement is binding on the court unless unconscionable).

Courts have been particularly solicitous of divorce litigants who are unrepresented by legal counsel. Even when there is no general duty of disclosure, a number of courts have held that when negotiating a separation agreement, a represented spouse has a fiduciary obligation toward an unrepresented spouse. See, e.g., Terwilliger v. Terwilliger, 64 S.W.3d 816 (Ky. 2002).

Although lack of independent legal counsel will not by itself invalidate an agreement, courts will generally examine the circumstances that led to the waiver of counsel. Moreover, an attorney may not ethically represent both spouses in drafting an agreement.

Here, Wife had no attorney before the mediation session, while Husband met with Mediator, an attorney who had represented his family for many years. Husband also failed to tell Wife about that meeting and his family's relationship with Mediator. Taken together, these facts may establish that the agreement was procured through fraud. Husband's collusion with Mediator to pressure Wife into signing an agreement favoring his interests also appears to be coercive; so does Husband's fist-clenching and "menacing" look.

Husband's behavior thus offered the trial court a basis for invalidating the settlement agreement if that agreement was substantively unfair to Wife. Because, in most states, there are strong arguments in favor of a spousal maintenance award to Wife (see Point 2), the trial court would be justified in finding that the agreement was substantively unfair.

[NOTE: Cases refusing to invalidate fraudulently obtained settlement agreements that already have been incorporated into a divorce judgment are inapplicable to this fact pattern. See, e.g., Daffin v. Daffin, 567 S.W.2d 672 (Mo. Ct. App. 1978); Hewett v. Zegarzewski, 368 S.E.2d 877 (N.C. Ct. App. 1988).]

Point One(b): (15-25%)

A divorce settlement agreement may be set aside based on serious mediator misconduct. Because Mediator was guilty of such misconduct, the trial court would not err in setting the agreement aside.

Substantial mediator misconduct is a basis for setting aside a divorce settlement agreement. See Vitakis-Valchine v. Valchine, 793 So. 2d 1094 (Fl. Ct. App. 2001). In this case, Mediator was guilty of serious misconduct. First, a mediator must be impartial and disclose potential conflicts of interest. See ABA Model Standards of Practice for Family and Divorce Mediation, Standard IV, 35 FAM. L.Q. 27 (2001) (mediator must "conduct the mediation process in an impartial manner" and "disclose all actual and potential grounds of bias and conflicts of interest reasonably known to the mediator . . ."). In this case, a number of facts suggest bias: Mediator was the attorney for Husband's family and met with Husband prior to the mediation session; Mediator failed to reveal these sources of bias and showed partiality toward Husband by requesting only his proposal. Second, a mediator is required to explain the mediation process and make sure that the parties have enough information to ensure informed decision making. See id. at Standard III ("mediator shall facilitate the participants' understanding of what mediation is"). In this case, Mediator did not explain the mediation process, the law, or the parties' entitlement to independent counsel. Third, a mediator should recognize and control a situation, such as domestic violence, that would result in unfairness or prejudice to one of the parties. See id. at Standard X ("mediator shall recognize a family situation involving domestic abuse and take appropriate steps to shape the mediation process accordingly”). Here, Mediator did not screen for domestic violence and did nothing to adjust the power imbalance between Husband and Wife. Fourth, a mediator may not coerce or improperly influence any party to make a decision. See id. at Standard I (“mediator shall recognize that mediation is based on the principle of self-determination by the participants”); Vitakis-Valchine, 793 So. 2d at 1099. Here, Mediator characterized Husband’s proposal as “fair” and failed to ask Wife what she would propose as a settlement.

Mediator’s misconduct offered the trial court another, independent basis for setting aside the settlement agreement.

Point Two: (40-50%)

Wife has a strong claim to spousal maintenance given her disproportionate contributions to the marriage and to Husband’s education, the substantial disparity in Husband’s and Wife’s economic circumstances, and the duration of the marriage.

Rules governing the award of spousal maintenance vary from one state to the next, but they almost invariably require the trial court to consider the parties’ financial resources and needs, the marital contributions, and the marital duration. Some state statutes require consideration of spousal misconduct. Some require the court to consider one spouse’s support for the other’s education or training or mandate reimbursement for such contributions. See Robert Kirkman Collins, The Theory of Marital Residuals: Applying an Income Adjustment Calculus to the Enigma of Alimony, 24 HARV. WOMEN’S L.J. 23 (2001) (describing and categorizing factors in determination of spousal maintenance). Spousal maintenance statutes also accord substantial discretion to the trial court.

In this case, Husband’s salary will soon be five times that of Wife’s, and his economic prospects are extremely good. Wife is minimally educated and relatively unskilled; her economic prospects are extremely poor. The marriage lasted eleven years. During that time, Wife made greatly disproportionate economic and non-economic contributions to the marriage, Wife greatly facilitated Husband’s medical training, and Husband was consistently abusive to Wife.

In the vast majority of states, this combination of facts would amply support a spousal maintenance award to Wife during the three-year period needed to complete her college education. Given Husband’s anticipated $150,000 annual salary, Wife’s earning capacity (apparently no greater than $30,000 per year), and her likely inability to work full time while attending college, a $25,000 spousal maintenance award also seems to be fully justified.

In some states, however, a spouse must establish that she lacks the capacity for self-support as a precondition to obtaining a spousal maintenance award. See, e.g., UMDA § 308(a) (court may not award spousal maintenance unless spouse (1) “lacks sufficient property to provide for his reasonable needs; and (2) is unable to support himself through appropriate employment . . .”). Wife has no property, but she is capable of self-support. Under a standard like that of the UMDA, she would be ineligible for spousal maintenance unless her employment was not “appropriate.” Some courts have thus refused to award spousal maintenance to a wife capable of self-support even when she supported her husband’s professional education. See, e.g.,

McDermott v. McDermott, 628 P.2d 959 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1981) (schoolteacher wife who supported husband through graduate school not eligible for spousal maintenance because she could support herself); Morgan v. Morgan, 383 N.Y.S.2d 343 (App. Div. 1976) (overturning spousal maintenance award to wife who had supported husband’s legal education and planned to finish college and go to medical school because she was capable of self-support).

Decisions denying spousal maintenance on facts like those in the problem are typically quite old, however. Today, courts and commentators tend to view spousal maintenance as compensation for loss rather than relief of need. See Principles of the Law of Family Dissolution: Analysis and Recommendations § 5.04 et seq., A.L.I. (2002) (treating spousal maintenance as a remedy for unfair loss allocation”). Some jurisdictions also employ a quasi-contract or unjust enrichment approach. The problem contains facts that would support this type of argument given that Husband and Wife both expected to benefit from Husband’s enhanced earning capacity.

Even in a jurisdiction with case law strongly emphasizing self-support, Wife could rely on the fact that she and Husband had an understanding that she would return to school after his education was completed. See Morgan, 383 N.Y.S.2d at 344 (basing denial of spousal maintenance in part on fact that wife’s current educational plan was “never in the contemplation of the parties during marriage”). That agreement would also provide Wife with an argument that her current employment is inappropriate.

[NOTE: The applicant’s conclusion should be given less weight than his or her command of the relevant legal principles and use of the facts.]

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP V. A.; VI.; VII. B.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) What is the legal relationship of Talker, Fixer, and Manager?
 - (2)(a) Did Fixer have actual authority to hire Crafty on behalf of TFM?
 - (2)(b) Did Fixer have apparent authority to hire Crafty on behalf of TFM?
 - (3) Can Crafty hold Talker personally liable for unpaid wages?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Talker, Fixer, and Manager are doing business as a general partnership. As partners in a general partnership, they must ordinarily act by majority rule; thus Fixer had no actual authority to hire Crafty. However, Fixer had apparent authority to hire Crafty on behalf of the partnership. Therefore, TFM is liable for Crafty's unpaid wages. As a general partner, Talker is personally liable for the partnership's debts. However, Crafty can collect those wages from Talker only if Crafty obtains a judgment against Talker and first exhausts the partnership's assets.

Point One: (20-30%)

Talker, Fixer, and Manager are general partners in TFM.

A partnership is the association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit whether or not the persons intend to form a partnership. See UNIF. PARTNERSHIP ACT (UPA) §§ 101(6) & 202(a) (1997); cf. also UPA § 6(1) (1914) (defining partnership in same manner as UPA (1997)). "A business is a series of acts directed toward an end." UPA § 202 cmt. 1 (1997). As co-owners of a business, each partner "has the power of ultimate control." Id.

In order to create a partnership, the parties must intend to take actions that create a partnership, but it is not necessary that they realize they are forming a partnership or describe their business as a partnership. "[W]here intent cannot be directly ascertained, it must be established from all of the facts, circumstances, actions, and conduct of the parties." MacArthur Co. v. Stein, 934 P.2d 214, 217-18 (Mont. 1997). A written agreement is generally not required.

A person who receives a share of the profits of the business is presumed to be a partner in the business. UPA § 202(c)(3) (1997); cf. UPA § 7(4) (1914) (receipt of a share of profits of a business is prima facie evidence that one is a partner in the business). The presumption does not apply in specified situations, such as where the profits are received in payment of a debt, as interest on a loan, as wages, as rent, or for the sale of the goodwill of a business. See UPA § 202(c)(3)(i)-(vi) (1997); cf. UPA § 7(4)(a)-(e) (1914) (providing similar exceptions).

Here, there is a for-profit business and the three friends share equally in the profits of the business. There are no facts suggesting that the profits are received in payment of a debt, as interest on a loan, as wages, as rent, or for the sale of the goodwill of a business. Furthermore, the conduct of Talker, Fixer, and Manager supports the partnership presumption: each of them participates in the business on a regular basis; they meet regularly to discuss the business; and the name of the business includes initials from each of their names.

In sum, although there is no written partnership agreement, the conduct of Talker, Fixer, and Manager establishes that they have associated as co-owners of a business for profit. This association constitutes a partnership relationship. Because they have no agreement to the contrary, they have created a general partnership.

Point Two(a): (5-15%)

Fixer had no actual authority to bind the partnership to a contract of employment with Crafty.

Absent an agreement to the contrary, “[a] difference arising as to a matter in the ordinary course of business of a partnership may be decided by a majority of the partners.” UPA § 401(a)(j) (1997); see also UPA § 18(h) (1914) (providing same rule as UPA (1997)). An act outside of the ordinary course of business requires the consent of all partners. UPA § 401(a)(j) (1997).

Hiring an employee to perform services in the partnership business is clearly a matter within the ordinary course of the business of the TFM partnership. No major change in or deviation from the cabinet restoration business is involved. Fixer was merely hiring additional help to deal with an overflow of business. See State Comp. Ins. Fund v. Indus. Acc. Comm’n, 82 P.2d 732, 734 (Cal. Ct. App. 1938) (general rule is that each partner has authority to bind the firm by employment of persons whose services are reasonably necessary for carrying on business); Felice v. Felice, 112 A.2d 581, 583 (N.J. Super. A.D. 1955) (partner can bind firm by engaging employees in ordinary course of business).

The facts of this problem make clear that a majority of the partners (two of the three) opposed the hiring of Crafty. Consequently, Fixer did not have actual authority to hire Crafty.

Point Two(b): (20-30%)

Fixer had apparent authority as a partner to bind the partnership when he hired Crafty.

Each partner has authority to bind the partnership by any act “for apparently carrying on in the ordinary course the partnership business or business of the kind carried on by the partnership . . . unless the partner had no authority to act for the partnership in the particular matter and the person with whom the partner was dealing knew or had received a notification that the partner lacked authority.” UPA § 301(1) (1997); see also UPA § 9(1) (1914) (very similar to UPA 1997)). The effect of UPA § 301(1) (1997) is to “characterize a partner as a general managerial agent having both actual and apparent authority co-extensive with the firm’s ordinary business, at least in the absence of a contrary partnership agreement.” UPA § 301 cmt. 2 (1997).

Under UPA (1997), a two-part analysis is required. First, it must be determined whether the particular act was “for apparently carrying on in the ordinary course the partnership business or business of the kind carried on by the partnership.” Id. If it was, then the partnership is liable unless it is proven that the person dealing with the partner had actual knowledge or notification of the partner’s lack of authority. See RNR Inv. Ltd. P’ship v. Peoples First Cmty. Bank, 812 So. 2d 561, 565-66 (Fla. Ct. App. 2002).

Here, hiring Crafty to help in cabinet restoration was in the ordinary course of a cabinet restoration business. See Point Two(a).

Therefore, the partnership will be bound unless it is proved that Crafty had known that Fixer lacked authority to hire Crafty, in which case Crafty would have no claim. The facts of the problem do not suggest that Crafty had knowledge of Fixer’s lack of authority; therefore, Fixer had apparent authority as a partner to bind the partnership by hiring Crafty because the act appeared to be in the ordinary course of the partnership business.

[NOTE: The result under the 1914 version of UPA would be the same. See UPA § 9(1) (1914).]

Point Three: (15-25%)

Talker is personally liable for Crafty’s unpaid wages. However, to collect against Talker, Crafty must first obtain judgments against Talker and the partnership and exhaust the assets of the partnership.

A partner is jointly and severally liable for all obligations of the partnership. See UPA § 306(a) (1997). As discussed above, Fixer had apparent authority as a partner to bind the partnership to an employment contract with Crafty. Therefore, the unpaid wages are a partnership obligation for which Talker is jointly and severally liable.

However, to collect from Talker personally, Crafty must first obtain a judgment against Talker and against the partnership and levy execution against the partnership’s assets. Ordinarily, a claimant may not take action against a partner’s personal assets unless the partnership assets fail to satisfy the claimant’s judgment. See UPA § 307(d) (1997). Moreover, under the UPA (1997), a judgment against a partnership is not, by itself, a judgment against a partner. Consequently, a judgment against a partnership may not be satisfied out of the partner’s separate assets unless there is also a separate judgment against the partner. See id. § 307(c). However, a judgment against a partner personally may be sought in the same action as a judgment against the partnership.

In sum, the unpaid wages are a partnership obligation. Therefore, Crafty can execute against the separate assets of Talker to satisfy the claim for unpaid wages only if Crafty obtains a judgment against Talker as well as obtaining a judgment against the partnership and exhausting its assets.

[NOTE: Under the UPA (1914), a partner is jointly, as opposed to jointly and severally, liable for obligations of the partnership. See UPA § 15(b) (1914). Consequently, all partners must be joined as defendants in an action based upon a partnership contract unless a statute permits otherwise. See generally WILLIAM GREGORY, THE LAW OF AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP § 207(A)-(C) (West 3d ed. 2001). Moreover, a partnership is not a legal entity under the UPA (1914). Therefore, a third party cannot sue the partnership and is required to sue all the individual partners unless a statute permits a suit against the partnership as an entity. See id. While the UPA (1914) does not require exhaustion of partnership assets prior to execution upon the separate assets of a partner, case law in a number of UPA jurisdictions imposes such a requirement. See id. § 207(E).]

CRIMINAL LAW I. B.1. & 2.; IV. B.1., D.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Defendant act with the mens rea sufficient to be found guilty of second-degree murder?
 - (2) Was Defendant's accidental shooting of Friend the legal cause of Friend's death?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Defendant need not have acted with deliberation or premeditation to be guilty of second-degree murder. However, Defendant must have acted with the mens rea, or mental state, of "malice aforethought." Malice aforethought is present where a defendant acts with "depraved indifference to the value of human life." On these facts, a jury could conclude that Defendant's act of shooting at a lamp to "scare Friend" evidenced a disregard of the risks to Friend and of the value of Friend's life sufficient to amount to depraved indifference.

Defendant's act of shooting Friend was the legal cause of Friend's death. First, it was the "but for" cause of Friend's death. Had Friend not been shot, Defendant would not have been driving him to the hospital, there would have been no accident, and Friend would not have bled to death. The fact that the accident contributed to Friend's death does not relieve Defendant of liability. The accident occurred as a result of Defendant's response to the shooting and would not be held to break the chain of causation. Thus, if Defendant were found to have acted with the requisite mens rea, Defendant would be responsible for Friend's death and guilty of second-degree murder.

Point One: (45-55%)

A jury could find that Defendant's act of shooting at a lamp to scare Friend evidenced an extreme indifference to the value of human life and thus conclude that Friend acted with "malice aforethought."

To be guilty of second-degree murder, Defendant must have acted with the requisite mens rea, or mental state, of malice aforethought. Malice aforethought is a term of art, and it encompasses several different mental states. In most jurisdictions, the malice aforethought requirement is satisfied if Defendant acted with intent to kill, with knowledge that his acts would kill, with intent to inflict great bodily harm, or with reckless disregard of an extreme risk to human life (a depraved heart). J. DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW 512-13 (2001); see MODEL PENAL CODE § 210.2(1)(b).

In this case, the evidence does not suggest that Defendant acted with intent or knowledge that Friend would be harmed. However, the evidence probably does support a conclusion that Defendant acted with “a depraved heart” and therefore with the malice aforethought necessary for Defendant to be guilty of murder.

Although the precise terminology used to describe “depraved-heart” murder differs from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, most states require (i) that the defendant act “recklessly” (i.e., with an awareness of the risk that his acts could cause death) and (ii) that the defendant’s conduct show a high degree of indifference to the value of human life. Thus, convictions for depraved-heart murder have been upheld when a defendant intentionally shot a gun into a crowded room, People v. Jernatowski, 144 N.E. 497 (N.Y. 1924), or played Russian roulette with a partially loaded revolver, Commonwealth v. Malone, 47 A.2d 445 (Pa. 1946).

Here, Defendant probably acted recklessly. Defendant shot a gun in the general direction of Friend, while aiming at a lamp that was behind Friend. This behavior carries an obvious risk to Friend: if Defendant’s aim was slightly off or if Friend moved (as happened here), Friend could be shot and fatally injured. From the facts of Defendant’s behavior, and the obvious risks attending that behavior, a jury could infer that Defendant must have been aware of those risks and thus acted recklessly.

Did Defendant’s recklessness evidence an “extreme indifference to the value of human life?” Courts have held that behavior that carries a substantial risk of causing death, when it has no legitimate purpose and is done solely for the amusement of a defendant, is a sufficient predicate for a conclusion that the defendant acted with the necessary indifference to human life to be liable for depraved-heart murder. See Malone, 47 A.2d 445. Here Defendant ran a high risk of causing serious harm to Friend for no purpose other than to amuse himself by scaring Friend. This is the kind of behavior that provides a sufficient predicate for a jury to find “extreme indifference to the value of human life” and to convict Defendant of second-degree murder.

Point Two: (45-55%)

Defendant’s act of shooting Friend was the legal cause of death because Friend would not have died “but for” having been shot by Defendant, and the injuries suffered by Friend in the car accident do not break the chain of proximate causation.

Defendant is criminally liable for Friend’s death only if Defendant’s acts were both the actual and proximate cause of Friend’s death. See generally WAYNE R. LAFAVE, CRIMINAL LAW 331-358 (4th ed. 2003).

Defendant’s act of shooting Friend was the actual cause of Friend’s death. First, Defendant’s act was the “but for” cause of Friend’s death. Had Defendant not shot Friend, they would not have been driving to the hospital, the accident would not have occurred, and Friend would not have bled to death. Quite apart from that, however, it is well established that where a defendant’s wrongful act (the gunshot wound) works in combination with some other cause (the injuries in the accident) to cause a victim’s death, the defendant’s act is an actual cause of the death because it “accelerated the death process.” DRESSLER, supra, at 185; see also Oxendine v. State, 528 A.2d 870 (Del. 1987) (defendant who inflicts a second non-mortal wound can be considered the cause of child's death only if his actions caused child to die sooner than he otherwise would). Here, the facts state that Friend's death was the result of loss of blood caused by both the gunshot wound and the automobile accident. In that case, the gunshot wound is an actual cause of death.

Defendant's acts were also the proximate cause of Friend's death. The accident was a "dependent intervening cause"—a consequence of Defendant's prior wrongful conduct. It is widely held that such an intervening cause breaks the chain of causation from the original act to the death only if the intervening force was "so out-of-the-ordinary that it is no longer fair to hold [the defendant] criminally responsible for the outcome." DRESSLER, supra, at 190. Courts routinely say that the intervening event must have been "abnormal or bizarre" to prevent a defendant's original action from being regarded as the proximate cause of death. See Kibbe v. Henderson, 534 F.2d 493, 498-99, n.6 (2d Cir. 1976), rev'd on other grounds, Henderson v. Kibbe, 431 U.S. 145 (1977). Here, there is nothing abnormal about Defendant's response to his wrongful act (he tried to rush Friend to the hospital). Nor is there anything abnormal or bizarre about the fact that Defendant was involved in an accident while rushing to the hospital with a wounded friend. Even if Defendant was not at fault in causing the accident, the fact that it occurred is not sufficiently "out-of-the-ordinary" to warrant breaking the chain of causation from the shooting to the death. Therefore, Defendant's act of shooting Friend was the legal cause of Friend's death, and Defendant is guilty of second-degree murder if that act was committed with malice aforethought (see Point One).

REAL PROPERTY V. A., B.2., D.1.d.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Owen convey a fee simple absolute to Abe by the Owen-to-Abe deed?
 - (2) Did Abe acquire title to Whiteacre by adverse possession?
 - (3) Did Buyer acquire title from Doris that was superior to Abe's title?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A valid deed requires that the grantee be named with specificity. Because the Owen-to-Abe deed did not name a grantee, it was ineffective to convey the land to Abe. Although Abe did not acquire title to Whiteacre by deed from Owen, he may have acquired title by adverse possession. This would depend on whether the court finds that Abe's acts were sufficiently open, notorious, exclusive, continuous, and under claim of right to warrant the conclusion that he had acquired title by adverse possession. If Abe acquired title to Whiteacre by adverse possession, his claim to possession is good against a subsequent purchaser for value like Buyer. If Abe did not acquire title by adverse possession either because an applicant wrongfully believes the Owen-to-Abe deed was valid or because Abe's acts are construed as insufficient to acquire a title by adverse possession, then Buyer's deed is controlling because he is a bona fide purchaser for value and had neither constructive nor inquiry notice of Abe's interest in Whiteacre.

Point One: (25-35%)

Abe did not acquire title to Whiteacre by deed from Owen because that deed failed to specify the name of the grantee.

To be valid, a deed must identify the buyer and the seller, describe the land subject to the conveyance, contain words denoting a present intent to convey, and be signed by the grantor. See generally STOEBUCK & WHITMAN, THE LAW OF PROPERTY 810 (3d ed. 2000). Here, the deed from Owen to Abe read in its entirety: "Owen hereby conveys to the grantee by a general warranty deed that parcel of vacant land in State B known as Whiteacre. [Signature of Owen]." The Owen-to-Abe deed names the seller, describes the land, sets forth a present intent to convey to a grantee, and contains the grantor's signature, but it does not contain the name of the grantee. Therefore Owen did not effectively convey the land to Abe. Although some courts have upheld deeds when the grantee's name is missing, these cases involve deeds containing language providing a method for ascertaining the grantee's identity, such as "to the grantor's son" or to the "trustee of a trust." No such language appears here.

[NOTE: If an applicant does not know the rule that a deed must name the grantee, the applicant should conclude the Owen-to-Abe deed is valid. If the applicant wrongly concludes that deed is valid, then the applicant might either completely skip Point Two, or, in discussing Point Two, conclude that Abe did not acquire a title by adverse possession because Abe's possession was not hostile.]

Point Two: (35-45%)

Abe may succeed in establishing that he acquired title to Whiteacre by adverse possession.

An individual may acquire title to land by adverse possession. To do so, the claimant must show that he entered the land and remained in actual possession that was open, continuous, exclusive, and under claim of right during the entire period in which the record owner (here, Owen) had a cause of action for possession. In State B, a cause of action for possession is available for ten years after a possessor's entry.

Whether the possessor has acquired title by adverse possession can only be conclusively determined by a judicial proceeding, and the sufficiency of particular acts of possession is not always clear. In most states, it is not necessary that the possessor have paid taxes. See STOEBUCK & WHITMAN, supra, at 854. (In a few states, a possessor cannot claim title by adverse possession without paying taxes. Id. at n.7.) The possessor need not possess the land to its highest and best use; the possession must be consistent with how a true owner would have possessed the land. See Jarvis v. Gillespie, 587 A.2d 981, 985 (Vt. 1991).

Abe has a strong case for adverse possession. His acts of possession were open in the sense that they were observable by anyone who looked. They continued for eleven years. His grants to others of permission to use the land suggest exclusivity. He paid taxes, although in most states this is not essential to establish a title by adverse possession. Lastly, his claim of right or hostility is evidenced by his entry under an invalid deed. It is irrelevant that he thought he was there rightfully under a valid deed because, in fact, the deed was invalid, and Owen could have ejected him at any time during the 10-year statutory period. Abe's acts of possession endured for eleven years, one year more than required to acquire a title by adverse possession in State B. His possession was also more active than Owen's, supporting the claim that it was consistent with how a true owner would have possessed the land. The fact that Abe did not build structures on the land, fence it, or post no-trespassing signs should not adversely affect his claim given that Owen, the previous owner, appears to have acted in the same way.

[NOTE: An applicant's conclusion is less important than his or her demonstrated mastery of the relevant legal principles and ability to utilize the facts.]

Point Three: (30-40%)

If Abe acquired title to Whiteacre by adverse possession, his claim to possession is good against a subsequent purchaser for value like Buyer despite his failure to record his interest. If Abe did not acquire title by adverse possession, Buyer's deed is controlling because Buyer had neither actual nor constructive notice of Abe's interest in Whiteacre when he purchased the property.

If Abe acquired title by adverse possession, that title is as good as a title traceable to a prior record owner; it is not lost because he allowed the property to go unoccupied. Thus if Abe acquired title by adverse possession (see Point Two), he is entitled to recover possession from Buyer.

The State B recording statute does not alter this result. Under the statute, a subsequent bona fide purchaser prevails against a prior donee or purchaser if the purchaser acquired the property without knowledge of the interest of the prior donee or purchaser. Statutes like this aim to protect subsequent purchasers against interest holders who could—but have failed to—record the documents describing their interests in the local land records office. In such a case, equity clearly favors the subsequent purchaser who took without notice of the prior interest. However, in the case of title acquired by adverse possession, there is no document that the interest holder could record. Courts have thus held that title acquired by adverse possession cannot be defeated by a later conveyance from the prior record title owner even if the land is vacant at the time the buyer purchases the land. See, e.g., Mugaas v. Smith, 206 P.2d 332 (Wash. 1949).

If Abe did not acquire title by adverse possession, then Buyer acquired title to the property from Doris, Owen's successor-in-interest. In that case, Buyer is entitled to possession because, given Abe's absence at the time Buyer purchased the property, Buyer had no actual or constructive notice of Abe's interest in the land.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS IV. A., B., D.; V. B.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Under what circumstances would Lender take the check free from Corporation's claim of ownership?
 - (2) Was Sam's fraudulent indorsement effective to negotiate the check to Lender and make Lender a holder?
 - (3) Did Lender give value for the check merely by reducing Sam's loan balance?
 - (4) Did Lender have notice of Corporation's claim to the check when it took the check in payment of a personal debt owed by Sam?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Lender will not be subject to Corporation's claim to the check because Lender is a holder in due course. Sam's forged indorsement of the check is treated as valid (as against Corporation) because Corporation gave Sam responsibility for handling its checks. Lender took the indorsed check in good faith. It also gave "value" for the check because it took it in payment for an antecedent debt. Finally, Lender had no notice of Corporation's claim to the check or of any other claim or defense that might be raised. Lender is therefore not obligated to return the check to Corporation.

[NOTE: The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) governs this problem. The American Law Institute and National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws approved a revision of UCC Article 1 in 2001 and approved amendments to UCC Article 3 in 2002 and 2003. This discussion cites the current revised and amended versions of these articles, but the problem has been designed so that the amendments do not affect the analysis.]

Point One: (20-30%)

Lender will be free of Corporation's claim if Lender took the check under circumstances that satisfy the requirements for being a holder in due course.

A check is a negotiable instrument, UCC § 3-104(f), and a "person taking an instrument . . . is subject to a claim of a property or possessory right in the instrument . . ." UCC § 3-306 (2003). In this case, Corporation was the original payee of the check, the check belonged to Corporation, and Corporation therefore has both a property and possessory right in the check. In most cases, Corporation would be able to assert this right and recover the check from a thief (e.g., Sam) or from a person who took the instrument from a thief (e.g., Lender).

However, a “claim of a property or possessory right in the instrument” may not be successfully asserted against a “person having rights of a holder in due course.” Id. Therefore, if Lender is a holder in due course of the check, Lender will not be subject to Corporation’s claim to the check. See American Parkinson Disease Ass’n, Inc. v. First Nat. Bank of Northfield, 584 N.W.2d 437, 441 (Minn. 1998) (holder in due course not subject to the claim of an organization from which the check was embezzled).

A “holder in due course” is a holder of a negotiable instrument who took the instrument in good faith, for value, and without notice of certain problems with respect to the instrument, including a claim to the instrument. UCC § 3-302(a)(2). The question stipulates that Lender took the check in good faith. Accordingly, whether Lender is a holder in due course depends on whether Lender is a holder of the check, whether Lender took the check for value, and whether Lender had notice of Corporation’s claim to the check. The following points address these issues, ultimately concluding that Lender is a holder in due course.

Point Two: (30-40%)

Lender is a holder of the check because a fraudulent indorsement of a check by an employee entrusted with responsibility with respect to the check is effective to negotiate the check.

Lender must be a “holder” of the check in order to be a holder in due course. A person can become a holder of a negotiable instrument by taking the instrument through the process of negotiation. See UCC § 1-201(b)(21)(A) (defining holder), § 3-201(a) (defining negotiation). Negotiation of an instrument payable to an identified person requires a transfer of possession of the instrument and the indorsement of the person to whom the instrument is payable. UCC § 3-201(b). In this case, the check was payable to Corporation, and possession was transferred to Lender. Therefore, if the check was indorsed by Corporation, Lender took the instrument through a negotiation and became a holder of the instrument.

Sam made an unauthorized indorsement of the check in the name of Corporation. Ordinarily, an unauthorized signature would not suffice to negotiate a check. UCC § 3-403(a). But an exception exists for unauthorized signatures made by an employee entrusted with responsibility for handling checks. The exception says: “if an employer entrusted an employee with responsibility with respect to the instrument and the employee . . . makes a fraudulent indorsement of the instrument, the indorsement is effective as the indorsement of the person to whom the instrument is payable if it is made in the name of that person.” UCC § 3-405(b). An employer may entrust an employee with responsibility with respect to a check in several ways, including giving the employee authority to handle the check “for deposit to an account.” UCC § 3-405(a)(3)(ii); see Cable Cast Magazine v. Premier Bank, Nat’l Ass’n, 729 So. 2d 1165, 1167 (La. Ct. App. 1999) (holding that a fraudulent indorsement by an employee who had authority to deposit checks was effective as the indorsement of the employer).

In this case, Corporation entrusted Sam with responsibility for the check because it authorized him to deposit it. Sam made a fraudulent indorsement of the check in the name of Corporation. This fraudulent indorsement therefore was effective as the indorsement of Corporation. Accordingly, the check was negotiated to Lender, and Lender became a holder of the check. The underlying policy is that the risk of unauthorized indorsement should fall upon Corporation because Corporation put Sam in a position that facilitated his commission of a forgery. Section 3-405(b) treats the fraudulent endorsement as effective only as to a person who took the instrument for value and in good faith. For a discussion of the value issue, see Point Three.

[NOTE: The facts stipulate that Lender took the instrument in good faith. Although the question asks only whether Lender must return the check to Corporation, some applicants might note that any loss caused by this fraud must be shared by Lender if Lender “fail[ed] to exercise ordinary care in . . . taking the instrument and that failure substantially contribute[d] to [the] loss” UCC § 3-405(b).]

Point Three: (15-25%)

An instrument is taken for value if it is taken in payment of an antecedent debt.

In order to be a holder in due course, Lender must have taken the check for “value.” UCC § 3-302(a)(2)(i). Section 3-303(a)(3) says that “[a]n instrument is issued or transferred for value if . . . the instrument is issued or transferred as payment of . . . an antecedent claim against any person, whether or not the claim is due.” In this case, Lender took the $3,000 check in payment of Sam’s antecedent mortgage debt. Therefore, even though Lender may not have given anything tangible to Sam, Lender still took the check for value. See Fedeli v. UAP/Ga. Ag. Chem., Inc., 514 S.E.2d 684, 690 (Ga. Ct. App. 1999) (holding that a lender who took checks in payment of an existing indebtedness gave “value” for the checks).

Point Four: (15-25%)

Lender did not have notice of Corporation’s claim to the check.

To be a holder in due course, Lender must take the check without notice of any claim to the check. UCC § 3-302(a).

The system of negotiability of checks presumes that checks will be transferred in payment of obligations by persons other than the original payees of the checks. Thus, there is nothing inherently suspicious about a person transferring an indorsed check that was not originally payable to that person. Indeed, the holder-in-due-course rule is designed to encourage persons and businesses like Lender to accept and transfer checks in this manner.

Lender had no knowledge of Sam’s fiduciary status; therefore, Lender cannot be charged with knowledge of Sam’s breach of a fiduciary duty. Cf. UCC § 3-307(b)(2) (notice of certain acts constituting breach of fiduciary obligation gives notice of represented person’s claim only where person taking an instrument from a fiduciary “has knowledge of the fiduciary status”). See Jelmoli Holding, Inc. v. Raymond James Financial Serv., Inc., 470 F.3d 14, 19 (1st Cir. 2006) (“plaintiff must show knowledge by the taker, and not just warning clues, that the person tendering the check is a fiduciary”); United Catholic Parish Schools of Beaver Dam Educ. Ass’n v. Card Serv. Ctr., 636 N.W.2d 206, 212-213 (Wis. Ct. App. 2001) (holding that the taker of an unauthorized check in payment of a personal debt did not have notice of a breach of a fiduciary duty because it did not have actual knowledge of any fiduciary relationship).

Thus, Lender is a holder in due course. It is a holder. It took the instrument in good faith and for value. And it did not have notice of Corporation’s claim to the instrument even though Sam was using the check to pay a personal debt. As a holder in due course, Lender is not subject to Corporation’s claim to the check.

[NOTE: Credit should be given for a reasonable discussion of the notice issue, regardless of the conclusion reached by the applicant.]

 - (3) How can Settlor ensure that trust assets are used so that Wife is comfortably provided for after his death?
 - (4) How can Settlor ensure that assets remaining in the trust after Wife's death go to their children and give Wife the power to reward the children in her will?
 - (5) How can Settlor ensure that issue of a child who predeceases Wife will take the deceased child's share of trust principal?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A redlined draft of the trust instrument showing alterations that would better meet Settlor's stated goals follows:

SETTLOR TRUST AGREEMENT

1. I appoint ~~Bank~~ Settlor as trustee of the Settlor Trust and, upon Settlor's death, I appoint Bank as trustee.
2. I reserve the right to revoke this trust at any time, by deed or will.
3. I reserve the right to withdraw and add assets to this trust at any time, by deed or will.
24. I direct ~~Bank~~ the trustee to hold all assets listed on Schedule A in trust and to dispose of these assets as follows:
 - a. Bank Settlor, as trustee, shall pay all trust income to Settlor during Settlor's lifetime.
 - b. After Settlor's death, Bank, as trustee, shall pay such trust income and principal to Wife ~~in such amounts as Bank, in its sole discretion, deems appropriate~~ as is necessary to comfortably provide for her support and maintenance.
 - c. Wife shall have the right to withdraw trust principal as is necessary to comfortably provide for her support and maintenance.
 - d. After Wife's death, Bank shall distribute all remaining trust assets to such one or more of Settlor's issue as Wife shall appoint by will. If Wife does not exercise her power of appointment, Bank shall distribute all remaining trust assets equally among Settlor's surviving children, share and share alike, provided, however, that if any child of Settlor predeceases Wife leaving issue surviving, the share of the deceased child shall be paid to that child's issue.

35. ~~Bank~~ Settlor accepts and agrees to faithfully carry out the terms of this trust.
[Signatures, dates, and acknowledgments are omitted]

SCHEDULE A

12,000 Shares of XYZ Corporation common stock
$150,000 (cash)

[NOTE: This new draft does not necessarily represent the best method of meeting Settlor's stated goals, but it does respond to the most obvious deficiencies in Attorney's draft.]

Point One: (20-30%)

Because Settlor wants to retain full control of trust assets, he should retain a power of revocation. To give Settlor more control, he might be also given a right of withdrawal and be named sole trustee.

In some states an inter vivos trust is revocable unless the instrument expressly provides otherwise (see UNIF. TRUST CODE § 602(a)), but in most jurisdictions it is irrevocable unless the instrument expressly provides otherwise. Thus a well-drafted trust instrument should always expressly state whether it is revocable or irrevocable.

Here Settlor told Attorney: "I want to fully control trust assets . . . until I die." An irrevocable trust is incompatible with this aim. To ensure that Settlor has the power to revoke as part of a testamentary plan as well as during his lifetime, the revocation clause should expressly provide that it can be exercised by deed or will.

Additional control could be conferred upon Settlor through a retained right of withdrawal. This power would enable Settlor to withdraw assets from the trust without revoking it.

Finally, Settlor could be named sole trustee with Bank the successor trustee. This step would give Settlor complete control of the management and administration of the trust.

Point Two: (10-15%)

Because Settlor contemplated the possibility of adding assets to the trust, the trust should have an additions clause.

As a general proposition, a trustee's duties cannot be unilaterally enlarged by the settlor after the trustee has accepted the office. See UNIF. TRUST CODE § 801 (providing that "[u]pon acceptance of a trusteeship, the trustee shall administer the trust in good faith, in accordance with its terms and purposes . . ."). Thus a well-drafted trust instrument should contain an additions clause if the settlor contemplates enlarging the trustee's responsibilities by augmenting the trust with additional assets. (Even then, however, a trustee may be able to reject additions. See, e.g., UNIF. TRUST CODE § 816.)

Point Three: (20-30%)

Because Settlor wanted to ensure that Wife would be comfortably provided for the trust instrument should require distribution in accordance with an ascertainable standard relating to Wife's maintenance and support, and Wife should be granted a withdrawal power.

Settlor specified that he wanted Wife “to be comfortably provided for.” Granting the trustee discretionary power to distribute income and principal to Wife cannot ensure this result because a beneficiary cannot compel a trustee to distribute trust property not otherwise subject to a standard unless he or she can show an abuse of discretion. See UNIF. TRUST CODE § 504(d). An ascertainable standard, such as “comfortable maintenance and support,” sets bounds on the trustee’s discretion and would empower Wife to compel distributions from the trust if necessary.

To further ensure that Wife is comfortably provided for, she could be given a right to withdraw trust principal. Such a power could be unconditional or, as in the revised instrument, might be limited to withdrawals necessary to ensure her comfortable support.

[NOTE: Unconditional withdrawal powers are often limited to $5,000 or 5 percent of trust principal in order to obtain tax advantages.]

Point Four: (15-25%)

Because Settlor wanted to leave trust principal to his children and to enable Wife “to use trust assets as a way of rewarding, in her will, whichever children have been most helpful,” and also expressed a desire that the descendants of a deceased child should take by substitution, Wife should have been given a special testamentary power of appointment. This power should extend to issue, not just children, to enable Wife to appoint to more remote descendants.

Settlor expressed the desire that his children take remaining trust principal and that Wife have the right to reward their children in her will. He also expressed a desire to have a deceased child’s descendants take the deceased child’s share. To accomplish these goals, Wife should have been given a special testamentary power of appointment. Such a power would enable Wife to favor some children over others, as Settlor wants. But because the exercise of a special power is limited to the group selected by the donor of the power (here, Settlor), Wife could not appoint trust assets to individuals other than Settlor’s issue. The special power would both ensure that trust assets ultimately go to Settlor’s children or more remote descendants and give Wife control. Exercise of a power can also be restricted, as Settlor has specified, to testamentary bequests. No other drafting tool can fully meet all of Settlor’s goals. As drafted, Wife could appoint to a grandchild even if the grandchild’s parent was alive. This could be avoided, if Settlor desired, by providing: “After Wife’s death, Bank shall distribute all remaining trust assets to such one or more of the Settlor’s children and issue of deceased children as Wife”

[NOTE: The word “issue” gives Wife the power to appoint to children as well as more remote descendants. This allows Wife the power, consistent with Settlor’s intent, to give the property to the descendants of the deceased child. (See Point Five.)]

Point Five: (10-20%)

Because Settlor wanted the issue of any deceased child to take his parent’s share of trust assets, the trust instrument should have so specified.

Settlor stated that, “if Son dies before Wife, I’d want his share to go to Grandchild.” Although Settlor did not specify that he would want surviving issue to take the shares of his other children, it’s likely that he focused on Son because Son was the only child to have a child.

In many jurisdictions, the instrument drafted by Attorney will not accomplish the aim of ensuring that surviving issue take their deceased parents’ shares. Many state anti-lapse statutes apply only to testamentary bequests, and the Settlor Trust was established during Settlor’s lifetime. Thus the trust instrument should expressly state that issue take a deceased parent’s share.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) Can the members of an LLC maintain a direct action against the manager of the LLC for mismanagement of the LLC?
 - (1)(b) Can the members of an LLC maintain a derivative action against the manager of the LLC for mismanagement of the LLC?
 - (2) Were Art's actions a breach of his fiduciary duty of care as the manager of LLC?
 - (3) Can Peter pierce the veil of limited liability of LLC and hold any or all of its members liable for LLC's debt?

DISCUSSION

Summary

If Brett and Chad bring an action against Art for mismanagement of LLC, that action must be a derivative (not direct) action because the harm Brett and Chad suffered was derivative of the injury Art caused LLC. To bring a derivative action, Brett and Chad must comply with the procedural requirements set forth in the Uniform Limited Liability Company Act (ULLCA). These requirements typically mandate a demand upon the managing partner before initiating an action. However, here demand is likely to be excused because Art is unlikely to bring an action against himself.

If Brett and Chad bring a derivative action, they are likely to lose. Under the ULLCA, Art would be liable for a breach of the duty of care only if he acted in a grossly negligent or reckless manner. In jurisdictions that have not adopted the ULLCA, Art would be protected by the business judgment rule.

Most LLC statutes provide that neither members nor managers are personally liable for the debts of an LLC. Courts generally recognize the equitable concept of piercing the veil of limited liability of an LLC. However, the facts in this case do not seem to provide a basis for piercing, and Peter probably cannot recover from Art, Brett, or Chad.

Point One(a): (15-25%)

Members of an LLC cannot maintain a direct action against the manager of the LLC for mismanagement of the LLC.

Members of a manager-managed LLC do not have the right to maintain a direct action against the manager of the LLC when the alleged misconduct caused harm only to the LLC. See Wright v. Herman, 230 F.R.D. 1, 10 (2005) (overwhelming majority rule that a claim for an injury to a corporate entity against a manager or officer must be brought derivatively). The operating agreement provides that Art manages LLC. Therefore, this is a manager-managed LLC. It does not matter that Art is also a member of LLC.

Here, the harms that Art caused—failing to manage the business profitably and failing to insure the business properly—were harms to the business and reputation of LLC, not harms directly to Brett and Chad. Because the harms were derivative, not direct, Brett and Chad may not bring a direct action against Art.

[NOTE: If Art breached a contractual obligation to Brett and Chad, they could maintain a direct action against Art. ULLCA § 410(a)(1) permits a member to sue the LLC or another member to enforce the member’s rights under the operating agreement. The facts do not suggest that any violation of the operating agreement occurred.]

Point One(b): (15-25%)

Members of an LLC can maintain a derivative action against the manager of the LLC for mismanagement of the LLC. Normally, members must make a demand on the manager to bring the action. Here, however, demand will likely be excused.

Members of an LLC can maintain a derivative action against the manager of the LLC for mismanagement of the LLC. In order to maintain such an action members must normally first make a demand that the manager bring the action and allege in their complaint the efforts that they made to “secure initiation of the action by [the] . . . manager or the reasons for not making the effort.” ULLCA §1103. Here, however, it is likely that demand would be excused, as Art would have to agree to bring an action against himself. Obviously, this demand would be futile. Therefore, Brett and Chad probably could bring a derivative action without first making a demand on Art, although that action would likely fail. (See Point Two.)

Point Two: (20-30%)

Simple negligence does not constitute a violation of a manager’s fiduciary duty of care to the LLC.

Under the ULLCA, managers (or members in a member-managed LLC) owe a duty of care to the LLC, but they are not liable for simple negligence. ULLCA § 409(c) provides that the duty of care consists of “refraining from engaging in grossly negligent conduct or reckless conduct, intentional misconduct, or a knowing violation of law.” Under this standard, the question would be whether Art’s failure to manage LLC profitably and to insure the business rose to the level of gross negligence or reckless conduct.

Some state statutes reject the gross negligence standard of the ULLCA and impose an ordinary negligence standard for evaluating breaches of an LLC manager’s duty of care. Where that is the case, however, the business judgment rule may be applied to protect LLC managers from liability for business decisions made in good faith. See Elizabeth Miller and Thomas E. Rutledge, The Duty of Finest Loyalty and Reasonable Decisions: The Business Judgment Rule in Unincorporated Business Organizations, 30 DEL. J. CORP. L. 343, 366-68 (2005). See also Revised Uniform Limited Liability Company Act § 409(c) (2006) (adopting an ordinary negligence standard but making an LLC manager's liability for breach of the duty of care subject to the business judgment rule).

Although the precise operation and content of the business judgment rule will vary from state to state, its impact is to shield managers from liability for business decisions. Brehm v. Eisner, 746 A.2d 244, 264 n.66 (Del. 2000). Under this rule, a court will not second-guess a manager's decision, even if the decision was a bad one, if the manager acted "on an informed basis, in good faith, and in the honest belief that the action taken was in the best interests of the company." Aronson v. Lewis, 473 A.2d 805, 812 (Del. 1984).

Under any of these tests, Art is unlikely to be held liable for the fact that LLC's business failed. The mere fact that LLC was unprofitable does not indicate that Art violated his duty of care. Many businesses operate unprofitably, and no facts suggest that Art was either grossly negligent (as required by the ULLCA) or even negligent in his general operation of LLC's business. In addition, in those jurisdictions that apply a negligence standard, Art would also have the protection of the business judgment rule, and there are no facts to suggest that Art behaved in a way that would take his decisions outside the scope of that rule.

On the other hand, Art is arguably liable for his failure to insure LLC. His failure to sign the insurance premium payment check was clearly negligent and could be characterized as grossly negligent. What's more, in a jurisdiction that imposed an ordinary negligence standard, the business judgment rule might not protect Art from liability for this sort of breach of the duty of care. Generally, the business judgment rule protects business managers from liability for their good faith business decisions; it does not protect them from liability for negligent failures to perform ministerial acts such as signing corporate checks.

[NOTE: An applicant may note that Art is subject to a duty to act in good faith. The ULLCA includes an obligation of good faith and fair dealing among the statutory duties of a manager. See §409(d). The facts, however, suggest that Art did act in good faith; thus, Brett and Chad could not maintain a claim for a breach of this duty.]

Point Three: (30-40%)

To pierce the veil of an LLC and hold the members personally liable, a claimant must demonstrate either that the LLC was a mere instrumentality of the individual defendants or that there was a unity of interest and ownership between the LLC and the individual defendants. Here, it is unlikely that Peter can pierce the veil of LLC.

Ordinarily, members of an LLC are not liable for the debts, obligations, or liabilities of an LLC "solely by reason of being or acting as a member." ULLCA §303. However, either by statute, see, e.g., Minn. Stat. § 322B.303(2), or by judicial decision, see, e.g., Kaycee Land & Livestock

v. Flahive, 46 P.3d 323 (Wy. 2002), most states to consider the issue have recognized the possibility of piercing the veil of limited liability of an LLC, under appropriate circumstances.

Courts that pierce the veil rely on various theories to do so. Two of the most prominent are the “mere instrumentality” and “unity of interest and ownership” theories. See, e.g., Litchfield Asset Mgmt. Corp. v. Howell, 799 A.2d 298 (Conn. App. Ct. 2002).

Under the “mere instrumentality” test, Peter would have to show that (1) the members dominated the entity in such a way that LLC had no will of its own, (2) the members used that domination to commit a fraud or wrong, and (3) the control and wrongful action proximately caused the injury complained of.

Under the “unity of interest and ownership” test, Peter must demonstrate that there was such a unity of interest and ownership between the entity and the members that, in fact, LLC did not have an existence independent of the members and that failure to pierce through to the members would be unjust or inequitable.

Whereas a failure to follow formalities in the operation of the corporation is a factor in corporate veil piercing cases, it is less frequently relevant in LLC cases. This is because many LLC statutes, including the Uniform Limited Liability Company Act, provide explicitly that “the failure of a limited liability company to observe the usual company formalities . . . is not a ground for imposing personal liability on the members or managers.” ULLCA § 303(b). However, in the absence of a statutory bar, some courts will cite a failure to follow formalities in the LLC context as part of the rationale for piercing the LLC veil. See, e.g., Bonner v. Brunson, 585 S.E.2d 917 (Ga. Ct. App. 2003).

The decision to pierce the LLC veil is highly fact dependent. The factors that are most likely to lead to an affirmative decision to pierce the veil are facts suggesting that the LLC was simply the “alter ego” of the owners, evidence of serious undercapitalization of the company, or a lack of substantive separation between the business of the company and the personal business of the owners. See Rapp, Preserving LLC Veil Piercing: A Response to Bainbridge, 31 IOWA J. CORP. L. 1063 (2006).

Under any of these tests, it seems probable that neither Brett nor Chad could be held liable for the liabilities of LLC as they had no authority to act on behalf of LLC. As to the “mere instrumentality” test, neither Brett nor Chad dominated LLC in a way that it became a “mere instrumentality.” As to the “unity of interest” test, there was not, in any sense, a unity of interest and ownership between Brett and Chad and LLC.

The case against Art may appear stronger, because Art may have dominated LLC, but it is still not likely that Peter could prevail. Under the mere instrumentality test, even if Peter could show that Art dominated LLC, it is not likely that Peter would be able to prove that Art used his domination to commit a fraud or wrong. Although Art sent in the insurance premium without signing the check, this negligence is not sufficiently wrongful to justify piercing the limited liability shield. Under the unity test, Peter could not show that Art had a “unity of interest in ownership with LLC” because Chad and Brett had substantial interests in LLC. Although it might be argued that LLC was undercapitalized because it could not meet its obligations, its initial capitalization was substantial ($100,000), and there are no facts to suggest that amount would not have been sufficient capitalization for a business of this sort had it been run more effectively (and had Art purchased insurance as intended).

Preface

This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2008 and July 2008 Multistate Essay Examinations. Each test includes nine questions; most jurisdictions that use the MEE select the six questions their applicants will answer.

The model analyses to the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. These models are not an official grading guide. Some jurisdictions grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses as they wish, including the suggested weights given to particular points. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topic or topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by Roman numerals which refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that topic. For example, Question 1 on the February 2008 MEE tested Decedents' Estates I.B.; II.J.3., I. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet and can also be found at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE is a three-hour examination consisting of six questions. The examination is administered in one continuous three-hour time period. Applicants are expected to spend approximately thirty minutes answering each of the questions. The areas of law covered by the questions in the examination are: Agency and Partnership, Commercial Paper, Conflict of Laws, Corporations and Limited Liability Companies, Decedents' Estates, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Sales, Secured Transactions, and Trusts and Future Interests. Some questions include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You will have three hours in which to write your answers to the six questions contained in this booklet. Each question is designed to be answered in 30 minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions to follow.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show: an understanding of the facts; a recognition of the issues included; a knowledge of the applicable principles of law; and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Your jurisdiction may instruct you to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

February 2008
Questions

MEE Question 1

Six years ago, Testator retired from his work as a business executive. Testator continued to serve as a trustee of several nonprofit organizations and manage all of his own financial affairs. He maintained these activities until his death.

Five years ago, Testator hired a housekeeper, Harriet.

Four years ago, Harriet began to ask Testator to provide for her in his will. She also began to interfere with Testator's relationship with his daughter, Doris. When Doris called, Harriet sometimes falsely told her that Testator was sleeping and could not talk on the phone. When Doris came to visit Testator, Harriet often stayed in the room to overhear their conversations. Harriet also made critical remarks about Doris to Testator and told him that Doris should visit him more regularly.

On a number of occasions, Harriet threatened to quit if Testator did not provide for her in his will. These threats made Testator fearful, particularly during the last year of his life when his declining health made him increasingly dependent on Harriet.

Six months ago, Harriet again threatened to quit if Testator did not provide for her in his will and told Testator that he should see her attorney. Testator told Harriet: "Stop bugging me. I'll see my own attorney."

Three months ago, Testator executed a will in accordance with the applicable statute of wills. The will was drafted by Testator's attorney pursuant to Testator's handwritten instructions.

The will specified as follows:

"I leave my estate in equal shares to my housekeeper, Harriet, and my daughter, Doris."

This is the only will Testator ever executed.

Testator recently died at age 78. Testator left a substantial estate.

Both Harriet and Doris survived Testator. Testator was also survived by a son (Sam), a grandchild (Ella), who was the child of Doris, and a grandchild (Fred), who was the child of Testator's son, Bob. Both Testator's spouse and Bob predeceased Testator. Testator and Sam had been estranged for several years prior to the time of Testator's death.

1. Is the will invalid in whole or in part? Explain.
2. Assuming the will is invalid in whole, to whom and in what shares should Testator's estate be distributed? Explain.
3. Assuming the will is invalid in part, to whom and in what shares should Testator's estate be distributed? Explain.

MEE Question 2

Last month, Paul attended a fund-raising lunch at Library, where he purchased and ate a chicken salad sandwich. Later that day, he became severely ill and was diagnosed with food poisoning. As a result of the food poisoning, Paul developed a permanent digestive disorder.

Several other people also became sick after eating at the lunch, and the Health Department determined that the chicken salad was contaminated with salmonella bacteria. According to the Health Department, raw chicken often contains salmonella bacteria. Although the risk of salmonella contamination cannot be eliminated, proper preparation and cooking can ensure that the chicken is safe for eating. The chicken must be thoroughly cooked, and all utensils or surfaces that come in contact with raw chicken must be thoroughly cleaned with hot water and soap before further use.

The Reading Club had initiated and planned the Library's first and only fund-raising lunch. Ann, Bill, and Chuck independently volunteered to make the chicken salad. Each made a separate batch of salad, using their own recipes and working individually at their own homes. Another volunteer combined the three batches of salad at Library, and a Library employee sold sandwiches at the lunch. All lunch profits went to Library.

Ann, Bill, and Chuck each purchased their chicken from Supermarket. The chicken was contained in packages labeled with a prominent warning describing the risk of salmonella contamination and the precautions necessary to avoid those risks.

A Health Department spokesperson has said that "Someone who made the chicken salad did not take proper precautions." Ann, Bill, and Chuck all claim they took the proper precautions.

Paul has consulted an attorney about bringing a tort action against: 1) Library, 2) Supermarket, and 3) Ann, Bill, and Chuck. If Paul can prove only the facts outlined above:

1. Can Library be found liable to Paul under a strict liability theory? Explain.
2. Can Supermarket be found liable to Paul under a strict liability theory? Explain.
3. Can Ann, Bill, and Chuck be found liable to Paul under either a strict liability or negligence theory? Explain.

MEE Question 3

Husband and Wife married 10 years ago. Shortly thereafter, Husband adopted Wife's two children, Amy, age 6, and Bert, age 9. Neither Amy nor Bert has ever had a relationship with their biological father.

One year ago, Husband and Wife were divorced. The divorce decree provided that:

- (1) Husband shall pay Wife $1,000 per month in child support for Amy until Amy is 18 years old;
- (2) Husband shall pay child support in the form of college tuition up to $20,000 per year for both Amy and Bert.

Three months ago, Husband stopped making support payments for Amy and college tuition payments for Bert. Husband stopped paying for two reasons:

First, Husband was disinclined to continue supporting Amy and Bert, now ages 16 and 19, respectively. Since the divorce, Husband has quarreled frequently with both children. Bert also disobeyed Husband and joined a rock band that plays at a local bar four nights per week. Since joining the band, Bert's college grades slipped from A's to C's, and he was arrested for driving while intoxicated. Bert has refused Husband's requests that he leave the band and devote more time to study.

Second, Husband, who formerly worked 40 to 60 hours per week, is now working only 10 to 20 hours per week so that he can finish writing a novel. Husband has worked on the novel sporadically over the past few years, but has not had time to complete it. Husband's current income is only 25% of what it was when he was employed full time.

Wife, who works full time at the job she has held since her marriage to Husband, has neither reduced nor increased her income since the divorce. Since Husband stopped paying support, she has been borrowing money to meet the family's expenses.

Wife recently filed a petition to obtain a judgment against Husband for the child-support arrears and Bert's tuition. Husband responded with a petition seeking:

- (1) a dissolution of his adoption of Amy and Bert on the basis of irreconcilable differences;
- (2) downward modification of all of his support obligations, on account of his reduced income, retroactive to the date on which Husband stopped making support and tuition payments; and
- (3) a declaration that Husband need not pay Bert's college tuition so long as Bert continues to perform in a rock band.

The age of majority in the state is 18. The trial court entered judgment in favor of Wife and denied Husband's petition in all respects.

Did the trial court err? Explain.

MEE Question 4

Victor was taken by ambulance to a hospital. Standard hospital practice requires the admitting nurse in the emergency room to record all information provided by a patient about the cause of the patient's illness or injury. Following that practice, the admitting nurse, Nurse, asked Victor: "What happened?" Victor responded: "I was stabbed with a big knife. Dan did it." Nurse immediately wrote Victor's statement in the appropriate place in the hospital record.

One week after his hospital admission, Victor unexpectedly died as a result of the stab wound. Dan was charged with Victor's murder.

When Victor's wife, Wife, heard of Dan's arrest, she was shocked. She told Friend, "When Victor and I were alone together in the hospital, he told me who stabbed him, and it wasn't Dan!" But Wife refused to tell Friend whom Victor had identified as his assailant.

During the trial, in order to prove that Dan stabbed Victor, the prosecutor offered the hospital record made by Nurse that contained Victor's statement that Dan stabbed him. The prosecutor cannot locate Nurse to testify at trial. Defense counsel objected to admission of the hospital record and the statements in it, but the court overruled the objection.

During the presentation of Dan's case, defense counsel suggested that Victor had been attacked by Stepson, Wife's child by a previous marriage. Defense counsel called Wife as a witness and questioned her concerning Victor's statement to her about the identity of his assailant. Wife refused to answer on the basis of the marital privilege. The prosecutor objected to the questions directed to Wife on the grounds that they sought to elicit hearsay. The court sustained both Wife's claim of privilege and the prosecutor's hearsay objection.

1. Did the trial court err in admitting into evidence the hospital record containing Victor's statement? Explain.
2. Did the trial court err in sustaining Wife's claim of privilege? Explain.
3. Did the trial court err in sustaining the prosecutor's hearsay objection to Wife's testimony? Explain.

MEE Question 5

Cal is the CEO and chairman of the 12-member board of directors of Prime, Inc. (Prime). Three other members of Prime's board of directors (the Board) are also senior officers of Prime. The remaining eight members of the Board are wholly independent directors.

Recently, the Board decided to hire a consulting firm to help Prime market a new product. The Board met to consider whether to hire Wiseman Consulting (Wiseman) or Smart Group (Smart). The Board first heard from a representative of Wiseman. The Wiseman representative described some of the projects Wiseman had completed for other clients and outlined the work it proposed to do for Prime for $500,000. The Board then heard from a representative of Smart, another consulting firm. The Smart representative described a similar work plan and stated that Smart's proposed fee was $650,000. Either of these amounts would be a significant outlay for Prime.

After the Board heard both presentations, Cal disclosed to the Board that he had a 25% partnership interest in Smart. Cal stated that he would not be involved in any work to be performed by Smart for Prime. He knew but did not disclose to the Board that Smart's proposed fee for this consulting assignment was substantially higher than it normally charged for comparable work. The Board did not ask about the basis for Smart's proposed fee.

After receiving all of this information, and no other information, the Board discussed the relative merits of the two proposals for 10 minutes. The Board then voted unanimously (Cal abstaining) to hire Smart, even though hiring Smart would cost Prime approximately 30% more than hiring Wiseman. Cal was present throughout the meeting but did not participate except to the extent indicated above.

1. Did Cal violate his duty of loyalty to Prime? Explain.
2. Assuming Cal breached his duty of loyalty to Prime, does he have any defense to liability? Explain.
3. Did the directors of Prime, other than Cal, violate their duty of care? Explain.

MEE Question 6

Plaintiff worked for Corporation. In her fifth year of employment, Plaintiff complained that she had been passed over for promotion to a management position in favor of a less experienced male colleague. Shortly after voicing her discontent, Plaintiff was fired. Plaintiff sued Corporation in federal district court alleging that she was fired because of sex discrimination in violation of federal law. Corporation filed an answer denying the material allegations of the complaint and alleging that Plaintiff was fired for inadequate work performance.

During voir dire, the court asked each prospective juror whether he or she had ever been a party to an employment discrimination lawsuit. None of the prospective jurors answered in the affirmative.

At trial, Plaintiff offered evidence to support her claim that she had been fired for discriminatory reasons. Her evidence included testimony by a former co-worker relating a conversation the co-worker had had with Plaintiff's supervisor. In the conversation, the supervisor reportedly said that women were ill-suited for managerial positions and that men didn't like taking orders from women.

At the close of Plaintiff's evidence, Corporation moved for judgment as a matter of law (JMOL). The court denied the motion. Corporation then submitted its own evidence. The evidence consisted primarily of Plaintiff's employment records and testimony by Plaintiff's supervisor, who testified that Plaintiff's work had been rated unsatisfactory several times in the past.

At the close of all the evidence, neither party made further motions. After instructions from the court, the case was submitted to the jury. The jury deliberated for several hours and then returned a verdict for Plaintiff. The jury specifically found that Plaintiff had been passed over for promotion and fired as the result of sex discrimination and that she was entitled to backpay and reinstatement.

Two days after the entry of judgment, Corporation learned for the first time that the jury foreperson had previously filed and lost two employment discrimination lawsuits and that, upon learning she was part of the jury pool in this case, had said to a friend, "I'm going to get on that jury and stick it to Corporation. Somebody needs to teach these companies not to discriminate."

Eight days after the entry of judgment, Corporation moved for a post-judgment JMOL or, in the alternative, for a new trial. Corporation made two arguments. First, Corporation claimed that the evidence it presented at trial regarding the reasons for Plaintiff's termination was more persuasive and more credible than Plaintiff's evidence. Second, Corporation claimed that a new trial is required because of the jury foreperson's failure to disclose during voir dire her prior involvement in employment discrimination lawsuits.

The trial judge believes that Corporation's evidence at trial was more credible and persuasive than Plaintiff's. The trial judge also believes that Corporation's information about the jury foreperson's prior experiences and her statements to her friend is credible and suggestive of possible juror bias.

1. Was Corporation's motion for a post-judgment JMOL procedurally proper? Explain.
2. Without regard to its procedural propriety, should the trial court grant Corporation's motion for a post-judgment JMOL? Explain.
3. Should the trial court grant Corporation's motion for a new trial on the ground that Corporation's evidence was more persuasive and credible than Plaintiff's evidence? Explain.
4. Should the trial court grant Corporation's motion for a new trial because of the jury foreperson's conduct? Explain.

MEE Question 7

On October 1, Dart Corporation (DC), a State A corporation, borrowed $300,000 from State Bank, a State A bank. On behalf of DC, DC's president signed a written security agreement giving State Bank a security interest in DC's State Bank checking account (a demand account) to secure its obligation to repay the loan. State Bank did not file a financing statement reflecting that interest.

On December 1, First Bank, another State A bank, agreed to loan $60,000 to DC. DC's president, on behalf of DC, signed a written security agreement granting First Bank a security interest in all of DC's "office equipment and deposit accounts." First Bank immediately advanced $60,000 to DC and filed a financing statement reflecting its interest.

First Bank's financing statement was filed in the correct filing office in State A and listed the collateral as "office equipment and deposit accounts." It correctly identified First Bank as the secured party, and it correctly gave the address of the debtor as "123 Smith Street, City, State A." However, First Bank's financing statement incorrectly listed the name of the debtor as "Dart Incorporated," rather than "Dart Corporation," the correct name of the company as reflected on its certificate of incorporation and other public records. Despite this error, a search under the name "Dart Corporation" using the State A filing office's standard search logic would turn up the financing statement listing "Dart Incorporated" as the debtor.

Shortly after receiving the loan from First Bank, DC defaulted on the obligations it owed to State Bank and First Bank.

On December 23, State Bank obtained a judgment against DC in connection with its unpaid $300,000 loan.

On January 3 of the following year, a State A sheriff levied on DC's office equipment on behalf of State Bank.

1. As between First Bank and State Bank, which has a superior claim to DC's checking account at State Bank? Explain.
2. As between First Bank and State Bank, which has a superior claim to DC's office equipment? Explain.

MEE Question 8

On April 10, a convenience store was robbed by someone carrying a gun. The store's video camera caught the robbery on tape. The tape was shown on the evening news.

On April 11, an anonymous caller contacted the police saying, "I saw that tape of the robbery. The robber kind of looks like Student. He's an 18-year-old student at the high school."

On April 12, two police officers took the tape to the high school and showed it to the principal, who said, "It could be Student. It's hard to tell because the tape is not clear." The tape was also shown to Student's homeroom teacher, who said, "It might be him, but I couldn't say for sure."

Later that day, the police officers went to the store where Student works after school. They asked the manager if they could talk with Student, who was called to the manager's office. The police introduced themselves to Student and said, "We'd like to talk to you." They walked with Student into the manager's office and shut the door. One police officer sat behind the manager's desk; the other, in full uniform with his revolver visible, sat near the door. Student sat between them. The manager's office measures eight feet by ten feet.

The police officers told Student they wanted to ask him some questions about the convenience store robbery on April 10. Student said he knew nothing about a robbery. He continued to deny that he had any knowledge of the robbery for about 20 minutes. Student did not ask to leave, and neither police officer told Student he was free to leave.

After about 20 minutes, the police officers told Student that they had a videotape of the robbery and that they had shown it to three people, all of whom positively identified Student as the robber.

Student said nothing for a few minutes. One of the police officers then said, "You know, if we can tell the prosecutor that you cooperated, she might go a lot easier on you. I'd hate to see you end up doing a long stretch in prison. Let's just say it's not a nice place." Student then blurted out, "I did the robbery. I used a little air gun."

Immediately after Student made that statement, the police officers informed Student that he was under arrest for the robbery of the convenience store. They read him his Miranda rights. Student stated he understood his Miranda rights and told the police officers that he was not going to say anything more to them. The police officers placed Student in handcuffs and took him to the police station where he was booked for armed robbery.

Student had had two earlier brushes with the law. When he was 16, he had been found delinquent in juvenile court for auto theft and had been placed on supervision for one year. When he was 17, he had received a ticket for underage drinking and had paid a fine of $150. He is a "C" student, but his teachers believe he is an "underachiever."

Student's defense attorney has filed a motion to suppress Student's statements on three grounds:

- (1) Student's statements were obtained in violation of Student's Fourth Amendment rights.
- (2) Student's statements were obtained in violation of his Miranda rights.
- (3) Student's confession was not voluntary.

How should the trial court rule on each of the grounds in the motion to suppress? Explain.

MEE Question 9

Six years ago, Settlor created a valid inter vivos irrevocable trust. Settlor funded the trust with publicly traded securities, named Friend as sole trustee, and directed Friend, as trustee, to distribute all trust income to James, whom Settlor had been supporting for several years. Settlor also gave James the right to withdraw up to 5% of the trust's principal annually during the first 10 years of the trust's existence.

Four years ago, Friend sold all of the trust's publicly traded securities and reinvested 45% of the proceeds in the preferred stock of A Corp., 45% of the proceeds in the preferred stock of B Corp., and 10% of the proceeds in different publicly traded securities. Both A Corp. and B Corp. were closely held companies that were newly organized and cash poor. Their preferred stocks were not publicly traded and were subject to valid restraints on alienation that effectively made them nontransferable by the trustee for the next 10 years. Furthermore, although both preferred stocks guaranteed an annual 5% dividend, these dividends were not payable until after the 10-year restraint-on-alienation period had expired.

At the time Friend invested in the preferred stocks of A Corp. and B Corp., both companies were developing competing technologies to make ballpoint pens that also function as cell phones. Neither company had yet developed working prototypes of the proposed product. Friend honestly believed that the preferred stocks represented a safe investment that would produce returns in excess of those available from any other investment. Friend did not individually own any preferred stock of A Corp. or B Corp. However, Friend did individually own 70% of the common stock of A Corp., but had no interest in B Corp.

Despite Friend's confidence, the A Corp. and B Corp. investments have proven disastrous. Since the preferred stocks were purchased, neither company has succeeded in producing a marketable product or making a profit. Both are now near bankruptcy. Moreover, because the stocks have not paid dividends and cannot be sold, James's income from the trust has declined precipitously. Furthermore, because of the valid restraints on alienation, Friend has truthfully told James that any withdrawal requests cannot be honored.

Friend has consulted your law firm, concerned that he may have breached one or more of his fiduciary duties. Explain to Friend which duties, if any, he may have breached in carrying out his responsibilities.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES I.B.; II.J.3., I

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Harriet unduly influence Testator to make her a beneficiary under his will?
 - (2) If Harriet unduly influenced Testator, is his will partially or entirely invalid?
 - (3) To whom should Testator's estate be distributed if:
 - (a) the will is entirely invalid?
 - (b) the will is partially invalid?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Testator's will is invalid, in whole or in part, if it was the product of undue influence. Here, the facts are not conclusive, but may support an undue influence finding. If the will is valid, the estate will pass in equal shares to Harriet and Doris.

If the bequest to Harriet was the product of undue influence, the court may invalidate the entire will or only Harriet's bequest. If the entire will is invalidated, the estate would pass under the laws of intestate succession: Doris, Sam, and Fred, who would take as the representative of his deceased parent, Bob, would take equal 1/3 shares.

If only the bequest to Harriet is invalidated, one-half of the estate would pass to Doris under the will and the remaining half would pass either to Doris as the remaining residuary legatee or, if the common law "no residue of a residue" rule is applied, to Doris, Sam, and Fred under the laws of intestate succession. In that case, Doris would take 2/3 of the estate, and Sam and Fred would each take 1/6.

Point One: (35–45%)

The court may find that Testator's will, in whole or in part, was the product of Harriet's undue influence.

If a will or portion of a will is the product of undue influence, it may be set aside. Undue influence occurs when the "wrongdoer exerted such influence over the [testator] that it overcame the [testator's] free will and caused the [testator] to make a donative transfer that the [testator] would not otherwise have made." RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY (WILLS AND OTHER DONATIVE TRANSFERS) § 8.3(b) (2003). The burden of establishing undue influence is on the will contestant, who must show that: (1) the testator was susceptible to undue influence, (2) the alleged wrongdoer had the opportunity to exert undue influence upon the testator, (3) the alleged wrongdoer had a disposition to exert undue influence, and (4) the will appears to be the product of undue influence. Id. at cmt. e. Undue influence may be established by circumstantial evidence. See generally Estate of Kamesar, 259 N.W.2d 733, 737–38 (Wis. 1977).

The facts of this case, if proven at trial, would certainly establish that Harriet had opportunity and a disposition to influence Testator. Harriet lived in Testator's home, criticized and limited his contacts with Doris, a natural object of Testator's bounty, and urged him repeatedly to make a will in her favor. The will contestant should also be able to show that the bequest to Harriet was linked to her attempts to influence the will, as Testator executed the will only after Harriet threatened to quit and at a time when he had become increasingly dependent upon her; Testator also bequeathed to Harriet, an employee who was not the natural object of his bounty, one-half of his probate estate.

The facts do not so clearly establish Testator's susceptibility to undue influence. On the one hand, Testator was increasingly ill and dependent on Harriet. He also agreed to see an attorney after Harriet threatened him. On the other hand, Testator maintained control over his financial affairs until his death, continued to play an active role as trustee of various nonprofits, refused to see the attorney Harriet suggested, and communicated his dispositional plan to his own attorney through handwritten instructions.

Because the evidence is inconclusive, the outcome might depend on who bears the burden of proof. Normally, this rests on the party challenging the will. However, in many jurisdictions, a presumption of undue influence arises when there is a confidential relationship between the testator and the alleged influencer and suspicious circumstances surround the drafting of the will. Most of the cases involving confidential relationships involve attorneys and close relatives; it is not clear that a confidential relationship between Testator and Harriet could be established in this case. But if it were, then the burden of proof on the issue of undue influence would shift to Harriet.

Point Two: (10–20%)

If the court finds that the bequest to Harriet was the product of undue influence, it may invalidate the entire will or only the bequest to Harriet.

A finding of undue influence may lead a court to invalidate the entire will or only a portion of it. Most courts will invalidate only those portions that are “infected” by undue influence. See Williams v. Crickman, 405 N.E.2d 799 (Ill. 1980). Clearly, if there was undue influence, it affected the bequest to Harriet and that bequest should be invalidated.

It is less clear whether the entire will was infected by Harriet's undue influence. Given his estrangement from Sam, it is possible that Testator would have left his entire estate to Doris had he not left a one-half share to Harriet. However, it is also possible that Testator might have left a share of the estate to his grandchild, Fred; the facts do not show that Testator was estranged from either Fred or Fred's deceased parent, Bob. Testator might also have left a share to Sam's child,

Ella, or even to Sam himself. Indeed, Testator might not have executed a will at all. Given this uncertainty, the court might invalidate the entire will or only the bequest to Harriet.

Point Three(a): (10–20%)

If the entire will is invalidated, Testator’s estate would pass to his heirs, Doris, Sam, and Fred.

Assuming that the court invalidates the entire will as the product of undue influence, Testator’s estate will be distributed to his heirs. In every jurisdiction, Testator’s heirs would be his two surviving children, Doris and Sam, and his grandchild, Fred, who takes as the representative of Testator’s deceased child, Bob. Doris’s child, Ella, would not take as an heir because Doris survived Testator and there is no basis for Ella to represent her mother. See UNIF. PROB. CODE §§ 2-101, 2-106.

Point Three(b): (15–25%)

If the bequest to Harriet alone is invalidated, Harriet’s one-half share of the estate would either pass to Doris in its entirety or be distributed equally to Doris, Sam, and Fred, depending on whether the jurisdiction applies the common law “no residue of a residue” rule.

When a residuary bequest fails, the question arises as to whether the invalidated share passes to the testator’s heirs or to the remaining residuary legatee(s). Under the common law “no residue of a residue” rule, the invalid share passes to the testator’s heirs. See WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN & SHELDON F. KURTZ, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES 335 n. 73 (3d ed. 2004). The theory behind this approach is that, if the invalid share were to pass to the remaining residuary legatee, it would increase her share without an executed bequest and thus violate the policies that underlie typical statutory execution requirements. Under the common law approach, Doris would take one-half of the estate under the will, and the remaining half would be distributed in equal shares to Doris, Sam, and Fred under the law of intestate succession. (See Point Three(a) above.)

Many courts today reject the common law rule, theorizing that the testator’s execution of a will evidences an intention to benefit the legatees named in the will to the exclusion of heirs, particularly would-be heirs not mentioned in the will. This “residue of a residue” approach has been adopted in Uniform Probate Code § 2-604. Under this approach, Harriet’s invalid share would go to Doris, the only other residuary legatee. Neither Sam nor Fred would take a share of Testator’s estate.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Is Library, an occasional, noncommercial product seller, strictly liable to Paul?
 - (2)(a) Is Supermarket, a commercial product seller, strictly liable for injuries to Paul when it did not produce or alter the defective product and did not sell the product to Paul?
 - (2)(b) Is a product defective when the risk cannot be eliminated and the product comes with adequate warnings?
 - (3) May Paul recover damages from any of Ann, Bill, or Chuck when he cannot show who was negligent and caused his injury?

DISCUSSION

Summary

If Paul proves only the facts given in the problem, he will not be able to recover damages from any of the parties. Paul cannot recover damages from Library because, as an occasional, noncommercial seller of food, Library is not strictly liable for injuries caused by its food. Paul cannot recover damages from Supermarket either. Although Supermarket, as a commercial seller, is strictly liable for defective products, here the product was not defective as it was prominently labeled as possibly having salmonella bacteria, and the risk of salmonella contamination cannot be eliminated. There is evidence that at least one of Ann, Bill, or Chuck was negligent in the preparation of the chicken salad that caused Paul's injury. If Paul could establish which party was negligent, he could recover damages from that individual. However, Paul cannot establish which party was negligent, and the doctrines of res ipsa loquitur, alternative liability, and joint enterprise liability are all unavailable to assist Paul in his claim.

Point One: (15–25%)

Strict products liability is only available against commercial product sellers. Thus Library cannot be liable because it is not a commercial product seller.

“One who sells any product in a defective condition unreasonably dangerous to the user or consumer . . . is subject to liability for physical harm thereby caused. . . .” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 402A (1966). The chicken salad sandwich that Paul consumed was unreasonably dangerous to the consumer because it contained salmonella bacteria. Thus, if Library had been a restaurant or other commercial entity, Paul would have a viable products liability action. In that action, he would not need to establish negligence on the part of Library.

However, a strict products liability action is only available against a “person engaged in the business of selling products for use or consumption.” Id. § 402A cmt. f; RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF THE LAW OF PRODUCTS LIABILITY § 1 (1998). Because the facts do not establish that Library is a commercial seller, Paul’s action against Library will fail on that ground.

Point Two(a): (10–20%)

A commercial seller may be found strictly liable for a defective product it sells even if the seller did not produce the product and the injured party did not purchase the product from the seller.

Strict products liability applies to all commercial sellers. Even a retailer who has no control over the design and manufacture of a product may be found strictly liable if that retailer sells a defective product. Because Supermarket is a commercial seller, it may be found liable if the chicken it sold was defective. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 402A.

The fact that Paul did not purchase the chicken himself does not alter the result. Modern products liability law applies to bystanders as well as purchasers. The “privity of contract” approach has everywhere been abandoned. See id. (establishing strict liability for injuries to “ultimate user or consumer”); see also 2 DAN DOBBS, THE LAW OF TORTS § 353 (2001).

Point Two(b): (15–25%)

A product seller is liable only for a defective product. Because the risk of salmonella contamination cannot be eliminated from raw chicken and the product was accompanied by detailed warnings, the chicken sold by Supermarket was not defective.

A product is defective when it is unreasonably dangerous. A product may be defective because it has a manufacturing defect, because it is defective in design, or because it provides inadequate instructions or warnings. The chicken sold by Supermarket carried adequate warnings of the risk of salmonella contamination and instructions on how to cook the chicken to ensure that it was safe for eating. The chicken sold by Supermarket did not contain a manufacturing or design defect as the risk of salmonella contamination is inherent in raw chicken and cannot be eliminated. Thus, the chicken conformed to the producer’s specifications, and those specifications could not be altered. Because the chicken was not defective, Paul cannot recover damages from Supermarket. See generally DOBBS, supra, § 354.

Point Three: (25–35%)

Paul could recover on a negligence theory against Ann, Bill, or Chuck if, and only if, he could show which of them was negligent in preparing the chicken salad. Furthermore, merely the fact that these batches of chicken salad were mixed together doesn’t make Ann, Bill, and Chuck joint tortfeasors because there is no evidence they were engaged in a joint venture or joint enterprise. In fact they acted independently of one another. Paul cannot recover on a strict liability theory because Ann, Bill, and Chuck are not product sellers.

The Health Department said that someone who made the chicken salad that Paul ate used improper precautions. The evidence thus shows that one of Ann, Bill, or Chuck was negligent, that is, failed to exercise reasonable care under the circumstances.

Even though Paul cannot show how the negligence occurred, he could still recover if only one individual had made the salad. In such a situation, Paul could use the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, which permits the jury to infer negligence when “the event is of a kind which ordinarily does not occur in the absence of negligence; . . . other responsible causes . . . are sufficiently eliminated by the evidence; . . . and the indicated negligence is within the scope of the defendant’s duty to the plaintiff.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 328D(1)(a)–(c). Paul can meet the first and third of these requirements: the Health Department has said that salmonella contamination does not occur when chicken is cooked and prepared properly. The salad preparers owed a duty to Paul as he was a lunch patron who would foreseeably have been expected to consume the chicken salad. However, Paul cannot establish that any one defendant had control of the chicken salad, as there were two other individuals who made salad independently. See Samson v. Riesing, 215 N.W.2d 662, 667–68 (Wis. 1974). Nor can Paul show that Ann, Bill, and Chuck have better information about who was negligent or are engaged in a conspiracy of silence. See Ybarra v. Spangard, 154 P.2d 687 (Cal. 1944).

There are other doctrines that permit the jury to find a defendant liable even when there is more than one defendant and the plaintiff cannot show which defendant’s conduct caused his injury. However, none of these doctrines would help Paul to establish the liability of Ann, Bill, or Chuck. The “alternative liability” doctrine, which permits the jury to find two defendants liable when each was negligent and either individual could have caused the plaintiff’s injuries, is unavailable because Paul cannot show that all defendants were negligent. See Summers v. Tice, 199 P.2d 1 (Cal. 1948); RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 433B(3). The “joint venture” or “joint enterprise” doctrine allows the jury to impute one defendant’s negligence to other defendants who are engaged in a common project or enterprise and who have an explicit or implied understanding about how the project is to be carried out. See DOBBS, THE LAW OF TORTS § 340. However, Paul cannot show that Ann, Bill, and Chuck had any common understanding. The facts state that Ann, Bill, and Chuck acted independently in making their respective batches of chicken salad.

Thus, because Paul cannot show which defendant was negligent, he cannot recover damages from Ann, Bill, or Chuck.

A strict products liability action would not be available against Ann, Bill, or Chuck because none is a product seller. Moreover, even if a products liability action were available, it would still be necessary to identify the source of the defective product, here the contaminated chicken salad.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) May an adoptive parent dissolve the adoption of a stepchild based on a quarrelsome relationship with the child?
 - (2) May a support obligor obtain retroactive modification of a support obligation?
 - (3) May a support obligor obtain downward modification of his future support obligation based on a voluntary reduction of his income?
 - (4) May a divorced parent of a 19-year-old college student refuse to support that student when the student has refused to obey reasonable parental commands?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A quarrelsome relationship with an adoptee is not a valid basis for dissolving an adoption. Husband is thus obligated to support Ann and Bert. Moreover, because retroactive modification of a child support obligation is forbidden by federal law, Husband may not obtain termination or reduction of his support obligation for the period before he sought modification. Modification of a future support obligation may be obtained based on a substantial change in circumstances, but a voluntary reduction in income does not warrant downward modification unless it was made in good faith. Many courts also take the needs and interests of the supported child into account. Thus the court probably did not err in denying Husband's petition to modify his obligation to support Ann. But the court probably did err in denying Husband's petition to modify his obligation to Bert, as Bert, an employable college student, had refused to obey reasonable parental commands.

Point One: (20–30%)

The court did not err in refusing to dissolve Husband's adoption of Ann and Bert.

An adoption order works as a complete—and final—transfer of parental rights and responsibilities. Traditionally, an adoption order could not be dissolved for any reason. In recent years, some states have enacted statutes authorizing dissolution of adoption in special circumstances, such as the discovery of an undisclosed mental or physical illness. See, e.g., CAL. FAM. CODE § 9100 (2007). Stepparent adoptions are no easier to undo than stranger adoptions.

In evaluating dissolution claims, courts typically look to the length of the relationship, the child's needs, and the parent's motives. See Annot., Annulment or Vacation of Adoption Decree by Adopting Parent or Natural Parent Consenting to Adoption, 2 A.L.R.2d 887, § 8 (1948). Here, Husband has been Ann's and Bert's parent for more than a decade and the only father they have known. Ann needs Husband's continuing support. The fact that Husband has reduced his income strongly suggests that he seeks dissolution, at least in part, for financial reasons. Moreover, the only reason that Husband can offer for dissolution, the fact that he had disagreements with teenagers Ann and Bert, is clearly inadequate. The trial court thus did not err in denying Husband's petition to dissolve the adoption.

Point Two: (10–15%)

The court did not err in refusing to retroactively modify Husband's support obligation.

Federal law absolutely forbids retroactive modification of child support obligations. See 42 U.S.C. § 666(a)(9). The trial court thus did not err in refusing to retroactively modify Husband's child support obligation.

Additionally, state courts have long held that the obligation to pay accrued and unpaid installments of child support may not ordinarily be modified. "If the hardship is particularly severe, the courts [have] sometimes devise[d] a way to protect the obligor, but in most instances the courts hold that retroactive modification of this kind is beyond their power and indeed the governing statute may so provide." HOMER H. CLARK, THE LAW OF DOMESTIC RELATIONSHIPS IN THE UNITED STATES 725 (2d ed. 1988). Here, because Wife commenced an enforcement action within a few months of when Husband ceased making payments and thereby limited the accrual of arrears, Husband has no basis for establishing a particularly severe hardship.

Point Three: (25–35%)

The trial court probably did not err in refusing to reduce Husband's future support obligation to Ann. A support obligor's voluntary income reduction cannot be used to obtain downward modification of his future support obligation unless the reduction was made in good faith. Even a good-faith income reduction may be inadequate to obtain downward modification if the court finds that the child(ren) would suffer hardship without an offsetting benefit.

In order to obtain modification of a future support obligation, the petitioner must show a substantial change in circumstances. Courts will generally find that a significant involuntary income reduction represents a substantial change warranting relief. But when the income loss is voluntary, they invariably require a showing that the reduction was made in good faith and not for the purpose of depriving the child or punishing the custodial parent.

Some courts will grant downward modification based solely on a showing of good faith on the theory that, if a married parent can reduce his income even if it negatively affects his children's living standard, a divorced parent should have the same right. Others will not grant downward modification if the support reduction would impose a significant hardship on the children. Many take a multifactor approach that balances the short- and long-term interests of both parent and child. See HARRY E. KRAUSE ET AL., FAMILY LAW: CASES, COMMENTS, QUESTIONS 1015 (5th ed. 2003).

If the court were to consider hardship or engage in an interest-balancing analysis, the facts support denial of Husband's petition. A temporary income reduction for training that will produce a future income gain is sometimes a valid basis for modification. However, Husband's income reduction does not have any obvious end point nor is it calculated to give the children future benefits. Even if Husband succeeds in becoming a successful novelist, the children's ages (16 and 19) would likely preclude a higher future support award to offset the current income loss. See, e.g., Harvey v. Robinson, 665 A.2d 215, 218 (Me. 1995); In re Marriage of Ilas, 16 Cal. Rptr. 2d 345 (1993). Wife, who already works full time, cannot easily make up the lost income nor can she continue to borrow indefinitely. But Husband could easily defer his plan to write a novel or reduce his income much less drastically.

Even if the court looked only at whether the income reduction was made in good faith, there is evidence to support denying Husband's petition. Although Husband's prior work on the novel provides evidence of good faith, the timing of the decision to reduce his income—the very same time that he wanted to stop supporting Ann and Bert—is suspect and suggests bad faith. Thus, the court probably did not err in denying Husband's petition to modify his support obligation to Ann.

Point Four: (15–20%)

Because the support rights of an employable child are contingent on compliance with reasonable parental demands, the trial court probably erred in denying Husband's request for future modification of his support obligation to Bert.

In a number of states, a divorced parent may be required to provide college or other educational support for a child over the age of majority. See KRAUSE ET AL., supra, at 881. But both married and divorced parents may terminate support to employable children who disobey reasonable parental commands. See 67A C.J.S. Parent and Child § 16 (2002).

Husband's commands to Bert seem reasonable and calculated to serve Bert's best interests. A regular, late-night job at a bar would either prevent Bert from getting enough sleep or prevent him from attending morning classes; the fact that Bert's grades have fallen supports Husband's view that Bert cannot keep up with his studying while performing with the band. Bert's arrest for driving while intoxicated also suggests that he should not be working in a bar. The evidence thus suggests that the trial court erred in denying Husband's request for modification of his college-tuition obligation to Bert.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) When a hospital record is offered into evidence to prove the truth of an out-of-court statement contained therein, must the record itself, the out-of-court statement, or both be covered by a hearsay exception?
 - (1)(b) Is Nurse's notation of Victor's statement a business record that can be admitted to prove the content of Victor's statement?
 - (1)(c) Is Victor's statement, which relates both to the general cause of his injuries and to the identity of the person causing the injuries, admissible to prove the truth of the matter stated?
 - (2) May a spouse assert the marital privilege in order not to testify with respect to communications with a deceased spouse?
 - (3) When a hearsay statement has been admitted, is an inconsistent hearsay statement admissible to attack the credibility of the hearsay declarant?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Both the hospital record and Victor's statement in it are hearsay, and each must fall within an exception to the hearsay rule in order for Victor's statement to be admissible for its truth. The hospital record falls within the business-records exception to the hearsay rule. Victor's statement that he was stabbed may fall within the hearsay exception for statements relating to medical diagnosis and treatment, but Victor's identification of Dan as his assailant is not pertinent to his medical treatment and would not fall within the medical diagnosis or any other hearsay exception. Consequently, that portion of Victor's statement is inadmissible to prove that Dan stabbed Victor and should have been excluded from evidence.

In most jurisdictions, Wife will be able to invoke the privilege for confidential marital communications and refuse to testify to what Victor told her. In some jurisdictions, however, only the "communicating spouse" can invoke the privilege, so in those jurisdictions, Wife would be required to testify.

If Wife cannot invoke the marital privilege, her testimony as to Victor's identification of his assailant is admissible only for the purposes of impeaching Victor's hearsay declaration that Dan stabbed him. If that hearsay declaration is not admitted, Victor's statement to Wife should also be excluded.

Point One(a): (20–30%)

Because the hospital record is being offered to prove both that Victor made certain statements to Nurse and that those statements are true, it is double hearsay and is admissible only if both the hospital record and the statements made by Victor fall within hearsay exceptions.

Hearsay is an out-of-court statement “offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.” FED. R. EVID. 801(c). Hearsay is generally inadmissible. FED. R. EVID. 802.

Here, the hospital record is “double hearsay,” and both levels of hearsay must fall within a hearsay exception or the record is inadmissible. The record itself is the first level of hearsay. The record is an “out-of-court statement,” and the prosecutor is offering it to prove the truth of what it says—that Victor told Nurse that Dan stabbed him. Without Nurse present to prove what she heard Victor say, her “out-of-court statement” about Victor’s words, in the form of her notation in his hospital record, is admissible only if the record falls within a hearsay exception. (See Point One(b).)

The prosecutor is also seeking to prove that what Victor said (“Dan stabbed me”) is true. This is also hearsay because Victor’s statement was made out of court and is offered for its truth. Therefore, the prosecutor must show that Victor’s statement falls within a hearsay exception. (See Point One(c).)

Point One(b): (20–30%)

The hospital record satisfies the business-records exception to the hearsay rule.

A record of “acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses” is admissible under the business-records exception to the hearsay rule if it is “made at or near the time” of the recorded event by “a person with knowledge” of the event. FED. R. EVID. 803(6). Additionally, the making of the record must occur in the course of a regularly conducted business activity, and it must be the regular practice of the business to make the record. Id. This foundation can be introduced through the testimony of a record custodian or other person with knowledge of the method of record keeping. It is not necessary that the person with knowledge of the matter entered testify at trial. United States v. Duncan, 919 F.2d 981, 986 (5th Cir. 1990).

Nurse’s notation in the hospital record concerning Victor’s statements to her falls within the business-records exception. Nurse had personal knowledge of what Victor said, and she wrote down his statements “at or near the time” that he made them. The facts state that it is the regular practice of the hospital to record this sort of information in a patient’s record.

Point One(c): (20–30%)

Victor’s statement to Nurse that he was stabbed may be admissible for the truth of the matter stated because it falls within the hearsay exception for statements made for the purpose of receiving medical diagnosis and treatment; however, Victor’s identification of his assailant as “Dan” is not admissible because it was not pertinent to diagnosis or treatment.

As noted earlier, Victor’s statement is itself hearsay because the prosecutor is offering it to prove the truth of the matter asserted—that Dan stabbed Victor. Therefore, even if the hospital record is admissible to prove what Victor said, the statement should still be excluded unless Victor's statement itself falls within a hearsay exception.

Statements made by a person who is seeking medical treatment are exempted from the ban on hearsay if the statements concern medical history, symptoms, "or the inception or general character of the cause" of the symptoms. FED. R. EVID. 803(4). Hence, Victor's statement to Nurse about the cause of his injuries may qualify for this hearsay exception.

However, the rationale for this hearsay exception is that statements made by people seeking medical treatment will generally be reliable because of the declarants' knowledge that medical diagnosis or treatment will be facilitated by such statements (or hindered if the statements are false). Thus, this hearsay exception is limited to statements that are "reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment." Id.

Statements which relate to the cause of the medical condition being diagnosed or treated are generally viewed as "pertinent to diagnosis or treatment." Thus, Victor's statement that he was stabbed with a knife would fall within the exception and would be admissible. But statements of fault ordinarily are not admitted under this exception, because the identity of the person who was at fault in causing the injury is not relevant to the treatment that is to be given. Thus, the portion of Victor's statement identifying Dan as the assailant is inadmissible. CHRISTOPHER B. MUELLER & LAIRD C. KIRKPATRICK, EVIDENCE § 8.75 (3d ed. 2007).

In short, although the hospital record of what Victor said is admissible even though it is hearsay, Victor's identification of his assailant is also hearsay and is inadmissible because it does not fall within an exception. Therefore, the trial court should not admit the record containing that statement.

Point Two: (20–30%)

The testimonial spousal privilege may only be asserted by a spouse who is testifying against an accused spouse. The marital-confidential-communications privilege can be asserted by either spouse. Wife may assert the privilege and refuse to testify concerning her confidential communications with Victor.

Two evidentiary privileges apply to the marital relationship. The federal courts recognize a testimonial or witness privilege under which a witness-spouse has the right not to testify against an accused spouse in a criminal case. Trammel v. United States, 445 U.S. 40 (1980). This privilege is inapplicable in this case because Wife has not been asked to testify against her husband, Victor.

The federal courts and most states also recognize a second privilege for confidential communications between spouses when those communications occur during the marriage. United States v. Acker, 52 F.3d 509, 514 (4th Cir. 1995). The privilege protects communications during marriage even if the marriage no longer exists and even if one of the parties to the marriage is dead.

Under the majority view, both spouses hold the privilege for all communications between them. Here, Wife could invoke the privilege and be excused from testifying as to Victor's statements to her because all the requirements of the privilege are met: Victor's statements were statements of one spouse to another in private (it appears that no one overheard them), and neither Wife nor Victor revealed their exact content to anyone else. These confidential communications between spouses are protected by the privilege.

Some courts, however, have taken the position that only the communicating spouse can assert the privilege. Under that minority view, Wife could not assert the privilege and would have to reveal what Victor said. See 1 KENNETH S. BROUN ET AL., MCCORMICK ON EVIDENCE § 83 (6th ed. 2006).

Here, however, it is possible that Wife will not be allowed to invoke the privilege because she broke the confidentiality of her communications with her husband when she told Friend, a third party, some of what her husband told her. The marital communications privilege is intended to protect the confidentiality of spousal discussions. Where one spouse has revealed the content of those communications to a third person, then confidentiality no longer exists and the privilege probably should not apply. At the very least, Wife might be required to testify to the fact that she has already revealed to Friend: that Victor told her that he was attacked by someone other than Dan.

Point Three: (10–20%)

The prosecutor's hearsay objection to testimony about Victor's statement to Wife should not have been sustained because the court had previously admitted Victor's hearsay statement that Dan was his assailant. Once an out-of-court statement is offered for its truth, the credibility of the hearsay declarant may be attacked with an inconsistent statement by that declarant, including statements that would otherwise be hearsay. Thus, once Victor's identification of Dan as his assailant was admitted into evidence, his inconsistent statement to Wife could be admitted to attack his credibility.

Victor's statement to Wife that Dan was not his assailant is hearsay (because it was made outside the courtroom) and could not have been admitted to prove the truth of the matter stated. Victor's statement is nonetheless admissible to impeach his credibility.

On the facts, the court has admitted Victor's hearsay statement to Nurse that Dan attacked him. Once a hearsay statement is admitted into evidence, the hearsay declarant's credibility may be attacked just as though the hearsay declarant were a witness at trial. In addition, any inconsistent statement made by the hearsay declarant may be admitted to impeach the declarant's credibility. FED. R. EVID. 806. Thus, if the hospital record is admitted to prove that Victor identified Dan as his assailant, then Victor's statement to Wife (identifying someone else as his assailant) is admissible to attack Victor's credibility, despite the existence of the hearsay rule. 4 CHRISTOPHER LOUISELL & LAIRD C. KIRKPATRICK, FEDERAL EVIDENCE § 511 (2d ed. 1994). (Of course, Wife's privilege claim may still prevent admission of the statement.)

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Cal violate his duty of loyalty to Prime by failing to make full disclosure of all relevant information to the Board about a partnership in which he has an interest and with which Prime is considering entering into a transaction?
 - (2) Assuming that Cal violated the duty of loyalty, does he have any defenses to avoid liability?
 - (3) Did the members of Prime's board of directors, other than Cal, violate their duty of care by approving a more expensive contract without full information?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Cal, the CEO and chairman of the board of Prime, owes a fiduciary duty of loyalty to Prime. Even though Cal did not participate in the Board's discussion of the consulting project and even though the contract with Smart was approved by a majority of disinterested directors, Cal breached his duty of loyalty by failing to disclose the substantially higher fee charged to Prime by Smart, a partnership in which Cal has a financial interest. Here, a court would be unlikely to find that the contract was objectively fair to Prime, given Smart's substantially higher fee. Therefore, Cal has no defense to a claim of breach of his duty of loyalty.

The Board may have violated its fiduciary duty of care when it approved the contract with Smart after only a 10-minute discussion and without seeking or receiving full information about the fees to be charged.

Point One: (5–15%)

Cal violated the fiduciary duty of loyalty by allowing Prime to contract with a partnership in which Cal is a partner without fully disclosing all relevant information.

Cal is the CEO and chairman of the board of Prime and therefore has a fiduciary duty of loyalty to Prime. Here, he may have breached that duty because he stands to benefit personally if Smart is hired, since he is a partner in Smart. As a partner, he is presumably entitled to a share of any profits derived from Smart's work for Prime, even if he himself performs no services.

Point Two: (40–50%)

The RMBCA provides three safe harbors for a director who breaches his duty of loyalty: approval by disinterested directors, approval by disinterested shareholders, or fairness. It is unlikely that any of these safe harbors will protect Cal.

The Revised Model Business Corporation Act §§ 8.60–8.63 (1984, with 2000 amendments) (RMBCA) includes three safe harbors that may protect a director who breaches his duty of loyalty. However, it is unlikely that any of these safe harbors will protect Cal under the facts of this case.

Under the first RMBCA safe harbor, approval by disinterested directors insulates a director's conflicting interest transaction from judicial scrutiny if the interested director disclosed his or her interest and "play[ed] no part, directly or indirectly, in [the disinterested directors'] deliberations or vote." RMBCA §§ 8.61(b)(1) & 8.62(b). The statute also requires disclosure of any information in Cal's possession that "an ordinarily prudent person would believe to be material to a judgment about whether or not to proceed with the transaction." Id. § 8.60(4).

Applying the first prong of this test, it appears that the Prime board, except for Cal, was disinterested when it approved the Smart consulting contract. As far as disinterested approval is concerned, the entire Prime board, with Cal abstaining, approved the Smart consulting contract. The facts do not suggest that any of the directors besides Cal had a personal interest in this matter. Nothing indicates that the other directors are subject to Cal's control or serve at his pleasure. Three board members are also senior officers of Prime and therefore arguably dependent on Cal's continued goodwill, but the remaining eight are outside directors with no other connections to the corporation. Accordingly, even if there is some possible doubt as to the independence of the three inside or management directors, there is no doubt as to the independence of the other eight, all of whom voted in favor of the contract. Thus, the disinterested directors approved the transaction and there is no evidence that Cal played any part in the deliberations or vote.

However, applying the second prong of this test, Cal did not make adequate disclosure. Cal informed the Board of his status as a partner in Smart before the Board's approval and therefore disclosed the fact of his conflict. However, he did not inform them that the fee to be charged by Smart was substantially higher than would ordinarily be expected for work like this. This is material information a prudent director would want to know. Therefore, because of the nondisclosure, it is unlikely that the contract with Smart can be defended on the basis of the disinterested directors' approval.

Under the second RMBCA safe harbor, approval by disinterested shareholders would insulate a director's conflicting interest transaction from judicial scrutiny. See id. § 8.61(b)(2). No facts support that defense.

Under the third RMBCA safe harbor, a duty of loyalty claim could be rebutted by proof that "the transaction, judged according to the circumstances at the time of commitment, is established to have been fair to the corporation." Id. § 8.61(b)(3). Although there is some room to argue this point, the fact that Smart's proposed fee is substantially higher than what it normally charges for comparable work suggests strongly that a finding of objective fairness could not be supported.

Point Three: (35–45%)

Prime's disinterested directors likely breached their duty of care when they approved, with minimal discussion and without full information, a contract in which a director had an interest.

If the directors do not qualify for the protection of the business judgment rule, they likely will be found to have breached their duty of care in approving the contract with Smart. The business judgment rule creates a presumption that “in making a business decision, the directors . . . acted on an informed basis, in good faith and in the honest belief that the action taken was in the best interests of the company.” Aronson v. Lewis, 473 A.2d 805, 812 (Del. 1984).

In this case, there is no evidence of bad faith. At least eight directors were entirely disinterested. Nor is there any evidence that the directors did not have an honest belief that they were acting in the best interests of Prime.

However, a court could find that the directors did not act on an informed basis in reviewing the two alternatives. Because the business judgment rule presumes that the Board was adequately informed, a party claiming that the directors breached their duty of care has the burden of showing that the Board did not have sufficient information to justify going with the higher-priced firm. The fact that Smart was going to charge Prime more than its customary rate suggests that the rate was not justified by added value. Arguably, the $150,000 price difference required the Board to at least ask more about Smart's rates. Moreover, if the Board had discussed the contract for more than 10 minutes, it might have realized that it lacked full information.

Therefore, it is likely that a court would find that the Board violated its fiduciary duty of care by approving the contract with Smart.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE V.A.; VI.D.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Under Rule 50 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, can a post-judgment motion for judgment as a matter of law be granted if the defendant moved for judgment as a matter of law at the close of the plaintiff's evidence but did not move for judgment as a matter of law at the close of all the evidence?
 - (2) Should a court reject a jury verdict and grant judgment as a matter of law on the basis that the losing party's evidence was more persuasive than the evidence of the party in whose favor the jury ruled?
 - (3) Should a court grant a motion for a new trial if the movant shows that the movant's evidence was more persuasive and more credible than the opponent's evidence?
 - (4) Should a court grant a motion for a new trial on the ground that a juror during voir dire withheld information suggesting that she would be biased against one of the parties in the suit?

DISCUSSION

Summary

In Plaintiff's employment discrimination suit against Corporation, the post-trial motion by Corporation for judgment as a matter of law (JMOL) should be denied. First, Corporation did not move for JMOL at the close of all the evidence as required by Rule 50(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Corporation's motion at the close of Plaintiff's evidence does not satisfy the Rule's requirement. Second, Corporation's arguments in support of the motion do not state grounds sufficient for entering judgment for Corporation as a matter of law.

On the other hand, Corporation's motion for a new trial under Rule 59 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure may have merit. Corporation does not face a procedural bar such as that precluding its post-judgment motion for JMOL. Corporation's alternative motion for a new trial should be granted if Corporation can show that the jury's verdict was clearly against the weight of the evidence and a miscarriage of justice, or if a juror failed to reveal information indicating a strong bias against Corporation. It is unlikely that Corporation can show that the verdict is clearly against the weight of the evidence, but Corporation should be able to show juror bias.

Point One: (20–30%)

Because Corporation failed to move for judgment as a matter of law at the close of all the evidence, Rule 50(b) bars it from moving for judgment as a matter of law after trial.

Under Rule 50(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a party may make a motion for judgment as a matter of law (“JMOL”; also called a judgment notwithstanding the verdict or JNOV) if the party makes the motion no later than 10 days after entry of judgment and if the party previously made a motion for JMOL at the close of all the evidence. Here, the defendant made its post-verdict motion in a timely manner, but it did not make an earlier JMOL motion “at the close of all the evidence.” Even though Corporation moved for JMOL at the close of plaintiff’s evidence, it must make the motion again at the close of the record or it loses its right to renew the motion after entry of judgment. Moreover, a post-trial motion for judgment can be granted only on grounds advanced in such a pre-verdict motion. See, e.g., STEVEN BAICKER-MCKEE, WILLIAM M. JANSSEN & JOHN B. CORR, A STUDENT’S GUIDE TO THE FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE 800 (10th ed. 2007).

The federal courts are divided on how strictly to enforce Rule 50(b) when a party has moved for judgment at the close of the plaintiff’s case but not at the close of all the evidence. Some circuits have required strict compliance and have held that a motion at the close of plaintiff’s case never is sufficient to support a renewed motion for JMOL. See, e.g., Mid-America Tablewares, Inc. v. Mogi Trading Co., 100 F.3d 1353, 1364 (7th Cir. 1996). Courts in these circuits would deny Corporation’s renewed motion because no JMOL motion was made at the close of all evidence.

Other circuit courts have held that, if a JMOL motion was made at the close of plaintiff’s case, the failure to again move at the close of all the evidence need not be fatal to a post-verdict motion if the evidence introduced by the defendant was brief and could not have possibly changed the court’s decision on the earlier motion. See, e.g., BE & K Constr. Co. v. United Bhd. of Carpenters & Joiners, 90 F.3d 1318, 1325 (8th Cir. 1996). See generally 11 CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT & ARTHUR R. MILLER, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 2537 n. 10 (3d ed. 2007). This exception would not help Corporation here, however, because the witness testimony it presented in defense was substantial and could well have changed the trial court’s view on the merits of the motion if Corporation had made that motion at the close of all evidence after presenting its own case.

Thus, Corporation is now precluded from renewing its JMOL motion.

Point Two: (20–30%)

Even if Corporation had preserved its right to file (or “renew”) the motion for JMOL after the verdict, the motion should still be denied because Corporation has not advanced arguments that justify granting such a motion.

A motion for JMOL at the close of all the evidence, or a renewed motion after the return of the verdict, can be granted only if “there is no legally sufficient evidentiary basis for a reasonable jury” to find for the party opposing the movant. FED. R. CIV. P. 50(a). In ruling on such a motion, the trial judge is not authorized to weigh the evidence, pass on credibility of witnesses, or otherwise substitute the judge’s view of the evidence for the jury’s view. The standard expressed in Rule 50(a) makes clear that the grant of a motion for JMOL is “a performance of the court’s duty to assure enforcement of the controlling law and is not an intrusion on any responsibility for factual determinations conferred on the jury by the Seventh Amendment.” FED. R. CIV. P. 50 advisory committee's notes to 1991 Amendment. This standard is also used as a reference point for entry of summary judgment under Rule 56. See Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, 477 U.S. 242, 250–51 (1986).

Thus, Corporation's argument that its evidence was more persuasive and more credible than Plaintiff's evidence does not provide the court with a basis for overturning the jury's verdict. Even if true, the superior strength of Corporation's evidence does not mean that the jury acted unreasonably by returning a verdict for Plaintiff. Similarly, even if the trial judge agrees with Corporation that its witnesses were more credible than the witnesses for Plaintiff, that fact still would be insufficient to support a motion for JMOL. Assessments of witness credibility are core jury functions, and Rule 50 does not give the judge license to usurp that core function.

The verdict may be overturned only if, on the basis of the evidence, no reasonable jury could have found that Plaintiff had met her burden of proof. See WRIGHT & MILLER, supra, § 2524. Here the jury had an objective, reasonable basis for accepting Plaintiff's version of the facts: the suspicious timing of Plaintiff's firing and the testimony by a witness to the discriminatory statements by Plaintiff's supervisor. Even if the trial court thinks the jury erred, the trial court should defer to the jury's choice between competing versions of events when the jury choice is reasonably based on the evidence presented in the case. Tennant v. Peoria & Pekin Union Rwy. Co., 321 U.S. 29, 35 (1944).

Point Three: (20–30%)

Corporation's alternative motion for a new trial should be granted if the court is convinced that the jury's verdict was clearly against the weight of the evidence and a miscarriage of justice, but such a result is unlikely here.

Corporation's motion for new trial was filed within 10 days of the entry of judgment, as required by Rule 59(b). Unlike motions for JMOL under Rule 50, no pre-verdict motions are required in order to make the post-verdict motion for new trial. Thus, Corporation's alternative motion for new trial is procedurally proper and can be considered on the merits.

Rule 59 does not specify any standard for the granting of a new trial, but instead provides that such motions can be granted "for any of the reasons for which new trials have heretofore been granted in actions at law in courts of the United States." In effect, Rule 59 gives the trial judge power and discretion to prevent a miscarriage of justice. Because an order for a new trial is not a final judgment, such motions are more freely granted than are motions for JMOL. In general, the grounds for a new trial are that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, that the damages are excessive, or that for other reasons—such as errors of law—the trial was not fair. See WRIGHT & MILLER, supra, §§ 2805, 2806. Where the court is convinced that a mistake has been made, such as where the prevailing party's witnesses were wholly lacking in credibility, a new trial may be ordered. On a motion for new trial, unlike a motion for JMOL, the court is not required to view the evidence in the light most favorable to the verdict winner. Id. § 2806.

In this case, the first ground offered in support of the motion is Corporation's argument that its evidence was more persuasive and more credible than Plaintiff's evidence. Because the court is free to weigh the evidence itself on a motion for new trial, this argument may prevail. Courts have held that an order for a new trial is appropriate when the trial judge is convinced that the jury has reached a seriously erroneous result.

However, the trial judge must respect the collective wisdom of the jury. See id. It is not proper for a court to grant a new trial on the ground that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence unless the record shows that the jury's verdict resulted in a miscarriage of justice. See, e.g., Tennant, 321 U.S. at 35; United States v. Landau, 155 F.3d 93, 104–05 (2nd Cir. 1998). “[S]ince the credibility of witnesses is peculiarly for the jury, it is an invasion of the jury’s province to grant a new trial merely because the evidence was sharply in conflict.” Latino v. Kaizer, 58 F.3d 310, 315 (7th Cir. 1995). The issue here is simple and the facts were highly disputed at trial. Notwithstanding the fact that the court may believe that Corporation’s evidence was “more persuasive,” it would be improper for the court to grant Corporation’s motion for a new trial on this basis.

Point Four: (20–30%)

Corporation’s motion for a new trial should be granted if a juror improperly failed to reveal information that would bias that juror against Corporation.

Corporation’s second argument in support of a grant of new trial is stronger. By showing that a juror improperly failed to disclose information that would bias the juror against Corporation, Corporation has identified an error that could have influenced the verdict. Through questions during voir dire, jurors are screened for potential bias. Although motions for a new trial based on juror nondisclosures during voir dire are often unsuccessful, if the withheld information would have justified a disqualification for cause, a new trial should be granted. See WRIGHT & MILLER, supra, § 2810; McCoy v. Goldston, 652 F.2d 654, 659 (6th Cir. 1981). Here, had Corporation known of the juror’s prior experience with employment discrimination suits and her hostility toward companies that are accused of discrimination, Corporation surely would have moved that the potential juror be struck for cause.

Of course, the fact that a juror has potential biases is not enough to warrant striking the juror from the jury for cause. The question is whether those potential biases are also actual biases. See Smith v. Phillips, 455 U.S. 209, 216 (1982). Here, there is evidence that the jury foreperson had actual bias and manifested that bias even before the trial began.

Under these circumstances, the trial court could find that the jury foreperson’s apparent bias against Corporation fundamentally undermined the fairness of the trial. If the court so concludes, it should grant Corporation’s motion for a new trial.

 - (2)(a) Is a financing statement effective to perfect a security interest when the financing statement does not give the debtor's correct name, but a search under the correct name would reveal the financing statement?
 - (2)(b) Does a perfected security interest have priority over a judicial lien that has attached to collateral?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A security interest in a deposit account is perfected only if the secured party has control of the account. First Bank did not have control of the deposit account; State Bank did. Thus, State Bank's interest is the only perfected interest, and State Bank's claim is superior to First Bank's claim.

First Bank's interest in Dart Corporation's office equipment was perfected even though its financing statement gave an incorrect name for Dart Corporation (DC). Because a search of the filing office records using DC's correct name would disclose the financing statement, it is effective to perfect First Bank's interest. Because First Bank is a perfected secured party, its interest prevails over the interest of State Bank, a judgment creditor whose lien attached after First Bank had perfected its interest.

Point One: (45–55%)

First Bank did not have control of DC's deposit account at State Bank. As a result, First Bank's interest is unperfected and is subordinate to State Bank's perfected interest, even though First Bank filed a financing statement and State Bank did not.

DC's checking account at State Bank is a "deposit account" for Article 9 purposes. The facts state that the account is a demand account, and demand accounts are Article 9 "deposit accounts." See UCC § 9-102(a)(29) (definition of "deposit account"). Both State Bank and First Bank have enforceable security interests in the account because the following criteria are fulfilled: (1) DC's president signed a security agreement granting each bank an interest in the account, (2) DC has rights in the account, and (3) each bank extended value to DC by giving DC a loan. UCC § 9-203.

Although First Bank filed a financing statement covering the deposit account, First Bank's interest is not perfected. Under UCC § 9-312, "a security interest in a deposit account may be perfected only by control." Under UCC § 9-104, a creditor only has control of a deposit account if: (1) "the secured party is the bank with which the deposit account is maintained" (the bank account is at State Bank, not First Bank), (2) the bank where the account is held has agreed in writing to follow the instructions of the secured party (no such agreement exists), or (3) the secured party becomes the bank's customer with respect to the account (which was not done). Because none of the UCC § 9-104 requirements for control has been met by First Bank, First Bank's security interest in the bank account is unperfected.

State Bank, on the other hand, does have a perfected security interest in the deposit account, even though it did not file a financing statement, because State Bank is "the bank with which the deposit account is maintained," and therefore has control of the account. As between an unperfected secured creditor (First Bank) and a perfected secured creditor (State Bank), the perfected secured creditor has the superior claim to the collateral. See UCC § 9-322(a)(2).

Point Two(a): (20–30%)

First Bank's security interest in DC's office equipment is perfected despite the error in DC's name on the financing statement.

First Bank filed a financing statement covering DC's office equipment. For a financing statement to be effective under UCC § 9-502, it must contain three pieces of information: (1) the name of the debtor, (2) the name of the secured party, and (3) an indication of the collateral. In the case of First Bank's financing statement, the name of the secured party is correct and the collateral is sufficiently indicated as "office equipment." (DC's office equipment would be categorized as "equipment" under Article 9. See 9-102(a)(33).) The name of the debtor, however, contains an error. The issue is whether this error renders the financing statement ineffective.

Under UCC § 9-506(a), minor errors do not render a financing statement ineffective, unless those errors make the financing statement "seriously misleading." However, a corporation is a registered organization, and under § 9-503(a)(1), a financing statement sufficiently states the name of a "registered organization" only if the financing statement provides the name of the organization that is "indicated on the public record" that "shows the debtor to have been organized." Here, the financing statement should have stated the debtor's name as "Dart Corporation." Moreover, under § 9-506(b), "a financing statement that fails sufficiently to provide the name of the debtor in accordance with Section 9-503(a) is seriously misleading." Thus, First Bank's failure to include DC's correct name on the financing statement raises the possibility that the financing statement will be deemed "seriously misleading" and therefore ineffective.

Luckily for First Bank, however, § 9-506(c) provides a safe harbor that deals with this situation. Even where the debtor's name is incorrect on the financing statement,

"If a search of the records of the filing office under the debtor's correct name, using the filing office's standard search logic, if any, would disclose a financing statement that [otherwise] fails . . . to provide the name of the debtor . . . the name provided does not make the financing statement seriously misleading.”

The facts state that a search in the State A filing office using DC’s correct name, “Dart Corporation,” will turn up the filed financing statement, even though it incorrectly states the name of the debtor as “Dart Incorporated.” As a result, First Bank’s financing statement is not “seriously misleading” under the relevant Article 9 provisions, and First Bank’s interest is perfected.

Point Two(b): (20–30%)

First Bank’s perfected security interest in the office equipment is superior to State Bank’s judgment lien.

First Bank’s claim to the office equipment is superior to State Bank’s claim. First Bank is a perfected secured creditor, and State Bank is a judgment lien creditor. Under UCC § 9-317, a judgment lien creditor takes priority over a security interest only if the creditor becomes a “lien creditor” before the conflicting security interest is perfected. State Bank became a “lien creditor” when the sheriff levied on January 3. First Bank, however, perfected its security interest in the office equipment by filing on December 1, a month earlier.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE V.A., B., D.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did the police interview of Student violate Student's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure such that Student's statements (including the confession) should be suppressed as "fruit of the poisonous tree"?
 - (2) Should Student's statements be suppressed because the police failed to read him his Miranda rights when they questioned him in the manager's office?
 - (3) Should Student's confession be suppressed because it was involuntary?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Student was "seized" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment when he was brought into the manager's office to be questioned by the police. However, that seizure did not violate Student's Fourth Amendment rights because the police had "reasonable articulable suspicion" that Student had been the perpetrator of an armed robbery. This allowed them to detain him for the purposes of investigation and will not taint any statements that Student made during the detention.

Whether the police were required to read Student his Miranda warnings depends on whether he was subject to in-custody interrogation. In this case, the only real question is whether Student was in custody. Applying the objective standard, Student was probably not in custody when he spoke with the officers in the manager's office, and Miranda warnings were not required.

The last question is whether Student's confession to the officers was voluntary or whether it was the product of police coercion that overcame Student's will. Here a court must look at the totality of the circumstances in ruling on the voluntariness of the confession. Most courts would probably conclude that Student's confession was voluntary.

Point One: (25–35%)

Student was seized by the police within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, but the seizure was a lawful investigative detention.

Student has a Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure. However, this Fourth Amendment right was violated in this case only if: (a) Student was in fact "seized" by the police when they spoke with him in the manager's office, and (b) that seizure was unreasonable for Fourth Amendment purposes. If the seizure did violate Student's Fourth Amendment rights, then Student's statements would be suppressible because they were the direct result of that seizure (i.e., "the fruit of the poisonous tree"). Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963).

A person has been seized if, in light of all of the circumstances, "a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave." United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544, 554 (1980). In this case, a court could legitimately find that Student was seized by law enforcement. Student was taken into his manager's office where he remained for approximately 25 minutes with two police officers, one of whom had a visible weapon. One officer sat between Student and the door, and the door was closed. Student was not told that he was free to leave. Under these circumstances, a reasonable person in Student's position would probably have believed that he was required to stay in the room until the police officers gave him permission to leave.

Assuming that there was a seizure, the next question is whether it was a violation of Student's Fourth Amendment rights. Although the police did not have probable cause to arrest Student for the armed robbery, the Fourth Amendment permits detention of an individual for a relatively brief period of time if the police have a "reasonable articulable suspicion" that the individual in question has been recently involved in criminal activity. Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968).

In this case, three people said that the person on the tape of the convenience store robbery "could be," "might be," and "looked like" Student. These identifications, although far from certain, gave the law enforcement officers sufficient specific facts to form the basis of a reasonable suspicion that Student was the robber. The fact that one of the identifiers was an anonymous caller does not affect the reasonableness of law enforcement's actions since the police officers corroborated the possible identification with Student's principal and Student's homeroom teacher.

Thus, Student's Fourth Amendment rights were not violated, and his statements should not be suppressed.

Point Two: (30–40%)

The police were probably not required to read Student the Miranda warnings because he was probably not in custody until they placed him under arrest.

Law enforcement officers are required to read Miranda warnings to a suspect when the suspect is subjected to an in-custody interrogation. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 444 (1966). If the officers were required to read the warnings and failed to do so, the statements should be suppressed.

Student was clearly subject to interrogation, which has been defined not only as questioning initiated by law enforcement but as "any words or actions on the part of the police . . . that the police should know are reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response" from the suspect. Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 301 (1980) (quoting California v. Beheler, 463 U.S. 1121, 1125 (1983) (per curiam)). The only question then is whether Student was "in custody" when he was being questioned.

Custody is a substantial seizure and is defined as either a formal arrest or “restraint on freedom of movement of the degree associated with a formal arrest.” New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649, 655 (1984). A suspect need not be in a police station to be in custody. Whether a suspect is in custody is determined by “how a reasonable person in the suspect’s situation would perceive his circumstances.” Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652, 662 (2004). In assessing the question of custody, courts consider the facts surrounding the interrogation. The test to be applied is purely objective. Therefore, a suspect’s age, experience, and other personal characteristics are not considered. Id. at 666–67.

In this case, two police officers had Student summoned to the manager’s office, into which they escorted him and closed the door. Student was outnumbered two to one, and one officer, with a visible firearm, sat between Student and the door. The police did not tell Student that he was free to leave. Nonetheless, Student was probably not in custody. The police officers told Student that they would “like to talk” with him; he was not told that he was under arrest until the end of the interview. During the interview, Student was not in any restraints, the two officers were seated in chairs, and the interview took place in an office. While Student may not have felt that he was free to leave, a reasonable person would probably not have believed that he had been arrested or otherwise taken into formal custody. If Student was not in custody, then the police were not required to read him Miranda warnings before talking with him. Therefore, there should be no suppression for a Miranda violation.

Point Three: (25–35%)

Based on the totality of the circumstances, Student’s confession was probably voluntary.

The voluntariness of a confession is based on (1) whether the police subjected the suspect to coercive conduct, see Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 167 (1986), and (2) whether the conduct was sufficient to overcome the will of the suspect, see Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U.S. 534, 543–44 (1961).

There is certainly some evidence of coercion. Here, the police interviewed Student in a small, closed room, two against one, with a firearm displayed. The police did not tell Student that he was free to go if he chose, did not tell him that he was not obliged to answer their questions, and did not advise him of his Miranda rights. The police also lied to Student about the strength of their case. By itself, the lie would not be a ground for suppression. Trickery and deceit do not render a confession inadmissible. United States v. Kontny, 238 F.3d 815, 817 (7th Cir. 2001). “Far from making the police a fiduciary of the suspect, the law permits the police to pressure and cajole, conceal material facts and actively mislead.” United States v. Rutledge, 900 F.2d 1127, 1131 (7th Cir. 1990). But in conjunction with the other factors, this deception pushes this case closer to the line of coercion.

The more difficult question is whether this coercive conduct was sufficient to overcome the will of the suspect. Here, courts consider the totality of the circumstances and take into account both the conduct of the police and the suspect’s individual characteristics such as age, level of education, and familiarity with the criminal justice system. Alvarado, 541 U.S. at 667–68; Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 226 (1973).

A court could conclude that the police behavior was insufficiently coercive to have overcome Student's will. The facts indicate that Student is an adult (18 years old) of at least average intelligence and that he has some experience with the juvenile justice system. The interview in his manager's office lasted less than 30 minutes. Although the police statements about the identification were not 100 percent true, the fact that a suspect has been deceived about the strength of evidence does not automatically render a statement involuntary. Frazier v. Cupp, 394 U.S. 731, 739 (1969). The statement by the police officers that the prosecutor might be more lenient when a defendant is young and cooperates could be construed as an accurate observation of how the justice system operates rather than as a promise of leniency. Similarly, the police officers' general description of prison as "not being a nice place" was not a threat but simply a statement of fact.

On the other hand, a court that focuses on Student's youth and inexperience might consider the confession to have been involuntary. Student is a high school senior with minimal experience with the criminal justice system. He was questioned in his manager's office by two police officers. His confession was in direct response to police conduct that could be considered "overreaching." First, the police deliberately lied about the strength of the evidence against him. When it appeared that Student was reacting to that tactic, the police upped the ante by telling him that a confession might result in leniency. Finally, the police officers made what could be taken as a veiled threat about what would happen to Student in prison if he did not confess.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Friend breach the duty of loyalty by investing trust assets in a closely held corporation in which he had a substantial financial interest?
 - (2) Did Friend breach the duty to invest prudently by investing 90% of trust assets in the illiquid stock of two closely held corporations?
 - (3) Did Friend breach the duty to diversify by investing 90% of trust assets in two corporations with virtually identical businesses?
 - (4) Did Friend breach the duty of care by making investments that produced no current income and made it impossible for James to exercise his 5% withdrawal power?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Friend breached the duty of loyalty, the duty to invest prudently, the duty to diversify the trust investments, and the duty of care when he invested 90% of the trust's assets in the preferred stock of two closely held corporations. Friend breached the duty of loyalty because he had a substantial financial interest in one of the closely held corporations. He breached the duty to invest prudently and the duty to diversify because the investments significantly diminished the liquidity of the trust principal and because A Corp. and B Corp. were involved in similar high-risk businesses. He breached the duty of care by investing in a manner that precluded carrying out the trust's obligations to James with respect to the payment of income and James's annual 5% withdrawal power.

Point One: (15–25%)

Friend breached the duty of loyalty by investing the trust assets in a corporation in which Friend, in his individual capacity, had a substantial investment.

A trustee owes trust beneficiaries a duty of loyalty and must administer the trust exclusively in the beneficiaries' interests. Because the trustee must act on behalf of the beneficiaries, and not on behalf of himself, the duty of loyalty is breached when a trustee enters into transactions, on behalf of the trust, that involve a conflict of interest or self-dealing. Friend entered into a transaction involving a conflict of interest.

Uniform Trust Code § 802(c) provides that an investment in "a corporation . . . in which the trustee . . . has an interest that might affect the trustee's best judgment" is presumptively a breach of the duty of loyalty. Here, Friend invested in A Corp., in which he held 70% of the common stock. Although the comments to § 802 note that the presumption of a breach can be rebutted by showing that the terms of the transaction were fair or that the transaction would have been made by an independent party, there is no evidence to support such a showing in this case. It is also hard to imagine that an independent trustee would have made such a risky and illiquid investment.

Point Two: (25–35%)

Friend breached the duty to invest prudently by investing the trust assets in the illiquid stocks of cash-poor, closely held corporations without proven, marketable products.

Almost all states have adopted, in one form or another, the Uniform Prudent Investor Act. Under this act, a trustee owes trust beneficiaries a duty to invest trust assets prudently. UNIF. PRUDENT INV. ACT § 1. In assessing whether a trustee has breached this duty, the Act requires consideration of a number of factors, including (1) the distribution requirements of the trust (id. § 2(a)), (2) general economic conditions (id. § 2(c)(1)), (3) the role the investment plays in relationship to the trust's overall investment portfolio (id. § 2(c)(4)), and (4) the trust's need for liquidity, regularity of income, and preservation or appreciation of capital (id. § 2(c)(7)). All of these factors support a finding that Friend's investment was imprudent.

The investments in A Corp. and B Corp. represented a very large share (90%) of the trust assets and dominated the portfolio. The investments drastically reduced the liquidity of the trust, making it impossible to meet the trust's distribution requirements. The investments also reduced the trust's annual income, resulting in a reduction in mandatory income distributions. The effects of the investments on the trust income and liquidity were not unexpected, but were known at the outset. Moreover, the technologies that both companies planned to develop were unproven; working prototypes had not been developed, and there was no evidence that such inventions would succeed in the highly competitive cell-phone market. (See Point Four.) Lastly, since the companies were developing competing technologies, there is a good chance that ultimately one of them would fail (e.g., Blu-ray vs. HD DVD).

Point Three: (15–25%)

Friend breached the duty to diversify by investing 90% of the trust's assets in two corporations that were involved in the same type of business and subject to the same market risks.

A trustee owes a duty to diversify trust investments unless he “reasonably determines that, because of special circumstances, the purposes of the trust are better served without diversifying.” UNIF. PRUDENT INV. ACT § 3.

The diversification duty rests on the assumption that it is risky to place all or substantially all of one's assets in the same investment basket. Although there is “no automatic rule for identifying how much diversification is enough,” (id. § 3 cmt.), it seems highly unlikely that any fact finder would find the investment of 90% of trust assets in one narrow and unproven market sector sufficiently diverse.

Additionally, there are no facts in this case to support a finding that a lack of diversification was warranted because of special circumstances. Settlor funded the trust with publicly traded securities. The terms of the trust contemplated investments that would produce income and distributable principal.

Point Four: (15–25%)

Friend breached the duty of care by investing the trust assets in a manner that precluded administration of the trust in accordance with its terms and purposes.

Under the common law, a trustee owes beneficiaries the duty to act with care, skill, and prudence. See generally GEORGE T. BOGERT, TRUSTS § 93 (6th ed. 1987). Although the Uniform Trust Code does not impose on trustees a duty of care, it does impose a duty to “administer the trust in good faith, in accordance with its terms and purposes and the interests of the beneficiaries” UNIF. TRUST CODE § 801.

Whichever formulation is used, Friend breached his duty by making investments that made it impossible to carry out the terms of the trust. The facts clearly evidence Settlor’s intention to provide James with an annual income and imply that this income may have been intended to supplant the support Settlor provided James before creating the trust. The facts also clearly show that Settlor gave James the power to annually withdraw up to 5% of trust principal over the first 10 years of the trust. The investments in A Corp. and B Corp. effectively prevented James from exercising his withdrawal power and dramatically curtailed his income from the trust.

Questions

MEE Question 1

Debtor sells and delivers medical supplies to hospitals. It owns a fleet of 40 trucks that it uses to make deliveries. Debtor has a state-issued certificate of title for each truck. The state has a statute that provides: “All security interests in a motor vehicle must be noted on the vehicle’s certificate of title as a condition for perfection.”

On June 1, Bank made a $100,000 loan to Debtor. In order to secure the loan, Debtor signed a valid security agreement granting Bank a security interest in “all Debtor’s inventory and equipment, whether now owned or hereafter acquired.” Bank did not note its security interest on the certificates of title issued for the trucks. However, Bank immediately filed an appropriate financing statement in the proper state office that listed its collateral as “all Debtor’s inventory and equipment, whether now owned or hereafter acquired.”

On July 1, Finance Company loaned $75,000 to Debtor. On that same day, Debtor signed a valid security agreement granting Finance Company a security interest in 25 of Debtor’s “delivery trucks” and “any accessories now or hereafter installed.” Each truck was identified individually and by its vehicle identification number. Although Finance Company never filed a financing statement, its security interest was noted on the certificate of title for each truck.

On August 1, Debtor entered into a contract with Global Inc. to buy 40 global positioning system units (GPS units) to be installed on all 40 delivery trucks (including the 25 trucks covered by Finance Company’s security agreement). GPS units are bolted on the dashboard of a vehicle and hooked up directly to the battery for power, but they otherwise operate independently of the vehicle.

The GPS units cost $50,000. Debtor made a down payment of $10,000 and signed an agreement to pay the remaining $40,000, plus interest, in equal monthly installments over a two-year period. To secure the amount owed on the contract, Debtor signed a security agreement giving Global a security interest in “the GPS units to be installed on Debtor’s delivery trucks.”

On August 2, Global properly filed a financing statement covering the GPS units. The GPS units were delivered to Debtor on August 10, and Debtor installed them on its delivery trucks shortly thereafter.

On October 1, Debtor defaulted on its obligations to Bank, Finance Company, and Global. Bank has repossessed all 40 of Debtor’s trucks, and it is now negotiating with Finance Company and Global about their respective claims to the trucks and the 40 GPS units installed in them.

1. Which of Bank or Finance Company has the superior claim to the 25 delivery trucks claimed by Finance Company? Explain.
2. Which of Global or Finance Company has the superior claim to the GPS units installed in the 25 delivery trucks claimed by Finance Company? Explain.
3. Which of Bank or Global has the superior claim to the remaining 15 GPS units? Explain.

MEE Question 2

Lex, a nationally prominent criminal defense attorney, has a weekly television show on LNN, a national cable television station devoted to legal news. Lex's show deals with a variety of legal topics. Lex often uses his show as a platform to argue that adultery should be criminalized. Lex and his wife are both 60 years old.

Scoop is a reporter for News, a nationally distributed newspaper. Scoop received an accurate tip that Lex was engaging in an adulterous affair at a hotel in State X. Scoop then broke into the hotel through a back door, an act constituting trespass under generally applicable tort law, and attempted to get into Lex's hotel room. Before he could get into the room, however, he was discovered by a hotel employee and escorted out of the hotel. Later that day, while waiting on a public street outside the hotel, Scoop saw Lex get into a car with a young woman who was clearly not Lex's wife. Scoop took a photograph of Lex and the young woman, who were kissing passionately. Scoop mistakenly thought the woman was Star, a world-famous actress.

Scoop hurried back to the newspaper and wrote a news story that was published with the photograph in News the next day. The story stated that Lex was having an affair with Star and that Lex's adultery was contrary to the beliefs he advocated on his television show. By coincidence, the next page of the same edition of News featured a separate story about the premiere of Star's new movie, correctly stating that Star had been in State Y for the entirety of the previous day. Scoop honestly believed that the woman in the photograph was Star, even though most people would have been able to tell from the photograph that this was not the case.

Would the First Amendment preclude liability if:

- 1) Star sued News for libel on the ground that the news story falsely stated that she was having an affair with Lex? Explain.
- 2) the hotel sued Scoop for trespass? Explain.
- 3) Lex sued News for invasion of privacy, claiming that the publication of the news story and photograph disclosed the truthful but highly offensive fact that he had engaged in an extramarital affair? Explain.

MEE Question 3

Fifteen years ago, Amy, Beck, and Curt formed a partnership, “Amy, Beck, and Curt Co.,” to engage in a retail shoe store business. The partnership is for a 25-year term. All real estate owned by the partnership is titled to “Amy, Beck, and Curt Co., a partnership.”

While the partnership has done well, the three partners have not managed their respective personal finances successfully. In order to deal with personal financial problems, Amy borrowed $25,000 from Green, Beck borrowed $50,000 from Red, and Curt borrowed $75,000 from White. The three partners each have defaulted on their respective loans.

Green, Red, and White are pursuing various avenues to recover what is owed to each of them.

Green has obtained a judgment against Amy, who is judgment-proof, and is considering attaching the partnership real estate.

Red has taken no legal action against Beck but wants to collect the amount of his loan to Beck from Beck’s interest in the partnership.

Curt has assigned all of his interest in the partnership to White. After the assignment, White asked to inspect the partnership books and records and demanded the right to participate in the management and affairs of the partnership. White is also considering the possibility of collecting Curt’s debt by forcing a dissolution and winding up of the partnership.

1. Can Green, as a judgment creditor of Amy, attach and execute upon the partnership real estate? Explain.
2. What steps should Red take to collect the amount of his loan to Beck from Beck’s interest in the partnership? Explain.
3. Does White have a right to inspect partnership books and records and to participate in the management of the partnership? Explain.
4. Can White force a dissolution and winding up of the partnership? Explain.

MEE Question 4

Two years ago, Landlord and Tenant entered into a five-year oral lease of an office at $800 per month, payable on the first day of each month. The lease was silent regarding Tenant's right to assign or sublet the office.

Three weeks ago, Tenant called Landlord, gave two weeks' notice of lease termination, and said that she planned to move out of state permanently.

Tenant told Landlord that Friend had agreed to take over the office space for the balance of the five-year lease. Landlord said that he would not accept Friend as a new tenant even though she was financially capable of paying the rent and that he would hold Tenant to the lease agreement for the balance of the five-year term.

Two weeks ago, Tenant vacated the office.

One week ago, on the day the next month's rent payment was due, Friend sent Landlord a check for $800, which Landlord refuses to cash. Landlord insists that Tenant is liable for the $800 rent. Tenant has not paid the $800 monthly rent. Landlord has sued Tenant to recover the $800 rent that she has not paid.

1. What type of tenancy did the oral lease agreement between Landlord and Tenant create? Explain.
2. Did Tenant properly terminate the tenancy? Explain.
3. Is Landlord entitled to collect $800 from Tenant? Explain.

MEE Question 5

Guest, a citizen of State A, ate oysters at Ron's Restaurant in State B. Guest paid for the meal with a $50 check. Ron's Restaurant is owned and operated by Ron, a citizen of State B.

After eating the oysters at Ron's Restaurant, Guest ate an ice cream sundae at the ice cream shop next door, which is owned and operated by CreamCorp, a State B corporation with its principal place of business in State B.

An hour later, Guest became ill and went to a hospital emergency room. Guest had to be admitted to the hospital for several days of tests, treatment, and observation. Ultimately, the doctors concluded that Guest was suffering from a severe case of food poisoning. Guest's hospital bills exceeded $75,000.

Guest stopped payment on the $50 check to Ron's Restaurant before the check cleared and has not otherwise paid for the meal.

Guest sued Ron (doing business as Ron's Restaurant) in the federal district court for the District of State B. Guest's complaint alleged that the oysters she ate at Ron's Restaurant caused her food poisoning. Guest further alleged that her damages exceed $75,000, exclusive of costs and interest.

Ron doubts that the oysters were contaminated because no other patrons suffered an adverse reaction to the oysters served that day. Ron believes that Guest became ill because the ice cream served at CreamCorp's shop was made with unpasteurized milk. Thus, Ron has moved to compel the joinder of CreamCorp as an additional defendant in the lawsuit so that, if the jury concludes Guest became sick from the ice cream, it can render a verdict against CreamCorp and not Ron. Ron has also added to his answer a claim against Guest for the unpaid $50.

Guest objects to the joinder of CreamCorp. Guest has also moved to strike Ron's claim for the unpaid $50 from Ron's answer.

1. Should the court order the joinder of CreamCorp as an additional defendant? Explain.
2. Do the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit Ron to join his claim against Guest for the unpaid $50 to Guest's lawsuit against Ron? Explain.
3. If the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit Ron to join his claim against Guest for the unpaid $50, will the court have subject matter jurisdiction to hear that claim? Explain.

MEE Question 6

Ten years ago, Wife created a valid trust (Wife's Trust) and named Bank as trustee. The trust instrument directed Bank to: (1) pay all trust income to Wife during her lifetime; (2) upon Wife's death, pay all trust income to Niece during Niece's lifetime; and (3) upon Niece's death, distribute the trust principal to Niece's "then living issue."

Article Five of Wife's Trust provided as follows:

Wife may revoke or amend this trust at any time prior to her death by a written instrument delivered to Bank.

Contemporaneously with the creation of Wife's Trust, Wife and her husband, Husband, executed separate wills. Each will devised the respective testator's entire probate estate to Bank "to hold as part of the principal of Wife's Trust, which was created simultaneously with the execution of my will."

Five years ago, Wife delivered to Bank a written instrument titled "Amendment to Wife's Trust." In this instrument, Wife directed Bank to distribute the trust principal to Niece's "children age 21 years or older who are living when Wife's Trust terminates."

Four months ago, Wife, Husband, and Niece were involved in an automobile accident. Wife was pronounced dead in the ambulance. Husband died three days later, and Niece died seven days later. Wife, who had previously transferred all of her assets to Wife's Trust, had no probate estate. Husband's probate estate was worth $300,000.

Niece had two children: Son, now age 20, and Daughter, who died one year ago at the age of 28. Daughter had one child (Grandchild), now age 4.

1. Does the Amendment to Wife's Trust apply to the assets distributable to that trust from Husband's probate estate? Explain.
2. Is Son entitled to a share of the assets of Wife's Trust given the language of the Amendment to Wife's Trust? Explain.
3. Is Grandchild entitled to a share of the assets of Wife's Trust given the language of the Amendment to Wife's Trust? Explain.

MEE Question 7

Six years ago, Hal and Wendy were married in State A. Both of them had been previously divorced. Hal, age 40, was a successful businessman earning $200,000 per year. Wendy, age 30, was a struggling songwriter earning $20,000 per year.

Two weeks before their wedding, Hal told Wendy that his lawyer (Lawyer) had advised him not to marry Wendy unless she signed a premarital agreement. Hal gave Wendy a copy of the agreement Lawyer had proposed and suggested that she review it with Lawyer or another attorney of her own choosing. The agreement specified that in the event of divorce:

1. Each spouse waives all claims to property acquired by the other during the first five years of the marriage;
2. The spouses will share joint physical and legal custody of any children born to them during the marriage.

When Hal gave Wendy the proposed agreement, she burst into tears. Wendy was very angry and hurt, but she did not want to call off the wedding at such a late date. Reluctantly, she agreed to discuss the matter with Lawyer.

Lawyer gave Wendy an accurate list of Hal's assets and a copy of Hal's tax returns for the past three years. Lawyer urged her to consult another attorney. After conferring with her family, but not an attorney, Wendy decided to sign the proposed agreement. The day before their wedding, she and Hal signed the agreement in Lawyer's office in State A.

Four years ago, Hal and Wendy had a child (Child).

Six months ago, Hal and Wendy moved to State B. Hal's business has continued to prosper. He currently earns $300,000 per year. Since the marriage, Hal has used his business income to acquire assets worth about $500,000. Wendy has continued to write songs. Her current income is $30,000 per year.

Three months ago, after Wendy discovered that Hal was having an affair, she took Child and moved back to State A, where she plans to remain. Since leaving Hal, Wendy has written and recorded several songs about her marriage. Wendy's agent believes that these songs "will hit the top of the charts."

State A has adopted the Uniform Premarital Agreement Act. State B has not. The premarital agreement contains no choice-of-law provision.

1. Which state's law governs the enforceability of the premarital agreement? Explain.
2. Is the waiver-of-property-rights provision in the premarital agreement enforceable? Explain.
3. Is the child-custody provision in the premarital agreement enforceable? Explain.

4. Are the profits to be derived from Wendy's songs written after she left Hal subject to division at divorce? Explain.

MEE Question 8

Rancher conducts cattle roping clinics in various locations around the country. Rancher thought it would be more profitable to buy his own land and conduct the clinics there.

In March, Rancher bought the Bar-X Ranch (Ranch) with a large pasture on which Rancher could hold the roping clinics.

In April, before Rancher had offered any roping clinics on the property, Rancher agreed to allow Gasco, an oil and natural gas company, to explore for gas reserves on Ranch. Before the parties signed a contract, Gasco executives drove around Ranch, and Rancher pointed out to them the pasture where he planned to hold his roping clinics. Rancher told the Gasco executives, "I can't wait to start holding my clinics here so that I won't have to go on the road anymore. Every summer that I travel with my clinics costs me $50,000. It will cost me only $10,000 to work from Ranch."

In July, Rancher and Gasco signed a contract in which Gasco agreed to complete its gas exploration and restore Ranch to its pre-exploration condition by March 31 of the following year. Gasco immediately began exploring for gas on Ranch.

By March 31 of the following year, Gasco had completed its exploration but chose not to restore Ranch to its pre-exploration condition. Because of Gasco's failure to restore Ranch, the pasture was not usable, and Rancher had to cancel his plans to conduct roping clinics on Ranch that summer.

Rancher sued Gasco for breach of contract. At trial, an expert for Rancher testified that because of Gasco's failure to promptly restore Ranch to its pre-exploration condition, it would cost $500,000 and take three years to restore Ranch. Furthermore, during that time Ranch could not be used for roping clinics.

An expert for Gasco testified that Ranch was worth only $20,000 less in its unrestored condition than if it had been restored to its pre-exploration condition. There was no other expert testimony.

Rancher testified that Ranch could not be used for roping clinics for the next three summers. Rancher estimated that 50 people would have attended the roping clinics each year, and each person would have paid a fee of $2,000, for a total of $100,000 per year. Therefore, Rancher seeks $300,000 for his losses.

The trial court found that there was an enforceable contract between the parties and that Gasco had breached the contract by failing to restore Ranch. The court awarded Rancher $500,000 for the cost of restoring Ranch to its pre-exploration condition and $300,000 for his losses.

1. Did the court err in awarding Rancher the cost of restoring Ranch to its pre-exploration condition? Explain.
2. Did the court err in awarding Rancher $300,000 for damages resulting from Rancher's inability to conduct roping clinics on Ranch for three years? Explain.

MEE Question 9

Two months ago, Finisher, an individual who refinishes antique furniture, entered into a contract with Law Firm to refinish a bookcase for $3,000.

Two weeks ago, Finisher entered into a contract with Restaurant to refinish a table for $1,000.

Ten days ago, Finisher hired Administrator to help Finisher manage the business. Finisher put Administrator in charge of opening the mail, recording incoming payments from customers, indorsing checks on behalf of Finisher, and depositing checks to Finisher's account at Bank. Finisher also put Administrator in charge of answering and resolving customer complaints.

Five days ago, Administrator opened Finisher's mail and found two checks.

The first check was from Law Firm and was drawn on Law Firm's account at Bank. The check was payable to the order of Finisher in the amount of $1,500. The words "Payment in full for bookcase work" appeared in handwriting on the bottom left-hand corner of the face of the check. The Law Firm check was stapled to a letter addressed to Finisher in which Law Firm reminded Finisher that when Finisher's employees were installing the refinished bookcase, one of them ripped a hole in an expensive carpet. Law Firm claims that the damage was $1,500, while Finisher claims that the damage to the carpet was only $500.

The second check was from Restaurant and was drawn on Restaurant's account at Bank. It was payable to the order of Finisher in the amount of $1,000.

The day the checks arrived, Administrator indorsed both checks in the name of Finisher. Administrator deposited the Law Firm check in Finisher's account at Bank. Administrator cashed the Restaurant check at CheckNow, a check cashing business. CheckNow gave Administrator $1,000 for the check. CheckNow then deposited the Restaurant check in its account at Bank.

The following day, Bank paid the Law Firm and Restaurant checks, and Administrator disappeared.

Two days ago, Finisher discovered that the Restaurant check was cashed by CheckNow and demanded that CheckNow repay the $1,000 to Finisher.

Yesterday, Finisher discovered the "full satisfaction" letter in Administrator's files. Finisher immediately contacted Law Firm, tendered back $1,500, the amount of the Law Firm check, and demanded payment of the full amount owed. Law Firm refused to accept the tender and insisted that it was no longer liable for the additional $1,500 that Finisher claimed was still owed.

1. May Finisher recover the balance of $1,500 from Law Firm for the refinishing work on the bookcase? Explain.
2. May Finisher recover from CheckNow the amount of the Restaurant check? Explain.

DISCUSSION

Summary

Bank's filing of a financing statement was ineffective to perfect its interest in Debtor's delivery trucks because the trucks were covered by a certificate-of-title statute. Finance Company's interest is therefore superior to Bank's because Finance Company properly perfected its interest by notation on the trucks' certificates of title.

Global's security interest in the GPS units continued after the units were attached to the trucks, but that interest will be subordinate to Finance Company's interest if Finance Company's security interest in "delivery trucks" is interpreted to include the GPS units installed in the trucks.

Bank's security interest in the GPS units installed in the remaining 15 trucks is a perfected security interest in "equipment." However, its interest is subordinate to Global's perfected purchase-money security interest in the same equipment.

Point One: (30–40%)

Finance Company has a superior claim to the 25 vehicles in which it has a security interest because its interest is perfected and Bank's is not. Where a motor vehicle certificate-of-title statute calls for perfection by notation on the certificate of title, the filing of a financing statement will not perfect an interest in the vehicles.

Debtor's fleet of delivery trucks is "equipment" for purposes of Article 9. See UCC § 9-102(a)(33). Bank has a security interest in that equipment. However, the facts tell us that the delivery trucks are subject to a certificate-of-title statute that provides for perfection by notation of a security interest on the certificate of title. Filing a financing statement is "not . . . effective to perfect a security interest in property subject to" such a statute. UCC § 9-311(a)(2). Thus, Bank did not perfect its interest in Debtor's delivery trucks by filing a financing statement.

Finance Company, on the other hand, did perfect its interest in the 25 trucks by complying with the applicable certificate-of-title statute and noting its interest on the certificates of title. See UCC § 9-311(b). Thus, Finance Company's perfected security interest in the 25 trucks is superior to Bank's unperfected interest. See UCC § 9-322(a)(2).

Point Two(a): (10–20%)

Once the GPS units were attached to Debtor's delivery trucks, they became accessions to those motor vehicles. Nonetheless, Global's interest in the GPS units continues after their attachment to the delivery trucks.

Where, as here, "goods . . . are physically united with other goods in such a manner that the identity of the original goods is not lost," the goods become accessions. UCC § 9-102(a)(1). A security interest in goods that is created and perfected before the goods become accessions continues after the goods become accessions. UCC § 9-335(a) & (b). Thus, Global's perfected security interest in the GPS units continued despite the fact that the units were attached to Debtor's trucks.

When the collateral of one creditor becomes united with the collateral of another, each creditor's collateral is an "accession" to the other creditor's collateral, and the two items of collateral together are regarded as "the whole." See UCC § 9-335, cmt. 3. Whether either creditor's security interest applies to "the whole," or applies only to its original collateral, "turns on the description of the collateral in [that creditor's] security agreement." UCC § 9-335, cmt. 5.

In this case, Global's security interest in the GPS units certainly does not cover "the whole" (i.e., delivery trucks with GPS units installed).

On the other hand, Finance Company's described security interest in the specifically identified delivery trucks expressly includes all installed accessories and therefore covers the GPS units.

Point Two(b): (10–20%)

Finance Company's interest in the delivery trucks and installed GPS units is superior to Global's interest in the GPS units.

The priority rules governing accessions are normally the same as the rules for other collateral. See UCC § 9-335(c). However, as it does in other places, Article 9 makes an exception when, as here, there is an applicable certificate-of-title statute. UCC § 9-335(d) provides that "[a] security interest in an accession is subordinate to a security interest in the whole which is perfected by compliance with the requirements of a certificate-of-title statute”

Thus, Global’s security interest in the GPS units installed in the trucks claimed by Finance Company is subordinate to Finance Company’s claim, which was perfected by notation on the trucks’ certificates of title. The policy rationale for preferring Finance Company in these circumstances is to “enable a secured party to rely upon a certificate of title without having to check the UCC files to determine whether any components of the collateral may be encumbered.” UCC § 9-335, cmt. 7.

Point Three: (30–40%)

Global’s purchase-money security interest prevails over Bank’s conflicting security interest in the remaining GPS units.

Bank’s perfected security interest covers inventory and equipment, including after-acquired equipment and inventory. The GPS units are “goods” that are properly classified as equipment because they are not inventory, farm products, or consumer goods. UCC § 9-102(a)(33) (equipment); see UCC § 9-102(a)(34) (farm products), (44) (goods) & (48) (inventory). The after-acquired collateral clause in Bank’s security agreement is valid, see UCC § 9-204(a), and Bank’s priority dates to the time it filed its financing statement covering equipment, see UCC § 9-322(a)(1), even though its interest in the GPS units did not attach or perfect until Debtor acquired rights in the units. Thus, Bank has a perfected security interest in the GPS units.

Global, however, has a purchase-money security interest in the GPS units. A security interest in goods is a purchase-money security interest if the collateral “secures a purchase-money obligation incurred with respect to that collateral.” UCC § 9-103(a)(1) & (b)(1). Global’s interest in the GPS units secures a purchase-money obligation—the $40,000 debt to Global that Debtor incurred “as all or part of the price of the collateral.” See UCC § 9-103(a)(2). Hence, the security interest is a purchase-money security interest. Global promptly filed a financing statement and its interest was perfected as soon as Debtor obtained possession of the GPS units.

A purchase-money security interest in equipment that is perfected when the debtor takes possession of the collateral prevails over a conflicting perfected interest in the same equipment, even if the conflicting interest is earlier in time. UCC § 9-324(a). Thus, although Bank’s priority dates to June 1, its interest is nonetheless subordinate to Global’s later-in-time purchase-money security interest.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW IV.F.2.a. & g., 3.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) To what extent does the First Amendment shield a newspaper from liability in a defamation action for publishing a false statement about a public figure?
 - (2) Does the First Amendment shield a reporter from liability in a civil trespass action for trespassing on private property while investigating a news story on a matter of public concern?
 - (3) Does the First Amendment shield a newspaper from liability in an invasion-of-privacy action based on disclosure of private facts in a newspaper story about a matter of public concern if the reporter did not break the law in obtaining the story?

DISCUSSION

Summary

New York Times v. Sullivan requires plaintiffs who are public figures to prove “actual malice” in order to receive money damages for defamation. If News was merely negligent in identifying the unknown woman as Star, Star cannot recover damages. But because of the conflicting stories about Star, News may have acted with reckless disregard of the truth and, therefore, with actual malice. The First Amendment does not shield Scoop from liability for trespass under generally applicable tort law; here, because Scoop’s acts constituted trespass under generally applicable tort law, he is liable for damages. Finally, Lex’s action for invasion of privacy should fail. Truthful disclosure of private facts is protected by the First Amendment unless the press did not obtain the information lawfully or the disclosure is not on a matter of public concern. Here, the published facts were on a matter of public concern because Lex is a public figure and his hypocrisy about adultery is newsworthy. Because neither News nor Scoop broke the law in obtaining the photograph, News is not liable to Lex under the First Amendment.

Point One: (40–50%)

Star cannot successfully sue News under a libel theory because the facts do not appear to support a finding that the reporting was done with actual malice.

In New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 280 (1964), the United States Supreme Court held that public officials seeking to recover damages in a defamation action (libel or slander) must prove that the defendant reporter acted with “actual malice,” defined as “knowledge that [the published defamation] was false” or “reckless disregard of whether it was false or not.” Proof of negligent falsehood is insufficient to permit liability for defamation.

The Supreme Court has extended this standard to public figures who assume “roles of especial prominence in the affairs of society. Some occupy positions of such persuasive power and influence that they are deemed public figures for all purposes. More commonly, those classed as public figures have thrust themselves to the forefront of particular public controversies in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved.” Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 345 (1974).

Here, Star, a world-famous actress, is undeniably a public figure. She can recover only if she proves that News acted with actual malice, i.e., that News knew that the woman Scoop photographed was not Star, or that it acted with reckless disregard with regard to that fact. There is no indication that News acted with knowledge of falsity; indeed, we are told that Scoop “honestly believed” that Star was Lex’s adulterous partner. But it is a much closer question whether News acted with “reckless disregard” for the truth. While logical or factual consistency is not demanded by New York Times, the fact that the same edition of News reported Star to be in another state shows that News very easily could have discovered Scoop’s report to be untrue. The fact that “most people” could have seen that Star was not the woman in Scoop’s photograph also provides some support for recklessness in reporting. These factors probably are inadequate to show that News acted with reckless disregard for the facts, but it is a close question.

Point Two: (15–25%)

There is no First Amendment privilege giving the press immunity from liability arising under generally applicable law, even when in pursuit of a news story on a matter of public concern.

The First Amendment does not shield the press from liability arising under generally applicable law not aimed at suppression of free speech. In Cohen v. Cowles Media Co., 501 U.S. 663 (1991), the United States Supreme Court stated that “generally applicable laws do not offend the First Amendment simply because their enforcement against the press has incidental effects on its ability to gather and report the news. . . . [E]nforcement of such general laws against the press is not subject to stricter scrutiny than would be applied to enforcement against other persons or organizations.” Id. at 669–70.

Here, Scoop’s actions in breaking into the hotel constituted trespass under generally applicable law that does not single out the press for special treatment. Scoop, like any other member of the public, is subject to tort law that applies to all members of society, even when he is engaged in the journalistic activities of gathering and reporting the news. Thus, the First Amendment is no shield to liability for him, and the hotel can collect damages for his trespass.

Point Three: (30–40%)

News is probably immune from liability for invading Lex’s privacy because the published information was lawfully obtained and involves a matter of public concern.

In a series of cases, the United States Supreme Court has held that where a media defendant has lawfully obtained a private fact, such as the identity of a rape victim, the First Amendment shields the media from liability as long as the news story involves a matter of public concern. See, e.g., Cox Broadcasting v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469 (1975); Florida Star v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524

(1989); Bartnicki v. Vopper Corp., 532 U.S. 514 (2001). In some jurisdictions, the First Amendment protection is incorporated directly into the tort rule, and the disclosure of private facts is not tortious if the facts are “of legitimate concern to the public.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 652D.

In this case, the First Amendment would shield News from liability. First, neither News nor its employee Scoop acted unlawfully in procuring the picture. Scoop took the photograph from a public vantage point and was not breaking the law in doing so. Indeed, publication of the picture was not really publication of a “private” fact at all. Lex was kissing the young woman on a public street. Although he was in a private car, passersby (e.g., Scoop) apparently could observe the kiss. A court might well conclude that Lex had no reasonable expectation of privacy under the circumstances.

Moreover, the news story about Lex’s adultery addresses a matter of public concern. Lex is undeniably a public figure under the Gertz test, see Point One, as he is a nationally famous lawyer and television personality. In addition, given the strong position he has taken publicly opposing marital infidelity, evidence that his personal actions belie his public arguments is relevant to the public debate that Lex has voluntarily thrust himself into. Accordingly, because the photograph was newsworthy and lawfully obtained, News cannot be held liable for invasion of privacy.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP VI., VII., VIII.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Can Green, as a judgment creditor of Amy, attach and execute upon the partnership real estate?
 - (2) What steps should Red take to collect the amount of his loan to Beck from Beck's interest in the partnership?
 - (3) Does White have a right to inspect partnership books and records and to participate in the management of the partnership?
 - (4) Can White force a dissolution and winding up of the partnership?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Green cannot attach and execute upon the partnership property because that property is owned by the partnership and is not subject to attachment and execution by a creditor of an individual partner. To collect the amount of his loan to Beck, Red must first reduce his claim to a judgment and seek a charging order against the partner's financial interest in the partnership. White does not have a right to inspect partnership books and records because non-financial partnership rights, such as the right to inspect partnership books and records, to demand information from other partners, or to participate in the management or affairs of the partnership, cannot be exercised by a creditor of an individual partner, nor can they be assigned by a partner.

White cannot force a dissolution and winding up of the partnership. A transferee of a partner's financial interest in the partnership may only seek dissolution and winding up of the partnership if the partnership is at will or, if the partnership is for a term or a particular undertaking, after the term or undertaking has been completed. Here, the partnership is for a specific term, and that term has not expired.

Point One: (20–30%)

Green, a judgment creditor of Amy, an individual partner, cannot attach and execute upon the partnership real estate.

A judgment creditor of an individual partner may not attach and execute upon partnership real estate to satisfy his claim against that partner.

Under the Uniform Partnership Act (UPA) (1914), partners are tenants in partnership in specific items of partnership property. UPA § 25 (1914). The incidents of this tenancy include an equal right to use the partnership property for partnership purposes. Id. § 25(2)(a). However, a partner's interest in specific items of partnership property is not subject to attachment or execution except upon a claim against the partnership. Id. § 25(2)(c).

Under the Uniform Partnership Act (1997), the partnership is a legal entity distinct from its partners. UPA § 201(a) (1997). Partnership property is owned by the partnership and a partner is not a co-owner of such property. Id. § 501. Therefore, partnership property is not subject to execution by an individual partner's creditors. Id. § 501 cmt.

Thus, Amy has no interest in partnership real estate that could be subject to attachment and execution by a judgment creditor such as Green.

Point Two: (20–30%)

Red should reduce his claim against Beck to a judgment and should then seek a charging order against Beck's financial interest in the partnership.

A creditor of an individual partner who wants to pursue a partner's financial interest in the partnership must first reduce his claim to a judgment. A creditor of an individual partner who has reduced his claim to a judgment may seek a charging order against that partner's financial interest in the partnership. UPA § 28 (1914); UPA § 504 (1997). The partner's financial interest (called the "transferable interest in the partnership" under the 1997 Act) is the partner's share of profits and losses and the right to receive distributions. See UPA § 26 (1914); UPA § 502 (1997). This financial interest is the only interest of a partner in the partnership that can be pursued by a creditor of an individual partner.

Thus, Red should reduce his claim against Beck to a judgment and should then seek a charging order against Beck's financial interest in the partnership.

Another way Red might collect from Beck's interest in the partnership is to convince Beck to assign him Beck's interest in the partnership in which case Red would succeed to Beck's financial interest in the partnership. See Points Three and Four.

Point Three: (20–30%)

White, an assignee of Curt's partnership interest, has received only Curt's financial interest in the partnership; White has no right to inspect partnership books and records or to participate in the management of the partnership.

Generally a person may become a partner only with the consent of all the partners. UPA § 18(g) (1914); UPA § 401(i) (1997). Thus, a partner does not have the unilateral power to make someone a partner by transferring his or her partnership interest to them.

The assignee of a partnership interest receives only the financial interest of the partner. See UPA § 27(1) (1914); UPA § 503(b)(1)–(2) (1997). The 1997 Act refers to this financial interest as the partner's transferable interest in the partnership. UPA § 502 (1997). "Section 502 continues the UPA Section 26 concept that a partner's only transferable interest in the partnership is the partner's share of profits and losses and right to receive distributions, that is, the partner's financial rights." See id. cmt. An assignee does not acquire the right to inspect partnership books and records, or to participate (or interfere) in the management or conduct of the business. UPA § 27(1) (1914); UPA § 503(a)(3) (1997).

In sum, because White is a mere assignee of Curt's partnership interest, White has received only Curt's financial interest in the partnership; White is not a partner and has no right to inspect partnership books and records or to participate in the management of the partnership.

Point Four: (20–30%)

White may not force a dissolution and winding up of the partnership because it is a partnership for a term and the term has not yet been completed.

White is a transferee of Curt's financial interest in the partnership. (See Point Three.) A transferee of a partner's financial interest in a partnership may seek dissolution of the partnership if the partnership is a partnership at will or, if a partnership is for a term or a particular undertaking, the term or the undertaking has been completed. UPA § 32(2) (1914); UPA § 503(b)(3) (1997). Under the 1997 Act, the court will dissolve a partnership for a term and order a winding up at the request of a transferee of a partner's financial interest after the expiration of the term and only if it is equitable to do so. See UPA § 801(6)(i) & cmt. 9 (1997).

In this case the partnership is a partnership for a term of 25 years, not a partnership at will, and the term has not yet expired. Therefore, a transferee of a partner's financial interest may not seek dissolution and winding up of the partnership. Consequently, White cannot force a dissolution and winding up of the partnership.

REAL PROPERTY I.D.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) What type of tenancy did the oral lease between Landlord and Tenant create?
 - (2) Did Tenant properly terminate the tenancy?
 - (3) Is Landlord entitled to collect $800 from Tenant?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under the Statute of Frauds, a lease for a term of more than one year (in some states, three years) must be in writing or its electronic equivalent. When a tenant enters into an oral lease that violates the Statute of Frauds and the landlord accepts rent from the tenant, a periodic tenancy ensues if, as here, the tenant has been in possession and paying rent for a substantial period. Either party can terminate a periodic tenancy by giving proper notice. A proper termination notice provides notice for a period at least equal to the payment period specified in the lease agreement. Here, the payment period was one month, and Tenant's two-week notice was thus improper. As a result, Tenant still owes rent to Landlord. However, because the lease did not prohibit an assignment, Tenant's interest was freely assignable; Landlord's consent was not required. Because Tenant properly assigned her lease to Friend, who timely paid the $800 rent due to Landlord, Landlord cannot recover $800 from Tenant.

Point One: (35–45%)

The oral five-year lease between Landlord and Tenant violated the Statute of Frauds. Because Tenant took possession two years ago and Landlord accepted monthly rent payments from Tenant throughout that time, a periodic month-to-month tenancy was created.

Most states have enacted a Statute of Frauds that requires leases of more than one year (in some states, three years) to be in writing. A lease subject to the Statute of Frauds is voidable until the tenant takes possession and the landlord accepts rent from the tenant. If the tenant takes possession and the landlord accepts rent, an at-will or periodic tenancy is created because there has been partial performance. See 3 GEORGE W. THOMPSON, COMMENTARIES ON THE MODERN LAW OF REAL PROPERTY, § 1021 (1980).

Here, Tenant took possession of the office and Landlord accepted rent. Thus, a periodic or at-will tenancy was created.

An at-will tenancy may be terminated without notice; a periodic tenancy requires notice for a period at least equal to the rent-payment term. Where, as here, rent has been paid for a substantial period of time, the tenancy is generally classified as periodic because payment over time evidences a commitment to the arrangement and creates expectations that justify notice of termination. Assuming that a periodic tenancy was created, most likely it was a month-to-month tenancy because the lease provided for monthly payments of rent.

Point Two: (15–25%)

A periodic month-to-month tenancy is terminable by notice given at least one month prior to the termination date. Here, the tenancy was not properly terminated because Tenant gave Landlord only two weeks' notice.

A periodic month-to-month tenancy can be terminated by either party with a one-month notice of termination. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF PROPERTY § 1.5, cmt. f. At common law, an oral notice was sufficient. Today, many states require written notice of termination. See, e.g., CAL. CIVIL CODE § 1946 (West 1985) (requiring written notice minimum of 30 days before date specified in notice).

Here, Tenant gave Landlord a two-week notice of termination instead of the required one-month notice. Thus the notice to terminate was ineffective to terminate the month-to-month tenancy as of the beginning of the next month even if Tenant's oral notice of termination was acceptable under state law.

Point Three: (35–45%)

Because the lease did not prohibit an assignment, Tenant was free to assign the lease to Friend. Because Friend properly took an assignment of the office lease from Tenant and timely paid the $800 rent to Landlord, Landlord has no claim against Tenant for unpaid rent.

Where a periodic tenancy arises, the terms of the unwritten lease, except the provision relating to the lease term, are enforceable. See generally STOEBOCK & WHITMAN, THE LAW OF PROPERTY § 6.15, at 261–62, § 6.17, at 265–66 (3d ed. 2000); RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF PROPERTY § 2.3(2). In the absence of a contrary provision in a lease, a tenant's interest, like other property interests, is assignable. The assignee of a month-to-month tenant takes a month-to-month tenancy.

When a tenant assigns his interest in a lease, privity of estate arises between the assignee and the landlord. Privity of contract continues to exist between the landlord and the tenant. See HERBERT HOVENKAMP & SHELDON KURTZ, PRINCIPLES OF PROPERTY LAW § 9.10 (2005). The tenant is still contractually bound to pay rent, and thus serves as a surety for unpaid rent; if the assignee fails to pay the rent, the tenant is liable to the landlord. See id. at 302–03. Here, because the assignee, Friend, paid the rent to Landlord when Friend sent Landlord the $800 check, no additional rent was due and Tenant is not liable to Landlord for $800.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE I.A.1., IV.C.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Do the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit a defendant to compel a plaintiff to join other parties as additional defendants when the original defendant alleges that those other parties are responsible for the plaintiff's injury?
 - (2) Do the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit a defendant to join a counterclaim against the plaintiff when the counterclaim is for an unpaid bill relating to the transaction that gave rise to the plaintiff's claim?
 - (3) Does a federal court have jurisdiction over a defendant's state-law counterclaim when that counterclaim is for less than $75,000 but is related to the plaintiff's original claim?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Ron probably cannot force Guest to join CreamCorp as a defendant because CreamCorp is not a necessary party within the meaning of Rule 19 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Ron's claim that CreamCorp caused Guest's injury does not provide a sufficient justification for forcing the joinder of CreamCorp over Guest's objection.

The Federal Rules permit Ron to join any counterclaim he may have against Guest, regardless of whether the counterclaim arises out of or relates to Guest's claim against Ron.

A federal court ordinarily would not have jurisdiction over Ron's $50 state-law claim because it does not satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement of diversity jurisdiction. Here, however, Ron's counterclaim arose out of the same transaction as Guest's tort claim. Therefore, it is likely that the federal district court will have subject matter jurisdiction to hear the counterclaim under the supplemental jurisdiction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1367.

Point One: (40–50%)

Rule 19 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure does not afford Ron a means to compel Guest to join CreamCorp as an additional defendant because CreamCorp does not qualify as a necessary party.

Ordinarily the plaintiff is the master of her suit and gets to decide whom to sue, with whom to sue, where to sue, and what claims to bring. Thus, if a plaintiff like Guest sues only one defendant when she has claims against two defendants, ordinarily there is nothing that a defendant, like Ron, can do to compel the plaintiff to join another party. See FLEMING JAMES, JR., ET AL., CIVIL PROCEDURE § 10.11 (5th ed. 2001).

But there are some checks on plaintiff autonomy. Rule 19, which governs the joinder of persons needed for just adjudication, authorizes joinder of defendants over the plaintiff's objection only when:

- “the court cannot accord complete relief among existing parties” if the absent person is not joined, or
- the absent person claims an interest in the action that would “as a practical matter” be impaired or impeded if that person is not joined, or
- the person's absence may leave any of the parties subject to a risk of multiple liability or inconsistent obligations.

FED. R. CIV. P. 19(a). Where any of these criteria is met, courts and commentators commonly refer to the absent party as a necessary party, and a court is empowered to join that party, even over the plaintiff's objection. See generally JACK H. FRIEDENTHAL ET AL., CIVIL PROCEDURE § 6.5 at 357–59 (4th ed. 2005).

In this case, none of these requirements is satisfied. First, CreamCorp's presence is not necessary for the court to afford complete relief as between Guest and Ron. If Guest got sick because the oysters were contaminated, the court can afford complete relief by holding Ron liable and awarding damages to Guest. If, on the other hand, Guest became sick because the ice cream was made from unpasteurized milk, then the court can afford complete relief between Ron and Guest by refusing to hold Ron liable. Either way, complete and proper relief can be accorded as between Ron and Guest, without CreamCorp's presence. If the jury or court finds that the oysters did not cause the food poisoning, Guest will have to initiate a separate suit to determine if she can recover from CreamCorp. While inefficient, this result does not render CreamCorp a necessary party under Rule 19. See FRIEDENTHAL, supra, at 359 n. 30. Cf. Temple v. Synthes Corp., 498 U.S. 5, 7–8 (1990) (per curiam) (concluding that joint tortfeasors are permissive, not necessary, parties under Rule 19(a)). In short, Guest's ability to recover whatever (if anything) she is entitled to recover from Ron is unaffected by CreamCorp's absence.

Second, although CreamCorp may have an interest in the subject matter of the action if Ron attempts to prove that CreamCorp's product caused Guest's food poisoning, that interest is not likely to be impaired or impeded if CreamCorp is not joined. If the jury finds that Guest's illness was caused by the oysters, CreamCorp's interest would not be impaired. If the jury finds that Guest's illness was caused by CreamCorp's ice cream, CreamCorp will not be bound by the judgment since it was not a party, and it will be free to relitigate the issue of the ice cream's toxicity if Guest sues it in a separate lawsuit. See Janney Montgomery Scott, Inc. v. Shepard Niles, Inc., 11 F.3d 399, 407 (3d Cir. 1993) (declining to hold that “any potential effect the doctrine [of stare decisis] may have on an absent party's rights makes the absent party's joinder compulsory under Rule 19(a)”); Pujol v. Shearson/American Express, Inc., 877 F.2d 132, 136 (1st Cir. 1989) (stating that “[t]he mere fact . . . that Party A, in a suit against Party B, intends to introduce evidence that will indicate that a non-party, C, behaved improperly does not, by itself, make C a necessary party”).

Third, Ron does not face a substantial risk of incurring inconsistent obligations or double liability if CreamCorp is not joined here. If Ron is held liable to Guest, Ron will pay Guest but face no other liability or obligation on the same claim. If Ron is not held liable, then the possibility of double liability or inconsistent obligations does not exist.

Therefore, under Rule 19 Ron cannot compel Guest to join CreamCorp as an additional defendant.

Point Two: (20–30%)

Rule 13 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure not only permits, but requires, Ron to bring his claim for the unpaid restaurant bill as a counterclaim against Guest in the context of Guest's lawsuit against Ron because the counterclaim arises out of or relates to the same transaction or occurrence.

A claim for relief brought by a defendant against a plaintiff is called a counterclaim. Counterclaims are governed by Rule 13 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Rule 13 requires a defendant to bring a counterclaim against the plaintiff if the counterclaim arises out of the same transaction or occurrence as the plaintiff's claim against the defendant. FED. R. CIV. P. 13(a). Here, Ron's claim to be paid for the restaurant meal arises out of the same transaction and occurrence as Guest's claim that she became sick as a result of the meal. Both claims arose out of the meal Ron served to Guest.

Rule 13(b) further provides that an answer "may state as a counterclaim" any claim against the plaintiff "that is not compulsory" FED. R. CIV. P. 13(b) (emphasis added). Read together, these portions of the rule authorize Ron to bring a counterclaim against Guest for the unpaid $50 regardless of whether it arises out of the same transaction or occurrence as Guest's claim against Ron. Therefore, it is not necessary to determine whether Guest's claim and Ron's claim arose out of the same transaction or occurrence. In either case, Ron may bring the claim.

Point Three: (25–35%)

The federal district court likely would have jurisdiction to hear the counterclaim under the supplemental jurisdiction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1367, as long as the counterclaim for failure to pay the check and the plaintiff's claim for negligence form part of the same case for purposes of the case-or-controversy requirement of Article III.

Whether the federal court can assert jurisdiction over Ron's counterclaim is another matter. The counterclaim against Guest for failure to pay the $50 is a state-law claim that could not be brought on its own in federal court. While there is complete diversity of citizenship between Guest and Ron, the amount in controversy on the unpaid restaurant check claim is only $50 and doesn't come close to satisfying the $75,000 amount-in-controversy requirement for diversity jurisdiction. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a).

However, where a federal court already has jurisdiction over some claims, the supplemental jurisdiction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1367, authorizes district courts to hear claims that could not otherwise be heard in federal court if those claims “are so related to [the primary] claims in the action . . . that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution.” 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a). In determining whether or not the primary claim and the supplemental claim “are so related,” most courts apply the “common nucleus of operative fact” test announced by the United States Supreme Court in United Mine Workers v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 725 (1966) (stating that “[t]he state and federal claims must derive from a common nucleus of operative fact” to be part of the same “case” for constitutional purposes). See JAMES, supra, § 2.28 at 146–47.

Here, it is likely that Guest’s claim against Ron for food poisoning and Ron’s claim against Guest for the unpaid $50 arise out of a common nucleus of operative fact, namely the alleged food-poisoning incident. The reason that Guest stopped payment on the check and declined to pay for the food was because the food allegedly made her ill. See, e.g., Geisinger Medical Ctr. v. Gough, 160 F.R.D. 467, 470 (M.D. Pa. 1994) (concluding that the defendant’s claim that the plaintiff committed medical malpractice was a compulsory counterclaim to the plaintiff’s claim to recover for unpaid medical bills; “[t]he counterclaim is thus an offshoot of the same basic controversy as the plaintiff’s claim and necessarily involves common issues of law and fact that would require duplicative effort if tried in a separate action”).

Section 1367(c) affords the district court discretion to decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction in four circumstances: “(1) the claim raises a novel or complex issue of State law; (2) the claim substantially predominates over the claim or claims over which the district court has original jurisdiction; (3) the district court has dismissed all claims over which it has original jurisdiction; or (4) in exceptional circumstances, there are other compelling reasons for declining jurisdiction.” 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c). Here, the counterclaim for failure to pay the restaurant bill does not raise any novel or complex issues of state law. The restaurant bill claim does not predominate over the more factually complex claim of food poisoning. The district court has not dismissed the plaintiff’s claim. Nor are there any compelling reasons to decline to exercise jurisdiction. Therefore, it is likely that the district court would have supplemental jurisdiction to hear Ron’s counterclaim against Guest.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Can Husband pour over the assets of his probate estate into a revocable trust he did not create and, if yes, does an amendment to that trust made after Husband executed his will apply to the disposition of Husband's probate estate?
 - (2) Is Son entitled to a share of the assets contributed to Wife's Trust given that he had not reached age 21 when Wife and Niece died?
 - (3) Is Grandchild entitled to a share of the assets contributed to Wife's Trust under either the amendment to or the original terms of Wife's Trust?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Wife retained the power to amend Wife's Trust and therefore her amendment to that trust was valid. Under the Uniform Testamentary Additions to Trusts Act and like statutes, if a testator (Husband) bequeaths assets to the trustees of a revocable trust created by another (Wife), the terms of such trust, including amendments made after the testator signed his will, govern the disposition of the bequeathed assets. The terms of Wife's Trust, as amended, thus govern the disposition of Husband's probate estate. Son will take a share unless the trust instrument is construed to mean that the age contingency had to have been met when Niece died. Grandchild will take if he is treated as a substitute taker of Daughter's remainder interest. Under traditional anti-lapse statutes, Grandchild would not be a substitute taker; under some modern survivorship statutes (see Point Three), Grandchild would be.

Point One: (20–30%)

Husband can bequeath his probate assets to the trustees of a revocable trust created by Wife. The disposition of those assets will be governed by the terms of the trust, including amendments made after Husband executed his will.

Under the Uniform Testamentary Additions to Trusts Act and Uniform Probate Code (UPC), a person may bequeath assets to a trust created during the testator's lifetime, by the testator or another, so long as the trust is identified in the testator's will and its terms are incorporated in a writing executed before or concurrently with the execution of the testator's will. See UNIF. TESTAMENTARY ADDITIONS TO TRUSTS ACT § 1(a); UPC § 2-511(a). Under these acts, a devise is valid even if the trust is revocable or amendable. And, even if the trust is amended after the testator's will was executed, the terms of the amendment will govern the distribution of assets bequeathed to the trust. It makes no difference that the amendment was made by someone other than the testator. One of these uniform acts or a like statute has been enacted in every state. Thus Husband could pour his estate over to Wife's Trust, and the amendments to that trust would govern the disposition of his estate.

Point Two: (25–35%)

Whether Son takes depends upon the construction of the amendment to Wife's Trust. If the provision is construed to mean that Niece's children must be 21 or older at the time they survive Niece, Son will not take. If the provision is construed to require only that Niece's children who survive her eventually reach the age of 21, Son will take if and when he reaches age 21.

The amendment to Wife's Trust is capable of two interpretations. The narrower interpretation is that Niece's children must satisfy both the age and survivorship contingencies at Niece's death in order to take. The more liberal interpretation is that the age contingency can be satisfied after Niece's death. In construing the instrument, the court will attempt to effectuate Wife's intent. A strong argument can be made that only Niece's children satisfying both the age and survivorship contingencies at her death should take since the amendment specifies distribution to "children age 21 or older who are living" when the trust terminates. However, it is hard to imagine why Wife would have wanted to exclude a child of Niece simply because the child had not yet attained the age of 21 at Niece's death. It can also be argued that given Son was only 15 when the amendment was signed, the sole purpose of the age 21 requirement was to assure that a beneficiary was of sufficient maturity when he/she took possession of the property and that Wife never anticipated that Niece would die only five years later. Bank could easily keep the trust open until it was clear whether the underage child could meet the age contingency. The fact that the trust amendment specifies that principal must be paid when the trust terminates, not when income beneficiaries die, might also support this interpretation of the instrument.

Point Three: (20–30%)

Grandchild can take a share of the trust only if Grandchild is a substituted taker for Daughter under state law. In most states, Grandchild would not be and thus would not take.

Grandchild is not a taker under the trust instrument because the gift was limited to Niece's children who survived the trust termination and the word "children" includes the ancestor's immediate offspring, not more remote descendants. Most state anti-lapse statutes apply only to wills and thus would not apply to the trust amendment. In these states, Grandchild would not take any share of the trust funded by gifts from Wife or from Husband's estate.

However, some states have enacted Uniform Probate Code § 2-707 or a like statute. Under this statute, when a remainder class gift is bequeathed to a class composed of children and a child dies before the event upon which the remainder becomes possessory (here Niece's death), a substitute gift is created in the descendants of the deceased child; words of survivorship (such as "who are living") do not affect the creation of a substitute gift. Thus, under Uniform Probate Code § 2-707 and like statutes, Grandchild would take as the representative of the deceased child beneficiary, Daughter. However, in some states with statutes similar, but not identical, to § 2-707, the survivorship contingency contained in the trust amendment could eliminate any subsequent gift to Grandchild.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Which state's law governs enforceability of the premarital agreement?
 - (2) Is the waiver-of-property-rights provision in the premarital agreement enforceable?
 - (3) Is the child-custody provision in the premarital agreement enforceable?
 - (4) Are profits from the songs Wendy wrote after separation but before the divorce filing marital property subject to division at divorce?

DISCUSSION

Summary

In determining the enforceability of a premarital agreement, some states apply the law of the state in which the contract was signed and others apply the law of the state with which the parties have the most significant relationship. Under either test, the law of State A will probably govern here. State A has adopted the Uniform Premarital Agreement Act (UPAA), under which an agreement will be enforced unless (1) the party against whom enforcement is sought did not execute the agreement voluntarily, or (2) that party did not receive or waive fair and reasonable disclosure of the assets and obligations of the other party and can show that the agreement was unconscionable when executed. Thus the property-distribution provision of the agreement would be enforceable under State A law. In all states, a premarital agreement respecting child support or custody is voidable based on the child's best interest. In most states, marital property continues to accrue at least until a divorce petition has been filed. Profits from property, such as a song, created by a spouse during the marriage are subject to distribution at divorce.

Point One: (15–25%)

In determining the enforceability of a premarital agreement, states apply either the law of the state in which the contract was executed (here State A) or the state with the most significant relationship to the parties and the transaction. Under either test the court will likely apply the law of State A.

Some states apply the law of the state in which a premarital contract was executed in determining its enforceability. See, e.g., Hill v. Hill, 262 A.2d 661 (Del. Ch. 1970). Under this approach, the court should apply the law of State A.

Others, probably more numerous, apply the law of the state with the most significant relationship to the matter at hand. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONFLICT OF LAWS § 188. Hal and Wendy entered into a premarital agreement in State A, married there, had a child there, and lived there for all but a few months of their six-year marriage. Wendy and Child are in State A and Wendy plans to remain there. Wendy has a strong argument that State A's law should govern because of its interest in assuring that contracts executed and marriages consummated within its borders comply with its policies. On the other hand, Hal is in State B, State B was the marital home when Hal and Wendy separated, and some marital assets may be located there. Thus, State B may also have an interest in applying its law.

On these facts, it is likely, but not certain, that State A's interests are stronger, and State A's law will likely apply under either test.

Point Two: (35–45%)

In determining whether a premarital agreement governing property distribution at divorce is enforceable, courts consider whether the agreement was voluntarily made, whether it is substantively fair, and whether full disclosure of assets and obligations was made. The weight assigned to these factors varies from state to state, but under the UPAA, an agreement entered voluntarily and with reasonable disclosure of assets and obligations is enforceable.

Although courts were once hostile to premarital agreements, today all states permit spouses to contract premaritally with respect to rights and obligations in property. In all states, the enforceability of a premarital agreement turns on three factors: voluntariness, fairness, and disclosure. How courts apply these factors varies significantly from one state to the next.

In many states, an agreement is unenforceable if the party against whom enforcement is sought succeeds in showing any one of involuntariness, unfairness, or lack of adequate disclosure. However, under the UPAA, which has been adopted in 25 states and State A, the party against whom enforcement is sought must prove (1) involuntariness or (2) that “the agreement was unconscionable when it was executed” and that he or she did not receive or waive “fair and reasonable” disclosure and “did not have, or reasonably could not have had, an adequate knowledge” of the other's assets and obligations. UPAA § 6(a). Thus, under the UPAA, a court may not refuse to enforce a premarital agreement based on substantive unfairness unless it also finds inadequate disclosure or lack of knowledge.

Wendy is highly unlikely to succeed in establishing inadequate disclosure or lack of knowledge. Lawyer gave Wendy copies of Hal's tax returns for the past three years and an accurate list of his assets. Under the UPAA, Wendy would thus be required to show that her execution of the agreement was involuntary in order to avoid its enforcement.

In considering whether a premarital agreement was voluntarily executed, courts look to whether there was fraud, duress, or coercion. They agree that one party's insistence on signing the agreement as a condition of the marriage does not, by itself, render the agreement involuntary, but there is no consensus on what additional facts are sufficient to establish involuntariness. See AMER. LAW INST., PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF FAMILY DISSOLUTION § 7.04, Reporter's Notes, cmt. b. & d.

Many of the reported cases, like this one, involve a claim of involuntariness based on presentation of an agreement very close to the wedding date. In analyzing whether an agreement signed under these circumstances is voluntary, courts have looked at a wide range of factors, including the difficulty of conferring with independent counsel, other reasons for proceeding with the marriage (for example, a preexisting pregnancy), and financial losses and embarrassment arising from cancellation of the wedding. HARRY D. KRAUSE & DAVID D. MEYER, FAMILY LAW IN A NUTSHELL 73 (4th ed. 2003). In this case, Hal presented the proposed agreement a full two weeks before the wedding. Wendy was mature, had been previously married, and made her decision to sign after conferring with her family. There are no facts indicating lack of opportunity to confer with counsel or any particular hardship that would result from canceling the wedding. On these facts, it is unlikely, although not impossible, that Wendy can establish involuntariness. Under the UPAA, the agreement is likely enforceable.

Point Three: (5–10%)

In all states, a premarital agreement regarding child support or custody is unenforceable if it is not in the best interest of the child.

The traditional rule is that a premarital agreement cannot bind a court deciding child support or custody. Although the UPAA does not explicitly bar an agreement respecting child custody, “[l]ong tradition . . . would seem to ensure . . . that courts would not consider themselves bound by custody provisions they believe injurious to the child’s interest. The law of separation agreements in every state is explicit on that point, and there is no reason why premarital agreements would be treated differently.” IRA M. ELLMAN ET AL., FAMILY LAW: CASES, TEXT, PROBLEMS 839 (3d ed. 1998).

Point Four: (20–30%)

Profits from a song written after separation but before a final divorce decree is entered are likely to be classified as marital property subject to division at divorce.

In the majority of states, marital property continues to accrue until a final divorce decree is entered. See HARRY D. KRAUSE ET AL., FAMILY LAW: CASES, COMMENTS, AND QUESTIONS 756–57 (5th ed. 2003). In some states, however, marital property ceases to accrue after the date of permanent separation (see, e.g., N.C. GEN. STAT. § 50-20) or the date of filing for a divorce (see, e.g., N.Y. DOM. REL. L. § 236B). Wendy’s songs were written after the five-year property-distribution waiver period provided for in the premarital agreement. Thus, because no divorce petition has been filed, Wendy’s songs are probably marital property.

The fact that Wendy has not yet received profits from the songs does not change this result. Today, even contingent expectancies such as nonvested pension rights are subject to division at divorce if they were acquired through spousal effort during the marriage. Thus profits from Wendy’s songs, even if payment has not yet been made, would be divisible at divorce if the songs were created during the marriage. See KRAUSE ET AL., supra at 774–75. Of course, a court might find that the songs were worthless or that their value was too speculative for distribution.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Should Rancher's damages for harm to Ranch be measured by the cost of completion ($500,000) or by the difference in value ($20,000)?
 - (2) Were Rancher's losses from the roping clinics foreseeable?
 - (3) Were Rancher's losses from the roping clinics ascertainable with reasonable certainty?
 - (4) Should the award of damages for Rancher's losses from the roping clinics take into account expenses he avoided?
 - (5) Did the damage award properly account for losses Rancher could reasonably have avoided by mitigation?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under basic principles of contract law an injured party is entitled to a damage award that will put him in the position he would have been in had the contract been performed. Here, with regard to the harm to Ranch, the question is whether the proper measure of damages is the cost of completion or the difference in value. Although the answer is not certain, the court probably did not err in awarding the cost of completion. With regard to the roping clinics, damages for Rancher's inability to conduct the clinics are recoverable only if foreseeable and reasonably certain. Here, while the damages are likely foreseeable, it is less clear that they are sufficiently certain. Even if the loss from the inability to conduct the clinics was foreseeable and certain, damages should have been reduced by any amount saved due to not conducting the clinics. Further, damages should be reduced by any amounts that could have been avoided through mitigation.

Point One: (40–50%)

Rancher is entitled to cost-of-completion damages because the breach appears to be willful and only cost-of-completion damages will enable Rancher to use Ranch for its intended purpose.

For breach of contract, the injured party may be entitled to expectation damages. These damages are intended to put the injured party in the same position as if the contract had been performed. See E. ALLAN FARNSWORTH, FARNSWORTH ON CONTRACTS § 12.8, at 190 (2004). Since Ranch was not restored to its pre-exploration condition, Rancher is entitled to damages. One measure of damages is the cost of restoration—here, $500,000. Id. § 12.13. However, where an award might be wasteful, such as when the cost to restore (here $500,000) would greatly exceed the difference in value (here $20,000), damages may be measured by the difference in value. See Jacob & Youngs v. Kent, 129 N.E. 889 (N.Y. 1921). But when the breach appears to be willful, as is the case here, and only completion of the contract will enable the non-breaching party to use the land for its intended purposes, the cost of completion is considered the appropriate damage award. See American Standard, Inc. v. Schectman, 439 N.Y.S.2d 529 (App. Div. 1981). Therefore, the court probably did not err in awarding Rancher the cost of returning Ranch to its pre-exploration condition.

Point Two: (5–10%)

Rancher's losses based on his failure to conduct roping clinics were foreseeable.

Contract damages must be foreseeable to be recoverable. FARNSWORTH ON CONTRACTS § 12.14. Damages are foreseeable if a reasonable person in the position of the breaching party would have known at the time the contract was made that the damages were likely to occur as a result of the breach. Hadley v. Baxendale, 156 Eng. Rep. 145 (Ex. 1854). Here, it is likely that Gasco would have known that if it did not restore Ranch, Rancher would not be able to hold his roping clinics. In fact, Rancher specifically told Gasco of his plans to hold the clinics on Ranch. Because of this direct communication, the damages caused by Rancher's inability to conduct the roping clinics were foreseeable.

Point Three: (5–10%)

Rancher can recover foreseeable losses from his inability to conduct the roping clinics only if those losses also were sufficiently certain.

Contract damages must be proved with reasonable certainty to be recoverable. FARNSWORTH ON CONTRACTS § 12.15. Here, Rancher faces the problem of a "new business." Although Rancher had conducted clinics on the road in the past, Rancher had not conducted clinics on Ranch. While most states no longer apply a per se rule denying recovery to all new businesses, courts still are reluctant to award lost profits to new businesses, because such profits "are regarded as being too remote, contingent and speculative to meet the standard of reasonable certainty." Western Publ'g Co. v. Mind Games, Inc., 944 F. Supp. 754, 756 (E.D. Wis. 1996).

Here, it is a close call whether there is sufficient certainty to award Rancher his lost profits from the roping clinics. On one hand, there is no reasonable certainty that the clinics would have been a success, or that 50 people would have attended each year. On the other hand, Rancher has run roping clinics in the past and so has some track record on which to base a damage award. See Fun Motors of Longview v. Gratty, Inc., 51 S.W.3d 756 (Tex. Civ. App. 2001) (experience of the person involved relevant in determining certainty of damages).

Point Four: (10–20%)

Rancher's award should have been reduced by the expenses Rancher would have incurred in conducting the roping clinics.

Contract damage awards must take into account costs avoided because of the breach. FARNSWORTH ON CONTRACTS § 12.9, at 209. Here, even if Rancher's claimed damages of $300,000 were foreseeable and certain, that amount represents the gross amount that Rancher would have received. In order to receive that amount, Rancher would have incurred expenses. Gasco's breach saved him those expenses. Therefore, even if the award of $300,000 was foreseeable and reasonably certain, it should be reduced to the net amount Rancher would have earned after expenses. See, e.g., Lieberman v. Templar Motor Co., 140 N.E. 222, 225 (N.Y. 1923).

Point Five: (10–20%)

It is uncertain whether Rancher's award should have been reduced by the amount of loss Rancher could have avoided by going on the road with his roping clinics.

The $300,000 award of damages may be reduced by the amount Rancher could have earned by mitigating his loss. Mitigation requires the injured party to take reasonable steps to reduce the damages. FARNSWORTH ON CONTRACTS § 12.12, at 232. Here, Rancher offered clinics on the road before he bought Ranch. After the breach Rancher could have resumed these activities as mitigation, as that alternative may not be viewed as substantially different from or inferior to the clinics he planned to offer on the ranch. Id. However, the need to travel might make this alternative inferior. See Parker v. Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp., 474 P.2d 689 (Cal. 1970). Therefore, it is uncertain whether Rancher's award should be reduced by the amount he could have earned by offering the roping clinics on the road.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) Did Law Firm's check and letter constitute an accord and satisfaction of Finisher's claims against Law Firm?
 - (1)(b) Can Finisher avoid the accord and satisfaction?
 - (2) Is CheckNow liable to Finisher for conversion of the Restaurant check?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under UCC § 3-311, the Law Firm check together with the letter from Law Firm constituted an accord and satisfaction against Finisher if: (1) Law Firm tendered the check in good faith as payment in full; (2) the amount of Finisher's claim was subject to a bona fide dispute; (3) Finisher obtained payment of the check; and (4) Law Firm included on the check or an accompanying written communication a conspicuous statement to the effect that the check was tendered as payment in full. Although an accord and satisfaction can sometimes be avoided, Finisher will not be able to avoid it in this case because the check was received and deposited by Administrator, who was not merely a processing clerk for Finisher but instead had direct responsibility for resolving the dispute between Finisher and Law Firm.

CheckNow is not liable to Finisher because Administrator's indorsement on behalf of Finisher was not a forgery and even if it was, it was nonetheless effective under UCC § 3-405(b).

Point One(a): (40–50%)

The Law Firm check constituted an accord and satisfaction.

UCC § 3-311 governs accord and satisfaction by use of an instrument. An accord and satisfaction occurs when a debtor offers a sum of money, or some other stated performance, in settlement of a debt, and the creditor accepts the proposed performance in satisfaction of the debt. The purpose of accord and satisfaction is to allow parties to resolve disputes without judicial intervention. Section 3-311 provides statutory requisites for an accord and satisfaction accomplished by use of an instrument.

UCC § 3-311 follows the common law rule regarding accord and satisfaction with minor variations to reflect modern business conditions. UCC § 3-311, cmt. 3. To accomplish an accord and satisfaction by use of an instrument, certain conditions must be met. The person seeking satisfaction must do so in good faith, the amount of the claim must be subject to dispute, and the person to whom the instrument is tendered must obtain payment of the instrument. UCC § 3-311(a). In addition, "the instrument or an accompanying written communication" must clearly state that the instrument is tendered in full satisfaction of the debt. UCC § 3-311(b). If those conditions are satisfied, then an accord and satisfaction is accomplished, subject to limited exceptions discussed in Point One(b).

On our facts, the requirements of an accord and satisfaction are met. First, the Law Firm check is an instrument. UCC § 3-104(c). Second, it appears that Law Firm acted in good faith. “Good faith” means honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing. UCC § 3-103(a)(4). There is nothing in the facts to suggest that Law Firm was trying to take advantage of Finisher or otherwise acting in bad faith. Thus, the good faith requirement is met.

Third, the amount that Law Firm owed was subject to a bona fide dispute. Not only did Law Firm have a claim in recoupment regarding damage to the carpet (that might reduce what was owed to Finisher), but that claim was unliquidated because there was no agreement on the amount of the damage to the carpet.

Lastly, Finisher obtained payment of the instrument, which was plainly marked “payment in full” and was attached to a letter making a clear assertion that the check was sent in settlement of the dispute about the damage to the carpet.

Point One(b): (10–20%)

Because Administrator had direct responsibility to resolve customer complaints, the accord and satisfaction was not inadvertent, and Finisher cannot avoid it.

Under some circumstances, a creditor can avoid an accord and satisfaction that is made inadvertently (e.g., when a creditor obtains payment of a check without realizing that the check was offered in full satisfaction of the creditor’s claim). Thus, despite entering into an apparent accord and satisfaction, a creditor can sometimes preserve its rights by tendering repayment of the amount it received in satisfaction within 90 days after it obtains payment of the instrument. See UCC § 3-311(c).

However, an accord and satisfaction cannot be avoided where it was not inadvertent. Thus, when the claimant, “or an agent of the claimant having direct responsibility with respect to the disputed obligation,” actually knows that an instrument is tendered in full satisfaction, then the claimant’s claim is discharged if payment is obtained on the instrument. See UCC § 3-311(d).

Here, the full satisfaction tender was made in plain terms to Administrator, an agent to whom Finisher had given responsibility for the resolution of customer disputes. Moreover, given that the check was clearly marked as a “full satisfaction” check and was accompanied by a letter to that effect, it is likely that Law Firm could prove that Administrator knew that the check was tendered in discharge of Law Firm’s debt.

Point Two: (35–45%)

Finisher cannot recover in conversion against CheckNow because Administrator's indorsement on the check in Finisher's name is effective.

UCC § 3-420 governs whether CheckNow is liable for its conversion of the Restaurant check. Subpart (a) provides that an instrument [in this case the Restaurant check] is converted “if it is taken by transfer, other than a negotiation, from a person not entitled to enforce the instrument” Section 3-420 permits the true owner of a check to recover the amount of the check from a person who “takes an instrument bearing a forged indorsement” and obtains payment on that instrument for himself or herself. See § 3-420, cmt. 1.

Finisher made Administrator an agent for purposes of handling checks and gave Administrator express authority to indorse checks on Finisher's behalf as part of Administrator's job responsibilities. So even though Administrator was not authorized to cash the check and keep its proceeds, Administrator's signing of the check in Finisher's name was authorized and not a forgery. See UCC § 3-402, cmt. 1 (signature by a representative binds the represented person if the represented person would be bound under ordinary agency law principles).

The properly indorsed check was bearer paper, and Administrator was a holder of it. UCC § 3-205(b). (The facts do not indicate that the check was restrictively indorsed, i.e., “for deposit only.”) As a holder, Administrator was a person entitled to enforce the instrument. Thus, when CheckNow cashed the check, it gave value for the check to a person “entitled to enforce the instrument.” This is not a conversion under UCC § 3-420.

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2009 MEE. Each test includes nine questions; most jurisdictions that use the MEE select six questions for their applicants to answer. In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law. The instructions for the test appear on page iii. For more information, see the MEE Information Booklet, available on the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. The model analyses are not an official grading guide. Some states grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses, including the suggested weights given to particular points, as they wish. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by roman numerals which refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that topic. For example, the Federal Civil Procedure and Conflict of Laws question on the February 2009 MEE tested the following areas from the Federal Civil Procedure outline: I.D., jurisdiction and venue—service of process and notice and II.A., law applied by federal courts—state law in federal court; and the following areas from the Conflict of Laws outline: III.B., choice of law—choice of law theories and C.1., application in specific areas—torts. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet.

Description of the MEE

The MEE is a series of essay questions, any of which a jurisdiction may select to include as a part of its bar examination. Applicants are expected to spend approximately 30 minutes answering each MEE question administered. The areas of law that may be covered by the questions on any MEE are Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts, Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Uniform Commercial Code (Negotiable Instruments (Commercial Paper); Secured Transactions). Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

Each question is designed to be answered in 30 minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions to follow.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Your jurisdiction may instruct you to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

Questions

MEE Question 1

Hanson's Fruitcakes (Hanson's) is the largest producer of fruitcakes in the world. The company was founded 150 years ago and uses an original secret recipe closely guarded by the company.

Because of a significant drop in the demand for fruitcakes, Hanson's decided to expand its product line to include other baked goods that will not compete with its fruitcakes.

Because Hanson's has limited experience producing baked goods other than fruitcakes, it decided to hire Taster as a consultant. The contract between Hanson's and Taster provided as follows:

- (1) Taster would travel for six months tasting baked goods at "high-end" bakeries. Taster was expressly authorized, on behalf of Hanson's, to buy the recipes of any baked goods he thought Hanson's could produce successfully. Taster was expressly prohibited from committing Hanson's to pay more than $5,000 cash for any one recipe, because market research confirmed that baked-goods recipes typically sold for prices between $3,000 and $6,000.
- (2) Hanson's would disclose to Taster the secret recipe for Hanson's fruitcake so that Taster would not inadvertently agree to buy any baked-goods recipes that were substantially similar to the fruitcake. Taster is required to keep Hanson's recipe secret from everyone.

Hanson's president announced the company's plans to expand its product line at the annual baking industry trade show attended by everyone in the baking industry. At the trade show, Hanson's president stated: "Hanson's is breaking new ground in the baking industry by hiring a consultant, Taster. Taster will be entering into contracts to buy recipes from other bakers on Hanson's behalf." Hanson's president did not disclose the precise terms of the Hanson's-Taster contract.

Purporting to act on behalf of Hanson's, over the next four months Taster entered into contracts to buy the following recipes:

- (1) Boysenberry-granola muffins for $4,000 from Monumental Muffins,
- (2) Almond-pecan tarts for $6,000 from Bakers Bonanza, and
- (3) Chocolate truffle cake from Parisian Delights in exchange for a copy of Hanson's secret fruitcake recipe.

Purporting to act on behalf of Hanson's, Taster also entered into a contract with Ironcast Enterprises to buy a sophisticated baking oven for $5,000.

Is Hanson's legally bound to any of the four contracts made by Taster? Explain.

MEE Question 2

Plaintiff, an employee of Contractor, was injured while using a table saw manufactured by Defendant and owned by Contractor. Plaintiff sued Defendant in federal court to recover damages for his injuries.

At trial, Defendant called Witness, another employee of Contractor. Neither Witness nor Contractor is a party to Plaintiff's action against Defendant. On direct examination, Witness testified that he saw Plaintiff remove a safety guard from the table saw on the morning of the accident.

During cross-examination by Plaintiff's Counsel, Witness testified as follows:

PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL: At the time you applied for your job with Contractor, you had three years of previous construction experience, didn't you?

WITNESS: Yes.

PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL: Didn't you lie about how much construction experience you had when you applied for the job with Contractor?

DEFENSE COUNSEL: Objection, inadmissible character evidence.

PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL: We are impeaching this witness with a specific instance of untruthful conduct under Rule 608(b), Your Honor.

COURT: Overruled.

PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL: I'll repeat my question—didn't you lie about how much construction experience you had?

WITNESS: No, I did not.

PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL: Isn't Plaintiff's Exhibit 37 a genuine copy of your job application?

WITNESS: Yes, it is.

PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL: Didn't you lie on that application?

WITNESS: No.

PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL: We offer Plaintiff's Exhibit 37.

DEFENSE COUNSEL: Objection, inadmissible character evidence.

COURT: Approach the bench. (The following occurred outside the hearing of the jury.)

PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL: Judge, this is a copy of Witness's job application in which he represented that he had twelve years of construction experience when he actually had only three.

COURT: Sustained.

Plaintiff's Counsel then asked Witness to review Plaintiff's Exhibit 37 to refresh his recollection about whether he had lied. Witness did so and then testified: "I didn't lie."

Plaintiff's Counsel thereafter re-offered Exhibit 37, claiming that it was admissible under Rule 612 to refresh Witness's recollection. Defense Counsel objected, and the Court sustained the objection.

MEE Question 2

Later, Plaintiff's Counsel called Contractor to testify. During direct examination, Plaintiff's Counsel asked Contractor, "Did Witness tell you that he had twelve years of construction experience during his job interview?" Defense Counsel objected that this was inadmissible character evidence, and the Court sustained the objection.

Did the Court err in:

1. Overruling Defense Counsel's objection to cross-examination about an alleged lie by Witness? Explain.
2. Sustaining Defense Counsel's objection to the introduction of Exhibit 37 as inadmissible character evidence? Explain.
3. Sustaining Defense Counsel's objection to the introduction of Exhibit 37 to refresh the recollection of Witness? Explain.
4. Sustaining Defense Counsel's objection to Contractor's testimony? Explain.

MEE Question 3

In 2004, Testator duly executed a will providing as follows:

1. I give my 100 shares of XYZ common stock to my cousin Andy.
2. I give my home at 4 Cypress Garden to my cousin Ben.
3. I give my automobile to my friend Carrie.
4. I give $10,000 to my friend Donna.
5. I give the residue of my estate to my friend Ed.

In 2006, Testator sold her home at 4 Cypress Garden and, with the entire sales proceeds, purchased a condominium as her new home.

In 2007, Testator traded the white automobile that she owned when her will was executed for a blue automobile.

In 2008, Testator died. At the time of her death, Testator owned 200 shares of XYZ common stock, having acquired an additional 100 shares as the result of a dividend paid by XYZ to its shareholders in its own stock. Testator also owned the condominium, the blue automobile, and a $50,000 bank account.

Testator was survived by Andy, Ben, Carrie, Donna, and Ed. She was also survived by Donna's daughter. Three months after Testator died, Donna made a valid disclaimer of any rights to the $10,000 bequest to which she might otherwise be entitled. Testator's will was admitted to probate.

To whom should Testator's probate estate be distributed? Explain.

MEE Question 4

Several years ago, Parent, the record owner of a farm in fee simple absolute, conveyed the farm as a gift “jointly in fee to my beloved daughters, Jessie and Karen, equally, to share and share alike.” Parent delivered the deed to Jessie and Karen. The deed was never recorded.

Two years ago, Jessie borrowed $60,000 from Credit Union, securing the loan by granting Credit Union a mortgage on her interest in the farm. Credit Union properly and promptly recorded the mortgage.

Six months ago, Jessie validly contracted to sell her one-half interest in the farm for $90,000 to Buyer, who was very anxious to acquire Jessie’s interest. Buyer paid Jessie $40,000 as earnest money and agreed in the contract to accept a deed with no warranties of any kind and to accept the title regardless of whether title was marketable. Buyer had no actual notice of the mortgage Jessie had granted to Credit Union.

Two months ago, before closing the sale with Buyer, Jessie died, survived by Karen. At the time of Jessie’s death, the loan secured by Credit Union’s mortgage was still outstanding. Jessie’s will provided: “I give all of my real property to Devisee and all of my personal property to Legatee.” Both Devisee and Legatee survived Jessie.

Last month, the executor of Jessie’s estate executed a deed purporting to convey a one-half interest in the farm to Buyer in exchange for the balance of the purchase price.

The jurisdiction has a notice-type recording statute and a grantor-grantee index system.

1. Did Parent convey the farm to Jessie and Karen as “tenants in common” or as “joint tenants with right of survivorship”? Explain.
2. Assuming Jessie and Karen acquired a joint tenancy with right of survivorship in the farm, what are the rights, if any, of Karen, Credit Union, and Buyer in the farm? Explain.
3. Assuming Jessie and Karen acquired a joint tenancy with right of survivorship in the farm, who is entitled to the balance of the purchase price Buyer paid the executor of Jessie’s estate? Explain.

MEE Question 5

Bearco is a corporation incorporated under the laws of State A. Bearco maintains its corporate and administrative offices in State A; its factories are located in State B. Bearco's popular stuffed toy bear, "Griz," is sold throughout the United States. Bearco has registered the trademark "Griz" with the United States Patent and Trademark Office.

Copyco is a corporation incorporated under the laws of Country X, a foreign country, where Copyco has its manufacturing facilities and corporate offices. Copyco sells a line of toy bears called "Griz," which look remarkably similar to the Bearco "Griz" bears. Copyco sells its bears to consumers throughout the United States. However, it sells only on the Internet, using a parcel delivery service to deliver the bears to consumers. The Copyco website does not list a telephone number, street address, or post office box for the company. It lists only an e-mail address and an Internet address.

Bearco has filed an action against Copyco in the United States District Court for State A, properly invoking the court's federal question and diversity jurisdiction. Bearco alleges both trademark infringement (a federal law claim) and unfair competition (a tort claim that, in the United States, is based on state law).

State A and State B have materially different unfair-competition laws. Unfair competition is not actionable under the law of Country X.

To address choice-of-law problems, State A follows the "most significant relationship" approach of the Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws. State B applies the "vested rights" approach of the Restatement (First) of Conflict of Laws. Country X's choice-of-law methodology is unknown.

Bearco has been unable to determine Copyco's street address or post office box address either in the United States or in Country X and has filed a motion requesting that the district court authorize service of the summons and complaint by e-mail. There are no international agreements that affect the court's resolution of the issues in this case.

1. If the United States District Court for State A permits service of process on Copyco by e-mail, would such e-mail service be consistent with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the United States Constitution? Explain.
2. Which jurisdiction's law should the United States District Court for State A apply to resolve Bearco's unfair-competition claim? Explain.

MEE Question 6

Drawer wrote a check, drawn on Bank, to Payee for $3,000 and delivered the check to Payee as payment for services Payee had performed for Drawer. Before Payee had a chance to deposit the check in her bank account, she was robbed at gunpoint by Thief, who took her handbag with the check in it. After Thief discovered Payee's check in her handbag, he used the examples of Payee's signature on various pieces of identification inside her wallet to create a perfect forgery of Payee's signature on the back of the check.

The next day, Thief agreed to buy a used car from Seller for $3,000. Thief offered Seller the $3,000 check stolen from Payee as payment for the car. Thief told Seller that his friend, Payee, owed him $3,000 and had signed the check over to him so that he could use it to pay for the car. Seller was initially reluctant to take the check in payment for the car. However, Thief showed Payee's driver's license to Seller, explaining that Payee had lent him her ID while she was at work. Seller saw that the signature on the check matched the signature on the driver's license, so he was convinced that Thief was telling the truth and that Payee had negotiated the check to Thief. Acting in good faith, Seller took the check in payment for the car, gave Thief the car keys, and signed the certificate of title over to him. Thief drove off in the car.

The next day, Seller took Payee's check to Bank and tried to cash it, but Drawer had stopped payment on the check after Payee had told him that the check had been stolen. Accordingly, Bank's teller refused to pay the check.

Does Seller have a right to recover the amount of the check from any of Payee, Drawer, Bank, or Thief? Explain as to each.

MEE Question 7

Tenant lives in Landlord's apartment building. The furnace in the building was inoperable during three periods last winter, causing the loss of heat and hot water. On each of those occasions, Landlord made temporary repairs.

On March 25, the furnace again broke down. Landlord was promptly notified of the problem and he ordered the parts needed to fix the furnace on March 26, but they did not arrive until April 6, at which time Landlord fixed the furnace. Between March 25 and April 5, there was no heat or hot water in the building.

In order to bathe from March 25 through April 5, Tenant heated a large pot of water on the stove. After the water boiled, Tenant transferred the water to the bathtub, mixed in cold water, and then used the water to bathe.

On April 3, Nephew, Tenant's eight-year-old nephew, arrived for a visit. On April 4, Tenant was carrying a pot of boiling water down the hall to the bathroom when Nephew, who was chasing a ball out of a bedroom that opened into the hall, collided with Tenant. As a result of the collision, the hot water spilled on Nephew, seriously burning him. Nephew did not look or call out before running into the hall.

A state statute provides that "every apartment building . . . and every part thereof shall be kept in good repair. The owner shall be responsible for compliance A violation shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $500."

Nephew, by his guardian, sued Tenant and Landlord for damages. At trial, both Tenant and Landlord argued that Nephew's negligence was the sole cause of the accident.

Based on these facts, may the jury properly award Nephew damages for his personal injury:

1. From Tenant? Explain.
2. From Landlord? Explain.

MEE Question 8

Fourteen years ago, Mom and Dad had a brief romance while Dad was on vacation in State A, where Mom lived. Nine months after Dad returned to his home in State B, Mom telephoned Dad. Mom told Dad that she had just given birth to Child and that Dad was Child's father. Mom also told Dad that, if he would agree to waive his right to establish his paternity of Child, she would sign a release waiving all rights to seek child support from him. Dad agreed to Mom's proposal, and they signed a written contract containing the terms outlined by Mom.

Mom is a college graduate and had an excellent job when Child was born. However, she has developed a chronic disease and is no longer able to fully provide for herself and Child, now age 14.

Mom brought an action against Dad in State A seeking to establish his paternity of Child and obtain child support, claiming that the contract waiving her right to child support is unenforceable. She served Dad by registered mail in State B, where he has continued to live since Child's birth. Dad has not visited State A since his vacation there more than 14 years ago and has never met Child.

State A's long-arm statute provides that a court has personal jurisdiction over an alleged parent for purposes of determining paternity and support obligations if the alleged parent "engaged in sexual intercourse in this state and the child may have been conceived by that act of intercourse."

Dad moved to dismiss Mom's petition on the ground that the State A court's assertion of personal jurisdiction over him to determine paternity and child support would violate due process requirements. The trial court denied the motion, and Dad entered a special appearance, preserving his right to appeal on the jurisdictional claim.

On the merits, Dad argues that the contract he and Mom made shortly after Child's birth should be enforced. In the event that the court declines to enforce the contract, Dad argues that the equities of the case require that the value of any child support awarded to Mom be calculated based on state public-assistance benefit levels or, in the alternative, that he be awarded custody of Child. Dad also seeks liberal visitation with Child in the event that the court awards custody to Mom.

1. Was the court's assertion of personal jurisdiction over Dad to determine Dad's paternity and support obligations consistent with due process requirements? Explain.
2. Assuming the court has personal jurisdiction over Dad, how should the court rule on the child support, custody, and visitation issues? Explain.

MEE Question 9

Corporation has 20 shareholders. Its largest shareholder, Major, owns just over 30 percent (30%) of Corporation's shares. No other shareholder owns more than five percent (5%) of the shares.

Major is also the president and one of the five directors of Corporation. The other four directors are also shareholders of Corporation.

Over the past two years Major, acting in his capacity as president of Corporation, has persuaded Corporation's board of directors (Board) to approve the purchase of a number of valuable items of Major's personal property appropriate for Corporation's business. Corporation paid vastly inflated prices for Major's property.

Major always informed Board of each proposed purchase before it was made. In each case, Minor, another member of Board, asked Major whether the purchase price was "fair." Major always replied: "I have investigated the value of my property to be purchased by Corporation and I assure you that the purchase price represents its fair market value." Board, relying on this statement and undertaking no further inquiry, always approved the purchases, with Major abstaining from voting.

Corporation's articles of incorporation contain a provision that exculpates the directors of the corporation for liability to the corporation for money damages "to the fullest extent permitted" by the applicable corporation-law statute.

A shareholder derivative suit has been properly brought against Corporation's directors seeking money damages for breach of their fiduciary duties as directors with regard to the transactions between Corporation and Major.

1. Will the directors (other than Major) be protected from liability by the business judgment rule? Explain.
2. Will Major be protected from liability by the business judgment rule? Explain.
3. Will Major be protected from liability by Board's approval of the transactions? Explain.
4. Will the directors (other than Major) be protected from liability by the exculpatory provision in the articles of incorporation? Explain.
5. Will Major be protected from liability by the exculpatory provision in the articles of incorporation? Explain.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did Taster have actual authority to buy Monumental Muffins' muffin recipe for $4,000?
 - (2) Did Taster have apparent authority to buy Bakers Bonanza's tart recipe for $6,000?
 - (3) Did Taster have any authority to buy Parisian Delights' cake recipe in exchange for a copy of Hanson's fruitcake recipe?
 - (4) Did Taster have any authority to buy the baking oven from Ironcast Enterprises for $5,000?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Taster purported to act as Hanson's agent. An agent acts with actual or apparent authority. Taster had actual authority to buy recipes for $5,000 cash or less. Hanson's is clearly bound to the contract with Monumental Muffins because Taster had actual authority to enter into that contract. Taster had apparent authority to enter into the contract with Bakers Bonanza and Hanson's is legally bound to that contract. Taster had no authority to reveal Hanson's secret recipe, and it was unreasonable for Parisian Delights to believe that Taster had such authority, so Hanson's is not bound to that contract. Taster also had no authority to enter into the contract with Ironcast, and Hanson's is not legally bound to that contract.

Point One (10–20%)

Taster had actual authority to enter into the Monumental Muffins muffin recipe contract for $4,000 on Hanson's behalf. Therefore, Hanson's is legally bound to that contract.

When Hanson's hired Taster to act on Hanson's behalf, an agency relationship was created. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 1.01 ("Agency is the fiduciary relationship that arises when one person (a "principal") manifests assent to another person (an "agent") that the agent shall act on the principal's behalf. . . ."). As Hanson's agent, Taster had actual authority to "take action designated or implied in [Hanson's] manifestations to [Taster] and acts necessary or incidental to achieving [Hanson's] objectives. . . ." Id. at § 2.02(1).

The contract between Hanson's and Taster empowered Taster to enter into contracts on Hanson's behalf to buy baked-goods recipes for a price not to exceed $5,000. Thus, Taster had actual authority to enter into the contract to buy Monumental Muffins' muffin recipe for $4,000, and Hanson's is legally bound to that contract.

Point Two (30–40%)

Taster had apparent authority to enter into the contract with Bakers Bonanza to buy the almond-pecan tart recipe for $6,000 on Hanson's behalf. Therefore, Hanson's is legally bound to that contract.

An agent has apparent authority to act on behalf of a principal when “a third party reasonably believes the actor has authority to act on behalf of the principal and that belief is traceable to the principal's manifestations.” RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 2.03. Apparent authority can co-exist with actual authority; it can also exist in the absence of any actual authority. See In re Victory Corrugated Container Corp., 183 B.R. 373, 376–77 (Bankr. D.N.J. 1995).

Here, Taster did not have actual authority to enter into contracts exceeding $5,000. Thus, Taster did not have actual authority to contract with Bakers Bonanza for $6,000. However, Hanson's president stated at the annual baking industry trade show that Taster would be buying recipes on Hanson's behalf. These manifestations by Hanson's would reasonably cause Bakers Bonanza to believe that Taster was acting with authority when contracting to buy recipes. The manifestations were made by Hanson's president, a person entitled to speak on behalf of Hanson's. The amount involved ($6,000) was within the price range typically paid for baked-goods recipes. Therefore, Taster had apparent authority to enter into the contract to buy Bakers Bonanza's tart recipe and Hanson's is legally bound to that contract.

Point Three (20–30%)

Taster did not have authority to buy Parisian Delights' chocolate truffle cake recipe in exchange for Hanson's fruitcake recipe. Therefore, Hanson's is not legally bound to that contract.

Taster did not have actual authority to buy Parisian Delights' cake recipe in exchange for Hanson's fruitcake recipe—in fact, Taster's contract expressly forbids such an action. Nor did Taster have apparent authority to enter into the contract with Parisian Delights. Here, the facts state that baked-goods recipes typically sold for $3,000 to $6,000. There is no suggestion that the use of non-cash consideration is typical. Further, given Hanson's long history in the baking industry and its close guarding of the fruitcake recipe, Parisian Delights may well have known that Hanson's fruitcake recipe was secret and that its disclosure was not authorized. When facts suggest it may be unreasonable for a third party to believe that a purported agent has authority, the third party has the duty to make further inquiry. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 2.03. Had Parisian Delights asked Hanson's if Taster had authority to obtain recipes for non-cash consideration, Taster's lack of any authority would have been readily determinable.

[NOTE: Applicants should not receive any credit for discussing inherent authority as that doctrine is not applicable generally nor on the facts.]

Point Four (10–20%)

Hanson's is not liable to Ironcast Enterprises on the contract for the oven as Taster had no authority to enter into that contract on Hanson's behalf.

Taster had no actual or apparent authority to enter into the contract with Ironcast Enterprises to buy the baking oven on Hanson's behalf. Actual authority does not exist because the contract limited Taster's authority to acquiring recipes—contracting to buy an oven was not within the express grant of authority nor was it an act “necessary or incidental to achieving the principal's objectives.” RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 2.02. Apparent authority does not exist because no acts of Hanson's reasonably interpreted could have caused Ironcast to believe that Taster had authority to buy baking equipment. Therefore, Hanson's is not legally bound on the contract to buy the oven from Ironcast for $5,000.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Under Rule 608(b), was it proper to cross-examine Witness about his alleged lie on his job application?
 - (2) Under Rule 608(b), was Witness's job application admissible to contradict Witness's denial that he had lied, or was it inadmissible extrinsic evidence?
 - (3) If Witness's job application was not admissible for impeachment purposes under Rule 608(b), could the exhibit be admitted into evidence to refresh recollection under Rule 612?
 - (4) Under Rule 608(b), was Contractor's testimony admissible to impeach Witness, or was it inadmissible extrinsic evidence?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under Rule 608(b), a trial court has discretion to permit cross-examination of a witness concerning a specific instance of untruthful conduct. Lying on a job application represents untruthful conduct and an important issue in this case—whether Plaintiff removed the safety guard—will probably turn on the credibility of the witnesses. Thus, the Court was within its discretion in permitting the cross-examination. With respect to the job application, Rule 608(b) expressly forbids the admission of extrinsic evidence of a prior bad act. Some federal courts hold that any document is extrinsic evidence; others hold that a document is not extrinsic evidence if it can be authenticated by the witness. Thus, the Court was within its discretion in excluding Exhibit 37, the job application. Exhibit 37 was inadmissible even if it had been used to refresh Witness's recollection because the use of Exhibit 37 to refresh Witness's recollection does not make it automatically admissible. Rule 612 authorizes admission of a recollection-refreshing exhibit only if offered by the lawyer who has not used the exhibit to refresh the recollection of the witness. Finally, Contractor's testimony was not admissible under Rule 608(b) because, although probative of untruthfulness, it was clearly extrinsic evidence.

Point One (25–35%)

The trial court acted within its discretion in permitting cross-examination concerning the alleged lie on Witness's job application because lying about one's job experience is probative of untruthfulness.

The standard of review regarding an alleged error in an evidentiary ruling is abuse of discretion. United States v. Alexander, 849 F.2d 1293, 1301 (10th Cir. 1988). A trial court's ruling should be affirmed, even if the court of appeals would make a different ruling, if the challenged ruling lies within the zone of reasonable disagreement.

Character evidence is generally inadmissible to prove action in conformity with the character trait. FED. R. EVID. 404(a). However, when a person testifies as a witness, that person's credibility becomes a material issue; a witness's credibility thus may be attacked by showing that the witness has an untruthful character. FED. R. EVID. 404(a)(3). Accordingly, a court may, in its discretion, admit evidence relating to a prior bad act if it is offered during cross-examination of the witness being impeached and is "probative of . . . untruthfulness." FED. R. EVID. 608(b). Conduct that involves falsehood or deception is generally considered probative of untruthfulness. See United States v. Cole, 617 F.2d 151 (5th Cir. 1980) (submitting a false excuse for being absent from work); United States v. Mansaw, 714 F.2d 785, 789 (8th Cir. 1983) (giving a false name); United States v. Reid, 634 F.2d 469, 473–74 (9th Cir. 1980) (giving false name, occupation, name of business, and purpose in information request to government).

In this case, the trial court acted properly in allowing counsel to ask Witness if he had lied about his job experience on his application. The facts suggest Witness's testimony was critical to establish that Plaintiff had removed a safety guard from the table saw. This testimony could be devastating to Plaintiff's claim. Consequently, this line of inquiry was relevant and probative of Witness's truthfulness and the court was reasonable in its decision to permit counsel to cross-examine Witness about his job application. FED. R. EVID. 608(b).

[NOTE: Admission into evidence of a document containing the falsehood might violate the extrinsic evidence rule (see Point Two), but questioning the witness about such a document does not. See United States v. Jackson, 882 F.2d 1444, 1448–49 (9th Cir. 1989); Cole, 617 F.2d at 154.]

Point Two (20–30%)

The trial court was within its discretion in excluding Exhibit 37 because Rule 608(b) forbids the use of extrinsic evidence to attack a witness's character for truthfulness.

Rule 608(b) expressly prohibits the use of extrinsic evidence to impeach a witness's character for truthfulness: "Specific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness's character for truthfulness . . . may not be proved by extrinsic evidence." FED. R. EVID. 608(b). Thus, although a witness may be cross-examined about a prior alleged lie, if he refuses to admit to lying, he may not be contradicted with extrinsic evidence. Rule 608(b) does not define "extrinsic evidence," and there is disagreement among federal courts and evidence scholars about the term's meaning. With respect to documents, one approach holds that a document is extrinsic evidence in all circumstances. The other, more lenient approach holds that a document is not extrinsic evidence if the witness being impeached can provide the foundation for admission of the document. See Kevin C. McMunigal & Calvin W. Sharpe, Reforming Extrinsic Impeachment, 33 CONN. L. REV. 363, 372–73 (2001) (concluding that a job application containing a lie would be extrinsic under the former approach, but not under the latter); United States v. Elliott, 89 F.3d 1360, 1368 (8th Cir. 1996) (holding that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the résumé of a witness offered to impeach the witness under Rule 608(b) by showing a misrepresentation of educational and employment experience).

Thus, whether the Court should have admitted Exhibit 37 depends on which approach prevails in this jurisdiction.

[NOTE: An applicant should receive full credit if the applicant recognizes the extrinsic evidence issue.]

Point Three (15–25%)

Exhibit 37 was not admissible to refresh Witness’s recollection because Rule 612 permits only counsel for the opposing party to offer such a document into evidence.

Since the Court permitted cross-examination concerning Exhibit 37, it was proper to allow the cross-examiner to try to get Witness to change his denial of lying on the job application. The cross-examiner need not take the first answer a witness offers. See Carter v. Hewitt, 617 F.2d 961, 969–73 (3d Cir. 1980); United States v. Ling, 581 F.2d 1118, 1121 (4th Cir. 1978). The cross-examiner thus appropriately showed Exhibit 37 to Witness to refresh his recollection before asking him again whether he had lied.

However, when an otherwise inadmissible document is shown to a witness to refresh his recollection, the witness must read it to himself. It is improper to allow such a document to be read aloud to the jury, and it may be admitted as an exhibit only if offered by the lawyer who has not used the exhibit to refresh the recollection of the witness. See FED. R. EVID. 612; CHRISTOPHER B. MUELLER & LAIRD C. KIRKPATRICK, FEDERAL EVIDENCE § 6:96 (3d ed. 2007).

[NOTE: It may have been improper for the Court to permit Plaintiff’s Counsel to attempt to “refresh” Witness’s recollection, given that Witness did not testify to any lack of memory about what was said on the job application. However, Defense Counsel did not object to the attempt to refresh recollection, but only to the admission of the job application as an exhibit. Accordingly, only the admission of the exhibit is at issue.]

Point Four (10–20%)

The trial court properly excluded the testimony of Contractor because testimony by another witness represents extrinsic proof of the prior bad act and therefore is not admissible under Rule 608(b).

The trial court correctly refused to permit testimony from Contractor that Witness had claimed 12 years of experience on his job application. This testimony was relevant only to the witness’s credibility and clearly constituted extrinsic evidence. FED. R. EVID. 608(b); see also United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45, 55 (1984) (witness’s testimony about defendant’s gang membership was inadmissible extrinsic evidence of defendant’s veracity; however, evidence of gang membership was admissible to show defendant’s bias).

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Does a bequest of a specific number of shares of stock owned by Testator when the will was executed include other shares of the same stock acquired after the will was executed as a result of a stock dividend?
 - (2) Does a bequest of a specifically described home include another home acquired with the proceeds from the sale of the specifically described home?
 - (3) Does a bequest of a generically described automobile adeem when the automobile owned when the will was executed is traded for another automobile?
 - (4) Does Donna's disclaimer of the $10,000 bequest result in that bequest passing to her daughter or to the residuary legatee?

DISCUSSION

Summary

In most jurisdictions today, Andy would be entitled to all 200 shares of XYZ stock. Ben might be entitled to the condo as replacement property. Carrie would be entitled to the blue automobile. The $10,000 bequest to Donna would fail as a result of her disclaimer and would pass to Ed, as the residuary legatee. However, in jurisdictions that do not follow the modern approach, Andy would only be entitled to 100 shares of the XYZ stock and Ben would not be entitled to the condo because that request adeemed. Any property not passing to Andy, Ben, or Carrie passes to Ed, the residuary legatee.

Point One (20–30%)

Andy is entitled to the 200 shares of XYZ stock Testator owned at the time of death unless the jurisdiction does not follow the modern approach.

Historically, a bequest of stock owned by a testator when the testator's will was signed excluded subsequently acquired shares of the same stock acquired by the testator as the result of a stock dividend. See, e.g., Hicks v. Kerr, 104 A. 426 (Md. 1918). The rule was justified on the ground that, if the testator had wanted the legatee to take the later-acquired shares, the testator could have changed the will to take those additionally acquired shares into account. A contrary rule applied to shares acquired as a result of a stock split. See, e.g., Bostwick v. Hurstel, 304 N.E.2d 186 (Mass. 1973).

Today, stock dividends are typically treated like stock splits because, in each case, nothing of value has been distributed by the corporation to the shareholder. Additional shares of the same company, when acquired by stock split or stock dividend, are, from the shareholder's economic perspective, merely a change in form, not substance. See UNIF. PROBATE CODE (UPC) § 2-605 (a devise of stock owned by the testator when the will is executed includes such additional stock owned by the testator at death, whether acquired by a stock split or a stock dividend). Under the UPC or a like statute, Andy would be entitled to all 200 shares of XYZ stock owned by Testator at her death.

Point Two (20–30%)

In most states, the bequest of the home to Ben adeems. However, in some states Ben would be entitled to the substitute home.

Under common law, an ademption occurs when the subject matter of specific devise is not found in the probate estate at the time of the testator's death. See WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN & SHELDON F. KURTZ, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES 315–16 (3d ed. 2004). Here, Testator specifically bequeathed to Ben Testator's home located at 4 Cypress Garden. Since Testator did not own that home when she died, the bequest adeems. Id. at 316. As a result, the condo passes to Ed, the residuary legatee.

Under UPC § 2-606(a)(5) or a like statute, however, Ben would be entitled to Testator's condominium. This section provides that the devisee of specifically devised real estate is entitled to any "real property . . . owned by the testator at death which the testator acquired as a replacement for specifically devised real property" The facts support the conclusion that Testator purchased the condominium as a replacement home for the home that was specifically devised to Ben.

The "replacement property" concept appears to have little support in case law. However, RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY (WILLS AND OTHER DONATIVE TRANSFERS) § 5.2, cmt. d urges that the provision of the UPC should be applied by courts in those cases "in which the result appears to be consistent with the testator's intent."

Point Three (20–30%)

Carrie is entitled to the blue automobile.

Because of the time-honored rule of construction that a will "speaks" at the time of death, a bequest of generically described property (e.g., my automobile) applies to property that meets the generic description at the testator's death. See generally MCGOVERN & KURTZ, supra, at 316; RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY (WILLS AND OTHER DONATIVE TRANSFERS) § 5.2, cmt. e. Thus, the bequest of the automobile is unlike the bequest of the home in that the latter, but not the former, is described in a non-generic manner and thus is subject to the rules of ademption.

[NOTE: At first blush an examinee might think that the bequest of the automobile raises an ademption problem because the automobile owned when the will was signed (the white automobile) was not the same as the automobile owned when Testator died (the blue automobile). However, this is not an ademption problem because Testator did not refer to a specific automobile when executing her will. Also, an examinee might analyze this under the doctrine of independent significance and get to the same result.]

Point Four (20–30%)

The $10,000 bequest to Donna fails because of Donna’s disclaimer and because Donna is not the type of legatee typically described in an anti-lapse statute. The bequest passes to Ed, the residuary legatee.

If Donna had not disclaimed the $10,000 legacy, it would have passed to her under the provisions of Testator’s will. However, she did disclaim the bequest. Under the typical disclaimer statute, if a legatee disclaims a general bequest, the bequest passes as if the disclaimant had predeceased the testator. See generally UPC §§ 2-1106, 2-901(d).

When a disclaimant is deemed to have predeceased the testator, the question arises whether the bequest to that disclaimant passes to her issue. The answer here depends upon the application of the anti-lapse statute. The typical anti-lapse statute would not apply here because Donna was a friend, not a relative, of Testator. See generally UPC § 2-603 (anti-lapse statute applicable to legatee who was a grandparent or issue of grandparent of the testator). If the anti-lapse statute is inapplicable, then the $10,000 passes to Ed as the residuary legatee.

[NOTE: If the anti-lapse statute did apply, as it might in a distinct minority of states, then the bequest to Donna would pass to Donna’s daughter. However, given how few states have adopted this view, an examinee who merely said that Donna’s disclaimed bequest passed to her issue should receive little or no credit unless that is the rule in the applicant’s state.]

DISCUSSION

Summary

The language in Parent’s deed to Jessie and Karen probably is sufficient to overcome the statutory presumption that a conveyance to two or more persons creates a tenancy in common. Thus, Jessie and Karen probably became joint tenants in the farm. At Jessie’s death her interest would terminate and Karen would own the farm in fee unless prior to her death Jessie severed the joint tenancy.

Whether the mortgage to Credit Union, executed only by Jessie, severs the joint tenancy depends upon whether the farm is located in a lien- or title-theory jurisdiction. However, even if the farm is located in a lien-theory jurisdiction where a mortgage would not sever the joint tenancy, when Jessie entered into a contract to sell Buyer her interest in the farm, she likely severed the joint tenancy and converted it into a tenancy in common. Thus, once the executor deeded Jessie’s interest to Buyer, Karen and Buyer owned the farm as tenants in common.

Credit Union also has a mortgage on one-half of the farm. Because Credit Union recorded the mortgage before Buyer entered into the contract to purchase Jessie’s interest, Buyer had constructive notice from the record of Credit Union’s interest created by Jessie and takes subject to that mortgage even though the deed to Jessie was not recorded.

Because of the doctrine of equitable conversion, Jessie's interest in the farm at her death is characterized as personalty and passes to Legatee under Jessie's will.

Point One (20–30%)

Parent's deed of gift to Jessie and Karen created a tenancy in common unless the language in the deed overcame the statutory presumption that a conveyance to two or more persons creates a tenancy in common. Whether or not it does here is a close question. While the word "jointly" itself may not overcome the presumption, when used in conjunction with the phrase "share and share alike," it might.

A deed to two or more grantees may create a joint tenancy or a tenancy in common. To create a joint tenancy, the common law traditionally required the existence of four unities (time, title, interest, and possession). See WILLIAM B. STOEBUCK & DALE A. WHITMAN, THE LAW OF PROPERTY 182–83 (3d ed. 2000). Under the four-unities test, a joint tenancy presumptively is created by a conveyance to two or more persons if they acquire their interest at the same time, acquire their interest under the same instrument, acquire an equal interest in the property, and acquire the right to possession of the property.

The four unities are satisfied by Parent's deed to the daughters, so at common law they clearly took title as joint tenants with right of survivorship. With a joint tenancy, each joint tenant has the right of survivorship.

Today, in most states, there is a statutory presumption that a conveyance to two or more persons creates a tenancy in common rather than a joint tenancy. See generally SHELDON F. KURTZ, MOYNIHAN'S INTRODUCTION TO THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY 282 (4th ed. 2005). Thus, if the presumption is not rebutted, Jessie and Karen took as tenants in common. Tenants in common have no right of survivorship.

The standard way to overcome the presumption favoring a tenancy in common is for the deed to use the term "joint tenancy" or "joint tenants," usually also adding an express reference to "survivorship" or "survivors," id. at 275–77, and it can be argued that where such language is absent the statutory presumption is not rebutted.

Although survivorship language is missing in Parent's deed to Jessie and Karen, the language of the deed could still be construed to overcome the statutory presumption favoring a tenancy in common. For example, some cases hold that the word "jointly" standing alone rebuts the presumption favoring a tenancy in common, although there are contrary cases holding that a grantor who uses the word "jointly" in the deed may intend that the grantees "own together" rather than that they own as joint tenants with the right of survivorship. STOEBUCK & WHITMAN, supra, at 185–86. Here, however, Parent's deed not only used the word "jointly" but added the phrase "equally, to share and share alike." This phrase, in common with the word "jointly," may point toward a joint tenancy as it evidences an intent by Parent to give each daughter an equal interest in the farm, another hallmark of a joint tenancy but not essential for a tenancy in common. This additional phrase also reflects the historic conception that joint tenants hold as a unit rather than as separate individuals. See id. at 184.

[NOTE: This is a close question, and applicants should receive equal credit for reasoned analyses that consider the possibilities, whether they conclude that the deed creates a tenancy in common or a joint tenancy. However, an applicant's conclusion should not affect the rest of the analysis because the remaining calls assume Jessie and Karen took from Parent as joint tenants with right of survivorship.]

Lastly, a deed is effective between the parties even if it is not recorded. Id. at 872. Thus, the daughters acquired a tenancy in common or a joint tenancy, notwithstanding their failure to record their deed of gift.

Point Two (25–35%)

If the deed of gift created a joint tenancy, Jessie's mortgage severed that joint tenancy as to her one-half interest if the state follows the "title theory" instead of the "lien theory" of mortgages. In any event, Jessie's contract of sale severed the joint tenancy. Therefore, Karen had no right of survivorship and the deed from the executor to Buyer caused Karen and Buyer to acquire a title to the farm as tenants in common.

When property is held by two persons in joint tenancy, a conveyance by one joint tenant of her entire ownership interest severs the joint tenancy as to the conveyed share. This is because the conveyance severs at least the unities of time and title between the remaining co-tenant and the new co-tenant. See Jackson v. O'Connell, 177 N.E.2d 194, 194–95 (Ill. 1961); KURTZ, supra, at 278–79.

When, as here, a joint tenant transfers a lesser interest, such as a mortgage, a severance of the joint tenancy may also occur. Courts usually resolve the issue by trying to decide whether the transfer destroyed any of the four unities.

In the case of mortgages, some states follow the "title theory," which says that the mortgagee takes title to the property for the duration of the mortgage. In "title theory" states, a mortgage granted by one joint tenant severs the joint tenancy as to the conveyed share. This would convert the joint tenancy into a tenancy in common. Other states follow the "lien theory" of mortgages, which says that the mortgagor retains title and the mortgagee takes only a lien on the property. This would leave the four unities intact, and thus Jessie would remain a joint tenant with her sister. See People v. Nogarr, 330 P.2d 858 (Cal. Ct. App. 1958); KURTZ, supra, at 279; STOEBUCK & WHITMAN, supra, at 184–85, 191.

If Jessie's grant of the mortgage did not sever the joint tenancy, her contract to sell her interest in the farm to Buyer almost certainly had that effect. See STOEBUCK & WHITMAN, supra, at 190–91; 2 A. JAMES CASNER, AMERICAN LAW OF PROPERTY § 6.2, at 11 (1952); Annotation, What Acts by One or More of Joint Tenants Will Sever or Terminate the Tenancy, 64 A.L.R.2d 918, 935–36 (1959). Although Jessie retained legal title until the contract closed, under the four unities analysis she no longer had the same interest as her sister. This follows from the doctrine of equitable conversion (discussed in Point Four below) because her interest (but not Karen's interest) is now subject to Buyer's equitable interest or title. Because the joint tenancy was severed, Karen had no right of survivorship and, therefore, did not become the sole owner of the farm at Jessie's death.

[NOTE: Many applicants may not address the distinction between the title- and lien-theory jurisdictions and should not be penalized for failing to do so. What is important is that applicants recognize the legal issue and come to a resolution. Furthermore, without regard to the mortgage, applicants should address the effect of the contract with Buyer. Also, if a jurisdiction does not recognize the doctrine of equitable conversion, the execution of the contract would not sever the joint tenancy.]

Since the joint tenancy was severed, the deed from the executor to Buyer caused Karen and Buyer to hold the farm as tenants in common.

Point Three (20–30%)

Buyer cannot qualify as a bona fide purchaser because Buyer had constructive notice of Credit Union's recorded mortgage. The failure to record the deed of gift from Parent to Jessie and Karen should not impair the mortgage because the non-recording of that deed would not interfere with Buyer's ability to find the mortgage during a title search. Thus, Buyer takes the farm subject to Credit Union's interest.

Assuming Buyer acquired an interest from Jessie, Buyer may claim to be a bona fide purchaser, who should take free of Credit Union's mortgage. To qualify as a bona fide purchaser, a person must (i) pay value for an interest and (ii) not have actual, inquiry, or constructive notice of the competing prior-in-time interest. See STOEBOCK & WHITMAN, supra, at 879–83.

Although Buyer paid value, see id. at 879–80, and lacked actual notice of the mortgage, Buyer had constructive notice of the mortgage because the mortgage was properly recorded before Buyer entered into the contract to buy Jessie's interest. Had Buyer made a proper title search by looking in the grantor-grantee index for all of Jessie's transactions as a grantor, the mortgage would have been discovered. Therefore, Buyer takes subject to Credit Union's interest.

[NOTE: The mortgage is not a “wild deed” that could be deemed unrecorded because it is outside of the buyer's chain of title or recorded out of sequence (too early or too late). Since the facts state that the grantor-grantee index operates in this jurisdiction, if Buyer had searched under Jessie's name as grantor, Buyer would have found her mortgage to Credit Union. In the typical wild deed case, the prior interest outside of the chain of title is created by someone other than the buyer's grantor.]

[NOTE: As an aside, Buyer's search would also reveal the fact that Jessie and her sister lacked record title because they never recorded the deed of gift from Parent. However, here that would not be a title objection because Buyer agreed to accept a title that was not marketable.]

Point Four (15–25%)

When Jessie entered into the contract of sale, the doctrine of equitable conversion transformed her interest into personalty. As a result, Devisee acquired no interest in the farm under Jessie's will. Rather, the sales proceeds pass to Legatee.

The doctrine of equitable conversion splits title to the property when a real estate contract is signed. Buyer obtained equitable title, and Jessie as seller retained legal title as trustee to secure payment of the remainder of the purchase price. See STOEBUCK & WHITMAN, supra, at 786–87. Equitable conversion only applies to a contract that is specifically enforceable; here there are no facts suggesting that Jessie or Buyer would be unable to obtain specific performance. Buyer cannot reject title because of the outstanding mortgage as Buyer agreed to accept a title without any warranties and regardless of its marketability. When equitable conversion applies, the seller's legal title is considered personal property, and the buyer's equitable title is considered real property. Id. When Jessie died, her share passed to Legatee, who took personal property under Jessie's will.

[NOTE: The preceding analysis depends upon Jessie's share prior to her death being classified as a tenancy in common because (1) the mortgage severed Jessie's joint tenancy share, or (2) the contract of sale to Buyer severed Jessie's joint tenancy share. If, on the other hand, Jessie died still owning a one-half interest as joint tenant, no part of the farm or its proceeds passed to Legatee or Devisee under Jessie's will. Rather, by right of survivorship, Karen owned the entire farm free and clear of the rights of Credit Union and Buyer because their interests, being wholly derivative from Jessie, would also expire at Jessie's death. See KURTZ, supra, at 279; STOEBUCK & WHITMAN, supra, at 191.]

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE I.D.; II.A.; CONFLICT OF LAWS III.B., C.1.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1)(a) Do the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit a federal district court to authorize service of process on a foreign defendant by e-mail?
 - (1)(b) Is e-mail service of process constitutional under the circumstances of this case?
 - (2)(a) Which jurisdiction's choice-of-law rules should be used to select the applicable unfair-competition law?
 - (2)(b) Under the "most significant relationship" test, what factors govern the choice among State A, Country X, and State B unfair-competition law?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Absent a governing international agreement, the district court has authority to order service of process by e-mail so long as the service is reasonably calculated to give notice to Copyco of the suit. Once it obtains jurisdiction over Copyco, the court should use State A's "most significant relationship" approach to determine the proper law to apply to the unfair-competition claim. The proper choice of law depends on several factors, including the policies underlying the competing laws. Here, given the many connections of the case to State A, it is likely that a court sitting in State A would apply State A law.

Point One(a) (20–30%)

Rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permits service of process on a foreign corporation outside of the United States by any means directed by the court as long as it is not prohibited by international agreement.

In a proper case, a federal court has the power to permit a plaintiff to serve a foreign corporate defendant by e-mail. Rule 4 authorizes service of process upon a corporation outside the United States "in any manner prescribed by Rule 4(f) for serving an individual, except personal delivery" FED. R. CIV. P. 4(h)(2). Subdivision (f) of Rule 4, in turn, permits service in places outside the United States by a variety of methods, including means of service allowed by international agreement, by foreign law, and by general international practice. Importantly, subdivision (f) gives the district court broad authority to direct service by any "means not prohibited by international agreement." FED. R. CIV. P. 4(f)(3). In other words, the court can authorize any method of making service of process abroad, including e-mail, in its discretion, if no international agreement prohibits it. Moreover, the court's authority to direct non-traditional means of service "is neither a 'last resort' nor 'extraordinary relief,'" Rio Props., Inc. v. Rio Int'l Interlink, 284 F.3d 1007, 1015 (9th Cir. 2002); it is simply one of the tools the court has to ensure that procedural matters are handled sensibly and fairly.

On the facts of this case, it is likely that e-mail service of process would be approved by the court. First, the facts state that there are no applicable international treaties, so the court's power to direct any "means" of service, including e-mail, is not limited by international agreement. Second, this seems like a perfect case for e-mail: the defendant's street address cannot be ascertained, and the defendant's business conduct evinces a preference for communication through the Internet. It would seem that service by e-mail would be convenient for the defendant and reasonably calculated to give the defendant notice of the action. It would, moreover, prevent the significant hardship to the plaintiff that might result if the plaintiff were required to find other means to track down and serve this elusive corporate defendant. For these reasons, the court is likely to authorize e-mail service in this situation. For other recent cases authorizing e-mail service under such circumstances, see Philip Morris USA Inc. v. Veles Ltd., 2007 WL 725412 (SDNY 2007); Export-Import Bank of the U.S. v. Asia Pulp and Paper Co., 2005 WL 1123755 (SDNY 2005); Williams v. Adver. Sex LLC, 231 F.R.D. 483 (N.D. W.Va. 2005); In re Int'l Telemedia Assoc., Inc., 245 B.R. 713, 719 (Bank. N.D. Ga. 2000).

Point One(b) (20–30%)

Service by e-mail is constitutional where it is reasonably calculated to give notice.

Even if permitted by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a method of service of process cannot be employed if it would violate the United States Constitution. The due process clause guarantees litigants "notice reasonably calculated, under all the circumstances, to apprise interested parties of the pendency of the action and afford them an opportunity to present their objections. . . . The means employed must be such as one desirous of actually informing the absentee might reasonably adopt to accomplish it." Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 U.S. 306, 314–15 (1950). Service by e-mail is reasonably calculated to reach Copyco, which lists its e-mail address on its website but does not list a street address or post office box. In fact, in these circumstances, service by e-mail may be the method of service most likely to reach Copyco. Since service via e-mail is reasonably calculated to reach Copyco, it comports with due process.

Point Two(a) (20–30%)

A federal court exercising diversity jurisdiction over non-federal claims must apply the choice-of-law rule of the state in which it sits.

In Klaxon Co. v. Stentor Electric Manufacturing Co., 313 U.S. 487 (1941), the Supreme Court of the United States held that a federal district court sitting in diversity must apply the choice-of-law approach prevailing in the state in which it sits. The Klaxon rule is designed to ensure that a federal court sitting in diversity and the state court sitting next door would reach the same result if presented with the same case. If federal courts were free to craft their own choice-of-law rules, then the federal court might choose a different jurisdiction's substantive law to govern the dispute than the state court would, and the goals of uniformity and equal administration of justice would be frustrated. Id. at 496–97. Thus, the federal district court sitting in State A should apply the choice-of-law approach followed by the courts of State A. The facts indicate that State A applies the Second Restatement of Conflict of Laws.

Point Two(b) (20–30%)

Because the federal court will apply State A's choice-of-law rule, the Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws (the methodology employed by State A) applies here. Under the Second Restatement's approach, issues in tort are governed by the law of the state that has the most significant relationship to the occurrence and the parties.

Unfair competition is a tort claim governed by § 145 of the Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws (cmts. e & f (1971)). Section 145 states that “the rights and liabilities of the parties with respect to an issue in tort are determined by the local law of the state which, with respect to that issue, has the most significant relationship to the occurrence and the parties under the principles stated in § 6.” Id. § 145(1). Section 145 lists four contacts to be considered in performing this analysis: “(a) the place where the injury occurred, (b) the place where the conduct causing the injury occurred, (c) the . . . place of incorporation, and place of business of the parties, and (d) the place where the relationship, if any, between the parties is centered. These contacts are to be evaluated according to their relative importance with respect to the particular issue.” Id. § 145(2).

Here, an evaluation of the § 145 contacts reveals that a number of jurisdictions have important connections to the parties and the transaction. First, Bearco's injury—the loss of customers who bought Copyco's knockoff “Griz” bears—occurred in all 50 states and would have been felt most acutely in State A (where Bearco maintains its corporate and administrative offices) and State B (where Bearco's factories are located). Copyco's conduct occurred both in Country X, where it manufactured the knockoff bears, and also in all 50 states, where it sold bears in competition with Bearco. The two companies are incorporated in different locations, State A (Bearco) and Country X (Copyco), and their places of business are likewise in different locales.

Where the contacts are so thoroughly split among so many jurisdictions, courts applying the Second Restatement will pay special attention to the principles for making choice-of-law decisions as stated in § 6 of the Restatement. In a tort case like this one, a court will ordinarily focus its attention on the policies of the laws that are in conflict and, in particular, on any interest of its own state in having its policies apply to the case. Id. at § 6(2)(b) & (c).

Here it is likely that the purpose of State A's unfair-competition law is to protect businesses from the economic harm caused by the kind of unfair competition involved in this case. Given that Bearco is a local business, incorporated and headquartered in State A, and that the injury from Copyco's unfair competition will be felt in State A, State A would certainly have an interest in seeing its policy applied to force Copyco to compensate Bearco. On the other hand, Country X would be interested in seeing its law apply to protect Copyco if the policy behind Country X's failure to regulate unfair competition is intended to facilitate competition by its companies and to encourage their manufacturing operations in Country X.

Here, a federal court sitting in State A is likely to conclude that State A has the “most significant relationship” to the case. In a situation of conflict between local and foreign law, where both the local and foreign jurisdictions’ policies would be furthered by applying their law, most courts will apply local law and further local policies unless there is a strong reason not to do so. There is nothing unfair in subjecting Copyco to State A law where its activities were directed in part at customers in State A, it injured a State A corporation, and it was foreseeable that it could be subject to State A law on account of its activities. The federal court will likely apply State A’s unfair-competition law.

[NOTE: An applicant’s conclusion is less important than his or her ability to state and use the relevant principles of the Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws. Applicants are expected to know that the federal court will apply State A’s choice-of-law methodology to choose the law governing the supplemental state claim and that the Second Restatement requires application of the law of the state with the most significant relationship to the parties and the occurrence. They should also know that the Second Restatement requires consideration of a variety of personal and territorial factors and an analysis of the policies underlying the laws competing for application. Applicants are not expected to recall specific Restatement sections or comments, nor are applicants expected to reach the same results as the model analysis.]

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS (COMMERCIAL PAPER) IV.A.; V.A., C., H.; VI.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Is a person in possession of a check that has been transferred by means of a forged indorsement entitled to enforce the check against the payee whose signature was forged?
 - (2) Is a person in possession of a check that has been transferred by means of a forged indorsement entitled to enforce the check against the drawer of the check?
 - (3) Is a person in possession of a check that has been transferred by means of a forged indorsement entitled to enforce the check against the drawee bank?
 - (4) Is a person in possession of a check that has been transferred by means of a forged indorsement entitled to enforce the check against the forger from whom he received the check?

DISCUSSION

[NOTE: Although a bank is involved in the fact pattern, this question does not raise any questions under UCC Article 4. When Seller tried to present the check payable to Payee for payment over the counter, Bank did not pay it or accept it for collection, so there are no Article 4 issues raised by these facts. Article 4 is not included in the negotiable instruments specifications for the MEE, and references to UCC Article 4 in answers to this question are unnecessary.]

Summary

Even though Seller acted in good faith and gave value in exchange for Payee's check, Seller has no rights against Payee because Payee never signed the check and is therefore not liable on it. Furthermore, the lack of a valid indorsement of the check by Payee means that Seller cannot be a holder of the check and is therefore not entitled to enforce it against Drawer or Bank. Moreover, Bank would not be liable to Seller in any event, as a drawee is not liable to the payee or holder of a check (draft) unless it has accepted it. Accordingly, Seller's only recourse will be against Thief on a theory of breach of transfer warranty or on Thief's indorser's contract.

Point One: (20–30%)

Seller cannot recover from Payee because Payee is not liable on the instrument. Thief's forgery of Payee's signature is not effective as an indorser's signature because Payee was not negligent, and Thief is not Payee's agent.

UCC § 3-401(a) provides that a person is not liable on an instrument unless that person signed the instrument or that person's agent or representative signed the instrument. Payee did not sign the instrument and Thief is not Payee's agent or representative, so his forgery of her signature is not effective as her signature. An exception to this general rule is found in UCC § 3-406, which provides that if a person's failure to exercise ordinary care substantially contributes to the making of a forged signature, then that person will be precluded from asserting the fact of the forgery to avoid liability. Nothing in the facts suggests that Payee was negligent, so this exception does not apply.

Point Two: (30–40%)

The check is payable to Payee, so without Payee's indorsement, Thief is not a holder of the instrument; when Thief transferred the check to Seller, Seller acquired only the rights that Thief had and so is not entitled to enforce the instrument.

When a negotiable instrument has been dishonored, a "person entitled to enforce the [instrument]" ordinarily may bring an action to enforce the instrument against the drawer of the instrument. UCC § 3-414(b). In this case, however, Seller has no legal right to enforce the instrument against Drawer because Seller is not a person entitled to enforce the instrument.

The check Drawer wrote was originally payable to Payee and was therefore "order paper." See UCC § 3-109. Until Payee indorses the check, Payee is the only person who can be a holder of the instrument. UCC § 1-201(b)(21)(A). When Thief acquired the check as a result of stealing Payee's handbag, he did not become a holder in his own right because Payee had not indorsed the check. Thief also did not acquire any of Payee's rights as a holder because Payee did not deliver the check to Thief for the purpose of giving Thief a right to enforce it. See UCC § 3-203(a) & (b). Thus, Thief was neither a holder of the check nor a person with the rights of a holder, and Thief was not entitled to enforce the check. See UCC § 3-301.

When Thief transferred the check to Seller, Seller did not become a holder because, as noted earlier, the forged indorsement of the check was ineffective and the check remained payable to Payee. Seller did receive all the rights Thief had in the check, but Thief had no right to enforce the check. In short, Seller is not a person entitled to enforce the check and therefore has no claim against Drawer.

[NOTE: Some examinees might also note that Seller's attempt to cash the check was not a presentment because he was not a person entitled to enforce. UCC §§ 3-301, 3-501. Since dishonor of a check is a condition precedent to the drawer's liability on a check, UCC § 3-414(b), and presentment is a condition precedent to dishonor, Seller also cannot recover from Drawer because the check has not yet been dishonored.]

Point Three (10–20%)

Bank is not liable to Seller on the check both because Seller is not entitled to enforce the check and because a drawee bank is not liable, even to a holder, on an uncertified personal check.

Bank is not under any obligation to the holder to pay a check that it has not already accepted (certified), so Seller could not recover from Bank even if it had wrongly dishonored the check because a drawee bank is not liable on an unaccepted draft. See UCC § 3-408. Moreover, Seller was not a holder and not entitled to enforce the check, so it was entirely proper for Bank to refuse to pay.

Point Four: (30–40%)

Seller is entitled to recover the amount of the check from Thief because Thief breached the transfer warranties that Thief is entitled to enforce the instrument and that all signatures are genuine.

A person who transfers an instrument for consideration makes certain standard warranties to the transferee of the instrument. In particular, the transferor warrants that he is entitled to enforce the instrument and that all signatures on the instrument are authorized and authentic. UCC § 3-416(a).

When Thief transferred the check to Seller in exchange for the car, Thief breached these transfer warranties. Thief was not a person entitled to enforce the instrument, and the forged Payee signature was neither genuine nor authorized. Seller took the instrument in good faith and so is entitled to recover the amount of the check from Thief for breach of these warranties. UCC § 3-416(b).

[NOTE: Seller arguably has a contract claim against Thief. Thief's forgery of Payee's signature is effective as Thief's own signature, UCC § 3-403(a), with respect to a person, like Seller, who takes the instrument for value. So as to Seller, Thief is an indorser of the check (even though he indorsed in Payee's name) and owes Seller an indorser's obligation. See UCC § 3-415(a). When Bank refused to pay the instrument, that refusal arguably triggered Thief's liability as an indorser.

There are difficulties with that analysis, however. First, only a person entitled to enforce the instrument can bring a claim against an indorser, and Seller is not entitled to enforce. Second, dishonor is a condition precedent to the indorser's liability on a check, UCC § 3-415(a), and (as noted earlier) the check has not yet been dishonored. Consequently, examinees who mention Thief's indorser's liability might receive some credit, but only if they also discuss the more likely basis for Thief's liability to Seller, that is, breach of transfer warranties.]

TORTS II.A., B., D.1., E.1.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Does Nephew have a cause of action against Tenant for negligence?
 - (2) What is the standard of care applicable to Nephew?
 - (3) Will Nephew's negligence prevent Nephew from recovering damages from Tenant or Landlord?
 - (4) Did Landlord's violation of a state statute requiring that every part of a building be kept "in good repair" represent negligence per se?
 - (5) Was Landlord's failure to repair the furnace a proximate cause of Nephew's injuries?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The jury could award Nephew damages in his action against Tenant. In a negligence action, an adult defendant's conduct is measured against that of a reasonable, prudent person engaged in a similar activity; a minor's conduct is measured against that of a minor of like age, intelligence, and experience. The determination of whether a party's conduct conforms to the applicable standard of care is a question of fact that is normally left to the jury. Here the jury could conclude that Tenant was negligent and that his negligence was the cause in fact and proximate cause of Nephew's injuries. Even if the jury also concluded that Nephew was negligent, under modern comparative negligence rules Nephew could still recover from Tenant.

It is less clear that the jury could award Nephew damages in his action against Landlord. Although violation of a state statute is normally considered negligence per se, it is unclear that the injuries Nephew suffered were within the category of harms the legislature aimed to prevent when enacting the statute. It is equally unclear whether Landlord's failure to repair the furnace was a proximate cause of the injuries.

Point One: (15–25%)

A reasonable jury could conclude that Tenant was negligent and that his negligence caused Nephew's injuries.

In any negligence action, a plaintiff must show that the defendant owed the plaintiff a duty to conform his conduct to a standard necessary to avoid an unreasonable risk of harm to others, that the defendant's conduct fell below the applicable standard of care, and that the defendant's conduct was both the cause in fact and the proximate cause of his injuries.

Nephew would have no difficulty in establishing that Tenant owed him a duty of care. Nephew was Tenant's household guest whose presence was known to Tenant. Thus, Tenant owed Nephew an obligation to exercise reasonable care to avoid foreseeable risks. See RICHARD A. EPSTEIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON TORTS 154–55 (7th ed. 2000).

In determining whether Tenant's conduct fell below the standard of care, the jury would measure that conduct against the conduct of a reasonable, prudent person engaged in a like activity. A reasonable, prudent person takes precautions to avoid foreseeable risks. See id. at 162–63. A large pot of boiling water, if it spills, clearly poses a foreseeable risk of serious burns. A jury might also conclude that it was foreseeable that someone would come out of the bedroom quickly and collide with the boiling water. The burden of taking precautions to avert this possibility was small; Tenant could have yelled, "I'm coming with a pot of boiling water," or closed the bedroom door. Given the foreseeability of serious harm and the small burden of taking precautions, a jury might conclude that Tenant was negligent.

Tenant's conduct also was the cause in fact and proximate cause of the injuries. Tenant's failure to take precautions appears to have been a substantial factor in producing the accident. Burns were a foreseeable result of collision with a pot containing boiling water. Thus, based on the facts, a jury could properly award damages to Nephew.

Point Two: (15–25%)

Although Nephew's age makes it unlikely, a jury could find that Nephew was negligent and that Nephew's negligence was a contributing factor in causing his injuries.

Nephew, like Tenant, had a duty to prevent foreseeable risks to himself and others. In judging whether Nephew exercised reasonable care under the circumstances, the jury would measure Nephew's conduct against that of a minor of like age, intelligence, and experience. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS §§ 283, 283A (1965); Roberts v. Ring, 173 N.W. 437 (Minn. 1919). A few jurisdictions apply the so-called "tender years doctrine," under which a minor of less than seven years of age cannot be found negligent, but Nephew was age eight when the accident occurred.

Nephew chased a ball into the hall without looking or calling out. To an adult, this conduct would create a foreseeable risk of collision with someone walking in the hall. Age is the key factor here. A normal toddler does not foresee risks, particularly when engaged in an activity like chasing a ball; a normal adolescent does foresee such risks. Nephew, age eight, falls between a toddler and an adolescent. Therefore, it is possible, but not likely, that a jury would find that Nephew's conduct was negligent.

Point Three: (10–20%)

Even if the jury found that Nephew was negligent in running into the hall, under modern comparative negligence rules, Nephew's negligence would reduce his recovery from Tenant but would not eliminate Tenant's liability.

At common law, if the jury found the plaintiff's negligence to be a cause in fact and proximate cause of his injuries, the plaintiff could not recover from the defendant. This all-or-nothing approach was frequently criticized; it has now been abandoned by virtually all states. See EPSTEIN, supra, at 369.

Under the modern "comparative negligence" approach, if the jury finds that two or more parties are negligent, it apportions fault between them. The plaintiff's fault share is subtracted from the total damages awarded by the jury. Thus, even if the jury found Nephew to be negligent, that finding would reduce his recovery from Tenant but would not eliminate Tenant's liability, except in a state that has preserved the all-or-nothing approach to contributory negligence or in a comparative negligence state where recovery is barred if the victim was more than 50 percent negligent.

Point Four: (15–25%)

The unexcused violation of a statutory standard is negligence per se if the statute was designed to protect against the type of accident the actor's conduct caused and the injured party is within the class of persons the statute was designed to protect. Under this standard, it is unclear whether Landlord's conduct constituted negligence per se.

The governing state statute requires that "every apartment building . . . and every part thereof shall be kept in good repair." Arguably, Landlord violated the statute, as the furnace was "part" of the "apartment building" owned by Landlord, and it malfunctioned on three different occasions before Landlord took steps to correct the problem permanently. "An actor is negligent if, without excuse, the actor violates a statute that is designed to protect against the type of accident the actor's conduct causes, and if the accident victim is within the class of persons the statute is designed to protect." RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TORTS § 14 (P.F.D. NO. 1 2005). In such a case, the jury is required to find that the actor is negligent.

Landlord's failure to permanently fix the furnace was unexcused. On three earlier occasions, he was given notice of problems with the furnace but made only temporary repairs. Nephew, as the guest of a tenant, is within the class of persons the statute is designed to protect. Loss of heat and hot water is certainly among the types of harms the statute was designed to protect against. However, it is not clear that the accident which occurred—burns due to a collision—was within the category of harms the statute was designed to protect against. See EPSTEIN, supra, at 259–60 (describing conflicting authority on whether statutes criminalizing the act of leaving a key in a car ignition are designed to protect against injuries caused by a car thief).

Point Five: (20–30%)

In a negligence action, a defendant is liable only if his conduct was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. A reasonable jury could find that the type of harm Nephew suffered was too remote from Landlord's negligence in failing to provide adequate heat and hot water.

It is unclear whether Landlord's failure to repair the furnace was a proximate cause of Nephew's injuries. (Indeed, the "right type of harm" requirement for use of a statutory standard to establish negligence is probably just another way of stating the proximate cause requirement.) Even when the defendant is negligent, his conduct must have "such an effect in producing the harm as to lead reasonable men to regard it as a cause, using that word in the popular sense, in which there always lurks the idea of responsibility, rather than in the so-called 'philosophic sense,' which includes every one of the great number of events without which any happening would not have occurred." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 431, cmt. a.

Intervening actors or events that produce harm different in kind from that which one would normally anticipate from the defendant's negligence may break the chain of causation and lead a fact-finder to conclude that the defendant's acts are not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. Thus, a defendant who negligently exceeds a speed limit and therefore happens to be on the spot where a tree falls during a violent windstorm is not liable for injuries caused by the tree (see Berry v. Sugar Notch Borough, 43 A. 240 (Pa. 1899)), and a defendant who negligently fails to stop a train at a station is not liable for the passenger's injuries when she elects to walk the mile back to the station along a dangerous route and is assaulted. See Hines v. Garrett, 108 S.E. 690 (Va. 1921). These harms are simply too remote from the defendant's negligent conduct.

On similar facts, courts have not agreed on whether a landlord's conduct was the proximate cause of a plaintiff's injury. Some courts have found that the landlord's negligence in failing to timely repair a furnace is too remote from burn injuries like Nephew's based on the intervening and arguably unforeseeable conduct of actors like Nephew and Tenant as well as the nature of the injuries, which are different in kind from those that would typically be produced by an inoperable heating system. Other courts have held that a jury might reasonably find heating hot water to be a foreseeable result of not having hot water and collisions from carrying hot water a foreseeable result of heating it. Compare Martinez v. Lazaroff, 399 N.E.2d 1148 (N.Y. 1979), with Enis v. Ba-Call Bldg. Corp., 639 F.2d 359 (7th Cir. 1980). See generally Annotation, Landlord and Tenant: Violation of Statute or Ordinance Requiring Landlord to Furnish Specified Facilities or Services as Ground of Liability for Injury Resulting from Tenant's Attempt to Deal with Deficiency, 63 A.L.R.4th 883 (1988).

FAMILY LAW IV.A., B., E.1.; V.B., B.3.; VI.B.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Did State A's assertion of personal jurisdiction over Dad to determine paternity and child support based on his sexual activity in State A more than 14 years earlier meet due process requirements?
 - (2) Will a court enforce an agreement between parents that relieves a parent of support duties in exchange for that parent relinquishing parental rights?
 - (3) Will a court base the support obligation of an unmarried father who has had no relationship with his child on public-assistance benefit levels?
 - (4) Will a court award custody or visitation of a 14-year-old child to a parent whom the child has never met and who lives in a different state from the child?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Because Dad's State A contacts that provide a statutory basis for long-arm jurisdiction are closely related to the nature of the claim against Dad and Dad has a continuing support obligation, State A's assertion of personal jurisdiction over Dad probably met the requirements of the Due Process Clause. The contract between Mom and Dad waiving Dad's child-support obligation is unenforceable. Dad's child-support obligation will be based on his earnings and income, not state public-assistance benefit levels. Dad is highly unlikely to succeed in obtaining custody of Child, but may obtain visitation.

Point One: (25–35%)

State A's assertion of personal jurisdiction over Dad probably met due process requirements because the nature of the claim—paternity and child support—is closely related to Dad's State A contacts, and Dad has a continuing obligation to support Child, a State A domiciliary.

The long-arm statute quoted in the fact pattern is § 201(6) of the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA), which has been adopted by all states. The Supreme Court of the United States has not ruled on the constitutionality of this provision.

The leading case on the due process requirements governing jurisdiction over a nonresident parent in a child-support action is Kulko v. Superior Court, 436 U.S. 84 (1978). In Kulko, the Supreme Court employed the “minimum contacts” test laid out in International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 316 (1945), and reversed a state-court ruling extending long-arm jurisdiction over a nonresident parent based on his “consent[] to the permanent residence of the . . . child” in the forum state. The Kulko court noted that due process demands “some act by which the defendant purposefully avails [him]self of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum state,” Hanson v. Denckla, 357 U.S. 235, 253 (1958), before the forum state may legitimately exercise long-arm jurisdiction. Kulko, 436 U.S. at 94. The Court also held that a father “who agrees, in the interests of family harmony and his children’s preferences, to allow them to spend more time in [the forum state] . . . than was required under a separation agreement can hardly be said to have ‘purposefully availed himself’ of the ‘benefits and protection’ of [the forum state’s] laws.” Id.

The long-arm statute at issue in this case does rely on purposeful activity, i.e., sexual intercourse. Although the Supreme Court has not ruled on the constitutionality of such a provision, state courts have found that statutes like this one meet due process requirements. See, e.g., Poindexter v. Poindexter, 594 N.W.2d 76 (Mich. Ct. App. 1999); County of Humboldt v. Harris, 254 Cal. Rptr. 49 (Cal. Ct. App. 1988); Lake v. Butcher, 679 P.2d 409 (Wash. Ct. App. 1984); Larsen v. Scholl, 296 N.W.2d 785 (Iowa 1980). These courts have relied on the voluntary nature of the conduct, the fact that the child’s birth could easily be anticipated, and the state’s strong interest in ensuring that the child is supported.

Dad might argue that the state’s assertion of jurisdiction in this case would violate due process standards given that more than 14 years have passed since the State A acts that serve as a jurisdictional basis. In making this argument, Dad might rely on Kulko, in which the Supreme Court stated that the forum state could not have relied on the defendant’s marriage during a three-day visit to the forum state 13 years before the support action was brought as a basis for jurisdiction. See Kulko, 436 U.S. at 93. But, in contrast to the marriage in Kulko, the sexual activity that serves as the jurisdictional basis in this case is directly related to the basis for asserting jurisdiction and Dad continues to have a support obligation to Child. It is thus likely that a court would find that the assertion of jurisdiction is constitutional. See UIFSA § 201 cmt. (“No time frame is stated for filing a proceeding; this is based on the fact that the absent parent has a support obligation that extends for at least the minority of the child (and often longer in many states).”). There are also state-court decisions exercising long-arm jurisdiction on similar facts. See Dambakly v. Patire, 754 N.Y.S.2d 308 (App. Div. 2003).

Point Two: (15–25%)

The agreement between Mom and Dad eliminating Dad’s child-support duty is inconsistent with the best interests of the child and is unenforceable.

Although the agreement between Mom and Dad appears to satisfy other basic contract law requirements, it is unenforceable. Courts have long held that parents may not enter into enforceable agreements that adversely affect the rights of their children; courts always retain authority to enter support and custody orders that are in the children’s best interests. See AM. LAW INST., PRINCIPLES

OF THE LAW OF FAMILY DISSOLUTION: ANALYSIS & RECOMMENDATIONS §§ 2.06, 3.13, 7.06 & comments (2002); HOMER H. CLARK, JR., THE LAW OF DOMESTIC RELATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES § 18.5 (2d ed. 1988). The agreement at issue in this case would eliminate the relationship between Dad and Child for the convenience of the parents; all courts would find that this conflicts with the child's interests in having two parents who can provide support and care.

Point Three: (20–30%)

The State A court will determine the value of Dad's child-support obligation to Child on the same basis that it would use to determine support for a child born to married parents. Because the court must consider, at a minimum, all of Dad's income and earnings, it will not base the value of a child-support award on state public-assistance benefit levels.

Federal legislation enacted during the 1980s requires all states, as a condition of federal funding, to employ numerical child-support guidelines and establish a rebuttable presumption that the award which would result from application of the guidelines is correct, see 42 U.S.C. § 667; the guidelines must be applied in all cases, regardless of the parents' marital status.

Although state guidelines vary considerably in the way support is calculated, none sets presumptive awards at a public-assistance level. Federal regulations require state support guidelines to "take into consideration all earnings and income of the noncustodial parent, . . . be based on specific descriptive and numeric criteria and result in a computation of the support obligation." 45 C.F.R. § 302.56.

Thus the State A court should determine the value of Dad's support obligation based on his income, not the value of state public-assistance benefits.

[NOTE: Support laws that disregard marital status may be constitutionally mandated. In Gomez v. Perez, 409 U.S. 535 (1973), the Supreme Court held that a state law which based the existence of a support obligation on the parents' marital status violated the Equal Protection Clause. Gomez has often been interpreted as forbidding marital-status variation in the value of support, although there are some state court opinions that have taken a contrary view. See AM. LAW INST., supra, § 3.01 Reporter's Notes.]

Point Four: (20–30%)

The State A court will determine custody and visitation based on Child's best interests. It will almost certainly award primary custody to Mom because Dad has had no prior relationship with Child, but it will likely award Dad visitation.

Custody and visitation disputes are governed by the court's determination of the child's best interests. See CLARK, supra, §19.1; AM. LAW INST., supra, § 2.02 & cmt. Residential and relational continuity are both widely recognized as important sources of child well-being. It is thus highly unlikely that a court would award custody to Dad, who lives at some distance from Child's current home and with whom Child has had no relationship whatsoever.

However, meaningful contact with both parents also is recognized as an important source of child well-being. It is thus extremely rare for a court to deny an adjudicated parent visitation, even when the parent and child have had no significant relationship. See id. The presumption in favor of visitation and the lack of any evidence in the fact pattern that visitation would be harmful to Child suggest that Dad's petition for visitation would be granted.

The court might nonetheless deny Dad's visitation petition if it finds that visitation is not in Child's best interests. This outcome is more likely if the court finds that the petition was brought in bad faith as a means of deterring Mom from proceeding with the paternity/support action and if Child strongly objects to visitation; because Child is 14, most states would require the court to consider Child's wishes in fashioning a visitation order. See Family Law in the Fifty States 2003–2004, 38 FAM. L. Q. 810, Chart 2 (custody criteria) (2005).

CORPORATIONS VI.A.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Does the business judgment rule protect from liability a director who authorizes a transaction in which another director has a financial interest without obtaining full disclosure?
 - (2) Does the business judgment rule protect from liability a director who is interested in a transaction and who does not make full disclosure about that transaction?
 - (3) Does the approval of the transaction by the disinterested members of the board of directors protect from liability a director who is interested in a transaction and who does not make full disclosure about that transaction?
 - (4) Does an exculpatory provision in the articles of incorporation protect from liability a director who authorizes a transaction in which another director has an interest without obtaining full disclosure?
 - (5) Does an exculpatory provision in the articles of incorporation protect from liability a director who is interested in a transaction and who does not make full disclosure about that transaction?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The directors (other than Major) will not be protected from liability by the business judgment rule because they did not exercise adequate care in authorizing the transactions with Major. Major will not be protected from liability by the business judgment rule because he is interested in the transactions and did not disclose all relevant facts about the transactions to the other directors. Nor will Major be protected from liability by the approval of the transactions by a disinterested board of directors because he failed to make full disclosure regarding the transactions to the directors who approved the transactions. The directors (other than Major) will be protected from liability by the exculpatory provision in the articles of incorporation because their breach was of the duty of care, not the duty of loyalty, and the exculpatory provision protects against breaches of the duty of care. Major, however, will not be protected from liability by the exculpatory provision because he breached his duty of loyalty when he received an improper financial benefit through the transactions with Corporation.

Point One: (30–40%)

The directors (other than Major) will not be protected from liability by the business judgment rule because they did not exercise adequate care when they failed to seek and receive sufficient information about the transactions.

Directors owe a duty of loyalty and a duty of care. The directors other than Major received no personal benefit from the transactions that they approved and did not stand on both sides of the transactions being approved. Thus the directors, other than Major, did not violate the duty of loyalty.

Consequently, the claims against them are for failure to exercise the level of care required of directors. In this case, the claim is likely to be that the directors failed to exercise care in informing themselves regarding the transactions that they approved. See generally Smith v. Van Gorkom, 488 A.2d 858, 872–73 (Del. 1985) (directors have a duty to exercise an informed business judgment); MODEL BUS. CORP. ACT § 8.30(b) (directors shall exercise care in becoming informed).

The exercise of managerial powers by a director is generally subject to the business judgment rule. The business judgment rule “is a presumption that in making a business decision, the directors of a corporation acted on an informed basis, in good faith and in the honest belief that the action taken was in the best interests of the company.” Aronson v. Lewis, 473 A.2d 805, 812 (Del. 1984) (overruled on other grounds). Consequently, “the party attacking a board decision as uninformed must rebut the presumption that its business judgment was an informed one.” Smith, 488 A.2d at 872. See also MODEL BUS. CORP. ACT § 8.31(a)(2)(ii)(A) (to similar effect).

Under the facts, the directors (other than Major) did not exercise adequate care in becoming informed about the transactions in question: they relied entirely on Major’s assurances that the prices paid by Corporation represented the fair market value of the properties purchased, they did not ask how he determined the fair market value, and they never employed any independent party to evaluate the properties being purchased, despite their awareness of Major’s interest in the transactions. In sum, the directors exercised scant, if any, care in becoming informed.

In performing their duty to become informed, directors are generally entitled to rely upon information, opinions, reports, or statements of corporate officers. See DEL. GEN. CORP. LAW § 141(e); MODEL BUS. CORP. ACT § 8.30(d) & (e)(1). In this case, however, the directors had knowledge that made such reliance unwarranted. They knew that Major was interested in the transactions being presented to the board for approval. See MODEL BUS. CORP. ACT § 8.30(d) (director is not protected from liability in reliance where he or she has knowledge that makes reliance unwarranted). In addition, Major’s statement that “I have investigated the value of my property to be purchased by Corporation and I assure you that the purchase price to be paid by Corporation represents its fair market value” probably lacked enough substance to be relied upon. See Smith, 488 A.2d at 874–75.

In sum, the directors (other than Major) are not entitled to the protection of the business judgment rule because their decisions were uninformed.

Point Two: (10–20%)

Major will not be protected from liability by the business judgment rule because Major has an interest in the transactions in question.

Where a director stands on both sides of a transaction, the business judgment rule does not apply. See AM. LAW INST., PRINCIPLES OF CORPORATE GOVERNANCE: ANALYSIS AND RECOMMENDATIONS § 4.01(c)(1) (1994) (good faith business judgment of director fulfills duty of director where director is, among other things, not interested in the subject of the transaction); cf. MODEL BUS. CORP. ACT § 8.31(a)(2)(v) (director not liable to corporation unless party asserting liability establishes one of a number of elements including receipt of financial benefit by the director to which director is not entitled or other actionable breach of duty by the director to deal fairly with the corporation). Instead, the director has the burden of proving the fairness of the transaction. See, e.g., HMG/Courtland Properties, Inc. v. Gray, 749 A.2d 94, 115 (Del. Ch. 1999) (directors who were on both sides of transactions in question had burden of establishing entire fairness of the transactions).

Major will not be protected from liability by the business judgment rule because Major was interested in the transactions and, consequently, Major will be required to establish the fairness of the transactions in question in order to avoid a claim that he breached a fiduciary duty of loyalty.

Point Three: (10–20%)

Major will not be protected from liability by the approval of the transactions by a disinterested board of directors because Major failed to make full disclosure regarding the transactions to the directors who approved the transactions.

Major may argue that since the transactions in question were approved by disinterested directors, the transactions should be subject to the business judgment rule and the party challenging the transactions should be required to prove that the transactions were unfair to the corporation or, perhaps, even to prove that the transactions constituted waste. See DEL. GEN. CORP. LAW § 144(a)(1); Marciano v. Nakash, 535 A.2d 400, 405 n.3 (Del. 1987) (dictum) (“approval by fully informed disinterested directors under § 144(a)(1) . . . permits invocation of the business judgment rule and limits judicial review to issues of gift or waste with the burden of proof upon the party attacking the transaction”). In a Model Act jurisdiction, Major may also argue that the transaction should be within the statutory “safe harbor” for transactions approved by disinterested directors and, therefore, immune from attack. See MODEL BUS. CORP. ACT §§ 8.61(b) & 8.62.

None of these arguments is available to Major because approval by disinterested directors does not trigger the business judgment rule where the director has not disclosed all material facts about the director’s interest in the transaction. Cf. id. § 8.60(4) (defining “required disclosure” to include, among other things, “all facts known [by the director] respecting the subject matter of the transaction that an ordinarily prudent person would reasonably believe to be material to a judgment about whether or not to proceed with the transaction”). Clearly Major did not make adequate disclosure to the board of directors. In fact, Major misrepresented the facts by assuring the board that the price being paid for his properties was the fair market value. Certainly an ordinarily prudent board member would find the fact that the price is vastly more than market price is material to a judgment about whether to proceed with a transaction.

In sum, Major is not protected from liability by the approval of the transactions by a disinterested board of directors because Major failed to make full disclosure to the directors.

Point Four: (5–15%)

The directors (other than Major) will be protected from liability by the exculpatory provision in the articles of incorporation.

A corporation's articles of incorporation may include a provision shielding its directors from liability for money damages for the failure to exercise adequate care in the performance of their duties as directors. Delaware, for example, permits provisions that protect directors from liability for breaches of the duty of care, but does not permit provisions that protect directors from liability for any breach of the duty of loyalty, for acts or omissions that are not in good faith, or for any transactions from which the director received an improper personal benefit. See DEL. GEN. CORP. LAW § 102(b)(7). Similarly, the Model Business Corporation Act permits provisions that protect directors from liability for breaches of the duty of care, but does not permit provisions that limit or eliminate liability “for the amount of a financial benefit received by a director to which he is not entitled.” MODEL BUS. CORP. ACT § 2.02(b)(4).

Here, there is no suggestion that the directors (other than Major) received an improper personal benefit. The directors (other than Major) do not appear to have breached the duty of loyalty. They have not engaged in self-dealing and the facts do not suggest they usurped any corporate opportunity or received excessive compensation. Although their actions in taking Major's assertions at face value appear very foolish, negligence does not establish bad faith.

In sum, the directors (other than Major) are protected from liability for money damages for breach of the duty of care by the exculpatory provision in the articles of incorporation.

[NOTE: An applicant may argue that the directors (other than Major) acted in bad faith because they failed to take any meaningful action to determine the facts underlying the transactions. If that inaction is found to constitute gross negligence, it may constitute an action “not in good faith” and so subject the directors (other than Major) to liability. Applicants who raise this argument should receive extra credit.]

Point Five: (5–15%)

Major will not be protected from liability by the exculpatory provision in the articles of incorporation because Major breached his duty of loyalty and received an improper personal benefit from Corporation.

Major will not be protected from liability by the exculpatory provision in the articles because that provision does not protect directors for actions undertaken in bad faith or for a breach of the duty of loyalty, such as the receipt of an improper personal benefit. Major acted in bad faith by intentionally misrepresenting to the board that the purchase prices represented fair market value when they in fact reflected vastly inflated prices. Major's conduct probably violated the duty of loyalty since he had a personal interest in the transactions, they were not properly approved, and they probably were not fair to the corporation. Major received an improper personal benefit by getting proceeds for his property at inflated prices. For these reasons, the exculpatory provision will not protect Major from liability.

Questions

MEE Question 1

Prior to his death, Settlor created a valid irrevocable trust and named Trustee as trustee. The trust instrument specified that:

- 1) Trustee shall distribute trust income to Trustee's adult children, David and Edna, in such amounts as Trustee, in Trustee's absolute and uncontrolled discretion, shall determine.
- 2) Trustee may distribute all trust income to either David or Edna.
- 3) Trustee shall have the power to sell any trust property.
- 4) This trust shall terminate in 10 years and, upon its termination, Trustee shall distribute 60% of trust property to David and Edna, in equal shares.
- 5) In view of my long-standing interest in the area of education, Trustee shall distribute all remaining trust property to my alma mater, Business College.

During the last year of the trust, Trustee paid all trust income to David. Trustee's decision was motivated solely by her personal disagreement with Edna's political opinions.

During the same year, Trustee decided to sell certain trust assets. Solely to avoid paying a 6% sales commission that would have reduced the trust's sales proceeds, Trustee, in her personal capacity, purchased these assets for their undisputed fair market value. After the sale, the assets unexpectedly increased in value. Trustee recently sold these assets to a bona fide purchaser for a significant profit and retained the profit for herself.

The trust has terminated, and Trustee has discovered that Business College no longer exists. Trustee seeks judicial approval to distribute Business College's share of the trust to Settlor's estate.

1. Did Trustee breach any fiduciary duty by paying all trust income to David during the last year of the trust? Explain.
2. Must Trustee return to the trust the profit she retained from assets she purchased from the trust? Explain.
3. Should a court authorize Trustee to distribute trust property that was payable to Business College to Settlor's estate? Explain.

MEE Question 2

Debate! is a local cable-TV program devoted to public affairs. Each program features a debate about a controversial public issue.

One year ago, a state official proposed legislation that would substantially increase tax rates. The proposal was very controversial, and the producers of Debate! invited two guests, Tax and Anti-Tax, to debate the proposal.

During a live broadcast, the following exchange took place:

Anti-Tax: Taxes are already much too high. If this ridiculous tax increase goes through, you'll have a revolution on your hands!

Tax: Don't be ridiculous. This tax increase is necessary and affordable.

Anti-Tax: You're a dishonest imbecile. The people have had enough! I call on all viewers to refuse to pay this proposed tax. And to make it clear that we mean business, I call on viewers to make Tax pay up. He lives at 224 Oak Street, right here in town. Let's show him what a taking really means.

At the conclusion of the program, Anti-Tax was arrested and charged with violating two state laws. One law, the "Sedition Statute," prohibits "any person from teaching the duty, necessity, or propriety of crime, violence, or unlawful acts of terrorism as a means of accomplishing political reform." The Sedition Statute has been construed to apply only to advocacy of imminent law-breaking.

The other law, the "Abusive Words Statute," punishes "directing any abusive word or term at another." This statute has not been interpreted by the state courts.

Two days after Anti-Tax's remarks, an unknown arsonist started a fire that destroyed Tax's home.

The proposed tax increase has not been enacted.

1. Assuming that Anti-Tax's statements fall within the scope of the Sedition Statute, what constitutional arguments can be made against convicting him for violating the statute? Explain.
2. Assuming that Anti-Tax's statements fall within the scope of the Abusive Words Statute, what constitutional arguments can be made against convicting him for violating the statute? Explain.

MEE Question 3

Two years ago, Husband and Wife divorced in State A. The divorce decree specified that

- (a) Husband and Wife shall have joint custody of their 10-year-old child, Son, who shall reside with Wife Sunday through Wednesday and with Husband Thursday through Saturday of each week; and
- (b) Husband shall pay Wife $1,000 per month in child support until Son turns 18.

Three months ago, Wife accepted a job in State B, about 600 miles from State A. Wife's new job raises her net income by $1,000 per month and offers excellent opportunities for promotion. Wife's parents also live near Wife's new job in State B, and Wife believes that Son will benefit from spending more time with his grandparents.

Two months ago, Wife moved to State B with Son. Given the distance between Wife's new home in State B and Husband's home in State A, Wife can no longer transport Son to Husband's home in compliance with the State A custody decree. Wife therefore telephoned Husband and said, "Son can visit you for six weeks during the summer," to make up the time that Husband will lose with Son each week.

Husband has never visited State B and owns no property there; he opposed Wife's move to State B. Husband also told Wife that, given her higher earnings from her new job, he would immediately stop paying child support. Husband has not paid child support since making this statement.

Ten days ago, Wife filed a petition in a State B court seeking modification of the State A custody decree so as to give her sole custody of Son and to substitute a six-week summer visitation period for Husband's weekly time with Son. Wife also registered and sought to enforce the State A child support order. Wife personally served this petition on Husband in State A.

Five days ago, Husband filed a petition in State A court seeking modification of the custody decree so as to give him sole custody of Son and to substitute an eight-week summer visitation period for Wife's weekly time with Son. Husband also requested elimination of his support obligation retroactive to the date of Wife's move. Husband personally served this petition on Wife in State B.

1. Should the State B court enforce the State A child support order? Explain.
2. Should the State B court modify the State A custody order by awarding sole custody of Son to Wife and substituting a six-week summer visit for Husband's weekly time with Son? Explain.

MEE Question 3

3. Should the State A court modify the State A custody order by awarding sole custody of Son to Husband and substituting an eight-week summer visit for Wife's weekly time with Son? Explain.
4. Should the State A court modify the State A child support order either retroactively or prospectively? Explain.

MEE Question 4

Three years ago, Printco, a printing company, borrowed $250,000 from Bank and entered into an enforceable agreement giving Bank a security interest in “all Printco’s equipment, whether now owned or hereafter acquired.” Bank promptly filed a proper financing statement in the appropriate state office, listing itself as the secured party, listing Printco as the debtor, and indicating “all debtor’s equipment, whether now owned or hereafter acquired” as collateral.

Two years after signing the security agreement with Bank, Printco entered into a signed agreement with Leaseco, a leasing company, pursuant to which Leaseco agreed to purchase a $100,000 printing press and to immediately lease the press to Printco. The agreement provided that Leaseco retained title to the printing press and required Printco to pay Leaseco $2,500 per month for five years for the use of the press. The agreement also provided that it could not be terminated by Printco for any reason. At the conclusion of the five-year lease, Printco was required to return the press to Leaseco or to purchase the press for $10.

Printco’s full compliance with the agreement would allow Leaseco to recover rental payments equal to the full cost of the press plus an annual return of about 10%.

Leaseco delivered the printing press to Printco.

Bank was unaware of Printco’s agreement with Leaseco, and Leaseco never filed a financing statement covering the printing press.

Recently, Printco defaulted on its obligations to Bank. At the time of the default, Printco owed $150,000 to Bank. Bank promptly and peacefully took possession of all of the equipment on Printco’s premises, including the printing press. After giving proper notice of the sale to Printco, Bank sold all of Printco’s equipment at a public auction for a total of $75,000. Purchaser, acting in good faith, bought the printing press for $50,000. All aspects of the auction and sale were commercially reasonable.

One week after the sale, Leaseco contacted Bank and informed Bank that the printing press was Leaseco’s property, not Printco’s, and that Bank had no right to sell it. Leaseco demanded that Bank pay Leaseco $50,000, the amount that Bank received for the press. Leaseco also contacted Purchaser and demanded that Purchaser return the press to Leaseco.

1. What is the nature of Leaseco’s interest in the printing press? Explain.
2. Did Bank have a right to repossess and sell the printing press? Explain.
3. As between Bank and Leaseco, which has a superior interest in the proceeds of the sale of the printing press? Explain.
4. Does Leaseco have the right to recover the printing press from Purchaser? Explain.

MEE Question 5

Sam was walking down the sidewalk when he heard shouts coming from a burning house. Sam immediately called 911 on his cell phone and rushed into the house. Inside the house, Sam discovered Resident trying to coax Resident's frightened dog from behind a couch. Sam, at great risk to his safety, crawled behind the couch and pulled the dog from its hiding place. Sam, carrying the dog, and Resident then safely made their way outside.

Once outside, Resident thanked Sam and asked Sam about his work. Sam told Resident, "I was hoping to start training as a paramedic in the fall, but I don't think I'll be able to afford the cost of the program."

Resident responded, "We need all the good paramedics that we can get! If you are going to start paramedic training, I want to help you. Also, my dog means everything to me. I want to compensate you for your heroism. Give me your address, and I will send you a check for a thousand dollars."

Sam said, "Thank you so much! Here is my address. I'll apply to the paramedic program tomorrow."

Sam applied to the paramedic training program but was denied admission. Sam then applied for and was accepted into a cosmetology training program and owes that program $1,000. Sam cannot pay the $1,000 he owes because when Resident learned Sam was not attending the paramedic program, he refused to give Sam the $1,000.

Sam sued Resident to recover the $1,000.

What theories could Sam assert to recover all or some portion of the $1,000, and what is the likelihood of success on each theory? Explain.

MEE Question 6

Ann and Bill, both citizens of State X, were walking by a construction site in State X when an overhead crane dropped a load of plate glass windows on the sidewalk near them. The windows shattered when they hit the pavement, and both Ann and Bill were struck by flying glass. Ann's injuries were severe; she incurred more than $450,000 in medical expenses. Bill suffered only minor injuries and had medical bills of $500.

At the time of the accident, the glass windows were being installed in a new skyscraper by GlassCo, Inc., a State Y corporation with its principal place of business in State Y. The crane operator was a GlassCo employee, and the crane was owned by GlassCo. A subsequent investigation by GlassCo's insurance company concluded that the accident was due to crane operator error and improper crane maintenance.

Ann and Bill have joined as plaintiffs and filed a suit against GlassCo in a state trial court in State X. Ann is seeking more than $1,000,000 in damages, and Bill is seeking $5,000. They have both refused GlassCo's request to enter into settlement negotiations.

You are an associate in the law firm that has been retained by GlassCo. The partner in charge of the case wants to remove the lawsuit from state to federal court. She has asked:

1. What must GlassCo do to remove the case from state to federal court? Explain.
2. If the case is removed to federal court, do the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit the separate claims of Ann and Bill to remain joined in a single lawsuit? Explain.
3. If Ann's and Bill's claims remain joined, will the federal court have jurisdiction over the case? Explain.

MEE Question 7

John, age 18, and Crystal, age 14, walked into the Minit Mart, a convenience store. They wandered around the store for a few minutes and then walked up to the counter. John had his hand in a leather bag. He stared at the store clerk for about 10 seconds and started to sweat. At this point, Crystal began to cry. She said, “I don’t want to do this,” and ran out of the store. John remained for a few more seconds and then ran out of the store himself. The store clerk immediately called 911 and nervously said, “Two kids were about to rob me, but I guess they changed their minds.”

Three days later, the police came to Crystal’s home, where she lives with her parents. The police told Crystal’s mother that Crystal was a suspect in an attempted robbery and that they wanted to search for evidence. Crystal’s mother asked the police if they had a warrant. They said, “No, but we can get one.” Crystal’s mother let the police in.

When the police searched Crystal’s room, they found John’s zipped leather bag in Crystal’s closet. Without first obtaining a search warrant, or asking Crystal’s mother who owned the bag, the police opened the bag and found a gun and printouts of e-mails from John to a friend. The police read the e-mails, which described John’s plans to rob the Minit Mart with the help of his girlfriend, Crystal.

Crystal later confessed that she and John had planned to rob the Minit Mart, but that she got scared and ran out of the store. She also said that John gave her the leather bag with the gun after they had left the Minit Mart and told her to “get rid of it.”

John was charged with attempted armed robbery of the Minit Mart store. His lawyer filed a motion to suppress the leather bag and its contents on the grounds that the bag was seized and searched in violation of John’s Fourth Amendment rights. The trial court denied the motion, and the issue was properly preserved for appeal.

At John’s trial for attempted armed robbery, the Minit Mart clerk testified to the facts that he had told the police earlier. Crystal also testified for the prosecution, repeating what she had previously told the police. She also said that the leather bag belonged to John, that she and John had planned the robbery together, that she saw John load the gun and put it in his leather bag before they entered the Minit Mart, and that John’s hand was in the leather bag with the gun for the entire time that they were in the Minit Mart. She testified that she “got scared” when she and John were standing at the counter, which is why she ran from the store. She said that when John got into the car after running out of the store, he said, “Well, that went bad,” and then drove away from the store.

After Crystal’s testimony, the prosecution introduced the leather bag, the e-mails, and the gun into evidence. The court admitted all of the evidence over the objection of John’s lawyer.

John presented no evidence.

MEE Question 7

At the close of the case, the trial court denied both John's motion for judgment of acquittal and his request for a jury instruction on the defense of abandonment.

The jury convicted John of attempted armed robbery. Did the trial court err:

1. In denying John's motion to suppress the leather bag and its contents? Explain.
2. In denying John's motion for judgment of acquittal? Explain.
3. In failing to instruct the jury on the defense of abandonment? Explain.

MEE Question 8

Six months ago, Andy, Ben, and Carol executed a document entitled “Metropolitan Limited Partnership Agreement” (the Agreement). Under the terms of the Agreement, Andy, Ben, and Carol were to be “limited partners” in the “Metropolitan Limited Partnership” (MLP). The Agreement provided that each would contribute $500,000 to the venture, which they each did.

The Agreement also provided that Warren would be the “general partner” of MLP, but Warren never signed the Agreement.

The Agreement further provided that the venture would buy undeveloped land and hold it for development. The land was purchased, and a deed for the land naming “Metropolitan Limited Partnership” as grantee was executed, delivered, and recorded. In the MLP name, Andy, Ben, and Carol also hired a marketing company, Marketing, to develop a campaign to resell the land as “Metropolitan Estates.”

Two months after the Agreement was executed by Andy, Ben, and Carol, Marketing sued MLP, and Andy, Ben, and Carol individually, for nonpayment of amounts due to Marketing for services it had provided to MLP. MLP is unable to pay Marketing because the land, its only asset, has substantially depreciated due to an economic downturn.

Immediately after Marketing filed suit, Andy, Ben, and Carol filed a Certificate of Limited Partnership in the name of Metropolitan Limited Partnership in the appropriate state office.

Two weeks after the Certificate of Limited Partnership was filed, Zack went onto the land owned in the name of Metropolitan Limited Partnership and fell down an uncovered well. Zack died as a result of injuries suffered in the fall. Zack’s estate has filed a wrongful death action against Andy, Ben, and Carol individually.

1. What type of entity is the Metropolitan Limited Partnership? Explain.
2. Can Marketing recover from Andy, Ben, and Carol personally for the amounts it is owed by Metropolitan Limited Partnership? What steps must it follow if it tries to do so? Explain.
3. If Zack’s estate is entitled to damages, can it recover from Andy, Ben, and Carol personally for the wrongful death claim? What steps must it follow if it tries to do so? Explain.

MEE Question 9

Two years ago, Testator, age 70, met Friend, age 50, through a dating service. Testator was a successful businessman and a widower. Friend worked for low-income wages. Friend showered Testator with affection and appeared to enjoy sharing his interests.

Three months ago, Testator proposed marriage to Friend, and Friend accepted. Thereafter, Testator decided to consult Friend's Brother, an attorney, about executing a will that would provide for Friend after Testator's death.

Without Testator's knowledge, Friend promised Brother that she would "be very generous" to him if Testator left her everything.

Testator consulted Brother and told him that he would like to leave his entire estate to a testamentary trust that would give Friend all trust income during her lifetime and give Charity the remaining trust assets after Friend's death. Brother told Testator that he would draft a will in accordance with these instructions. Brother instead drafted a will in which Testator bequeathed all of his assets to a trust, named Friend the beneficiary of "all trust income during her lifetime," gave Friend a "general power of appointment exercisable by deed or will" over trust assets, and named Charity the taker in default of appointment. After Brother advised Testator that the will reflected Testator's instructions, Testator properly executed the will drafted by Brother.

Shortly thereafter, Friend properly executed a will leaving her entire residuary estate to her Sister. Neither the residuary clause nor any other clause in Friend's will made reference to the power of appointment in Testator's will.

On the way to their wedding, Testator and Friend were in an automobile accident. Testator died immediately, and Friend died one week later.

Testator left a substantial estate. He was survived by his elderly Uncle and his Niece, both of whom he had not seen in several years. Friend is survived by Sister and Brother.

1. Is Testator's will invalid on the basis of undue influence? Explain.
2. Is Testator's will invalid on the basis of fraud? Explain.
3. If Testator's will is valid, to whom should Testator's estate be distributed? Explain.
4. If Testator's will is invalid, to whom should Testator's estate be distributed? Explain.

TRUSTS I.C.2., E.1., I.3.; II.F.3.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) May a trustee with absolute and uncontrolled discretion be held liable for abuse of discretion?
 - (2) Does a trustee breach her duty of loyalty by purchasing trust property at its fair market value, and if so, must the trustee return the profits to the trust?
 - (3) When a charitable gift of trust assets cannot be carried out because the charitable beneficiary no longer exists, should these assets be returned to the settlor's estate?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Even when a trustee has absolute and uncontrolled discretion, she may be held liable for actions representing an abuse of discretion. Failure to distribute trust income to Edna based on a personal motive constitutes an abuse of discretion, and it is likely that Trustee would be liable for withholding income from Edna based on her disagreement with Edna's political opinions.

A trustee has a duty of loyalty to trust beneficiaries. A trustee breaches the duty of loyalty by purchasing trust assets from the trust in her personal capacity, even if she pays the trust the fair market value of those assets. Because Trustee breached her duty of loyalty by purchasing property from the trust, Trustee must return the profit to the trust.

When a charitable disposition of trust assets cannot be carried out and the trust has terminated, the court should determine whether, in making the gift, the settlor had a general or specific charitable purpose. If the court finds that the settlor had a general charitable purpose, as is likely in this case, it should exercise its cy pres power and authorize distribution of the trust property to a charity that falls within the settlor's general charitable purpose.

Point One: (30–40%)

Even when a trustee has absolute and uncontrolled discretion, she may be held liable for actions representing an abuse of discretion. A failure to distribute trust income based entirely on a personal motive constitutes an abuse of discretion.

A trustee has a fiduciary duty to carry out the terms of the trust established by the settlor; failure to do so constitutes a breach of trust. In this case, the trust instrument conferred upon Trustee absolute and uncontrolled discretion to make income distributions, including distribution of all trust income to only one beneficiary. Trustee's distribution thus appears to be consistent with the terms of the trust, and a court will not ordinarily question a trustee's exercise of a discretionary power, particularly when the trustee is granted absolute and uncontrolled discretion. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 187, cmts. g & j.

However, even when a trustee is granted absolute and uncontrolled discretion, her actions may be reviewed for abuse of discretion. See id. § 187; UNIF. TRUST CODE § 814(a). Application of this standard will insulate the trustee with respect to decisions about which reasonable individuals might disagree. But when the trustee's decision is based exclusively on personal reasons unrelated to the settlor's goals, the trustee's decision may be overturned. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 187, cmts. g & j.

Here, Trustee withheld all income from Edna solely because of her personal disagreement with Edna's political opinions. Such vindictiveness probably represents an abuse of discretion. It is likely that a court would hold that Trustee's decision not to pay Edna any trust income during the last year of the trust was an abuse of discretion and therefore a breach of the duty to carry out the terms of the trust.

[NOTE: The call is structured in such a way that the applicant need not discuss what damages Edna might be entitled to for this breach. The amount of her damages may not be easily calculable.]

Point Two: (30–40%)

Because Trustee breached her duty of loyalty by purchasing trust property in her personal capacity, Trustee must return the profits to the trust.

It is a fundamental trust concept that trustees have a duty of loyalty to trust beneficiaries. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 170(1); UNIF. TRUST CODE § 802(a). The duty of loyalty includes the duty not to engage in self-dealing, such as purchasing property from the trust without court approval. The prohibition on self-dealing applies even if the purchase price is fair and reasonable. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 170(1), cmt. b; UNIF. TRUST CODE § 802(b).

[NOTE: The trust standard differs from the corporate standard. Under the corporate standard, fairness, under certain circumstances, may shield directors from liability for a self-dealing transaction.]

Trustee clearly breached her duty of loyalty to the trust beneficiaries by buying trust assets in her personal capacity. Under the no-further-inquiry rule, the reasonableness of Trustee's action and her goal to save the trust the sales commission are irrelevant. Therefore, Trustee is liable to the trust beneficiaries for all profits resulting from the breach. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS §§ 205, 206; UNIF. TRUST CODE § 1002(a)(2).

Point Three: (30–40%)

The court should find that Settlor had a general charitable intent. Therefore, the trust property should not be returned to Settlor's estate. Instead, the court should exercise its cy pres power and order that the property be distributed to a charity that falls within the general charitable purposes expressed in the trust.

Although a settlor or the settlor's estate is generally entitled to the return of any trust property that cannot be distributed in accordance with the terms of the trust, an exception applies to charitable trust dispositions that reflect a general charitable intention. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS §§ 411, 413; RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 8, cmt. g. In such a case, a court should exercise its cy pres power and direct distribution of the failed disposition to another charity. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 399; RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 67.

Until recently, it was necessary to demonstrate that the settlor had a general charitable intention before the cy pres doctrine could be applied. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 399. However, the latest Restatement of Trusts adopts the position that there should be a presumption that the settlor had a general charitable intention. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 67, cmt. b; accord UNIF. TRUST CODE § 413.

Under either approach, a court should find that Settlor had a general charitable intention given that the trust instrument itself specified that the gift to Business College derived from Settlor's "long-standing interest in the area of education." Because Settlor had a general charitable intention to benefit education, Settlor's estate is not entitled to a return of any portion of the trust property. Instead, a court should exercise its cy pres power and direct distribution to another educational institution. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 399; RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 67; UNIF. ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Does the First Amendment permit Anti-Tax's conviction under the state sedition statute based on advocacy of (a) illegal nonpayment of a future tax increase, or (b) "mak[ing] Tax pay up . . . [and] show[ing] him what a taking really means"?
 - (2) Does the First Amendment permit Anti-Tax's conviction under the state's broad abusive-words statute?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under the Brandenburg test, a conviction for violation of the Sedition Statute based on inciting illegal conduct is consistent with the First Amendment if there is advocacy of illegal conduct that is imminent and likely to occur and if the statute is limited to criminalizing advocacy of such conduct. Anti-Tax's advocacy of nonpayment of the proposed tax increase does not meet the "imminent and likely" test because the proposed tax legislation has not been enacted. It is unclear whether Anti-Tax's advocacy of "mak[ing] Tax pay up . . . [and] show[ing] him what a taking really means" satisfies the Brandenburg test.

Anti-Tax may not be convicted under the Abusive Words Statute because the statute is overbroad and facially unconstitutional.

Point One: (45–55%)

Anti-Tax cannot be convicted for advocating nonpayment of the tax increase because the proposed illegal conduct could not be performed imminently. It is possible, but not certain, that Anti-Tax could be convicted for urging viewers to "make Tax pay up" and "show him what a taking really means."

In Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969), the Supreme Court of the United States held that the First Amendment precludes the conviction of individuals who incite or advocate breaking the law unless (1) there is advocacy of illegal conduct and not just an abstract expression of ideas, (2) the advocacy calls for imminent lawbreaking, and (3) the lawbreaking is likely to occur. Moreover, a person cannot be convicted on the basis of a statute that does not distinguish between abstract expression of ideas and such advocacy.

In this case, Anti-Tax made two statements. He advocated nonpayment of the proposed tax increase and he urged viewers to "make Tax pay up" and "show him what a taking really means."

Anti-Tax's statement urging nonpayment of a future tax increase does not satisfy the Brandenburg requirements. Although the statement satisfies the illegality requirement, the imminence requirement cannot be satisfied because the proposed tax legislation had not been enacted. It also seems doubtful that the state could show likelihood; it is unclear that the tax increase legislation will ever be passed, and there is no evidence that anyone will take seriously Anti-Tax's suggestion.

It is unclear whether Anti-Tax's statement urging viewers to "make Tax pay up" and "show him what a taking really means" meets the Brandenburg requirements for advocacy of imminent lawbreaking. The statement does not expressly advocate immediate, illegal conduct.

On the other hand, the statement does urge a "taking," which implies theft or property destruction. This implication, coupled with the fact that Anti-Tax provided Tax's home address, suggests that Anti-Tax was calling for immediate action. Although there is no evidence of the likelihood that a viewer would act on Anti-Tax's suggestion, the short time lapse between the broadcast and the arson provides circumstantial evidence that a viewer did act on it. It is thus possible, but not certain, that Anti-Tax's statement will be found to satisfy both Brandenburg requirements.

While the Sedition Statute is not limited on its face to punishing advocacy of imminent lawbreaking, it has been construed to apply only to such advocacy. Accordingly, overbreadth of the statute is not a bar to conviction under it.

Point Two: (45–55%)

The First Amendment "fighting words" doctrine does not permit Anti-Tax's conviction under the Abusive Words Statute.

In Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 572 (1942), the Supreme Court excluded from the protection of the First Amendment so-called "fighting words," i.e., words "which by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace." Fighting words are unprotected speech because they play little or no part in the exposition of ideas. Id.

Speech does not come within the fighting-words doctrine unless it is likely to cause a violent reaction from others. See Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971) (wearing of a jacket reading "F*ck the Draft" in a courthouse did not constitute fighting words because it was not likely to cause a violent reaction from others under the circumstances). Here, it is possible, but not certain, that the state can establish that Anti-Tax's statement urging viewers to "make Tax pay up," etc., was likely to cause a violent reaction.

However, even if the state establishes a likelihood of a violent reaction, Anti-Tax may not be convicted under the Abusive Words Statute because of its overbreadth. In Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518 (1972), the Court held that a man who told a police officer "I'll kill you" and "I'll choke you to death" could not be punished for uttering what were clearly fighting words because the statute under which conviction was sought was overbroad and unconstitutional on its face.

Here, the Abusive Words Statute, which punishes "directing any abusive word or term at another," is clearly overbroad. Commentary on matters of public concern is afforded the highest level of First Amendment protection, and this protection extends to “vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials.” New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964). A statute which punishes language that is merely rude or abusive will of necessity reach protected speech. Indeed, Anti-Tax’s statement “You’re a dishonest imbecile” is a textbook example of rude and abusive speech protected by the First Amendment.

Thus, even if Anti-Tax’s statement urging viewers to “make Tax pay up” represented fighting words that threatened personal violence against Tax, Anti-Tax’s conviction under this overbroad statute would violate the First Amendment.

- (1) May a court in a non-issuing state enforce a child support order against an obligor over whom it does not have personal jurisdiction?
 - (2) May a court in a non-issuing state modify a custody decree when one party continues to reside in the issuing state?
 - (3) When should a court modify a custody decree based on the relocation of a parent in a situation where the parents share joint physical custody?
 - (4) When should a court grant a support obligor downward modification of a child support order?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Interstate enforcement and modification of child support is governed by the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA), which has been adopted by all states. Here, UIFSA would permit State B, the non-issuing state, to enforce a registered support order against Husband through a “two-state” procedure.

The interstate modification of the child custody decree is governed by the federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (PKPA) and the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA). Neither the PKPA nor the UCCJEA give the State B court authority to modify the State A custody decree.

Custody modification is based on a substantial change in circumstances. Wife’s relocation to State B has significantly impaired Husband’s ability to exercise his custodial rights and represents a substantial change in circumstances. On these facts, it is unclear whether Husband will obtain modification of the custody decree in State A.

Under UIFSA, State A has exclusive jurisdiction to modify the State A child support order prospectively if it finds a substantial change in circumstances. If Husband obtains modification of the custody decree, he can probably succeed in eliminating his child support obligation. If he does not obtain modification, he will not be able to eliminate his child support obligation, although it is possible that he will be able to obtain prospective downward modification.

Point One: (10–20%)

State B should enforce the State A child support order because a registered child support order is enforceable in a non-issuing state even if the non-issuing state does not have personal jurisdiction over the respondent.

The interstate enforcement and modification of child support is governed by the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA), which has been adopted by all states. Under UIFSA § 603(b), a registered child support order issued in another state is “enforceable in the same manner and is subject to the same procedures as an order issued by a tribunal of [the adopting state].”

State B does not have personal jurisdiction over Husband because he has no State B contacts. See Kulko v. Superior Court, 436 U.S. 84 (1978). However, UIFSA provides a two-state procedure that avoids the need to obtain personal jurisdiction over Husband. Using this approach, Wife can obtain an enforcement order in State A (the issuing state) by filing an enforcement petition in a court of State B (the initiating state) that will be forwarded to the relevant State A court. See UIFSA § 203. Thus, a State B court may enforce the State A child support order.

Because Husband has not paid child support required under the State A order, support enforcement is appropriate, and State B should enforce the State A child support order.

Point Two: (20–30%)

A State B court may not modify the State A custody order because, under the PKPA, only courts of the issuing state may modify a custody order so long as the child or any contestant continues to reside in the issuing state and the issuing state does not decline to exercise jurisdiction.

The federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (PKPA) provides that a state may not modify a custody decree issued by another state if either the child or any party continues to reside in the issuing state and the issuing state’s courts do not decline to exercise jurisdiction. See 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(d). Under the Supremacy Clause, the PKPA takes precedence over any conflicting state law. See, e.g., Murphy v. Woerner, 748 P.2d 749 (Alaska 1988).

Virtually all states have now enacted the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), which contains custody-modification standards virtually identical to those of the PKPA. Under the UCCJEA, a state that properly issued a custody decree (here, State A) retains continuing, exclusive jurisdiction until all parties and the child have left the state, or until an issuing-state court has determined that there is no longer any significant connection between the child and the person remaining in the state and that substantial evidence is no longer available in that state. See UCCJEA § 202.

It is highly unlikely that a State A court would decline to exercise jurisdiction under UCCJEA § 202 because Husband remains in State A, Wife moved only two months ago, and Son and Husband had ongoing weekly contact until that time. Son thus maintains a significant connection with Husband and substantial evidence is still available in State A. Thus, if Wife wishes to modify the custody arrangement, she must do so in State A; a State B court may not modify the custody decree.

Point Three: (25–35%)

Custody modification is based on a substantial change in circumstances. One parent’s relocation that significantly impairs the other parent’s ability to exercise his or her custodial rights represents a substantial change in circumstances. It is unclear whether the court will grant Husband’s modification petition.

Because of the need to protect the best interests of a child, custody orders are subject to modification throughout the child’s minority. But because stability and finality are also important values in child custody litigation, most states permit modification only when there has been a substantial change in circumstances since the original custody decree. See HARRY D. KRAUSE ET AL., FAMILY LAW: CASES, COMMENTS AND QUESTIONS 740–41 (6th ed. 2007). One parent’s physical relocation that significantly impairs the other parent’s opportunity to exercise custody and visitation rights provided in the divorce decree is almost invariably considered a substantial change in circumstances. See id.

Parental relocation is a common triggering factor in custody-modification cases, and “[t]his area of law has been unusually unstable. . . . [However, t]he clear trend has been that of increasing leniency toward the relocating parent with whom the child has been primarily living.” AM. LAW INST., PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF FAMILY DISSOLUTION: ANALYSIS AND RECOMMENDATIONS § 2.17, Reporter’s Notes, cmt. d (2002). One group of states places the burden of proof on the relocating custodial parent and requires that parent to show that the move serves the child’s best interests. See Pollock v. Pollock, 889 P.2d 633, 635 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1995). In some of these states, the relocating parent must additionally show that the move is for a legitimate purpose and reasonable in light of that purpose. See, e.g., CONN. GEN. STAT. 46b–46d. Other states place the burden of proof on the objecting parent to show that the move does not serve the child’s best interests; some additionally require the objecting parent to show that the move would be harmful to the child. See, e.g., Pennington v. Marcum, 266 S.W.3d 759, 768–69 (Ky. 2008) (best interests test applicable when modification petition brought more than two years after initial decree or when objecting parent seeks merely to preserve initial visitation schedule; harm standard applicable when custody modification petition brought within two years of initial decree); TENN. CODE ANN. § 36-6-108 (2005) (objecting parent must show that move is not for a reasonable purpose, that “relocation would pose a threat of specific and serious harm to the child that outweighs the threat of harm to the child of a change of custody,” or that parent’s motive for moving is vindictive).

Some states, in joint-custody cases, apply standards that are more protective of the parent who is not relocating. See, e.g., O’Connor v. O’Connor, 793 A.2d 810 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 2002); OKLA. STAT. ANN. tit. 43 § 109(f) (best interests test applicable to modification of joint-custody order); TENN. CODE ANN. § 36-6-108 (2005) (best interests test applicable when parents share equal visitation). Even if State A does not have a special rule for joint-custody cases, relocation, of necessity, has a much larger impact when, as here, the parent who is not relocating has had more than 40 percent of total residential time with the child.

In this case, a number of facts support Husband's petition. Under the custody decree, Husband not only had joint custody, but Son resided with Husband more than 40 percent of each week. Wife's move 600 miles away precludes weekly visits by Husband, let alone substantial residential time with Son. Wife's move was not necessary; she could have stayed at her former employment. Ten-year-old Son undoubtedly had established school and social relationships that were disrupted by the move. Perhaps most important, Wife moved without notifying Husband or seeking court approval; Wife should have sought modification of the custody decree so as to accommodate her proposed move before physically removing Son from State A. Her failure to do so will certainly place her at a disadvantage in contesting Husband's modification petition.

On the other hand, some facts support Wife's relocation. Wife's relocation will provide Son with a higher family income and better access to his maternal relatives. There are no facts to suggest that Wife's move was motivated by vindictiveness.

It is thus possible, but not certain, that Husband will obtain modification of the custody decree.

[NOTE: An applicant's conclusion about case outcome is less important than his or her analysis of the relevant issues.]

Point Four: (15–25%)

Under UIFSA, State A has exclusive jurisdiction to modify the State A child support order. Although federal law forbids retroactive modification of the support order, a State A court may modify the order prospectively if it finds a substantial change in circumstances. It is possible that Husband could obtain elimination of his child support obligation if his petition for custody modification is granted.

Under UIFSA, an issuing state has continuing, exclusive jurisdiction to modify a support order if the child or any party continues to reside in that state and all parties do not consent to the jurisdiction of another forum. See UIFSA § 205. See also UIFSA § 603 (“[A] tribunal of this State shall recognize and enforce, but may not modify, a registered order if the issuing tribunal had jurisdiction.”). Because Husband continues to reside in State A, State A courts have exclusive jurisdiction to modify the State A child support order.

A State A court may not retroactively modify the child support order because federal law forbids retroactive modification in all circumstances. See 42 U.S.C. § 666(a)(9)(C).

If Husband succeeds in obtaining modification of the custody decree, a State A court might grant Husband prospective elimination of his child support obligation. In all states, modification of a support order is based on a finding that there has been a substantial change in circumstances that significantly reduces the child's need for support or the obligor's capacity to pay. See KRAUSE ET AL., supra, at 991. If Husband succeeds in obtaining modification of the custody decree, Wife would have residential time with Son for only eight weeks per year. This would certainly represent a substantial change in circumstances, as Wife would no longer be a custodial parent. Moreover, Wife's net monthly income has increased by $1,000 per month. On these facts, a court could prospectively eliminate Husband's child-support obligation.

If Husband does not obtain modification of the custody decree, the court should not eliminate Husband's child support obligation. There is a strong public policy favoring the establishment and maintenance of legal support obligations, and even poor obligors whose income falls below a value that the state deems essential for self-support are typically required to make token child support payments. See id. at 905–06. A court might reduce Husband's support obligation based on Wife's increased income if that income is available to support Son. However, Wife's move to State B may have increased her expenses and, assuming that Husband does not obtain sole custody of Son, Son's increased residential time with Wife would almost certainly increase her child-related expenses. It is thus unclear whether a State A court would find that Wife's increased income warrants a prospective reduction in Husband's support obligation.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS I.B.; II.A.; III.A. & B.; IV.A. & B.; V.A.2.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) What is the nature of Leaseco's interest in the printing press?
 - (2) Did Bank have a right to repossess and sell the printing press?
 - (3) As between Bank and Leaseco, which has a superior interest in the proceeds of the sale of the printing press?
 - (4) Does Leaseco have the right to recover the printing press from Purchaser?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The "lease" transaction between Leaseco and Printco created a security interest, not a lease. Therefore, Leaseco's interest in the press is governed by Article 9. Leaseco's security interest in the press is unperfected because it did not file a financing statement or take any other steps to perfect its interest.

Bank also has a security interest in the press by virtue of its security agreement with Printco. Bank's security interest is perfected.

Bank's perfected security interest has priority over Leaseco's unperfected interest. As the $50,000 recovered by the sale of the press did not fully cover Printco's debt to Bank, Bank is entitled to retain the $50,000 proceeds of the sale and Leaseco is not entitled to any recovery from Bank.

Leaseco cannot recover the press from Purchaser. Bank's proper foreclosure sale of the press to Purchaser transferred all of Printco's rights in the press to Purchaser and also discharged both Bank's and Leaseco's security interests.

Point One: (25–35%)

Although Leaseco's arrangement with Printco was denominated a "lease," Leaseco actually transferred ownership of the press to Printco and retained an unperfected security interest.

Whether a transaction in the form of a lease actually creates a "true lease" or a security interest depends on the "economic realities" of the transaction, not on the form of the transaction or the supposed intent of the parties. See UCC § 1-203, Official Comments.

In this case, the lease transaction was structured so that Printco was obligated to pay an amount that would fully cover the cost of the printing press and also ensure Leaseco a 10% return. Moreover, Printco was not entitled to terminate the lease at any point prior to full performance. If Printco failed to perform, Leaseco could recover the printing press. If Printco performed, Printco could keep the printing press for the trivial sum of $10. In economic reality, this was not a lease of the printing press at all. It was the economic equivalent of an installment sale of the press, with Leaseco's retained title constituting only a security interest (the right to recover the press if payments were not made, thereby securing Printco's obligation to pay the purchase price).

UCC § 1-203(b) identifies certain situations in which a transaction creates a security interest, not a lease. In particular, § 1-203(b)(4) explicitly states that "a transaction in the form of a lease creates a security interest if" lease payments must be made for the full term of the lease and are not subject to termination, and the lessee has an option to "become the owner of the goods . . . for nominal additional consideration" at the conclusion of the lease agreement. That is precisely the structure of the Printco-Leaseco contract, and therefore this transaction should be treated as a sale of the press with Leaseco retaining a security interest.

The fact that the lease agreement provided for title to remain in Leaseco's name is immaterial. See UCC § 9-202. Leaseco's interest in the press is a security interest and is governed by Article 9. Because Leaseco did not file a financing statement, its security interest is unperfected.

[NOTE: Examinees need not know the details of the UCC rules. However, they should realize that the form of the transaction is not controlling, and that a so-called "lease" will be treated as a security interest if the "economic realities" so dictate. They should also be able to identify some of the facts that are relevant to a resolution of this issue.]

Point Two: (20–30%)

Bank had a perfected security interest in the press and was entitled to repossess and sell the printing press.

In a signed agreement, Printco gave Bank a security interest in "all Printco's equipment, whether now owned or hereafter acquired." Bank advanced value to Printco by making a loan to Printco. Finally, Printco obtained rights in the printing press so that Bank's security interest attached to the press. A security interest attaches to collateral and is enforceable only if the debtor has rights in the collateral, but "limited rights in collateral, short of full ownership, are sufficient for a security interest to attach." UCC § 9-203(b), Official Comment 6. Here Printco had at least the right to possession of the press for the lease term.

In addition, because Bank filed its financing statement covering Printco's equipment, Bank's security interest was perfected. UCC § 9-310(a).

Following a debtor's default, a secured party may repossess and sell any collateral that secures its debt. See UCC §§ 9-609 (right to repossess), 9-610 (right to dispose of collateral by sale). As a secured party, Bank had the right to repossess and sell the printing press.

[NOTE: Moreover, the facts suggest that Bank fully complied with applicable laws: the repossession was peaceful, and the sale was made at a public auction, in a commercially reasonable manner, and after notice to the debtor.]

Point Three: (20–30%)

Because Bank's security interest was superior to Leaseco's, Bank has a superior claim to the proceeds of the sale of the printing press, and it need not share those proceeds with Leaseco unless the proceeds exceed the amount due to Bank.

Bank had a perfected security interest. Leaseco's interest was unperfected. A perfected security interest has priority over an unperfected security interest. UCC § 9-322(a)(2).

[NOTE: If Leaseco had filed a financing statement within 20 days of delivery of the printing press to Printco, it would have had a perfected purchase-money security interest with priority over Bank's general security interest. UCC § 9-324(a). The facts state that Leaseco did not make such a filing.]

When a secured party with priority disposes of collateral, the proceeds of that disposition are applied in the following order: (1) the expenses of the disposition, (2) satisfaction of the obligation owed to the disposing secured party, and (3) satisfaction of any obligation secured by a subordinate interest. See UCC § 9-615(a).

Because Bank had priority over Leaseco, Bank was entitled to use the proceeds from the sale of the collateral to cover its expenses and any amounts owed to it by Printco before making any payment to Leaseco. The amount recovered from the sale of all of Printco's collateral, including the printing press, was only $75,000. The amount owed to Bank by Printco, on the other hand, was $150,000 (plus the expenses of the disposition). Thus, the proceeds of the collateral did not fully satisfy Printco's obligations to Bank, and there was no surplus that Leaseco could claim. Leaseco therefore has no valid claim to any of the proceeds of the sale of the printing press.

Point Four: (15–25%)

Leaseco cannot recover the printing press from Purchaser because Bank's sale of the press to Purchaser discharged Leaseco's security interest and therefore eliminated its claim to the press.

A secured party's disposition of collateral after a debtor's default transfers the debtor's rights in the collateral to any transferee for value, and also discharges the secured party's interest in the collateral and "any subordinate security interest." UCC § 9-617(a).

Bank sold the printing press to Purchaser for $50,000. As a good-faith buyer of collateral at a foreclosure sale, Purchaser is a "transferee for value," and has the rights set out in UCC § 9-617. Thus, Purchaser takes free of Leaseco's interest, because Leaseco's interest is nothing more than a "security interest" that is subordinate to Bank's interest. See UCC § 9-617(b).

CONTRACTS II.A. & C.; VII.D.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Was Resident's promise to pay Sam $1,000 supported by consideration?
 - (2) In the absence of bargained-for consideration, can Sam enforce Resident's promise under the material benefit (moral consideration) rule?
 - (3) In the absence of bargained-for consideration, can Sam enforce Resident's promise under the theory of promissory estoppel?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Sam cannot recover the $1,000 under the theory that Resident's promise was supported by consideration as there is no evidence of a bargained-for exchange. Sam may be able to recover if the material benefit (or moral consideration) rule applies because Resident made the promise to pay $1,000 in recognition of a benefit received. Sam may also be able to recover under the theory of promissory estoppel if he acted in reasonable reliance on Resident's promise. However, Sam may recover less than the full $1,000 under both the material benefit rule and the theory of promissory estoppel.

Point One: (25–35%)

Sam cannot recover under the theory that Resident's promise was supported by consideration because that promise was not part of a bargained-for exchange.

To be legally enforceable, a promise generally must be supported by consideration, which is shown through bargained-for exchange. This means that the promisor must have sought and received something of legal value in exchange for the promise. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 71. Here, there was no bargained-for exchange.

Sam might argue that his action in rescuing the dog and/or Sam's promise to apply for paramedic training constitutes consideration for Resident's promise to pay $1,000. However, neither of those arguments will prevail. Resident's promise to pay the $1,000 was not made in exchange for Sam's rescue of the dog, but instead was made in recognition of that prior action. With regard to Sam's promise to apply for paramedic training, Resident did not seek that promise in exchange for the promise to pay the $1,000. Resident's promise was not part of an exchange and therefore the consideration necessary to make Resident's promise legally enforceable is absent.

Point Two: (15–25%)

Sam may be able to recover if the material benefit (moral consideration) rule applies, but possibly may not receive the full $1,000 Resident promised him.

Some states recognize an exception to the past consideration limitation in cases in which the promise is made after receipt of a significant benefit. This exception is set out in the Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 86 (the material benefit rule) and encapsulates cases in which moral consideration was found to provide a basis for recovery. The material benefit rule states that a promise not supported by consideration may be enforceable if it is “made in recognition of a benefit previously received by the promisor from the promisee” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 86(1); see Webb v. McGowin, 168 So. 196 (Ala. 1935). Here, Resident promised to give Sam $1,000 in recognition of Sam’s act of saving Resident’s dog. Thus, it could be argued that the material benefit rule applies because Resident received a benefit from Sam and made the promise to give Sam $1,000 in recognition of that benefit.

However, the material benefit rule does not apply (and the promise is not enforceable) if the promisee conferred the benefit as a gift, or to the extent that the value of the promise is disproportionate to the benefit conferred. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 86(2). Here, it is unclear whether Sam intended to confer a gift upon Resident. He may have been acting out of pure selflessness when he rescued the dog, or he may have believed that his heroic action would result in a financial reward.

Even if it is determined that Sam did not intend to confer a gift (and that Resident’s promise is therefore enforceable), a court might limit recovery to something less than the full $1,000 if it finds that $1,000 is disproportionate to the value of the rescue of the dog.

Point Three: (35–45%)

Sam may be able to recover some or all of the $1,000 if the doctrine of promissory estoppel applies. Promissory estoppel requires that the promisee show that a promise existed, that a detrimental change in position was made in reasonable reliance on the promise, and that enforcement of the promise is the only way to avoid injustice.

The doctrine of promissory estoppel allows the enforcement of gratuitous promises to avoid harm to individuals who have relied on those promises. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 90. In order to establish a promissory estoppel claim, all of the following must be shown: (1) the promisor, when making the promise, should have reasonably expected that the promisee would change his position in reliance on the promise; (2) the promisee did in fact change position in reliance on the promise; (3) the change in position was to the promisee’s detriment and injustice can be avoided only by enforcing the promise. Id.

Here, the facts state that Resident promised to pay $1,000. Sam did change his position in reliance on that promise by incurring a $1,000 debt. Resident might argue that Sam’s applying to the cosmetology program was not reasonable reliance because the promise was specific to a different program—Resident said, “If you are going to start paramedic training, I want to help you.” However, Resident also said, “I want to compensate you for your heroism,” and Sam could reasonably interpret that remark as indicating that Resident's promise to give him $1,000 was a promise to compensate him for rescuing Resident's dog and was not conditioned on his career choice. Thus, it is possible that Sam could recover that portion of the $1,000 promised by Resident that is determined to be the amount required to avoid injustice.

DISCUSSION

Summary

To remove a case from state to federal court, the defendant must file a notice of removal with the federal district court, give written notice of that filing to all adverse parties, and file a copy of the notice of removal with the state court.

The joinder of Ann and Bill as plaintiffs would be proper under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 20 because their claims for relief arose out of "the same transaction [or] occurrence" and involve a "common question" of law or fact.

The case is within the subject matter jurisdiction of a federal court in State X. Both Ann and Bill, citizens of State X, are diverse from GlassCo, which is a citizen of State Y (the state of its incorporation and principal place of business). Ann's claim for $1,000,000 easily satisfies the required jurisdictional amount of $75,000. Although Bill's claim does not satisfy the required jurisdictional amount, the federal court will have "supplemental jurisdiction" over Bill's claim because it is sufficiently related to Ann's claim to be part of the same "case or controversy."

Point One: (10–20%)

The defendant begins the process of removal by filing a notice of removal in the federal court "for the district and division within which [the state court action] is pending." Removal is then accomplished by giving notice of the filing to all adverse parties and filing a copy of the notice of removal with the state court.

Procedurally, the first step for removing an action from state to federal court is for the defendant to file a notice of removal in the federal district court for the district and division within which the state action is pending. 28 U.S.C. § 1446(a). The notice must be filed within 30 days of the defendant's "receipt . . . , through service or otherwise, of a copy of the initial pleading . . . , or within 30 days after the service of summons . . . if such initial pleading has then been filed and is not required to be served . . . , whichever period is shorter.” Id. § 1446(b). The notice of removal must be signed and must include a statement of the basis for federal jurisdiction. Id. § 1446(a). A copy of the materials from the state court proceeding must also be filed. Id.

After filing the notice of removal, the defendant must serve notice of the filing on all adverse parties and file a copy of the notice of removal with the state court. Id. § 1446(d). Removal is “automatic.” Once the state court has a copy of the notice of removal, the case is removed and the state court can take no further action in the case. Id.

[NOTE: If the defendant removes the action to federal court, and the plaintiff wishes to contest the removal, the plaintiff must file a motion to remand.]

Point Two: (30–40%)

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 20(a) permits the claims of Ann and Bill to be joined in a single action because those claims arose out of the “same transaction [or] occurrence” and involve “common questions” of law and fact.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 20(a)(1) provides that two or more plaintiffs may join their claims in a single lawsuit if the plaintiffs “assert any right to relief jointly, severally, or in the alternative with respect to or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence or series of transactions or occurrences; and . . . any question of law or fact common to all plaintiffs [being joined] will arise in the action.” (emphasis added)

Both requirements for joinder are met in this case. First, Ann and Bill are each asserting claims that arose out of a single occurrence—the accident involving the falling glass. Second, those claims will certainly raise some common questions of fact (e.g., whether the glass accident was caused by the negligence of GlassCo employees) and may also raise common questions of law (e.g., the legal standard for measuring damages). This is precisely the kind of case in which Rule 20 allows joinder of plaintiffs in the interest of promoting efficiency and consistency of results.

The fact that Ann and Bill are asserting separate claims and separate rights to relief does not matter. Rule 20 allows plaintiffs to join when they assert their rights to relief “severally.”
