The federal court will have subject matter jurisdiction over the removed case because Ann’s claim is within the diversity jurisdiction of the court and Bill’s claim, although it does not satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement for diversity jurisdiction, is within the federal court’s supplemental jurisdiction.

Removal of a case from state to federal court is proper only when the “civil action” that is removed is within the “original jurisdiction” of the federal court. 28 U.S.C. §1441(a).

In this case, Ann’s tort claim against GlassCo would be within the original diversity jurisdiction of the federal district court of State X. Ann and GlassCo are citizens of different states, and Ann's claim for $1,000,000 exceeds the $75,000 amount-in-controversy requirement of the diversity statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1332.

Bill's tort claim, on the other hand, is not within the diversity jurisdiction of the court. Although Bill and GlassCo are diverse, Bill is seeking damages of only $5,000, which is substantially less than the $75,000 minimum amount-in-controversy for federal diversity actions.

Nonetheless, the federal court will have jurisdiction over Bill's claim pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1367, the "supplemental jurisdiction" statute. When a federal court has original jurisdiction over a claim in an action, § 1367(a) provides that the court "shall have supplemental jurisdiction over all other claims that are so related [to the main claim] that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution."

On the facts of this problem, Bill's claim is sufficiently related to Ann's claim to be "part of the same case or controversy." Both claims arose out of a "common nucleus of operative fact" (the accident involving the glass) and are so similar in facts and law that it is sensible to expect them to be tried in a single judicial proceeding. See, e.g., United Mine Workers of America v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 725 (1966). Thus, the court has supplemental jurisdiction over Bill's claim. See Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Allapattah Services, Inc., 545 U.S. 546 (2005).

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE II.C.; III.A.1.; IV.A.; V.A. & E.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Does John have standing to challenge the search of Crystal's parents' home and the seizure and search of the leather bag?
 - (2) Did the prosecution produce sufficient evidence to prove all of the elements of attempted armed robbery?
 - (3) Is "withdrawal," "abandonment," or "change of mind" a defense to a charge of an attempted crime?

DISCUSSION

Summary

John does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in Crystal's parents' home and therefore does not have standing to challenge the legality of the search of that home. Nor can he claim a reasonable expectation of privacy in the leather bag and its contents since he turned it over to Crystal.

The trial court correctly denied the motion for judgment of acquittal. The prosecution presented sufficient facts to prove all the elements of attempted armed robbery. Specifically, the state showed that John had the intent to commit an armed robbery and that he had performed sufficient acts toward the commission of the robbery to have gone beyond mere preparation.

The trial court was probably correct to deny the motion for the jury instruction on abandonment. In many jurisdictions, abandonment is not a defense in any case in which an individual has committed sufficient acts to constitute an attempt, as John has in this case. Even in jurisdictions where abandonment is a defense, it must be a voluntary and complete renunciation by the defendant of the criminal scheme. John's decision not to complete the robbery was not due to his voluntary abandonment of his criminal purpose. It was the result of his accomplice's flight from the scene.

Point One: (30–40%)

John does not have standing to challenge the search of Crystal's parents' home because he lacks a reasonable expectation of privacy in that home. Similarly, he cannot challenge the seizure of his bag and the search of its contents because he had surrendered control of the bag to Crystal and therefore had no reasonable expectation of privacy in its contents.

Although the police did not have a warrant, Crystal's mother consented to the search of her home when she let them in after they stated that they could get a warrant. Even if her consent to the search of her home was considered coerced or involuntary and therefore invalid, John could not raise the issue. In Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128 (1978), the Supreme Court of the United States held that only those who are actual victims of the alleged Fourth Amendment violation have “standing” to challenge it. As the Court put it, “[a] person who is aggrieved by an illegal search and seizure only through the introduction of damaging evidence secured by a search of a third person’s premises or property has not had any of his Fourth Amendment rights infringed.” Id. at 134. Here, John can claim no reasonable expectation of privacy in his girlfriend’s family’s home.

Similarly, a person challenging a seizure and search of an object such as a bag must have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the object seized and searched. John cannot claim that he had a reasonable expectation of privacy in his bag found in Crystal’s closet. While he might have a property interest in the bag, he surrendered his reasonable expectation of privacy in the bag when he turned the bag over to Crystal and asked her to “get rid of it.” See Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1980). Once John gave the bag to Crystal, he had no way to control who had access to his bag and how Crystal was to dispose of it.

Accordingly, the trial judge correctly denied John’s motion to suppress the bag and its contents.

Point Two: (30–40%)

The prosecution produced sufficient evidence to prove that John intended to commit an armed robbery and that he committed acts going “beyond mere preparation” and constituting an attempt to commit the robbery.

A motion for judgment of acquittal should be granted only if the prosecution has failed to present sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to find that the defendant committed each element of the charged offense beyond a reasonable doubt. Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 319 (1979); State v. Thompson, 88 S.W.3d 611, 614–15 (Tenn. Crim. App. 2000). In this case, there is more than enough evidence to support a conviction for attempted armed robbery.

In order to prove that John attempted an armed robbery, the prosecution must prove two elements. First, the prosecution must prove that John intended to commit an armed robbery. Second, the prosecution must prove that John’s actions went sufficiently beyond “mere preparation” to constitute an actual “attempt” to commit the crime. See MODEL PENAL CODE § 5.01.

As to John’s intent, the e-mails and the testimony of the clerk and Crystal provide ample evidence that John planned to either use a weapon or threaten the imminent use of a weapon against the store clerk to compel the store clerk to turn over money. This evidence shows clearly that John intended to commit the essential elements of armed robbery—he intended to use force or the threat of force to steal the property of another. Accordingly, the prosecution has more than met its burden of proving that John intended to commit armed robbery.

The evidence is also sufficient to show that John’s actions to carry out his plan went beyond “mere preparation” and constituted an actual “attempt” to commit the crime. States use various tests for determining when a defendant’s conduct has gone far enough to constitute an attempt to commit a crime. Some state courts say that the actor's conduct must be "proximate" to the crime; others say that it must be "dangerously proximate" to the crime. The Model Penal Code requires only that a defendant's conduct be a "substantial step" toward commission of the crime and corroborative of his criminal intent. JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.09 (4th ed. 2006). Some states say that the defendant's behavior must "unequivocally" manifest the criminal intent. See id. § 27.06.

In this case, the prosecution's evidence demonstrates that John's conduct went beyond mere preparation and constituted an attempt. John's behavior—loading a gun, taking it into a store, and approaching the store clerk—ought to satisfy any test of proximity: John was dangerously close to completing his crime. Moreover, the conduct on its face bespeaks an intention to rob the store clerk by force or threat of force, and the clerk said that he thought John intended to rob him. Indeed, from all the facts, it appears that John would have robbed the clerk but for the fact that John's accomplice started to cry and left the store. Most courts would find that these actions were "near enough to the accomplishment of the substantive offense to be punishable." Commonwealth v. Peaslee, 59 N.E. 55, 56 (Mass. 1901); see also People v. Terrell, 443 N.E.2d 742 (Ill. Ct. App. 1982); State v. Stewart, 420 N.W.2d 44 (Wis. 1988).

Point Three: (20–30%)

Although John left the Minit Mart without completing the robbery, the circumstances of his departure do not support a defense of withdrawal or abandonment.

In most jurisdictions, voluntary withdrawal or abandonment is not a defense to the crime of attempt once the actor's conduct has gone beyond mere preparation. See Dixon v. State, 559 So. 2d 354, 355–56 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1990); DRESSLER, supra, § 27.08. In those jurisdictions, if John's conduct had gone far enough toward completion of a crime to constitute an attempt, he would be guilty of attempt even if he subsequently decided to renounce his criminal plans completely and voluntarily. See, e.g., Stewart, 420 N.W.2d at 49–51. In a jurisdiction taking this view of attempt, the court was correct to refuse a jury instruction on the defense of abandonment because no such defense exists.

A minority of jurisdictions take the view that the abandonment of an attempt before the crime is completed is an affirmative defense. However, the abandonment must be utterly voluntary. An abandonment that is the result of any extrinsic factor is not considered voluntary. Wilkinson v. State, 670 N.E.2d 47, 49 (Ind. Ct. App. 1996) (passing out from intoxication not voluntary abandonment of an attempted crime).

Here, John abandoned the robbery only after his 14-year-old accomplice got scared and ran out of the store. Whether his decision to leave the store without completing the robbery was motivated by a concern for Crystal, a belief that he needed her participation, or some other factor, it was taken in response to Crystal's behavior and was not an entirely voluntary decision by John. It does not satisfy the requirements for the abandonment defense, and the trial judge was correct to deny an instruction on that defense.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP V.A. & B.; VI.

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) What type of entity is the “Metropolitan Limited Partnership”?
 - (2) Can Marketing recover from Andy, Ben, and Carol in their individual capacities for the amounts it is owed by MLP and what steps must it follow if it tries to do so?
 - (3) Can Zack’s estate recover from Andy, Ben, and Carol in their individual capacities for the wrongful death claim?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Despite being labeled a limited partnership, the Metropolitan Limited Partnership (MLP) is not a limited partnership because it lacks a general partner. Even though a Certificate of Limited Partnership was ultimately filed, that filing does not create a limited partnership when no general partner has signed the partnership agreement. By their actions in buying the land and arranging for the marketing of the venture’s property, Andy, Ben, and Carol acted as co-owners of a business for profit and thereby formed a general partnership.

As partners in a general partnership, Andy, Ben, and Carol are each personally liable for partnership debts. Marketing can recover from Andy, Ben, and Carol in their individual capacities for the amounts it is owed by MLP if Marketing first obtains a judgment against each of Andy, Ben, and Carol and against MLP and levies execution on MLP’s assets.

Zack’s estate can recover for the wrongful death claim from Andy, Ben, and Carol in their individual capacities if it follows the same procedures. The fact that the Certificate of Limited Partnership was filed before Zack’s claim arose does not change this result because that filing did not create a limited partnership.

Point One: (35–45%)

Metropolitan Limited Partnership is not a limited partnership, but is a general partnership.

Despite being labeled a limited partnership, MLP is not a limited partnership. Although Andy, Ben, and Carol may have intended to form a limited partnership, they did not succeed in doing so. To create a valid limited partnership, statutory requirements must be met. A limited partnership must include a general partner who has signed the initial Certificate of Limited Partnership filed with the Secretary of State. UNIF. LTD. P’SHP ACT §§ 201(a)(3), 204, 801(4) (1976 with 1985 amendments). Here, Warren was designated as the general partner, but never signed the agreement. Thus, MLP never had a general partner and cannot qualify as a limited partnership.

Further, to create a limited partnership, a certificate of limited partnership must be filed with the state. Id. § 201. Here, such a certificate was not initially filed. Even though Andy, Ben, and Carol did ultimately file the Certificate of Limited Partnership, their failure to obtain the signature of a general partner prevents the formation of a limited partnership.

Instead, the venture is a general partnership. Andy, Ben, and Carol were acting as co-owners of a business for profit. As such, they formed a partnership whether or not they subjectively intended to. See UNIF. P'SHIP ACT (1997) § 202(a) (“... the association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit forms a partnership, whether or not the persons intend to form a partnership.”). As is the case here, individuals can inadvertently form a general partnership notwithstanding their expressed intention to do something else, in this case to form a limited partnership. See id. § 202 cmt. 1 (“Indeed, they may inadvertently create a partnership despite their expressed subjective intention not to do so.”).

Had Andy, Ben, and Carol done nothing more than purchase property, they might have avoided a partnership designation under the Uniform Partnership Act which states that neither “common property” nor “part ownership” alone is enough to establish a partnership. See id. § 202(c). However, in addition to owning the property, Andy, Ben, and Carol hired a marketing company to develop a campaign to resell the land as “Metropolitan Estates.” This exceeds co-ownership and thus Andy, Ben, and Carol are general partners and MLP is a general partnership.

Point Two: (35–45%)

Because MLP is a general partnership and Andy, Ben, and Carol are general partners in that partnership, as such, each is personally liable for partnership debts, including the amounts owed to Marketing. However, to collect from Andy, Ben, and Carol personally, Marketing must first obtain a judgment against Andy, Ben, and Carol individually and against MLP and levy execution against MLP's assets.

As partners in the general partnership that owns the property, Andy, Ben, and Carol “are liable jointly and severally for all obligations of the partnership unless otherwise agreed by the claimant or provided by law.” See UNIF. P'SHIP ACT (1997) § 306(a). There being no agreement or statutory provision to the contrary, Andy, Ben, and Carol are jointly and severally liable for Marketing's claim.

However, to collect from Andy, Ben, and Carol personally, Marketing must first obtain a judgment against Andy, Ben, and Carol individually and against MLP and levy execution against MLP's assets. Ordinarily, a claimant may not take action against a partner's separate assets unless the partnership assets fail to satisfy the claimant's judgment. See id. § 307(d). Moreover, under the Uniform Partnership Act, a judgment against a partnership is not, by itself, a judgment against a partner. Consequently, a judgment against a partnership may not be satisfied out of the partner's separate assets unless there is also a judgment against the partner. See id. § 307(c). A judgment against a partner personally may be sought in the same action as a judgment against the partnership.

Here, if these procedures are followed and MLP's assets fail to satisfy Marketing's claim, Marketing may recover from Andy, Ben, and Carol personally.

Point Three: (10–20%)

Andy, Ben, and Carol are each personally liable for the wrongful death claim even though that claim arose after they filed the Certificate of Limited Partnership, because the limited partnership did not have a general partner.

As general partners, Andy, Ben, and Carol are jointly and severally liable for the wrongful death claim. (See Point Two.) Although the wrongful death claim arose after the Certificate of Limited Partnership was filed in the name of Metropolitan, that filing does not protect Andy, Ben, and Carol because it failed to create a limited partnership due to the lack of a general partner. (See Point One.) Therefore, the act of filing is irrelevant, and Andy, Ben, and Carol are jointly and severally liable for the wrongful death claim. To recover from them, Zack's estate must follow appropriate procedures. (See Point Two.)

ANALYSIS

- Legal Problems:
- (1) Is Testator's will invalid because it was the product of undue influence?
 - (2) Is Testator's will invalid because it was induced by fraud?
 - (3) If Testator's will is valid, did Friend effectively exercise her general power of appointment over trust assets with the general residuary clause in her will?
 - (4) If Testator's will is invalid, who are Testator's heirs?

DISCUSSION

Summary

If a will was procured through undue influence or induced by fraud, it is invalid. In this case, the facts, if proven at trial, would not establish undue influence but would establish that Testator's will was induced by fraud in the execution. If the will is valid, under the majority view, Testator's estate will probably pass to Charity following Friend's death because Friend did not effectively exercise her power of appointment by the general residuary clause in her will. If Testator's will is invalid, his estate passes to Niece if the intestacy statute utilizes the parentelic method of determining heirship and to both Niece and Uncle if the statute utilizes the civil law consanguinity method. If only the general power of Friend is set aside as a product of either undue influence or fraud but the court rules that the remaining provisions of Testator's will are valid, then Charity takes.

Point One: (20–30%)

The facts do not establish that Testator's will is invalid as the product of undue influence.

A will is invalid if it was executed as the result of undue influence. Undue influence occurs when the "wrongdoer exerted such influence over the [testator] that it overcame the [testator's] free will and caused the [testator] to make a donative transfer that the [testator] would not otherwise have made." RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY (WILLS AND OTHER DONATIVE TRANSFERS) § 8.3(b).

The burden of establishing undue influence is on the will contestant, who must show that (1) the testator was susceptible to undue influence, (2) the alleged influencer had the opportunity to exert undue influence upon the testator, (3) the alleged influencer had a disposition to exert undue influence, and (4) the will appears to be the product of undue influence. See id. at cmt. e. See also Estate of Kamesar, 259 N.W.2d 733, 737–38 (Wis. 1977).

In this case, there are facts showing that Friend had both the opportunity and the disposition to exert undue influence. Friend and Testator were intimates over a two-year period. Friend showered Testator with affection. Friend told Brother that she would “be generous” to him if Testator left her everything, suggesting her desire to influence Testator’s will.

It is less clear that Testator was susceptible to undue influence. Susceptibility is typically based on “age, personality, physical and mental health, and ability to handle business affairs.” Kamesar, 259 N.W.2d at 738. Testator was 70 years old and a successful business executive. There is no evidence that he was in poor physical or mental health. On the other hand, Testator does seem to have been influenced by Friend’s demonstrations of affection, interest, and commitment.

The more important weakness in a will contest based on undue influence is the fact that neither Friend nor Brother attempted to persuade Testator to give Friend a general power of appointment or bequeath other assets to her, nor did they attempt to dissuade Testator from making bequests to others or interfere with his relationships. Instead, Brother used deception to achieve Friend’s goal of obtaining control of Testator’s assets. While this deception is important to a claim of fraud (see Point Two), it does not fit the usual pattern of undue influence claims.

Point Two: (20–30%)

Because the facts establish that Testator’s will was induced by fraud in the execution, it is invalid in whole or in part.

A will or provision in a will procured by fraud is invalid. Fraud occurs when a testator is deceived by a misrepresentation and is thereby led to execute a will that the testator would not otherwise have made. Most courts additionally require a finding that the misrepresentation was made with the intent to deceive the testator and for the purpose of influencing the testamentary disposition. See JESSE DUKEMINIER & STANLEY M. JOHANSON, WILLS, TRUSTS, AND ESTATES 213 (6th ed. 2000). Fraud in the inducement occurs when a person misrepresents facts—for example, whether a proposed beneficiary is alive. Fraud in the execution occurs when a person misrepresents the character or contents of the instrument signed by the testator. Id. at 214–15.

The facts of this case support a finding of fraud in the execution. Testator told Brother that he wanted to leave the trust remainder to Charity. Brother told Testator that the will he had drafted was in accordance with Testator’s instructions. It was not, because the will gave Friend a general power of appointment over trust assets; she could appoint those assets to herself and deprive Charity of the remainder. Because Friend told Brother that she wanted the will to leave her “everything,” the evidence supports a finding that Brother intended to deceive Testator. If the will contestant succeeds in establishing these facts at trial, the court should invalidate the will.

If the court finds that the will was tainted by fraud or undue influence, it may invalidate the entire will or only those portions “infected” by the fraud or undue influence. See Williams v.

Crickman, 405 N.E.2d 799 (Ill. 1980). As there are no facts to suggest that Friend or Brother played a role in the selection of Charity as taker in default, a court might invalidate the general power alone, leaving Charity as the residuary taker.

Point Three: (20–30%)

If Testator's entire will is valid, whether Charity or Sister takes Testator's estate depends on whether Friend effectively exercised her general power of appointment. Under the majority view, a residuary clause in a will that makes no reference to the power is an ineffective exercise.

If fraud cannot be proven and Testator's entire will is valid, Friend's lifetime interest in the trust and general power of appointment would be valid also. Whether Charity or Sister takes the trust principal depends on whether Friend, who survived Testator, effectively exercised her general power.

Whether a power is effectively exercised depends on the donee's intent and any formalities mandated by the donor. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF PROPERTY (DONATIVE TRANSFERS) § 17.1. In this case, the donor required no formalities. However, since the donee's (i.e., Friend's) will does not specifically refer to the power, it is unclear whether she intended to exercise her general power. Under the majority approach, also followed by the Restatement of Property, a residuary article in a donee's will that makes no reference to a power of appointment is not an effective exercise of a general power. See id. § 17.3. Under this approach, Charity, the taker in default of appointment, would take Testator's estate because Friend did not effectively exercise the power of appointment. Under the minority view, a general residuary clause does effectively exercise a power of appointment. If this approach is followed, Sister would take Testator's estate.

[NOTE: Friend survived Testator by a week; thus, under the Uniform Probate Code and the Simultaneous Death Act, she survived Testator because she survived him by 120 hours. If the state has the old version of the Uniform Simultaneous Death Act, Friend might be deemed to have predeceased Testator if they are viewed as having died in a common accident or disaster. In such a case, Charity takes as well.]

Point Four: (15–25%)

If Testator's entire will is invalid, Testator's entire estate would pass to Niece under the parentelic method of determining heirship, but it would pass equally to Niece and Uncle under intestacy schemes governed by the civil law consanguinity method.

If the court finds that Testator's entire will is the product of fraud, his estate will be distributed based on state rules of intestate succession. Had the accident taken place after Testator and Friend were married, Friend would have taken Testator's entire estate. But given that the wedding had not yet taken place, no state grants Friend a share of Testator's assets.

Under the so-called parentelic method of determining heirship employed in the Uniform Probate Code and most state intestacy rules, the issue of an intestate's parents take to the exclusion of any issue of the intestate's grandparents. Niece is a grandchild of Testator's parents; Uncle is a child of Testator's grandparents. Thus, Niece takes to the exclusion of Uncle. See UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-103. Under the civil law consanguinity method employed in a minority of jurisdictions, Niece and Uncle would share equally because both of them are in the third degree of consanguinity to Testator.

[NOTE: An applicant might argue that only a portion of the will, the power of appointment, is invalid due to fraud. In such a case, the power would be excised from the will and upon Friend's death the trust assets would pass to Charity.]

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2010 MEE. Each test includes nine questions; most jurisdictions that use the MEE select six questions for their applicants to answer. In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law. The instructions for the test appear on page iii. For more information, see the MEE Information Booklet, available on the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions for the sole purpose of assisting graders in grading the examination. For the February 2010 MEE, suggested percentage weights for question subparts are now expressed in specific values, not in a 10-point range. The model analyses are not an official grading guide. Some states grade the MEE on the basis of state law, and jurisdictions are free to modify the analyses, including the suggested weights given to particular points, as they wish. Grading of the MEE is the exclusive responsibility of the jurisdiction using the MEE as part of its admissions process.

The topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by roman numerals which refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that topic. For example, the Federal Civil Procedure question on the February 2010 MEE tested the following areas from the Federal Civil Procedure outline: I.A.1., jurisdiction and venue—subject matter jurisdiction—federal courts, and IV.C., pre-trial procedures—joinder of parties and claims (including class actions). Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet.

Description of the MEE

The MEE is a series of essay questions, any of which a jurisdiction may select to include as a part of its bar examination. Applicants are expected to spend approximately 30 minutes answering each MEE question administered. The areas of law that may be covered by the questions on any MEE are Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts, Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Uniform Commercial Code (Negotiable Instruments (Commercial Paper); Secured Transactions). Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the applicant's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the applicant to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

Each question is designed to be answered in 30 minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions to follow.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Your jurisdiction may instruct you to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

Six months ago, Kitchenware, a manufacturer of copper cookware, borrowed $200,000 from Bank and signed a security agreement granting Bank a security interest in “all inventory that Kitchenware now owns or that it manufactures or acquires in the future.” Bank filed a properly completed financing statement reflecting this security interest in the appropriate state office.

Copperco is a company that produces high-quality copper sheet that is suitable for fabrication into cookware. Two months ago, Kitchenware entered into a contract with Copperco to buy two tons of copper sheet to be used by Kitchenware to produce cookware. The contract, which was signed by both parties, required Copperco to deliver the copper sheet to Kitchenware’s factory in two installments, one ton in the first installment and the second ton 30 days later. Kitchenware was to pay for each of the installments separately, with one-half of the contract price due 25 days after the first delivery and the balance due 25 days after the second delivery. Copperco’s obligation to ship the second installment was expressly made conditional on full payment for the first installment. The parties further agreed that Kitchenware would have no rights in an installment of the copper sheet until it received delivery of that installment and that Copperco would retain title to all the copper sheet until Kitchenware paid the full contract price.

Copperco promptly delivered the first ton of copper sheet to Kitchenware’s factory. Twenty-three days after the delivery, Copperco loaded its truck with a second ton of copper sheet for delivery to Kitchenware’s factory and planned to send the truck to Kitchenware in time to meet its delivery deadline. However, by 25 days after the first delivery, Kitchenware had not paid for the first installment of copper sheet. As a result, Copperco exercised its right under the contract to withhold shipment of the second installment and, accordingly, the truck with the second ton of copper sheet never left Copperco’s plant.

Kitchenware has defaulted on its loan from Bank, and Bank would like to exercise its rights with respect to its collateral. The first ton of copper sheet delivered to Kitchenware is still at Kitchenware’s factory, and the second ton of copper sheet that was not delivered to Kitchenware is still at Copperco’s plant. Bank believes it has a security interest in both tons of copper sheet, while Copperco asserts that it has title to both tons of copper sheet and that its rights are superior to any rights of Bank.

1. As between Copperco and Bank, which has the superior claim to the first ton of copper sheet that was delivered to Kitchenware? Explain.
2. As between Copperco and Bank, which has the superior claim to the second ton of copper sheet, which is still at Copperco’s plant? Explain.

REAL PROPERTY QUESTION

In 1960, Owen, the owner of vacant land, granted a power-line easement over the land to an electric company by a properly executed written instrument. This easement was never recorded. Consistent with the easement, the electric company erected power lines over the land. The power lines and supporting poles remain on the land.

In 1961, Owen granted an underground gas-line easement on the land to a gas company by a properly executed written instrument. This easement was never recorded. Consistent with the easement, the gas company dug trenches, laid pipes, and restored the surface of the land to its pre-installation condition.

In 1970, Owen conveyed the land to Abe by a full covenant and warranty deed that made no mention of the easements. The Owen-to-Abe deed was promptly and properly recorded. Abe paid full value for the land and had no actual knowledge of the two easements Owen had previously granted.

In 1995, Abe conveyed the land to Bob by a full covenant and warranty deed that made no mention of the easements. The Abe-to-Bob deed was promptly and properly recorded. Bob, who paid full value for the land, knew of the underground gas line because he had helped dig the trenches on the land. Bob had not visited the portion of the land crossed by the power lines and had no actual knowledge of the power-line easement.

In 2009, Bob decided to build a house on the land and hired an engineer to evaluate the proposed building site. Following an inspection of the proposed site, the engineer told Bob that each easement precluded building on the site.

Relevant state statutes provide

- (1) "A conveyance of real property is not valid against any subsequent purchaser who, without notice, purchases said real property in good faith and for valuable consideration," and
- (2) "Easements by prescription are abolished."

1. Did Bob take the land subject to the power-line easement? Explain.
2. Did Bob take the land subject to the gas-line easement? Explain.
3. Assuming Bob took the land subject to either easement, may Bob obtain damages from Owen based upon a breach of the covenant against encumbrances? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Harry and Wendy married when they were both 23, shortly after Harry began his first year of law school. They decided that Wendy, who had completed two years of college, would temporarily quit college and get a full-time job until Harry started practicing law.

Wendy obtained a full-time job as a supermarket cashier. All of her earnings were used for Harry's and Wendy's support. Harry did not work during the school year but worked full-time during summers. All of Harry's earnings were used to pay his law school tuition.

Harry recently earned his law degree, passed the bar examination, and began working as a public defender.

Last month, after three years of marriage, Harry told Wendy that he felt they had drifted apart and that he wanted a divorce. Although deeply hurt, Wendy decided to separate amicably. Harry and Wendy had no children.

Harry suggested that he draw up a settlement agreement in order to avoid the expense of hiring a lawyer. Harry proposed that each spouse keep his or her own personal property and that he bear full responsibility for his educational loans. Harry also told Wendy that a divorce court would "definitely not impose any further obligations" on him because there were no children of the marriage. Wendy agreed to the terms of the settlement agreement proposed and prepared by Harry, and both parties signed it. In the agreement, each spouse waived "any and all rights to the past or future income of the other party."

Thereafter, following Harry's instructions, Wendy filed a petition for a no-fault divorce, requesting that the court incorporate their settlement agreement into the final divorce decree.

Prior to any hearing on the petition, Wendy learned that Harry had been involved in an adulterous relationship with another woman. Angry and mistrustful, Wendy contacted an attorney, who urged her to amend her divorce petition. The attorney suggested that Wendy petition the court to invalidate the settlement agreement, seek a divorce on grounds of adultery, and request alimony and a cash award representing her share of the value of Harry's law license, which he acquired during the marriage.

State law does not authorize reimbursement alimony.

1. Should the court invalidate the settlement agreement? Explain.
2. What, if any, are the advantages to Wendy of obtaining a divorce based on Harry's adultery instead of on no-fault grounds? Explain.
3. Assuming the court invalidates the settlement agreement, can Wendy obtain
 - a) a cash award representing her share of the value of Harry's law license? Explain.
 - b) alimony? Explain.

TORTS QUESTION

Penny lives in an apartment on Oak Street across from the Fernbury Baseball Park (“the Park”). The Park is owned and maintained by the Fernbury Flies, a professional minor league baseball team. As she left her apartment building one day, Penny was struck in the head by a baseball that had been hit by Dennis, a Flies player, during a game.

The section of Oak Street that adjoins the Park was once lined with single-family homes. Over the past two decades, these homes have been replaced by stores and apartment buildings, causing an increase in both car and pedestrian traffic on Oak Street.

The ball that struck Penny was one of the longest that had been hit at the Park since its construction 40 years ago. During the last 40 years, Flies’ records show that only 30 balls had previously been hit over the Park fence adjoining Oak Street. Fifteen of the balls hit out of the Park onto Oak Street were hit during the past decade.

The Park is surrounded by a 10-foot-high fence, which was built during the Park’s construction. All other ballparks owned by clubs in the Flies’ league are surrounded by fences of similar type and identical height. These fences are typical of those used by other minor league teams in the United States. However, in Japan, where ballparks are often located in congested urban neighborhoods, netting is typically attached to ballpark fences. This netting permits balls to go over a fence but captures balls before they can strike a bystander or car.

After being struck by the ball, Penny was taken by ambulance to a hospital emergency room. After tests, the treating physician told Penny that she had suffered a concussion. The physician prescribed pain medication for Penny. However, because of a preexisting condition, she had an adverse reaction to the medication and suffered neurological damage resulting in the loss of sensation in her extremities.

Penny has sued Dennis, the player who hit the baseball that struck her, for battery and negligence. Penny has also sued the Fernbury Flies. She seeks to recover damages for the concussion and the neurological damage resulting from the medication.

1. Does Penny have a viable tort claim against Dennis? Explain.
2. Does Penny have a viable tort claim against the Fernbury Flies? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

Smith owns 10% of the common shares of Omega, Inc., a closely held corporation. Baker and Jones each own 45% of Omega's common shares. Baker and Jones also serve on Omega's board of directors and are paid corporate officers.

Omega has not paid a dividend on its common shares for several years. Smith, who is not an officer of the corporation and has never received a salary from the corporation, is very unhappy that no dividends are being paid.

When Smith complained to Baker and Jones about nonpayment of dividends, they said that while Omega could legally pay dividends, it has not done so in order to retain the corporation's earnings for expansion of the business. They also pointed to data showing that Omega's business has expanded considerably in the past several years, financed entirely through undistributed earnings, and told Smith that he should "go away and let us run the show." Smith complained that "only you are enjoying the fruits of Omega's success." In response to an inquiry from Smith, Baker and Jones refused to reveal the amounts of their salaries, even though those salaries are within industry range.

Baker and Jones each offered to purchase all of Smith's shares for $35 per share. Smith suspects that the shares are worth more than $35 per share. Smith has asked to inspect Omega's corporate books and records in order to determine the value of his shares, but Jones and Baker have refused to give Smith access to any corporate records.

Smith has asked your law firm the following questions:

1. Does Smith have a right to inspect Omega's corporate books and records to determine whether $35 per share is a fair price for his shares? Explain.
2. If Smith brings a suit to compel the payment of a dividend, must Smith first make a demand on the corporation? Explain.
3. If Smith brings a suit to compel the payment of a dividend, is that suit likely to be successful? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

Husband is an American citizen domiciled in State A. Wife is a citizen of a foreign country who was admitted to permanent residency in the United States five years ago and has been domiciled in State A since then.

After struggling with infertility, Husband and Wife consulted with Doctor, who created embryos in a laboratory using Husband's sperm and Wife's ova. Husband and Wife then entered into a surrogacy contract with Surrogate, a domiciliary of State B. Pursuant to the contract, Surrogate agreed to carry the couple's embryo, to relinquish to them any child born as a result of the implantation, and to waive any and all parental and/or custodial rights to the child. Husband and Wife also agreed, jointly and severally, to pay all of Surrogate's expenses and to assume custody and full financial and legal responsibility for any child born as a result of the implantation.

Doctor implanted one of the embryos in Surrogate. Surrogate gave birth to a baby in State A and listed Husband and Wife as the parents on the baby's birth certificate. Husband and Wife obtained a judgment from a State A court declaring that they were the legal parents of the baby and were entitled to sole custody.

The baby had serious medical problems at birth and remained in the State A hospital for three months. When the baby left the hospital, she went home with Husband and Wife. Surrogate returned to her home in State B.

The hospital sent the bill for the baby's medical care, which exceeded $500,000, to Surrogate. Surrogate has medical insurance with Insureco, an insurance company incorporated under the laws of State A with its principal place of business in State C. Surrogate's insurance policy covers all reasonable and necessary medical expenses incurred by Surrogate and her dependent(s), including "any natural child of Surrogate born after the policy is in force." However, Surrogate's policy expressly provides that Insureco will not cover expenses if a third party is liable for those expenses.

Insureco has refused to pay the baby's medical bill on the grounds that she is not a "natural child" of Surrogate within the meaning of the insurance policy and that the baby's expenses are Husband and Wife's responsibility.

Husband and Wife have also refused to pay the bill, claiming that they cannot afford to pay it and that the surrogacy contract is unenforceable under the applicable state law.

Surrogate has filed suit in the federal district court of State A against Insureco, Husband, and Wife. Surrogate alleges that Husband and Wife breached the surrogacy contract and that Insureco breached the terms of the insurance policy. Surrogate seeks to compel any or all of the defendants to pay the $500,000 hospital bill.

The defendants have moved to dismiss the action on the grounds that (i) the federal court lacks jurisdiction over the case, (ii) the case involves state-law domestic-relations issues (i.e., the biological parentage of the child and the enforceability of a surrogacy contract) that are inappropriate for resolution by a federal court, and (iii) Surrogate improperly joined her separate claims against Insureco, on the one hand, and Husband and Wife, on the other, in a single action.

1. Does the federal district court of State A have subject-matter jurisdiction over Surrogate's claims? Explain.
2. Should the federal district court of State A dismiss the action because it involves domestic-relations issues? Explain.
3. Did Surrogate properly join Insureco, Husband, and Wife as defendants in a single action? Explain.

EVIDENCE QUESTION

Driver was driving an automobile that struck Pedestrian in the crosswalk of a busy street. Pedestrian suffered painful fractures and a concussion that affected her memory of the accident.

Pedestrian filed a negligence action against Driver, who responded with a general denial and an assertion that Pedestrian's negligence caused her injuries. The parties have stipulated to the severity of Pedestrian's injuries, to Pedestrian's pain and suffering, and to the total value of Pedestrian's damages. The parties are scheduled for a jury trial on the issues of both Driver's and Pedestrian's negligence.

Pedestrian plans to call Witness to testify at trial. Witness did not see the collision occur. However, Witness will testify that he walked past Pedestrian no more than five seconds before the collision, at which time Witness saw that Pedestrian was deeply engrossed in a cell phone conversation. Witness will also testify that he saw Driver's distinctive sports car as it approached the intersection in which Pedestrian was hit. Witness, who has no specialized training, experience, or education, will also offer the opinion that the car was speeding just prior to the collision because it was traveling noticeably faster than the cars near it, all of which appeared to be traveling at the same slower speed.

Pedestrian plans to call her Spouse to testify that Pedestrian is very cautious and risk-averse.

Pedestrian also plans to testify at trial. She will not deny having been on the cell phone when Witness walked by, but will claim to have lowered the cell phone and looked for traffic just prior to entering the intersection. In fact, Pedestrian intends to testify that she has used a cell phone for many years, that she talks on it while walking almost every day, and that she invariably ends a call or lowers the cell phone when preparing to cross a street in order to look both ways before entering the intersection.

Driver intends to undermine Pedestrian's credibility by introducing evidence of her memory loss. Pedestrian counters that if the jury hears about some of Pedestrian's injuries, then it must hear about all of them, and so Pedestrian seeks to introduce evidence on the full nature and extent of her other injuries.

At the final pretrial motion hearing, Driver's counsel argued that the court should grant these four motions in limine:

- (1) to exclude Witness's opinion that Driver was speeding;
- (2) to exclude Spouse's testimony;
- (3) to exclude evidence of Pedestrian's cell phone use at any time other than the day of the collision;
- (4) to admit evidence of Pedestrian's memory loss, but to exclude evidence of Pedestrian's other injuries.

The evidence rules of this jurisdiction are identical to the Federal Rules of Evidence.

How should the court rule on each of these motions? Explain.

TRUSTS QUESTION

Settlor created a revocable trust naming Bank as trustee. The trust instrument directed Bank, as trustee, to pay all trust income to Settlor and, upon Settlor's death, to distribute all trust assets to "Settlor's surviving children." When Settlor created the trust, he had three living children, Alan, Ben, and Claire.

Settlor died last year. Alan predeceased him. Settlor was survived by three children, Ben, Claire, and Doris (born after Settlor created the trust), and two grandchildren. One of the surviving grandchildren was Claire's child and one was Alan's child. Alan's child was his only heir.

When Settlor created the trust, he funded it with cash. Bank promptly invested the cash in a broad range of stocks and bonds and held this broadly diversified portfolio for just over twenty years. Although the portfolio had by then significantly increased in value, Settlor was dissatisfied with the rate of appreciation. Settlor therefore directed Bank to sell 90% of the trust portfolio and to reinvest the proceeds in the stock of XYZ, a closely held corporation that Settlor believed would substantially appreciate in value.

The investment in XYZ appreciated more than 50% during the first two years after Bank purchased the stock. However, during the five years preceding Settlor's death, the XYZ investment depreciated to about 70% of its initial value. This depreciation was largely due to mismanagement by XYZ's board of directors. Although Settlor was neither a director nor an officer of XYZ, he was fully aware of the management problems. He discussed these problems with Bank and told Bank, "I expect things will turn around soon."

Immediately upon Settlor's death, Bank liquidated the trust's interest in XYZ, thus avoiding further losses from this investment.

One month after Settlor died, Claire wrote to Bank disclaiming all of her interest in the trust.

1. To whom should the trust assets be distributed? Explain.
2. Is Bank liable for losses on the investment in XYZ stock? Explain.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS QUESTION

Employee was Lawyer's bookkeeper. Employee's responsibilities included paying Lawyer's bills, receiving payments from Lawyer's clients, posting those payments to the proper client accounts, and depositing checks and cash into Lawyer's business account at Bank. Employee did not have authority to sign or indorse checks on behalf of Lawyer. If a check required a signature or an indorsement, Employee secured Lawyer's signature.

Employee recently disappeared. Shortly thereafter, Lawyer discovered that Employee had been stealing from Lawyer for several weeks. Although the amounts taken or misapplied by Employee were usually quite small, in two cases the amounts were rather substantial.

In one case, Employee entered into an agreement to purchase a car from Dealer, falsely telling Dealer that the car was for Lawyer's business. Employee and Dealer agreed that Employee would pay the $10,000 price by check and that the car would be delivered once the check had cleared.

Employee prepared a check for $10,000 drawn on Lawyer's business account and payable to the order of "Dealer." She included the check among a group of checks that she gave Lawyer to sign. Lawyer, who was pressed for time, signed all the checks without carefully examining them, including the check to Dealer.

Employee delivered the check to Dealer. However, by the time Dealer presented the check for payment, Lawyer had discovered Employee's fraud and instructed Bank to dishonor the check. Bank followed the instruction and dishonored the check, which was then returned to Dealer. The car is still in Dealer's possession.

In the second case, Employee forged Lawyer's signature on the back of a $5,000 check from a third party payable to the order of Lawyer. Employee then cashed the check at Checkco, a check-cashing service. Checkco subsequently obtained payment of the check from the bank on which it was drawn.

Dealer has demanded payment of the $10,000 check from Lawyer.

Lawyer has demanded that Checkco pay him $5,000.

1. Is Lawyer liable to Dealer on the $10,000 check? Explain.
2. Is Checkco liable to Lawyer for $5,000? Explain.

DISCUSSION

Summary

Copperco's interest in the copper sheet that has been delivered to Kitchenware is "limited in effect to a reservation of a security interest." UCC § 1-201(b)(35). Thus, Kitchenware is the owner of that copper sheet and Copperco has a security interest in it. The delivered copper sheet became part of Kitchenware's inventory and thus, Bank's security interest attached to it and was perfected. Copperco's security interest in the copper sheet is unperfected. As a result, Bank's security interest in the delivered copper sheet has priority over Copperco's security interest.

With respect to the second installment of copper sheet, the security agreement with Bank will create an enforceable security interest in that sheet only if Kitchenware "has rights in" the sheet. Because, under the Copperco-Kitchenware contract, Kitchenware has no rights in the second installment of copper sheet, Bank's security interest did not attach to that installment and only Copperco has an interest in it.

Point One(a) (30%)

Copperco's reservation of title to the delivered goods is ineffective except as retention of a security interest; Copperco's security interest is unperfected.

Secured Transactions Analysis

The sales contract between Copperco and Kitchenware provided that Copperco would retain title to the copper sheet until it received full payment for it. Under the Uniform Commercial Code, such “retention or reservation of title by a seller of goods notwithstanding shipment or delivery to the buyer under Section 2-401 is limited in effect to a reservation of a ‘security interest.’” UCC § 1-201(b)(35). See also UCC § 2-401(1). Thus, Kitchenware owns the copper sheet, and Copperco has a security interest in it. Copperco has neither retained possession of the copper sheet nor filed a financing statement with respect to it, so Copperco’s security interest is unperfected. See UCC § 9-308 et seq.

Point One(b) (10%)

The copper sheet constitutes inventory, so it is covered by Bank’s security interest.

Bank has a security interest in Kitchenware’s “inventory.” The copper sheet is inventory of Kitchenware because it constitutes “raw materials, work in process, or materials used or consumed” in Kitchenware’s business. UCC § 9-102(a)(48)(D).

Point One(c) (20%)

Bank has a perfected security interest in the delivered copper sheet.

As noted in Point One(a) above, once the copper sheet was delivered to Kitchenware, Kitchenware became the owner of the sheet even though the contract provided that Copperco retained title. At that point, Kitchenware had rights in the delivered copper sheet, and Bank’s security interest in inventory attached to it. See UCC § 9-203(b) (security interest attaches when value is given, security agreement has been signed, and debtor has rights in the collateral), § 9-204(a) (security interest may attach to after-acquired collateral). Bank filed a financing statement with respect to its security interest, so its security interest in the copper sheet is perfected. See UCC § 9-308 et seq.

Bank’s perfected security interest in the delivered copper sheet is superior to Copperco’s unperfected security interest.

As noted above, Bank and Copperco both have security interests in the delivered copper sheet. Bank’s security interest in the copper sheet was perfected by filing. Copperco’s interest, on the other hand, was not perfected at all. As between the perfected and an unperfected security interests, Bank’s perfected interest has priority. UCC § 9-322(a)(2).

Point Two (20%)

Because Kitchenware did not have rights in the undelivered copper sheet, Bank’s security interest in it did not attach.

One of the elements of an enforceable and attached security interest is that the debtor have “rights in the collateral.” See UCC § 9-203(b)(2). Thus, Bank has a security interest in the undelivered copper only if Kitchenware has rights in it. Under the terms of the contract between Copperco and Kitchenware, Kitchenware obtained no rights (even rights that are short of title) in the undelivered copper (and UCC § 2-401 does not limit Copperco's rights to a security interest because the goods were neither shipped nor delivered to Kitchenware). Thus, Kitchenware had no interest in the copper sheet. Accordingly, Bank's security interest did not attach to the undelivered copper sheet. Thus, as between Copperco and Bank, only Copperco has an interest in the undelivered copper sheet.

[NOTE: An applicant might argue that Kitchenware had some rights in the undelivered copper sheet because, when the copper sheet was identified to the contract by Copperco (when Copperco designated it for delivery to Kitchenware), this gave Kitchenware a "special property" in the copper sheet, see UCC § 2-501, and Bank's security interest could attach to that set of rights in the sheet. See UCC § 9-203(b)(2), cmt. 6 (limited rights in collateral are sufficient for attachment even if the rights are less than full ownership). However, that "special property" would not give Kitchenware (or Bank) any right to claim the goods from Copperco in the absence of payment of the contract price. See UCC §§ 2-502, 2-511. Moreover, Article 9 states expressly that a seller with a security interest created by retention of title under § 2-401 "has priority over a conflicting security interest created by the debtor" in any case where the debtor has not yet obtained possession of the goods. UCC § 9-110(4). Here, Copperco has at least a security interest in the goods under § 2-401 (see Point One(a), above). Because the goods were never in Kitchenware's possession, Copperco's security interest will be superior to Bank's interest, which was created by the debtor, Kitchenware. See UCC § 9-110. An applicant who makes these points should receive some credit.]

REAL PROPERTY ANALYSIS

(Real Property II.B.; V.B., D.1)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Did Bob take the land subject to a power-line easement when the easement was not recorded but the power lines were visible?
- (2) Did Bob take the land subject to a gas-line easement when the easement was not recorded and the gas line was not visible but Bob had actual knowledge of the gas-line easement?
- (3) If Bob took the land subject to the power-line easement, may he obtain damages from Owen based on the Owen-to-Abe warranty deed's covenant against encumbrances?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under the state recording statute, a subsequent purchaser for value takes the purchased property free of prior unrecorded interests unless the purchaser has actual or inquiry notice of those interests. Both Abe and Bob had inquiry notice of the power-line easement, as the power lines were clearly visible. Had they looked, they would have discovered the power lines and been aware that they should make further inquiry regarding the possibility of an existing easement. Thus, Abe and Bob were on notice of any interest the electric company actually had that they could have ascertained by asking the electric company, and they take subject to that interest.

Abe had no notice of the underground gas-line easement, since it was not visible and it was not on the record. Thus Abe took the property free and clear of the gas-line easement. While Bob had actual knowledge of the gas-line easement, because of the shelter doctrine, Bob takes the land free of that easement. Because Bob is a remote grantee, he cannot recover damages from Owen for the power-line easement based on the covenant against encumbrances in the Owen-to-Abe deed.

Both Abe and Bob acquired the land subject to the unrecorded power-line easement. Because the power lines were visible, Abe and Bob were on inquiry notice of the easement.

In this state, a “conveyance of real property is not valid against any subsequent purchaser who, without notice, purchases said real property in good faith and for valuable consideration.” Notice may be actual, constructive, or inquiry. JOHN G. SPRANKLING, UNDERSTANDING PROPERTY LAW § 24.04[D] (2d ed. 2007). Constructive notice comes from information that is on the public land records; inquiry notice arises from facts discernible through visual inspection of the premises or the applicable recorded instruments. Id. § 24.06. Some jurisdictions and authors equate constructive and inquiry notice.

Here, because Abe paid Owen for the land, he is a subsequent purchaser for value. Abe did not have actual notice of the power-line easement and, because that easement was never recorded, he did not have constructive notice of it based on the recorded instruments. However, because the power lines were discernible from visual inspection, Abe had inquiry notice of the power-line easement. Therefore, under the relevant statute, Abe took subject to the power-line easement. See WILLIAM B. STOEBUCK & DALE A. WHITMAN, THE LAW OF PROPERTY § 11.10, at 882 (3d ed. 2000).

The same analysis applies to Bob, who also takes subject to the power-line easement.

Point Two (30%)

Abe did not take the land subject to the unrecorded and invisible gas-line easement because he had no actual, constructive, or inquiry notice of it. While Bob had actual knowledge of the gas-line easement, because of the shelter doctrine, he takes free and clear of that easement.

The gas-line easement was never recorded. Thus neither Abe nor Bob acquired constructive notice of this easement from the land records. Abe had no actual notice of it, either. In contrast to the power-line easement, the gas-line easement was not discernible through visual inspection; the gas lines were underground, and the surface of the land had been restored to its pre-installation condition. Therefore, Abe had no inquiry notice of the gas-line easement. Thus, under the state recording statute, Abe took free of the gas-line easement.

At first blush, it would appear that Bob took the land subject to the gas-line easement because, in contrast to Abe, he had actual notice of it. However, under the “shelter doctrine,” when a bona fide purchaser (here, Abe) acquires title free of a prior encumbrance, he can convey that title to a subsequent purchaser (here, Bob) free of that encumbrance. In order to ensure that the bona fide purchaser has an unlimited right to alienate his land in the future, the shelter doctrine applies even when the subsequent purchaser has actual notice of the prior, unrecorded encumbrance. See STOEBUCK & WHITMAN, supra, § 11.10 at 889.

Point Three (30%)

Bob cannot obtain damages from Owen for breach of the covenant against encumbrances because Bob is a remote grantee. However, some jurisdictions do not follow the common law rule. In those jurisdictions, a remote grantee may sue on the covenant against encumbrances.

Owen conveyed the land to Abe with a full covenant and warranty deed that made no mention of encumbrances. A full-covenant deed includes a covenant against encumbrances, i.e., a warranty that, at the time of conveyance, there are no outstanding third-party rights that negate the title the grantor purports to convey. That covenant is inconsistent with the fact that Abe and later Bob took subject to the power-line easement. (See Point One.) Abe clearly had a cause of action against Owen for breach of the covenant against encumbrances. The issue is whether Bob may also sue Owen.

Under the common law, the covenant against encumbrances is a “present covenant,” breached, if at all, if there is an encumbrance at the time of the conveyance to Abe. Furthermore, the covenant does not run with the land. Therefore, it cannot benefit a remote grantee like Bob. See STOEBUCK & WHITMAN, supra, § 11.13 at 911; HERBERT HOVENKAMP & SHELDON F. KURTZ, THE LAW OF PROPERTY 617 (5th ed. 2001).

Some jurisdictions do not follow the common law rule. See, e.g., In re Estate of Hanlin, 133 N.W. 140 (Wis. 1907). In those jurisdictions, a remote grantee may sue on the covenant against encumbrances. See UNIFORM LAND TRANSACTIONS ACT § 2-312. Even in those jurisdictions, a remote grantee with notice of the easement may not sue on the theory that with such notice the grantee (1) never relied on the covenant or (2) bargained for a reduction in the purchase price to take account of the easement. See Ford v. White, 172 P.2d 822 (Or. 1946). Courts are divided on whether the covenant against encumbrances is breached when an unrecorded easement is ascertainable through visual inspection. Some courts say yes; others disagree, arguing that the grantee can sue even though the easement is visible because, if the warranty is in the deed, the grantee can reasonably assume that an easement is no longer valid when the grantor makes no exception for it when conveying title.

FAMILY LAW ANALYSIS

(Family Law III.D., E., J.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Did Harry's behavior constitute fraud or overreaching sufficient to invalidate the settlement agreement?
- (2) Would a divorce obtained on grounds of adultery significantly enhance Wendy's prospects of obtaining a monetary award?
- (3)(a) Is Harry's law degree marital property subject to division at divorce?
- (3)(b) Can Wendy obtain alimony (spousal support)?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Courts generally will invalidate a settlement agreement resulting from fraud, overreaching, or duress if it results in a settlement that is substantively unfair. Harry's preparation of the agreement, his failure to advise Wendy to seek independent counsel, and his biased account of Wendy's legal rights will likely lead the court to conclude that the agreement should be invalidated if the court also concludes that Wendy should have obtained an award. A divorce obtained on grounds of adultery will not likely give Wendy a significant advantage in obtaining an award. In only about half of the states is fault a factor in alimony determination or property division, and even in those jurisdictions in which fault is relevant, it rarely plays a major role in judicial decision making. Wendy is not entitled to a cash award based on the value of Harry's law license, and the facts do not reveal any other assets that might provide the basis for such an award. Given that state law does not authorize claims for reimbursement alimony, it is unclear whether Wendy can obtain an alimony award.

Point One (30%)

The settlement agreement will be invalidated if the court finds that (1) it was procured by fraud, duress, or overreaching, and (2) it is substantively unfair. A court will likely find that Harry's conduct in drafting and negotiating the agreement satisfies the first part of this test. It is unclear whether the court will conclude that the agreement is substantively unfair to Wendy.

In most states, a settlement agreement resulting from fraud, overreaching, or duress may be set aside if it is substantively unfair. See JOHN DEWITT GREGORY, PETER N. SWISHER & SHIRLEY L. WOLF, UNDERSTANDING FAMILY LAW 112 (3d ed. 2005). See also UNIF. MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE ACT (UMDA) § 306(b) (written settlement agreement is binding on the court unless unconscionable). A few courts have also held that spouses have fiduciary obligations toward each other that continue, when one spouse is unrepresented by counsel, during the negotiation of a settlement agreement. See, e.g., Crawford v. Crawford, 524 N.W.2d 833 (N.D. 1994).

Here, Wendy was unrepresented and Harry, an attorney, failed to advise her to seek independent legal counsel. Although a lack of independent legal counsel will not by itself invalidate a settlement agreement, courts will generally examine the circumstances that led a spouse to forgo counsel or waive marital rights. Harry also advised Wendy that a court would “definitely not” impose any post-marital obligations on him, which is probably untrue. Taken together, these facts suggest fraud and overreaching.

However, if Harry’s conduct did not result in an agreement substantively unfair to Wendy, the agreement should not be invalidated. The agreement is not unfair as to Harry’s law degree. (See Point Three(a).) It might be unfair as to alimony. (See Point Three(b).)

[NOTE: Some applicants may state that the court can ignore the settlement agreement because the divorce is not yet final. This is incorrect, and an applicant who resolves the issue in this way should not receive credit.]

Point Two (20%)

Obtaining a divorce on grounds of adultery is unlikely to significantly improve Wendy’s prospects of obtaining alimony or a cash award representing her share of marital property.

Even if Wendy is able to obtain a divorce on grounds of adultery, it is unlikely to give her a financial advantage. About a third of the states have eliminated fault-based divorce grounds. In these states, Wendy could not obtain a divorce on grounds of adultery; she could obtain only a no-fault divorce.

Although most states permit consideration of financial misconduct, only about half permit consideration of marital misconduct, such as adultery, in either property division or alimony determination. Of the group of states that permit consideration of marital misconduct, about half restrict its use to alimony determination. And while a claimant’s marital fault was once, in many states, a bar to an alimony award, in virtually all states that today permit consideration of fault in alimony decision making, it is simply one factor among many. See AM. LAW INST., PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF FAMILY DISSOLUTION: ANALYSIS AND RECOMMENDATIONS 46–53 (2002) (describing state-by-state survey). Some appellate courts in states that permit consideration of marital misconduct have required trial courts to consider fault only when egregious. See O’Brien v. O’Brien, 489 N.E.2d 712, 719 (N.Y. 1985) (fault excluded except in “egregious cases that shock the conscience”); O’Loughlin v. O’Loughlin, 458 S.E.2d 323, 326 (Va. Ct. App. 1995) (party’s fault relevant to award determination when fault had an economic impact on marriage). Some states have explicitly ruled that adultery is not sufficiently egregious to have an impact on alimony. See In re Marriage of Sommers, 792 P.2d 1005, 1009 (Kan. 1990) (“It is difficult to conceive of any circumstances where evidence of marital infidelity would be a proper consideration in the resolution of the financial aspects of a marriage.”); Stevens v. Stevens, 484 N.Y.S.2d 708 (App. Div. 1985). In other states, there is older case law permitting consideration of adultery or similar misconduct, but virtually no modern cases do so. See AM. LAW INST., supra. Commentators reviewing the case law have thus concluded that “the current judicial trend in many states today . . . [is] to ignore or severely limit the ultimate effect of fault-based statutory divorce factors except in serious or egregious circumstances.” Peter Nash

Swisher, The ALI Principles: A Farewell to Fault—But What Remedy for the Egregious Marital Misconduct of an Abusive Spouse?, 8 DUKE J. GENDER L. & POL'Y 213, 227 (2001).

Thus, in most states, proving Harry's adultery is unlikely to significantly enhance Wendy's prospects of obtaining either a property-distribution or an alimony award. In some states, however, this factor might play a role in the court's decision.

Point Three(a) (10%)

Harry's law degree is not marital property subject to division at divorce, and the facts do not show that there are any other significant assets.

The states, by an overwhelming margin, have rejected the claim that a professional degree or license is property subject to division at divorce; the notable exception is New York. See HARRY D. KRAUSE, LINDA D. ELROD, MARSHA GARRISON & J. THOMAS OLDHAM, FAMILY LAW CASES, COMMENTS, AND QUESTIONS 788 (6th ed. 2007). See also O'Brien v. O'Brien, 489 N.E.2d 712 (N.Y. 1985). Wendy thus has no property interest in Harry's degree, and a court could not grant her a cash award in compensation for such an interest. The facts also fail to reveal any other assets that could be classified as marital property. Thus, a cash award to Wendy representing a share of marital property would be inappropriate.

Point Three(b) (40%)

It is not clear whether Wendy will receive alimony.

If the court invalidates the settlement agreement, Wendy could seek an alimony award. But permanent or long-term alimony is seldom awarded except in the case of a long marriage and a significant, long-term gap between the husband's and wife's economic prospects. See GREGORY ET AL., supra, at 307–08, 411. It is virtually certain that Wendy could not obtain such an award, given the short duration of the marriage and the possibility that Wendy could pursue a career that would generate an income equal to or higher than Harry's since Wendy is still young and without children.

In a state, like this one, that does not permit reimbursement alimony, Wendy could seek a short-term, "rehabilitative" alimony award to complete her college education. In some states a spouse must establish that she lacks the capacity for self-support as a precondition to obtaining a rehabilitative award. See, e.g., UMDA § 308(a) (court may not award alimony unless spouse (1) "lacks sufficient property to provide for his reasonable needs; and (2) is unable to support himself through appropriate employment . . ."). Wendy has no property, but she is capable of self-support. Under a standard like that of the UMDA, she would be ineligible for alimony unless her employment was not "appropriate." Some courts have thus refused to award alimony to a wife capable of self-support even when she supported her husband's professional education. See, e.g., McDermott v. McDermott, 628 P.2d 959 (Ariz. App. 1981) (schoolteacher wife who supported husband through graduate school not eligible for alimony because she could support herself); Morgan v. Morgan, 383 N.Y.S.2d 343 (App. Div. 1976) (overturning alimony award to wife who had supported husband's legal education and planned to finish college and go to medical school because she was capable of self-support).

Most of these decisions are old; courts today typically view capacity for self-support as only one factor among many in awarding rehabilitative alimony. Here, Wendy's contributions to the couple's support and to Harry's education and Harry's ability to contribute to Wendy's future support would weigh in her favor. But the process of alimony determination is highly discretionary, and several factors—Wendy’s youth, the short duration of the marriage, the fact that the marriage produced no children, Harry’s probably modest salary as a public defender—would all weigh against Wendy’s claim for rehabilitative alimony. See GREGORY ET AL., supra, at 312–14.

In sum, Wendy’s prospects of obtaining an alimony award are quite uncertain.

[NOTE: Spousal support and spousal maintenance are alternative terms for alimony. An applicant should not be penalized for using one of these terms instead of alimony. The applicant’s conclusion should be given less weight than his or her command of the relevant legal principles and use of the facts. A number of jurisdictions now authorize “reimbursement” or “restitutional” alimony to compensate one spouse for significant contributions to the other’s education or career. Id. at 411–13. Given Wendy’s support of Harry during law school, Wendy would have a strong claim to this form of alimony, but it is not authorized in the state where her claim was brought.]

- (5) If Penny succeeds in her action against either Dennis or the Flies, can she recover for damages for the neurological harm that resulted from a preexisting condition?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Penny does not have a viable battery action against Dennis because Dennis neither intended, nor knew with substantial certainty, that the ball he hit out of the Park would strike anyone. Penny does not have a viable negligence action against Dennis because there is no reasonable means by which Dennis could have avoided hitting Penny. Because Penny does not have a viable claim against Dennis, she has no viable claim against the Flies based on the team's employment of Dennis even though Dennis was acting within the scope of his employment. However, Penny might have a viable negligence action against the Flies based on the team's failure to attach netting to the fence adjoining Oak Street. The fact that the Flies have conformed to customary standards for minor league baseball fence construction is relevant but not determinative. If the jury finds that the Flies' failure to install netting along the Oak Street fence was negligent, Penny could recover for harm suffered as a result of her adverse reaction to medication even though this harm resulted from a preexisting condition.

Point One (25%)

Dennis did not commit a battery when the ball he hit struck Penny. Therefore Penny does not have a viable battery action against Dennis.

In a battery action, the plaintiff must show that the defendant intentionally caused a harmful or offensive bodily contact. A defendant intentionally causes such a contact if he "acts with the desire to bring about that harm" or engages "in action knowing that harm is substantially certain to occur." RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TORTS § 1, cmt. d. In this case, Dennis neither desired to bring about a harmful contact between the baseball and Penny nor, in light of his location inside the Park, could he have known that such a contact would or was substantially certain to occur. As a result, Penny does not have a viable battery claim against Dennis.

Point Two (25%)

Dennis was not negligent in hitting the ball that struck Penny over the Oak Street fence. Therefore Penny does not have a viable negligence claim against Dennis.

In a negligence action, the plaintiff must show that the defendant owed the plaintiff a duty to conform his conduct to a standard necessary to avoid an unreasonable risk of harm to others, that the defendant's conduct fell below the applicable standard of care, and that the defendant's conduct was both the cause in fact and the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries.

In determining whether Dennis's conduct fell below the standard of care, the jury would measure that conduct against the actions of a reasonable, prudent person engaged in a like activity. A reasonable, prudent person takes appropriate precautions to avoid foreseeable risks; in measuring whether a particular precaution was warranted, the jury weighs the burden of taking such precautions against the gravity of the risk and the likelihood that it will eventuate. See RICHARD A. EPSTEIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON TORTS 150–51 (7th ed. 2004); United States v. Carroll Towing Co., 159 F.2d 169 (2d Cir. 1947).

Here the burden of taking the precaution against the risk is high. The only meaningful precautions that Dennis might have taken were not hitting the ball at all or trying to hit it with less than maximum force. Either precaution would generally be inconsistent with Dennis's job as a professional baseball player, which includes the obligation to hit the ball and to hit a home run if possible. For Dennis, the cost of taking precautions could mean the loss of his career.

The gravity of the risk created by his hitting the ball cannot be determined easily. Being hit with an errant baseball could cause harm ranging from minimal bruising to far more serious injury. The likelihood of the harm occurring is low—in 40 years only 30 balls had previously been hit into Oak Street.

Thus Dennis was not negligent in hitting the ball that caused Penny's injury.

Point Three (10%)

Penny does not have a viable claim against the Flies based on the team's employment of Dennis.

An employer is vicariously liable for the tortious actions of his employee that are within the scope of the tortfeasor's employment. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY §§ 219, 229; RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 2.04. In this case, there is no question that Dennis was acting within the scope of his employment; he was a baseball player engaged in hitting a baseball. But Penny does not have a viable tort action against Dennis because Dennis's conduct was not tortious. Therefore, the Flies are not vicariously liable for his conduct.

Point Four (25%)

Penny may have a viable negligence action against the Flies based on the team's failure to attach netting to the Oak Street fence despite the fact that the fence conforms to customary standards within professional baseball.

Just as a jury would measure Dennis's conduct against the actions of a reasonable, prudent person engaged in a like activity, it would measure the Flies' conduct in constructing and maintaining the Oak Street fence against that of a reasonably prudent ballpark owner. And while Dennis had no means of avoiding the injury to Penny other than not hitting the ball, the Flies could have added netting to the Oak Street fence, and that netting would have prevented Penny's injury.

Custom is relevant in a negligence action, but it is not determinative. See The T.J. Hooper, 53 F.2d 107 (S.D.N.Y. 1931). Thus, even though the Flies' conduct conformed to the industry standard, Penny may succeed in her negligence action if she can establish that the cost of adding netting to the fence was relatively modest in relation to the risk of injuries from balls exiting the Park onto Oak Street. Given the changed character of the street, the increasing number of balls hit onto the street in recent years, and the widespread adoption of netting in another country, it is possible that Penny may succeed in making such a showing.

Because a tort defendant "takes his victim as he finds him," Penny could recover for harm suffered due to her adverse reaction to medication.

A tort defendant takes his victim as he finds him. The plaintiff with an "eggshell skull" who suffers damage greatly in excess of those that a normal victim would suffer thus is entitled to recover fully for his injuries. See Epstein, supra, at 476–77. Because Penny's sensitivity to the prescribed medication was a preexisting condition, if Penny succeeds in her lawsuit against the Flies, she could recover for all injuries suffered as a result of that sensitivity.

CORPORATIONS ANALYSIS

(Corporations V.A.; VI.A.; IX.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Does Smith have a right to inspect Omega's corporate books and records to determine whether $35 per share is a fair price for his shares?
- (2) Is Smith required to make a demand on the corporation prior to bringing a suit to compel a dividend?
- (3) Is a suit to compel the payment of a dividend likely to be successful?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Smith has a right to inspect corporate books and records to determine the value of his shares because this purpose is reasonably related to Smith's interest as a shareholder. Smith is not required to make a demand upon the corporation prior to bringing a suit to compel the payment of a dividend because such a suit attempts to vindicate an individual right of Smith as a shareholder. It is not a suit by Smith as a representative of Omega to vindicate a corporate right. However, a suit to compel the payment of a dividend is unlikely to be successful because, even if funds are legally available to pay dividends, Smith can compel the payment of a dividend only by showing that the decision to withhold dividends was made in bad faith.

Point One (25%)

As a shareholder, Smith has a right to inspect corporate books and records for a proper purpose. Determining the value of Smith's shares for purpose of sale is a proper purpose.

A shareholder has a right to inspect corporate books and records for a proper purpose. MODEL BUSINESS CORP. ACT (MBCA) § 16.02(b) & (c) (1984); DEL. GEN. CORP. § 220(b). A proper purpose is a purpose reasonably related to a person's interest as a shareholder. DEL. GEN. CORP. § 220(b). The determination of the value of one's own shares for purposes of sale is a proper purpose. CM & M Group, Inc. v. Carroll, 453 A.2d 788, 792 (Del. 1982); Matter of Smilkstein v. J. Smilkstein & Sons, Inc., 223 N.Y.S.2d 561, 563 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1961). The fact that Smith has not definitely decided to sell does not prevent the valuation from being a proper purpose. CM & M Group, Inc., 453 A.2d at 792–93 (involving shares in a closely held corporation); Macklowe v. Planet Hollywood, Inc., 1994 WL 560804 (Del. Ch., Sept. 29, 1994) (involving shares in a closely held corporation; no present intention to sell or concrete steps to sell shares required in order for valuation of shares to be a proper purpose).

In contrast to a publicly traded corporation, a closely held corporation has no market that continuously values its shares. The fact that Omega is a closely held corporation reinforces the conclusion that valuing the shares is a proper purpose for inspection. Thus, “[w]hen a minority shareholder in a closely held corporation whose stock is not publicly traded needs to value his or her shares in order to decide whether to sell them, normally the only way to accomplish that is by examining the appropriate corporate books and records.” Macklowe, 1994 WL 560804 at *4.

In sum, Smith has a right to inspect Omega’s corporate books and records because this purpose is reasonably related to Smith’s interest as a shareholder.

[NOTE: An applicant might receive extra credit for recognizing that in order to exercise his inspection rights, Smith must comply with procedural requirements, which generally include making a written demand for inspection and allowing the corporation a certain length of time (typically five days) to respond.]

Point Two (30%)

A suit to compel the payment of a dividend is a suit seeking to enforce an individual right of the shareholder and not a suit in a representative capacity seeking to enforce a right of the corporation. Therefore, no demand on the corporation is required prior to bringing suit.

A shareholder is generally required to make a demand on the corporation to take remedial action prior to bringing a derivative suit. See MBCA § 7.42 (requiring a demand in all cases); Del. Chancery Court Rule 23.1 (requiring complaint to allege demand or reason for failure to make demand). However, a shareholder is not required to make a demand on the corporation prior to bringing suit where the shareholder brings a suit in his or her individual capacity to enforce an individual right of the shareholder. The important question, then, is whether a suit to compel the payment of a dividend is a suit to enforce a right of the corporation or, conversely, a suit to enforce an individual right of the shareholder.

A suit to compel the payment of a dividend is not a suit to enforce a right of the corporation. It is a suit to enforce a right of the individual shareholder, that is, the shareholder’s right to share in the net profits of the corporation. Doherty v. Mutual Warehouse Co., 245 F.2d 609, 612 (5th Cir. 1957); Knapp v. Bankers Securities Corp., 230 F.2d 717, 721–22 (3d Cir. 1956) (noting also that the right to dividends is an incident of the ownership of stock). Consequently, there is no requirement that Smith make a demand on the corporation prior to bringing suit to compel the payment of a dividend.

[NOTE: In some jurisdictions, a derivative suit may be appropriate and graders are encouraged to ascertain local law on this issue. If an applicant approaches this issue solely from the perspective of the shareholder bringing a derivative suit, then the grader should also expect some analysis of demand futility. Presumably, Baker and Jones, having made the decision not to pay a dividend, are unlikely to agree to have the corporation sue the directors for failure to declare a dividend.]

Point Three (45%)

The decision as to whether to distribute corporate earnings as dividends or to retain those earnings in order to expand the business is a matter that is generally within the business judgment of the corporate directors. Smith’s suit to compel the payment of a dividend is unlikely to be successful because, in order to succeed, Smith would be required to prove that dividends were withheld in bad faith.

While directors have fiduciary duties, the business judgment rule protects them from liability for breach of their fiduciary duties. The business judgment rule is a presumption that in making business decisions, the directors act on an informed basis, in good faith, and in the honest belief that the action being taken is in the best interests of the corporation. Aronson v. Lewis, 473 A.2d 805, 812 (Del. 1984), overruled on other grounds by Brehm v. Eisner, 746 A.2d 244 (Del. 2000). The decisions regarding whether to declare a dividend and the amount of any dividend declared are generally matters within the business judgment of the directors. Dodge v. Ford Motor Co., 170 N.W. 668, 682 (Mich. 1919).

To prevail in a suit to compel the payment of a dividend, a shareholder must prove that there are funds legally available for the payment of a dividend and that the directors acted in bad faith in their refusal to pay. Gay v. Gay's Super Markets, Inc., 343 A.2d 577, 580 (Me. 1975); Zidell v. Zidell, Inc., 560 P.2d 1086, 1089 (Or. 1977) (plaintiff must show bad faith, fraud, breach of fiduciary duty, or abuse of discretion on the part of the directors); Gottfried v. Gottfried, 73 N.Y.S.2d 692, 695 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1947). "The essential test of bad faith is to determine whether the policy of the directors is dictated by their personal interests rather than the corporate welfare." Gottfried, 73 N.Y.S.2d at 695.

Usually the plaintiff-shareholder will attempt to prove bad faith by establishing various "earmarks of bad faith." These earmarks include "[i]ntense hostility of the controlling faction against the minority; exclusion of the minority from employment by the corporation; high salaries, or bonuses or corporate loans made to the officers in control; the fact that the majority group may be subject to high personal income taxes if substantial dividends are paid; [and] the existence of a desire by the controlling directors to acquire the minority stock interests as cheaply as possible." Id. Here, there may be several earmarks of bad faith. Baker and Jones seemed hostile toward Smith, telling him to "go away and let us run the show." They refused to disclose their salaries. Further, it could be argued that Baker and Jones were trying to acquire Smith's shares as cheaply as possible. The facts do not establish whether $35 per share is a fair price.

The earmarks "are not, however, invariably signs of improper behavior by the majority." Zidell, 560 P.2d at 1089. If these earmarks are not the "motivating causes" of the board's dividend decision, they do not constitute bad faith. Gottfried, 73 N.Y.S.2d at 695. In a number of cases, courts have recognized that a good-faith decision to retain corporate earnings for business expansion is an appropriate exercise of business judgment. Gay, 343 A.2d at 580; Gottfried, 73 N.Y.S.2d at 700–01. In judging the decision of the board of a closely held corporation, a court may also consider that "[d]irectors of a closely held, small corporation must bear in mind the relatively limited access of such an enterprise to capital markets." Gay, 343 A.2d at 582.

In sum, a suit to compel the payment of a dividend is unlikely to be successful because, even if funds are legally available to pay dividends, Smith could succeed only by showing that the decision to withhold dividends was made in bad faith or, in other words, was dictated by the personal interests of the directors rather than the corporate welfare. It is unlikely that he can do this when a proper motive for withholding the payment of dividends exists, as it does here.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure I.A.1.; IV.C.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Does a federal district court have diversity jurisdiction over an action between a plaintiff domiciled in one state and three defendants who are domiciled in another state when one of the defendants is a permanent resident alien and not a U.S. citizen?
- (2) Does a federal district court have diversity jurisdiction over a case that arises out of a surrogacy agreement but does not seek a divorce, alimony, or child custody decree?
- (3) Do the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit a plaintiff to join three defendants in a single action when her claims against the defendants, although based on different contracts, all seek recovery for expenses generated by a single occurrence?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The federal district court has jurisdiction to adjudicate Surrogate's claims against the defendants because there is complete diversity among all of the parties and the amount-in-controversy requirement is met. The domestic relations exception to diversity jurisdiction is not implicated by these facts because Surrogate does not seek a divorce, alimony, or child custody decree, and a state court already has determined legal parentage. Surrogate properly joined all three defendants in a single action because her claims against them arise out of the same transaction or occurrence (the birth and hospitalization of the baby) and involve a common question of law or fact.

Point One (35%)

The federal district court has diversity jurisdiction to hear these breach-of-contract claims because complete diversity of citizenship exists between the plaintiff and all of the defendants, and the amount-in-controversy requirement is met.

Surrogate is suing Insureco for breaching the terms of the insurance policy, in which it agreed to insure Surrogate and her dependent children. She is suing Husband and Wife for breaching the surrogacy agreement, in which they agreed to assume full financial and legal responsibility for any child resulting from the implantation of their embryo. These claims arise under state contract law and do not raise any federal questions. Therefore, federal court jurisdiction is proper only if the case satisfies the requirements of 28 U.S.C. § 1332, the diversity statute.

Section 1332 grants federal district courts original jurisdiction of all civil actions with an amount in controversy in excess of $75,000 if the plaintiff and defendant are “citizens of different States.” 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a). In addition, the “diversity” between the parties on either side of the case must be “complete.” Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 7 U.S. (3 Cranch) 267, 267 (1806). In other words, no plaintiff may be a citizen of the same state as any of the defendants. See 13E CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT ET AL., FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 3605 (2009).

On these facts, there is complete diversity. Plaintiff Surrogate is deemed to be a citizen of State B because she is domiciled there. Id. § 3611 at 464–65. Defendant Husband, similarly, is a citizen of State A, where he is domiciled. Surrogate and Husband are diverse.

Surrogate is also diverse from Insureco. Under the diversity statute, “a corporation shall be deemed to be a citizen of any State by which it has been incorporated and of the State where it has its principal place of business” 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1). See also 13F WRIGHT ET AL., supra, §§ 3623–3624. Thus, Insureco is a citizen of both State A and State C and is therefore diverse from Surrogate, a State B citizen.

Even though Wife is not a U.S. citizen, § 1332 provides that “an alien admitted to the United States for permanent residence shall be deemed a citizen of the State in which such alien is domiciled.” 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a). Since Wife has been admitted for permanent residence, she is deemed to be a citizen of State A, where she is domiciled. 13E WRIGHT ET AL., supra, § 3604 & n. 14. Thus, she is also diverse from Surrogate.

Because the plaintiff, Surrogate, is a citizen of only State B and none of the defendants is a citizen of State B, complete diversity exists.

Surrogate alleges that each defendant is obliged by contract to pay the $500,000 hospital bill. She seeks a court order compelling payment of that bill. She thus raises a claim against each defendant that exceeds the $75,000 amount-in-controversy threshold. See JACK H. FRIEDENTHAL, MARY KAY KANE & ARTHUR R. MILLER, CIVIL PROCEDURE 49–50 (4th ed. 2005) (in cases where plaintiff seeks equitable relief, the amount in controversy is the value to the plaintiff of what is sought to be obtained); Burns v. Massachusetts Mut. Life Ins. Co., 820 F.2d 246, 248 (8th Cir. 1987).

Point Two (30%)

Under the domestic relations exception, federal courts do not have authority to issue divorce, alimony, and child custody decrees. Here, the district court would retain jurisdiction to adjudicate the plaintiff’s claims, because they raise contractual questions.

The federal courts have long declined to exercise jurisdiction over domestic relations issues. More than a century ago, the Supreme Court of the United States announced that “[t]he whole subject of the domestic relations of husband and wife, parent and child, belongs to the laws of the States and not to the laws of the United States.” In re Burrus, 136 U.S. 586, 593–94 (1890). Although the domestic relations exception is not grounded in the Constitution, the Supreme Court has concluded that such a long-established exception to diversity jurisdiction should be retained, absent a Congressional decision to repudiate it. See Ankenbrandt v. Richards, 504 U.S. 689, 695, 700–01 (1992) (stating that “[w]ith respect to such a longstanding and well-known construction of the diversity statute, and where Congress made substantive changes to the statute in other respects, we presume, absent any indication that Congress intended to alter this exception, that Congress ‘adopt[ed] that interpretation’ when it reenacted the diversity statute,” quoting Lorillard v. Pons, 434 U.S. 575, 580 (1978) (internal citations and footnote omitted)).

Nonetheless, the mere fact that a case involves domestic relations (as the current problem arguably does) does not mean that there is no diversity jurisdiction over that case. According to one leading treatise, the domestic relations exception applies only to cases that are primarily marital disputes. See 13E WRIGHT ET AL., supra, § 3609. This conclusion was reinforced in Ankenbrandt, in which the Supreme Court limited the scope of the domestic relations exception, stating that it “encompasses only cases involving the issuance of a divorce, alimony, or child custody decree.” 504 U.S. at 704. There, the Court held that a federal district court had diversity jurisdiction to adjudicate a tort claim brought by the mother of two children on their behalf against their father and his companion, alleging sexual and physical abuse, because the suit did not seek a divorce, alimony, or child custody decree. Id. See generally CHEMERINSKY, FEDERAL JURISDICTION § 5.3, at 302–03 (4th ed. 2003); 13E WRIGHT ET AL., supra, §§ 3609 & 3609.1.

On the facts of this question, the domestic relations exception does not apply. No one is seeking a divorce or alimony decree. And there is no dispute over custody of the baby. To the contrary, Husband and Wife already have obtained a state court declaration that they are the baby’s parents and are entitled to sole custody; Surrogate’s suit does not seek to alter that judicial custody determination. All Surrogate seeks is specific performance of Husband and Wife’s contractual obligation to assume financial responsibility for the baby.

Finally, while Surrogate’s claim against Insureco raises the issue of whether the baby is Surrogate’s “natural child” within the meaning of the insurance policy, any determination of that issue would affect only Insureco’s financial responsibility to cover the baby’s hospital bills. Resolution of the issue would not affect the custody of the child.

Therefore, this case does not appear to fall within the domestic relations exception, and the district court should exercise its diversity jurisdiction and adjudicate Surrogate’s claims. See Mid-South Ins. Co. v. Doe, 274 F. Supp. 2d 757 (D.S.C. 2003). As the Supreme Court held long ago, a federal court has “no more right to decline the exercise of jurisdiction which is given, than to usurp that which is not given.” Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 404 (1821), cited with approval in Marshall v. Marshall, 547 U.S. 293, 298–99 (2006) (rejecting a broad interpretation of the probate exception to federal jurisdiction and requiring lower courts to exercise jurisdiction).

Point Three (35%)

Surrogate properly joined Husband, Wife, and Insureco as defendants because her claims against each of them arose out of the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences and involve questions of law or fact common to all defendants.

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure embody a liberal and flexible joinder policy. Rule 20(a), which governs permissive joinder of parties, permits the plaintiff to join multiple defendants whenever two conditions are met: (1) “any right to relief is asserted against [the defendants] jointly, severally, or in the alternative, with respect to or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences” and (2) “any question of law or fact common to all defendants [will] arise in the action.” FED. R. CIV. P. 20(a). See generally 7 WRIGHT ET AL., supra, § 1651 et seq. Both of these conditions must be satisfied. Id. § 1653, at 403–04. Rule 20 is designed to “promote trial convenience and expedite the final determination of disputes, thereby preventing multiple lawsuits.” Id. § 1652, at 395 (footnotes omitted). The Rule 20 requirements should be read as broadly as possible whenever doing so is likely to promote judicial economy. Id. § 1653, at 415.

In determining whether claims against the three defendants arise out of the same transaction or occurrence, courts often employ the logical-relationship test, under which “all logically related events entitling a person to institute a legal action against another generally are regarded as comprising a transaction or occurrence.” Id. § 1653, at 409 (footnote omitted). Emphasizing the liberality and flexibility of this standard, one leading treatise notes that “courts are inclined to find that claims arise out of the same transaction or occurrence when the likelihood of overlapping proof and duplication in testimony indicates that separate trials would result in delay, inconvenience, and added expense to the parties and to the court.” Id. § 1653, at 411–12. The inclusion of the language “in the alternative” was specifically intended to permit a plaintiff to join multiple defendants when she or he “is entitled to relief from someone, but the plaintiff does not know which of two or more defendants is liable under the circumstances set forth in the complaint.” Id. § 1654, at 418–19.

Here, Surrogate’s claims against all three defendants arise out of the same event—the baby’s birth and hospitalization. In addition, certain factual questions will be common to both claims, including the circumstances of the birth and the terms of the surrogacy agreement between Surrogate and Husband and Wife, which are facts important both to Surrogate’s claim against Husband and Wife and to Insureco’s defense that the baby is not Surrogate’s “natural child.” Thus, joinder is appropriate in this case.

[NOTE: An applicant who demonstrates knowledge of the joinder rule and the ability to apply the rule to the facts of the problem in a sensible way should receive some credit, even if the applicant concludes that joinder is improper in this case. However, an applicant who concludes that joinder is improper should also note that dismissal of the action is not an appropriate remedy for improper joinder. The appropriate remedy is to sever the claims and allow Surrogate to proceed separately against the defendants. FED. R. CIV. P. 21.]

Legal Problems

- (1) Should the court exclude Witness's opinion that Driver was speeding?
- (2) Should the court exclude Spouse's testimony as to Pedestrian's character for being cautious and risk-averse?
- (3) Should the court exclude evidence of Pedestrian's habit of lowering her cell phone or ending a call when crossing a street?
- (4)(a) Should the court admit evidence of Pedestrian's memory loss?
- (4)(b) If the court does admit evidence of Pedestrian's memory loss, should it then also admit the evidence of Pedestrian's other injuries?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Witness's proffered testimony that Driver was speeding is relevant to the issues of Driver's negligence and causation. Although it is an opinion, it is admissible because non-experts may offer opinions on relevant, non-technical issues, rationally based on their personal perceptions.

The court should exclude Spouse's testimony that Pedestrian is cautious and risk-averse. Evidence of character traits is not admissible to prove action in conformity with those character traits in civil cases.

Pedestrian's testimony that she always lowers her cell phone and checks for traffic before entering intersections is admissible evidence of a habit and may be offered to prove that she acted in conformity with that habit on the day in question.

Proof of Pedestrian's concussion and memory loss is relevant and admissible to show that Pedestrian is not a reliable witness and that the facts to which Pedestrian is testifying are therefore "less probable" than they would otherwise be.

However, even if the court admits evidence of Pedestrian's concussion, it should not admit evidence of her other injuries. Because the parties have stipulated the extent of injury and the resulting damages, evidence of those injuries is irrelevant and likely to unfairly prejudice the jury.

Point One (20%)

The court should allow Witness to offer an opinion on the speed of Driver's car.

To be admissible, evidence must be relevant. FED. R. EVID. 402. Relevant evidence is any evidence that tends "to make the existence" of a "fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence.” FED. R. EVID. 401. Witness’s testimony is relevant to the determination of the action because the fact that Driver was speeding, if true, would make it more likely that Driver was acting negligently and was the cause of the accident. Under Rule 403, relevant evidence can be excluded under certain circumstances, but there are no facts in this question to suggest an appropriate ground for exclusion under this rule. See FED. R. EVID. 403 (relevant evidence may be excluded if it is unduly prejudicial, confusing, cumulative, a waste of time, or a source of undue delay in the proceedings).

However, Witness’s testimony is in the form of an opinion. Rule 701 places restrictions on non-expert opinion evidence. A witness who is not testifying as an expert may offer an opinion only if

- (a) the opinion is “rationally based on the [witness’s] perception” of what happened;
- (b) the opinion helps determine “a fact in issue”; and
- (c) the opinion is “not based on scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge” that is governed by Rule 702.

FED. R. EVID. 701.

In this case, Witness’s testimony meets all three requirements. First, Witness saw Driver’s car as it approached the intersection and was able to perceive its speed. In addition, Witness was able to observe Driver’s speed relative to that of other cars around it, and Witness observed that Driver’s car was moving noticeably faster than surrounding cars. These perceptions provide a rational and logical basis for Witness’s opinion that the car was speeding.

Second, there is no question that whether Driver was speeding is a fact relevant to Pedestrian’s claim. If Driver was speeding, that fact would make it more likely that Driver was driving negligently and that Driver’s negligence caused the collision.

Finally, Witness is not an “expert in disguise” who is attempting to sneak in an opinion based on scientific or engineering principles. Witness’s opinion that Driver was speeding is a commonsense conclusion based on direct observations. No specialized training, experience, or education is necessary to form a valid opinion on such a basis.

[NOTE: How much weight the jury should give this opinion is an issue for the jury and does not affect admissibility.]

Point Two (25%)

The court should not admit Spouse’s testimony regarding Pedestrian’s character trait of being cautious and risk-averse.

Spouse’s proposed testimony that Pedestrian is very cautious and risk-averse is testimony about Pedestrian’s character. The purpose of offering the testimony is to suggest that Pedestrian would have acted consistently with that character on the day in question and would have checked before entering the intersection. If true, that would tend to establish that Pedestrian was not negligent. The evidence is therefore relevant.

However, Federal Rule of Evidence 404(a) restricts the use of character evidence, even when such evidence is relevant. Rule 404(a) provides that “evidence of a person’s character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion,” except in three situations that apply exclusively to criminal trials. Here, Spouse’s testimony that Pedestrian generally is cautious and risk-averse is relevant precisely because it suggests that on the day of the collision Pedestrian was acting in a cautious and risk-averse manner. This is exactly what Rule 404(a) forbids, and the testimony is inadmissible.

The court should admit Pedestrian’s testimony about Pedestrian’s cell phone usage habits.

Habit evidence is admissible to prove that a person acted in conformity with that habit. FED. R. EVID. 406. This is true even if the only evidence of a habit is Pedestrian’s own testimony. Rule 406 specifically authorizes the use of habit evidence “whether corroborated or not and regardless of the presence of eyewitnesses.” Pedestrian’s testimony will provide sufficient background information to establish that she actually has a habit of lowering her cell phone and looking both ways when crossing a street. Pedestrian claims to have acted in conformity with this habit when entering the intersection, which is relevant to Pedestrian’s defense against Driver’s claim that Pedestrian was contributorily negligent. Therefore, this evidence is admissible.

Point Four(a) (15%)

The court should admit the evidence of Pedestrian’s memory loss.

Pedestrian’s concussion is relevant, albeit indirectly, to determining who is liable for the collision. Pedestrian intends to testify at trial about what happened, but the concussion has erased some of her memory. Evidence of memory loss is relevant because it has a tendency to suggest to the jury that Pedestrian’s testimony concerning the events related to the collision is less reliable. The evidence of memory loss may make the facts to which Pedestrian testifies “less probable.” FED. R. EVID. 401. Rule 403 is not a basis to deny Driver’s motion because it would not be “unfairly prejudicial” to Pedestrian to allow Driver to benefit from Pedestrian’s inability to recall what happened. Cf. Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308, 316 (1974) (“[T]he cross-examiner is . . . permitted to delve into the witness’[s] story to test the witness’[s] perceptions and memory . . .”).

Point Four(b) (15%)

The court should exclude the evidence of Pedestrian’s other injuries.

Rules 401–403 also establish that evidence of Pedestrian’s fractures is not relevant and not admissible. The parties have stipulated to these injuries and have agreed on the value of the compensation due to Pedestrian if Driver is responsible for these injuries. Therefore, the fact that Pedestrian suffered these additional injuries does not, by itself, tend to prove any fact of consequence in dispute that will aid in the determination of who caused the collision. Therefore, such evidence is a “waste of time” under Rule 403. It is also “unfairly prejudicial in the sense that the evidence is unnecessary and might cause the jury improperly to sympathize” with Pedestrian without advancing the factual inquiry at all. See, e.g., Miller v. New Jersey Transit Authority Rail Operations, 160 F.R.D. 37, 42 (D.N.J. 1995) (bifurcating damages phase of trial from liability necessary because “the severity of Plaintiff’s injuries would prejudice the defendants so severely if issues of liability and damages were not bifurcated that the defendants would not receive a fair trial”).

[NOTE: To the extent that Driver’s introduction of evidence of Pedestrian’s memory loss includes evidence of the severity of Pedestrian’s injuries, Pedestrian can argue, and the judge could find, that the parties’ stipulation has been violated. If the stipulation is no longer in effect, this could open the door to admission of evidence of Plaintiff’s other injuries, subject to Federal Rules of Evidence 401 and 403.]

TRUSTS ANALYSIS

(Trusts I.C.1., I.1.; II.A., C.; III.B.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Did the class of “Settlor’s surviving children” remain open following the creation of the trust so that Doris shares in the gift?
- (2) Does the share of Alan, who predeceased Settlor, pass to Alan’s child or Settlor’s surviving children?
- (3) Did Claire effectively disclaim her remainder interest in the trust, and, if so, to whom does her disclaimed interest pass?
- (4) Did Bank breach its obligation to invest trust assets prudently by investing, at Settlor’s direction and acquiescence, 90% of the portfolio in the stock of a closely held corporation and by maintaining this investment despite the stock’s depreciation?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Doris is eligible to take a share of trust assets because the class of “Settlor’s surviving children” did not close until Settlor’s death. In all states, Ben and Doris would receive a share of the assets as surviving children of Settlor. Alan, who predeceased Settlor, would lose his share as would Claire, because her disclaimer is effective and precludes her from sharing in the estate. In most states Ben and Doris would each take one-half of the trust assets because Claire is deemed to have predeceased Settlor because of the disclaimer. However, in states that have adopted Uniform Probate Code § 2-707 or a like statute, trust assets would be divided into four equal shares, and the children of Alan and Claire would take, by representation, the shares their respective parents would have received. Because Settlor directed the investment in XYZ and acquiesced in its retention by Bank, Bank is probably not liable for losses on that investment.

Point One (20%)

Doris is entitled to share in the trust remainder because the class of “Settlor’s surviving children” did not close until Settlor’s death.

If a gift is made to a class of persons, such as a named person’s children, the class closes (i.e., additional persons may no longer join the class) when the named person dies or the gift becomes possessory. See WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN, JR., AND SHELDON F. KURTZ, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES § 10.3 at 429 (3d ed. 2004); RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY (WILLS AND OTHER DONATIVE TRANSFERS) § 15.1, cmt. e.

Here, Settlor's death closed the class of Settlor's "surviving children" under either test. Thus, all of Settlor's children, including Doris, who was born before the class closed, are eligible to share in the gift.

Point Two (20%)

The share that would have passed to Alan had he survived Settlor passes to Ben and Doris, the surviving members of the class, unless the state has adopted a survivorship rule like Uniform Probate Code § 2-707. If the Uniform Probate Code applies, Alan's share passes to his child.

When a remainderman (such as Alan) predeceases the life tenant, the trust assets are distributed based on the directives contained in the trust instrument. Here the assets pass to Settlor's other "surviving children" (i.e., Ben, Claire, and Doris) as the trust instrument specifically provided that, upon Settlor's death, the trust property should be distributed to Settlor's surviving children. (But see Point Three with respect to Claire's disclaimer of her interest.)

In states that have adopted Uniform Probate Code § 2-707 or a like statute, the outcome is different. Under § 2-707, if a gift is made in trust to a class of persons described as "children," a deceased child's descendants take the deceased child's share by representation. The use of the word "surviving," as here, does not change that result. See UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-707(b)(3). Thus, if the Uniform Probate Code or a like statute applies, Alan's share would pass to Alan's child.

[NOTE: The following states have enacted a form of Uniform Probate Code § 2-707: Alaska, Arizona, Colorado, Hawaii, Massachusetts, Michigan, North Dakota, New Mexico, and Utah.]

Point Three (30%)

Claire effectively disclaimed her interest in the trust. Under most state laws, her interest goes to those persons to whom it would have passed had she predeceased Settlor. In this case, the interest would pass to Ben and Doris, the remaining members of the class of "Settlor's surviving children." However, in states that have adopted a survivorship rule like Uniform Probate Code § 2-707, Claire's interest would pass to her child.

Almost all states have enacted disclaimer statutes that permit beneficiaries of wills and trusts to disclaim their interests in the estate or trust property. In most states, a disclaimer is not effective unless it is in writing and is made, for a testamentary transfer, within nine months of the decedent's death or, for a future interest in a nontestamentary transfer, within nine months after the future interest would become "indefeasibly vested." See generally UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-801(b) (1969). Both requirements were met in this case, with the result that Claire's disclaimer is effective. Claire's disclaimer would also be effective under the newest version of the Uniform Probate Code, which permits a disclaimer at any time prior to acceptance of the interest. See id. § 2-113.

When the holder of a future interest effectively disclaims that interest, the disclaimant is deemed to have predeceased the life tenant. Thus, Claire is deemed to have predeceased Settlor. See, e.g., id. § 2-1106 cmt. example 4(b). Under the common law, Claire's disclaimed share would pass to Ben and Doris, the surviving class members. However, under § 2-707 or a like statute, Claire's child would take Claire's share notwithstanding the express survivorship contingency in the trust instrument. See id. § 2-1106 cmt. example 4(b). (See Point Two.)

Trusts Analysis

[NOTE: The following states have enacted a form of Uniform Probate Code § 2-707: Alaska, Arizona, Colorado, Hawaii, Massachusetts, Michigan, North Dakota, New Mexico, and Utah.]

Point Four (30%)

Bank may have breached its duties to invest prudently and diversify trust investments. However, whether Bank is liable for these breaches depends upon whether acting pursuant to the directions of the settlor of a revocable trust excuses Bank from its duties to diversify and act prudently.

A trustee is under a duty to “invest and manage trust assets as a prudent investor would.” UNIF. PRUDENT INVESTOR ACT § 2. The obligation to invest and manage prudently normally requires the trustee to diversify trust investments. Id. § 3. A trustee is also expected to consider the trust’s “needs for liquidity . . . and preservation or appreciation of capital.” Id. § 2(c)(7).

If the trust here had been irrevocable, there is almost no doubt that Bank would be found to have breached its duties. First, by investing 90% of the trust assets in one stock, Bank failed to diversify. Second, Bank failed to preserve trust capital. Bank was aware that XYZ was declining in value and was suspicious of mismanagement by its directors, but Bank nonetheless retained the investment. XYZ was also a closely held stock. Although such an investment is not explicitly proscribed by the Uniform Act, it was disfavored in some earlier versions of the prudent investor rule. The commitment of 90% of trust assets to such an investment thus may have conflicted with the trustee’s obligation to preserve liquidity and capital.

While a strong case can be made that Bank acted imprudently, Bank may not be liable because it acted in accordance with Settlor’s express direction and continued acquiescence. Acting in accordance with a settlor’s directives is inadequate to absolve a trustee from liability when a trust is irrevocable because the trustee’s obligations are owed to trust beneficiaries. But when, as here, there were no income beneficiaries other than Settlor and Settlor held the power to revoke the trust, Settlor could be treated as the effective owner, thus absolving Bank of liability to Settlor and all other trust beneficiaries.

Uniform Trust Code § 603 specifically provides that, with respect to a revocable trust, a trustee’s duties are “owed exclusively to” the settlor. Moreover, Uniform Prudent Investor Act § 3 provides that a trustee shall diversify trust investments unless the trustee “reasonably determines that, because of special circumstances, the purposes of the trust are better served without diversifying,” and Uniform Prudent Investor Act § 2 directs the trustee to “consider[] the purposes, terms, . . . and other circumstances of the trust” in managing its assets. Under the Restatement of Trusts, the terms of a trust include the “intentions of the settlor manifested in any way that admits of proof.” RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 90 (1992 § 227), cmt. b. This approach reflects the view that the settlor of a revocable trust has an interest in trust assets that is the practical equivalent of ownership. In addition, trustees are not generally liable for “consented to” acts and can defend against charges of imprudence by proving a waiver.

Given these principles and the fact that Settlor directed Bank to invest in XYZ and was aware of the situation at XYZ, but told Bank that he expected things would turn around, an argument can be made that Bank is not liable for the imprudent investment in XYZ.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1)(a) Is Dealer entitled to enforce the $10,000 check against Lawyer?
- (1)(b) Does Lawyer have a defense to payment of the check to Dealer?
- (1)(c) Is Lawyer's defense of ordinary fraud available against Dealer, the holder of an instrument who received it in exchange for a promise that has not yet been performed?
- (2) When a check with a forged indorsement is transferred to a check-cashing service, is the original payee of the check entitled to recover from the check-cashing service when the forgery was committed by an employee to whom the payee had given responsibility for handling the check?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Dealer is a holder of the $10,000 check that was dishonored and can enforce the check against Lawyer. However, Lawyer signed the check only because of Employee's fraud, and Lawyer therefore has a defense to payment that can be asserted against anyone who is not a holder in due course. Dealer is not a holder in due course because Dealer did not give value for the check—Dealer never delivered the car to Employee. Thus, although Dealer can enforce the check, Dealer will be subject to Lawyer's defense of fraud in the inducement.

Checkco is not liable to Lawyer for taking the $5,000 check with the forged indorsement because Employee was entrusted by Lawyer with responsibility for the check and, therefore, for these purposes, Employee's forgery is effective as the indorsement of Lawyer.

[NOTE: Because the facts of this question include the collection of checks by banks, UCC Article 4 (Bank Deposits and Collections), which is not included in the Negotiable Instruments specifications for the MEE, is implicated. However, the issues raised by this question are Article 3 (Negotiable Instruments) issues, and reference to UCC Article 4 is not necessary to resolve them.]

Point One(a) (20%)

Dealer is entitled to enforce the check against Lawyer because Dealer is a holder of the check.

The $10,000 check is payable to the order of Dealer and is in Dealer's possession. Dealer is accordingly a holder of the check, UCC § 1-201(b)(21), and is "a person entitled to enforce" it.

Negotiable Instruments Analysis

UCC § 3-301. Lawyer signed the check as drawer and the check has been dishonored. Therefore Lawyer is obliged to pay the check to a person entitled to enforce it. UCC § 3-414. Consequently, Dealer has a prima facie claim to payment from Lawyer.

Point One(b) (25%)

Lawyer has a personal defense of fraud in the inducement.

Lawyer has a defense to payment. Lawyer signed and issued the check because of Employee's fraudulent act of including the check among a group of checks intended to pay Lawyer's ordinary business expenses. Under UCC § 3-305, this fraud is a defense to Lawyer's obligation to pay the check. See UCC 3-305(a)(2) & cmt. 2 ("the obligation of a party to pay an instrument" is subject to any defense that would be available to the party in an action to enforce "payment under a simple contract," including defenses of fraud, misrepresentation, and mistake). Dealer, as a person entitled to enforce Lawyer's check, will be subject to this defense unless Dealer is a holder in due course. See UCC §§ 3-305(a), 3-305(b) (in general, the right to enforce an instrument is subject to both real and personal defenses, but a holder in due course is subject only to the so-called "real defenses," which do not include ordinary fraud).

[NOTE: Some applicants may erroneously argue that this defense is good even against a holder in due course because there was fraud in the factum—Lawyer did not know what he was signing. But UCC § 3-305(a)(1) allows a fraud defense to be asserted against a holder in due course only if the fraud induced the obligor to sign the instrument without a "reasonable opportunity" to learn its terms. Here Lawyer knew he was signing a check and had an opportunity to learn its terms—he could have read it.]

Dealer is not a holder in due course because he did not give value for the check.

A holder in due course is a holder who took the instrument for value, in good faith, and without notice of, inter alia, any defenses to it. UCC § 3-302(a). Although Dealer does not appear to have acted in bad faith or to have had notice of Lawyer's defense, Dealer has not given "value" for the instrument within the meaning given to that term in Article 3 of the UCC.

Here Dealer took the negotiable instrument (the check) as payment for the car. However, Dealer has not delivered the car. When a negotiable instrument "is issued or transferred for a promise of performance," the promisor gives value only "to the extent the promise has been performed." UCC § 3-303(a)(1). Thus, because Dealer did not perform its promise—delivering the car—it did not take the check for value.

Because Dealer did not take the check for value, Dealer is not a holder in due course. Dealer, as a mere holder, is therefore subject to Lawyer's defense. Lawyer does not have to pay $10,000 to Dealer.

Point Two (30%)

Even though Checkco took the stolen check, it is not liable to Lawyer because Lawyer had entrusted responsibility for the check to Employee, and Employee's fraudulent indorsement of the check in Lawyer's name therefore is treated as an effective indorsement.

The check that was transferred to Checkco was originally made payable to the order of Lawyer. While the check appeared to carry Lawyer's indorsement, the indorsement had been forged by Employee. Normally, the forged indorsement would be ineffective, Employee would not be a holder of the check or a person entitled to enforce it, and Checkco's action of taking the check by transfer from Employee would be a conversion of that check for which Checkco would be liable to Lawyer. UCC § 3-420(a). See also UCC §§ 1-201(b)(21) (definition of holder), 3-301 (definition of person entitled to enforce).

In this case, however, the result is different. According to the facts, Employee had the authority to process checks and to deposit those checks in Lawyer's business account. This constitutes "responsibility" for those checks. See UCC § 3-405(a)(3). Because the fraudulent indorsement of Lawyer's signature on the instrument was perpetrated by Employee, a person to whom Lawyer entrusted "responsibility with respect to the instrument," the indorsement is effective as Lawyer's indorsement. UCC § 3-405. Inasmuch as the indorsement was effective, Employee was a holder of the check and, thus, a person entitled to enforce it. As a result, Checkco did not obtain transfer of the check from a person not entitled to enforce it and, accordingly, Checkco's action did not constitute conversion and Checkco is not liable to Lawyer for the amount of the check.

[NOTE: Lawyer would have a claim to recover some part of the loss from Checkco if Checkco "fail[ed] to exercise ordinary care" in taking the instrument from Employee and that failure contributed to the loss. See UCC § 3-405(b). There are no facts in the problem to suggest a lack of care by Checkco, but some applicants may note the possibility that Lawyer could recover some portion of the value of the check from Checkco if Lawyer proved that Checkco failed to exercise ordinary care.]

[NOTE: References to UCC § 1-201 are to the current official text. In states in which former Article 1 is still in effect, citations will be slightly different. There is no difference in substance.]

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

On January 2, Fran opened Petals, a floral shop, and operated it as a sole proprietorship. Petals soon ran into financial difficulties, and Fran could not pay its bills.

On March 1, Fran asked her friends Gina and Hank for financial help.

On April 1, in response to Fran's request, Gina delivered a check payable to "Petals" to Fran. In exchange for this contribution, Fran agreed to pay Gina 25% of the monthly net profits of Petals for as long as Petals remained in business. Gina also agreed that, if Petals suffered losses, she would share those losses with Fran.

Gina began working at the shop with Fran and helped Fran with business planning for Petals.

On April 2, also in response to Fran's request, Hank delivered a check payable to "Petals" to Fran and noted on the memo line of the check "loan to Petals." Hank agreed to accept 25% of the monthly net profits of Petals until his loan (plus interest) was repaid in full.

Fran used the proceeds of the checks from Gina and Hank to purchase equipment, supplies, and a delivery truck in the name of Petals.

Beginning in April, on the last day of each month, Fran distributed to both Gina and Hank 25% of Petals' monthly net profits.

On September 1, Gina wrote a letter to her son Ivan stating that she was assigning to Ivan, as a gift, all of her interest in Petals effective immediately. Gina gave a copy of that letter to Fran. Fran told Gina, "I don't want anything to do with Ivan." Gina continued to be active in the business operations of Petals.

On September 30, Fran distributed the monthly net profits of Petals to Gina and Hank, but distributed nothing to Ivan.

On October 10, Ivan demanded that Fran distribute Gina's share of Petals' net profits to him and that she also allow him to inspect the books and records of Petals.

On October 15, Gina learned that Fran was using Petals' delivery truck on Sundays to transport her children to their soccer games. Gina demanded that Fran stop doing so, but Fran refused, noting that the truck was not being used for Petals' business on Sundays.

1. What is the legal relationship among Fran, Gina, and Hank? Explain.
2. Is Ivan entitled to Gina's share of the monthly net profits of Petals? Explain.
3. Is Ivan entitled to inspect the books and records of Petals? Explain.
4. Is Fran entitled to use the delivery truck on Sundays to take her children to their soccer games? Explain.

CONTRACTS/NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS QUESTION

Buyer, who was in the market for a car, heard that Seller wanted to sell his car for $5,000. On June 1, Buyer visited Seller and saw the car. Buyer asked Seller about the car's condition. In response, Seller said, "The car is in tip-top shape—the brakes and clutch were replaced in the last six months. It's in beautiful shape for a vehicle of this age. Good for another 100,000 miles easy."

Seller agreed to sell the car to Buyer for $5,000. They both signed the following document: "Seller agrees to sell, and Buyer agrees to buy, Seller's car for the price of $5,000. Buyer will pick up the car at Seller's home on June 2 and pay Seller $4,000 in cash and give Seller a check for $1,000 at that time."

On June 2, Buyer came to Seller's home. Before handing the check to Seller, Buyer said, "I'd like my mechanic to look at the car to make sure that it is as you represented it." Seller responded, "Don't waste money on a mechanic. The car is exactly as I described it." Even though Buyer, while at Seller's home, had no way to tell if the brakes and clutch were as represented, Buyer thought that it would be a waste of time and money to visit a mechanic and thus decided to proceed with the transaction. Accordingly, after briefly inspecting the car, Buyer gave Seller $4,000 in cash and a $1,000 check drawn on First Bank. Seller handed Buyer the keys to the car, and Buyer left with the car.

On June 3, Seller went to Checkco, where he indorsed the back of Buyer's check by signing his name with no other words and handed the check to the clerk in exchange for $950 in cash. Checkco was unaware of any facts about the transaction that gave rise to the check.

On June 10, the car broke down and Buyer had it towed to a mechanic's shop. After looking at the car, the mechanic accurately told Buyer that the clutch had failed because it was old and needed to be replaced. The mechanic also warned Buyer that the brakes were unsafe and that the engine needed a complete overhaul or it wouldn't last another 10,000 miles. The mechanic told Buyer that if the car had been as represented by Seller, it would have had a market value of $5,000, but in its current condition the car was worth only about $500—its value as salvage for parts.

On June 11, Buyer hand-delivered a letter to Seller. The letter informed Seller that Buyer was revoking his acceptance of the car and that Seller could recover his car at the mechanic's shop. Buyer also visited First Bank and instructed it to refuse to pay the check that Buyer had given Seller.

On June 12, an agent of Checkco went to First Bank and demanded payment of Buyer's check. First Bank refused to pay the check because of Buyer's instruction and gave the check back to the agent. Checkco then promptly gave notice of First Bank's refusal to pay to both Seller and Buyer.

1. What rights, if any, does Buyer have against Seller? Explain.
2. What rights, if any, does Checkco have against Buyer and against Seller? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

Three years ago, Testator told his attorney to draft a will leaving $20,000 to his Sister and the balance of his estate to his children. Testator told his attorney that he was divorced and that he had two children, Abby and Bruce, both biological children born during Testator's first marriage. Testator did not tell the attorney that he had adopted his stepchild, Carl, when Carl was two years old.

The attorney prepared a typed will based on Testator's instructions. When Testator came to the attorney's office to execute the will, the attorney placed the three unstapled pages of the will on her desk and said to Testator, "Please sign your will."

Page 1 of the will included introductory clauses and two bequests reading: "I give $20,000 to Sister. I give the balance of my estate to my children, in equal shares." Pages 2 and 3 of the will contained clauses relating to the responsibilities of the executor. At the bottom of page 3, there were lines for Testator's and his witnesses' signatures and an attestation clause.

Testator, in the presence of two witnesses, read the three pages, declared the document on the attorney's desk to be his will, and signed it on the line provided on page 3. Both witnesses, who were able to see all three pages, signed their names underneath Testator's signature and again under the attestation clause. The attorney thereafter folded the three pages together and gave them to Testator.

Two years ago, Testator decided that he wanted to leave more money to Sister. To accomplish this, Testator crossed out the bequest reading "I give $20,000 to Sister" on page 1 of the will and wrote above the crossed-out phrase, "I give $40,000 to Sister."

Last month, Testator died. Testator's will, all three pages folded together, was found in a night table in Testator's bedroom. Abby, Bruce, Carl, and Sister survived Testator. In addition, Don claims to be Testator's nonmarital child.

The only relevant state statutes provide:

- I. "No will or codicil thereto is valid unless signed by the testator and two attesting witnesses."
 - II. "A will may be revoked, in whole or in part, by destruction or cancellation."
 - III. "If a decedent dies intestate survived by children and no spouse, the decedent's entire estate passes to his children, in equal shares."
- 1. Is Testator's will valid? Explain.
 - 2. To whom should Testator's estate be distributed? Explain.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW QUESTION

The Church of Peace (the Church) is a religious organization that advocates “peace to everyone.” Recently, a Church chapter (Chapter) was organized in the town of Homestead. Chapter members decided to spread the Church’s message to the people of Homestead by handing out leaflets that proclaimed in bold letters, “PEACE TO ALL!” Chapter members who participated in passing out the leaflets stood on a public sidewalk and distributed the leaflets to pedestrians. The Chapter members did not block traffic or take any actions except passing out leaflets and remarking, “Peace to all!”

Many people who took the leaflets threw them onto the sidewalk, and Homestead employees spent several hours cleaning up these discarded leaflets. Chapter was fined $3,000 under a municipal anti-leafleting ordinance that prohibits any distribution of leaflets “in or on any public space, including roads, streets, and sidewalks.” No Chapter member threw leaflets or other litter onto the ground.

Chapter members who attend High School, a public school in Homestead, recently formed the “Church of Peace Club” (Church Club) to pray together and to do good works. High School has a policy that permits student groups to meet in High School classrooms after scheduled classes. Under this policy, student groups must first obtain permission from Principal before using a classroom for a meeting. Pursuant to this policy, the Chess Club, the Drama Club, and the Future Lawyers Club all use classrooms for after-school meetings. Church Club officers asked Principal if they could meet in a classroom after school. Principal denied this request and stated that after-school use of a classroom by Church Club would be “a violation of the separation of church and state.”

Father, a Chapter member and the parent of a Church Club officer, learned about Principal’s decision and went to High School to see Principal. Outside Principal’s office was a sign reading “No admittance without an appointment.” Father, who had no appointment, threw open the closed door and marched into Principal’s office, interrupting a meeting between Principal and another parent, and told Principal, “Your policy is unwise and unconstitutional. I believe that you are discriminating against members of my faith.” Principal asked Father to leave the office until the meeting with the other parent was concluded, but Father refused. Principal called the police, who forcibly removed Father from Principal’s office.

Father was convicted of trespassing on government property.

Does the First Amendment, as applied to state and local governments through the Fourteenth Amendment,

1. Preclude Homestead’s enforcement of its anti-leafleting ordinance against Chapter? Explain.
2. Preclude Principal’s denial of Church Club’s request to use classroom space for its meetings? Explain.
3. Provide grounds to vacate Father’s trespass conviction? Explain.

REAL PROPERTY QUESTION

Eighty years ago, Owner, the owner of vacant land known as Blackacre, conveyed Blackacre to a local school district (School) “if School uses Blackacre only to teach children aged 5 to 13.” Shortly after acquiring title to Blackacre, School erected a classroom building on Blackacre and began teaching children aged 5 to 13 in that building.

Seventy years ago, Owner died and left his entire estate to Daughter.

School used the classroom building to teach its students aged 5 to 13 until three years ago when, due to increasing enrollments, School built a new classroom building three miles from Blackacre and converted the classroom building on Blackacre into administrative offices.

The building on Blackacre is now exclusively occupied by administrative offices, and all School students aged 5 to 13 are taught in the new classroom building.

Two years ago, Daughter died. Daughter did not object to School’s altered use of Blackacre before her death. She devised her entire estate to her Husband for life, with the remainder to “my surviving children.” Daughter was survived by Husband and two children, Ann and Bill.

One year ago, Bill died. Bill’s entire estate passed to his wife, Mary.

One month ago, Husband, the life tenant under Daughter’s will, died. Husband was survived by Ann and by Bill’s widow, Mary.

State law provides:

- I. “Actions to recover the possession of real property shall be brought within 10 years after the cause of action accrues.”
- II. “All future interests are alienable, devisable, and descendible to the extent they do not expire as a result of the holder’s death.”
- III. “Conditions and limitations in a deed shall not be construed as covenants.”

There are no other relevant statutes.

What interests, if any, do School, Ann, and Mary have in Blackacre? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Fifteen years ago, Husband and Wife married in State A. At the time of the marriage, Husband and Wife were both 35 years old, and each had a high school education. Wife worked as an administrative assistant for a manufacturing company, where she had been employed for six years. Husband was unemployed.

Husband was a spendthrift with a history of selling his possessions to fund unsuccessful business ventures. Aware of his personal failings, Husband asked Wife to enter into a premarital agreement under which (a) Wife would become the sole owner of all assets owned by Husband before his marriage to Wife; (b) Wife would pay all of Husband's premarital debts; (c) if Husband and Wife divorced, Wife would have exclusive rights to all assets acquired by either Husband or Wife during their marriage; and (d) if Husband and Wife divorced, both would waive all claims to alimony. Wife agreed to Husband's proposal. Husband and Wife both disclosed their assets to each other.

Attorney thereafter prepared a premarital agreement based on Husband's and Wife's understanding. Husband and Wife signed the agreement one week after a meeting at which Attorney explained the consequences of signing the agreement. The agreement contained a provision stating that both Husband and Wife had chosen to forgo individual representation by a lawyer. After signing the agreement, Husband transferred title to his assets to Wife.

Throughout the marriage, Wife has performed virtually all household chores. Wife has also worked full time at the manufacturing company; at times, she has also held a part-time job to pay for household expenses. Wife paid Husband's premarital debts with her earnings and with some of the assets Husband had transferred to her. She sold the balance of the assets Husband had transferred to her to pay for flying lessons for Husband. Husband got a commercial pilot's license after taking these lessons but never tried to find work as a pilot. Instead, Husband worked at part-time odd jobs until five years ago, when he was injured in a car accident. Thereafter, Husband claimed he was disabled and ceased working altogether. Wife currently earns $35,000 per year.

Wife has sued Husband for divorce in State A, which terms spousal support "alimony." Husband claims that he is entitled to alimony and a share of the couple's assets. Wife claims that she is entitled to all assets titled in her name and in Husband's name. These assets are (a) the marital home, purchased by Wife during the marriage and titled in Wife's name; (b) Wife's employment pension; and (c) real estate inherited by Husband during the marriage and titled in Husband's name.

Wife has asked your law firm these questions:

1. Is the premarital agreement enforceable? Explain.
2. If the premarital agreement is unenforceable, what assets are divisible at divorce? Explain.
3. If the premarital agreement is unenforceable, is Husband entitled to alimony? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

Until recently, Paul had always lived in State A. Last year, he decided he would move to State B for at least one year and, after a year, decide whether to remain in State B or return to State A. Six months ago, Paul moved to State B, rented an apartment, and took a job as a temporary employee. Paul has enjoyed living in State B so much that he recently left his temporary job and accepted a position as a permanent employee at a law firm in State B.

Shortly after he moved to State B, Paul bought a vacation home in State A, which he visits about once a month for two or three days. To pay for the vacation home, Paul obtained a loan from Credit Union in State A. Credit Union is incorporated in and chartered by State A. Its only office, located in State A, is both its corporate headquarters and the place where it transacts business with its customers. Ninety-five percent of Credit Union's customers are State A residents who do business with Credit Union in person at its State A office.

Paul's loan agreement with Credit Union provides that he will repay the loan in monthly installments over a 30-year period. Credit Union has a mortgage on Paul's vacation home to secure the debt. The loan paperwork lists Paul's State B address as his mailing and home address. The loan agreement also contains a privacy provision whereby Credit Union agrees not to disclose Paul's personal information to any third party without Paul's written permission. Credit Union sends a loan statement and payment coupon to Paul's State B address each month, and Paul returns the payment coupon with a check for the payment amount.

After the loan closed, a Credit Union employee mailed copies of all the loan paperwork to Paul. Unfortunately, the employee misread Paul's address in State B and sent the paperwork to an incorrect address. Several months later, Paul discovered that someone had gotten his loan paperwork and had used the information (including Paul's Social Security number and credit card numbers) to steal his identity. The identity thief had quickly accumulated $150,000 in unpaid bills in Paul's name. Paul's credit rating was ruined, and no one would extend him new credit.

Paul has sued Credit Union in the United States District Court for the District of State B for breach of the privacy provisions of the loan contract. The parties have stipulated that Paul's actual loss was $80,000. Paul's suit seeks $240,000 in damages, plus attorney's fees, pursuant to a State A statute that entitles victims of identity theft to recover treble damages and attorney's fees from anyone who wrongfully discloses their personal information. Paul's complaint also asserts that a federal statute restricting damages in state-law identity-theft cases to actual damages is unconstitutional and therefore does not preempt the treble damages provisions of the State A statute. The complaint asserts that the State B federal court has both diversity and federal-question jurisdiction over the case.

The long-arm statute of State B extends personal jurisdiction as far as the Constitution allows.

1. May the United States District Court for the District of State B exercise personal jurisdiction over Credit Union? Explain.

2. Does the United States District Court for the District of State B have diversity jurisdiction over the case? Explain.
3. Does the United States District Court for the District of State B have federal-question jurisdiction over the case? Explain.

CRIMINAL LAW QUESTION

Customer went to Star Computers (Star) to buy a refurbished computer. Upon arrival, Customer was approached by Owner, who identified himself as the owner of Star. Owner directed Customer to a refurbished desktop computer and told Customer, "We have the best refurbished computers in town. We send used computers to a computer technician who always installs new hard drives and replaces any defective parts." Owner made these claims because Owner believed that they would be effective in persuading Customer to buy a refurbished computer. In fact, Customer was persuaded by Owner's claims and purchased a computer for $250 cash.

At the time of this transaction, Owner did not believe that Star had the best refurbished computers in town. Owner was aware of at least two other computer stores in town and believed that the refurbished computers sold by these other stores were better than those sold by Star. Owner also thought it was very likely that the computer technician used by Star did not actually install new hard drives in the refurbished computers. Owner had never raised the issue with the technician because the technician offered much faster service and lower rates than those of any other technician in the area.

After Customer's purchase, a local news station conducted an investigation into the computer technician used by Star and reported that the technician did not install new hard drives in any of the computers she refurbished. After the report aired, the computer technician acknowledged that no new hard drives had been installed in the computers she had refurbished for Star.

Owner has been charged with larceny by false pretenses in connection with the computer sale to Customer.

Is Owner guilty of larceny by false pretenses? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

On December 30, X Corporation's legal record date, X Corporation had 100 shares of issued and outstanding common stock. Fifty shares were owned by Amy, 25 shares were owned by Brian, and 25 shares were owned by Carter. X Corporation also had 50 shares of stock that it previously had issued to, but later repurchased from, Amy.

On January 30, X Corporation's annual shareholders' meeting was validly held. Before the meeting, X Corporation's staff prepared a list of shareholders entitled to vote at the meeting and mailed proper notice to them. That notice stated that a proposal requiring shareholder approval would be voted on at the annual shareholders' meeting.

Before the annual shareholders' meeting and in a timely manner, Amy mailed in her duly executed proxy, directing the secretary of X Corporation to vote her 50 shares in favor of the proposal. However, before the annual shareholders' meeting date, Zach called the secretary of X Corporation and truthfully told the secretary that Amy's shares belonged to Zach because he had bought the shares from Amy on December 31. Zach then mailed the secretary a duly executed proxy directing the secretary of X Corporation to vote his 50 shares against the proposal.

Prior to the annual shareholders' meeting, Brian duly executed a proxy in favor of Dell. The proxy stated in its entirety, "I, Brian, hereby grant Dell full authority to vote my 25 shares of X Corporation at the January 30th annual shareholders' meeting." Dell timely mailed a duly executed proxy directing the secretary of X Corporation to vote Brian's 25 shares against the proposal. Dell also sent the secretary a copy of the proxy given to Dell by Brian. Brian, however, attended the annual meeting and voted his 25 shares in favor of the proposal.

Carter personally appeared at the annual shareholders' meeting and voted his 25 shares against the proposal.

X Corporation's president attended the annual meeting and, on behalf of X Corporation, voted the 50 shares that X Corporation had repurchased from Amy against the proposal.

X Corporation's Articles of Incorporation require an affirmative vote by the holders of two-thirds of the shares entitled to be voted to approve any proposal at a shareholders' meeting. The bylaws, on the other hand, require a unanimous vote of such shares to approve any proposal.

Your law firm represents X Corporation. You have been asked to advise the firm's senior partner on whether the proposal received sufficient votes to be approved. Explain your conclusion.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP ANALYSIS

(Agency and Partnership V.A.; VI.; VII.A. & B.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) What is the legal relationship among Fran, Gina, and Hank?
- (2) Is Ivan entitled to Gina's share of the monthly net profits of Petals?
- (3) Is Ivan entitled to inspect the books and records of Petals?
- (4) Is Fran entitled to use the delivery truck on Sundays to take her children to their soccer games?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Fran and Gina are general partners in the Petals partnership, but Hank is only a creditor of Petals. As a transferee of Gina's right to receive net profits in Petals, Ivan is legally entitled to Gina's share of those profits. However, that assignment does not make Ivan a partner. Therefore, Ivan does not have a right to inspect the books and records of Petals. Fran is not entitled to use the delivery truck on Sundays to take her children to their soccer games.

Fran and Gina are partners in Petals. Hank is a creditor of Petals.

A partnership is defined as "the association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit . . . whether or not the persons intend to form a partnership." UNIFORM PARTNERSHIP ACT (UPA) (1997) § 202(a); see also UPA (1914) § 6(1). Here, a partnership was formed when Gina joined Fran in running Petals. Because the partnership was formed without the formalities required of other types of partnerships, it is a general partnership.

Fran and Gina each receive a share of the net profits of Petals, and each is therefore presumed to be a partner in the business. UPA (1997) § 202(c)(3); UPA (1914) § 7(4). This presumption is supported by the fact that Gina is to receive her share of the net profits "for as long as Petals remains in business," and that Fran and Gina each work in the business and participate in the business planning for Petals. Further, Gina agreed to share in any losses that Petals might suffer. Therefore, Fran and Gina are partners in the Petals partnership.

Hank also receives a share of the net profits of Petals and, therefore, also might be presumed to be a partner in the partnership. However, this presumption does not apply where those profits are "received in payment of a debt by installment or otherwise." UPA (1997) § 202(c)(3)(i); UPA (1914) § 7(4)(a). The statement on the memo line of Hank's check is evidence that Hank loaned money to the partnership. Hank is entitled to receive a share of the net profits of Petals only until his loan (plus interest) to Petals is paid in full, and therefore he is not presumed to be a partner in the business. In addition, Hank did not agree to share in any losses that Petals might suffer. Further, Hank does not play any role in the day-to-day operations of Petals. Hank is a creditor of Petals, but is not a partner in the partnership.

Point Two (25%)

As the transferee of a legally transferable interest in the partnership, Ivan is legally entitled to receive distributions that Gina would otherwise have received.

As a partner in the Petals partnership (see Point One), Gina has a transferable interest in the profits and losses of the partnership and in her right to receive distributions. UPA (1997) § 502; UPA (1914) § 26. The transfer of that interest is permissible and creates in the transferee a right to receive distributions to which the transferor would otherwise be entitled. UPA (1997) § 503(b)(1); UPA (1914) § 27(1). Here, Gina transferred her right to receive a share of the net profits of Petals to Ivan when she assigned all of her interest in Petals to him. Therefore, Ivan is legally entitled to receive Gina's share of the net profits of Petals.

[NOTE: An applicant might add that a partnership need not give effect to a transferee's rights until it has notice of the transfer. UPA (1997) § 503(e). Here, the partnership had such notice because Gina gave Fran a copy of the letter effecting the transfer. An applicant might also note that the transfer of a partner's right to profits and losses and the right to receive distributions does not effect a termination or dissolution of the partnership.]

Ivan is not entitled to inspect the books and records of Petals because he is not a partner in Petals.

As a partner in the Petals partnership, Gina has a transferable interest in the partnership (see Point Two). That interest, however, is limited. For example, a transfer of the partnership interest does not make the transferee a partner unless the other partner or partners consent to making the transferee a partner. On our facts, such consent was not given because Fran said, "I don't want anything to do with Ivan." Therefore, Ivan did not become a partner and is not entitled to access information concerning partnership transactions nor to inspect or copy the partnership books or records. UPA § 503(a)(3); UPA (1914) § 27(1).

The delivery truck is partnership property, and Fran is not entitled to use it on Sundays to take her children to their soccer games.

Property is partnership property if it is acquired in the name of the partnership. UPA (1997) § 204(a)(1); UPA (1914) § 8(1). Partnership property is property of the partnership and not of the partners individually. UPA (1997) § 203; UPA (1914) § 25(1). Here, the delivery truck was purchased in the partnership's name and, therefore, is partnership property and not Fran's individual property. The facts do not suggest that the partners agreed that Fran could use the delivery truck for her own purposes on Sundays, and, absent such an agreement, Fran is not entitled to use the truck to take her children to their soccer games even if the partnership is not using the truck on that day.

[NOTE: Under § 27 of the UPA (1914) and § 503 of the UPA (1997), the transfer of all or any part of a partner's interest is not a dissolution of the partnership. Thus, Gina's gift to her son Ivan of her interest in the partnership does not dissolve the partnership.]

CONTRACTS/NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS ANALYSIS

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Is a seller bound by statements about goods made by him in conjunction with their sale?
- (2) Under what circumstances may a buyer revoke acceptance of goods that do not conform to the contract?
- (3) What are the rights of a buyer who has revoked acceptance of goods?
- (4) What are the rights of a holder of a dishonored check?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The transaction between Buyer and Seller is a contract for the sale of goods governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code, as well as by common law doctrines (e.g., involving fraud and misrepresentation) that supplement the Code. Under both UCC principles and common law principles, Seller's untrue statements about the brakes and clutch provide a basis for Buyer to avoid the contract, recover the purchase price, and recover any other allowable damages for losses that he may have suffered as a result of the breach.

The false statements about the brakes and the clutch were misrepresentations under common law principles. They also constituted express warranties under the UCC, which Seller breached because the statements were untrue. Under common law rules, Seller's misrepresentations provide a basis for Buyer to avoid the contract because the misrepresentations were fraudulent and material, they induced Buyer to complete the car purchase, and Buyer was justified in relying on them. Similarly, under the UCC, Buyer was entitled to revoke his acceptance of the car because acceptance was induced by Seller's false assurances. If Buyer avoids or rescinds the contract under common law principles, or revokes his acceptance under UCC rules, Buyer is entitled to return of any payments made plus any damages for breach of contract.

Checkco, as the holder of the check, can recover the amount of the check from Buyer (as drawer) or Seller (as indorser). Checkco is a holder in due course, and Buyer will have to pay the amount of the check even though the car did not conform to the contract.

Point One (20%)

Seller's statements about the brakes and clutch constituted express warranties that became part of the contract under the Uniform Commercial Code. They were also misrepresentations that could provide Buyer with a basis to avoid the contract under common law principles.

This is a contract for the sale of goods and as such is governed by Article 2 of the UCC. In addition, basic principles relating to fraud and misrepresentation can be applied to supplement the rules in the Code. See UCC § 1-103.

Buyer and Seller clearly entered into a contract for the sale of the car. There was offer and acceptance, and the basic terms of the bargain were reflected in a writing.

Under the UCC, affirmations of fact relating to the goods that are part of the basis of the bargain create express warranties that the goods will conform to those affirmations and descriptions. UCC § 2-313(1). Seller's statements that the brakes and clutch had been replaced were clearly such affirmations of fact and, thus, constituted express warranties. The more general statements that the car was in "tip-top shape" and was "good for another 100,000 miles," however, may be "an affirmation merely of the value of the goods or a statement purporting to be merely the seller's opinion or commendation of the goods" and, therefore, may not constitute express warranties. UCC § 2-313(2).

[NOTE: Although the warranties are not included in the writing the parties signed, UCC § 2-202 (Article 2's parol evidence rule) allows that writing to be supplemented by "consistent additional terms" unless the court finds that the writing was intended to be a "complete and exclusive" statement of the terms. There are no facts in the problem to suggest that the parties intended their writing to be the exclusive statement of their terms, and the express warranties made by Seller were not inconsistent with anything in the writing.]

Under common law principles, a misrepresentation is any "assertion that is not in accord with the facts," Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 159, and a misrepresentation is "material" if it is likely to induce assent to the contract, id. § 162. Here, Seller's misrepresentations about the brakes and the clutch were clearly not in accord with the facts, and were also the sort of claims that would contribute directly and substantially to a buyer's decision to purchase the car. Furthermore, there is strong reason to believe that Seller's statements were fraudulent, as Seller very likely knew that the brakes and clutch had not been repaired within the last six months (although the facts are not completely clear on this point). Seller will be bound by his fraudulent or material misrepresentations. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 164 (buyer may void a contract if assent is induced by a fraudulent or material misrepresentation on which the buyer is justified in relying).

Buyer accepted the car, but was entitled to revoke his acceptance under UCC rules because the car's nonconformity substantially impaired its value to him and because the car was accepted without discovery of the nonconformity and acceptance was induced by Seller's false assurances. Under the common law doctrine of misrepresentation, Buyer may avoid the contract because his assent to it was induced by Seller's misrepresentations.

Buyer took the car and drove it for a week. Since this time span was well beyond a reasonable period in which to inspect the car, Buyer's failure to reject the car means that he accepted it. UCC § 2-606. Having accepted the goods, Buyer can no longer reject them. UCC § 2-607(2). However, under proper circumstances, a buyer can revoke acceptance of goods. See UCC § 2-

608. In particular, a buyer may revoke acceptance if (i) the goods do not conform to the contract, (ii) the nonconformity “substantially impairs” the value of the goods to the buyer, and (iii) the buyer accepted the goods either on the reasonable assumption that a nonconformity would be cured or without discovery of a nonconformity if acceptance was induced by either difficulty of discovery before acceptance or the seller’s assurances; revocation must occur within a reasonable time after the buyer discovers or should have discovered the nonconformity and before any change in condition of the goods not caused by the nonconformity. Id.

In this case, all conditions for revocation are met. First, there is no doubt that the goods do not conform to the contract. The car was warranted to have new brakes and a new clutch. (See Point One.) Second, it is obvious that those nonconformities substantially impair the value of the car to Buyer. Third, Buyer accepted the car without discovery of the nonconformities, and this acceptance was induced by Seller’s false assurances. Moreover, Buyer communicated the revocation to Seller immediately upon learning of the grounds for it, and there was no change in the condition of the car that was unrelated to its nonconformity. Therefore, Buyer’s revocation is effective. See UCC § 2-608(2).

Under the common law doctrine of misrepresentation, a buyer can avoid (rescind) a contract if his assent was induced by fraudulent or material misrepresentations and he was justified in relying on those misrepresentations. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 164. Those conditions are met here. Although the facts do not explicitly say so, Buyer asked specifically about the car’s condition and even contemplated taking it to a mechanic. Seller’s specific statements about the recent work done on the brakes and clutch (relatively expensive items to repair) probably were a significant factor in Buyer’s decision to assent to the contract without inspection. See id. § 167, cmt. a (“It is enough that the manifestation substantially contributed to his decision to make the contract.”) Buyer was justified in relying on Seller’s statements about the car’s condition, as Seller was in possession of the car, was offering it for sale, and represented that he knew its condition. Under these circumstances, Buyer can avoid the contract as a result of Seller’s misrepresentations.

Because Buyer’s revocation of acceptance is effective, Buyer may cancel the contract, recover the purchase price that has been paid, and recover any damages. If Buyer chooses to rescind or avoid the contract under common law principles, Buyer is entitled to restitution of the purchase price that has been paid, and may also recover any damages.

A buyer who has justifiably revoked acceptance of goods is entitled to recover so much of the price as has been paid. See UCC § 2-711. Similarly, a buyer who rescinds a contract due to a seller’s misrepresentation is entitled to restitution of any portion of the purchase price that has been paid. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 376. Thus, Buyer is no longer obligated to pay for the car and can recover the purchase price that has been paid (the $4,000 in cash and the $1,000 amount of the check).

Moreover, Buyer is also entitled to damages under UCC § 2-712 or § 2-713. Under UCC § 2-713, Buyer is entitled to the difference between the market price of a car conforming to the contract and the contract price, plus incidental and consequential damages. Because, according to the mechanic, the market price of a car conforming to the contract was equal to the contract price, Buyer is entitled only to any incidental and consequential damages under UCC § 2-713. Alternatively, under UCC § 2-712, Buyer may “cover” by buying a car in substitution for the car bought from Seller. Such a covering purchase must be a commercially reasonable substitute as opposed to an upgrade to a better car. If Buyer makes a covering purchase, Buyer may recover the excess, if any, of the cover price over the contract price of $5,000, plus incidental and consequential damages. UCC § 2-712(2). Pursuant to UCC § 2-721, these additional remedies are also available to a buyer who chooses to rescind the contract based on a claim of material misrepresentation or fraud.

Checkco, as a holder of the check, can assert a claim for the amount of the check against either Seller or Buyer.

The facts state that Buyer paid $1,000 of the purchase price of the car with a check drawn on First Bank. A check is a negotiable instrument governed by Article 3 of the Uniform Commercial Code. UCC § 3-104. Buyer was the “drawer” of the check. See UCC § 3-103(a)(3). Seller was an “indorser.” See UCC § 3-204(b).

If a check is dishonored, the drawer (Buyer, in this case) has an obligation “to pay [it] . . . according to its terms at the time it was issued” to a “person entitled to enforce” it. UCC § 3-414(b). Similarly, if a check is dishonored, an indorser (Seller, in this case) has an obligation to pay the amount of the check to a person entitled to enforce it. See UCC § 3-415(a). The refusal of First Bank to pay the check when it was presented by Checkco constituted dishonor. UCC § 3-502(b)(2).

A “holder” of a check is a person entitled to enforce it. UCC § 3-301. When Seller indorsed the check in blank (i.e., by signing only his name), the check became payable to the bearer. UCC § 3-205(b). When Seller handed this “bearer instrument” to Checkco, Checkco became a holder of the check because it was in possession of an instrument that was payable to the bearer. UCC § 1-201(b)(21)(A). Thus, under UCC §§ 3-414 and 3-415, Buyer and Seller are liable to Checkco for the amount of the check.

[NOTE: Seller is liable on the check because Seller indorsed it. Some applicants might also note that Seller could be liable to Checkco for breach of a transfer warranty because, at the time Seller transferred the check to Checkco, Seller would have been aware that Buyer had a defense to payment of the instrument. UCC § 3-416(a). An examinee might be given credit for a correct analysis of this point, but the more direct route to Seller’s liability is that Seller has an indorser’s obligation to pay the holder of a dishonored instrument. UCC § 3-415(a).]

Checkco is a holder in due course and will not be subject to defenses that may be asserted by either Seller or Buyer.

Seller has no defenses to his obligation under UCC § 3-415, so Checkco may recover from Seller. Buyer, however, might claim that he has a defense to that obligation or a “claim in recoupment” arising from Seller’s breach of contract in the transaction that gave rise to the check. If Checkco qualifies as a holder in due course, Buyer will not be able to raise any claims in recoupment and will be able to raise only the four “real” defenses listed in UCC § 3-305(a)(1). None of those defenses (infancy, illegality of the transaction, fraud that induced the obligor to sign the instrument without knowledge of or reasonable opportunity to learn its terms, and discharge in insolvency proceedings) is present. Thus, if Checkco is a holder in due course, it will be able to recover from Buyer despite the fact that Seller breached the contract giving rise to the check.

A holder in due course is a holder of an instrument who takes an instrument that is not questionable on its face for value, in good faith, and without notice of, inter alia, any defenses to it. UCC § 3-302(a).

Each of these elements has been fulfilled. First, it has already been established that Checkco is a holder. Second, there are no facts to suggest that the check was questionable on its face. Third, Checkco took the check for value because it performed its promise of paying $950 for it. See UCC § 3-303(a)(1). The fact that $950 is less than the face amount of the check is irrelevant. Fourth, Checkco appears to have taken the check in good faith. “Good faith” is defined to include “honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing.” UCC § 3-103(a)(4). Nothing in these facts suggests a lack of good faith on the part of Checkco. There is no evidence of dishonesty and no indication that its actions were outside the bounds of commercial standards of fair dealing. Finally, there are no facts to suggest that Checkco had notice of any defenses to the check.

Accordingly, Checkco is a holder in due course and may recover from Buyer notwithstanding the fact that Seller breached the contract giving rise to the check.

[NOTE: Of course, Checkco is entitled to only one recovery.]

Legal Problems

- (1) Did Testator execute a valid will when he did not sign the only page containing bequests, but all three pages of the will were physically present at the time he signed the last page and Testator intended them to be his will?
- (2) Was Testator's handwritten codicil valid?
- (3) Did Testator revoke the bequest to Sister by striking out the clause in his will giving her $20,000?
- (4) Does Testator's gift to "children" include adopted children and nonmarital children?
- (5) May a court reform Testator's will when Testator's likely intention conflicts with the will as drafted?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under the doctrine of integration, all pages of a will that are together when the last page is signed and witnessed are deemed to have been validly executed. Thus, Testator's will is valid. Testator's handwritten codicil is invalid because it was neither signed by Testator nor witnessed. However, although crossing out a portion of a will (here, the bequest to Sister) would normally revoke that bequest under this state's law, because of the doctrine of dependent relative revocation, Testator's bequest to Sister was not revoked because it appears that Testator struck out this bequest on the mistaken assumption that the handwritten codicil was valid. In all states, a gift to children includes adopted and marital children. In most states, a gift to children would include a nonmarital child if clear and convincing evidence of paternity was available. Although Testator appears to have intended to benefit only some of his children, Abby and Bruce, the will gives the residuary estate to all of Testator's "children," and most courts do not allow the admission of extrinsic evidence to alter the plain meaning of a will. Thus, Sister would receive $20,000 from Testator's estate and the balance would likely be distributed, in equal shares, to Abby, Bruce, Carl, and Don, if Don can establish Testator's paternity.

If the will was not validly executed Testator would have died intestate and his estate would be distributed only to his heirs. His heirs would be Abby, Bruce, and Carl in all states and, depending upon the state rules relating to proof of paternity, possibly Don.

Point One (25%)

Because all pages of Testator's will were present at the same time that Testator signed the last page of his will and the pages were intended by Testator to be his will, the will is valid.

Under the relevant state statute, a will, to be valid, must be signed by the testator and witnessed by two witnesses. Like all wills statutes, the statute applicable here does not require that the pages of the will be stapled or that the testator and witnesses sign each page.

Under the doctrine of integration, a multi-page will is valid even if only the last page is executed as long as the proponent of the will can establish that all pages were physically present and together when the testator and witnesses signed the last page of the will and that each page was intended by the testator to be part of his will. See THOMPSON ON WILLS § 124 (3d ed. 1947); 2 PAGE ON THE LAW OF WILLS §§ 19.10, 19.11 (2003). Here, all three pages of the will were present and together when Testator signed the will, and Testator intended the document to be his will. The proponent of the will may also rely upon a presumption that all pages of the will were present and together when the last page was signed if the pages, when read together, set out an orderly dispositional plan. See THOMPSON, supra, § 105; Comment, Wills: Integration and Incorporation by Reference, 4 BAYLOR L. REV. 211 (1952); Comment, Wills—Integration, 50 MICH. L. REV. 915 (1952). Here, page 1 of the will contained a bequest consistent with Testator's instructions to the attorney, and this page was followed by other pages containing matters commonly included in wills.

In sum, the will was executed properly and is valid.

Testator's handwritten codicil to the will is invalid because state law requires all testamentary provisions to be signed by the testator and witnessed by two attesting witnesses.

Under state law, all testamentary provisions, to be valid, must be signed by the testator and witnessed by two attesting witnesses. Here, Testator attempted to change the bequest to Sister with a handwritten, unsigned, and unwitnessed writing. This provision is ineffective under state law.

Point Three (30%)

Notwithstanding the fact that Testator crossed out the bequest to Sister, the bequest is not revoked. Under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation, a revocation based on a mistaken assumption of law or fact (here, the validity of the handwritten bequest) is not given effect if it appears that the testator would not have revoked his will or some portion thereof had he known the truth.

Testator crossed out the bequest to Sister with the intention of substituting for it a larger bequest. This alternative bequest was invalid because it was neither witnessed nor signed by Testator. (See Point Two.)

Under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation, if a testator revokes a will or bequest based on a mistaken assumption of law or fact, the revocation is ineffective if it appears that the testator would not have revoked the bequest had he had accurate information. Here, Testator's cancellation of the bequest to Sister was motivated by a desire to give Sister more money. Had Testator known that the alternative larger bequest would be invalid, he would not have wanted to cancel the lesser bequest to Sister, leaving her with nothing at all. Thus, under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation, the revocation of the bequest to Sister is ignored and she is entitled to the $20,000. See WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN & SHELDON F. KURTZ, 242–43 (3d ed. 2004).

Point Four (25%)

The bequest to “my children” would include Testator’s two biological children born during marriage and his adopted stepchild. It is unclear whether it would include Testator’s nonmarital child.

State laws generally provide that the word “children” in a will should be interpreted consistently with the definition of the word “children” used in determining rights to intestate succession. See, e.g., UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-705.

Biological children born to a married couple and adopted children are included within the category of children entitled to take through intestate succession. Thus, Abby, Bruce, and Carl are all included in Testator’s bequest to his “children.” See MCGOVERN & KURTZ, supra, at 100–04.

In all states, a nonmarital child (here, Don) is included within a bequest to children only if paternity is established under the relevant statute. In most states, paternity for purposes of intestate succession may be established by evidence of subsequent marriage of the parents, by acknowledgment by the father, by an adjudication of paternity during the life of the father, or by other clear and convincing evidence. See JESSE DUKEMINIER & STANLEY M. JOHANSON, WILLS, TRUSTS, AND ESTATES 115 (6th ed. 2000). It is unclear whether Testator’s paternity of Don was adjudicated or acknowledged during Testator’s lifetime; it is also unclear whether there is clear and convincing evidence of Testator’s paternity.

In sum, it is uncertain whether Testator’s nonmarital child, Don, will be included within the bequest to Testator’s “children.”

[NOTE: If evidence of Testator’s paternity is not currently available, Don might seek an order requiring decedent’s marital children to submit to blood testing in order to establish Testator’s paternity; some courts have granted such petitions. See Sudwischer v. Estate of Hoffpauir, 589 So. 2d 474 (La. 1991). In recent years, some courts have also permitted exhumation of a decedent’s remains for purposes of establishing paternity. See Brancato v. Moriscato, 2003 WL 1090596, 34 Conn. L. Rptr. 208 (Super. Ct. 2003). Other courts have refused to grant such requests. See In re Estate of Bonanno, 745 N.Y.S.2d 813 (Sur. Ct. 2002) (request for exhumation denied when postmortem DNA analysis of decedent’s blood samples established that petitioner was not decedent’s son).]

Most jurisdictions disallow reformation of a will to correct a mistake. In those states, the bequest to “my children” would stand despite Testator’s apparent intention to benefit only his biological children, Abby and Bruce.

The fact that Testator identified only Abby and Bruce as his children when talking with his lawyer is unlikely to result in an interpretation of the will limiting the word “children” to Abby and Bruce. Although the “controlling consideration in determining the meaning of a donative document is the donor’s intention” (RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY: WILLS AND OTHER DONATIVE TRANSFERS § 10.1 (2003)), a majority of jurisdictions bar the admission of extrinsic evidence to vary the literal meaning of the words used in a will and refuse to allow reformation of a will to correct a mistake. "Hypothetical or imaginary mistakes of testators cannot be corrected. . . . The only means for ascertaining the intent of the testator are the words written and the acts done by him." Sanderson v. Norcross, 136 N.E. 170, 172 (Mass. 1922). Under this formalist approach, Testator's attorney could not testify that Testator intended to leave his estate to only Abby and Bruce, based on their conversations.

In recent years, a few states have begun to move away from the formalist approach and toward the more liberal approach adopted in the Restatement (Third) of Property. Under the Restatement, a court may reform even an unambiguous donative document based on clear and convincing evidence of (a) a mistake of fact or law or (b) the donor's intention. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY: WILLS AND OTHER DONATIVE TRANSFERS § 12.1; Estate of Herceg, 747 N.Y.S.2d 901 (Sur. Ct. 2002) (reforming will based on drafting attorney's testimony that omission of particular beneficiary was due to computer error); UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-805 (2008 amendment). Using this approach, a court would admit the attorney's testimony to show that Testator's bequest to "children" was based on a mistake of law (the meaning of "children" for purposes of intestate succession) and that Testator intended to benefit only Abby and Bruce. However, it is unclear whether such testimony would meet a clear and convincing evidentiary standard given that Testator did not discuss his intentions toward Carl and Don with the attorney.

In sum, Abby and Bruce will certainly take a share of Testator's estate. It is highly probable, but not certain, that Carl will. It is uncertain whether Don will as well, depending on whether Testator's nonmarital children are included in the class gift to "children" under state law. See Point Four.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) May a municipality prohibit leafleting in a public forum based on an anti-leafleting rationale?
- (2) May a public school deny use of classroom space to a student religious group when, by making that space available to other student groups, it has created a limited public forum?
- (3) May a speaker be convicted for trespassing on government property that is not a public forum when the government has an interest unrelated to speech in preventing the trespass?

DISCUSSION

Summary

For First Amendment purposes, there are three types of forums: the public forum, the limited public forum, and the nonpublic forum. A public street or sidewalk is a public forum. In a public forum, the state may not regulate speech based on its content, nor may it penalize speech based on an anti-leafleting rationale. Thus, Homestead may not fine Chapter under the anti-leafleting ordinance.

When a governmental entity deliberately opens government property to the public for meetings or other forms of speech, it creates a limited public forum subject to the same First Amendment requirements as a traditional public forum. Thus, because High School created a limited public forum, Principal may not deny Church Club the right to use that forum.

In a nonpublic forum, governmental actors may restrict speech as long as their actions are reasonable and content-neutral. Principal's office was a nonpublic forum because it was clearly off-limits to the public except by invitation, and Principal's actions were reasonable under the circumstances. Thus, Father has no First Amendment grounds to vacate his trespass conviction.

Homestead cannot enforce its anti-leafleting ordinance against Chapter because a municipality must allow speech in a traditional public forum even if doing so imposes costs on the municipality.

The First Amendment, as applied to the states and local governments through incorporation in the Fourteenth Amendment, applies to Homestead's enforcement of its anti-leafleting ordinance, which is a state action.

Although the United States Supreme Court once granted local governments broad powers to regulate speech in streets and parks, see Davis v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts, 167 U.S. 43 (1897), for the better part of a century, the Court has treated a public street or sidewalk as a First Amendment “public forum.” In a public forum, government may regulate speech only if certain conditions are met. If the regulation is not content-neutral, it must meet the requirements of strict scrutiny. If the regulation is content-neutral, it must meet the requirements of intermediate scrutiny; to pass muster under this standard, the regulation must impose only reasonable restrictions on the time, place, or manner of speech that are narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest, and it must leave open ample alternative opportunities to engage in speech. See Ward v. Rock against Racism, 491 U.S. 781 (1989); ERWIN CHEMERINSKY, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW: PRINCIPLES AND POLICIES 1127 (3d ed. 2006).

Here, Homestead’s regulation of speech under its anti-leafletting ordinance is content-neutral; the ordinance forbids one means of communication, leafletting, without regard to the content of the speech. Thus, Homestead must show that its ordinance passes intermediate rather than strict scrutiny.

The Homestead ordinance is unlikely to pass muster under intermediate scrutiny because Homestead has not left open an alternative channel for the prohibited speech. Instead of regulating the time, place, and manner of leafletting, Homestead has banned it entirely. Particularly where a form of speech is inexpensive and available to all, a governmental entity may not prohibit it altogether. See City of Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43, 56 (1994).

The fact that the prohibited speech imposes costs upon the governmental entity does not alter this result. In the seminal case of Schneider v. State of New Jersey, Town of Irvington, 308 U.S. 147 (1939), the Supreme Court struck down an anti-leafletting ordinance much like the Homestead ordinance. In so doing, the Court held that

“the purpose to keep the streets clean and of good appearance is insufficient to justify an ordinance which prohibits a person rightfully on a public street from handing literature to one willing to receive it. Any burden imposed upon the city authorities in cleaning and caring for the streets as an indirect consequence of such distribution results from the constitutional protection of the freedom of speech and press.” Id. at 162.

Thus, Homestead may not fine Chapter for leafletting.

Point Two (35%)

A public school that makes classroom space available to student groups has created a limited public forum and may not discriminate as to use of that forum based on the content of speech. Thus High School cannot deny use of a classroom after school hours to Church Club.

A “limited public forum” (also known as a “designated public forum”) is created when a governmental entity could close a location to speech but instead opens it to speech. All the rules applicable to a traditional public forum apply to a limited public forum. Thus, under the First Amendment, as applied to the states and local governments through incorporation in the Fourteenth Amendment, the government may not discriminate among speakers based upon the content of their speech. See CHEMERINSKY, supra, at 1137.

There is no exception to the requirement of content neutrality when religious speech is at issue. The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that, in a public forum, religious speech stands on an equal footing with nonreligious speech, and content-neutral access rules do not violate the Establishment Clause. Many of the cases have involved student or community groups that wanted to use, for religious speech, limited public forums created by public schools. See, e.g., Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981); Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School Dist., 508 U.S. 384 (1993); Good News Club v. Milford Central School, 533 U.S. 98 (2001). In Good News, the case most like this one, the Supreme Court held that, when a school opens its classrooms for use by student groups, it creates a limited public forum and may not deny access to a student religious club that intends to use the classroom for prayer based on the religious content of that speech. The Court also held that a school that opens its facilities to religious speech under a content-neutral policy does not violate the Establishment Clause under the standard established in Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 642 (1971). See Good News, 533 U.S. at 103–04.

Thus, High School may not deny Church Club use of its classrooms for after-school meetings.

Point Three (25%)

The First Amendment does not shield Father from a trespass conviction. First, government can regulate conduct that is not imbued with communicative value. Second, even if the conduct has communicative value, the state can regulate such conduct in a nonpublic forum if the state's interest is important or substantial, and is unrelated to the suppression of expression, and if the regulation is no greater than necessary to serve the state's interest. Here, Principal's office was a nonpublic forum, Father's act of trespass was not communicative, and High School had an important and substantial interest in preventing trespassers from entering Principal's office.

Father was convicted for his physical entry into Principal's office, not for what he said while there. The act of marching into Principal's office—which is the act for which Father was convicted—is not conduct imbued with communicative value and does not implicate the First Amendment. Thus, Father's trespass conviction will likely survive a First Amendment challenge.

Even if Father's conduct is viewed as conduct imbued with communicative value because he entered Principal's office to express an opinion, the conviction would be upheld under United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968). The test in that case is whether a law that regulates speech-related conduct serves an interest within the government's regulatory powers that is important or substantial and that is both unrelated to the suppression of expression and no greater than necessary to serve the state's interest. Here, Principal's office was clearly not a public forum. The door was closed, a sign announced that there was “no admittance without an appointment,” and Principal was meeting with another parent at the time that Father marched in. High School clearly has a legitimate and important interest in prohibiting trespassers from entering Principal's office where private conversations about individual students or official school business may be taking place. High School's interest is not related to suppression of expression. Moreover, the means of protecting that interest (prohibiting admittance without appointment) are closely related to advancement of High School's interest.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) What interest did School acquire in Blackacre and what interest did Owner retain?
- (2) Did School breach the condition or limitation in the deed from Owner when it stopped using the building erected on Blackacre to teach students and began using it for administrative purposes?
- (3) If Owner retained a future interest in Blackacre, did the statute of limitations run on that interest?
- (4) What interests, if any, do Ann and Mary have in Blackacre?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Owner conveyed either a fee simple determinable or a fee simple on condition subsequent to School. Because the Owner-to-School deed used language that did not conform to the classic formulations for creating either of these interests, it is unclear which interest School acquired. However, in the case of an ambiguous conveyance, there is a presumption in favor of the fee simple on condition subsequent.

If School has a fee simple on condition subsequent, either (1) Owner retained nothing to pass to Daughter because the Owner-to-School deed did not expressly specify that Owner retained a power of termination, or (2) Owner retained an implied power of termination which passed to Daughter and then through Daughter's estate to Ann and possibly, upon Bill's death, to Mary as well.

If School has a fee simple determinable, then Owner's retained possibility of reverter passed through Daughter's estate at least to Ann and possibly to Mary.

Any cause of action for breach of the condition or limitation (depending on the interest created in the School) accrued only three years ago and, thus, the statute of limitations on that action has not run.

Of course, whether School's interest has been lost depends upon whether using Blackacre for administrative purposes violates the requirement of using the property to teach children aged 5 to 13, which it probably does.

Point One (45%)

The terms of the conveyance to School were ambiguous. In construing an ambiguous instrument, courts typically adopt a preference for the fee simple on condition subsequent. If so construed, it is unclear what interest, if any, Owner retained. It is either no interest or a right of entry for condition broken (also called a “power of termination”). If, on the other hand, School acquired a fee simple determinable in Blackacre, then Owner retained a possibility of reverter.

If the Owner-to-School deed conveyed a fee simple determinable to School, then Owner retained a possibility of reverter, which became possessory immediately upon the happening of the event designated in the instrument. JOSEPH W. SINGER, INTRODUCTION TO PROPERTY 309 (2d ed. 2005). If, instead, the Owner-to-School deed conveyed a fee simple on condition subsequent, Owner may or may not have a power of termination or right of entry for condition broken, depending on whether the court would be willing to imply a forfeiture provision when none was expressly set forth in the deed. See RICHARD POWELL, REAL PROPERTY § 1:13.06[3] (Patrick J. Rohan ed., 1990); THOMPSON ON REAL PROPERTY § 17.01(d) (David A. Thomas ed., 1994).

Here, Owner conveyed Blackacre to School “if School uses Blackacre only to teach children aged 5 to 13.” The language of the deed does not conform to the paradigms for creating either a fee simple determinable or a fee simple on condition subsequent. To create a fee simple determinable, the typical formulation would be “to School, so long as it uses Blackacre only to teach children aged 5 to 13.” To create a fee simple on condition subsequent, the typical formulation would be “to School, but if School does not use Blackacre only to teach children 5 to 13, then the grantor may reenter and reclaim Blackacre.” See SHELDON F. KURTZ, MOYNIHAN’S INTRODUCTION TO THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY 44–48 (4th ed. 2005).

In this case, the deed language is ambiguous. The word “if” in the deed expresses the language of condition and suggests an intent to create a fee simple on condition subsequent, but the deed’s lack of an express, retained power of termination suggests the intention to instead create a fee simple determinable. On the other hand, the deed’s failure to use the typical formulation for creating a fee simple determinable, coupled with the absence of any language suggesting that Owner intended to retain a possibility of reverter (e.g., “Blackacre shall revert”), suggests that Owner did not intend to convey a fee simple determinable, but instead a fee simple on condition subsequent.

Where the terms of a conveyance are ambiguous, courts construe the instrument to effectuate the grantor’s intentions. In construing an ambiguous instrument, courts typically adopt a preference for the fee simple on condition subsequent. See id. at 48; WILLIAM B. STOEBUCK & DALE A. WHITMAN, THE LAW OF PROPERTY 44 (3d ed. 2000).

Here, it doesn’t matter whether the court finds that the Owner-to-School deed created a fee simple determinable or fee simple on condition subsequent if, in the latter case, it also implies a forfeiture provision. Either construction would allow Owner to regain possession of Blackacre if School ceased using Blackacre only to teach children aged 5 to 13. The only practical difference that flows from these two constructions is that the fee simple on condition subsequent would require Owner (or his successors) to first make a demand, and the fee simple determinable would not because it becomes possessory immediately upon the happening of the limitation. In either case, the holder might have to sue the School to enforce her rights if Blackacre is not vacated voluntarily by School.

If, however, the court construes the deed as creating a fee simple on condition subsequent and does not imply a power of termination, then School has what amounts to a fee simple absolute because no one has the power of termination or right of entry for condition broken. In this case, School’s decision to discontinue use of Blackacre for teaching children aged 5 to 13 has no effect on School’s interest in Blackacre.

[NOTE: Applicants who conclude that School has a fee simple on condition subsequent may fail to realize that a right of entry must be expressly reserved in the deed and, thus, fail to discuss a court's reluctance to find a forfeiture.]

[NOTE: An applicant's conclusion on how the deed should be construed is much less important than demonstrating an understanding of the consequences that flow from the various constructions.]

Point Two (10%)

School has likely ceased using Blackacre "only to teach children aged 5 to 13." If Owner is treated as having either a possibility of reverter or a right of entry for condition broken (power of termination), then School's interest can come to an end and, subject to Point Four, Blackacre passes to the successors of Owner's estate. Otherwise, School continues to own Blackacre.

There is a factual question as to whether ceasing to only teach children aged 5 to 13 in the building on Blackacre and then using that building for administrative purposes is inconsistent with language in the deed from Owner to School. See Mahrenholz v. County Bd. of School Trustees of Lawrence County, 417 N.E.2d 138 (Ill. Ct. App. 1981). Here again applicants can make an argument either way, but the stronger argument appears to be that the terminating event occurred. No teaching appears to be going on in the building; rather, it is being used for administrative purposes, and that use seems to be beyond the intended purpose set forth in the Owner-School deed.

Point Three (10%)

If Owner's successors have an interest in Blackacre, the statute of limitations has not run on that interest.

Whether Owner conveyed to School a fee simple determinable or a fee simple on condition subsequent, the state statute of limitations applicable to actions for possession permits actions within "10 years after the cause of action accrues."

Because School ceased using Blackacre for the permitted purposes only three years ago, the period in which an action for possession may be brought has not yet expired.

Point Four (35%)

Ann has an interest in Blackacre if Owner retained either a possibility of reverter or a power of termination. In some jurisdictions, Mary (Bill's widow) would also have such an interest. If Owner retained only a power of termination, Ann will have to assert that right by exercising the power because possession will not automatically inure to her as it would have if Owner had retained a possibility of reverter.

If Owner retained a future interest in Blackacre, that interest passed to Daughter upon Owner's death because state law provides that such an interest is devisable. Upon Daughter's death, Daughter's devisable interest passed to Husband for life, with the remainder to "my surviving children."

Although Daughter was survived by two children, one of them, Bill, predeceased Husband. According to the Restatement of Property, which expresses what appears to be the current majority view, a survivorship contingency like that contained in Daughter's will applies at the termination of the interests that precede distribution of the remainder. See RESTATEMENT

OF PROPERTY § 251 (1940). In this case, that point is Husband's death. Thus, under the Restatement approach, Mary has no interest in Blackacre because Bill, having predeceased Husband, had no interest in Blackacre to devise to Mary. This approach is typically justified on the ground that a testator would want an interest in property to pass only to children who could take possession.

There is another view that interprets a survivorship contingency to require surviving only the testator (here, Daughter) and not the life tenant (here, Husband). This view is typically justified by a preference for early vesting of estates. If it applies, then Bill's interest passed to Mary. See 3 POWELL ON REAL PROPERTY ¶ 27.03[2] (Michael Allen Wolf ed., LexisNexis Matthew Bender 2008).

If Owner bequeathed a possibility of reverter in Blackacre, instead of a power of termination, then Ann (and Mary, in a state that follows the non-Restatement view) is entitled to immediate possession of Blackacre. If Owner retained and bequeathed only a power of termination, then Ann's (and, in a non-Restatement jurisdiction, Mary's) interest would not become possessory until and unless the power of termination was exercised.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Under what circumstances is a premarital agreement enforceable?
- (2) What property is subject to division at divorce?
- (3) When is an alimony award appropriate?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Although state rules governing the enforceability of a premarital agreement vary considerably, a premarital agreement will generally be enforced unless the party against whom enforcement is sought can show involuntariness, inadequate disclosure by the other spouse, or unconscionability. Although Husband cannot show involuntariness or inadequate disclosure, it is possible that he can show unconscionability if this jurisdiction evaluates unconscionability at the time enforcement of the agreement is sought. If the agreement is unenforceable, in most states Husband's inherited real estate would not be divisible at divorce; the marital home titled in Wife's name would be, and Wife's pension would be partly marital and partly separate. In considering whether to award alimony, courts consider a variety of factors, including the parties' ages, length of the marriage, contributions by both parties, and the parties' physical and mental health. Here, it is unclear whether a court would award Husband alimony.

Point One (50%)

In determining whether a premarital agreement governing property distribution at divorce is enforceable, courts consider whether the agreement was voluntarily made, whether it is unconscionable, and whether disclosure of assets and obligations was made. The weight assigned to these factors varies from state to state. Here, Husband may have a basis for challenging the validity of the premarital agreement in a state that allows a court to strike down an agreement based on unconscionability at the time enforcement is sought.

Although courts were once hostile to premarital agreements, today all states permit spouses to contract premaritally with respect to rights and obligations in property. In all states, the enforceability of such agreements turns on three factors: voluntariness, unconscionability, and disclosure. How courts apply these factors varies significantly from one state to the next. In many states, an agreement is unenforceable if the party against whom enforcement is sought succeeds in showing any one of the three factors: involuntariness, unconscionability, or inadequate disclosure.

Under the Uniform Premarital Agreement Act (UPAA), which has been adopted in 27 jurisdictions, the party against whom enforcement is sought must prove (1) involuntariness or (2) that “the agreement was unconscionable when it was executed” and that he or she did not receive or waive “fair and reasonable” disclosure and “did not have, or reasonably could not have had, an adequate knowledge” of the other’s assets and obligations. UNIF. PREMARITAL AGREEMENT ACT § 6(a). Thus, under the UPAA, a court may not refuse to enforce a premarital agreement based on unconscionability unless the court also finds lack of adequate disclosure or knowledge.

Under the UPAA, Husband and Wife’s premarital agreement would be enforceable. The facts show that Husband and Wife both disclosed their assets, and there is no evidence that Husband signed the agreement involuntarily. Although lack of independent legal advice is a factor in determining whether a party entered into an agreement voluntarily, Husband had ample opportunity to obtain legal counsel and decided against it. Husband also had ample time to review the agreement before signing it, and, perhaps most importantly, he proposed the agreement. See ROBERT E. OLIPHANT & NANCY VER STEEGH, FAMILY LAW §§ 14.11, 14.13 (2d ed. 2007); Hengel v. Hengel, 365 N.W.2d 16 (Wis. Ct. App. 1985) (agreement upheld when wife received proposed agreement two weeks before wedding and had it reviewed by legal counsel).

In states that have not adopted the UPAA, courts employ a range of standards. In most of these states, a court may invalidate a premarital agreement on grounds of unconscionability even if both parties have fully disclosed their assets. In evaluating unconscionability, some states require courts to determine whether the agreement was unconscionable when signed; others require a determination of unconscionability at the time of divorce; yet other states permit courts to invalidate an agreement based on unconscionability at either point in time or to invalidate an agreement simply because it is unfair. And some states specifically disallow spousal support waivers or apply special standards to such waivers. See HARRY D. KRAUSE, ET AL., FAMILY LAW: CASES, COMMENTS AND QUESTIONS 208 (6th ed. 2007).

Here, the agreement initially benefited Husband by ensuring payment of his debts and protecting him against his own imprudent speculation; if unconscionability is analyzed at the time the agreement was signed, the court will likely find it enforceable. At the time of divorce, however, the agreement is arguably unconscionable in that it would grant Wife not only all marital assets, but also Husband’s inherited real estate, an asset that, in most states, would be Husband’s separate property. (See Point Two.) Moreover, Husband has suffered a serious injury and might succeed in establishing that he is incapable of self-support. Thus, in a state that permits invalidation of an agreement based on unconscionability at the time of divorce, a court could find that the premarital agreement between Husband and Wife is unconscionable and unenforceable. In a state that disallows spousal support waivers, this provision might also be struck down even if the property division provision were upheld.

[NOTE: A number of states that have adopted the UPAA have varied its enforcement provisions. For example, although the UPAA provides that “parties to a premarital agreement may contract with respect to . . . the modification or elimination of spousal support,” UPAA § 3(a)(4), some UPAA states have disallowed spousal support waivers (see S.D. CODIFIED LAWS § 25-2-18 (2009); Sanford v. Sanford, 694 N.W.2d 283 (S.D. 2005)) or allowed such waivers only in limited circumstances. See 750 ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. § 10/7 (West 2010) (a spousal-support waiver is unenforceable if it causes the waiving spouse undue hardship in light of circumstances not reasonably foreseeable at the time of signing). Some states permit a court to invalidate a premarital agreement on grounds of unconscionability even when there has been full asset disclosure. See, e.g., WIS. STAT. ANN. § 766.58(6) (2009).]

Point Two (30%)

Unless a valid premarital agreement specifies otherwise, in most states, property acquired during the marriage through spousal effort is divisible at divorce, but property acquired through gift, descent, or devise is not. Thus Husband could be awarded part of Wife's pension and a share in the marital home.

In all states, a divorce court may divide marital property without regard to title. In the majority of states, a divorce court may not divide separate property. In a minority of “hotchpot” jurisdictions, the court may divide all assets, whenever or however acquired; a few states permit the division of separate property in special circumstances, such as hardship. See KRAUSE, supra, at 752, 763–65 (6th ed. 2007).

An asset is marital if it was acquired during the marriage by any means other than gift, descent, or devise. An asset that is initially separate property may be transformed into marital property if marital funds or significant efforts by the owner-spouse enhance its value or build equity during the marriage. See id.

Here, if State A is a majority jurisdiction, Husband's real estate would be classified as separate property, the marital home as marital, and Wife's pension as partly marital and partly separate. The real estate was inherited, and there is no evidence that its value has been enhanced by Husband's efforts or marital funds. The marital home was purchased after marriage with Wife's employment income. The value of Wife's pension reflects both marital employment income and premarital employment income; a court would thus apportion its value. See J. THOMAS OLDHAM, DIVORCE, SEPARATION AND THE DISTRIBUTION OF PROPERTY § 7.10[5] (2006) (describing apportionment principles).

Thus, absent an enforceable premarital agreement, a divorce court could award Husband a share of Wife's pension and the marital home. In most states, it could not award Wife a share of Husband's real estate.

Point Three (20%)

Even if the premarital agreement is unenforceable, it is unclear whether Husband can obtain alimony. Husband's failure to contribute to the marriage weighs against his alimony claim, but, if Husband can establish that his injury precludes employment, that factor coupled with his age and the duration of the marriage may support an alimony award.

State A terms spousal support “alimony.”

Rules governing the award of alimony vary from one state to the next, but they almost invariably require the trial court to consider the parties' financial resources and needs, their marital contributions, and the marital duration. Some state statutes also require consideration of spousal misconduct. See Robert Kirkman Collins, The Theory of Marital Residuals: Applying an Income Adjustment Calculus to the Enigma of Alimony, 24 HARV. WOMEN'S L.J. 23, 46 (2001) (describing and categorizing factors in alimony determination); LYNN D. WARDLE & LAURENCE C. NOLAN, FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF FAMILY LAW 718 (2d ed. 2006); AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE, PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF FAMILY DISSOLUTION: ANALYSIS AND RECOMMENDATIONS §§ 5.02, 5.03 (2002). Although alimony statutes typically accord substantial discretion to the trial court, they are invariably gender neutral. See Orr v. Orr, 440 U.S. 268 (1979).

In evaluating need, a court typically considers the standard of living enjoyed by the parties during the marriage and whether the recipient spouse will be able to achieve that level of economic self-sufficiency within a reasonable period of time following the divorce; health, the existence of separate assets, and the share of marital assets that the recipient spouse will receive may also be taken into account. See OLIPHANT & VER STEEGH, supra, §§ 11.14–11.18.

In evaluating a spouse's contributions to the marriage, a court may consider negative as well as positive actions, including a spouse's failure to make economic or noneconomic contributions and misuse or dissipation of marital funds. Id. § 11.13.

In this case, both Husband and Wife are minimally educated. The 15-year marriage was relatively lengthy. The marital standard of living has not been high, and throughout the marriage, Wife has made greatly disproportionate contributions. For most of the marriage, Husband's failure to contribute more was unexcused. Although Husband suffered a major injury five years ago, a court may be skeptical of his claim that he cannot work given Husband's employment history, his apparent lack of noneconomic contributions, and his failure to make use of the pilot's license he acquired with Wife's help. Wife does not earn a high salary that would permit her to pay alimony easily. Finally, because the question assumes that the agreement is invalid, Husband would, in most states, retain his inherited real estate, which would provide him with an asset that he could use to defray his expenses.

On the other hand, if Husband succeeds in establishing his disability, a court might find that his current need outweighs his lack of economic contributions, particularly given the length of the marriage, Husband's age, Wife's earning ability, and the fact that Wife will receive a share of marital assets.

Thus, on these facts, it is possible, but by no means certain, that Husband will obtain an alimony award if the premarital agreement is found to be invalid.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure I.A.1., B.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) May a federal district court exercise personal jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant that contracted outside the forum state to provide a loan to a plaintiff who lived in the forum state and that mailed loan paperwork to the plaintiff in the forum state, including the incorrectly mailed paperwork that gave rise to the plaintiff's lawsuit?
- (2) Does a federal district court have diversity jurisdiction when the plaintiff previously was domiciled in the defendant's state of citizenship and still returns there about once a month, but has moved to another state to work and may intend to stay there permanently?
- (3) Does a federal district court have federal-question jurisdiction over a lawsuit when the plaintiff's complaint refers to a potentially relevant federal statute but denies the applicability of the statute?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The State B district court may exercise specific personal jurisdiction over nonresident defendant Credit Union because Credit Union engaged in contacts with the forum state that demonstrated purposeful availment and that gave rise to Paul's claims. The exercise of personal jurisdiction would not be unfair.

Diversity of citizenship exists if Paul intends to remain in State B, which could be argued either way. Defendant Credit Union is a citizen of State A, where it is incorporated and has its principal place of business. Paul's complaint seeks sufficient monetary damages to satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement.

The district court does not have federal-question jurisdiction in this case because Paul's complaint does not state a federal claim. It instead seeks to anticipate and rebut a potential federal defense. Under the well-pleaded complaint rule, federal-question jurisdiction is appropriate only when a federal claim is raised on the face of the complaint.

Point One (35%)

The United States District Court for the District of State B may exercise personal jurisdiction over Credit Union because Credit Union's contacts with the forum state gave rise to the suit and demonstrate purposeful availment and because the exercise of jurisdiction would not be unfair.

The United States District Court for the District of State B has personal jurisdiction over Credit Union. Federal district courts may exercise personal jurisdiction to the same extent as the courts of general jurisdiction of the state in which the district court sits. See FED. R. CIV. P. 4(k)(1)(A). State courts of general jurisdiction may exercise personal jurisdiction over nonresident defendants to the extent authorized by both the state's long-arm statute and the due process clause of the 14th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. In this case, State B's long-arm statute authorizes jurisdiction as far as the Constitution allows, so the long-arm analysis is the same as the constitutional analysis.

The due process clause of the 14th Amendment permits states to assert personal jurisdiction over nonresident defendants who have established minimum contacts with the state such that the exercise of personal jurisdiction would not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. International Shoe v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310 (1945).

In this case, Paul's suit arises out of or relates to Credit Union's contacts with State B. Paul's claim is based on a loan agreement which informed Credit Union that Paul was a resident of State B at the time of the agreement and that loan information should be mailed to Paul in State B. Credit Union in fact sends information about the loan to Paul in State B, and receives payments from Paul from State B. Moreover, the lawsuit arises out of one of Credit Union's mailings to State B, albeit a mailing to an incorrect address.

Although these contacts probably fall short of the continuous and substantial contacts required for general jurisdiction, see Helicopteros Nacionales v. Hall, 466 U.S. 408 (1984), they are probably sufficient for the court to exercise specific jurisdiction over claims against Credit Union that arise out of its contacts with State B.

A nonresident defendant is subject to specific jurisdiction when its contacts with the forum state demonstrate purposeful availment of the benefits of the forum state and/or render it foreseeable that the defendant may be haled into the forum state's courts. See Hanson v. Denckla, 357 U.S. 235 (1958). While Credit Union might argue that its contacts with State B result from Paul's unilateral act of moving to State B and therefore do not demonstrate purposeful availment, this argument will fail. Credit Union entered a long-term contract with Paul knowing that he lived in State B and would be performing his part of the contract (making loan payments) in State B. Credit Union mailed several payment statements addressed to Paul in State B. As a result, Credit Union purposefully availed itself of the benefits of State B and could foresee being haled into court in State B on matters related to the contract with Paul. See Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 475–76 (1985).

Even when a nonresident defendant has established the necessary minimum contacts with the forum state, the exercise of personal jurisdiction over the defendant may offend due process if inconsistent with traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. The defendant must make a compelling case for fairness considerations to outweigh the existence of minimum contacts. Id. at 477. Credit Union will not succeed in making such a case, as the fairness considerations tend to support the exercise of personal jurisdiction by the courts of State B. Paul, who now lives in State B, has an interest in convenient and effective relief close to home. State B has an interest in providing its residents with a forum for redress of injuries caused by out-of-state defendants. And although litigation in State B will impose a burden on Credit Union, which maintains no branches in State B, that burden is minimized by modern transportation and communication. See id. at 483–84. As a result, the exercise of personal jurisdiction by the courts of State B will not offend notions of fairness.

Point Two (35%)

Credit Union is a citizen of State A. As a result, complete diversity will exist if Paul is a domiciliary of State B. However, it is uncertain whether Paul is a domiciliary of State B or is still a domiciliary of State A. If Paul is a State B domiciliary, then there is diversity jurisdiction; Paul's claim satisfies the amount-in-controversy requirement.

28 U.S.C. § 1332 vests the district courts with jurisdiction over cases in which (a) there is complete diversity of citizenship, meaning no plaintiff shares the state of citizenship of any defendant, and (b) the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000.

In determining citizenship, § 1332(c) directs that a corporation is a citizen where it is incorporated and where it has its principal place of business. Hertz Corp. v. Friend, ___ U.S. ___, 130 S.Ct. 1181, 1192 (2010) (“‘[P]rincipal place of business’ is best read as referring to the place where a corporation’s officers direct, control, and coordinate the corporation’s activities. . . the place where the corporation maintains its headquarters . . . i.e., the ‘nerve center’”). Credit Union is incorporated in State A. Moreover, its principal place of business (indeed, its only place of business) is in State A. Credit Union is a State A citizen for diversity purposes.

An individual U.S. citizen’s citizenship is determined by domicile, which is defined as the individual’s “true, fixed, and permanent home . . . to which he has the intention of returning whenever he is absent therefrom.” Mas v. Perry, 489 F.2d 1396, 1399 (5th Cir. 1974) (quotation omitted). Until recently, Paul’s domicile was clearly State A, where he had lived his entire life. Six months ago, however, Paul moved to State B, where he now resides most of the time, although he sometimes returns for short visits to his vacation home in State A.

The question is whether Paul has changed his domicile to State B. To change domicile, an individual must both take up residence in a new state and intend to remain there. Id. at 1400. While Paul has taken up residence in State B, it is unclear whether he intends to remain there. He originally planned to stay in State B for a year and then decide whether he would remain or return to State A. Consistent with that plan, he took a job as a temporary employee. Recently, however, Paul decided to obtain more permanent employment, as he has really enjoyed living in State B. This change to more permanent employment suggests that Paul now intends to remain in State B on a permanent basis, in which case his domicile has changed to State B. On the other hand, his purchase of a vacation home in State A may suggest that he does not, in fact, intend to change his State A domicile.

[NOTE: The issue can be fairly argued either way.]

If Paul is a citizen of State B, complete diversity exists. If Paul remains a citizen of State A, complete diversity does not exist, as Paul and Credit Union would both be citizens of State A.

To determine whether the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000, courts rely on a plaintiff’s good-faith allegations unless it appears “to a legal certainty” that the plaintiff cannot recover the amount alleged. St. Paul Mercury Indemnity Co. v. Red Cab Co., 303 U.S. 283, 289 (1938). Paul’s claim for $240,000 clearly satisfies the amount-in-controversy requirement, and there are no facts to suggest that it was not made in good faith. Even if the state statute providing for treble damages is preempted by the federal identity-theft statute, Paul’s $80,000 claim for actual loss still satisfies the amount-in-controversy requirement.

Point Three (30%)

Paul’s assertion of a defense to the possible applicability of a federal statute does not create federal-question jurisdiction.

28 U.S.C. § 1331 provides district courts with jurisdiction to hear suits arising under the laws of the United States. To determine whether such federal-question jurisdiction exists, a court looks at the allegations necessary for a well-pleaded complaint and asks whether the claims stated by those allegations are created by federal or state law. Claims created by federal, but not state, law generally fall within the scope of a district court's federal-question jurisdiction.

Paul's breach-of-contract claim is created by state law and therefore lies outside the district court's original federal-question jurisdiction. Although Paul's complaint mentions a federal statute, it does not state any claim that is based on the federal law. Instead, in order to rebut an anticipated defense, Paul's complaint asserts that certain provisions of federal law are unconstitutional.

Pursuant to the well-pleaded complaint rule, there is no federal-question jurisdiction when federal law is mentioned in the complaint only to deny the applicability of that law. Federal-question jurisdiction exists "only when the plaintiff's statement of his own cause of action shows that it is based upon [federal] laws or [the] Constitution." Louisville & Nashville Railroad v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149, 152 (1908). Here, Paul is asserting a cause of action based only on state law; the only federal issue in the case is whether Paul's cause of action is preempted. Federal-question jurisdiction does not exist under these circumstances.

CRIMINAL LAW ANALYSIS

(Criminal Law II.A.3; IV.B.1.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) What are the elements of the crime of larceny by false pretenses?
- (2) Did Owner make a false representation of a material present or past fact that caused Customer to pass title to the property (the $250) to Owner?
- (3) Did Owner act with the mens rea required to be found guilty of false pretenses?

DISCUSSION

Summary

To be guilty of larceny by false pretenses in most jurisdictions, Owner must have made a false representation of a material fact that caused Customer to pass title to property to Owner. Owner must have acted with knowledge of the falsity of the fact and with an intent to defraud.

While Owner did not believe that Star had the best refurbished computers in town, his claim to the contrary was a false representation of opinion, not fact, and could not support a conviction for larceny by false pretenses. However, Owner's statement that the computer technician installed a new hard drive in each refurbished computer was a false statement of a material fact because the technician did not install new hard drives. Owner obtained title to Customer's property when Customer paid Owner $250 for the computer. The fact that Customer purchased the computer after being satisfied by Owner's claims suggests that Customer relied upon Owner's false representation of fact in passing title to property.

A court would likely find that Owner knowingly made the false representation about new hard drives because Owner believed that it was very likely that the computer technician used by Star did not install new hard drives, and Owner deliberately decided not to question the technician. Owner also had the requisite intent to defraud because Owner made the false claim about the new hard drives based upon the belief that it was one of the most important factors that would lead to a purchase by Customer.

To be guilty of larceny by false pretenses, a defendant must knowingly make a false representation of material fact to a person, with the intent to defraud, and the false representation must cause the victim to pass title to something of value to the defendant.

The crime of "larceny by false pretenses" or, as it is sometimes called, "obtaining property by false pretenses" or just "false pretenses," is a type of theft offense. In most jurisdictions, the actus reus elements of false pretenses are (i) a false representation of material fact (ii) that causes another person to transfer title to property (including money) to the defendant. The mens rea required is knowledge that the representation of fact is false and an intent to defraud. See generally JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 32.10 (5th ed. 2009). See, e.g., MODEL PENAL CODE § 223.3 (theft by deception).

Here, Owner is charged with the crime of false pretenses on the theory that Owner stole Customer's money (the $250 that Customer paid for the computer) by lying to Customer in order to induce Customer to give the money to Owner in exchange for the computer.

Point Two (35%)

The actus reus elements of the crime of false pretenses are met because Owner made a false representation of a material present or past fact that caused Customer to pass title to something of value (the $250) to Owner.

As noted above, to be guilty of false pretenses in most jurisdictions, Owner must have made a false representation of a material present or past fact that caused Customer to pass title to property to Owner. See State v. Agosta, 787 A.2d 1252, 1254 (Vt. 2001). The false representation must be one of fact, not opinion. See McMurphy v. State, 455 So. 2d 924, 927 (Ala. Crim. App. 1984). Commercial puffery is not generally considered "false pretenses." See DRESSLER, supra, § 32.10[C][2][a]. While Owner did not believe that Star had the best refurbished computers in town, his claim to the contrary was a false representation of opinion, not of fact, and could not support a conviction for larceny by false pretenses. See id.

On the other hand, Owner's statement that the technician had installed a new hard drive in each refurbished computer was a false statement of a material fact. See People v. Taurianen, 300 N.W.2d 720, 725 (Mich. Ct. App. 1980) (per curiam) (misrepresentation of fact where defendants accepted payment for repair work that was not performed). Owner claimed that the technician had installed a new hard drive in every refurbished computer when no such installation had occurred.

Through this false representation, Owner succeeded in obtaining title to Customer's property when the purchase of the computer was completed and Customer gave Owner $250. See People v. Long, 294 N.W.2d 197, 200 (Mich. 1980).

It does not matter that Customer may have had additional reasons for purchasing the computer—reasons that had nothing to do with Owner's false representation. It is enough that Owner's false representation contributed to Customer's parting with property. See State v. Handke, 340 P.2d 877, 883 (Kan. 1959). The fact that Customer purchased the computer after being satisfied by Owner's claims, including the claim that the computer technician installed a new hard drive in every refurbished computer, suggests that the false representation contributed to Customer's parting with $250, thus establishing the causal link between Owner's false representation and the transfer of title to the property. See id.

Point Three (40%)

The mens rea element of the crime of false pretenses is likely met because Owner made the false representation knowingly and with the intent to defraud Customer.

To be guilty of false pretenses, Owner must have made the false representation knowingly and with the intent to defraud Customer. See Trevino v. State, 142 P.3d 214, 216 (Wyo. 2006). Most courts find that a defendant acts knowingly and has knowledge of a particular fact when, inter alia, the defendant is aware of a high probability of the fact's existence and deliberately avoids learning the truth. See United States v. Guay, 108 F.3d 545, 551 (4th Cir. 1997); MODEL PENAL CODE § 2.02(7). A court would likely find that Owner knowingly made the false representation based upon both Owner's belief that it was very likely that the computer technician used by Star did not install new hard drives and Owner's deliberate decision not to question the technician. See Guay, 108 F.3d 545 at 551. The markedly low rates and fast service provided by the technician would provide additional evidence that Owner knew or should have known that the technician was not installing new hard drives. See Commonwealth v. Franks, 340 A.2d 456, 459–60 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1975) (Price, J., dissenting).

A few states, however, reject this “willful blindness” standard and require actual knowledge. See Love v. Commonwealth, 55 S.W.3d 816, 825 (Ky. 2001) (actual knowledge of each element of offense required, but such knowledge may be proved by circumstantial evidence). In these states, Owner would lack actual knowledge that the technician failed to install new hard drives and could not be found guilty of false pretenses. See id.

With respect to the second element, a defendant has the intent to defraud required to establish false pretenses when the defendant intends that the person to whom the false representation is made will rely upon it. See Commonwealth v. Cheromcka, 850 N.E.2d 1088, 1094 (Mass. App. Ct. 2006). Because Owner made the claim about the new hard drives based upon the belief that it would help persuade Customer to buy a computer, Owner also had the requisite intent to defraud.

DISCUSSION

Amy's shares were properly voted by Amy in favor of the proposal even though she no longer owned the shares when the meeting was held. Zach did not acquire ownership of those shares until after the record date, and Amy did not grant Zach a proxy to vote those shares at any time. Brian's shares were properly voted in favor of the proposal because his earlier proxy to Dell was revoked when Brian attended the meeting and voted his shares. Carter's shares were properly voted against the proposal because he properly attended the meeting and voted them. X Corporation's president was not permitted to vote the shares reacquired from Amy.

When the articles of incorporation of a corporation conflict with its bylaws regarding how many shares must be voted in favor of a shareholder proposal in order for that proposal to be approved, the articles of incorporation preempt the bylaws. Therefore, the proposal must receive a two-thirds vote of the outstanding shares entitled to vote on the matter to be approved. Here, the shareholder proposal received sufficient votes in favor and was approved.

Only shareholders of record on the record date are entitled to vote at an annual shareholders' meeting. Here, Amy was the owner of the 50 shares on the record date, and Zach is not entitled to vote them. Therefore, Amy's vote of 50 shares in favor of the shareholder proposal is counted, and Zach's vote of 50 shares against the proposal is not.

A record date determines who is entitled to vote at a particular shareholder meeting, “namely, those persons who were registered as shareholders ‘of record’ on that date.” ROBERT CHARLES CLARK, CORPORATE LAW § 9.1.2 (1986); Brizzolara v. Sherwood Mem. Park, Inc., 645 S.E.2d 508, 518 (Va. 2007). Here, on the record date of December 30th, Amy was the owner of the 50 shares. Therefore, absent her proxy to another, Amy is entitled to vote the 50 shares. The fact that Zach bought the shares does not give Zach the right to vote the 50 shares because he did so after the record date.

[NOTE: If Amy had given Zach a legally binding proxy together with the shares, Zach might have had the right to vote them even though Zach was not the record owner on the record date. The facts do not suggest that any proxy was given, however, and therefore Amy’s vote of 50 shares in favor of the proposal should be counted, and Zach’s vote of 50 shares against the proposal should not be counted.]

Point Two (25%)

Generally, a shareholder proxy is revocable. Any action taken inconsistent with a proxy revokes that proxy. Here, Brian attended the meeting and voted, which was inconsistent with Brian’s prior grant of a proxy to Dell. Therefore, Brian effectively revoked the proxy, and his vote of 25 shares in favor of the shareholder proposal should be counted.

Brian gave Dell a proxy to vote Brian’s shares. Shareholder proxies generally are revocable, and any action inconsistent with the grant of a proxy works as a revocation of that proxy. See Anish Monga, Using Derivatives to Manipulate the Market for Corporate Control, 12 STAN. J.L. BUS. & FIN. 186, 213 (2006); Richard A. Epstein, Why Restrain Alienation?, 85 COLUM. L. REV. 970, 985 n. 32 (1985) (“Proxies must be revocable unless coupled with an interest.”); see, e.g., N.Y. BUS. CORP. LAW § 609 (McKinney 1984). A proxy may be made irrevocable only if the proxy form explicitly so states and the proxy is “coupled with an interest.” See MODEL BUSINESS CORP. ACT (MBCA) § 7.22(d) (1984 with 2000 amendments) (“An appointment of a proxy is revocable unless the appointment form or electronic transmission states that it is irrevocable and the appointment is coupled with an interest.”).

Here, the proxy given by Brian to Dell did not state that it was irrevocable, nor was it coupled with an interest, and therefore it was revocable. Brian’s attendance at the shareholders’ meeting and his vote of the 25 shares were actions inconsistent with the grant of a proxy covering those shares to Dell. Therefore, Brian effectively revoked the proxy, and Brian’s vote of 25 shares in favor of the proposal should be counted while Dell’s vote of 25 shares against the proposal should not be counted.

Point Three (10%)

A shareholder of record may attend and vote at an annual shareholders’ meeting. Thus Carter’s vote of 25 shares will be counted against the proposal.

A shareholder of record is entitled to attend and vote at an annual shareholders’ meeting unless he or she has executed a valid, irrevocable proxy covering his shares. See MBCA § 7.22(a). Here, Carter attended the meeting and properly voted his 25 shares against the proposal.

Point Four (20%)

Shares that are repurchased by a corporation are not outstanding shares and therefore may not be voted. Therefore, the vote of 50 shares by X Corporation's president against the proposal cannot be counted.

Shares that are reacquired by a corporation are considered authorized but not outstanding. MBCA § 6.31(a). Some jurisdictions refer to these as "treasury shares."

In counting shareholder votes, "each outstanding share . . . is entitled to one vote on each matter voted on at a shareholders' meeting." Id. § 7.21(a). The facts indicate that X Corporation's president voted 50 shares that the corporation reacquired from Amy. Because reacquired shares are not outstanding, they cannot be voted. Therefore the 50 shares voted by the president do not count.

Point Five (20%)

When the articles of incorporation conflict with a corporation's bylaws regarding how many shares must vote in favor of a shareholder proposal in order for that proposal to be approved, the articles of incorporation prevail over the bylaws. Here, the shareholder proposal received sufficient votes in favor and was approved.

When a corporation's articles of incorporation conflict with its bylaws regarding how many shares must vote in favor of a shareholder proposal in order for that proposal to be approved, the articles of incorporation preempt the bylaws. See Boatmen's First Nat'l Bank of West Plains v. Southern Mo. Dist. Council of the Assemblies of God, 806 S.W.2d 706, 713 (Mo. Ct. App. 1991) ("[A]ny bylaw provision that conflicts with the articles of incorporation is void."). Here, X Corporation's Articles of Incorporation requiring approval of two-thirds of the shares outstanding and entitled to vote on the matter to approve any shareholder action will preempt the bylaws' requirement of unanimity.

Here, Amy's 50 votes and Brian's 25 votes in favor of the proposal are counted, while only Carter's 25 votes against the proposal are counted. Therefore, the proposal received the necessary approval by two-thirds of the shares outstanding and entitled to vote on the matter and should pass.

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2011 MEE. Each test includes nine questions; user jurisdictions may elect which of the nine questions they wish to use. In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law. The instructions for the test appear on page iii. For more information, see the MEE Information Booklet, available on the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions. Examinees need not present their responses in the same way or cover all the points discussed in the model analyses to receive good grades.

The topics covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that topic. For example, the Federal Civil Procedure question on the February 2011 MEE tested the following areas from the Federal Civil Procedure outline: I.A.1., jurisdiction and venue—subject matter jurisdiction—federal courts, and IV.A. & C., pretrial procedures—pleadings and motions & joinder of parties and claims (including class actions). Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet.

The MEE is a series of essay questions, any of which a jurisdiction may select to include as a part of its bar examination. It is administered by participating jurisdictions on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Examinees are expected to spend approximately 30 minutes answering each MEE question administered. The areas of law that may be covered by the questions on any MEE are Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts, Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Uniform Commercial Code (Negotiable Instruments [Commercial Paper]; Secured Transactions). Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test form contains the following instructions:

Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

Each question is designed to be answered in 30 minutes. There will be no break once the formal testing session begins. You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions to follow.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Your jurisdiction may instruct you to answer MEE questions according to the law of the jurisdiction. Absent such an instruction, you should answer the questions by applying fundamental legal principles rather than local case or local statutory law.

TRUSTS QUESTION

In 1994, Testator died, survived by her sons, Ron and Sam, and Ron's son, Peter. Under Testator's duly probated will, Testator created a trust and provided that Trustee shall distribute to Ron, for the duration of his life, as much of the income and principal from the trust as Trustee, in her uncontrolled discretion, deems advisable. At Ron's death, any remaining trust funds shall be distributed to my grandchildren, with the children of any deceased grandchild taking the deceased parent's share.

In another section of her will, Testator bequeathed property to her son Sam.

In 2006, Ron adopted Carol, who was then 14 years old.

On January 2, 2008, Ron borrowed $50,000 from a friend and gave the friend a note for that amount payable in five annual installments of $10,000 plus interest.

Between 1994 and 2009, Trustee distributed all the trust income (which averaged $15,000 per year) to Ron.

In 2009, Peter, Ron's son, died in an automobile accident survived by his wife, Ginny, but by no descendants. Under Peter's valid will, his entire estate passed to Ginny.

On January 2, 2010, Ron failed to make the required payment to his friend on the $50,000 note. Ron's friend then demanded that Trustee distribute that year's trust income to him instead of to Ron until the $10,000 plus interest due that year was fully paid. At that point, Trustee stopped paying trust income to Ron and refused to make payments to Ron's friend. Instead, Trustee began to accumulate trust income.

In late 2010, Ron died. He was survived by his adopted daughter, Carol; his daughter-in-law, Ginny; his brother, Sam; and Sam's wife. Sam has no children, but he and his wife plan to have a child in the near future.

1. Was Ron's friend entitled to any of the trust income earned during 2010? Explain.
2. At Ron's death, to whom should the trust principal be distributed? Explain.

EVIDENCE QUESTION

On May 5, at 2 p.m. in City Park, Victim was hit from behind and temporarily knocked unconscious. Upon regaining consciousness moments later, Victim discovered that his bag containing valuables had been stolen.

While investigating the crime later that day, Police Officer interviewed Witness. Witness told Police Officer that she had seen the robbery of Victim and had recognized Defendant, a resident of the neighborhood, as the perpetrator. Witness also told Police Officer that Defendant had a reputation in the neighborhood for violence, that everyone was afraid of him, and that she shouldn't be talking to the police at all. Nevertheless, Witness agreed to accompany Police Officer to police headquarters, where she looked at photographs of suspects and signed a written statement. The statement read, "I was walking in City Park on May 5, at 2 p.m., when I saw Defendant. I saw Defendant attack Victim and then run away with Victim's bag. I know Defendant from the neighborhood and recognized Defendant as suspect number 1 on the 12-person photograph display shown to me today by Police Officer."

Defendant was subsequently arrested and charged with robbery and assault.

At Defendant's trial, Prosecutor called Witness to the stand. In response to questions from Prosecutor, Witness testified that she had no memory of the incident. She stated that she did not remember seeing anyone in City Park at the time of the alleged robbery. When Prosecutor asked Witness whether her sudden memory loss was because she was afraid of Defendant, Witness said that she had never seen Defendant before in her life and was not afraid of him because she did not know him. When Witness was asked whether she had told Police Officer that Defendant had robbed Victim, Witness denied ever making that statement.

Immediately after this testimony, Prosecutor offered Witness's signed statement into evidence to impeach Witness's credibility and to prove that Defendant was in City Park and attacked Victim. An authenticated copy of Witness's statement was provided to Defense Counsel. Defense Counsel raised no constitutional challenges to Witness's identification of Defendant at police headquarters. However, Defense Counsel objected to Prosecutor questioning Witness about the statement and to admission of the copy of the statement. The judge sustained both objections.

After the prosecution had rested, Defense Counsel called Buddy to the stand. Buddy testified that he had never met Defendant. He also testified that some of his friends had recently met Defendant a few times, and that they think that Defendant is an honest and gentle person who would never hurt anyone. Prosecutor objected to this testimony. The judge sustained the objection and excluded Buddy's testimony.

The rules of evidence in this jurisdiction are identical to the Federal Rules of Evidence.

1. Should the judge have permitted Prosecutor to question Witness about Witness's written statement and admitted the copy of the statement to impeach Witness's credibility? Explain.
2. Should the judge have admitted Witness's written statement to prove that Defendant was in City Park and attacked Victim? Explain.

Evidence Question

3. Should the judge have admitted Buddy's testimony to prove Defendant's character for honesty and gentleness? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

Astronomy Corporation (Astronomy) sells expensive telescopes to home stargazers. Astronomy has a long-term financing arrangement pursuant to which it borrows money from Bank. In a signed writing, Astronomy granted Bank a security interest in all its present and future inventory to secure its obligations to Bank under the financing arrangement. Bank filed a properly completed financing statement reflecting this transaction. The financing statement lists Astronomy as the debtor and Bank as the secured party. The financing statement indicates that the collateral is inventory.

Astronomy sells telescopes to some of its customers on credit. For a credit sale, Astronomy requires the customer to sign an agreement granting Astronomy a security interest in the purchased item to secure the customer's obligation to pay the balance of the purchase price.

Six months ago, Johnson, an amateur stargazer, went to Astronomy's showroom, saw a $3,000 telescope that he liked, and bought it on credit from Astronomy. Johnson paid $500 in cash and agreed to pay the $2,500 balance in installment payments of $100 per month for the next 25 months, interest free. Consistent with Astronomy's policy for credit sales, Johnson signed an agreement granting Astronomy a security interest in the telescope to secure Johnson's obligation to pay the balance of the purchase price. Astronomy did not file a financing statement with respect to this transaction. At the time of the sale of the telescope to Johnson, Johnson was unaware of the financial arrangement between Astronomy and Bank.

One month ago, Johnson sold the telescope for $2,700 in cash to his neighbor, Smith, another amateur stargazer. Smith had no knowledge of any interest of Bank or Astronomy in the telescope. Johnson then left the country without paying the remaining $2,000 owed to Astronomy and cannot be located.

One week ago, Astronomy defaulted on its obligations to Bank.

Both Bank and Astronomy have discovered that Johnson sold the telescope to Smith. Bank and Astronomy each have demanded that Smith surrender the telescope on the grounds that it is collateral for obligations owed to them.

1. Does Bank have a security interest in the telescope that is enforceable against Smith? Explain.
2. Does Astronomy have a security interest in the telescope that is enforceable against Smith? Explain.

TORTS QUESTION

After recent terrorist threats, Metro Opera (Metro) decided to place metal detectors in its lobby. Metro also marked off an area just beyond the metal detectors in which to search patrons who failed the metal-detector test. Metro posted a sign near the entrance that read: “Warning! No metal objects allowed inside. All entrants are screened and may be searched.”

Claimant and Friend saw the warning sign as they entered Metro. After entering, they observed several patrons being frisked. Claimant said to Friend, “I’m certainly not going to allow anyone to touch me!”

Claimant then walked through the metal detector, which buzzed. Without asking Claimant’s permission, Inspector, a Metro employee, approached Claimant from behind and began to frisk Claimant. Claimant leaped away from Inspector and snarled, “Leave me alone!” Guard, another Metro employee, then used a stun device, which administers a painful electric shock, to subdue Claimant.

Unfortunately, the stun device, manufactured by Alertco, malfunctioned and produced a shock considerably more severe than that described in Alertco’s product specifications. The shock caused minor physical injuries and triggered a severe depressive reaction that necessitated Claimant’s hospitalization. Claimant had a history of depression but was in good mental health at the time of the shock. Claimant was the first person who had ever experienced a depressive reaction to the Alertco device.

The Alertco device malfunctioned because it was incorrectly assembled at the factory and therefore did not meet Alertco’s specifications. Alertco’s assembly-inspection system exceeds industry standards, and it is widely recognized as the best in the industry. Nonetheless, it did not detect the assembly mistake in the device that injured Claimant.

Claimant has filed two tort actions seeking damages for her physical and psychological injuries: (1) Claimant sued Metro, claiming that both the frisk and the use of the stun device were actionable batteries, and (2) Claimant brought a strict products liability action against Alertco.

Metro has conceded that the actions of Inspector and Guard were within the scope of their employment. Metro had instructed its employees to ask permission before frisking patrons, but on the day Claimant was frisked, a supervisor told employees to frisk without asking permission in order to speed up the entrance process.

1. Can Claimant establish a prima facie case of battery against Metro for (a) the use of the stun device and (b) the frisk? Explain.
2. Does Metro have a viable defense to either battery claim? Explain.
3. Can Claimant establish the elements of a strict products liability claim against Alertco based on the malfunction of the device? Explain.
4. Assuming that Claimant establishes either Metro’s or Alertco’s liability, can Claimant recover for her depressive reaction to the stun device? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Husband and Wife married 12 years ago. Two years later, Wife gave birth to Child. Both Husband and Wife are employed, and each earns approximately $80,000 per year.

Four months ago, Husband and Wife decided to divorce and entered into a written separation agreement drafted by their respective attorneys. Under this agreement, Wife obtained sole title to assets worth $175,000 and Husband obtained sole title to assets worth $125,000. All assets were acquired during the marriage with employment income; there were no other assets. The separation agreement provided that Wife would have sole custody of Child. It required Husband to pay to Wife $500 per month in spousal support until her death or remarriage and $400 per month in child support until Child reaches the age of 18.

At the time he signed the separation agreement, Husband was living with Fiancée, a woman with two teenage children. Indeed, his planned marriage to Fiancée was the primary reason for Husband's willingness to sign the separation agreement.

Three months ago, Child was injured in an automobile accident. As a result of blood tests performed following the accident, Husband discovered that he is not Child's biological parent.

Two months ago, at a hearing in the Husband-Wife divorce action, Husband petitioned the trial court to invalidate the separation agreement based on unconscionability and fraud. The trial court refused and entered a divorce decree incorporating the terms of the separation agreement.

After entry of the divorce judgment, Husband and Fiancée got married. Husband then filed a motion to modify the divorce decree to

- (a) grant him an equal share of the marital assets,
- (b) award Wife no more than $200 per month in spousal support so that Husband could "meet the needs of [his] new family," and
- (c) eliminate his child-support obligation based on Husband's "nonpaternity of Child."

The trial court denied Husband's motion to modify the divorce decree.

1. Did the trial court err in denying Husband's petition to invalidate the separation agreement on the basis of unconscionability and fraud? Explain.
2. Did the trial court err in denying Husband's motion to modify the divorce decree according to each of the terms set forth in his motion? Explain.

CONTRACTS QUESTION

Designer and Retailer entered into a legally binding contract for Designer to maintain Retailer's website. Under the terms of the written contract, Retailer was to pay Designer $20,000 per year. Retailer made timely payments for two years.

Eight months before the third year's payment was due, Designer learned of an investment opportunity. Designer called Retailer and said, "I need cash quickly to make an investment that will enable me to make a $35,000 profit. I know that you owe me $20,000, but if you promise now to pay me $15,000 in cash by the 25th of this month, I will accept that payment as satisfying your obligation under our contract for this year."

Retailer responded, "Thanks. That's a good deal. I don't have the cash to pay you now. I'll do it if I can get a loan."

"That will be great," responded Designer.

Because Designer assumed that Retailer would provide the cash Designer needed, Designer did not try to raise the cash from another source.

Retailer, however, was busy with other matters. He visited two banks and picked up loan applications, but he never bothered to submit them. Retailer did not take any other action to obtain a loan before the 25th of the month had passed.

When the 25th of the month passed without payment from Retailer, Designer telephoned Retailer. The moment that Retailer heard Designer's voice saying "Hello," Retailer quickly said, "Sorry, but I can't take you up on your offer to accept early payment."

Designer was shocked and angered. He had counted on that money. He can prove that he would have gained $35,000 had he been able to make the planned investment.

Designer has sued Retailer for actual damages plus punitive damages.

1. Is Retailer liable for breach of contract? Explain.
2. Assuming that Retailer is liable, can Designer recover his actual damages from Retailer? Explain.
3. Assuming that Retailer is liable, can Designer recover punitive damages? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

On September 1, Adam, Baker, and Clark formed a shoe manufacturing business called Delta Incorporated (Delta). Each was to be a shareholder. Adam was named president of Delta.

Adam agreed to prepare and file articles of incorporation and bylaws for Delta, in accordance with the state's corporation statute, which is identical to the Model Business Corporation Act (1984, with 2000 amendments). Adam, Baker, and Clark agreed to include a provision in Delta's articles of incorporation stating that the corporation's existence would begin on September 1.

On October 1, Adam, acting on behalf of Delta, entered into a contract with Mega Stores Corporation (Mega) pursuant to which Mega was to purchase shoes from Delta for $3,000. Following delivery of the shoes and after Mega had paid in full, Mega discovered that the shoes did not conform to the contract specifications and returned the shoes to Delta. It is undisputed that Delta owes Mega the $3,000 purchase price.

On October 15, Baker learned that Delta's articles of incorporation had not been filed.

On November 1, Adam, acting on behalf of Delta, entered into a contract with Sole Source, Inc. (Sole), a supplier of shoe soles, pursuant to which Delta purchased shoe soles from Sole for $100,000. The soles were delivered to Delta, and it is uncontested that Delta owes Sole the $100,000 purchase price. Adam learned of the opportunity to contract with Sole from Baker, who had worked with Sole in the past. Baker helped Adam negotiate the contract with Sole.

On November 15, Adam filed Delta's articles of incorporation with the appropriate state official.

When Delta did not pay either Mega or Sole the amounts it owed them, each company sued Delta, Adam, Baker, and Clark for the amounts owed.

At all times, Clark believed that Delta's articles of incorporation had been filed.

1. When did Delta's corporate existence begin? Explain.
2. Is Adam, Baker, or Clark personally liable on the Mega contract? Explain as to each.
3. Is Adam, Baker, or Clark personally liable on the Sole contract? Explain as to each.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

Plaintiff, a citizen of State B, was vacationing in State A, where he visited the O.K. Bar. While he was at the bar, Plaintiff was attacked and seriously beaten by Dave, a regular bar patron and a citizen of State A. Bartender, a citizen of State A, attempted to stop the attack and was also injured by Dave.

Plaintiff sued Dave and Bartender in the United States District Court for the District of State A, properly invoking the court's diversity jurisdiction. Plaintiff's complaint states a state law battery claim against Dave, seeking damages from Dave in excess of $75,000. Plaintiff's complaint also states a claim against Bartender based on Bartender's alleged negligence in serving alcohol to Dave after Dave became visibly intoxicated and belligerent. Plaintiff's complaint seeks damages from Bartender in excess of $75,000. Plaintiff's damages claims are reasonable in light of the injuries Plaintiff suffered in the attack.

Dave was personally served with the summons and complaint. However, the process server could not find Bartender. He therefore taped the summons and complaint to the front door of the O.K. Bar, where Bartender found them the next day.

Bartender made a timely motion to dismiss Plaintiff's complaint for failure to state a cause of action. When that motion was denied by the district court judge, Bartender filed a second motion to dismiss for insufficiency of service of process. The judge also denied that motion.

Bartender then filed an answer to the complaint, denying liability. The answer also stated a state law claim for battery against Dave, seeking $20,000 damages for the injuries Bartender suffered when he tried to stop Dave's attack on Plaintiff.

Dave has moved to dismiss Bartender's cross-claim on the grounds of improper joinder and lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

1. Did the United States District Court for the District of State A properly deny Bartender's motion to dismiss for insufficiency of service of process? Explain.
2. Do the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit Bartender to join a claim for battery against Dave in Bartender's answer to Plaintiff's complaint? Explain.
3. Assuming that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit Bartender to join his state law claim against Dave, does the United States District Court for the District of State A have subject-matter jurisdiction over that claim? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

Two years ago, Testator purchased a $50,000 life insurance policy and named Niece as beneficiary.

One year ago, Testator invited three friends to dinner. After dessert had been served, Testator brought a handwritten document to the table and stated, "This is my will. I would like each of you to witness it." Testator then signed and dated the document. The three friends watched Testator sign her name, and immediately thereafter, they signed their names below Testator's name.

One month ago, Testator died. Testator was survived by Niece, Cousin, and Son. Son is Testator's child from her first marriage. Testator's second husband, Husband, died six months before Testator. Husband's daughter from a prior marriage also survived Testator.

The handwritten document that Testator signed and that the three friends witnessed was found in Testator's desk. Its dispositive provisions provide in their entirety:

*I, Testator, hereby make my Last Will and Testament.
I give my life insurance proceeds to Cousin.
I give the items listed in a memorandum to be found in my safe-deposit box to Niece.
I give $25,000 each to Church, Library, and School.
I give $40,000 to Husband.
I give the remainder of my assets to Son.*

At Testator's death, she owned the following assets:

1. The $50,000 life insurance policy, payable on Testator's death "to Niece"
2. Jewelry worth $15,000
3. A bank account with a balance of $60,000

The jewelry was found in Testator's safe-deposit box with a handwritten memorandum signed and dated by Testator the day before she signed her will. The memorandum lists each piece of jewelry and states, "I want Niece to have all the jewelry here."

The terms of Testator's life insurance contract provide that the beneficiary may be changed only by submitting the change on the insurer's change-of-beneficiary form to the insurance company.

State law explicitly disallows "all holographic wills and codicils." To be valid, a will must be "acknowledged by the testator to the witnesses and signed by the testator in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses, who shall sign their names below that of the testator within 30 days."

1. Is Testator's will valid? Explain.
2. Assuming that Testator's will is valid, who is entitled to
 - (a) Testator's life insurance policy? Explain.
 - (b) Testator's jewelry? Explain.
 - (c) Testator's bank account? Explain.

TRUSTS ANALYSIS

(Trusts I.D., E.1; II.A., B. & E.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Does a creditor of a beneficiary of a discretionary trust have the right to compel the trustee to make payments to the creditor?
- (2) When an income beneficiary of a testamentary trust adopts a child after the testator's death, does the adopted child qualify as a "grandchild" for purposes of sharing in a trust remainder?
- (3) In a class gift to grandchildren following the death of a life tenant, does the class close upon the life tenant's death when there is a grandchild eligible to take, even though more grandchildren could be born after that date?
- (4) When a trust instrument creates a remainder in "grandchildren, with the children of any deceased grandchild taking the deceased parent's share," does any interest vest in the estate of a grandchild who dies without issue before the remainder becomes possessory?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A creditor of the beneficiary of a discretionary trust may not compel the trustee to make payments to the creditor when the beneficiary cannot compel the trustee to make payments. Thus, Ron's friend had no claim against Trustee.

Adoption statutes generally treat adopted children equally with biological children for purposes of inheritance and taking as class gift members under a will. Thus Carol, Ron's adopted daughter, will be entitled to share in the remainder interest in the trust even though she was not adopted until after Testator's death, because the class of grandchildren was still open at that time.

When a trust instrument creates a future interest in grandchildren, the class of grandchildren closes when a grandchild becomes entitled to take, even if that means excluding other potential (but yet unborn) grandchildren. Here, grandchildren became entitled to take at the death of Testator's son Ron, and the class closed at that time, thus excluding any future-born grandchildren.

When a trust creates a future interest in grandchildren, with the children of any deceased grandchild taking the deceased parent's share, the estate of a grandchild who dies without issue before the time for distribution succeeds to the grandchild's interest unless the jurisdiction has adopted a statute akin to Uniform Probate Code § 2-707, which creates a presumption that future interests under the terms of a trust are contingent on survivorship until the distribution date.

Trusts Analysis

[NOTE: There is no perpetuity issue in this question because Testator had a living grandchild when she died (Peter) and thus the remainder interest is guaranteed to vest no later than the death of Ron, who is a life in being.]

Point One (30%)

Because the trust instrument conferred discretion on Trustee, Trustee was not obligated to make payments to Ron or to Ron's creditor.

The language of the trust instrument conferred uncontrolled discretion on Trustee to make payments to, or withhold payments from, Ron. When, as here, a trustee's discretion is uncontrolled, there is no abuse of discretion if the trustee acts "honestly and in a state of mind contemplated by" the trust creator. RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 50, cmt. c (2003). As a result, Ron would be able to compel payments only if Ron could demonstrate that Trustee had acted dishonestly or in a state of mind not contemplated by the trust's creator. There are no facts here to support such a finding. See id.; SCOTT ON TRUSTS § 128.3 (4th ed. 2001).

Because Ron's creditor could have no greater rights in the trust than Ron had, the creditor, Ron's friend, could not compel Trustee to make payments to him. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 56 (2003); SCOTT ON TRUSTS § 155 (4th ed. 2001) (If the beneficiary himself cannot compel the trustee to pay over any part of the trust fund, his creditors are in no better position.). Moreover, even in the unlikely event that the friend could establish that Trustee's failure to make payments constituted an abuse of discretion, some modern authorities hold that a creditor cannot assert the beneficiary's right to complain of abuse of discretion. See, e.g., UNIF. TRUST CODE § 504(b)(2) (providing that a creditor may not compel the trustee of a discretionary trust to make a distribution, even when failure to make the distribution would constitute an abuse of discretion).

[NOTE: This problem does not involve the law relating to the ability of creditors to come after a beneficiary's interest when the instrument includes a spendthrift clause, as no such clause appears in the instrument here.]

Carol, the adopted daughter of Ron, is entitled to a share of the remainder allocated to "grandchildren."

Section 2-705(a) of the Uniform Probate Code provides that "[a]dopted individuals . . . are included in class gifts . . . in accordance with the rules for intestate succession." Section 2-114(b) of the Uniform Probate Code, which deals with intestate succession, provides that "an adopted individual is the child of his [or her] adopting parent or parents . . ." Thus, for purposes of the trust, Carol is treated equally with a child born to Ron after Testator's death. See also RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY (WILLS AND OTHER DONATIVE TRANSFERS) (Tentative Draft No. 4 (2004) § 14.5(2)(i) ("In construing a class gift created by someone other than the adoptive parent, the adopted child is treated as a child of the adoptive parent, but only if (i) the adoption took place before the child reached the age of majority.")).

Because it is clear that Carol should be treated as though she were Ron's biological child, the question is whether she qualifies to take the remainder even though she was not yet adopted at Testator's death. The answer is yes. The class of grandchildren closes when one person becomes entitled to possession of the remainder interest. Id. § 15.1. Because no person became entitled to a share of the trust principal/remainder interest until Ron's death, Carol is entitled to share because she was adopted before that time.

Point Three (20%)

Because at least one grandchild was entitled to take at the time of Ron's death, the class of grandchildren closed at that time, requiring distribution of the remainder at that time and excluding future grandchildren from sharing in the remainder.

A class gift closes to future entrants when at least one class member is entitled to distribution. RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY (WILLS AND OTHER DONATIVE TRANSFERS) Tentative Draft No. 4 § 15.1 (2004). In this case, because grandchildren were entitled to take at Ron's death, the class closed, and any children subsequently born to Sam were excluded from sharing in the remainder.

Point Four (25%)

Ginny, the beneficiary of Peter's will, is entitled to share in the remainder to grandchildren unless the jurisdiction has adopted a statute akin to Uniform Probate Code § 2-707.

When a trust creates a vested remainder in a person or member of a class and then provides that the remainder should pass to that person's child if the remainder person predeceases the life tenant, the remainder is divested only if the deceased remainder person has a child. If, on the other hand, the remainder person dies childless, the remainder is not divested and passes to the remainder person's estate. See, e.g., Swanson v. Swanson, 514 S.E.2d 822 (Ga. 1999); Matter of Krooss, 99 N.E.2d 222 (N.Y. 1951). Here, Peter's remainder would have been divested in favor of his child if he had been survived by a child, but because he was not survived by a child, the remainder vested in his estate. And, because Peter left his entire estate to his wife, Ginny, she succeeds to Peter's interest in the remainder.

The result would be different if the jurisdiction has adopted § 2-707 of the Uniform Probate Code or a similar statute. Section 2-707(b), a controversial provision, makes future interests under the terms of a trust contingent on the beneficiary's surviving to the distribution date. Under UPC § 2-707(b), then, Peter's remainder was contingent on surviving Ron. Because Peter did not survive Ron, his interest did not vest. As a result, he had no interest to pass to Ginny.

Hence, at common law, Carol and Ginny would share the remainder equally; if UPC § 2-707 or a similar statute is in force, only Carol would succeed to the entire remainder.

[NOTE: The following MEE jurisdictions have enacted § 2-707 of the Uniform Probate Code: Massachusetts, Michigan, Montana, North Dakota, Utah, and Iowa (modified).]

Legal Problems

- (1) May a witness who testifies to a lack of memory at trial be impeached with a prior inconsistent statement, and may extrinsic evidence of the prior inconsistent statement be admitted?
- (2) May a prior statement of identification be admitted?
- (3) May a prior inconsistent statement made to the police be admitted to prove the elements of the charged offenses?
- (4) May a defense witness's testimony about what his friends think of a criminal defendant whom they met recently just a few times be admitted to prove that the defendant is honest and gentle?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Witness's statement to Police Officer contradicted her testimony at trial. This is a "prior inconsistent statement" that can be used at trial to impeach her credibility. Because Witness's testimony that she did not remember the incident and did not recognize Defendant was inconsistent with her written statement, because her lack of memory was likely feigned, and because she was given an opportunity to explain the statement, the court should have permitted Prosecutor to question Witness about her prior inconsistent statement and admitted the authenticated copy of Witness's statement to impeach Witness.

Part of Witness's statement—"I was walking in City Park on May 5, at 2 p.m., when I saw Defendant. I know Defendant from the neighborhood and recognized Defendant as suspect number 1 on the 12-person photograph display shown to me today by Police Officer"—should have been admitted as a statement of identification, which is not hearsay as defined in the Federal Rules of Evidence. FED. R. EVID. 801(d)(1)(C). The remainder of Witness's statement—"I saw Defendant attack Victim and then run away with Victim's bag"—was properly excluded because, although inconsistent, the statement was not made "under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, or in a deposition." FED. R. EVID. 801(d)(1)(A).

Buddy's testimony was properly excluded because even relevant character evidence must be introduced in the form of proper opinion or reputation evidence. Buddy did not testify to his own opinion, and Buddy's knowledge of his friends' opinions did not provide evidence of Defendant's reputation.

Point One (25%)

A prior inconsistent statement is ordinarily admissible for the purpose of impeaching the credibility of a witness. Extrinsic evidence of the prior statement, such as the written statement itself, may be admitted when the witness has been given an opportunity to explain or deny the statement.

It is generally permissible for a litigant to impeach the credibility of any witness, including a witness called by that litigant. FED. R. EVID. 607. Moreover, it is common and proper to impeach a witness's credibility "by showing that the witness has made prior statements inconsistent with his [or her] testimony at trial." GRAHAM C. LILLY, AN INTRODUCTION TO THE LAW OF EVIDENCE § 8.5, at 414 (3d ed. 1996).

In order to introduce a prior out-of-court statement to impeach a witness's credibility, there must be an inconsistency between the prior out-of-court statement and the witness's trial testimony. The inconsistency must involve a relevant issue. If a witness testifies to a lack of memory regarding a relevant issue contained in a prior out-of-court statement, the judge may find that this testimony is inconsistent with the out-of-court statement on the same issue. Moreover, if the judge finds that the lack of memory is feigned, the court is more likely to find that the testimony and statement are inconsistent. See MICHAEL H. GRAHAM, HANDBOOK ON FEDERAL EVIDENCE § 613.2 (5th ed. 2001). Here, there is more than a claimed lack of present memory concerning the facts. Witness testified that she had never seen Defendant in her life and denied that she had told Police Officer that she saw Defendant rob Victim. Thus, her trial testimony is inconsistent with her previous written statement. Her testimony is also strongly suggestive of feigned memory loss.

Thus, the court should have allowed Prosecutor to question Witness about the entire statement. The written statement may also be admitted as extrinsic evidence. Witness should also have been given an opportunity to explain or deny all or part of the written statement, and the statement should have been admitted to impeach Witness's credibility by proving that she made prior inconsistent statements. Admission of Witness's statement for the limited purpose of impeaching her trial testimony does not raise hearsay concerns because it is not admitted to prove the truth of the matter asserted in the statement.

[NOTE: At Defense Counsel's request, the judge should instruct the jury that the prosecution cannot rely on Witness's prior written statement, which was admitted solely to impeach Witness's credibility, to prove any of the elements of the charged offenses.]

Part of Witness's statement—"I was walking in City Park on May 5, at 2 p.m., when I saw Defendant. I know Defendant from the neighborhood and recognized Defendant as suspect number 1 on the 12-person photograph display shown to me today by Police Officer"—should have been admitted as a statement of identification, which is not hearsay.

A prior statement of identification of a person made after perceiving the person is not hearsay if the witness who made the statement testifies at trial and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement. FED. R. EVID. 801(d)(1)(C). The rationale for this rule is that the opportunity to cross-examine the witness concerning the statement takes it outside the scope of the hearsay rule. FED. R. EVID. 801(d)(1). For the statement to be admissible to prove the truth of the matter asserted under this provision, it is not necessary that the speaker be able to confirm the identification at trial or remember the identity of the person. If the declarant testifies and is subject to cross-examination concerning the identification, the declarant's lack of memory at trial does not defeat admissibility and the requirements of Rule 801(d)(1)(C) are fulfilled. United States v. Owens, 484 U.S. 554 (1988).

In this case, Witness's prior written statement included an identification of Defendant. That identification was made by Witness based on Witness's knowledge of Defendant from the neighborhood, Witness's direct observation of Defendant in City Park on May 5 at 2 p.m., and Witness's recognition of Defendant's photograph. That prior statement of identification of Defendant is excluded from the general definition of hearsay when, as here, Witness testifies and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement.

Point Three (20%)

The remainder of Witness's prior inconsistent statement made to the police—"I saw Defendant attack Victim and then run away with Victim's bag"—may not be admitted to prove the elements of the charged offenses because it is hearsay.

Under the Federal Rules of Evidence, certain prior inconsistent statements are not hearsay. FED. R. EVID. 801(d)(1)(A). However, to be admissible to prove the truth of the matter asserted, the prior inconsistent statement must be made "under oath, subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, or in a deposition." Id. Witness's statement to the police does not fit within this rule, nor does it fit within any hearsay exception.

Point Four (30%)

A criminal defendant may introduce evidence of his good character relating to a relevant character trait. Character may be proved only through testimony of reputation or opinion.

Character evidence is generally inadmissible to prove that a person acted in conformity with a particular character trait. However, a defendant in a criminal case is permitted to offer evidence of a relevant character trait to prove that the defendant did not commit the charged offense. FED. R. EVID. 404(a)(1). Because Defendant is charged with robbery and assault (both crimes of violence), evidence that Defendant is a "gentle person who would never hurt anyone" would be relevant. FED. R. EVID. 401. Evidence that Defendant is "honest" is a closer call. Committing a robbery or an assault is not inconsistent with having a reputation for truth-telling, if being "honest" means being a truth-teller. See United States v. Darland, 626 F.2d 1235 (5th Cir. 1980). On the other hand, robbery is a form of theft, and theft is dishonest. So a court might admit evidence of Defendant's honesty, as well as evidence of his gentleness.

However, the Federal Rules of Evidence limit the ways in which a defendant's character traits may be proven. See FED. R. EVID. 405(a). In particular, "proof may [only] be made by testimony as to reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion." Id. See also Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469 (1948).

Here, Buddy did not testify as to his own opinion or Defendant's community reputation. Rather, he said that a few of his friends think that Defendant is honest and gentle. Buddy's testimony about his friends' opinions of Defendant does not qualify as evidence of Defendant's "reputation in the community." "Community" includes circles of associates where one lives, works, or regularly socializes. United States v. Oliver, 492 F.2d 943 (8th Cir. 1974); United States v. Parker, 447 F.2d 826, 830–31 (7th Cir. 1971). Buddy's friends' opinions do not qualify as reputation testimony because the friends met Defendant recently and only a few times.

- (2)(a) Did Astronomy have a security interest in the telescope before Johnson sold it to Smith? Was the security interest perfected?
- (2)(b) Did Astronomy's security interest in the telescope continue to be enforceable after Johnson sold the telescope to Smith?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Bank had a perfected security interest in Astronomy's inventory. When one item of that inventory—the telescope—was sold to Johnson, Johnson took the telescope free of Bank's security interest in it because Johnson was a "buyer in ordinary course of business." Because Johnson owned the telescope free of Bank's security interest, Johnson transferred it to Smith free of that security interest. Astronomy retained a security interest in the telescope when Johnson bought it from Astronomy. The security interest was perfected even though Astronomy did not file a financing statement because the security interest was a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods. When Smith later bought the telescope from Johnson, he took free of Astronomy's security interest because of the protection afforded to buyers in consumer-to-consumer transactions by Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code.

Bank had a perfected security interest in the telescope before it was sold.

Because Astronomy held the telescope for sale, the telescope was part of Astronomy's inventory. See UCC § 9-102(a)(48). Thus, it was covered by the security interest granted by Astronomy to Bank. The security interest was enforceable and attached because the three criteria in UCC § 9-203(b) were fulfilled: value had been given (Bank loaned money to Astronomy), Astronomy had rights in the telescope, and Astronomy had authenticated (signed or its electronic equivalent) a security agreement containing a description of the collateral. Bank's security interest in the telescope was also perfected. Filing the statement satisfied the requirement in UCC § 9-310 that a financing statement must be filed to perfect a nonpossessory security interest in goods.

Point One(b) (30%)

Bank's security interest in the telescope did not continue after the successive sales of the telescope to Johnson and Smith.

As a general rule, a security interest continues after sale of the collateral. UCC § 9-315(a)(1). However, that general rule is subject to many exceptions, one of which applies here: a buyer in ordinary course of business (BIOCOB) takes free of a security interest created by that buyer's seller. See UCC § 9-320(a). A BIOCOB is a buyer who buys goods in good faith, without knowledge that the sale violates the rights of another, from a person in the business of selling goods of the kind, in the ordinary course of the seller's business. See UCC § 1-201(b)(9) (UCC § 1-201(9) in states that have not enacted Revised Article 1). Johnson qualifies as a BIOCOB. Johnson bought the telescope from a person (Astronomy) in the business of selling goods of the kind in the ordinary course of Astronomy's business, and there is no indication in these facts that Johnson failed to act in good faith or had knowledge that the sale violated the rights of another. Because Johnson was a BIOCOB, he took the telescope free of Bank's security interest, which was created by his seller, Astronomy.

Since Johnson owned the telescope free of that security interest, under general property principles all of Johnson's property rights in the telescope were transferred to Smith when Johnson sold the telescope to Smith. See also UCC § 2-403(1). Thus, Smith acquired the telescope free of Bank's security interest. This is known in secured transactions law as the "shelter principle."

Point Two(a) (25%)

Before Johnson sold the telescope, Astronomy had a perfected security interest in it.

The security agreement between Johnson and Astronomy provided that Astronomy retained a security interest in the telescope to secure Johnson's obligation to pay the remainder of the purchase price. The security interest was enforceable and attached because the three criteria in UCC § 9-203(b) were fulfilled: value had been given (the telescope), Johnson had rights in the telescope, and Johnson had authenticated (signed or its electronic equivalent) a security agreement containing a description of the collateral.

Astronomy's security interest in the telescope was also perfected, even though Astronomy did not file a financing statement. This is because Astronomy's security interest was a purchase-money security interest (PMSI) in consumer goods. It was a PMSI because it was retained by the seller of the telescope to secure the buyer's obligation to pay the remainder of the purchase price. See UCC § 9-103. The telescope constituted consumer goods because it was bought by Johnson for personal, family, or household purposes. UCC § 9-309(1) provides that a PMSI in consumer goods perfects automatically upon attachment; thus, it was not necessary for Astronomy to file a financing statement to perfect its security interest.

Astronomy's security interest in the telescope is not enforceable against Smith.

Prior to the sale from Johnson to Smith, Astronomy had a perfected security interest in the telescope. (See Point Two(a).) Smith does not qualify as a BIOCOB because, inter alia, Smith did not buy the telescope from someone in the business of selling goods of that kind. (Johnson was not in the business of selling telescopes.) Thus, Smith did not take free of Astronomy's security interest pursuant to UCC § 9-320(a). However, a buyer of consumer goods takes free of a security interest in those goods if the buyer buys without knowledge of the security interest; gives value; buys for personal, family, or household use; and receives the goods before the filing of any financing statement covering them. See UCC § 9-320(b). Smith fulfilled these criteria. (Recall that Astronomy was not required to file a financing statement to perfect its security interest because it was a purchase-money security interest.) Thus, Smith took the telescope free of Astronomy's security interest in it.

[NOTE: Some examinees may note that Astronomy's rights against Johnson constitute chattel paper in which Bank has a security interest as proceeds of its original collateral. This is correct but does not affect the answer to the question posed because Smith is free of both security interests.]

Legal Problems

- (1)(a) Did use of a stun device to shock Claimant establish a prima facie case of battery?
- (1)(b) Did frisking Claimant establish a prima facie case of battery?
- (2) Did Claimant consent to either the frisk or the stun-device shock?
- (3) Is the manufacturing defect in the Alertco device actionable in strict products liability?
- (4) Can Claimant recover damages for her depressive reaction to the malfunctioning stun device even though that depressive reaction was unforeseeable?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A prima facie case of battery is established when the plaintiff shows that she suffered a harmful or offensive contact and that the defendant intended to cause such a contact. Guard's use of a stun device against Claimant meets this test because Guard intentionally administered a painful and physically incapacitating shock to Claimant's body. However, it is unclear whether Inspector's frisk of Claimant's body satisfies this test, as such a frisk may not be sufficiently offensive to constitute battery and Inspector may have been unaware that Claimant would be offended by the frisk. Moreover, because conduct can manifest consent, Claimant may have consented to the frisk when she walked through the metal detector. On the other hand, Claimant did not manifest consent to being shocked with the stun device.

A manufacturer is strictly liable for manufacturing defects. Alertco is thus liable for the defective stun device because the defect arose during the manufacturing process.

Because a tort defendant "takes his victim as he finds him," Claimant may recover for her unforeseeable depressive reaction to the stun device.

Point One(a) (20%)

A prima facie case of battery is established when the plaintiff shows that she suffered a harmful or offensive contact and that the defendant intended to cause such a contact. Guard's use of a stun device against Claimant satisfies this test. Thus, because Guard was acting within the scope of his employment, Claimant can establish a prima facie case against Metro.

An actor is subject to liability to another for battery if (a) he acts intending to cause a harmful or offensive contact with the person and (b) a harmful or offensive contact results. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS §§ 13 (Battery: Harmful Contact) & 18 (Battery: Offensive Contact) (1965). Intent, for purposes of establishing a battery, means either that “the actor desires to cause [the] consequences of his act” or that he “knows that the consequences are certain, or substantially certain, to result from his act” Id. § 8A & cmt. b.

Guard’s use of a stun device to subdue Claimant meets these standards for an actionable battery. First, the use of a stun device both incapacitates the target and causes the target to suffer pain. Either effect constitutes “bodily harm” for purposes of establishing a prima facie case of battery. See id. § 15 (“bodily harm” includes “any physical impairment of the condition of another’s body, or physical pain or illness”). Second, Guard certainly used the stun device for the purpose of physically impairing Claimant. His goal was to make it easier to subdue Claimant by causing physical impairment. Furthermore, although the facts do not say so explicitly, it is a reasonable assumption that Guard was aware that stun devices cause pain when they are used against someone. Thus, Guard’s actions amount to battery: Guard intended to, and did, cause a harmful contact with Claimant. Because Guard was acting within the scope of his employment, Claimant can establish a prima facie case against Metro.

It is unclear whether Inspector’s frisk of Claimant establishes a prima facie case of battery. It is possible that Claimant will not be able to show intent to cause a harmful or offensive contact.

Inspector’s frisk of Claimant was not harmful, but a contact can also constitute battery if it is offensive. “A bodily contact is offensive if it offends a reasonable sense of personal dignity.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 19 (1965). The facts make clear that Claimant found the contact offensive, but this is not determinative. Claimant must additionally show that being frisked offends a “reasonable” sense of dignity.

The frisk in this case was part of a routine screening process, and screening like this is now frequently encountered in airports and other public places. The routine nature of such screening may mean that it is no longer “reasonable” to be offended by it. On the other hand, the fact that Metro generally required employees to ask permission before frisking opera patrons suggests that frisking is often experienced by people as offensive, especially if it occurs without permission. It is thus possible, but not certain, that a routine frisk would be viewed by a court as a contact that “offends a reasonable sense of personal dignity.”

Even if the frisk were considered offensive, a prima facie case of battery based on the frisk cannot be established unless Inspector is shown to have acted with intent to cause an offensive contact. To establish intent, Claimant must show that Inspector had the purpose of causing offense or knew he would cause offense by frisking Claimant. It is not enough to show that Inspector may have been aware of a risk that some patrons would be offended by a frisk. Battery’s protection against “offensive contact” is intended to protect a person’s “dignitary” interest. That interest “is protected only against intentional invasion. The actor is not liable for an act which involves a risk, no matter how great and unreasonable, that it will cause . . . an offensive contact.” Id. § 18, cmt. g (emphasis added).

Because opera patrons were warned of the possibility of being frisked, Inspector may have assumed that they would not be offended by such a contact. On the other hand, Inspector did not warn Claimant before initiating the frisk in question, and it is unclear in what manner Inspector conducted that frisk. Claimant can establish a prima facie case if she can present some facts suggesting that Inspector knew with substantial certainty that Claimant's "reasonable sense of personal dignity" would be offended by Inspector's decision to touch her without warning, or that Inspector knew that the manner in which he touched Claimant would be offensive to her. But, absent some facts suggesting Inspector's knowledge that the frisk would be offensive, the mere fact that Inspector intentionally contacted Claimant's person does not satisfy the requirements for an actionable battery.

Point Two (30%)

Because conduct can manifest consent, Claimant may have consented to being frisked. Claimant did not manifest consent to being shocked with the stun device.

Consent—"willingness in fact for conduct to occur"—is a defense to battery. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 892. Consent "may be manifested by action or inaction and need not be communicated to the actor." Thus, "[i]f words or conduct are reasonably understood by another to be intended as consent, they constitute apparent consent and are as effective as consent in fact." Id.

Claimant did not intend to consent to Inspector's search of her person. Claimant told Friend, "I'm certainly not going to allow anyone to touch me," and told Inspector, "Leave me alone!"

However, a defendant is entitled to rely on objective manifestations of consent. Thus, because Claimant read the warning sign, saw opera patrons being frisked, and still proceeded through the metal detector, Metro can argue that its employee, Inspector, was entitled to infer that Claimant had consented to being frisked herself. See O'Brien v. Cunard Steamship Co., 28 N.E. 266, 274 (Mass. 1891) (finding that the plaintiff consented to vaccination when she stood in line with other passengers and "there was nothing in [her] . . . conduct . . . to indicate . . . that she did not wish to obtain a [vaccination] card").

On the other hand, the fact that Metro usually required its employees to request permission before frisking patrons suggests that it did not infer consent to frisking from a patron's decision to proceed through the metal detector. A court thus might conclude that it was unreasonable to infer Claimant's consent to being frisked.

Metro has no possible argument that Claimant consented to being shocked with a stun device. Claimant did not see the stun device in use, and there were no signs warning of its use.

There are no other defenses available to Metro. The privilege to exercise force in self-defense or defense of others is unavailable because Claimant's statement ("Leave me alone!") could not reasonably be interpreted as a threat. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 63 ("An actor is privileged to use reasonable force . . . to defend himself against unprivileged harmful or offensive contact or other bodily harm which he reasonably believes that another is about to inflict . . .").

Point Three (15%)

A manufacturer is strictly liable for a defective product. Alertco is thus liable for the defective stun device even though Claimant cannot show that Alertco was negligent.

Alertco's product contained a manufacturing defect; it failed to meet Alertco's own specifications, and the defect occurred during the product's manufacture. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TORTS: PRODUCTS LIABILITY § 2 (1998). In order to recover for injuries sustained because of a manufacturing defect, a plaintiff need not show that the manufacturer was negligent. The manufacturer is strictly liable whenever “the product departs from its intended design even though all possible care was exercised in the preparation and marketing of the product . . .” Id. In this case, the evidence establishes that the defect occurred during the manufacturing process. Thus, despite Alertco’s excellent quality control, it is strictly liable to Claimant.

Because a tort defendant “takes his victim as he finds him,” Claimant may recover for her unforeseeable depressive reaction to the stun device.

“When an actor’s tortious conduct causes harm to a person that, because of a preexisting physical or mental condition or other characteristics of the person, is of a greater magnitude or different type than might reasonably be expected, the actor is nevertheless subject to liability for all such harm to the person.” RESTATEMENT OF TORTS: LIABILITY FOR PHYSICAL HARM § 31 (2010). Thus, the plaintiff with an “eggshell skull” who suffers injuries different from or greater than those that a normal victim would suffer is entitled to recover fully for his injuries.

Claimant’s history of depression is a preexisting condition, like an eggshell skull. Thus, despite the fact that a depressive reaction to the stun device was unforeseeable, Alertco is liable for both Claimant’s physical and psychological injuries. See Bartolone v. Jeckovich, 481 N.Y.S.2d 545 (N.Y. App. Div. 1984); Steinhauser v. Hertz Corp., 421 F.2d 1169 (2d Cir. 1970).

Both the support and property-division provisions of a separation agreement may be invalidated based on a finding of unconscionability or fraud. Here, there are insufficient facts to support a finding of unconscionability with respect to the property-division or spousal-support portions of the agreement. Given the variety of approaches currently applied by the states to paternity misrepresentation and disestablishment, it is unclear whether the court erred in denying Husband's petition to invalidate the child-support provisions of the separation agreement.

A spousal- or child-support order may be modified based on a change of circumstances after the order was entered. However, there has been no change of circumstances in this case because Husband knew or should have known of the economic needs of his intended wife and stepchildren before signing the agreement, and there is no evidence that those needs have changed. It is unclear whether Husband can obtain modification of his child-support obligation based on his nonpaternity of Child.

A separation agreement may be invalidated, in whole or in part, based on unconscionability or fraud. Here, there are insufficient facts to support a finding of unconscionability with respect to the property-division or spousal-support portions of the agreement. Given the variety of approaches currently applied by the states to paternity misrepresentation and disestablishment, it is unclear whether the trial court erred in denying Husband's petition to invalidate the child-support provisions of the separation agreement based on fraud.

All states authorize invalidation of a separation agreement, or a specific portion of such an agreement, based on a finding of fraud or unconscionability. Here, there is no evidence of asset or income misrepresentation. And, although judicial interpretations of the unconscionability test vary (compare Jameson v. Jameson, 239 N.W.2d 5 (S.D. 1976) with Williams v. Williams, 508 A.2d 985 (Md. 1986)), the facts do not appear to support an unconscionability finding with respect to the property-division or spousal-support portions of the agreement. The parties were represented by separate counsel, and there is no evidence of asset nondisclosure. Nor will the unconscionability doctrine serve to relieve a spouse whose complaint is simply that he believes he made a bad bargain. See Jameson, 239 N.W.2d at 7. It is not even clear that Husband made a bad bargain. Although he did receive fewer assets than Wife, most states require equitable, not equal, division of assets, and equity is determined through a complex assessment of contribution and need-based factors. See HARRY A. KRAUSE ET AL., FAMILY LAW: CASES, COMMENTS, AND QUESTIONS (6th ed. 2007) at 752. Moreover, the agreement requires Husband to pay only $10,800 per year (13.5 percent of his total income) in combined child and spousal support. Many state child-support guidelines would require Husband to pay this much or more in child support alone. See id. at 891–93 (reviewing support guidelines). Thus, it is highly unlikely that an appellate court would find reversible error in the trial court’s refusal to invalidate these portions of the agreement based on unconscionability.

It is unclear whether an appellate court would find reversible error in the trial court’s refusal to invalidate the child-support portion of the agreement, however. It is now apparent that Husband is not Child’s biological parent. Arguably, Wife’s failure to alert Husband to this possibility was a form of misrepresentation which might support a finding of fraud. A few courts have permitted tort actions against a wife who misrepresented her husband’s paternity. See Miller v. Miller, 956 P.2d 887 (Okla. 1998); G.A.W., III v. D.M.W., 596 N.W.2d 284 (Minn. App. 1999). In a state with such case law, it is possible that an appellate court might conclude that Wife’s conduct provided a basis for invalidating the child-support provisions of the agreement. See Point Three, infra.

Point Two (10%)

A divorce property-division award is not subject to modification.

Although a support award may be modified after a divorce decree has been entered, a property-division award, whether it results from a judicial decision or a divorce settlement agreement, may not be modified after a divorce decree has been entered. See KRAUSE ET AL., supra, at 991. This distinction rests on a fundamental difference between support and property division. A support order requires payment, over what may be a long period of time, of post-divorce income, while a property-division award divides assets accrued during the marriage based on the equities at the time of divorce. Property division thus reflects an evaluation of the past, and support determination reflects an evaluation of the future. Because the future is unpredictable, courts are empowered to modify a support award to take account of changed circumstances. Because the past can be ascertained, courts are not empowered to reconsider that evaluation and modify a property-division award once it has been embodied in a final judgment of divorce. Thus, the trial court did not err in refusing to modify the property-division provisions of the divorce decree.

Point Three (25%)

A spousal-support award may be modified when the court finds that there has been a substantial change in a party’s circumstances. Because Husband knew of his future obligations to his new spouse and stepchildren at the time he signed the agreement, there is no change of circumstances in this case.

In all states, a spousal-support award may be modified based on a change in a party's circumstances. Most courts require that such a change be substantial. See HARRY D. KRAUSE & DAVID D. MEYER, FAMILY LAW IN A NUTSHELL, 303–05 (5th ed. 2007).

A court may take into account legal obligations to a new spouse and/or children in determining whether there has been a change in circumstances that warrants modification of a support award. See id. However, in this case, Husband does not have new adopted or biological children to whom he owes support; he has stepchildren. In most states, a stepparent relationship creates no legal support obligations. See id. at 175–76.

More importantly, a change in circumstances that is anticipated may not serve as a basis for modification of a support order. See M.L. Cross, Annotation, Change in Financial Condition or Needs of Husband or Wife as Ground for Modification of Decree for Alimony or Maintenance, 18 A.L.R.2d 10 § 3 (1951 & Supp.). Here, Husband knew about the support needs of Fiancée and her children at the time he signed the separation agreement; Husband was living with Fiancée and the children at the time the agreement was signed, and his planned marriage to Fiancée was the reason Husband was willing to sign the agreement as presented. Thus, because Husband's decision to sign the agreement and accept these support obligations was made with full knowledge of his impending marriage, he cannot now claim that marriage as a change of circumstances that warrants modification of his obligations under the divorce decree. Therefore, the trial court should not modify the spousal-support award based on the needs of Husband's new wife and her children.

Point Four (25%)

It is unclear whether the trial court erred in refusing to modify the child-support award based on Husband's nonpaternity of Child.

Traditionally, courts have been extremely reluctant to terminate an established parent-child relationship and have relied on a wide range of equitable and procedural principles to avoid doing so. Some courts have found that a prior legal judgment, such as the divorce decree terminating Husband's and Wife's marriage, bars the introduction of nonpaternity evidence based on application of res judicata or collateral estoppel principles. See Alan Stephens, Annotation, Parental Rights of Man Who Is Not Biological or Adoptive Father of Child but Was Husband or Cohabitant of Mother When Child Was Conceived or Born, 84 A.L.R.4th 655 (1991 & Supp.) (collecting cases). Other courts have relied on the equitable doctrines of estoppel and laches to achieve the same result. See AM. LAW INST., PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF FAMILY DISSOLUTION: ANALYSIS & RECOMMENDATIONS § 3.03 cmt. d (2002); John C. Williams, Annotation, Laches or Acquiescence as Defense, so as to Bar Recovery of Arrearages of Permanent Alimony or Child Support, 5 A.L.R.4th 1015 (1981 & Supp.). Moreover, some courts have simply cited the child's best interest, without relying on any specific legal principle, as justification either for denying permission to introduce evidence of nonpaternity or for denying a petition to disestablish paternity. See, e.g., Godin v. Godin, 725 A.2d 904, 911 (Vt. 1998). See also Stephens, supra. Under this latter approach, the trial court correctly denied Husband's petition to modify his support obligation based on his nonpaternity because Child is 10 years old, Husband is the only father Child has known, and there is no evidence that another father-child relationship could be established.

However, in recent years, a number of courts have placed greater emphasis on the interests of erroneously identified fathers. For example, in M.A.S. v. Mississippi Department of Human Services, 842 So. 2d 527 (Miss. 2003), the Mississippi Supreme Court held that a paternity judgment could be vacated more than nine years after its entry based on DNA tests performed in an unrelated matter which revealed that the petitioner was not the child's biological father. Although M.A.S. involved a nonmarital child, the Mississippi courts have since applied its reasoning in a case brought by a divorced petitioner. Although the petitioner had lived with the child only during its first month of life and had limited contact thereafter, the court did not rely on the tenuous parent-child relationship in granting the disestablishment petition. Instead, the court stated its belief that "the best interest of the child . . . is to know the identity of the natural father" and "refuse[d] to sanction the manifest injustice of forcing a man to support a child which science has proven not to be his." Williams v. Williams, 843 So. 2d 720, 723 (Miss. 2003). See also Doran v. Doran, 820 A.2d 1279 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2003) (utilizing similar approach).

Some states have also adopted new paternity disestablishment legislation that places greater emphasis on the interests of erroneously identified fathers. See, e.g., GA. CODE ANN. § 19-7-54 (2009) (mandating paternity disestablishment in certain circumstances when genetic testing demonstrates a zero percent probability of paternity). See also Paula Roberts, Truth and Consequences: Part II. Questioning the Paternity of Marital Children, 37 FAM. L.Q. 55, 94 (Appendix F) (2003) (listing 12 state statutes allowing paternity disestablishment by a married father and noting a strong trend toward enactment of such legislation). Under a legislative or judicial standard which permits paternity disestablishment without regard to the child's relational and financial interests, a court could appropriately accept the blood tests offered by Husband, enter a finding of nonpaternity, and terminate Husband's support obligation.

In a state where the courts or the legislature has adopted rules favoring the ability of erroneously identified fathers to prove nonpaternity, Husband's motion to disestablish his paternity and eliminate his child-support obligation would be more likely to succeed. Even in such states, if Husband was aware of his nonpaternity and had an opportunity to litigate the issue at the time of entry of the divorce decree, courts are likely to treat the divorce decree as res judicata on the paternity issue and conclude that there are no changed circumstances warranting a modification of the child-support order. Nancy Darlene M. v. James Lee M., Jr., 400 S.E.2d 882 (W. Va. 1990). However, some courts have allowed motions to modify a child-support order in a divorce decree on the basis of nonpaternity, even when that issue was litigated in the original action, reasoning that a motion to modify is a direct attack on the judgment, not a collateral attack, and therefore is not barred by res judicata principles. Dixon v. Pouncy, 979 P.2d 520, 524 (Alaska 1999).

- (3) If Retailer breached the contract, is Retailer liable for punitive damages?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Retailer and Designer entered into a new, modified contract which Retailer breached. Designer’s opening statement was an offer. However, because Retailer’s response added a condition, his need to take out a loan to obtain the cash to pay early, the response did not constitute acceptance of Designer’s offer. Rather, Retailer’s response was a counteroffer, which Designer accepted, thereby creating a contract. That contract contained Retailer’s implied promise to make a good-faith effort to borrow the needed cash. Retailer did make some efforts to get the cash, but these efforts were not sufficient to constitute good faith. Therefore, Retailer breached the contract by not acting in good faith.

The ordinary measure of damages in a contract action is expectation damages, which aim to put the nonbreaching party in the position he expected to be in following full performance. Here, if Retailer had not breached, Designer would have had $15,000 to make an investment that would have netted a $35,000 gain. Because these losses were foreseeable and reasonably certain, Designer will be able to recover his actual damages.

Designer will not be able to collect punitive damages because Retailer’s conduct was not tortious.

Point One(a) (40%)

Designer made an offer to Retailer to modify their existing contract. Retailer did not accept the offer. Instead, Retailer made a counteroffer, which Designer then accepted, forming a modified contract.

Designer's statement "I need cash quickly to make an investment. . . . [I]f you promise now to pay me $15,000 in cash by the 25th of this month, I will accept that payment as satisfying your obligation under our contract for this year" was an offer to enter into a new, modified contract. Retailer did not accept this offer. Instead, Retailer said, "Thanks. That's a good deal. I don't have the cash to pay you now. I'll do it if I can get a loan." This response, impliedly making Retailer's obligation to perform conditioned upon his getting a loan, contained an additional term and was, therefore, a counteroffer. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 59. Designer's response, "That will be great," indicated assent to the terms of Retailer's counteroffer even though it did not include specific words of acceptance. There was consideration for the modified contract under the bargained-for-exchange test because Designer agreed to accept a reduced payment and Retailer agreed to pay early if he could get a loan. See id. § 71.

It might be argued that Retailer's response did not constitute a counteroffer because Retailer did not explicitly state that his performance was conditioned upon getting a loan. However, Retailer's response made it clear that Retailer could not complete the contract unless Retailer obtained a loan, and Designer certainly understood this. Therefore, the parties entered into a contract on the terms offered by Retailer.

[NOTE: An examinee may discuss this issue in terms of an amendment to the existing contract. Such an analysis should receive full credit.]

Point One(b) (30%)

Retailer breached the contract by failing to make good-faith efforts to obtain the necessary loan.

Retailer might argue that because he did not get the loan, his obligation to pay never arose and he was not in breach. In fact, the language used only suggested that Retailer's obligation to perform would be subject to a condition precedent, that is, his getting the loan.

However, the contract contained an implied obligation to make good-faith efforts to obtain a loan. Without such an implied obligation, the contract would be illusory because Retailer would have no obligation. See Wood v. Lucy, Lady Duff-Gordon, 222 N.Y. 88, 118 N.E. 214 (1917); Mezzanotte v. Freeland, 200 S.E.2d 410 (N.C. Ct. App. 1973).

To satisfy the requirement of making good-faith efforts, Retailer must have taken reasonable steps to obtain the necessary cash. Here, Retailer did no more than pick up two loan applications which he did not even submit. His actions were not sufficient to constitute a good-faith effort to obtain the loan. Retailer therefore breached the contract.

Point Two (20%)

Designer is entitled to recover from Retailer his actual damages, which would include the gain that he would have realized on the investment he intended to make.

The normal measure of damages for breach of contract is expectation damages, which aim to give the nonbreaching party the benefit of his bargain. See FARNSWORTH, CONTRACTS § 12.1 (3d ed. 2004). Expectation damages must be foreseeable, see Hadley v. Baxendale, 156 Eng. Rep. 145 (1854), and proved with reasonable certainty, see FARNSWORTH, supra, § 12.1.

Here, when Designer made the initial offer, he stated that he needed cash quickly to make a potentially profitable investment. On these facts, it is foreseeable that Designer would not be able to make the investment when Retailer failed to make timely payment. It is not necessary that the profitability of the investment be foreseeable at the time of the breach. It is enough that the fact of the investment is foreseeable, and here it was, because Designer told Retailer that

Contracts Analysis

Designer needed the cash to make an investment, making the damages foreseeable. The facts state that Designer can prove that he would have made $35,000 on the investment, making the damages reasonably certain. Therefore, Retailer is liable for Designer's actual damages.

Point Three (10%)

Designer is not entitled to recover punitive damages because such damages are not ordinarily recoverable in a contract action.

Punitive damages are not generally recoverable as an element of damages in a breach of contract action "unless the conduct constituting the breach is also a tort for which punitive damages [can be recovered]." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 355. The facts do not indicate any conduct on the part of Retailer that would constitute a tort compensable through punitive damages. Therefore, Designer is not entitled to recover punitive damages.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) When did Delta's corporate existence begin?
- (2) Is Adam, Baker, or Clark personally liable on the Mega contract?
- (3) Is Adam, Baker, or Clark personally liable on the Sole contract?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Delta's corporate existence began only upon Adam's filing of Delta's articles of incorporation on November 15. The recitation in the articles of a stated earlier effective date (September 1) is of no legal consequence. Only Adam is personally liable on the Mega contract because Adam alone participated in entering into the contract with knowledge that the articles had not been filed. Adam and Baker, but not Clark, are liable on the Sole contract. That contract was executed by Delta before its articles were filed. Adam and Baker, but not Clark, participated in entering into the contract with knowledge that Delta's articles had not been filed. Thus, Adam and Baker are personally liable for the Sole contract, and Clark is not personally liable.

Point One (20%)

Delta achieved corporate status upon the filing of its articles of incorporation on November 15. The filing of Delta's articles of incorporation does not relate back to the earlier date of September 1 specified in the articles.

Under the Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA) § 2.03(a) (1984, with 2000 amendments), ". . . corporate existence begins when the articles of incorporation are filed." Because "[i]ncorporation under modern statutes is so simple and inexpensive . . . nothing short of filing articles of incorporation should create the privilege of limited liability." Id., ch. 2 official cmt.

This date-of-filing rule applies even if the filed articles recite an effective date prior to the date of filing. The MBCA allows the parties to specify "a delayed effective date" but not an earlier effective date. Id. § 2.03(a). Thus, the recitation in Delta's articles of an earlier effective date is ineffective; Delta's corporate existence began on the date that Adam filed the articles.

Point Two (40%)

When a corporation's articles of incorporation have not been filed, persons purporting to act for the corporation are personally liable for corporate debts if they knew when the debt was incurred that there was no incorporation.

The fact that Delta's articles of incorporation were not filed when Delta entered into the contract with Mega does not automatically make Adam, Baker, and Clark liable to Mega for amounts due on that contract. Under the MBCA, "[a]ll persons purporting to act as or on behalf of a corporation, knowing there was no incorporation under this Act, are jointly and severally liable for all liabilities created while so acting." § 2.04. Thus, under § 2.04 both the participation and knowledge requirements must be met to hold any of Adam, Baker, and Clark liable.

With regard to the Mega contract, only Adam purported to act on Delta's behalf and only Adam knew that Delta's articles had not been filed. Therefore, Adam is personally liable on the Mega contract. On the other hand, neither Baker nor Clark satisfies either the participation or knowledge requirement. Thus, neither is liable on the Mega contract.

[NOTE: The facts clearly state when Baker learned that the articles had not been filed: October 15. Clark, however, at all times believed that Delta's articles of incorporation had been filed.]

[NOTE: Examinees may discuss the de facto incorporation doctrine under which a shareholder is not liable for the obligations of a defectively incorporated corporation when there was "a bona fide attempt to organize . . . and colorable or apparent compliance with the requirements of the law." Gillette v. Aurora Ry. Co., 81 N.E. 1005, 1009 (Ill. 1907); Milligan v. Milligan, 956 So. 2d 1066, 1074 (Miss. Ct. App. 2007). Such analysis is inapplicable here. First, the MBCA (which the facts state governs this problem) abolished the doctrine. Even in a non-MBCA jurisdiction, the doctrine would not apply here because Adam did nothing to attempt compliance with the statutory requirements. "Without allegations that a certificate of formation was ever prepared or filed, there is no basis . . . to claim a good-faith attempt to comply with [statutory requirements]." Leber Associates, LLC v. The Entertainment Group Fund, Inc., No. 00 Civ. 3759, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13009 at *33 (S.D.N.Y. July 29, 2003) (applying Delaware law).]

Point Three (40%)

Persons purporting to act for a corporation are personally liable for a corporate contract if they entered into the contract with knowledge that there was no incorporation.

When a corporation's articles of incorporation have not been filed, a person is liable for pre-incorporation transactions only when the person purporting to act on behalf of a corporation not yet formed possesses actual knowledge that the corporation's charter has not yet been issued. See MBCA § 2.04; Weir v. Kirby Construction Co., Inc., 446 S.E.2d 186 (1994). It is not enough to establish liability that a person should have inquired about the entity's status and should have known that the corporation was not formed, as those facts do not rise to the level of actual knowledge required. See Sivers v. R & F Capital Corp., 858 P.2d 895, 898 (Or. Ct. App. 1993).

Here, with regard to the Sole contract, Adam and Baker knew that Delta's articles of incorporation had not been filed at the time Delta entered into that contract, while Clark did not know. Baker might argue that, as a mere prospective shareholder, he was not a "[person] purporting to act as or on behalf of a corporation," MBCA § 2.04, and thus has no liability. This argument is likely to fail. With regard to the Sole contract, Baker was more than a prospective shareholder—he participated in the negotiation of the contract and therefore purported to act on behalf of a corporation. Further, the official commentary to § 2.04 suggests that its protection does not extend to individuals in Baker's position. ("[Section 2.04] does not foreclose the possibility that persons who urge defendants to execute contracts in the corporate name knowing that no steps to incorporate have been taken may be estopped to impose personal liability on individual defendants.”) Rather, the provision is intended to shield those who erroneously but in good faith believe that the necessary documents have been filed. See Cranson v. IBM, 200 A.2d 33 (Md. 1964). Here, at the time of the Sole contract, Baker knew that Delta’s articles had not been filed and therefore did not have the necessary good-faith belief to the contrary. Thus, Baker, together with Adam, will be personally liable on the Sole contract. Clark, however, is not liable because he does not meet the participation requirement nor does he satisfy the knowledge requirement; he believed at all relevant times that the articles had in fact been filed. However, even if Clark had knowledge that the articles had not been filed, he would not be liable on the Sole contract because he does not meet the participation requirement.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure I.A.1; IV.A. & C.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) May a defendant make a motion to dismiss for insufficiency of service of process when the defendant has already moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted?
- (2) Do the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit a defendant to join a cross-claim against a co-defendant if it arises out of the same events as the plaintiff's claim against the defendants?
- (3)(a) Does a federal district court have independent subject-matter jurisdiction over a state law cross-claim for $20,000 between two defendants who are citizens of the same state?
- (3)(b) Does a federal district court have supplemental subject-matter jurisdiction over a state law cross-claim for $20,000 between two defendants who are citizens of the same state?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Because Bartender made a motion to dismiss the action against him for failure to state a cause of action without raising his defense of insufficiency of service of process, he was barred from raising that defense at a later time. The court therefore was correct in denying his motion, even if Bartender had a valid claim that the manner of service was improper.

Bartender's claim against Dave arises out of the same transaction or occurrence as Plaintiff's claim. The claim therefore qualifies as a cross-claim under Rule 13(g) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and Bartender may state that claim in his answer to the complaint.

A federal court would not have subject-matter jurisdiction over Bartender's claim against Dave if that claim were filed as an independent action. However, Plaintiff's original claim and Bartender's cross-claim are sufficiently closely related to form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution. Accordingly, the supplemental jurisdiction statute authorizes the federal court to take jurisdiction over Bartender's cross-claim.

The court correctly denied Bartender's motion to dismiss for insufficiency of service of process because that defense was not raised when Bartender made his motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim.

Although it is likely that service of process was improper in this case, the district court nonetheless was correct to deny Bartender's motion to dismiss on that basis. Bartender initially responded to Plaintiff's complaint by making a motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action. FED. R. CIV. P. 12(b)(6). When that motion was denied, Bartender moved to dismiss for insufficiency of service of process. FED. R. CIV. P. 12(b)(5).

When a motion pursuant to Rule 12(b) is initially made, a party may join with that motion all other motions permitted by Rule 12 that are then available to the party. If a party makes a Rule 12(b) motion and fails to join certain other available defenses or objections, the party may not later raise those objections and defenses. In particular, a party that makes a Rule 12(b) motion but omits from that motion a defense of insufficiency of service of process is deemed to have waived that defense. FED. R. CIV. P. 12(h)(1).

Because Bartender made a Rule 12(b) motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim but did not join his available defense of insufficiency of service of process, Bartender waived that defense. Hence, the district court was correct to deny Bartender's motion to dismiss on that ground. It does not matter that Bartender appears to have had a valid claim that service was improper.

Point Two (30%)

Rule 13(g) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permits a defendant, in the answer, to state a cross-claim against a co-defendant if it arises out of the same transaction or occurrence as the original claim.

Rule 13(g) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides that a defendant's answer may state as a cross-claim against a co-defendant any claim that "aris[es] out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the original action" between the plaintiff and the defendants. The policy underlying Rule 13(g) is efficiency; multiple lawsuits are avoided if defendants bring related cross-claims in the context of the plaintiff's suit. 6 CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT ET AL., FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE CIVIL § 1431, at 267 (2010).

Here, Plaintiff's claims concern Dave's injury of Plaintiff and Bartender's service of alcohol to Dave. Bartender's cross-claim concerns Dave's injury of Bartender. The question is whether these various claims arise out of the same transaction or occurrence.

To determine whether two different claims arise out of the same "transaction or occurrence" for purposes of Rule 13, federal courts look at a number of factors: (1) whether the issues of fact and law in the plaintiff's claim and the defendant's cross-claim are essentially the same, (2) whether the same evidence would support or refute the plaintiff's claim and the defendant's cross-claim, (3) whether there is a logical relationship between the plaintiff's claim and the defendant's cross-claim, and (4) whether res judicata would bar a subsequent suit on the cross-claim. See, e.g., Q Int'l Courier, Inc. v. Smoak, 441 F.3d 214, 219 (4th Cir. 2006) (interpreting the same words in Rule 13(a), the compulsory counterclaim rule); 6 WRIGHT ET AL., supra, §§ 1410, 1431 at 277 (stating that "the standard for asserting a cross-claim is basically the same as that for a compulsory counterclaim"). The presence of any of these factors supports a conclusion that the "transaction or occurrence" requirement is met. See Glass v. IDS Financial Serv., Inc., 778 F. Supp. 1029, 1061–62 (D. Minn. 1991); 6 WRIGHT ET AL., supra, § 1410 at 58.

The most frequently considered factor is whether there is a logical relationship between the defendant's cross-claim and the plaintiff's original claim. 6 WRIGHT ET AL., supra, § 1410 at 61, 65. Here, the alleged batteries of Plaintiff and Bartender occurred in the same place, within seconds of one another. Bartender's efforts to intercede in the initial battery presumably prompted Dave to injure Bartender. There appears to be a causal link, and thus a logical relationship, between the two claims.

In addition, the two claims involve almost identical factual and legal issues. Both Plaintiff's claim against Dave and Bartender's cross-claim against Dave are claims for battery arising under State A's law. Both claims involve factual questions about the cause and course of the fight in which Dave, Bartender, and Plaintiff were involved. Even though the factual issues may differ—whether Dave battered Plaintiff is a distinct question from whether Dave battered Bartender—the substantial overlap between the legal and factual issues supports the conclusion that the claims arise from the same transaction or occurrence. The identity-of-issues inquiry does not require a complete overlap between the claim and the cross-claim. Id. § 1410, at 59.

The “same evidence” test is also likely to be satisfied. To prove the battery claim against Dave, Plaintiff will need the testimony of witnesses to the brawl. It is likely that the patrons of the bar who witnessed Dave's alleged battery of Plaintiff also witnessed Dave's alleged battery of Bartender. Thus, a substantial amount of the evidence (i.e., the testimony of the witnesses to the event) will be the same.

The only factor that militates against allowing Bartender to bring a cross-claim is that a judgment on Plaintiff's claim against Dave would not preclude Bartender, who is not in privity with either Dave or Plaintiff, from suing on his own claim. Denying Bartender the ability to bring the claim would not prevent him from having his case heard at some future point. Id. § 1431, at 275–76. However, given that Bartender's claim against Dave is logically related to Plaintiff's claims, that it raises overlapping factual and legal issues, and that the same evidence is relevant to both claims, a court should allow Bartender's claim to be included as a cross-claim in Bartender's answer.

A federal district court would not have independent subject-matter jurisdiction over a state law cross-claim for $20,000 between two defendants who are citizens of the same state because the claim does not arise under federal law, the claimants are not diverse, and the amount-in-controversy requirement for diversity cases is not satisfied.

The federal question statute grants the federal district courts original jurisdiction “of all civil actions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States.” 28 U.S.C. § 1331. A claim arises under federal law if federal law creates the cause of action. Merrell Dow Pharms. Inc. v. Thompson, 478 U.S. 804, 808 (1986); Am. Well Works Co. v. Layne & Bowler Co., 241 U.S. 257, 260 (1916) (Holmes, J.) (“A suit arises under the law [that] creates the cause of action.”). Here, state law creates Bartender's battery claim against Dave. Under this test, Bartender's cross-claim does not arise under federal law, and therefore the court would not have jurisdiction under the federal question statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1331.

Nor would a federal court have diversity jurisdiction over Bartender's claim. First, there is no diversity. Bartender and Dave are both citizens of State A. Second, Bartender is seeking damages of only $20,000, well below the $75,000 jurisdictional minimum in diversity actions. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(1).

Point Three(b) (20%)

A federal district court would have supplemental subject-matter jurisdiction over a state law cross-claim for $20,000 between citizens of the same state as long as it is so related to the plaintiff's claim against the defendants, of which the court has original jurisdiction, that the claims form part of the "same case or controversy" under Article III of the Constitution.

In the instant case, the federal district court has original diversity jurisdiction over Plaintiff's claims against Bartender and Dave. 28 U.S.C. § 1332. Each claim is for an amount in excess of $75,000, and Plaintiff, a citizen of State B, is diverse from both defendants, who are citizens of State A.

The supplemental jurisdiction statute permits federal district courts that have original jurisdiction of a civil action to assert "supplemental jurisdiction over all other claims that are so related to claims in the action within such original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution." 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a). Claims form part of the "same case or controversy" under Article III if they "derive from a common nucleus of operative fact." United Mine Workers of America v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 725 (1966). Cross-claims that satisfy Rule 13(g)'s "transaction or occurrence" test presumptively satisfy the Gibbs "common nucleus of operative fact" test and are within the court's supplemental jurisdiction. 13 WRIGHT ET AL., supra, § 3523, at 165–73. As noted in Point One, Bartender's claim and Plaintiff's claims arise out of the same occurrence, raise many of the same factual and legal issues, and will be proved, in part, by the same evidence. These claims clearly arise out of a "common nucleus of operative fact"—the bar fight that gave rise to all the claims in the case.

Because Bartender's claim is part of the "same case or controversy" as Plaintiff's original claims, it falls within the federal court's supplemental jurisdiction.

Legal Problems

- (1) Was Testator's will validly executed?
- (2) Should the life insurance proceeds be distributed to Niece or Cousin?
- (3) Does the handwritten memorandum found in Testator's safe-deposit box determine the disposition of Testator's jewelry?
- (4) Did the bequest to Husband lapse?
- (5) How should the general bequests in Testator's will abate?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Testator's will is valid and should be admitted to probate because Testator complied with the statutory requirements in executing the will. Testator's life insurance proceeds will probably go to Niece because life insurance contracts almost always disallow alteration of a beneficiary designation in a life insurance contract by will, and most states have upheld such contractual requirements. Testator's jewelry will probably go to Niece because the memorandum describing the gift to Niece preexisted Testator's will and thus was incorporated by reference into Testator's will. The gift of $40,000 to Husband lapsed because he predeceased Testator, and bequests to spouses are not typically saved from lapse by an antilapse statute. It is irrelevant that Husband had a child who survived Testator. The general bequests of $25,000 each to Church, Library, and School must be abated because there are insufficient funds ($60,000) to pay these bequests. Because there are no indications in the will specifying a different abatement scheme, Church, Library, and School will take equal shares (i.e., $20,000) of Testator's bank account. As a result of the abatement, nothing remains in the estate to pass to Son. Niece need not contribute to those general bequests because life insurance proceeds are nonprobate assets not governed by the will. Furthermore, the devise of items listed in a memorandum was specific, and specific devises are the last to abate.

Point One (20%)

Because Testator complied with the statutory execution requirements, her will is valid.

Here, state law disallows "all holographic wills and codicils." A holographic will is an unwitnessed will in a testator's handwriting. Testator's will was not holographic even though written in the testator's hand because it was signed and witnessed.

State law does provide that a will is not valid unless it is “acknowledged by the testator to the witnesses and signed by the testator in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses, who shall sign their names below that of the testator within 30 days.” Testator signed her will in the presence of three witnesses who, on the same day, signed their names below hers. Testator acknowledged the instrument to be her will when she stated, “This is my will. I would like each of you to witness it.” Therefore, Testator’s will is valid because its execution complied with the law of the state.

Point Two (20%)

Niece will probably take Testator’s life insurance because, in most states, Testator could not change her life insurance beneficiary except as specified in her life insurance contract.

If an insured dies while a life insurance policy is in effect, the policy proceeds are payable to the named beneficiary. Although the owner of a life insurance policy typically retains the right to change the named beneficiary without obtaining that beneficiary’s consent, the owner must do so in accordance with procedures specified in the life insurance contract.

Life insurance contracts almost never permit a change of beneficiary by will, and courts have almost invariably upheld such restrictions. See ROBERT J. LYNN & GRAYSON M.P. MCCOUCH, INTRODUCTION TO ESTATE PLANNING IN A NUTSHELL 131–32 (5th ed. 2004); Cook v. Equitable Life Assurance Society, 428 N.E.2d 110 (Ind. Ct. App. 1981). Courts have sometimes found that a beneficiary change that does not comply with the terms of the insurance contract is valid if the policyholder has “substantially complied” with the contract by taking all reasonable steps within his or her power to make the change in accordance with the contract terms. See LYNN & MCCOUCH, supra, at 131–32. Courts in a few states have also upheld a change of beneficiary by will. See, e.g., Burkett v. Mott, 733 P.2d 673 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1986) (relying on insurance company’s failure to object); Connecticut Gen. Life Ins. Co. v. Peterson, 442 F. Supp. 533 (W.D. Mo. 1978).

Here, Testator attempted to change the beneficiary of her policy by naming Cousin as the beneficiary in her will. Assuming that Testator had a standard life insurance contract, such a change would be disallowed. There is nothing in the facts to show that Testator made any attempt to comply with the formalities required by the insurance contract. Thus, unless this state follows the minority approach, Niece, the named beneficiary in the policy, will take the policy proceeds.

Niece will probably take Testator’s jewelry because, in most states, the memorandum describing the bequest was incorporated by reference into Testator’s will.

In most jurisdictions, a writing that exists at the time a will is executed may be incorporated by reference into the will. The will must describe the writing with sufficient particularity that it can be identified, but the writing need not be witnessed or executed with testamentary formalities. See LYNN & MCCOUCH, supra, at 183–84; UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-510.

Here, the memorandum describing the bequest of jewelry to Niece is clearly identified in Testator’s will, and it was found in the location described by Testator. The memorandum is dated on the day before Testator’s will was executed, so it qualifies as a document that can be incorporated by reference. Thus, assuming that this state follows the approach of the overwhelming majority of states and allows incorporation by reference, Niece will take the jewelry.

In addition, some states recognize the right of a testator to dispose of tangible personal property by a signed memorandum, whether prepared before or after the execution of the will, even though it is not executed with the formalities required of wills. See, e.g., Iowa Code § 633.276; UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-513.

[NOTE: The difference between UPC § 2-513 and the incorporation-by-reference doctrine is that the former allows a testator to dispose of tangible personal property by a signed memorandum executed both before and after the will was signed. Under the incorporation-by-reference doctrine, the memorandum must be in existence at the time the will is executed.]

Point Four (20%)

The bequest to Husband lapsed because he predeceased Testator. Under the typical antilapse statute, the bequest to Husband would not be saved from lapse even though he left issue who survived Testator.

If a beneficiary does not survive the testator, the bequest lapses and falls into the residue of the estate. Under the common law, lapse occurred whenever a beneficiary predeceased the testator and the testator specified no alternate disposition of the assets in question. A lapsed bequest passes into the residue of the testator's estate. See WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN, JR. & SHELDON F. KURTZ, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES 328–29 (3d ed. 2001).

Today, all states have antilapse statutes. Under a typical antilapse statute, if a beneficiary dies before the testator and the beneficiary was both related by blood to the testator within a certain degree of relationship and had issue who survived the testator, the bequest to the deceased beneficiary is saved from lapse and the deceased beneficiary's issue takes in lieu of the deceased beneficiary. See, e.g., UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-603.

The typical antilapse statute, therefore, would not save a bequest to a spouse even if the spouse predeceased the testator leaving issue who survived the testator. Id.

Thus, the $40,000 bequest to Husband lapses and passes into the residuary estate.

[NOTE: In New Hampshire and Kansas the result differs, because their antilapse statutes would apply to Husband. In those states, his share would pass to his daughter.]

Point Five (20%)

Testator's general legacies must be abated because there are insufficient assets to pay all named beneficiaries. Under standard abatement principles, Son will receive nothing and Library, Church, and School will receive equal, pro rata general bequests. Niece will take the jewelry because specific devises abate last. She also will take the life insurance because it passes outside the will.

When the assets of a testator's estate are insufficient to pay all of the bequests payable under the testator's will, these bequests are reduced, or abated. Under the common law and in most states, unless the testator specifies a different abatement scheme, testamentary bequests abate in the following order: (1) residuary bequests, (2) general bequests (i.e., bequests of a fixed dollar amount), and (3) specific bequests (i.e., identifiable property such as "my jewelry"). Abatement within each category is pro rata. See UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 3-902; LYNN & MCCOUCH, supra, at 47–48.

Here, there are insufficient assets in Testator's estate to pay the bequests made under her will, and Testator specified no abatement scheme. Thus, the residuary bequest to Son abates first; Son will receive nothing. The general bequests to Church, Library, and School, totaling $75,000, abate next and pro rata as each of them was bequeathed $25,000. Thus, Church, Library, and School will each receive $20,000 from the available $60,000. Niece need not contribute because the bequest of jewelry is a specific devise and, assuming this state follows the majority view, the life insurance is a nonprobate asset that will not be taken into account when abating the testamentary bequests. See UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 3-902.

[NOTE: If Husband's daughter is entitled to the $40,000 bequest to Husband, there will be $115,000 of general legacies to abate proportionally when distributing the $60,000.]

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

Decorator operates a business that sells decorative items for the office. Eight months ago, Decorator borrowed $10,000 from Lender and, pursuant to a properly completed and signed security agreement, granted Lender a security interest in all of Decorator's present and future inventory and equipment to secure that indebtedness. Lender filed a properly completed financing statement on the same day that the loan was made and the security agreement was signed.

Seven months ago, Clockwork and Decorator entered into a signed agreement pursuant to which Decorator bought and received delivery of 25 decorative clocks from Clockwork for resale to Decorator's customers. Under the terms of the agreement, Decorator agreed to pay the $2,500 purchase price in six months. The agreement also provides that, until the payment of the purchase price to Clockwork by Decorator, title to the clocks will be retained by Clockwork. No financing statement was filed in conjunction with this transaction.

Three months ago, Decorator leased an industrial vacuum cleaner from Vac for use in Decorator's business. The lease, which was signed by both parties, provides that, at the end of the four-year lease term (which cannot be terminated early), Decorator will automatically become the owner of the vacuum cleaner so long as all monthly payments have been made. No financing statement was filed in conjunction with this transaction.

Decorator has defaulted on all obligations to Lender, Clockwork, and Vac. Your law firm represents Lender, who has asked the following questions:

1. Who has a superior interest in the clocks? Explain.
2. Who has a superior interest in the vacuum cleaner? Explain.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE QUESTION

A police officer (Officer) on routine traffic patrol watched Suspect drive by. Suspect was in compliance with all applicable traffic laws except the state seat belt law. The state motor vehicle code provides that police officers have discretion to make an arrest for any traffic infraction, including violation of the state seat belt law. Officer had never stopped a driver merely for violating the seat belt law. However, Officer knew that Suspect was a reputed drug dealer and stopped Suspect's vehicle, hoping to uncover evidence of a more serious crime.

Officer directed Suspect to get out of his vehicle, handcuffed Suspect, and told Suspect that he was under arrest for violating the seat belt law. Immediately afterward, Officer looked through the driver's-side car window and noticed a clear plastic bag containing white powder on the front seat of Suspect's car. Officer asked Suspect, "Are those drugs yours?" Suspect responded, "No, that cocaine isn't mine!" Officer then opened the car door and removed the bag of white powder.

Officer transported Suspect to the police station for booking. An hour later, Detective visited Suspect in the police station holding cell to attempt an interview. Detective read Suspect his Miranda rights. Suspect stated that he understood his Miranda rights but nonetheless would answer Detective's questions. Suspect voluntarily answered Detective's questions for about five minutes and then said, "I'm not sure about this. Maybe I need a lawyer." Detective did not seek clarification of Suspect's statement but continued to question Suspect, who ultimately confessed to possessing the cocaine found in his car.

The state charged Suspect with misdemeanor violation of the seat belt law and felony drug possession. Suspect has moved to suppress all the state's evidence, alleging an unlawful stop, an unlawful arrest, an unlawful seizure of evidence, and multiple Miranda violations.

1. Did the traffic stop and subsequent arrest violate Suspect's constitutional rights? Explain.
2. Did Officer's seizure of evidence from Suspect's car violate Suspect's constitutional rights? Explain.
3. Did Officer's questioning of Suspect violate Suspect's Miranda rights? Explain.
4. Should Suspect's confession to Detective be suppressed? Explain.

TRUSTS QUESTION

Forty years ago, Testator executed a valid will under which he devised his home to the trustee of a trust. Testator's will directed the trustee to retain the home to ensure that my Daughter has a comfortable residence throughout her life. The home shall not be sold until Daughter dies. After Daughter's death, I direct the trustee to sell the home and to distribute the sale proceeds to Charity, a charitable corporation organized to end homelessness in Capital City.

Thirty years ago, Testator died. At the time of his death, Testator still owned the home, which was located in Capital City in a quiet residential neighborhood of single-family homes near both a local college and the city's business district. The business district was commercially successful, but it had attracted a large number of homeless people.

During the last 30 years, the character of the neighborhood where the home is located has changed dramatically. Many apartment buildings have been built, greatly increasing population density and noise. Several bars and restaurants catering to college students have also opened in the formerly residential blocks near the home. Stores in the city's business district have moved to suburban shopping malls, and the vacated buildings have been converted to bars and dance clubs. This shift has increased public rowdiness, but it has also been associated with a marked decline in the number of homeless individuals in the business district.

Daughter recently decided that she wants to move from the home to a rental apartment in a quieter and less congested neighborhood. Daughter consulted a real estate agent, who correctly told her that the home is worth about $300,000 and will easily sell for that amount.

Daughter asked the trustee to sell the home, to hold the expected sale proceeds of $300,000 in trust, and to use the proceeds and the income to pay Daughter's rent, which will be about $2,000 per month. The monthly income from the $300,000 trust, however, is expected to be only $1,000.

When the trustee attempted to contact Charity to discuss Daughter's request, he discovered that Charity no longer exists.

The trustee has consulted the law firm where you work for advice on these questions:

1. Can the terms of Testator's testamentary trust be reformed to permit the sale of the home? Explain.
2. Assuming that the trust can be reformed to permit the sale of the home, can the trustee also obtain authorization to use the sale proceeds and the earnings thereon to pay Daughter's rent? Explain.
3. After Daughter's death, will the trust assets pass to Testator's estate? Explain.

REAL PROPERTY QUESTION

In 1980, Oscar sold undeveloped land that he owned in fee simple to Sam, but Sam failed to record the deed.

In 1985, Sam granted Railroad an easement to operate a rail line across a portion of the land to serve a grain storage facility located on a neighboring tract of land. Railroad recorded this easement, laid railroad tracks on the land, and operated trains weekly until the grain storage facility went out of business in 2000. The tracks are still in place and clearly visible, but no trains have operated over them since 2000.

In 1990, Sam conveyed the land to Daughter as a graduation gift. Daughter promptly recorded the deed given to her by Sam. Except for the railroad tracks, the land has remained undeveloped.

Oscar died six months ago. Unaware of the prior transactions, the executor of Oscar's estate sold the land to Purchaser for its fair market value. Purchaser was also unaware of these prior transactions. The executor gave Purchaser a quitclaim deed to the land. Purchaser promptly recorded this deed.

The state in which the land is located maintains its records under a grantor-grantee indexing system, and the state's recording act provides: "No conveyance or mortgage of real property shall be good against subsequent purchasers for value and without notice unless the same be recorded according to law."

What are the rights, if any, of Purchaser, Daughter, and Railroad in the land? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

OfficeEquip is a U.S. distributor of office machines. It is incorporated in State A, where it has its principal place of business. BritCo is a manufacturer of copiers. It is incorporated in Scotland and has its principal place of business in London, England. OfficeEquip sued BritCo, alleging that BritCo had breached a long-term contract to supply copiers to OfficeEquip.

The suit was filed in the United States District Court for State A, and OfficeEquip properly invoked the court's diversity (alienage) jurisdiction.

BritCo made a timely motion to dismiss the complaint on the ground that it was filed in violation of a forum-selection clause in the supply contract that required all contract disputes to be adjudicated in London. While its motion to dismiss was pending, BritCo filed an answer to the complaint.

In its answer, BritCo denied breaching the supply contract. BritCo also made a counterclaim seeking damages for OfficeEquip's alleged breach of a contractual covenant not to compete with BritCo.

OfficeEquip filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings on BritCo's counterclaim, arguing that the covenant not to compete was unenforceable as a matter of law.

After a short period of discovery, the district judge issued the following two orders:

OfficeEquip's motion for judgment on the pleadings is granted. The contractual covenant not to compete is void as a matter of public policy and is therefore unenforceable. Given that this is strictly a legal issue and entirely severable from OfficeEquip's breach of contract claim, there is no just reason for delay, and I accordingly direct that judgment should be entered in favor of OfficeEquip on BritCo's counterclaim.

BritCo's motion to dismiss is denied. Enforcement of the forum-selection clause would be unreasonable in this case. OfficeEquip has never done business in London, and it would be extremely inconvenient for it to litigate there.

Trial on the breach of contract claim is scheduled in three months.

1. Can BritCo immediately appeal the district court's order granting OfficeEquip's motion for judgment on the pleadings with respect to BritCo's counterclaim? Explain.
2. Can BritCo immediately appeal the district court's order denying its motion to dismiss? Explain.

FAMILY LAW/CONFLICT OF LAWS QUESTION

Dave and Meg lived in State A. Three years ago, they began dating. Two years ago, Meg became pregnant with their child. Shortly thereafter, Dave and Meg discussed marriage. Dave told Meg, "Perhaps we should get married if we're going to have a child." Meg told Dave, "I am committed to marrying you, but I want a real wedding, and we can't afford that now." Meg proposed that Dave move in with her so that "we can save money to get married." Dave agreed and began living in Meg's rented apartment. Meg did not tell her landlord about Dave. She did tell her family and friends that "Dave, my fiancé, has moved in."

Fifteen months ago, Meg gave birth to Child. Meg and Dave agreed that Child's birth certificate would identify Dave as Child's father. Meg and Dave sent birth announcements to friends and relatives noting the birth of "our son, Child." After Child's birth, Meg quit work. Dave took on a second job in order to support Meg and Child.

Five months ago, Meg took Child and abruptly left Dave. Dave hired a private investigator to find Meg and Child. The investigator recently discovered that they are living in State B with Husband, whom Meg married three months ago. The investigator also discovered that Meg and Husband have filed a petition to terminate Dave's parental rights and authorize Husband's adoption of Child.

State B permits a mother or a married father to veto the adoption of his or her child unless he or she "has willfully refused to support said child for a period of one or more years."

State B permits an unmarried father to veto the adoption of his child only if he (a) "has consistently supported such child" and (b) "has maintained a residential relationship with such child for at least 9 of the 12 months immediately preceding the filing of an adoption petition."

State B does not have a putative father registry.

State A recognizes common law marriage. State B does not. Both State A and State B have adopted the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA).

1. Will State B recognize a common law marriage contracted in State A? Explain.
2. Did Dave and Meg enter into a common law marriage in State A? Explain.
3. Assuming that Dave is an unmarried father, can State B constitutionally grant Meg and Husband's adoption petition over Dave's opposition? Explain.
4. Does the UCCJEA permit State B to terminate Dave's parental rights or issue an order awarding custody of Child to Meg? Explain.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS (COMMERCIAL PAPER) QUESTION

Supplier sold Manufacturer some raw materials to be used in its manufacturing business. In payment for those raw materials, Manufacturer sent Supplier a check for $10,000 payable to the order of Supplier. The check was drawn on Manufacturer's checking account at Bank.

Supplier then used the check to buy a diamond ring from Jeweler. Before giving the check to Jeweler in exchange for the ring, Supplier indorsed the check by writing "Pay to Jeweler" and signing his name on the back of the check. Shortly after this exchange took place, Jeweler's store was robbed by a thief, who took Jeweler's cash box containing the check.

The thief forged Jeweler's signature underneath Supplier's signature and gave the check to Checkco, a check cashing company, in exchange for $8,000 in cash. Checkco took the check with neither knowledge nor notice of the history of the check. Immediately after obtaining the $8,000, the thief disappeared and cannot be found.

Checkco then presented the check to Bank, which paid the check and debited Manufacturer's account for $10,000. After the check was paid, Jeweler informed Manufacturer about the theft of the check and Manufacturer, in turn, informed Bank. After investigation, Bank discovered the forgery of Jeweler's signature. Accordingly, Bank reccredited the account because, under its account agreement with Manufacturer, it was obligated to do so because Jeweler's signature was forged.

1. What rights, if any, does Bank have against Checkco with respect to the check? Explain.
2. Assuming that Bank is able to recover its loss from Checkco, what rights, if any, does Checkco have against Jeweler and Supplier with respect to the check? Explain.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW QUESTION

There are two nursing schools in State A: Public Nursing School (Public) and Private Nursing School (Private). Public is an agency of the state government, and all its faculty and staff are state employees. Private is owned by a private corporation and receives no direct funding from the state. The State A Board of Education regulates the curriculum of each nursing school and certifies all graduates of the two nursing schools as eligible to become licensed nurses in State A.

Both Public and Private have a long-standing policy of restricting admission to women. Neither school has ever admitted a male applicant. There has been general discrimination against women in State A in the health care field. Historically, however, 95 percent of State A nurses have been female.

A male resident of State A wants to be a nurse. The man first applied to Private and was denied admission. His rejection letter from Private stated that he was “not eligible to enroll because Private was established as an all-female institution and does not admit or enroll male students.”

The man next applied to Public and was again denied admission. His letter from Public stated that “you are not eligible to enroll because Public does not enroll male students. Mindful of the historical discrimination that women have faced in State A, our state has established Public to remedy this discrimination and provide opportunities for women who want to work in the growing field of health care as nurses.” The letter continued, “Because your grades and test scores would have been sufficient to admit you if you were female, we offer you admission to our new Male Nursing Opportunity Program instead.”

The Male Nursing Opportunity Program allows male residents of State A to become nurses by studying at a nursing school in an adjacent state. Graduates of the program are certified by the State A Board of Education as eligible to become licensed nurses in State A. However, the Male Nursing Opportunity Program facilities are not as modern as those at Public, the faculty is not as experienced, and graduates of the Male Nursing Opportunity Program do not enjoy the same employment opportunities as graduates of either Public or Private.

1. Has Private violated the man’s rights under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment? Explain.
2. Has Public violated the man’s rights under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment? Explain.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

Portable Shredder Services (PSS) is a partnership that operates a mobile shredding business. When a client needs paper shredded, PSS sends a truck and a crew to perform the operation.

Adam, Beth, and Chris are partners in PSS. Each of them contributed $50,000 in start-up capital, and each actively works in the business.

The PSS partnership agreement provides in relevant part that (1) each partner is required to devote substantially all of the partner's working efforts to the business and (2) any partner can withdraw from the partnership upon giving six months' written notice. The partnership agreement contains no other relevant provisions modifying any of the statutory default rules.

PSS has not been profitable. Adam is convinced that the assets of PSS are worth more than the value of the business as a going concern. He believes that the only way he can receive a fair price for his share of partnership assets is if those assets are sold. Beth and Chris, on the other hand, wish to continue operating the business, if they can.

Adam would like to withdraw immediately from the partnership in order to force Beth and Chris to cease the operations of PSS immediately and sell the partnership's assets.

Adam has asked your law firm to answer the following three questions:

1. If Adam immediately withdraws from the partnership, what will be the consequences (a) to him and (b) to the partnership? Explain.
2. If Adam gives six months' written notice before withdrawing from the partnership, what will be the consequences (a) to him and (b) to the partnership? Explain.
3. If the partnership's business is wound up after Adam's withdrawal, will he be liable for partnership debts incurred during the winding-up process after his withdrawal? Explain.

DISCUSSION

Summary

Clockwork's interest in the clocks is a security interest governed by Article 9 of the UCC. Because Clockwork did not file a financing statement with respect to its security interest in the clocks, its security interest is unperfected. The clocks are inventory of Decorator, so Lender also has a security interest in them. That interest was perfected when Lender filed a financing statement covering it. Lender's perfected security interest has priority over Clockwork's unperfected interest.

Vac's interest in the vacuum cleaner, although presented as a lease, is a security interest governed by Article 9 of the UCC. Because Vac did not file a financing statement with respect to its interest in the vacuum cleaner, its security interest is unperfected. The vacuum cleaner is equipment of Decorator, so Lender has a security interest in it. Because Lender filed a financing statement, Lender's security interest in the vacuum cleaner is perfected. Unperfected security interests are subordinate to perfected security interests, so Lender's security interest has priority over Vac's.

Clockwork has an unperfected security interest in the clocks.

The agreement between Clockwork and Decorator provides that Clockwork retains title to the clocks until their purchase price is paid. Under the Uniform Commercial Code, the substance of a transaction controls, rather than its form or the label given to it by the parties. Because Clockwork's interest exists to secure performance of Decorator's payment obligation, it is a security interest even though the parties did not label it as such. See UCC § 1-201(b)(35) [§ 1-201(37) in states that have not enacted revised Article 1 of the UCC].

Because the Clockwork-Decorator transaction created a security interest by contract, it is governed by Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code. UCC § 9-109(a)(1). The signed agreement between Clockwork and Decorator is sufficient to create an enforceable and attached security interest because value has been given to Decorator (the extension of credit), Decorator has rights in the clocks, and the agreement between them, providing for Clockwork's retained interest in the clocks, was signed by Decorator. See UCC § 9-203. However, in order for Clockwork's security interest to be perfected, Clockwork would need to either have possession of the clocks or file a financing statement with respect to the security interest. See UCC § 9-308 et seq. Clockwork's security interest in the clocks is not perfected because Clockwork neither filed a financing statement with respect to its security interest nor retained or took possession of the clocks.

[NOTE: An examinee might state that Clockwork's security interest is a purchase-money security interest and, therefore, perfected upon attachment without the necessity of filing a financing statement. This is incorrect. Only purchase-money security interests in consumer goods are perfected upon attachment without the filing of a financing statement. See UCC § 9-309(1). While Clockwork's security interest is a purchase-money security interest (see UCC § 9-103), the clocks do not constitute "consumer goods" in the hands of Decorator because the clocks are being held for sale to Decorator's customers and were not used or bought for Decorator's personal, family, or household purposes. See UCC § 9-102(a)(23).]

Point Two (10%)

Lender has a perfected security interest in the clocks.

Pursuant to its agreement with Decorator, Lender was granted a security interest in all Decorator's present and future inventory. Because the clocks are being held by Decorator for resale to its customers, they are inventory. See UCC § 9-102(a)(48). The security interest with respect to each clock that Decorator has or subsequently acquires is enforceable and attached because value has been given, Decorator has rights in the clocks, and Decorator has signed the security agreement. See UCC § 9-203. The after-acquired property clause is made enforceable by UCC § 9-204. The security interest is perfected because Lender filed a properly completed financing statement with respect to the security interest. See UCC §§ 9-308, 9-310.

Lender's security interest in the clocks is superior to that of Clockwork.

While both Clockwork and Lender have security interests in the clocks, only Lender's security interest is perfected. (See Points One and Two.) Lender's security interest has priority over that of Clockwork because a perfected security interest is superior to an unperfected security interest in the same property. See UCC §§ 9-317(a)(1) and 9-322(a)(2).

[NOTE: An examinee might state that Clockwork's security interest has priority under UCC § 9-324 because it is a purchase-money security interest. This is incorrect. While Clockwork's security interest is a purchase-money security interest (see UCC § 9-103), § 9-324 gives priority only to certain perfected purchase-money security interests and Clockwork's security interest is unperfected.]

Vac has an unperfected security interest in the vacuum cleaner.

The agreement between Vac and Decorator is presented as a lease. However, the UCC recognizes that the transaction is economically equivalent to a secured sale because Decorator will automatically become the owner of the vacuum cleaner after making all of the lease payments. Accordingly, the interest of Vac is a “security interest.” See UCC § 1-203 [§ 1-201(37) in states that have not enacted revised Article 1 of the UCC]. Thus, the Vac-Decorator transaction is governed by Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code. UCC § 9-109(a)(1). The signed agreement between Vac and Decorator is sufficient to create an enforceable and attached security interest because value has been given to Decorator, Decorator has rights in the vacuum cleaner, and the agreement was signed by Decorator. See UCC § 9-203. However, in order for Vac’s security interest to be perfected, Vac would need to retain or take possession of the vacuum cleaner or file a financing statement with respect to the security interest. See UCC §§ 9-308 et seq. Because Vac neither filed a financing statement with respect to its security interest nor retained or took possession of the vacuum cleaner, Vac’s security interest in the vacuum cleaner is not perfected.

Point Five (10%)

Lender has a perfected security interest in the vacuum cleaner.

Pursuant to its agreement with Decorator, Lender was granted a security interest in all of Decorator’s present and future equipment. Because the vacuum cleaner is used by Decorator in its business and is not inventory, farm products, or consumer goods, it constitutes equipment. See UCC § 9-102(a)(33). The security interest with respect to the vacuum cleaner is enforceable and attached because value has been given, Decorator has rights in the vacuum cleaner, and Decorator has signed the security agreement. See UCC §§ 9-203 & 9-204. Therefore, Lender’s security interest attaches to the vacuum cleaner. The security interest is perfected because Lender filed a properly completed financing statement with respect to the security interest in inventory and equipment. See UCC §§ 9-308, 9-310.

Point Six (15%)

Lender’s security interest in the vacuum cleaner is superior to that of Vac.

While both Vac and Lender have security interests in the vacuum cleaner, only Lender’s security interest is perfected. (See Points Four and Five.) Lender’s security interest has priority over that of Vac because a perfected security interest is superior to an unperfected security interest in the same property. See UCC §§ 9-317(a)(1) & 9-322(a)(2).

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Criminal Law and Procedure V.A., B. & D.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Was it constitutional for Officer to stop and arrest Suspect for a petty traffic offense when Officer's real motive was to find evidence of other crimes?
- (2) Was it constitutional for Officer to seize evidence from Suspect's car?
- (3) Did Officer's questioning of Suspect violate Suspect's rights under Miranda?
- (4)(a) Did Officer's questioning of Suspect make Detective's subsequent interrogation of Suspect unconstitutional?
- (4)(b) Was Suspect's ambiguous statement regarding a lawyer sufficient to invoke Suspect's right to an attorney and to require Detective to cease interrogation?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Officer had probable cause to believe that Suspect was violating traffic laws based on his own observations of Suspect. Officer therefore acted constitutionally in stopping and arresting Suspect. The stop and the subsequent arrest are constitutional despite the fact that the traffic infraction was minor, Officer had never previously arrested anyone for a seat belt violation, and Officer had another motive for making the stop.

It was also lawful for Officer to engage in a "plain view" search of the front seat of Suspect's car by looking into the window after the arrest of Suspect.

Officer violated Suspect's constitutional rights by interrogating Suspect at the scene after arresting him without first providing Miranda warnings and obtaining a valid waiver. Thus, Suspect's responsive statement to Officer at the scene is inadmissible. However, Officer's Miranda violation does not make Suspect's subsequent interrogation by Detective unconstitutional. A violation of Miranda does not taint derivative evidence (e.g., Suspect's statement made during the second interrogation). Moreover, Detective's second interrogation was a separate interrogation that involved a change in time, place, and circumstance. Prior to Detective's second interrogation, Miranda warnings were given and a knowing and valid waiver was obtained. Suspect's equivocal and ambiguous statement about possibly needing a lawyer was not an invocation by Suspect of his Miranda right to silence, so Detective did not need to cease his interrogation and provide Suspect with an attorney.

Point One (25%)

A traffic stop and arrest with probable cause does not violate the Fourth Amendment even if the offense was minor and the stop served as a pretext for investigating other criminal wrongdoing.

Under the Fourth Amendment, the constitutional reasonableness of a traffic stop does not depend on the motivation of the officer involved or the petty nature of the offense charged, as long as state law permits an arrest. See Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 810 (1996) (“As a general matter, the decision to stop an automobile is reasonable where the police have probable cause to believe that a traffic violation has occurred.”). If the officer has probable cause to believe that a suspect has committed an offense, then a stop and arrest of that suspect is reasonable if authorized under the applicable state statute. See Atwater v. City of Lago Vista, 532 U.S. 318, 354 (2001) (“If an officer has probable cause to believe that an individual has committed even a very minor criminal offense in his presence, he may, without violating the Fourth Amendment, arrest the offender.”).

Here, the arrest was constitutional because Officer had probable cause, based on his personal observations, to believe that Suspect was committing a traffic violation and the state seat belt statute permitted arrest. The stop and subsequent arrest were constitutional despite the fact that the traffic infraction was minor and Officer had never previously arrested anyone for a seat belt violation. In addition, the stop and arrest were constitutional even if Officer used the seat belt violation as a pretext to investigate criminal wrongdoing based on Officer’s knowledge that Suspect was a reputed drug dealer. Whren, 517 U.S. at 813–14.

Officer’s seizure of evidence from the front seat of Suspect’s car did not violate the Fourth Amendment.

Under the Fourth Amendment, a police officer is lawfully permitted to seize evidence without a warrant if the evidence is found in plain view during lawful observation. See Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 465 (1971) (“It is well established that under certain circumstances the police may seize evidence in plain view without a warrant.”). Under the plain view doctrine, “if police are lawfully in a position from which they view an object, if its incriminating character is immediately apparent, and if the officers have a lawful right of access to the object, they may seize it without a warrant.” Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366, 375 (1993).

In this case, Officer had probable cause to stop and arrest Suspect for a traffic law violation based on his own observation of Suspect’s violation of the seat belt law. Following the arrest, Officer was lawfully permitted to look into the car window while the car was stopped on a public road. Officer had probable cause to believe that white powder contained in a clear plastic bag in the car of a reputed drug dealer is likely to be an illegal drug, and Officer had additional cause to support that belief after Suspect stated, “That cocaine isn’t mine,” in response to Officer’s question about the bag. The fact that Suspect’s statement is inadmissible, see Point Four(a), does not prevent Officer from relying on the statement to establish probable cause. The lawful access requirement “guard[s] against warrantless entry onto premises whenever contraband is viewed from off the premises . . . but does not bar the seizure of evidence in a parked car” that is observed by an officer who is viewing contraband from a lawful vantage point. Boone v. Spurgess, 385 F.3d 923 (6th Cir. 2004). See also United States v. Gillon, 348 F.3d 755, 759–60 (8th Cir. 2003) (once officers saw “what appeared to be bags containing crack cocaine” in a parked car “they had a right of access to the passenger compartment of the car” to seize the likely contraband). Cf. United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798 (1982) (police officers who have probable cause to believe a vehicle contains contraband had lawful right to enter and search vehicle and seize contraband found therein).

Officer violated Suspect's Miranda rights when Officer arrested Suspect and interrogated him without providing Miranda warnings and obtaining a valid waiver.

A person under arrest is in custody and must first receive Miranda warnings before being subjected to interrogation. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 444 (1966) (Prior to any questioning, a person under arrest “must be warned that he has a right to remain silent, that any statement he does make may be used as evidence against him, and that he has a right to the presence of an attorney, either retained or appointed.”). Here, Officer arrested Suspect and then interrogated Suspect, asking him “Are these drugs yours?” without first providing Miranda warnings. This custodial interrogation involved express questioning of Suspect by Officer that violated Suspect's Miranda rights. See Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 300–01 (1980) (“[T]he Miranda safeguards come into play whenever a person in custody is subjected to either express questioning or its functional equivalent.”).

Officer's Miranda violation did not taint Detective's subsequent interrogation.

Statements taken during custodial interrogations conducted in violation of Miranda are excluded from the prosecution's case-in-chief. However, a violation of Miranda is a violation of a constitutional “rule,” see Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 444 (2000), not a direct violation of the constitution. Unlike direct violations of the constitution, Miranda violations do not taint derivative evidence and the “fruit of the poisonous tree” doctrine does not apply. See United States v. Patane, 542 U.S. 630, 631–32 (2004) (“Unlike . . . actual violations of the Self-Incrimination Clause, there is, with respect to mere failures to warn, nothing to deter . . . [and] therefore no reason to apply [Wong Sun's] ‘fruit of the poisonous tree’ doctrine.”).

In Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298, 305–09 (1985), the U.S. Supreme Court held that, if a suspect was subjected to custodial interrogation without the benefit of Miranda warnings, a subsequent confession by the suspect may nonetheless be admitted if the totality of circumstances establishes that the second statement was knowing and voluntary. Unless the police engage in an interrogation process that must “realistically [be] seen as part of a single unwarned sequence of questioning,” see Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. 600, 612 n. 4 (2004), subsequent custodial interrogation following a break in the initial proceedings, Miranda warnings, and a waiver of rights is constitutional. See id. See also Elstad, 470 U.S. at 318 (“a suspect who has once responded to unwarned yet uncoercive questioning is not thereby disabled from waiving his rights and confessing after he has been given the requisite Miranda warnings.”).

Here, Officer's initial unwarned custodial interrogation should not prevent the prosecution from using Suspect's later confession to Detective. After Officer's original Miranda violation, Suspect was taken to the police station where Detective provided proper Miranda warnings and obtained Suspect's knowing and voluntary waiver before interrogating Suspect. Detective's provision of Miranda warnings at a later time and in a different place rendered Suspect's later statements to Detective admissible.

Suspect's statement that he might want an attorney was too ambiguous to require Detective to cease interrogation.

Pursuant to Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452, 458 (1994), if an arrestee makes an unambiguous and unequivocal request or demand for an attorney, the police must cease the interrogation and honor the request.

Suspect did not make such a request or demand; the statement “I’m not sure about this. Maybe I need a lawyer” was ambiguous and equivocal. Id. at 459–62. See also United States v. Johnson, 400 F.3d 187, 195 (4th Cir. 2005), citing Burket v. Angelone, 208 F.3d 172, 197–98 (4th Cir. 2000) (“I think I need a lawyer” is not an unambiguous request for an attorney.). Therefore, Detective was not required to cease the interrogation and provide Suspect with an attorney. Indeed, Detective was not even obliged to seek clarification of Suspect’s intentions. Davis, 512 U.S. at 461–62 (declining to “adopt a rule requiring officers to ask clarifying questions” and concluding that when a suspect’s statement “is not an unambiguous or unequivocal request for counsel, the officers have no obligation to stop questioning him”). Detective therefore did not violate Suspect’s rights by ignoring Suspect’s equivocal statement about an attorney, and the court should not suppress Suspect’s confession.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) May a court reform the terms of Testator's testamentary trust to permit the sale of the home?
- (2) May a court reform the terms of Testator's testamentary trust to authorize the use of both the home's sale proceeds and the earnings on those proceeds to pay Daughter $2,000 monthly for her expected rent?
- (3) Will the trust property pass to Testator's estate upon Daughter's death?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under the "equitable deviation" doctrine, a court may modify an administrative provision of a trust based on unanticipated changed circumstances. Here, the trust's "no-sale" provision is administrative, and there is a strong argument that the change in the neighborhood around the home represents a circumstance not anticipated by Testator.

Under the common law, courts may not change the dispositive provisions of a trust. The trust provisions regarding disposition of the home's sale proceeds are dispositive. Thus, if the home is sold, a court may not alter the relative interests of Daughter and Charity in the sale proceeds. However, under Uniform Trust Code § 412(a) and like statutes, a court may modify the "dispositive terms of a trust . . . if, because of circumstances not anticipated by the settlor, modification . . . will further the purposes of the trust." It is unclear whether a court would reform the trust in the manner Daughter seeks under this provision.

If a charitable beneficiary no longer exists when a trust terminates, trust property reverts to the trust settlor or his or her estate unless the court, using its cy pres power, substitutes another charity for the nonexistent charity. Here, Testator's intentions are unclear. However, because there is a presumption of general charitable intent, the court would likely exercise its cy pres power. Under the Uniform Trust Code, which establishes a conclusive presumption of general charitable intent, the court would certainly exercise its cy pres power and substitute a different charity. Thus, the trust property would not revert to Testator's estate.

Under both the common law equitable-deviation doctrine and the Uniform Trust Code, a court could reform the provisions of the trust to authorize the trustee to sell the home instead of retaining it.

Under the common law, a court may order “equitable deviation” from the terms of a trust when an unanticipated change in circumstances would otherwise “defeat or substantial[ly] impair[] the accomplishment of the purposes of the trust.” See AUSTIN W. SCOTT, ABRIDGEMENT OF THE LAW OF TRUSTS § 167 (1960). See also RESTATEMENT (SECOND) TRUSTS § 167; MARY F. RADFORD, GEORGE G. BOGERT & GEORGE T. BOGERT, THE LAW OF TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES § 994 (3d ed. 2006).

The Uniform Trust Code recognizes and expands the equitable-deviation doctrine. Under the Code, an administrative provision of a trust may be modified “if, because of circumstances not anticipated by the settlor, modification or termination will further the purposes of the trust.” UNIF. TRUST CODE § 412(a). An administrative provision of a trust is one relating to the management of trust property instead of the allocation of benefits among trust beneficiaries. An unanticipated change in the character of the community where realty held by a trust is located represents the sort of change to which the equitable-deviation doctrine is applicable. See SCOTT, supra, at 315.

Here, the facts support application of the equitable-deviation doctrine. The trust provision in question is administrative: it directs the trustee to retain the home and not to sell it. The facts also show that the neighborhood in which the home is located has changed substantially and in a way that Testator did not anticipate. The trust instrument’s directive that the trustee retain the home until Daughter dies seems to have been based on the view that the home would be in a desirable residential neighborhood. Instead, the neighborhood is now dominated by apartment houses and noisy commercial establishments. Thus, the equitable-deviation doctrine should permit reformation of the trust.

The Uniform Trust Code also provides that, even if circumstances have not changed in an unanticipated manner, an administrative provision may be modified if “continuation of the trust on its existing terms would be impracticable or wasteful or impair the trust’s administration.” Id. § 412(b). This expansion rests on the view that “a policy of rigid adherence to the letter of the donative instrument is likely to frustrate both the donor’s purposes and the efficient use of resources.” RICHARD POSNER, ECONOMIC ANALYSIS OF LAW 556 (5th ed. 1998).

Here, there is a strong argument that retention of the home would impair the trust goal of providing Daughter with adequate and desirable housing. Thus, reformation of the trust should also be permitted under Uniform Trust Code § 412(b).

[NOTE: Because the request to sell the home affects an administrative provision of the trust, the permission of the trust beneficiaries and/or trustee is not required to reform the trust. “Lack of consent by a beneficiary is no bar if a modification will have no effect on the non-consenting beneficiary.” WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN, JR., AND SHELDON F. KURTZ, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES 385 (3d ed. 2004).]

Point Two (40%)

Under modern statutes, but not the common law, a court may alter a dispositive provision of a trust to further trust purposes. It is unclear whether a court would find that using the proceeds of the home’s sale to fund Daughter’s rent would further trust purposes.

Under the common law, the equitable-deviation doctrine applies only to administrative provisions of a trust. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 167. Courts are not empowered to alter dispositive provisions that determine the allocation of trust assets and income among trust beneficiaries.

Here, although the trust provision directing that the home be retained until Daughter's death is administrative, the provisions directing that Daughter has the right to live in the home until her death and that the home sale proceeds go to Charity when Daughter dies are dispositive; effectively, these provisions grant Daughter an entitlement to trust income (but not trust principal) and grant Charity the proceeds from the home's sale. See generally UNIF. PRIN. & INC. ACT § 404(2) (1997). Thus, under the common law, a court may not alter the beneficial rights of Daughter and Charity in the proceeds obtained from selling the home.

However, under Uniform Trust Code § 412(a) and like statutes, a court may modify the "dispositive terms of a trust . . . if, because of circumstances not anticipated by the settlor, modification . . . will further the purposes of the trust. To the extent practicable, the modification must be made in accordance with the settlor's probable intention."

Here, it is unclear whether a court would find that trust modification would further the purposes of the trust. There is an argument that Testator intended to provide Daughter with a desirable residence during her lifetime and, although the home was such a residence during Testator's lifetime, an unanticipated change of circumstances has altered its desirability. (See Point One). Thus, a court could find that modification would further Testator's purposes, even if use of the proceeds would ultimately reduce the value of Charity's remainder interest.

There is an opposing argument, perhaps even stronger. Daughter has only a life interest in the home. However, her proposed modification would likely result in the complete loss of the remainder interest. Daughter proposes that the trust expend $24,000 annually from an estimated $300,000 trust. A payout of this size would likely cause a depletion of the entire trust corpus in due course and deprive the remainderman of its interest. In fact, if Daughter lives long enough, that payout would exhaust the trust principal, leaving no money to pay her either. On the other hand, the trustee could be authorized to purchase a new residence with the proceeds from the home's sale. This approach would both provide Daughter with a desirable place to live for the rest of her life, as Testator intended, and still preserve the remainder interest.

[NOTE: Extra points could be awarded to the examinee who notes that to the extent the remainder interest fails (see Point Three) and the property reverts to Testator's estate, the argument in favor of Daughter is strengthened if she is the sole beneficiary of Testator's estate.]

Point Three (30%)

Upon Daughter's death, the trust property likely will not pass to Testator's estate because of the cy pres doctrine.

Under the common law, when trust property to be used for a charitable purpose could not be distributed as directed in the trust instrument, the trust did not necessarily fail. See SCOTT, supra, § 399 (1960). Instead, the court determined whether to exercise its cy pres power and redirect the charitable gift to another like charity. See UNIF. TRUST CODE § 413; RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 67.

The common law cy pres doctrine requires an initial inquiry into the settlor's intent: If the court determines that the settlor had a specific charitable intention limited to the charitable purpose stated in the trust instrument, the property reverts to the settlor or the settlor's estate. If the court determines that the settlor had a general charitable intention, it substitutes for the named charity another one with activities consistent with the settlor's intentions. See UNIF. TRUST CODE § 413; RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 67. The common law and the Restatement (Third) of Trusts both presume that a settlor has a general charitable intent. Id.

Trusts Analysis

Here, there is little evidence regarding Testator's intentions. Testator may have wanted to help the homeless generally; Testator may also have wanted to address homelessness in Capital City's business district specifically. There is no evidence that Testator viewed Charity as the sole means to either of these goals; nor is there evidence to the contrary. Therefore, the presumption of general charitable intent would likely prevail.

The Uniform Trust Code appears to establish a conclusive presumption of general charitable intention. Section 413(a) of the Code provides that "if a particular charitable purpose becomes unlawful, impracticable, impossible to achieve, or wasteful: (1) the trust does not fail, in whole or in part; (2) the trust property does not revert to the settlor or the settlor's successors in interest; and (3) the court may apply cy pres to modify . . . the trust by directing that the trust property be applied or distributed, in whole or in part, in a manner consistent with the settlor's charitable purposes." Thus, under § 413(a), the court should apply the cy pres doctrine and substitute a different charity for Charity. The trust assets would not revert to Testator's estate.

[NOTE: The following MEE jurisdictions have enacted the Uniform Trust Code: Alabama, Arkansas, District of Columbia, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Dakota, and Utah. The Uniform Trust Code has substantially influenced the Trust Code of Iowa as well.]

(Real Property II.B.; V.B.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Has Railroad abandoned its interest?
- (2) In the absence of a state recording act, as between Daughter and Purchaser, who owns the land?
- (3) Was Purchaser on constructive notice of the interests of Railroad and Daughter and thus not a bona fide purchaser for value?
- (4) Was Purchaser on inquiry notice of the interests of Railroad and Daughter and thus not a bona fide purchaser for value?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Railroad's interest would be lost only if it abandoned that interest, and abandonment is not supported by the facts. Under the common law, in the absence of a recording statute, Daughter would own the land in fee simple subject to the Railroad's easement because both of them acquired their interests before Purchaser bought the land from Oscar's estate. This result changes under the state's notice-type recording statute only if Purchaser is a protected bona fide purchaser without notice of either prior interest. Here, the most likely conclusion is that Purchaser, although having no actual or constructive notice of the interest of Railroad or Daughter, had inquiry notice of their interests and, thus, is not protected by the state recording statute. An argument can be made, however, that Purchaser had inquiry notice only of Railroad's interest, in which case Daughter would have no interest in the land, and Purchaser would own it subject to Railroad's interest.

Point One (30%)

Railroad's easement was not abandoned unless Railroad had an intent to abandon it.

Easements may be terminated in a variety of ways, such as by their express terms, written release, merger of the dominant and servient tenements, prescription, estoppel, condemnation, and abandonment. The only method of termination potentially applicable under these facts is abandonment. See HERBERT HOVENKAMP & SHELDON F. KURTZ, PRINCIPLES OF PROPERTY LAW 333–36 (6th ed. 2005). If a court were to find that either Daughter or Purchaser acquired a fee simple title (see Point Three) subject to Railroad's interest, either may argue that Railroad's easement was extinguished by abandonment because Railroad has not used the easement since 2000.

An abandonment theory is unlikely to succeed, however, because mere non-use of an easement is insufficient to establish abandonment. Instead, there must be a cessation of use coupled with evidence of the user's intent to abandon the easement. WILLIAM B. STOEBCUK & DALE A. WHITMAN, The Law of Property, 467–68 (3d ed. 2000). Here, there is insufficient evidence of Railroad's intent to abandon its easement. Notably, Railroad has not removed its tracks and there are no other facts to suggest that Railroad has voluntarily relinquished its interest. In the absence of such evidence, a court is likely to find that Railroad has not abandoned its easement.

Point Two (10%)

Under the common law first-in-time, first-in-right principle, Daughter, and not Purchaser, owns the land, unless the state's recording act mandates a contrary result.

Under the common law, a grantor can convey only those rights in land that the grantor had at the time of the conveyance. Thus, under the common law, priority among successive transfers is dictated by priority of time—the so-called “first-in-time, first-in-right” principle. See 14 POWELL ON REAL PROPERTY § 82.01[1][a] at 82-4 (2009).

Here, Oscar's conveyance to Sam in 1980 takes priority over the subsequent transfer by the executor of Oscar's estate to Purchaser. Once Oscar conveyed the land to Sam, neither Oscar nor his estate at his later death had a title left to convey to anyone, including Purchaser. Rather, title was then in Sam. Sam's conveyance of legal title to Daughter would prevail over the later conveyance by Oscar's executor to Purchaser. However, if the state recording act protects Purchaser, then Purchaser rather than Daughter would own the land. See Point Three.

While the state has rejected the common law first-in-time, first-in-right principle by enacting a notice-type statute with a grantor-grantee index, Purchaser was not on constructive notice of the interest of either Daughter or Railroad. Although the deeds to Daughter and Railroad were recorded, they were not properly indexed and, thus, not discoverable, because the deed to their predecessor in title—Sam—was never recorded.

All states have recording statutes that, when applicable, overturn the results of the common law “first-in-time, first-in-right” principle. The recording statute here is a notice-type statute providing that unrecorded conveyances are not valid against a “subsequent purchaser for value and without notice” of the conveyance. Under a notice-type recording statute, Purchaser can prevail against either of or both Daughter and Railroad only if (1) the prior conveyances were unrecorded, (2) Purchaser paid value for the land, and (3) Purchaser took without either actual, constructive, or inquiry notice of the prior conveyances.

[NOTE: Some examinees may incorrectly conclude that the recording act is a race-notice statute because the last part of the statute states: “unless the same be recorded according to law.” Placed in its proper grammatical context, however, “the same” relates to the instrument of prior conveyance. There is no requirement that the subsequent purchaser must record to take priority over an earlier transaction. By comparison, a typical race-notice statute protects only a subsequent purchaser who records. If he does not record, he is not protected, even though he is a bona fide purchaser.]

The facts clearly state that Purchaser paid value, so payment of value is not an issue here. Furthermore, no facts suggest that Purchaser had actual notice of the conveyances of the easement and fee to Railroad and Daughter, respectively. But there are two other possible ways for a subsequent purchaser to have notice. One is constructive; the other is inquiry.

Constructive notice arises through the recording system. A purchaser is placed on constructive notice of all information that is properly recorded on the public land records whether he sees it or not. See POWELL, supra, § 82.02[1][d][ii] at 82-33. While both Railroad and Daughter recorded their interests, Sam (from whom they both claimed) did not. Because Sam's deed from Oscar was not recorded, both the deed from Sam to Railroad conveying an easement and the later deed from Sam to Daughter conveying to her a fee are so-called "wild deeds," meaning they were recorded outside the chain of title. As such, they are undiscoverable by a reasonable search of the grantor-grantee indexes. A search of the public land records by Purchaser would have shown that as a matter of public record his seller, Oscar, had not conveyed the property to anyone because the Oscar to Sam deed was not recorded. As a result, a title searcher could not have discovered Sam's later conveyances to Railroad and Daughter even though they were recorded. Courts have uniformly held that a wild deed is not "properly recorded" and, therefore, imports no constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser. See WILLIAM B. STOEBCUK & DALE A. WHITMAN, supra, 894. Accordingly, Purchaser is not on constructive notice of the interests of Daughter and Railroad and his interest would appear to have priority to theirs. But see Point Four.

Point Four (35%)

Purchaser is not a bona fide purchaser for value under the state's notice-type recording statute because he had inquiry notice of Railroad's interest and, likely, of Daughter's interest as well.

Although Purchaser did not have constructive notice (see Point Three), the law also imputes knowledge to a subsequent purchaser in another way, namely through an obligation of inquiry. Here there is a strong argument that Purchaser had inquiry notice of Railroad's interest and, therefore, also that he had inquiry notice of Daughter's interest.

Inquiry notice exists when knowledge is imputed to a buyer from facts and circumstances suggesting the existence of a prior conveyance. See POWELL, supra, § 82.02[1][d][iii], at 82-39. Some courts have held that a purchaser who takes by quitclaim deed, as Purchaser did, is presumed to take with notice of any interests that could have been discovered by reasonable diligence. See id. § 82.02[1][d][iii][B], at 82-44 to 82-45. This perspective is based upon the theory that the title is suspicious if a grantor refuses to give covenants of title. The majority of courts, however, reject this rule because there are many legitimate reasons for a grantor to convey by quitclaim deed, particularly in an environment where title insurance is common. See id. § 82.02[1][d][iii][B], at 82-46. Accordingly, in most states, Purchaser would not have inquiry notice from the quitclaim deed alone.

[NOTE: In the minority of states that would require further inquiry based upon the quitclaim deed alone, it is unclear what further investigation is required. One could argue that Purchaser could have contacted Oscar's heirs or neighboring landowners, but there is no indication from the facts that such an inquiry would have revealed the prior conveyances. Another possibility would be to search the property tax rolls. The facts do not indicate who has been paying taxes on the property (or whether such taxes even exist in this state), but it is possible that such taxes were assessed against Sam (and later Daughter) after they acquired title to the property.]

The better argument is that inquiry notice arose from the possibility of a visual inspection of the property. Inquiry notice exists when someone other than the record owner is in possession or use of the property. See id. § 82.02[1][d][iii][A], at 82-41. Here, a visual inspection would have revealed the existence of railroad tracks on otherwise undeveloped land. Exercising reasonable diligence, Purchaser would have discovered the tracks, and then should have engaged in further inquiry to ascertain the interest of whoever put the tracks there. Accordingly, a court is most likely to find that even though Railroad's easement was recorded outside the chain of title, Purchaser had inquiry notice of Railroad's interest based upon the visible improvements on the land.

Would this inquiry notice also extend to the interest of Sam and then Daughter? Assuming that Purchaser was successful in making inquiries to find Railroad, Purchaser could have discovered that Railroad had acquired its interest from Sam. That discovery would have prompted further inquiry into the nature of Sam's interest. In addition, a search of the grantor index for Sam's name would reveal the deed to Daughter, which was recorded, albeit outside of the chain of title. Accordingly, if Railroad is still in existence and easily located, a court is likely to find that Purchaser had inquiry notice not only of Railroad's easement but also Daughter's fee simple interest.

In short, it seems fairly clear that Purchaser would be deemed to have inquiry notice of Railroad's easement, and it is likely that Purchaser also would have inquiry notice of Daughter's interest. [NOTE: Should an examinee, however, reason that Purchaser's inquiry obligation did not extend beyond asking Railroad what its interest was, then Purchaser would prevail as against Daughter, but not Railroad.]

[NOTE: Examinees may observe that Daughter does not qualify as a purchaser for value because Daughter received the land as a gift. However, Daughter's status as a donee is irrelevant to the analysis because she acquired legal title before Purchaser and, therefore, would prevail under the common law priority rule. Thus, Daughter is protected without having to prove her status as a purchaser under the recording act.]

Legal Problems

- (1) Is a district court's grant of judgment on the pleadings with respect to a counterclaim a "final decision" subject to immediate appeal when the district court also orders judgment to be entered on the counterclaim?
- (2) Is a district court's refusal to enforce a contractual forum-selection clause a "final decision" subject to immediate appeal?
- (3) Does a district court's refusal to enforce a contractual forum-selection clause fall within any of the exceptions to the final-judgment rule?
- (4) If a district court makes several orders in a case and one of those orders is appealable, may an appellate court review the non-appealable orders on grounds of efficiency?

DISCUSSION

Summary

BritCo can appeal immediately from the district court's decision on BritCo's counterclaim. Where there are multiple claims or counterclaims in a case, a final disposition of one of those claims will be appealable when, as here, the trial court orders entry of judgment on that claim and certifies that there is no just reason for delay. FED. R. CIV. P. 54(b).

BritCo cannot appeal immediately from the court's refusal to enforce the forum-selection clause. The court's decision on this issue did not end litigation on the merits of the case and was therefore not an appealable final judgment.

In addition, the court's forum-selection order is not appealable under the collateral-order doctrine. Assuming the lower court's decision on the forum-selection clause was incorrect, immediate appeal is not necessary to vindicate BritCo's rights under the contractual forum-selection clause. Those rights can be protected after final judgment, by striking down any judgment issued in violation of the forum-selection clause. Nor do the facts of this problem present the kind of extraordinary abuse of power that would prompt an appellate court to review a lower court's action by writ of mandamus.

Even though the appellate court would have jurisdiction over another decision in the same case, considerations of efficiency do not give the court the power to hear an appeal from the lower court's decision on the forum-selection issue.

Point One (45%)

The district court's grant of judgment on the pleadings with respect to BritCo's counterclaim is immediately appealable because the district court judge stated that there was no just reason for delay and ordered entry of judgment on the counterclaim.

In the federal courts, litigants ordinarily may appeal only from final judgments of the district courts. See 28 U.S.C. § 1291. A final judgment is one that “ends the litigation on the merits and leaves nothing for the court to do but execute the judgment.” Catlin v. United States, 324 U.S. 229, 233 (1945).

When, as in this problem, more than one claim for relief is presented in an action, Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 54(b) provides that a decision that “adjudicates fewer than all the claims” in the action “does not end the action as to any of the claims or parties. . . .” Under this default rule, a grant of judgment on one of several claims in an action is not a final judgment and is not subject to immediate appeal.

However, Rule 54(b) permits district courts to reverse the default rule and to designate their resolutions of particular claims as immediately appealable “final judgments” even when there are other claims in the action that have not yet been decided. A district court may “direct entry of a final judgment” as to a claim if the district court “expressly determines that there is no just reason for delay.” This procedure “does not relax the finality required of each decision, as an individual claim, to render it appealable, but it does provide a practical means of permitting an appeal to be taken from one or more final decisions on individual claims, in multiple claims actions, without waiting for final decisions to be rendered on all the claims in the case.” Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Mackey, 351 U.S. 427, 435 (1956) (emphasis in original).

In this problem, multiple claims for relief were presented by the parties—OfficeEquip sued for breach of contract and BritCo counterclaimed for breach of the non-competition clause in the contract. When the district court granted judgment on the pleadings for OfficeEquip on BritCo's counterclaim, the court also expressly directed entry of judgment and expressly determined that there was no reason for delay. Thus, under Rule 54(b), the district court's decision constituted a “final judgment” on the counterclaim and is immediately appealable.

Point Two (40%)

The district court's refusal to enforce the forum-selection clause is not an appealable final judgment.

The district court's refusal to enforce the forum-selection clause did not resolve any of the claims in the action. Far from “end[ing] the litigation on the merits,” Catlin, 324 U.S. at 233, the court's decision allowed the litigation to go forward on the merits. Under the final-judgment rule, this is a non-appealable interlocutory order.

Although there are certain exceptions to the final-judgment rule that BritCo could invoke in an attempt to secure immediate review of the court's decision, none of the exceptions would be applicable on the facts of this problem. See Point Three.

Point Three (10%)

A district court's order refusing to dismiss a case pursuant to a contractual forum-selection clause is not immediately appealable under the judge-made collateral-order doctrine or pursuant to any other exception to the final-judgment rule.

a. Collateral-order doctrine. In Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541 (1949), the U.S. Supreme Court created the so-called “collateral order” doctrine as an exception to the final-judgment rule. Under the collateral-order doctrine, an immediate appeal may be taken from an interlocutory order that conclusively determines an important issue in a case if that issue is independent of (collateral to) the merits of the action and if a delay in appellate review would effectively preclude the losing party from an opportunity to vindicate its rights on appeal.

The collateral-order doctrine does not apply in this case because an immediate appeal is not necessary to preserve BritCo’s contractual right to have contract disputes adjudicated in London. If the lower court’s ruling on the forum-selection clause is wrong, BritCo’s contractual rights can be vindicated on an appeal from a final judgment in the case. An appellate court could order dismissal of the case at that time, thus forcing OfficeEquip to pursue its claim in the appropriate court. See Lauro Lines S.R.L. v. Chasser, 490 U.S. 495 (1989) (collateral-order doctrine does not permit immediate appeal from an order denying enforcement of a contractual forum-selection clause because the right to have “binding adjudication” only in a particular forum can be vindicated on appeal from final judgment by reversing a judgment entered in violation of that right).

b. Mandamus or prohibition. Another means of obtaining immediate review of interlocutory orders is to seek an extraordinary writ (mandamus or prohibition) from the appellate court reversing the trial court’s ruling. 28 U.S.C. § 1651(a). However, an appellate court is highly unlikely to grant an extraordinary writ in a case of this sort.

Mandamus and prohibition are available to allow appellate courts “to confine trial judges to the lawful exercise of their jurisdiction or to compel them to act if they have abdicated their jurisdictional obligations.” J.H. FRIEDENTHAL, M.K. KANE, & ARTHUR R. MILLER, CIVIL PROCEDURE 624 (4th ed. 2005); Roche v. Evaporated Milk Ass’n, 319 U.S. 21, 26 (1943). Although courts often favor the enforcement of forum-selection clauses, see The Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore Co., 407 U.S. 1 (1972) (stating strong federal policy of enforcing forum-selection clauses in admiralty actions), their enforceability is not guaranteed and ultimately depends on the terms of the clause, the reasons for its adoption, and its impact on the parties to the litigation. Cf. Carnival Cruise Lines, Inc. v. Shute, 499 U.S. 585 (1991) (enforcing a forum-selection clause in a cruise line ticket on basis that clause is efficient tool for determining location of litigation in event of accident, use of clause avoids litigation in multiple forums, and plaintiffs did not satisfy their burden of establishing serious inconvenience if case were heard in chosen forum). Given that the writs of mandamus and prohibition are extraordinary writs to be used only in exceptional circumstances, see Cheney v. U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, 542 U.S. 367, 380 (2004), it is highly unlikely that an appellate court would grant a writ to exercise immediate review over a district court’s judgment about such matters.

[NOTES: (1) Technically, the writ that would be appropriately sought in this case is a writ of prohibition. But examinees who mention either writ should receive credit. (2) There are other statutory exceptions to the final-judgment rule, but none of them apply to this problem and you should not expect examinees to discuss them. See, e.g., 28 U.S.C. § 1292(a) (immediate appealability of certain orders relating to injunctions, receiverships, and admiralty); 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) (appealability of interlocutory orders when district judge certifies certain grounds for immediate appeal). See generally FRIEDENTHAL, supra, at 629–33.]

The doctrine of pendent appellate jurisdiction would not authorize the appellate court to hear an appeal from the forum-selection decision, even though the court would have jurisdiction over another decision in the same case.

Otherwise non-appealable rulings are sometimes reviewed by appellate courts under the doctrine of “pendent appellate jurisdiction.” The argument for pendent appellate jurisdiction is that the final-judgment rule “is designed to prevent parties from interrupting litigation by pursuing piecemeal appeals. Once litigation has already been interrupted by an authorized pretrial appeal, . . . there is no cause to resist the economy that pendent appellate jurisdiction promotes[.]” and a party should be able immediately to appeal any decisions in the case that can conveniently be reviewed along with the appealable order. Swint v. Chambers County Comm., 514 U.S. 35, 45 (1995). BritCo might argue persuasively that judicial economy would be served if the appellate court would hear its appeal from the order denying enforcement of the forum-selection clause at the same time the court hears its appeal from the judgment on the pleadings order.

However, pendent appellate jurisdiction would not be available in this case. Although the U.S. Supreme Court has implied that the exercise of pendent appellate jurisdiction might sometimes be appropriate, it has also suggested that the scope of such jurisdiction should be narrowly confined. The appellate courts are bound by 28 U.S.C. § 1291, which limits their basic appellate jurisdiction to “final decisions,” and reasons of judicial economy alone would not justify a court in expanding its jurisdiction to cover non-final orders. Rather, a party seeking review of a non-final order on the ground that it is pendent to an appealable order would need to show that the two rulings were “inextricably intertwined” or that “meaningful review” of the ruling over which the court has jurisdiction would not be possible unless the court also reviewed the otherwise non-appealable ruling. Swint, 514 U.S. at 51.

The forum-selection ruling and the ruling denying BritCo’s counterclaim are not inextricably intertwined. Moreover, meaningful review of the counterclaim issue is possible without any consideration of the forum-selection question. Consequently, pendent appellate jurisdiction is not available in this case.

[NOTE: Even well-prepared examinees may be unfamiliar with the concept of pendent appellate jurisdiction. While the Supreme Court has mentioned the concept and it may be a useful label for some decisions, the Court has not expressly developed a doctrine of “pendent appellate jurisdiction.” Nonetheless, examinees should be expected to spot the issue—raised by these facts—of how an appellate court ought to respond when a litigant seeks review of multiple orders of a lower court, some of which are appealable orders and some of which are not. What is important is that examinees recognize that there is a judicial economy argument in favor of reviewing all the orders simultaneously, but that the judicial economy argument fails because of the final-judgment rule, unless some special reason can be shown why simultaneous review will contribute to the court’s ability to review the appealable order. Examinees who spot the problem and understand that judicial economy alone is not grounds for review of the forum-selection clause decision should receive full credit for this portion of the analysis, even if they make no mention of pendent appellate jurisdiction.]

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Is a common law marriage that is valid where contracted also valid in a state that does not recognize common law marriage?
- (2) What are the requirements for a valid common law marriage?
- (3) Does a state statute that permits the adoption of an unmarried father's child when he has not "maintained a residential relationship" with the child for "at least 9 of the 12 months immediately preceding the filing of an adoption petition" violate the U.S. Constitution when applied to a committed residential parent?
- (4) Under the UCCJEA, when may a state issue an order (a) terminating parental rights and (b) making an initial custody determination?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A common law marriage valid where contracted is valid in all states. To enter into a valid common law marriage, a couple must cohabit, hold themselves out as a married couple, and enter into a present agreement that they are married. Although Meg and Dave may have agreed to be married in the future and Meg has held Dave out as a future husband (her fiancé), this conduct is inadequate to establish a common law marriage. Thus, Dave would be treated as an unmarried father under State B's adoption-consent statute.

Dave cannot satisfy the statutory requirements to veto his child's adoption because he has not lived with Child for at least 9 of the 12 months prior to filing of the adoption petition. However, the State B statute is almost certainly unconstitutional as applied to Dave because Dave is a committed father who consistently held himself out as Child's father and both lived with and supported Child until Meg's unannounced departure to State B.

The UCCJEA permits a state to make an "initial child-custody determination" only if it is the child's "home state" when the child-custody proceeding was commenced or was the home state of the child within six months before the commencement of the proceeding and a parent continues to live in the state. A child-custody proceeding includes a proceeding to terminate parental rights. Thus, because Meg took Child from State A only five months ago, State B does not have jurisdiction to terminate Dave's parental rights or to issue a child custody order.

Point One (20%)

A common law marriage that is valid where contracted is also valid in a state that does not permit common law marriage.

Under accepted conflict-of-laws principles, a marriage valid under the law of the place in which it was contracted is valid elsewhere unless it violates a strong public policy of the state which has the most significant relationship with the spouses and the marriage. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONFLICT OF LAWS § 283. Perhaps because the vast majority of states once permitted common law marriage, courts in states that do not recognize common law marriage have consistently held that, if a man and woman were domiciled in a state that permits common law marriage and their conduct met the requirements of that state's law for establishing such a marriage, recognition of the marriage does not violate a strong public policy. Thus, if Dave and Meg entered into a valid common law marriage in State A, it would be recognized by a State B court. See Point Two(b).

A common law marriage, once established, is the equivalent of a ceremonial marriage. Thus, if Dave can show that he and Meg entered into a common law marriage, he would be treated as a married father under State B's adoption law.

Dave and Meg did not enter into a common law marriage.

To establish a common law marriage, the proponent must show: (1) capacity to enter a marital contract, (2) a present agreement that the two parties are married, (3) cohabitation, and (4) "holding out" a marital relationship to the community. See HARRY D. KRAUSE ET AL., FAMILY LAW: CASES, COMMENTS, AND QUESTIONS 129 (6th ed. 2007). The evidence here clearly establishes capacity and cohabitation. It also suggests an agreement to become married. However, a common law marriage requires a present marriage agreement. If Dave and Meg made any marriage agreement, it was an agreement to be married in the future: Meg told Dave that she was "committed to marrying him," but that she "wanted a real wedding, and we can't afford that now;" Meg also proposed that Dave move in with her so that "we can save money to get married." There is also no evidence that Dave and Meg held themselves out as a married couple. Although Meg said to friends and family that Dave was her fiancé, a fiancé is an intended spouse, not a current marriage partner.

Thus, Dave and Meg did not enter into a valid common law marriage, and Dave would be categorized as an unmarried father under State B's adoption-consent statute.

Point Three (40%)

Dave is a committed father who consistently held himself out as a parent, resided with his child, and provided support for his child and the child's mother. Thus, Dave has a strong argument that State B is constitutionally precluded from permitting his child's adoption without his consent.

"When an unwed father demonstrates a full commitment to the responsibilities of parenthood by '[coming] forward to participate in the rearing of his child,' his interest in personal contact with his child acquires substantial protection under the [Fourteenth Amendment's] Due Process Clause." Lehr v. Robertson, 463 U.S. 248, 261 (1983). See also Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645 (1972); Quilloin v. Walcott, 434 U.S. 246 (1978); Caban v. Mohammed, 441 U.S. 380 (1979). Interpreting this standard, the U.S. Supreme Court has held that a father who lived with his children and their mother and held the children out as his own is entitled to a hearing to demonstrate his parental fitness before his parental rights may be terminated. Stanley. The Court has also held that the equal protection clause requires the state to give a father the opportunity to veto his child's adoption when state law grants a similarly situated unmarried mother a veto. See Caban.

On the other hand, the Court has held that a state adoption law that failed to grant an unmarried father a right to veto his child's adoption was constitutional when applied to a nonresidential father who provided minimal support and did nothing to establish his legal paternity until after the adoption petition was filed. See Quilloin, 434 U.S. 246. The Court has also held that an adoption order entered without notice to the unmarried father was constitutional when the state provided him with an opportunity to obtain notice and a hearing through registration with a "putative father registry." See Lehr, 463 U.S. at 264.

Dave has demonstrated the kind of commitment that triggers protection under the Fourteenth Amendment. Like the fathers whose constitutional rights were recognized in Stanley and Caban, Dave held himself out as Child's father; he consented to be identified as Child's father on Child's birth certificate and sent birth announcements identifying himself as Child's father. Like the fathers in Stanley and Caban, Dave lived with Child and Child's mother and provided support to them. After Child's birth, Dave was the only family breadwinner and held down two jobs in order to provide for Meg and Child. He also had volunteered to marry Meg and thus would have been a marital father had Meg agreed. Dave is also blameless for his failure to satisfy the statutory veto requirements; Dave would have lived with Child and Meg for the relevant nine-month period but for Meg's abrupt and unannounced departure from their home. State courts have typically held adoption-consent statutes that would deny a veto right to a father who has done everything in his power to establish a full relationship with his child are unconstitutional as applied in such a case. See e.g., Adoption of Kelsey S., 823 P.2d 1216 (Cal. 1992); In re Raquel Marie X, 559 N.E.2d 418 (N.Y. 1990).

Although Dave does in some respects resemble the unsuccessful unmarried father in Lehr, it is likely that Dave would still prevail. The Lehr father, like Dave, was forced to hire an investigator to find his child and her mother. By the time he succeeded in doing so, an adoption petition had been filed. However, the Lehr father did not receive notice of this petition because he had not established his paternity and had failed to enter his name in the state's putative father registry. Given that he could have obtained notice and a hearing, the Supreme Court held that the state did not violate his constitutional rights when a judge refused to delay signing the adoption petition in order to give the father time to file the appropriate papers and participate in a hearing at which his objection could be heard. See Lehr, 463 U.S. 248.

Here, by contrast, Dave established his paternity by voluntarily acknowledging Child and causing his name to be placed on Child's birth certificate. Under federal law, a voluntary acknowledgment of paternity is binding if unchallenged by the named father within 60 days. See 42 U.S.C. § 666(a)(5). Additionally, State B does not provide unmarried fathers with a putative father registry, and Dave thus had no way of obtaining notice of an adoption proceeding.

Thus, State B's adoption consent statute appears to be unconstitutional as applied to Dave, a committed parent who has fully participated in the rearing of his child.

Point Four (20%)

Because State A has been Child's home state within the past six months and Dave, a parent, continues to live in State A, State B does not have jurisdiction to terminate Dave's parental rights or to make an initial child-custody determination respecting Child.

Under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, which has been adopted in 48 states, a child's "home state" has exclusive jurisdiction to issue an initial custody decree. UCCJEA § 201(a)(1). A "home state" is a state where the child has lived with "a parent, or a person acting as a parent, for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of a child-custody proceeding.” Id. § 102(7). A “child-custody proceeding” includes a “proceeding for . . . termination of parental rights.” Id. § 102(4). A home state continues to have exclusive jurisdiction to issue an initial custody order even if the child is absent from the state when a custody petition is brought, so long as no more than six months has elapsed since the child’s departure from the jurisdiction and “a parent or person acting as a parent continues to live in” the home state. Id. § 201(a)(1). The “[p]hysical presence of, or personal jurisdiction over, a party or a child is not necessary . . . to make a child-custody determination.” Id. § 201(c).

Here, Meg took Child from the family home in State A only five months ago, and Dave still lives in State A. Thus, State A has exclusive jurisdiction to issue an initial custody decree and also to terminate parental rights. State B lacks jurisdiction to do either.

[NOTE: The UCCJEA does not apply to adoption proceedings, but termination of a parent’s rights is typically a precondition for an adoption. Thus, as a practicality, the UCCJEA should preclude a State B court from granting petition for Husband’s adoption of Child.]

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS (COMMERCIAL PAPER) ANALYSIS

(Negotiable Instruments (Commercial Paper) III.A. & B.; IV.A.; V.A., G. & H.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Can Bank recover from Checkco, which presented a check with a forged indorsement, for the loss Bank incurred in recrediting Manufacturer's account?
- (2) Can Checkco recover its loss from Jeweler, who was neither a party to the check nor transferred it?
- (3) Can Checkco recover its loss from Supplier, who indorsed the check and transferred it to Jeweler?

DISCUSSION

Summary

When Checkco presented the check to Bank, it warranted that it was entitled to enforce the check. This warranty was breached because, as a result of the forgery of Jeweler's signature, Checkco was not a person entitled to enforce the check; thus, Bank can recover its loss from Checkco. Checkco cannot recover from Jeweler, who neither indorsed the check nor made any transfer warranties. Supplier was a transferor who transferred by indorsement, so Supplier made transfer warranties to Checkco. None of the transfer warranties was breached and, because the check was not dishonored, Supplier is not liable on his indorser's obligation. Thus, Checkco cannot recover from Supplier.

By presenting the check to Bank and obtaining payment, Checkco warranted that it was entitled to enforce the check. This was not the case because of the forged indorsement of Jeweler. Thus, Bank may recover from Checkco the damages flowing from this breach of warranty.

When a check is presented to the drawee for payment and the drawee pays the check, the person making presentment warrants that, inter alia, it is a person entitled to enforce the check (or is authorized to obtain payment on behalf of such a person). UCC § 3-417(a)(1). Checkco presented the check to Bank, the drawee (UCC § 3-103(a)(4)), and Bank paid the check; therefore Checkco made this warranty.

Checkco was not a person entitled to enforce the check. Under UCC § 3-301, to be a person entitled to enforce the check in these circumstances, Checkco would need to be either a holder of the check or a nonholder of the check in possession of it who has the rights of a holder. Checkco is not the holder of the check because, in order to be the holder, Checkco would need to be in possession of the check and it would have to be payable either to bearer or to Checkco. UCC § 1-201(b)(21)(A). While Checkco was in possession of the check, the check was not payable to either bearer or Checkco. Once the check was indorsed “Pay to Jeweler” by Supplier, the check became payable to Jeweler and could only become payable to bearer or another person if indorsed by Jeweler. UCC § 3-205(a). Jeweler never indorsed the check, however. (The forgery of Jeweler’s signature is ineffective. UCC § 3-403.) Thus, Checkco was not the holder of the check. While Checkco was a nonholder in possession of the check, it did not have the rights of a holder. It could have obtained the rights of a holder if Jeweler—the former holder—had transferred those rights, but Jeweler did not do so because transfer requires delivery of the check to a person for the purpose of giving that person the right to enforce the check (see UCC § 3-203) and Jeweler never delivered the check to Checkco (or anyone else) with such intent. Thus, Checkco was neither a holder of the check nor a non-holder in possession with the rights of a holder; accordingly, it was not a person entitled to enforce the check and, as a result, breached its presentment warranty. The fact that Checkco acted in good faith and without notice of the forged indorsement does not alter Checkco’s status.

Bank was damaged by this breach because, had Checkco been a person entitled to enforce, the facts giving rise to Bank’s obligation to recredit Manufacturer’s account would not be present and Bank would not have suffered the loss it incurred when it recredited Manufacturer’s account after paying the check. Accordingly, Checkco is liable to Bank for this loss.

Checkco cannot recover from Jeweler, who is not a party to the check and did not make any warranties with respect to it.

A person is not liable on an instrument unless the person has signed the instrument. UCC § 3-401(a). Jeweler did not sign the check and thus is not liable on it. (The forgery of Jeweler’s signature as an indorsement does not count as Jeweler’s signature. UCC § 3-403.) While a person who is not a party to an instrument can still make warranties with respect to it, Jeweler has made no warranties to Checkco in this case. Presentment warranties are not relevant because they run only to a drawee or acceptor of the check and Checkco is neither. UCC § 3-417(a). Jeweler made no transfer warranties because Jeweler did not transfer the check for consideration. UCC § 3-416(a).

Point Three (35%)

Supplier indorsed the check, but has no liability as an indorser because the check was not dishonored. Supplier made a transfer warranty to Checkco, but it was not breached. Thus Supplier has no liability for breach of transfer warranty.

When Supplier indorsed the check, he incurred the obligation of an indorser. The obligation is to pay the check if it has been dishonored. UCC § 3-415(a). This check was paid by Bank and was not dishonored, so Supplier has no liability as an indorser. [NOTE: Alternatively, an examinee could conclude that Supplier has no liability to Checkco as an indorser because Checkco is neither a person entitled to enforce the check nor a subsequent indorser who paid it.]

When Supplier transferred the check for consideration and by indorsement, he made transfer warranties not only to its transferee (Jeweler) but also to any subsequent transferees, including Checkco. UCC § 3-416(a). As of the time of the transfer, none of the transfer warranties set out in UCC § 3-416(a) was breached—Supplier was a person entitled to enforce the check (as the payee in possession of the check, Supplier was its holder and, thus, a person entitled to enforce it); all signatures on the check were authentic and authorized; the check had not been altered; it was not subject to any claims or defenses that could be raised against Supplier; and no insolvency proceedings had been instituted against Manufacturer. Therefore, Supplier was not liable for breach of transfer warranty.

[NOTE: An examinee might cite UCC § 4-208 rather than UCC § 3-417 in Point One, and UCC § 4-207 rather than UCC § 3-416 in Point Three. Those citations are equally valid.]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ANALYSIS

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Are the actions of a private nursing school subject to the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment if the school receives no direct state funds, but the state regulates the school and certifies its graduates as eligible to become licensed nurses?
- (2)(a) Does it violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment for a state-owned nursing school to deny admission to a male applicant because of his gender?
- (2)(b) Does it violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment for a state to have an in-state nursing program reserved for female students, and an out-of-state program for male students, where the facilities of and employment from the all-female program are superior?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Private has not violated the man's rights under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by denying him admission, because the actions of Private are not the actions of the state for purposes of the Equal Protection Clause. By contrast, as an arm of the state itself, Public's actions are state action. When Public denied the man admission based upon his gender, Public denied him equal protection of the laws. The creation of the Male Nursing Opportunity Program fails to cure this constitutional violation. As in United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515 (1996), if a state creates two separate single-gender educational institutions, the institutions must (at a minimum) provide equivalent educational experiences. Because in this case the Male Nursing Opportunity Program is clearly inferior as an educational institution, it fails to pass scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause.

Point One (30%)

Private's actions are not subject to the Equal Protection Clause because it is not a state actor.

The Fourteenth Amendment provides that "No State shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The U.S. Supreme Court has interpreted this language as applying not only to the states themselves but also to private parties whose actions constitute "state action." Simply put, in order for there to be a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, the allegedly unconstitutional action (here, denial of admission based upon gender) must be attributable to the state. Actions of private parties are not typically considered state action, but the actions of otherwise “private” parties can constitute state action in certain exceptional cases. For instance, private parties have been held to be state actors where (1) they have performed a traditional public function, Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 352–53 (1974), (2) there is the enforcement of certain private contracts, (3) there is joint action or “entanglement” between a state and private actor, or (4) there is state encouragement of private discrimination, Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S. 991, 1004 (1982) (“A State normally can be held responsible for a private decision only when it has exercised coercive power or has provided such significant encouragement, either overt or covert, that the choice must in law be deemed to be that of the State.”).

Private is a private entity and none of the factors described above contribute to a conclusion that its actions constitute state action. Running a private school or college is not state action. Rendell-Baker v. Kohn, 457 U.S. 830 (1982). First, Private is not performing a traditional public function. Second, there has been no judicial enforcement of a private contract here. Third, it is highly unlikely that a court would hold that mere state regulation of the curriculum and state certification of graduates is sufficient to constitute entanglement. Fourth, there is no evidence that the state has directly encouraged Private to discriminate on the basis of gender.

Point Two(a) (40%)

Public has violated the Equal Protection Clause because a state college may not deny admission on the basis of gender absent an “exceedingly persuasive justification.”

Laws that classify on the basis of gender are typically assessed under heightened scrutiny. Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. 71, 75 (1971). Although some early cases suggested that strict scrutiny was the correct standard, modern cases have settled on intermediate scrutiny. See Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190 (1976). In United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 531 (1996), the U.S. Supreme Court held that state laws that make classifications on the basis of gender are unconstitutional unless the state can establish an “exceedingly persuasive justification” for the classification. An “exceedingly persuasive justification” is one that serves “important governmental objectives” and which does not rely upon outdated or overbroad generalizations and stereotypes about differences between men and women. The burden of justification is demanding and rests entirely on the state. The state must at least show that the “[challenged] classification serves important governmental objectives and that the discriminatory means employed are substantially related to the achievement of those objectives.” Mississippi Univ. for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718, 724–25 (quoting Wengler v. Druggists Mut. Ins. Co., 446 U.S. 142, 150 (1980) (internal quotations omitted)). These objectives must be real in the sense that they are real state purposes rather than hypothetical justifications for the gender classification. Moreover, gender classifications must be “substantially related” to the achievement of such important governmental objectives. “[A] State can evoke a compensatory purpose to justify an otherwise discriminatory classification only if members of the gender benefited by the classification actually suffer a disadvantage related to the classification.” Id. at 728.

Because the man has been denied admission to Public solely on the basis of his gender, the action of Public—clearly the action of the state, as Public is the state nursing school—is presumptively unconstitutional. The state interest in this case is remedying past discrimination against women—as the letter states, “[m]indful of the historical discrimination that women have faced in State A, our state has established Public to remedy this discrimination and provide opportunities for women who want to work in the growing field of health care as nurses.” Remedying past discrimination is certainly an important governmental objective; in the contexts of race and gender classifications, the Supreme Court has upheld this governmental objective in the face of heightened scrutiny. However, it is unclear whether this quote from Public's letter sets forth the actual state purpose. Although there has been gender discrimination in the field of health care in State A in the past, there is no evidence that there has been discrimination against women in the nursing field. Indeed, the evidence that 95 percent of nurses have historically been women suggests that State A is more likely reinforcing outdated stereotypes of women as nurses (rather than, say, doctors) by restricting Public admissions to women. Finally, if the goal of the admissions policy is to end discrimination against women in the health care field, it is not clear how the admissions policy advances this objective.

Point Two(b) (30%)

The Male Nursing Opportunity Program is inconsistent with the guarantees of equal protection.

In certain cases, a state may treat men and women differently consistent with the equal protection guarantee and provide separate facilities for each gender (for example, male and female sports teams, dormitories, and bathroom facilities at state universities). In such cases, moreover, the state must bear the burden of (1) demonstrating the "exceedingly persuasive justification" for the separate treatment, and (2) demonstrating that the separate facilities are substantially equivalent. Thus, for example, in United States v. Virginia, the Supreme Court suggested that the Commonwealth of Virginia could offer all-male and all-female public military-style education consistent with the Equal Protection Clause. However, because the new all-female "Leadership Program" in that case provided facilities and career opportunities inferior to those that the Commonwealth was providing in its established all-male program at the Virginia Military Institute, the Court concluded that the separate program violated the Fourteenth Amendment.

In this case, because the Male Nursing Opportunity Program is markedly inferior to the all-female Public program, it is insufficient to satisfy the Equal Protection Clause. Although graduates of the all-male program are still eligible to become nurses in State A, the two programs are not substantially equivalent. They differ in both overall quality and the employment opportunities they offer to their graduates. The facilities of the Male Nursing Opportunity Program are not as modern as those at Public, the faculty is not as experienced, and graduates of the Male Nursing Opportunity Program do not enjoy the same employment opportunities as graduates of either Public or Private. For these reasons, the Male Nursing Opportunity Program is inferior to the regular all-female Public program, and it cannot be offered as a substitute consistent with Equal Protection.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1)(a) If Adam immediately withdraws from the partnership, what are the consequences to him?
- (1)(b) If Adam immediately withdraws from the partnership, what are the consequences to the partnership?
- (2)(a) If Adam gives six months' written notice and then withdraws from the partnership, what are the consequences to him?
- (2)(b) If Adam gives six months' written notice and then withdraws from the partnership, what are the consequences to the partnership?
- (3) If the partnership's business is wound up after Adam's withdrawal, will he be personally liable for any partnership debts incurred during the winding-up process after his withdrawal?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Adam can withdraw from PSS, without complying with the six months' written notice requirement in PSS's partnership agreement, by giving notice of dissociation. But such a notice, although effective, would be wrongful because it would violate the notice requirement set forth in the partnership agreement. Thus, Adam would be liable to the partnership and to Beth and Chris for damages caused by Adam's wrongful dissociation. Further, Adam would not be able to force the cessation of the operations of PSS and a sale of partnership assets. Beth and Chris may vote to buy out Adam's interest and continue operations instead. Even if Adam's dissociation did lead to a sale of partnership assets, Adam would not be able to participate in the winding-up process.

On the other hand, if Adam gives the six months' notice required under PSS's partnership agreement, Adam's withdrawal would dissolve the partnership and force the winding up of PSS and the sale of the partnership assets. Adam could participate in that process but could not dictate the terms of the sale.

If the partnership business is wound up, Adam would be liable as a partner for liabilities appropriately incurred during the winding-up period whether or not he gives notice properly.

[NOTE: The following jurisdictions have enacted the Uniform Partnership Act (1997): Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Delaware, DC, Florida, Hawaii, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana,

Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, and Washington. The remaining states have the UPA (1914).]

Under the Uniform Partnership Act (1997), Adam can dissociate from PSS without complying with the six months' written notice requirement under PSS's partnership agreement. However, dissociation from the partnership without giving the required six months' notice, although effective, would be wrongful and would make Adam liable for damages. A similar result would follow under the Uniform Partnership Act (1914).

Under the Uniform Partnership Act (UPA) § 601(1) (1997), a partner can dissociate from the partnership at any time by giving notice to the partnership. Thus, Adam can dissociate from the partnership by giving the partnership a notice of dissociation. Furthermore, the right to dissociate can be exercised by the dissociating partner at any time even if the exercise of the power to dissociate was wrongful. Dissociation is wrongful if it is done in contravention of the terms of the partnership agreement. Id. § 602(a), cmt. 1, § 602(b)(1).

Here, Adam's dissociation would be wrongful because the partnership agreement requires the giving of six months' written notice. Because Adam's dissociation would be wrongful, Adam would be liable to the partnership and to Beth and Chris for any damages caused by his dissociation. UPA § 602(c) (1997). Furthermore, as a wrongfully dissociating partner, Adam could not participate in the winding up of the business. Id. § 803(a)

Generally, the provisions of the UPA (1997) are default law that can be modified by the terms of a partnership agreement. However, certain rules cannot be modified. For example, a partnership agreement cannot modify the right to dissociate except to require that a dissociation notice be in writing. Id. § 103(b)(6). Therefore, even though the PSS partnership agreement requires that a partner give six months' written notice before the partnership can be dissolved, Adam can effectively dissociate from PSS. And, because Adam's dissociation would be wrongful, Adam would be liable to the partnership and to Beth and Chris for any damages caused by his dissociation. Id. § 602(c).

The result is similar under the Uniform Partnership Act of 1914. While that act does not recognize a concept of dissociation as that term is used in UPA (1997), it does recognize the right of a partner to dissolve a partnership. A dissolution is the "change in the relation of the partners caused by any partner ceasing to be associated in the carrying on as distinguished from the winding up of the business." Uniform Partnership Act (UPA) § 29 (1914). Dissolution of a partnership is caused by "the express will of any partner when" as here, there is "no definite term or particular undertaking," specified in the partnership agreement. Id. § 31(b).

Under the UPA (1914), if Adam notifies the partners that he no longer wishes to be associated with the partnership, the partnership will be dissolved. As under the UPA (1997), it is irrelevant that Adam's notice is in contravention of the terms in the partnership agreement, such as a requirement, as here, that he gives six months' notice. Id. § 31(2). Regardless of whether he complies with the partnership agreement, Adam's notice would result in the partnership's dissolution. But, as under the UPA (1997), if Adam wrongfully caused the partnership to be dissolved in contravention of the terms of the partnership agreement, the other partners have a right to damages for the breach of the partnership agreement. Id. § 38(2)(a)(II).

Under the Uniform Partnership Act (1997), while Adam may immediately dissociate from the partnership, his wrongful dissociation will not necessarily lead to a dissolution and winding up of PSS. Beth and Chris may elect not to wind up the business but instead to purchase Adam's interest in PSS and continue its operations. A similar result follows under the Uniform Partnership Act (1914).

Under the UPA (1997), which recognizes the partnership as a separate legal entity from its partners, a partner's wrongful dissociation from the partnership does not cause the partnership to be dissolved if the remaining partners waive the right to have the partnership terminated and its business wound up. UPA § 802(b)(1) (1997). Here, because Adam's dissociation would be wrongful (see Point One (a)), under Section 802(b), the partnership would be terminated and its business would up unless the remaining partners, Beth and Chris, waived those rights. If they did, the partnership would have to purchase Adam's interest, see id. § 701(a), for a buyout price determined in accordance with § 701(b).

If Beth and Chris did not waive the right to wind up the business and terminate the partnership but decided to wind up the business and terminate the partnership, Adam could not participate in that winding-up process. See Point One(a). The persons winding up the business, here Beth and Chris, could choose to continue PSS's business for a "reasonable time." Id. § 803(c).

Under the UPA (1914), a rightful or wrongful withdrawal results in the dissolution of the partnership. UPA § 31(1) (1914). However, under § 38(2)(b) "[t]he partners who have not caused the dissolution wrongfully, if they all desire to continue the business in the same name, . . . may do so" A partner who has caused the dissolution wrongfully is not granted the same right. Id. § 38(2)(c). Thus, Beth and Chris could choose to continue the business. If they did choose to continue the business, Adam would be entitled to receive the value of his interest less the damages he caused by wrongfully causing the partnership's dissolution. Id. § 38(2)(c)(II). If Beth and Chris chose not to continue the business, Adam would have the same rights to the partnership property as Beth and Chris would have subject to any damages he would owe them. Id. § 38(2)(c)(I).]

Point Two(a) (20%)

Under the Uniform Partnership Act (1997), if Adam gives the required six months' notice, his dissociation would not be wrongful; Adam would be entitled to participate in the dissolution and winding up of PSS (see Point Two (b)).

If Adam gives the six months' notice required under PSS's partnership agreement, his dissociation would not be wrongful. See UPA § 602(b) (1997). Thus, he would not be liable for damages to either the partnership or Beth or Chris. See id. § 602(c). His dissociation would result in dissolution of the partnership with the requirement that the partnership's business be "wound up." Id. § 801(1); see also § 802(a). Because Adam's dissociation would not be wrongful, he is entitled to participate in the winding up of the partnership. Id. § 803(a). Thus, by giving notice as required by the partnership agreement, Adam can force the cessation of operations of PSS and the sale of its assets. Lastly, because his dissociation would not be wrongful, Beth and Chris could not cause a buyout of his interest, nor would he be liable to them for damages. See id. § 701(a).

If Adam gives the required six months' notice, the partnership will be dissolved and wound up. Although Adam could participate in the winding-up process, Beth and Chris would control that process.

If Adam gives the required six months' notice, PSS will be dissolved and wound up. UPA § 801(1) (1997). Furthermore, Adam can participate in the winding-up process (see Point Two (a)). However, Adam is still only one of three partners, all of whom may participate in the winding up. Because no facts suggest that Adam has controlling management authority, Adam may vote to conduct an immediate winding up and sale of assets, but could be consistently outvoted by Beth and Chris should they decide to continue the partnership for a reasonable time after its dissolution. See generally id. § 803(c). Thus, Adam cannot force an immediate cessation of operations and sale of partnership assets even if he properly gives notice under the PSS partnership agreement. A similar result should follow under the Uniform Partnership Act (1914). See UPA §§ 37, 38(1) (1914).

Point Three (15%)

Partnership obligations appropriately incurred during the winding up process are obligations of all partners including a dissociating partner.

Under Section 804 of the Uniform Partnership Act (1997), the partnership is bound by a partner's act after dissolution if the act was appropriate to the winding up of the partnership. If the partnership is bound, then each partner is liable for his proportionate share of the liability. See UPA § 806 (1997); see also UPA § 306 (1997) ("all partners are liable jointly and severally for all obligations of the partnership"). Thus, a dissociating partner, whether the dissociation was rightful or wrongful, cannot avoid liability for partnership debts incurred during the winding up process.

A similar result follows under the UPA § 35(1) (1914). As to contractual debts, however, the partners' liability is only joint, not joint and severable. UPA § 15(b) (1914).

* Used as one of the six questions on the February 2012 Uniform Bar Examination in Alabama, Colorado, Idaho, Missouri, and North Dakota.

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2012 MEE. Each test includes nine 30-minute questions; user jurisdictions may elect which of the nine questions they wish to use. (The MEE is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination [UBE]. Jurisdictions administering the UBE use a common set of six MEE questions as part of their bar examinations.) In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law. The instructions for the test appear on page iii. For more information, see the MEE Information Booklet, available on the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Federal Civil Procedure/Conflict of Laws question on the February 2012 MEE tested the following areas from the Federal Civil Procedure outline: I.A.1., Jurisdiction and venue—subject matter jurisdiction—federal courts; I.E., Jurisdiction and venue—venue, forum non conveniens, and transfer; and II.A., Law applied by federal courts—state law in federal court; and the following areas from the Conflict of Laws outline: II.D.1.a., Jurisdiction of courts—limits on exercise of jurisdiction—traditional limitations—choice of forum by agreement; and III.F.2., Choice of law—federal-state conflicts—Erie doctrine. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet.

The MEE consists of nine 30-minute essay questions, any of which a jurisdiction may select to include as part of its bar examination. (UBE jurisdictions use a common set of six MEE questions as part of their bar examinations.) It is administered by participating jurisdictions on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. The areas of law that may be covered by the questions on any MEE are Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts, Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Uniform Commercial Code (Negotiable Instruments and Bank Deposits and Collections; Secured Transactions). Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

EVIDENCE QUESTION

Six months ago, a woman was taken to a hospital following what she alleged was a sexual assault by a man during a fraternity party. The woman and the man were both seniors attending the college where the party was held.

At the time of the alleged assault, the hospital's policy required that "in all cases of alleged or suspected sexual assault, non-emergency patients must be interviewed by a victim counselor before receiving medical treatment." The woman was deemed a non-emergency patient and was told to wait in the waiting room to see a victim counselor. Three hours later, the victim counselor finally interviewed the woman. Thereafter, hospital personnel treated the woman for her injuries and sent her home.

There was no contact between the woman and the man until one week later, when the man sent the woman a text message on her cell phone. The text message said, "If you are upset about what happened, I can send you a check for $10,000 to help you forget the whole thing. I can also pay any medical expenses." The woman did not respond.

Four months after the alleged assault, the woman contacted a lawyer and filed a civil action against the man and the hospital. She sought damages from the man for physical injuries resulting from the alleged assault. She also sought damages from the man for psychological injuries. According to the woman, these injuries were especially traumatic because of her belief in sexual abstinence before marriage and her lack of prior sexual experience. She sought damages from the hospital for exacerbating her injuries by negligently delaying her medical treatment.

The man filed an answer admitting that he had had sexual relations with the woman but asserting that they were consensual. In its answer, the hospital denied that its conduct had exacerbated the woman's injuries.

Immediately after filing its answer, the hospital contacted the woman and offered to settle the claim for $5,000. The woman refused the hospital's offer.

Five weeks after the woman filed her suit, the hospital changed its policy on dealing with sexual assault victims to provide that "in all cases of alleged or suspected sexual assault, immediate medical care will be provided to emergency and non-emergency patients."

The woman's suit against the man and the hospital is now set for trial. The following properly filed motions are before the court:

1. The hospital's motion to exclude evidence of its new policy providing immediate medical treatment to emergency and non-emergency patients in all cases of alleged or suspected sexual assault.
2. The hospital's motion to exclude evidence of its offer to settle with the woman.
3. The man's motion to exclude evidence of
 - (a) his offer to pay the woman $10,000.
 - (b) his offer to pay the woman's medical expenses.
4. The man's motion to admit evidence that the woman had sexual relations with another student during her junior year.

The rules of evidence in this jurisdiction are identical to the Federal Rules of Evidence.

How should the court rule on each of these motions? Explain.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS QUESTION

On September 1, Ned bought 1,000 liters of an industrial chemical from Steve for the price of $20 per liter, for a total of $20,000. Steve convinced Ned to buy the chemical by falsely telling Ned that Steve's company would soon announce a new use for the chemical that would dramatically increase its market price. Because Ned did not have $20,000 in cash available, Steve accepted as payment a negotiable promissory note for $20,000. When Ned gave the note to Steve, it was signed on the front by Ned (as maker of the note) and indorsed on the back by Ned's Uncle. Ned's Uncle had indorsed the note as a favor to Ned to help induce Steve to take the note rather than insisting on payment in cash. The note stated that it was payable to the order of Steve and that it was payable on November 15.

On October 14, Steve, who was nervous not only about Ned's ability to pay the amount of the note but also about the prospect that his representation to Ned might soon be exposed as false, sold the note to Cal for $19,000. Cal was an honest businessman who had never dealt with Steve before and was unaware of any of the facts surrounding the sale of the chemical by Steve to Ned. Steve told Cal that Ned was an excellent risk but that he (Steve) was unable to wait until November 15 for payment. To effectuate the sale, Steve indorsed the note by signing his name below Uncle's indorsement and handed the note to Cal. Cal then handed Steve $19,000 in cash.

On October 15, Cal read an article in a local newspaper revealing that Steve was a con artist who had convinced several people, including Ned, to buy the chemical based on false claims of imminent increases in its market price.

On November 1, Cal used the note as partial payment for a new car he contracted to buy from Dealer, handing the note to Dealer without indorsing it. The contract to buy the car provided that the car would not be delivered to Cal until December 1.

On November 15, Dealer, who had not yet delivered the car to Cal, presented the note to Ned. Ned refused to pay and told Dealer that he had been induced to issue the note by Steve's lie. Dealer did not sue Ned because Dealer did not believe that Ned would be able to satisfy a judgment against him. Dealer then gave timely notice to Uncle of Ned's refusal to pay and sued Uncle on the note.

Will Dealer be successful in his suit against Uncle? Explain.

CONTRACTS QUESTION

GreenCar owns a fleet of 10 identical energy-efficient, electric “green” cars that it rents out for special events. GreenCar is the only company that has such specialized cars available for rental. GreenCar needed all 10 of its cars to fulfill a contract to provide 10 identical green cars to carry dignitaries in the local Earth Day parade on April 22, but each of the cars needed repair to be operable for the parade.

In order to have all 10 cars repaired in time for the parade, GreenCar entered into a contract with RepairCo pursuant to which RepairCo promised to “repair all 10 cars and return them to GreenCar no later than April 21 for $1,000 per car, $10,000 total.”

On April 21, RepairCo had completed repairs on only 6 of the 10 cars and returned those 6 cars to GreenCar. When RepairCo delivered the 6 cars, it informed GreenCar that the remaining 4 cars were not ready because RepairCo workers had walked off the job when salary negotiations broke down. RepairCo also explained to GreenCar that it planned to give its workers the raises they wanted, but it first wanted “to teach them a lesson.” RepairCo estimated that the remaining 4 GreenCar cars (all still inoperable) would be repaired by April 30.

GreenCar demanded that RepairCo return the remaining 4 unrepaired cars immediately. RepairCo did so. GreenCar refused to pay RepairCo for any repairs to the other 6 cars.

RepairCo sued GreenCar, alleging that GreenCar’s refusal to pay anything was a breach of contract.

Is RepairCo entitled to any payment from GreenCar, and if so, under what theory or theories? Explain.

TORTS QUESTION

Paul, age eight, and Paul's mother, Mom, spent the morning at Funworld, an amusement park. Paul decided to ride the Ferris wheel. Mom, who was pregnant and tired, waited for him about 100 yards away.

After Paul entered a Ferris wheel car, the attendant, Employee, fastened the car's safety bar. As the Ferris wheel began to turn, Paul could hear loud screams from a car carrying two boys, both age six. The boys were rocking their car vigorously. Employee also heard the two boys screaming and saw them rocking their car, but Employee took no action to stop them.

As Paul's car began to descend from the top of the wheel, the two boys—whose car was right behind Paul's car—shook the safety bar on their car hard enough that it unlatched. Both boys fell to the ground. One of the boys struck Paul on his way down.

After the two boys fell, Employee stopped the Ferris wheel and sounded an emergency alarm to notify Funworld security guards of the incident.

Mom did not see the accident, but she heard the alarm and rushed to the Ferris wheel. A crowd had already gathered, and Mom was unable to see Paul. A bystander told Mom that "a little boy has been killed." Mom, panic-stricken, attempted to make her way through the crowd but could not.

Ten minutes later, the two boys who had fallen were taken to the hospital by an ambulance.

Paul and several of the other passengers begged to be taken off the Ferris wheel. Employee, however, refused without any explanation to restart the Ferris wheel. Thirty minutes later, a manager showed up and ordered Employee to restart the Ferris wheel and allow the passengers to exit.

Forty minutes after the accident, Mom was finally reunited with Paul. Both Paul and Mom went to the hospital, where Paul was treated for minor injuries caused by being hit when the two boys fell and where Mom suffered a miscarriage as a result of accident-related stress.

National accident records show that during the last 40 years, there has been only one other incident in which injuries have occurred as a result of passengers rocking a Ferris wheel car.

Paul and Mom have sued Funworld. Funworld has conceded that Employee was acting within the scope of his employment.

Based on the facts, could a jury properly find that

1. Funworld falsely imprisoned Paul? Explain.
2. Funworld was negligent because Employee failed to take action to stop the boys from rocking their car? Explain.
3. Mom is entitled to damages for her emotional distress and resulting miscarriage? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

Five years ago, Testator asked her attorney to draft a will that would leave Testator's entire estate to Nephew. One week later, the attorney mailed to Testator a document captioned "Last Will and Testament." Although the document complied with Testator's instructions, Testator did not sign it or have it witnessed.

Three years ago, Testator called her attorney and said, "I want my 400 shares of XYZ Corporation common stock to go to Aunt instead of Nephew." Testator added, "I also want my home to go to Cousin. The house has five bedrooms, and Cousin has such a large family." Testator told the attorney that her home was located at 340 Green Avenue, Springfield, State A.

Subsequently, the attorney sent Testator a document stating in its entirety:

I, Testator, being of sound and disposing mind, give my home, located at 340 Green Avenue, Springfield, State A, to Cousin and my 400 shares of XYZ Corporation common stock to Aunt. In all other respects, I republish my will.

Upon receipt of this document, Testator properly executed it.

Two years ago, Testator sold her five-bedroom house at 340 Green Avenue and used the proceeds to purchase a two-bedroom house located at 12 Elm Street in Springfield. The same year, Testator received 200 shares of XYZ common stock from XYZ Corporation in the form of a "dividend paid in stock."

Three weeks ago, Testator died. Her probate estate consists of $200,000, her house at 12 Elm Street, and 600 shares of XYZ Corporation common stock, consisting of Testator's original 400 shares and the 200-share stock dividend.

Testator is survived by Daughter, Daughter's child (Grandson), Nephew, Cousin, and Aunt.

Fifteen years ago, Daughter was convicted of murdering her father, Testator's husband. Testator and Daughter have had little contact since Daughter's conviction, and Daughter remains in prison.

Testator is a resident of State A, and all of Testator's assets are located in State A.

How should Testator's probate assets be distributed? Explain.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

A man and a woman validly formed a partnership (“Garden Partnership”) to fix commercial gardening equipment. Several months after Garden Partnership began operations, it hired an employee who was a skilled mechanic.

The employee negligently repaired a piece of equipment for a customer. As a result, the customer was severely injured. The customer successfully sued Garden Partnership and recovered a judgment for $500,000, which has not been paid.

Shortly after entry of this judgment, the man and woman took the necessary steps to qualify Garden Partnership as a limited liability partnership, and they renamed it “Garden LLP.”

Shortly thereafter, the man and woman decided to expand the business. Because they needed more capital, they agreed to admit an investor as a partner. The investor contributed $50,000 and became a partner in Garden LLP.

1. Is Garden LLP liable for the $500,000 judgment against Garden Partnership? Explain.
2. Are the man and woman personally liable to the customer for the $500,000 judgment against Garden Partnership? Explain.
3. Is the investor personally liable to the customer for the $500,000 judgment against Garden Partnership? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE/CONFLICT OF LAWS QUESTION

The owner of a rare antique tapestry worth more than $1 million is a citizen of State A. The owner contacted a restorer, a citizen of State B, to restore the tapestry for $100,000. The owner and the restorer met in State A and negotiated a contract, but the final documents, prepared by the parties' respective attorneys, were drafted and signed in State B. The contract has a forum-selection clause that specifies that any litigation arising out of or relating to the contract must be commenced in State B.

The restorer repaired the tapestry in State B and then informed the owner that the restoration was complete. The owner picked up the tapestry and paid the restorer $100,000. Subsequently, the owner discovered that the restorer had done hardly any work on the tapestry.

Despite the forum-selection clause in the contract, the owner filed suit against the restorer in a state court in State A, claiming breach of contract. The owner's suit sought rescission of the contract and a return of the full contract price—$100,000.

The laws of State A and State B are different on two relevant points. First, State A courts do not enforce forum-selection clauses that would oust the jurisdiction of State A courts, regarding such clauses as against public policy; State B courts always enforce forum-selection clauses. Second, State A would allow contract rescission on these facts; State B would not allow rescission but would allow recovery of damages.

Under the conflict-of-laws rules of both State A and State B, a state court would apply its own law to resolve both the forum-selection clause issue and the rescission issue.

After the owner filed suit in State A court, the restorer removed the case to the United States District Court for the District of State A and then moved for a change of venue to the United States District Court for the District of State B, citing the contractual forum-selection clause in support of the motion. (There is only one United States District Court in each state.) The owner moved for remand on the ground that the federal court did not have removal jurisdiction over the action. Alternatively, the owner argued against the motion to transfer on the basis that the forum-selection clause was invalid under State A law.

1. Does the federal court in State A have removal jurisdiction over the case? Explain.
2. Should the change-of-venue motion, seeking transfer of the case to the federal court in State B, be granted? Explain.
3. Would a change of venue affect the law to be applied in resolving the rescission issue? Explain.

REAL PROPERTY QUESTION

Blackacre, which is immediately to the west of Whiteacre, is bounded on its west by a state highway. Whiteacre is bounded on the east by a county road. Both roads connect to a four-lane highway.

Twenty years ago, Tom, who then owned Blackacre, sold to Sue, who then owned Whiteacre, an easement over a private gravel road that crossed Blackacre. This easement allowed Sue significantly better access to the four-lane highway from Whiteacre than she had had using only the county road adjacent to Whiteacre. The easement was promptly and properly recorded.

After acquiring this easement, Sue discontinued using the county road to the east of Whiteacre and used the private gravel road crossing Blackacre to travel between Whiteacre and the four-lane highway. Sue used the private gravel road across Blackacre for that purpose almost every day for the next 18 years.

Fifteen years ago, Sue purchased Blackacre from Tom. The deed from Tom to Sue was promptly and properly recorded.

Two years ago, Sue sold Whiteacre to Dan. The deed from Sue to Dan, which was promptly and properly recorded, did not mention the private gravel road crossing Blackacre, although Dan was aware that Sue had used the road to more easily access the four-lane highway.

Following the purchase of Whiteacre, Dan obtained a construction loan from Bank secured by a mortgage on Whiteacre. This mortgage was promptly and properly recorded. The loan commitment, in the amount of $1,500,000, which was reflected in the mortgage, obligated Bank to loan Dan $300,000 immediately. It further obligated Bank to loan Dan an additional $500,000 in 180 days and $700,000 in 280 days.

After obtaining the second loan installment from Bank, Dan realized that he would need additional funds and borrowed $400,000 from Finance Company. This loan was also secured by a mortgage on Whiteacre. Upon Dan's signing the note and mortgage, Finance Company immediately remitted the $400,000 to Dan and promptly and properly recorded its mortgage.

Thereafter, Bank advanced the final $700,000 loan installment to Dan.

Recently, Dan defaulted on the loans from both Bank and Finance Company. At the time of these defaults, Dan owed $1,500,000 to Bank and $400,000 to Finance Company.

At a proper foreclosure sale by Bank, Whiteacre was sold for $1,500,000 net of sale expenses.

1. Immediately before Sue sold Whiteacre to Dan, did Sue have an easement over Blackacre? Explain.
2. Immediately after Sue sold Whiteacre to Dan, did Dan have an easement over Blackacre? Explain.
3. How should the proceeds from the sale of Whiteacre be distributed between Bank and Finance Company? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

A corporation's articles of incorporation state that the corporation shall have a seven-member board of directors. Neither the articles of incorporation nor the corporation's bylaws contain any special provisions regarding the board of directors.

On March 1, the corporation's president told its secretary to convene a special meeting of the board of directors. Accordingly, the secretary prepared a Notice of Special Meeting (Notice) and sent it by overnight mail to six of the seven directors. The secretary did not send the Notice to the seventh director — Claire — because Claire had recently moved and the corporation did not have a current mailing address for her.

The Notice stated only that a special meeting of the corporation's board of directors would be held on March 31 at 10 a.m., at the corporate headquarters.

On March 2, each member of the board of directors except Claire received the Notice. Directors Alan and Barb, both of whom had vacation plans for March 31, made arrangements with the secretary to participate in the special meeting by telephone.

On March 30, Alan called Claire and informed her that a special meeting of the board of directors was going to be held on March 31.

On March 31, five members of the board of directors (including Claire but neither Alan nor Barb) gathered in the corporation's conference room. Alan and Barb called in from their vacation homes. The five directors present in the conference room could hear both Alan and Barb. Alan and Barb could each hear the five directors in the conference room but could not hear each other.

After a lengthy discussion, the board of directors voted 4–3 to approve the corporation's purchase of a major asset. Alan and Barb both voted to approve the purchase.

Claire, who voted against the purchase, is very upset and has brought an action seeking an injunction to prevent the purchase of the asset. Claire asserts that the board of directors did not properly approve the purchase of the asset.

Did the board of directors properly approve the purchase of the asset? Explain.

EVIDENCE ANALYSIS

(Evidence II.A.1.; III.G., H., I.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Should the court admit evidence of the hospital's subsequent remedial measures when those measures would have prevented or mitigated the woman's injuries if they had been in place at the time of the alleged tortious conduct?
- (2) Should the court admit evidence of the hospital's offer to pay the woman when that offer was made after her lawsuit had been filed?
- (3)(a) Should the court admit evidence of the man's offer to pay the woman when the offer was made before the woman's claim was in dispute?
- (3)(b) Should the court admit evidence of the man's offer to pay the woman's medical expenses?
- (4) Should the court admit evidence of the woman's past sexual relations in a civil suit alleging that she was sexually assaulted?

DISCUSSION

Summary

While evidence of the hospital's subsequent remedial measures may be relevant to a determination of its liability for the woman's physical and psychological injuries, this evidence is inadmissible because subsequent remedial measures that would have made an injury less likely to occur are not admissible to prove negligence or other culpable conduct.

Although evidence of the hospital's offer to settle with the woman may be relevant to a determination of the hospital's negligence, settlement offers are inadmissible to prove negligence.

Evidence of the man's offer to pay the woman $10,000 may be relevant to a determination of his liability. This evidence is admissible because his offer was made before the woman's claim was disputed and before she filed her civil suit.

Evidence of the man's offer to pay the woman's medical expenses may be relevant to a determination of his liability. However, this evidence is inadmissible because evidence of an offer to pay medical and other similar expenses caused by an injury is inadmissible to prove liability for the injury.

Evidence that the woman has engaged in sexual relations in the past with another student should be admitted. This evidence has significant probative value because the woman has specifically alleged psychological injuries attributable to her belief in abstinence before marriage and her lack of prior sexual experience. On these facts, the court should find that the probative value of this evidence "substantially outweighs" the potential harm that could inure to the woman when the jurors hear evidence that she engaged in sexual relations with another student.

Point One (20%)

The court should exclude evidence of the hospital's subsequent remedial measures.

Evidence is relevant if it has “any tendency to make a fact” either “more or less probable than it would be without the evidence.” FED. R. EVID. 401 (as amended December 1, 2011). “Relevant evidence is admissible,” unless it is inadmissible pursuant to some other rule. FED. R. EVID. 402. The woman has alleged that the hospital caused the exacerbation of her injuries by negligently delaying her medical treatment for three hours pursuant to its then-existing standard policy. The hospital’s decision to change its policy and provide immediate treatment to all sexual assault victims suggests that it has concluded that its old policy was inappropriate. This may be relevant to the woman’s claim that the hospital’s decision to deny her immediate treatment was negligent.

However, evidence of the policy change is nonetheless inadmissible. Rule 407 of the Federal Rules of Evidence provides that “[w]hen measures are taken that would have made an earlier injury or harm less likely to occur, evidence of the subsequent measures is not admissible to prove negligence.” FED. R. EVID. 407. Here, the hospital’s policy change is a subsequent measure that could have made the woman’s alleged injury less likely had the policy been in place at the time she visited the hospital. The woman wishes to introduce evidence of the policy change to establish that the hospital’s behavior pursuant to its prior policy was negligent. There are no facts indicating that this evidence is relevant to prove anything other than the hospital’s negligence in this case. But such evidence, even when relevant, is excluded based on “a social policy of encouraging people to take, or at least not discouraging them from taking, steps in furtherance of added safety.” FED. R. EVID. 407 advisory committee’s note. See Werner v. Upjohn Co., Inc., 628 F.2d 848, 857 (4th Cir. 1980) (explaining that Rule 407 is intended to guard against the fact that people “would be less likely to take subsequent remedial measures if their repairs or improvements would be used against them in a lawsuit”).

Point Two (20%)

The court should exclude evidence of the hospital's offer to settle with the woman.

Evidence of the hospital’s offer to settle with the woman may be relevant to a determination of its negligence because this evidence has some tendency to make it more probable that the hospital engaged in negligent conduct. FED. R. EVID. 401. However, the Federal Rules of Evidence bar evidence that a party “furnish[ed] or promis[ed] or offer[ed] . . . a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise the [disputed] claim.” FED. R. EVID. 408. Rule 408 excludes settlement offers and statements made during settlement negotiations. Evidence of offers to settle “disputed claim[s]” is excluded based on “the promotion of the public policy favoring the compromise and settlement of disputes.” FED. R. EVID. 408 advisory committee’s note.

Here, the hospital’s offer to settle with the woman falls squarely within this rule and should be excluded from evidence. Its offer was an effort to settle with the woman. Because the offer was made after the woman filed her claim, it was made at a time when her “claim was disputed as to validity or amount.” She seeks to admit the offer to help prove the hospital’s liability for her claim. Rule 408 bars admission of the evidence under these circumstances.

[NOTE: In their discussion of this issue and of Point Three, some examinees might discuss whether any out-of-court statements by the man or the hospital would be excluded from evidence by the hearsay rule. In this case, the hearsay rule would not exclude these statements because they were made by an opposing party. FED. R. EVID. 801(d)(2). A statement by the man is “an opposing party’s statement.” Id. A statement by the hospital is either a statement “made by a person whom the party authorized to make a statement on the subject,” FED. R. EVID. 801(d)(2)(C), or a statement “made by the party’s agent or employee on a matter within the scope of that relationship and while it existed.” FED. R. EVID. 801(d)(2)(D).]

The court should admit evidence of the man’s offer to pay the woman $10,000.

Evidence of the man’s statement “If you are upset about what happened, I can send you a check for $10,000 to help you forget the whole thing” may be relevant to a determination of his liability. This evidence has some tendency to make it more probable that the man believed that the woman might have some valid basis for filing a complaint against him. FED. R. EVID. 401. The question is whether this offer to the woman, like the hospital’s offer, is barred from admission by Rule 408.

As noted above, an offer to compromise is barred from admission only if it is made in response to a “disputed claim.” FED. R. EVID. 408. In this instance, the man made his offer to the woman almost four months before she filed this suit. Rule 408 excludes settlement offers and statements made during settlement negotiations. Although Rule 408 does not require that a lawsuit be filed, here the man made his offer before the woman had made any claim at all against him, much less a “disputed claim,” and therefore his offer is not excluded under Rule 408.

The court should exclude evidence of the man’s offer to pay the woman’s medical expenses.

Evidence of the man’s offer to pay the woman’s medical expenses is probably relevant, but the court should nonetheless exclude the evidence. Federal Rule 409 precludes admission of “[e]vidence of furnishing, promising to pay, or offering to pay medical . . . expenses resulting from an injury . . . to prove liability for the injury.” FED. R. EVID. 409. Such evidence is excluded because “such payment or offer is usually made from humane impulses and . . . to hold otherwise would tend to discourage assistance to the injured person.” FED. R. EVID. 409 advisory committee’s note (quoting 20 A.L.R. 2d 291, 293). Unlike Rule 408, Rule 409 does not require that the statement be made in response to a disputed claim.

Point Four (20%)

The court should admit evidence of the woman’s past sexual behavior because the probative value of the evidence substantially outweighs the danger of harm to her.

In any “civil or criminal proceeding involving alleged sexual misconduct,” the “Rape Shield” rule of the Federal Rules of Evidence generally bars the admission of “evidence offered to prove that a victim engaged in other sexual behavior.” FED. R. EVID. 412(a). The purpose of the rule is “to safeguard the alleged victim against the invasion of privacy, potential embarrassment and sexual stereotyping that is associated with public disclosure of intimate sexual details and the infusion of sexual innuendo into the fact finding process.” FED. R. EVID. 412 advisory committee’s note.

However, in civil cases, Federal Rule of Evidence 412 permits the admission of otherwise inadmissible evidence of an alleged victim’s sexual behavior “if its probative value substantially outweighs the danger of harm to any victim.” FED. R. EVID. 412(b)(2). In this case, evidence of the woman’s past sexual behavior with another student has significant probative value because the woman has specifically alleged psychological injuries attributable to her belief in abstinence before marriage and her lack of prior sexual experience. Here, the court is likely to find that the probative value of this evidence “substantially outweighs” the potential harm that could inure to the woman when the jurors learn that she previously had sexual relations with another student.

(Negotiable Instruments II.; III.; IV.; V.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Does Dealer have a claim against Uncle?
- (2) Does the fact that Uncle received no consideration for his indorsement give him a defense?
- (3) Can Uncle assert Ned's defense that he was induced to enter into the transaction and issue the note because of Steve's misrepresentation?
- (4) Can Uncle's defense be raised successfully against Dealer?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Dealer is likely to be successful in his action against Uncle. Dealer, who is the holder of the note and thus a person entitled to enforce it, will sue Uncle based on his indorser's obligation. Because Uncle is an accommodation party, the lack of consideration for his indorsement is not a defense. Although Uncle has no defenses of his own, because he is an accommodation party he is permitted to raise Ned's defense that he was induced to enter into the transaction by Steve's misrepresentation. This defense will not be successful against a person who has the rights of a holder in due course. Thus, it is necessary to determine whether Dealer is such a person. Although Dealer is not a holder in due course because he did not take the note for value as defined in UCC Article 3 (the unperformed promise to deliver the car does not constitute "value"), Dealer has the rights of a holder in due course by transfer from Cal, who was a holder in due course. Accordingly, Dealer is not subject to Uncle's defense, and Uncle is liable to Dealer for the amount of the note.

Point One (15%)

Dealer has a claim against Uncle as an indorser of the note.

If an instrument has been dishonored and notice of dishonor has been given or is excused, an indorser of the instrument is liable to a person entitled to enforce it. UCC §§ 3-415, 3-503. Ned's failure to pay the note constituted dishonor (UCC § 3-502(a)), and Uncle is an indorser of the note. Thus, as long as he has been given notice of dishonor (or such notice is excused), Uncle is liable to a person entitled to enforce the note.

Dealer is a person entitled to enforce the note because he is the holder of the note. UCC § 3-301. Although the note was issued payable to the order of Steve, Dealer, who is in possession of the note, is now the holder because when Steve indorsed the note by signing his name on the back, the note became a bearer instrument (see UCC § 3-205), and anyone in possession of a bearer instrument is a holder. UCC § 1-201(b)(21).

Uncle has been given timely notice of dishonor. As a result, subject to possible defenses (see Points Two, Three, and Four), Uncle is liable on the note to Dealer.

Point Two (10%)

Uncle cannot successfully raise as a defense lack of consideration for his indorsement.

Uncle incurred the obligation of an indorser on the note without receiving consideration for incurring that obligation. This lack of consideration would, in most circumstances, be a defense against his liability on the note. UCC § 3-305(a)(2). But in this case, a different rule applies because Uncle is an “accommodation party.” He is an accommodation party because he signed an instrument for the purpose of becoming liable on it, even though he was not a direct beneficiary of the value given for the instrument. UCC § 3-419(a). The obligation of an accommodation party may be enforced whether or not the accommodation party received consideration. UCC § 3-419(b). Accordingly, Uncle cannot raise as a defense the fact that he received no consideration for his indorsement.

[NOTE: An examinee might state that Uncle received consideration because Steve agreed to sell the chemical on credit in exchange for Uncle’s willingness to be liable on the note. The facts do not explicitly indicate such a quid pro quo, but an examinee should receive credit for this analysis.]

Uncle can raise as a defense Ned’s claim that he was induced to enter into the transaction by Steve’s misrepresentation.

Parties to an instrument generally are not permitted to assert another party’s defense to liability on the instrument. UCC § 3-305(c). There is an exception to this principle: because Uncle is an accommodation party, he is entitled to raise the defenses of the “accommodated party”—Ned. UCC § 3-305(d). Thus, Uncle would be able to raise, as a defense to his obligation on the note, the defense that Ned would be able to raise—that he was induced to enter into the transaction by Steve’s misrepresentation. As explained in Point Four, however, Uncle will be unsuccessful in this defense because Dealer has the rights of a holder in due course and will be free of that defense.

Ned’s defense of misrepresentation is a “personal” defense that cannot be raised successfully against someone who has the rights of a holder in due course.

Except when a holder in due course is enforcing an instrument, a person liable on the instrument can raise any defense to liability that could be raised against liability on a simple contract. UCC § 3-305(a)(2). Under this principle, Uncle, raising Ned’s defenses (see Point 3), could defend on the ground that Ned would not be liable on the promissory note because he was induced to enter into the obligation by Steve’s misrepresentation.

However, this defense would be effective only if the person enforcing the note did not have the rights of a holder in due course. The right of a holder in due course to enforce the obligation of a party to an instrument is subject to the four “real” defenses listed in UCC § 3-305(a)(1) but is not subject to any other defenses (usually referred to as “personal” defenses). The four “real” defenses are (i) infancy; (ii) duress, lack of capacity, or illegality that nullifies the obligation under other law; (iii) fraud that induced the obligor to sign the instrument with neither knowledge nor reasonable opportunity to learn of its character or essential terms; and (iv) discharge of the obligor in insolvency proceedings. The defense that Ned was induced to enter into the transaction by Steve's misrepresentation is not a real defense listed in UCC § 3-305(a)(1). Accordingly, if Dealer has the rights of a holder in due course, Dealer will not be subject to the defense.

Although Dealer is not a holder in due course, Dealer has the rights of a holder in due course under the shelter principle of negotiable instruments law and thus is not subject to Uncle's defense.

Dealer is not a holder in due course of the note. This is because one of the criteria under UCC § 3-302(a) that must be satisfied for a person to be a holder in due course is that the person must have taken the instrument for "value." As that term is defined in Article 3 of the UCC, an unperformed promise does not constitute value. UCC § 3-303. Accordingly, because Dealer has not yet delivered the car to Cal, he did not take the note for value. Thus, Dealer is not a holder in due course. (This is the case even if Dealer took the note without notice of Steve's misrepresentation.)

However, when Cal owned the instrument, he was a holder in due course. This is because Cal was a holder of the instrument and satisfied the other requirements listed in UCC § 3-302(a). Cal was a holder because he was in possession of a bearer instrument (see Point One). In addition, Cal satisfied the other elements of UCC § 3-302: he gave value by paying $19,000 for the note, took the note in good faith (honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing, UCC § 1-201(b)(20)), and took the note without notice of any claims or defenses to it or that it was overdue. Although Cal subsequently learned of Steve's misrepresentation, holder-in-due-course status is determined at the time the instrument is negotiated and value is given. In this case, that was October 14, and Cal did not receive notice of the misrepresentation until the next day. Therefore, Cal was a holder in due course.

When Cal transferred the note to Dealer, Dealer obtained Cal's rights as a holder in due course. This is because of the "shelter principle" of UCC Article 3: "transfer of an instrument . . . vests in the transferee any right of the transferor to enforce the instrument, including any right as a holder in due course." UCC § 3-203(b). As a result, Dealer has the same rights as Cal. As a holder in due course, Cal would not have been subject to Uncle's defense based on Steve's misrepresentation. Therefore, Dealer is not subject to Uncle's defense and is entitled to payment of $20,000 from him.

Legal Problems

- (1) Did RepairCo substantially perform its contractual obligations by the contract due date?
- (2) Can RepairCo recover some portion of the contract price on the theory that the contract was divisible?
- (3) Can RepairCo recover some portion of the contract price as restitution for part performance?

DISCUSSION

Summary

RepairCo neither fully nor substantially performed its contractual obligations. Therefore, RepairCo is not entitled to recover the full contract price. However, RepairCo may be entitled to recover some portion of the contract price if the contract is divisible. If the contract is not divisible, RepairCo may be entitled to restitution for part performance.

Point One (50%)

RepairCo did not substantially perform its contractual obligations when it repaired only 6 of the required 10 cars by the contract due date.

RepairCo did not fully perform its contractual obligations. However, RepairCo might argue that it substantially performed its obligations under the contract and therefore is entitled to recover on that contract. Substantial performance is present when a party completes its contractual obligations with “no uncured material failure.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 237. Whether a failure to perform is material depends on several factors, including (1) the extent to which the injured party will be deprived of the benefit he reasonably expected, (2) the extent to which the injured party can be adequately compensated for the part of that benefit of which he will be deprived, (3) the extent to which the other party failing to perform or to offer to perform will suffer forfeiture, (4) the likelihood that the party failing to perform will cure his failure, and (5) the extent to which the behavior of the party failing to perform comports with standards of good faith and fair dealing. Id. § 241.

Here, because its failure to perform was a material breach, RepairCo did not substantially perform. First, it repaired only 6 of the 10 vehicles, thereby denying GreenCar a material portion of the benefit GreenCar reasonably expected. GreenCar could not make other arrangements to obtain that lost material benefit (the use of 4 “green” cars on April 22) because it was the only company with the specialized cars, and GreenCar was not aware until April 21 that only 6 of the 10 cars had been repaired. Second, while GreenCar might be compensated in damages for some of the harm caused by not having a full fleet of vehicles for the Earth Day parade, it could not be compensated for such non-economic harms as lost reputation. Third, RepairCo will not suffer forfeiture—it will not have to undo any work done and might recover some amount for the work it completed (see Points Two and Three). Fourth, RepairCo cannot cure its failure because the contract required it to deliver 10 cars on April 21, which it did not and cannot do. Finally, RepairCo's failure to perform likely did not comport with standards of good faith and fair dealing. This is because it allowed the work stoppage to continue so that it could teach its workers a lesson, rather than accepting their terms, as it intended to do eventually, and completing the contract.

Because RepairCo failed to substantially perform its contractual obligations, GreenCar is excused from its obligation to pay on the contract. "Where a contract is made to perform work and no agreement is made as to payment, the work must be substantially performed before payment can be demanded." Stewart v. Newbury, 115 N.E. 984, 985 (N.Y. 1917). Here, the facts do not indicate that progress payments or periodic payments were negotiated or agreed to. Thus, RepairCo is not entitled to recover on the entire contract on the theory of substantial performance.

If RepairCo establishes that the contract with GreenCar is divisible, RepairCo may be entitled to recover an amount less than the full $10,000 contract price.

If RepairCo's performance is divisible, RepairCo may be entitled to some payment. See Gill v. Johnstown Lumber Co., 25 A. 120 (Pa. 1892). A contract is said to be divisible if the performances to be exchanged can be divided into corresponding pairs of part performances in such a way that a court will treat the elements of each pair as if the parties had agreed they were equivalents. E. ALLAN FARNSWORTH, FARNSWORTH ON CONTRACTS § 8.13 (3d ed. 2004). Here, RepairCo could argue that although the contract stated one total contract price ($10,000), the contract also stated an amount per vehicle. Thus, the total payment could easily be divided among the 10 very similar vehicles, which required similar work, with each car repair corresponding to $1,000 of GreenCar's payment. RepairCo could argue, therefore, that it is entitled to 6/10 of the $10,000, or $6,000, less any additional incidental or consequential losses resulting from its failure to repair the remaining 4 cars on April 21.

GreenCar could argue, however, that the contract is not divisible. GreenCar needed all 10 cars to meet its contractual obligation to supply 10 cars for the local Earth Day parade. "[T]here is no set formula which furnishes a foolproof method for determining in a given case just which contracts are severable and which are entire." John v. United Advertising, 439 P.2d 53, 56 (Colo. 1968). Thus, it is possible, but far from certain, that RepairCo could recover some part of the contract price from GreenCar on the theory that the contract is divisible.

Even if the contract is not divisible, RepairCo may be entitled to restitution from GreenCar for the benefit it conferred in part performance.

Even if the contract is not divisible and RepairCo cannot recover on the contract, RepairCo may be entitled to some recovery from GreenCar as restitution for part performance so that GreenCar is not unjustly enriched. A party "is entitled to restitution for any benefit that he has conferred by way of part performance...in excess of the loss that he has caused by his own breach." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 374(1); Lancellotti v. Thomas, 491 A.2d 117 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1985). RepairCo partially performed by delivering 6 of GreenCar's vehicles with the work done on the contract due date. Thus RepairCo may be entitled to restitution for the work done on those cars, less any additional incidental or consequential losses resulting from its failure to repair the remaining 4 cars on April 21. [NOTE: An examinee might properly refer to this form of possible recovery as either unjust enrichment or quantum meruit.]

Legal Problems

- (1) Could a jury properly find that Employee falsely imprisoned Paul by stopping the Ferris wheel for 30 minutes?
- (2) Could a jury properly find that Funworld was negligent because Employee failed to take action to stop the two boys from rocking their car?
- (3) Could a jury properly find that Mom is entitled to recover for her emotional distress and resulting miscarriage?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A jury could properly find that Employee falsely imprisoned Paul, because Employee knew with substantial certainty that Paul would be confined in the Ferris wheel car when he refused to restart the Ferris wheel, and the facts do not establish any defense to a false imprisonment claim. Because Employee was acting within the scope of his employment, a jury could impose liability on Funworld for Employee's actions. A jury could properly find that Employee's failure to take action to stop the two boys from rocking the car was negligent and that it caused Paul's injuries even though there has been only one similar accident over the past 40 years. It is unlikely that Mom can recover for her emotional distress and resulting miscarriage because she was not in the zone of danger and did not contemporaneously observe any injury to Paul.

Point One (40%)

Paul can establish the elements of a prima facie case of false imprisonment, and there is no defense here to a false imprisonment claim.

An actor is subject to liability to another for false imprisonment if "(a) he acts intending to confine the other or a third person within boundaries fixed by the actor, and (b) his act directly or indirectly results in such a confinement of the other, and (c) the other is conscious of the confinement or is harmed by it." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 35.

Confinement need not be physical, and it "need not be stationary." Id. § 36 cmt. b. The individual confined is not required to endanger his person through escape efforts. Id. § 36 cmt. a. See also id. § 38 ("confinement may be by actual or apparent physical barriers").

The requisite intent to confine can be shown through either motivation or knowledge. An actor may be found liable for false imprisonment both when "his act was done for the purpose of imposing confinement upon the other" and when he acted "with knowledge that such confinement would, to a substantial certainty, result from [his actions]." Id. § 35 cmt. d.

Here, Employee confined Paul by stopping the Ferris wheel. Given Paul's position in midair, he could not leave the car in which he was riding without endangering his person. Employee knew that Paul would be unable to leave the car when he acted. Thus, Paul can establish a prima facie case of false imprisonment. And because Employee was acting within the scope of his employment, Funworld is vicariously liable for his conduct.

Employee's actions would have been privileged if stopping the Ferris wheel had been necessary in order to protect "some interest of the actor or of the public which is of such importance as to justify the harm caused or threatened by its exercise." Id. § 10. See also id. § 890; Sindle v. New York City Transit Authority, 307 N.E.2d 245 (N.Y. 1973) (holding that a school bus driver who drove straight to police station instead of making regular stops was privileged to confine all students riding the bus when some students had committed acts of vandalism and continued to be abusive after being warned). Thus, for example, if Employee had stopped the Ferris wheel briefly to permit rescue workers to remove the two boys from the scene, Employee's conduct would likely have been privileged. However, Employee, for no apparent reason, failed to start the Ferris wheel for 30 minutes after the two boys were taken to the hospital.

Therefore, a jury could properly find that Employee falsely imprisoned Paul. Because Employee was acting within the scope of his employment, the jury could also find that Funworld was liable to Paul for injuries caused by Employee's actions.

While an argument could be made that Paul consented to being confined on the Ferris wheel, Paul's consent to be on the wheel was withdrawn once he begged to be taken off the wheel.

Point Two (25%)

A reasonable jury could properly conclude that Funworld was negligent for failing to take any action to stop the two boys from rocking the Ferris wheel car.

In any negligence action, a plaintiff must show that the defendant owed the plaintiff a duty to conform his conduct to a standard necessary to avoid an unreasonable risk of harm to others, that the defendant's conduct fell below the applicable standard of care, and that the defendant's conduct was both the cause in fact and the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries. Paul would have no difficulty in establishing that Funworld owed him a duty of care. Paul was a business visitor, and Funworld thus owed Paul reasonable care to avoid foreseeable risks. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS §§ 332 & 343. Because Employee was acting within the scope of his employment, the jury could also find that Funworld was liable to Paul for injuries caused by Employee's negligence (see Point One).

In determining whether Employee's conduct was negligent, the jury should measure that conduct against the conduct of a reasonable, prudent person engaged in a like activity. A reasonable, prudent person takes precautions to avoid foreseeable risks, even if those risks have rarely materialized. See RICHARD A. EPSTEIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON TORTS 177–78 (9th ed. 2008). If a Ferris wheel car is rocking vigorously, there is a small but nonetheless foreseeable risk that persons riding within the car or objects they are carrying may fall and cause injuries. Given the foreseeability of serious harm, and the small burden of taking steps to prevent the harm, a jury could properly conclude that Employee was negligent in failing to take any action to stop the two boys from rocking the car.

Point Three (35%)

Mom is unlikely to recover for her emotional distress and resulting miscarriage because she was not in the zone of danger nor did she contemporaneously observe an injury to Paul.

Although early cases typically denied recovery for negligent infliction of emotional distress to a plaintiff who experienced no physical contact or injury (see Mitchell v. Rochester Railway Co., 45 N.E. 354 (N.Y. 1896)), today virtually all American jurisdictions have abandoned this approach; a plaintiff who is within the zone of danger created by the defendant and who suffers a physical manifestation of emotional distress occasioned by a threatened injury may recover in virtually all states. Here, however, Mom did not apprehend any personal danger. Her emotional harm and resulting miscarriage were due to her fears for Paul's safety.

In evaluating claims for emotional distress resulting from accidents involving other individuals, American jurisdictions have taken two different approaches. Some disallow recovery unless the plaintiff was herself within the zone of danger. See, e.g., Tobin v. Grossman, 249 N.E.2d 419 (N.Y. 1969); Michael Steenson, Engler v. Illinois Farmers Insurance Co. and Negligent Infliction of Emotional Distress, 32 WM. MITCHELL L. REV. 1335, n. 176 (2006) (reporting 13 jurisdictions that follow the zone-of-danger approach). A larger group permits recovery if the plaintiff was closely related to the victim, was located near the scene of the accident, and suffered shock resulting from “the sensory and contemporaneous observance of the accident.” Dillon v. Legg, 441 P.2d 912 (Cal. 1968) (emphasis added); Steenson, supra (reporting 30 jurisdictions that follow some variant of the Dillon approach). In virtually all jurisdictions, emotional distress must result from sensory and contemporaneous observance of the accident itself, not the receipt of news relating to the accident. “All of us can expect at least once in our lives to be informed of the serious injury or death of a close family member Although the shock and grief growing out of such news is great, it is not compensable emotional distress.” Bowen v. Lumbermens Mutual Casualty Co., 517 N.W.2d 432, 445 (Wis. 1994). Some jurisdictions that follow the Dillon approach limit recovery to relatives who were at the scene when the accident happened. See Steenson, supra, n. 176. Some permit recovery by a relative who comes upon the scene shortly after the accident happens. See id. Only a handful of jurisdictions permit recovery based simply on the foreseeability of mental distress. See id. (reporting nine jurisdictions that use a foreseeability approach and noting that they typically require arrival at the scene shortly after the injury); Ferriter v. Daniel O’Connell’s & Sons, Inc., 413 N.E.2d 690 (Mass. 1980) (permitting recovery by wife who saw husband’s injuries at hospital) (superseded by statute, M.G.L.A. 152 § 24).

Here, Mom was not within the zone of danger; she was some 100 yards away. Moreover, Mom’s fright was occasioned solely by an erroneous report that “a little boy has been killed.” Although Mom was located near the scene of the accident, she did not see or hear the accident; she arrived on the scene after hearing emergency alarms. Indeed, even after she arrived, Mom could neither see nor hear Paul (nor could she see any other injured person) until several minutes after Paul exited the Ferris wheel, which was 40 minutes after the accident took place.

Thus, in virtually all jurisdictions, Mom will not be able to recover for her distress and resulting miscarriage even if Funworld is found negligent in failing to prevent Paul’s injury. Mom was not within the zone of danger, and her emotional harm stemmed from an erroneous report that a boy had been killed, not from sensory and contemporaneous observance of injuries to Paul.

Legal Problems

- (1) Was the document captioned "Last Will and Testament" republished by codicil?
- (2) Was the document captioned "Last Will and Testament" incorporated by reference into Testator's valid partial will?
- (3) Assuming that the document captioned "Last Will and Testament" drafted by Testator's attorney is not a valid will, will Daughter be barred from inheriting from Testator by the state "slayer statute"?
- (4) Did Testator's bequest of her house located at 340 Green Avenue adeem?
- (5) Did the dividend of 200 shares of XYZ Corporation common stock pass to the devisee, Aunt?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Because the document captioned "Last Will and Testament" was never executed by Testator, it cannot be republished by codicil. Because the partial will (an intended codicil) did not specifically refer to the document captioned "Last Will and Testament," that document cannot be incorporated by reference. Thus, although the partial will is valid and determines the disposition of the assets named therein, the rest of Testator's estate passes to Daughter, Testator's sole heir, through partial intestacy. Nephew gets nothing.

Daughter is not barred from inheriting from Testator, because slayer statutes bar from inheriting only a beneficiary who killed the decedent whose estate is at issue. Here, Daughter was convicted of murdering Testator's husband, not Testator. Thus, Daughter takes the $200,000.

Under the common law ademption doctrine, the bequest of Testator's house at 340 Green Avenue was adeemed by extinction, and Cousin would take nothing. Under the Uniform Probate Code or a like statute, however, Cousin would take Testator's home at 12 Elm Street as replacement property.

Under the law of most states, Aunt would be entitled to both the 400 shares of XYZ Corporation common stock devised to her and the 200 shares Testator received as a stock dividend.

Point One (20%)

Testator's valid partial will did not republish the unexecuted, unwitnessed document captioned "Last Will and Testament."

The document captioned “Last Will and Testament” is not a valid will because it was never executed. However, the document the attorney next sent was properly executed by Testator, and it is a valid partial will. It thus determines the disposition of the assets named therein (Testator's home and 400 shares of XYZ stock).

A valid partial will, or codicil, that refers to an earlier will is said to republish that will. When republication takes place, the republished will is deemed to be executed on the same day as the codicil. See generally RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY: WILLS AND OTHER DONATIVE TRANSFERS § 3.4 (1999). Republication can cure defects that might otherwise affect the validity of bequests made under a will. For example, in a jurisdiction that voids bequests to interested witnesses, a bequest to such a witness can be saved if the will is republished by a later-executed codicil witnessed by two disinterested witnesses.

However, by most accounts, a document that is not a valid will cannot be republished by codicil. See generally JESSE DUKEMINIER AND STANLEY M. JOHANSON, WILLS, TRUSTS, AND ESTATES 303 (6th ed. 2000). There is some contrary authority, but those cases involve codicils written on the unexecuted dispositive document itself. See, e.g., Johnson v. Johnson, 279 P.2d 928 (Okla. 1954). Here, the codicil was a separate document.

Thus, the “Last Will and Testament” unexecuted by Testator (and which left Testator's entire estate to Nephew) was not republished when Testator properly executed a partial will, and it will have no effect on the distribution of Testator's assets. Nephew gets nothing.

[NOTE: Colorado, Hawaii, Montana, and Utah have adopted the dispensing power in the Uniform Probate Code § 2-503. That power allows a court to validate a will not executed in accordance with the statute of wills if the evidence is clear and convincing that the testator intended the document to be a will. It is not clear, however, whether that statute can apply where the will was neither signed by the testator nor witnessed by anyone. It is also unclear that Testator intended the first, unsigned document to be her will. Examinees who believe that the document captioned “Last Will and Testament” can be saved under the dispensing power would have to conclude that the later document was a codicil only and that assets not disposed of by the later codicil pass to Nephew under the earlier will.]

The document captioned “Last Will and Testament” was not incorporated by reference into Testator's valid partial will because the partial will did not specifically refer to the earlier document or reflect Testator's intent to incorporate that will.

“A writing that is not valid as a will but is in existence when a will is executed may be incorporated by reference into the will if the will manifests an intent to incorporate the writing and the writing to be incorporated is identified with reasonable certainty.” RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY: WILLS AND OTHER DONATIVE TRANSFERS § 3.6. See also UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-510 (allowing for incorporation by reference when the will describes “the writing sufficiently to permit its identification”).

Here, the document captioned “Last Will and Testament” drafted by Testator's attorney was in existence at the time Testator executed the second, partial will disposing of Testator's real estate and stock. However, it is unclear whether the partial will identifies the “Last Will and Testament” with “reasonable certainty.”

More importantly, the partial will does not evidence an intention to incorporate the prior “Last Will and Testament” by reference. Indeed, quite to the contrary, the only possible “reference” to the first document is in the statement “I republish my will.” “I republish” is not the type of reference to a prior document that an experienced attorney would use to incorporate a document by reference; “republish” is a term of art that has legal consequences. See Point One.

Thus, the “Last Will and Testament” first drafted by the attorney was not incorporated by reference into the second document, Testator’s valid partial will. Therefore, assets not passing under the valid partial will should pass to Testator’s heir(s) by intestacy.

Point Three (15%)

Daughter is Testator’s sole heir, and she is not barred from inheriting from Testator by a slayer statute because these statutes apply only when the heir has murdered the decedent whose estate is at issue.

Because Testator’s valid will did not dispose of Testator’s entire estate, the remaining assets will pass to Testator’s heirs. Under all intestate succession statutes, Daughter would be Testator’s only heir.

Although murderers are often barred from inheriting under a “slayer statute,” such a statute would not bar Daughter from inheriting from Testator because these statutes apply only when the heir killed the decedent whose estate is at issue. See UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-803 (barring legatee or heir from taking share of estate when he or she killed the decedent). No slayer statute bars an heir from inheriting from a decedent’s estate because the heir killed another person, even if the heir’s victim left property to the decedent that is included in the decedent’s estate.

[NOTE: If an examinee erroneously concludes that Daughter is barred from taking a share of Testator’s estate, the examinee should conclude that whatever Daughter would have taken will pass to her child, Grandson, absent a statute that bars both the slayer and the slayer’s descendants from taking.]

Point Four (35%)

Under the common law ademption doctrine, the bequest of Testator’s house to Cousin adeemed because Testator’s house at 340 Green Avenue, Springfield, State A, was not in Testator’s probate estate. Possibly under the intent theory of ademption, and certainly under Uniform Probate Code § 2-606 or a like statute, the house located at 12 Elm Street could pass to Cousin as a substitute gift.

Under the common law ademption doctrine, if specifically devised property (i.e., property that is specifically described in the will) is not in the testator’s estate when the testator dies, the bequest adeems (i.e., fails). See generally WILLIAM MCGOVERN & SHELDON KURTZ, WILLS, TRUSTS, AND ESTATES 315 (3d ed. 2004). Under this common law doctrine, the testator’s intentions are irrelevant; all that matters is whether the testator owned the specifically devised asset at his or her death.

Some modern courts have rejected the common law “identity test” for ademption in favor of an intent test. Under the intent test, a beneficiary of specifically devised property is entitled to substitute property that was owned by the testator at his or her death if the beneficiary proves that the testator intended the beneficiary to take the substitute property. See generally Note, 23 DRAKE L. REV. 478 (1974); Estate of Austin, 113 Cal.App.3d 167 (1980).

Testator’s bequest of the property at 340 Green Avenue was a specific bequest and thus subject to the ademption doctrine. Under the common law identity test, the bequest would adeem because Testator did not own this property at her death. The home would then pass to Daughter as Testator's heir. See Point Three.

Under the intent test, Cousin would be entitled to Testator's home at 12 Elm Street if he or she could establish that Testator wanted Cousin to take this home as a substitute for the property at 340 Green Avenue. It is unclear whether Cousin could make such a showing. Indeed, the fact that Testator told her attorney that she wanted Cousin to have the five-bedroom house at 340 Green Avenue because "Cousin has such a large family" arguably suggests that Testator did not want Cousin to take the two-bedroom house at 12 Elm Street, which would likely be too small for Cousin's family.

[NOTE: An examinee who demonstrates an understanding of the intent theory of ademption should not be penalized if he or she reaches a different conclusion.]

Under the Uniform Probate Code, a specific devisee has the right to any "real . . . property owned by the testator at death which the testator acquired as a replacement for specifically devised real property." UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-606(5). Under this or a like statute, Cousin would be entitled to the property at 12 Elm Street because Testator acquired that property as a replacement for 340 Green Avenue.

Point Five (15%)

Aunt is entitled to both the 400 shares of XYZ Corporation common stock bequeathed to her by Testator and the 200 additional shares of XYZ Corporation common stock distributed to Testator as a stock dividend. Thus, Aunt takes all 600 shares of that stock.

Under the common law, a devisee of common stock was entitled to additional shares of that stock obtained by the testator through a stock split, but not to additional shares acquired as a stock dividend. Under this approach, Aunt would be entitled to only 400 shares of XYZ common stock. See JESSE DUKEMINIER AND STANLEY M. JOHANSON, WILLS, TRUSTS, AND ESTATES 464 (6th ed. 2000); Hicks v. Kerr, 104 A. 426 (1918).

Today, virtually all jurisdictions treat stock splits and dividends the same way; in each case, additional shares obtained by the testator go to the specific devisee. See, e.g., UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-605. Under this approach, Aunt would be entitled to all 600 shares of XYZ common stock.

AGENCY PARTNERSHIP ANALYSIS

(Agency and Partnership V.A., C.; VI.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Is Garden LLP liable for the $500,000 judgment owed to the customer when the injury that led to the judgment occurred prior to the partnership's qualification as an LLP?
- (2) Are the man and woman personally liable for the $500,000 judgment owed to the customer?
- (3) Is the investor personally liable for the $500,000 judgment owed to the customer?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Garden LLP is the same entity as Garden Partnership and is liable for the $500,000 judgment owed to the customer even though the injury that led to that judgment occurred prior to the partnership's qualification as an LLP.

LLP status does not relieve partners of pre-existing liability for partnership obligations incurred prior to qualification as an LLP, although it does limit their liability for obligations incurred after such qualification. Therefore, the man and woman are jointly and severally liable for the $500,000 owed to the customer because the injury that led to the judgment occurred before Garden Partnership, then a general partnership in which the man and woman were the general partners, became Garden LLP.

A new partner is not personally liable for LLP obligations incurred before the person's admission as a partner. Therefore, the investor is not personally liable for the customer's injury because the investor was not a partner in Garden LLP (or Garden Partnership) when that injury occurred.

Point One (45%)

Garden LLP is liable to the customer for the judgment because the limited liability partnership is the same entity that existed prior to its qualification as an LLP and assumes all outstanding liabilities of the prior entity.

The Uniform Partnership Act (UPA 1997) adopts an entity theory of partnership. In other words, the partnership itself is a legal entity and not a mere aggregate of individual partners. See UPA § 201(a) (1997) ("A partnership is an entity distinct from its partners.").

An LLP continues to be the same entity that existed prior to the filing of a statement of qualification as an LLP. Id. § 201(b). "[T]he filing of a statement of qualification does not create a ‘new’ partnership. The filing partnership continues to be the same partnership entity that existed before the filing.” Id. § 201 cmt.

Here, since Garden LLP is the same entity as Garden Partnership, it has all of Garden Partnership’s outstanding obligations, and Garden LLP is liable to the customer for the judgment.

[NOTE: In states that have not adopted the UPA 1997, the same result follows if they have both the UPA 1914 and a separate statute providing for LLPs.]

Point Two (35%)

The man and woman are jointly and severally liable to the customer because the obligation to the customer was incurred prior to Garden Partnership’s qualification as an LLP.

Under the UPA (1997), the partners in a partnership are jointly and severally liable for all obligations of the partnership “unless otherwise agreed by the claimant or provided by law.” UPA § 306(a) (1997). [A similar result follows from § 15 of the UPA 1914.] Because the customer has not otherwise agreed, the man and woman are jointly and severally liable for the judgment obtained against Garden Partnership unless otherwise provided by law.

Here, the UPA does not protect the man and woman. The UPA provides that when a partnership has qualified as an LLP, any obligation “incurred while the partnership is a limited liability partnership, whether arising in contract, tort, or otherwise, is solely the obligation of the partnership.” Id. § 306(c). Here, however, the obligation to the customer arose before the partnership qualified as an LLP, and the limited liability protection does not apply. Garden Partnership became a limited liability partnership only upon the filing of the statement of qualification with the secretary of state. UPA § 1001. “The connection between partner status and personal liability for partnership obligations is severed only with respect to obligations incurred while the partnership is a limited liability partnership. Partnership obligations incurred before a partnership becomes a limited liability partnership . . . are treated as obligations of an ordinary partnership.” Id. § 306 cmt. 3. Consequently, the man and woman are jointly and severally liable for the judgment owed to the customer that arose prior to Garden Partnership qualifying as an LLP.

The investor is not personally liable to the customer because the customer’s injury occurred before the investor became a partner.

A person who is admitted as a partner is not personally liable for any partnership obligation incurred prior to the admission of the person to the partnership. UPA § 306(b) (1997). In this case, the injury to the customer and, consequently, the partnership obligation arose before the investor was admitted as a partner. Therefore, the investor has no personal liability to the customer.

[NOTE: While not asked to do so by the question, an examinee may correctly point out that while the investor has no personal liability to the customer, the $50,000 that the investor contributed to the partnership is “at risk for the satisfaction of existing partnership debts.” UPA § 306 cmt. 2 (1997).]

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE/CONFLICT OF LAW ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure I.A.1., E.; II.A. / Conflict of Laws II.D.1.a.; III.F.2.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Does a federal court have removal jurisdiction when the parties to the state action are diverse, the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000, and the defendant is not from the state where the action was originally filed?
- (2) Should a federal court grant a change of venue pursuant to a forum-selection clause when the chosen venue is reasonable but the forum-selection clause is invalid under the law of the state where the case was originally filed?
- (3) When federal jurisdiction is based on diversity, what effect does a change of venue have on the substantive law that applies?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1441, a case filed in state court is removable by a defendant to federal court if the case falls within the original jurisdiction of the federal court. Here, the case was properly removed because it falls within the original diversity jurisdiction of the federal court: the two parties are of diverse citizenship, and the amount in controversy is in excess of $75,000. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(1).

Venue changes are proper under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) when they serve “the convenience of parties and witnesses” and are “in the interest of justice.” Here, State B is arguably a more convenient forum for the litigation. Moreover, the Supreme Court has ruled that the “interest of justice” language in the statute provides a basis for a federal policy of enforcement of forum-selection clauses through venue transfers. Finally, venue in State B is proper under 28 U.S.C. § 1391(a)(1), because State B is a place where all defendants reside, and also under § 1391(a)(2), because a “substantial part” of the events relating to the dispute occurred in State B.

When a case is transferred under § 1404, the transferee court must apply the law of the original transferor forum, including that state’s choice-of-law rules. Here, because the facts say that State A courts would apply State A law to the case, the federal court in State A is required to do so, and that law also must be applied in the transferee State B federal court. Therefore, the change of venue would not affect what law applies, and therefore contract rescission will be allowed.

It was proper to remove the action from a state court in State A to the federal court in State A because that federal court would have had diversity jurisdiction over the case had it been filed there originally.

A defendant may remove a civil action from state court to federal court if the action is a type over “which the district courts of the United States have original jurisdiction.” 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a). In this case, if the action had been filed originally in a federal court, it would have been within the diversity jurisdiction of the federal court.

Federal diversity jurisdiction extends to “all civil actions where the matter in controversy exceeds . . . $75,000, and [which are] between . . . citizens of different States.” 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(1). The restorer and owner are citizens of different states, so the diversity requirement is satisfied. Furthermore, the remedy sought by the owner—a return of the $100,000 contract price—exceeds the jurisdictional amount of $75,000. It does not matter that the owner may recover less than this: a plaintiff’s claim of damages in excess of the jurisdictional amount will be accepted unless it “appear[s] to a legal certainty that the claim is really for less than the jurisdictional amount.” St. Paul Mercury Indemnity Co. v. Red Cab Co., 303 U.S. 283, 289 (1938). Here the facts relating to performance of the restoration contract, the amount paid on that contract, and the amount sought in rescission are adequate to avoid any suggestion that the recoverable damages are less than the jurisdictional amount “to a legal certainty.”

Accordingly, because the case falls within the federal court’s diversity jurisdiction, the federal court had removal jurisdiction over the action.

[NOTES: (1) Removal itself does not raise any personal jurisdiction issues, and discussions of personal jurisdiction are not relevant to the question asked, which is whether the federal court has removal jurisdiction.

(2) In actions where federal jurisdiction is based on diversity, a defendant cannot remove the case to federal court if the case was filed in a state court in the defendant’s home state. See 28 U.S.C. § 1441(b). That bar to removal is inapplicable on our facts because State A is not the defendant’s (the restorer’s) home state.]

Point Two (40%)

The change-of-venue motion is very likely to be granted because State B is a reasonably convenient forum in which to hear the action, the parties’ contractual agreement to litigate in State B provides a strong reason for granting a transfer, and the State B federal court would have been an appropriate place in which to bring the action in the first place.

The motion for a change of venue is governed by 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a), which provides in its entirety, “For the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice, a district court may transfer any civil action to any other district or division where it might have been brought.” Transfer pursuant to the “convenience . . . and interest of justice” standard of § 1404 is discretionary (“may”), but transfer under § 1404 may be made only to a district in which the action might originally “have been brought.”

In this case, the action originally could have been brought in a federal district court in State B. First, a State B federal court would have had diversity jurisdiction over the action. (See Point One.) Second, a State B federal court would have been an appropriate venue for the action. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1391(a)(1), venue is proper in a district where “any defendant resides, if all defendants reside in the same State.” On that basis, State B is a proper original venue simply because the restorer resides there. In addition, venue is proper in State B under § 1391(a)(2), which permits venue in any judicial district “in which a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred.” The contract was signed in State B, and the restorer’s work on the tapestry was performed there. Finally, because the restorer is a resident citizen of State B, the State B federal court would have had jurisdiction over him. In short, the action could originally have been brought in State B.

The question, therefore, is whether convenience and the “interest of justice” favor a transfer from State A to State B. Absent the forum-selection clause, the issue could be argued either way. Arguably, most of the evidence and witnesses in the case would be found in State B, which is where the work on the tapestry was performed and where the contract was drafted and signed. On the other hand, State A is the owner’s home (and a convenient place for the owner to litigate), and it is also connected to the transaction—it was the situs of the negotiations. Judges have a good deal of discretion under § 1404(a), but normally a judge would allow a plaintiff’s original venue choice to prevail where the facts are closely divided on the issues of convenience and interest of justice.

However, the presence of the forum-selection clause alters this analysis. In Stewart Organization, Inc. v. Ricoh Corp., 487 U.S. 22 (1988), the Supreme Court ruled that a reasonable forum-selection clause is a relevant factor favoring a § 1404 change-of-venue motion, even if the forum-selection clause is unenforceable under the applicable state law. According to the Supreme Court, the presence of a reasonable forum-selection clause is an important consideration relevant to the “interest of justice” determination under § 1404. See 487 U.S. at 29. In this case, there are several connections between the transaction, the parties, and State B, and the parties’ selection of a State B forum was certainly reasonable.

In sum, State B is an appropriate venue under the federal venue statute, there are several important connections between the case and State B, and the forum-selection clause provides a strong reason to grant the transfer. Therefore, the State A federal district court should grant the motion for change of venue.

Point Three (30%)

The United States District Court in State B must apply the law of State A to the transferred action, including State A’s choice-of-law rules. Because State A would have applied its own rescission law, the federal court in State B must also apply State A rescission law.

In this diversity case based on a state law breach-of-contract claim, the Erie rule would have required the State A federal court to apply state substantive law. Moreover, for Erie purposes, the state substantive law includes any choice-of-law rules that a state court would apply as part of state law. See Klaxon Co. v. Stentor Electric Mfg. Co., 313 U.S. 487 (1941). In this case, the facts state that State A choice-of-law rules would lead a State A court to apply its own rescission law.

Following a § 1404 transfer, the transferee court must apply the same law to the case as would have been applied by the transferor court. See Van Dusen v. Barrack, 376 U.S. 612 (1964). Thus, the State B federal court must apply whatever law would have been applied by the State A federal court. In short, the change of venue does not affect the law that will be applied to the substantive issues in the case.

Therefore, whether the case is heard in federal court in State A or federal court in State B, State A rescission law will be applied.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Was Sue's easement over Blackacre that she had acquired from Tom extinguished when she purchased Blackacre from Tom?
- (2) Did Dan acquire an easement implied from prior use over Blackacre when he purchased Whiteacre from Sue?
- (3) How should the proceeds from the sale of Whiteacre be distributed?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Immediately prior to Sue's sale of Whiteacre to Dan, Sue had no easement over Blackacre because the easement she had acquired from Tom was extinguished by merger. Immediately after the sale of Whiteacre to Dan, Dan had an easement over Blackacre. This easement arose by implication from Sue's prior use of the private gravel road over Blackacre for the benefit of Whiteacre.

Because Bank was obligated to advance the $700,000 to Dan under the terms of its loan commitment with Dan, Bank is entitled to all $1,500,000 from the $1,500,000 sales proceeds, and Finance Company is entitled to nothing.

Point One (25%)

The easement Sue acquired from Tom was extinguished by merger when Sue bought Blackacre from Tom. Thus, immediately prior to her sale of Whiteacre to Dan, Sue had no easement over Blackacre.

Sue purchased from Tom an easement for a right-of-way over Blackacre to be used in connection with her ownership of Whiteacre. This easement, an appurtenant easement of which Whiteacre was the dominant estate and Blackacre was the servient estate, was promptly and properly recorded. When the owner of the dominant estate (Sue) acquired the servient estate (Blackacre), however, the easement was extinguished by merger. See generally HERBERT HOVENKAMP & SHELDON KURTZ, PRINCIPLES OF PROPERTY LAW 334 (6th ed. 2005); see also II AMER. LAW OF PROPERTY § 8.90 (1957). This result follows from the fact that because of the post-sale unity of ownership of the two estates, Sue could enforce the easement only against herself, and lawsuits against one's self are impermissible.

Point Two (40%)

Upon the conveyance of Whiteacre, Dan acquired an easement implied from prior use with respect to use of the private gravel road traversing Blackacre.

An easement implied from prior use arises in favor of a grantee when (1) two parcels of land are in common ownership; (2) one of the parcels is conveyed to a grantee; (3) the parcel conveyed had been receiving a benefit from the parcel retained prior to the conveyance to the grantee, i.e., there was a use over the retained parcel in favor of the conveyed parcel which could have been the subject of an express easement appurtenant; (4) the usage is reasonably necessary or convenient; and (5) the usage is apparent. See generally WILLIAM B. STOEBCUK & DALE A. WHITMAN, THE LAW OF PROPERTY § 8.4 at 445 (3d ed. 2000); JOSEPH W. SINGER, INTRODUCTION TO PROPERTY § 5.3.3 at 194 (2d ed. 2005); HOVENKAMP & KURTZ, supra, at 331; see also Romanchuk v. Plotkin, 9 N.W.2d 421 (Minn. 1943).

Here, the first three criteria are clearly met: Sue owned both Blackacre and Whiteacre; she conveyed one parcel (Whiteacre) to Dan; and Whiteacre, the parcel conveyed, had been receiving a benefit from the parcel retained, i.e., use of the private gravel road traversing Blackacre, which could have been—indeed, was, before its extinction by merger—the subject of an express easement appurtenant.

Sue's use of Blackacre also appears to satisfy the "reasonably necessary" and "apparent" requirements. "The principle underlying the creation of an easement by implication is that it is so evidently necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the granted premises, so continuous in its nature, so plain, visible and open, so manifest from the situation and relation of the two tracts that the law will give effect to the grant according to the presumed intent of the parties." Rischall v. Bauchmann, 46 A.2d 898, 902 (Conn. 1946); see also Gemmell v. Lee, 757 A.2d 1171 (Conn. Ct. App. 2000).

Most courts interpret the "reasonably necessary" requirement "to mean that the easement must be important to the enjoyment of the" conveyed land or "highly convenient." SINGER, supra, at 196. Courts are likely to find that an easement is implied from prior use where access to the transferred land is "extremely difficult by other routes" and to find that an easement is not implied when the transferred land has "easy access to public roads in another direction." Id. at 197. Sue's use of Blackacre for the benefit of Whiteacre meets this test; the facts specify that the private gravel road provided significantly better access to the four-lane highway than did the county road abutting Whiteacre.

Most courts have found that the "apparent" requirement is met when the usage is visible. See HERBERT HOVENKAMP & SHELDON F. KURTZ, THE LAW OF PROPERTY 367 (5th ed. 2001). Here, the private gravel road was open and obvious; indeed, the facts state that Dan was aware that Sue had used that road to more easily access the four-lane highway.

Thus, upon Sue's conveyance of Whiteacre to Dan, she conveyed to Dan an easement implied from prior use.

[NOTE: Dan did not acquire an easement by necessity over Blackacre, because Whiteacre is not landlocked, and he has access to it from the county road. An easement by necessity arises only when there has been a conveyance of a portion of the grantor's land, the grantor retains the remaining portion, and, after severance of the grantor's land, it is necessary for the grantee to pass over the grantor's retained portion to reach a public street or highway. See generally STOEBCUK & WHITMAN, supra, § 8.5 at 447. Landlocked land clearly satisfies the necessity test, and a few courts have found an easement where there is merely "reasonable" necessity. Additionally, this is not a case for easement by estoppel. An easement by estoppel arises when A gives B permission to use A's land and the licensee, here B, invests substantial funds in that land reasonably relying on the permission. The facts here do not support the conclusion that there is an easement by estoppel.]

Point Three (35%)

The proceeds from the foreclosure sale should be paid entirely to Bank because Bank gave Dan a future-advances mortgage.

The typical construction loan provides that the lender will advance funds to the borrower over a fixed time period. The lender secures a mortgage on the property for the entire amount of the money it has agreed to lend, including future advances. Such “future advances” mortgages may provide for obligatory advances, or they may provide for advances that are optional.

Whether the future-advances mortgage payments are obligatory or optional is critical to the rights of a junior lender. If payments under a future-advances mortgage are obligatory, then the junior lender’s lien is junior both to amounts loaned to the debtor before the junior lien was recorded and to amounts loaned after the junior lien is recorded. If the payments under a future-advances mortgage are optional, the junior lender has a priority over amounts transferred to the debtor by the senior lender after the junior lender transfers funds to the debtor and records its mortgage. See generally GRANT S. NELSON & DALE A. WHITMAN, REAL ESTATE FINANCE LAW § 12.7 at 1088–90 (5th ed. 2007). The rationale for this rule is that in the case of an obligatory loan, the junior lender can ascertain from public land records the maximum amount of the senior lender’s claim before loaning money to the creditor, while with an optional loan, the junior lender cannot know whether subsequent advances will be made and the senior lender can protect itself against junior lenders by searching the land records before making additional advances.

Here, Bank’s loan commitment to Dan was secured by an obligatory future-advances mortgage, and Bank both recorded its mortgage and loaned Dan money before Finance Company did so. Thus, Bank is the senior lender in the amount of $1,500,000, the full value of its loan commitment to Dan, and it is entitled to all of the foreclosure sales proceeds. Finance Company is entitled to nothing.

Legal Problems

- (1)(a) Did the directors other than Claire receive proper notice of the special meeting of the board of directors?
- (1)(b) Did Claire receive proper notice of the special meeting of the board of directors and, if not, did she waive notice?
- (2) Was a quorum present at the special meeting of the board of directors?
- (3) Did the purchase of the asset receive the required number of votes in favor to be approved?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Proper notice of the special meeting of the board of directors was given to all directors other than Claire. Claire did not receive proper notice of the special meeting, but she waived the right to object to actions taken at the special meeting when she attended the special meeting and voted. A quorum (a majority of the directors) is required for action taken at a meeting to be proper. Here, a quorum was present at the special meeting. However, Alan and Barb were not able to hear each other and therefore cannot be counted as participating in the meeting. Therefore, in determining whether the purchase of the asset received the required number of votes to be proper, the votes of Alan and Barb may not be counted. Thus, the purchase of the asset was not properly approved by the board because it did not receive the required number of votes.

Point One(a) (25%)

The directors other than Claire received proper notice of the special meeting of the board of directors.

Unless the articles of incorporation or bylaws provide otherwise, notice of a special meeting of a corporation's board of directors must be given at least two days prior to the date of the meeting. MODEL BUS. CORP. ACT (MBCA) § 8.22(b). The notice must include information regarding the time, location, and date of the meeting but does not need to include information regarding the purpose of the meeting. Id.

Here, the facts state that the corporation's articles of incorporation and bylaws do not contain any special provisions regarding the board of directors. Notice of the special meeting was sent to six of the seven directors 29 days before the meeting was to be held, and it specified a time, location, and date. Therefore, with respect to those six directors, the notice of the special meeting was proper.

[NOTE: Although the references in the analysis are to the MBCA, the result throughout is the same under the Delaware General Corporation Law.]

Point One(b) (25%)

Claire did not receive proper notice of the special meeting of the board of directors; however, she waived such notice.

A director who does not receive notice of a special meeting of the board of directors at least two days prior to the meeting does not receive proper notice of that meeting. (See Point One(a).) However, a director who attends a special meeting of the board of directors despite not receiving proper notice waives such notice unless the director objects to the holding of the meeting and thereafter does not vote at the meeting. MBCA § 8.23(b). Here, there is no doubt that Claire did not receive proper notice of the special meeting. No notice was sent to Claire, who learned of the meeting through a phone call with another director. Even if that phone call constitutes notice, it was not received at least two days prior to the special meeting and therefore is not proper. (See Point One(a).)

However, Claire attended and voted at the special meeting. By these actions, Claire waived the notice requirement and therefore cannot claim that proper notice of the special meeting was not given.

Point Two (25%)

A quorum was present at the special meeting of the board of directors.

In order for action taken at a special meeting of directors to be proper, a quorum must be present at the meeting. MBCA § 8.24(c). Unless the articles of incorporation or bylaws provide otherwise, when a corporation has a fixed number of directors, a quorum consists of a majority of that fixed number. Id. § 8.24(a)(1).

Here, the facts state that the corporation's articles of incorporation mandate a seven-member board of directors and its articles of incorporation and bylaws contain no special provisions regarding the board of directors. Therefore, a quorum for the corporation's purposes consists of four directors. Here, while not all seven members of the board of directors were legally present at the special meeting, five of them (all but Alan and Barb) were (see Point Three). Therefore, a quorum was present, and the meeting was legally held.

The purchase of the asset did not receive the required number of votes and was therefore not properly approved by the board of directors.

Unless the articles of incorporation or bylaws provide otherwise, if a quorum is present when a vote is taken, a majority vote of directors present is the act of the board of directors. MBCA § 8.24(c). Here, a quorum was present when the vote was taken (see Point Two). However, there were only five members of the board of directors present at the special meeting. Alan and Barb were not legally present.

While directors generally are entitled to participate in special meetings over the telephone, as Alan and Barb attempted to do, such participation is valid only if all directors participating "may simultaneously hear each other during the meeting." MBCA § 8.20. Only directors who satisfy this requirement are deemed to be present at the meeting. Id. Here, the facts state that Alan and Barb could hear and be heard by the five directors present in the conference room but that Alan and Barb could not hear each other. Because Alan and Barb could not hear each other, neither was legally present at the meeting.

Because Alan and Barb were not legally present at the meeting, their votes on the purchase of the asset may not be counted. Therefore, the vote on the purchase of the asset was two votes in favor and three votes against, and the purchase of the asset was not approved by the board of directors.

* Used as one of the six questions on the July 2012 Uniform Bar Examination in Alabama, Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Missouri, and North Dakota.

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the July 2012 MEE. Each test includes nine 30-minute questions; user jurisdictions may elect which of the nine questions they wish to use. (Jurisdictions that administer the Uniform Bar Examination [UBE] use a common set of six MEE questions as part of their bar examinations.) In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law. The instructions for the test appear on page iii. For more information, see the MEE Information Booklet, available on the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Federal Civil Procedure question on the July 2012 MEE tested the following areas from the Federal Civil Procedure outline: IV.A., Pretrial procedures—pleadings and motions, and VI.B., Verdicts and judgments—judicial findings and conclusions. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet.

The MEE consists of nine 30-minute essay questions, any of which a jurisdiction may select to include as part of its bar examination. (UBE jurisdictions use a common set of six MEE questions as part of their bar examinations.) It is administered by participating jurisdictions on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. The areas of law that may be covered by the questions on any MEE are Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts, Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Uniform Commercial Code (Negotiable Instruments and Bank Deposits and Collections; Secured Transactions). Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law. (UBE instructions: Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles rather than local case or statutory law.)

TRUSTS AND FUTURE INTERESTS QUESTION

Thirty years ago, Settlor entered into an irrevocable trust agreement with Trustee. Pursuant to the terms of this trust, all trust income was payable to Settlor's Husband, and upon Husband's death, all trust assets were to be distributed to "Settlor's children." The trust also provided that Husband's income interest would terminate if Husband remarried after Settlor's death.

When the trust was created, Settlor and Husband had three children. Five years later, Settlor and Husband had a fourth child.

Ten years later, Settlor died.

This year, when the trust principal was worth $750,000, Husband wrote to his four children. Husband noted that he was about to retire and wanted cash to buy a retirement home. He asked the children to agree to terminate the trust and to direct Trustee to distribute $250,000 of trust principal to Husband and the remaining $500,000, in equal shares, to the four children. All four children agreed to Husband's proposal. Husband and the four children then wrote Trustee the following letter:

We, the only beneficiaries of the trust, direct you to terminate the trust and distribute $250,000 of trust assets to Husband and the remainder, in equal shares, to Settlor's four children.

Trustee's response stated:

I cannot make the requested distribution to you for the following reasons:

- (1) The trust is irrevocable and cannot be terminated.
- (2) Even if the trust were terminable, termination would require the consent of all beneficiaries. This is not obtainable because, if a child of Settlor predeceases Husband, one or more of Settlor's future grandchildren might be entitled to trust assets at Husband's death.
- (3) Even if the trust were terminable, only the three children living when the trust was created have a beneficial interest in the trust; therefore no distribution of trust principal can be made to Settlor's youngest child.
- (4) The actuarial value of Husband's interest is only $150,000. Therefore, even if the trust were terminable, any distribution of trust principal to Husband in excess of that amount would be a breach of trust.

Is Trustee correct? Explain.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE QUESTION

At 9:00 p.m. on a Sunday evening, Adam, age 18, proposed to his friend Bob, also age 18, that they dump Adam's collection of 2,000 marbles at a nearby intersection. "It'll be funny," Adam said. "When cars come by, they'll slip on the marbles and they won't be able to stop at the stop sign. The drivers won't know what happened, and they'll get really mad. We can hide nearby and watch." "That's a stupid idea," Bob said. "In the first place, this town is deserted on Sunday night. Nobody will even drive through the intersection. In the second place, I'll bet the cars just drive right over the marbles without any trouble at all. It'll be a total non-event." "Oh, I'll bet someone will come," Adam replied. "And I'll bet they'll have trouble; maybe there will even be a crash. But if you're not interested, fine. You don't have to do anything. Just give me a ride to the intersection—these bags of marbles are heavy."

At 10:00 p.m. that same night, Bob drove Adam and his bags of marbles to the intersection. Adam dumped several hundred marbles in front of each of the two stop signs at the intersection. Adam and Bob stayed for 20 minutes, waiting to see if anything happened. No one drove through the intersection, and Adam and Bob went home.

At 2:00 a.m., a woman drove through the intersection. Because of the marbles, she was unable to stop at the stop sign. Coincidentally, a man was driving through the intersection at the same time. The woman crashed into the side of the man's car. The man's eight-year-old child was sitting in the front seat without a seat belt, in violation of state law. The child was thrown from the car and killed. If the child had been properly secured with a seat belt, as required by state law, he would likely not have died.

Adam has been charged with involuntary manslaughter as defined at common law, and Bob has been charged with the same crime as an accomplice. State law does not recognize so-called "unlawful-act" involuntary manslaughter.

1. Could a jury properly find that Adam is guilty of involuntary manslaughter? Explain.
2. If a jury did find Adam guilty of involuntary manslaughter, could the jury properly find that Bob is guilty of involuntary manslaughter as an accomplice? Explain.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW QUESTION

Congress recently enacted the Violence at Work Act (the Act).

Title I of the Act provides that an employee who has been injured in the workplace by the violent act of a coworker has a cause of action for damages against that coworker.

Title II of the Act imposes several duties on employers subject to the Act and creates a cause of action against employers who do not fulfill those duties. Section 201 provides that all employers, “including all States, their agencies and subdivisions,” who have more than 50 employees are subject to the Act. Section 202 requires employers subject to the Act to (i) train employees on certain methods of preventing and responding to workplace violence, (ii) conduct criminal background checks on job applicants, and (iii) establish a hotline to report workplace violence. Section 203 provides that if an employer subject to the Act does not fulfill the duties imposed by Section 202, an employee who has been injured by the violent act of a fellow employee may recover damages from the employer for the harm resulting from that violent act. Section 204 provides that any action brought pursuant to Section 203 may be brought in federal or state court and that “if brought in federal court against a State, its agencies or subdivisions, any defense of immunity under the Eleventh Amendment to the United States Constitution is abrogated.”

The House and Senate committee reports on the Act note that Congress passed the Act under its power to regulate interstate commerce. To support its use of that power, Congress found that acts of workplace violence directly interfere with economic activity by causing damage to business property, injury to workers, and lost work time due to the violent acts and their aftermath. The House report estimated that total interstate economic activity is diminished by $5 to $10 billion per year as a result of losses associated with workplace violence.

After the Act’s effective date, an employee of a state agency was injured in the workplace by the violent act of a disgruntled coworker. The state agency, which has over 100 employees, conceded that it had not implemented the measures required by Section 202 of the Act. Accordingly, the employee has sued the state agency in United States District Court to recover damages for the harm caused by the act of workplace violence. The state agency has moved to dismiss the lawsuit on three grounds: (1) Congress did not have the power to enact the Act, (2) Congress did not have the power to apply the Act to state agencies, and (3) the Eleventh Amendment bars the employee’s lawsuit.

1. Is the Act a valid exercise of Congress’s power to regulate interstate commerce? Explain.
2. Assuming that the Act is a valid exercise of Congress’s power, may the Act constitutionally be applied to state agencies as employers? Explain.
3. Does the Eleventh Amendment bar the employee’s lawsuit in federal court against the state agency? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Fifteen years ago, Mom and Dad were married in State A, where both were domiciled.

Fourteen years ago, Mom gave birth to Daughter in State A. Dad is Daughter's biological father.

Four years ago, Dad died in State A. After Dad's death, Mom relied heavily on Dad's parents, Grandparents. Mom and Daughter moved to an apartment near Grandparents in State A. Thereafter, Grandparents visited Mom's home at least once a week. Daughter was also a frequent visitor at Grandparents' home. Grandparents also helped Mom to support Daughter financially.

Four months ago, Mom married Stepdad and moved with Daughter to Stepdad's home in State B, 500 miles from Mom's former residence in State A. Stepdad believes that Grandparents discouraged Mom's marriage to him, and he asked Mom not to invite Grandparents to visit. Mom agreed to Stepdad's request. However, she allowed Daughter to visit Grandparents in State A during a school vacation.

One week ago, Grandparents sent Daughter a bus ticket. Without revealing her plans to Mom, Daughter used the ticket to go to Grandparents' home in State A. When she arrived at Grandparents' home, Daughter telephoned Mom and said, "I hate State B, I dislike Stepdad, and I want to live with Grandparents in State A until you leave Stepdad and return to State A, too."

On the same day that Mom received this telephone call, she was served with a summons to appear in a State A court proceeding, brought by Grandparents, in which Grandparents seek custody of Daughter. Grandparents' petition was brought pursuant to a State A statute that authorizes the award of child custody to a grandparent when the court finds that (1) the "child has been abandoned or one of the child's parents has died" and (2) an award of custody to the petitioner grandparent "serves the child's best interests."

Both State A and State B have enacted the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA).

Mom has sought advice from your law firm. She asks the following questions:

1. Does State A have jurisdiction to award custody of Daughter to Grandparents? Explain.
2. On the merits, may a court deny Grandparents' custody petition if Daughter testifies that she wants to live with Grandparents? Explain.
3. Is the State A statute authorizing the award of custody to grandparents constitutional? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

On March 1, Recycled, a business that sells new and used bicycles and bicycle equipment, borrowed $100,000 from Bank. To secure its obligation to repay the loan, Recycled signed an agreement granting Bank a security interest in “all the inventory of Recycled, whether now owned or hereafter acquired.”

On March 5, Bank filed a financing statement in the appropriate state office. The financing statement listed Recycled as debtor and “inventory” as collateral.

Over the next month, Recycled entered into the following transactions:

(a) On March 10, Recycled sold a new bicycle to Consumer for $1,500. The sale was made in accordance with the usual business practices of Recycled. Both parties acted honestly and in accordance with reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing, and Consumer was unaware of the financial relationship between Recycled and Bank.

(b) On March 15, Recycled traded a used bicycle to Student for a used computer that Student no longer needed. Recycled immediately began using the computer in its business.

(c) On March 31, Recycled bought 100 new bicycle helmets from Manufacturer. The sale was on credit, with payment due in 15 days. The written sales agreement, signed by Recycled, states that Manufacturer retains title to the helmets until Recycled pays their purchase price to Manufacturer. No financing statement was filed. None of the helmets has been sold by Recycled.

Recycled has not paid its utility bills for several months. On April 29, Utility obtained a judgment in the amount of $2,500 against Recycled and, pursuant to state law, obtained a judgment lien against all the personal property of Recycled.

Recycled is in default on its repayment obligation to Bank, and it has not paid the amount it owes to Manufacturer.

Bank claims a security interest in all the bicycles and bicycle helmets owned by Recycled, the bicycle bought by Consumer, and the computer obtained by Recycled in the transaction with Student. Manufacturer claims an interest in the bicycle helmets, and Utility seeks to enforce its lien against all the personal property of Recycled.

1. As between Bank and Consumer, which has a superior claim to the bicycle sold to Consumer? Explain.
2. As between Bank and Utility, which has a superior claim to the used computer? Explain.
3. As among Bank, Manufacturer, and Utility, which has a superior claim to the 100 bicycle helmets? Explain.

TORTS QUESTION

Susan, a student at University, lived in a University dormitory. Access to Susan's dormitory was restricted to dormitory residents and guests who entered the dormitory with a resident. Entry to the dormitory was controlled by key cards. Dormitory key cards opened all doors except for a rear entrance, used only for deliveries, that was secured with a deadbolt lock.

On November 30, at 2:00 a.m., Ann, a University graduate, entered the dormitory through the rear entrance. Ann was able to enter because the deadbolt lock had broken during a delivery four days before Ann's entry and had not been repaired. Ann attacked Susan, who was studying alone in the dormitory's library.

Jim, another resident of Susan's dormitory, passed the library shortly after Ann had attacked Susan. The door was open, and Jim saw Susan lying on the floor, groaning. Jim told Susan, "I'll go for help right now." Jim then closed the library door and went to the University security office. However, the security office was closed, and Jim took no other steps to help Susan. About half an hour after Jim closed the library door, Susan got up and walked to the University hospital, where she received immediate treatment for minor physical injuries.

One day after Ann's attack, Susan began to experience mental and physical symptoms (e.g., insomnia, anxiety, rapid breathing, nausea, muscle tension, and sweating). Susan's doctor has concluded that these symptoms are due to post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). According to the doctor, Susan's PTSD was caused by trauma she suffered one month before Ann's attack when Susan was robbed at gunpoint. In the doctor's opinion, although Susan had no symptoms of PTSD until after Ann's attack, Ann's attack triggered PTSD symptoms because Susan was suffering from PTSD caused by the earlier robbery. The symptoms became so severe that Susan had to withdraw from school. She now sees a psychologist weekly.

Since the attack, Susan has learned that Ann suffers from schizophrenia, a serious mental illness. From August through November, Ann had been receiving weekly outpatient psychiatric treatment from her Psychiatrist. Her Psychiatrist's records show that on November 20, Ann told her Psychiatrist that she "was going to make sure" that former University classmates who were "cheaters" got "what was coming to them for getting the good grades I should have received." Ann's Psychiatrist did not report these threats to anyone because Ann had no history of violent behavior. Ann's Psychiatrist also did not believe that Ann would take any action based on her statements.

At the time of the attack, Susan knew Ann only slightly because they had been in one class together the previous semester. Susan received an A in that class.

Susan is seeking damages for the injuries she suffered as a result of Ann's attack and has sued University, Jim, and Ann's Psychiatrist.

1. May Susan recover damages for physical injuries she suffered in Ann's attack from
 - (a) University? Explain.
 - (b) Jim? Explain.
 - (c) Ann's Psychiatrist? Explain.
2. Assuming that any party is found liable to Susan, may she also recover damages from that party for the PTSD symptoms she is experiencing? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

Plaintiff, a female employee of Defendant, a large manufacturing firm, sued Defendant in federal district court for violating a federal statute that creates a right to be free of sex discrimination in the workplace.

Plaintiff alleged the following: (1) Plaintiff worked for Defendant in a position for which females had seldom been hired in the past. (2) Shortly after Plaintiff was hired, male coworkers began to make sexually charged remarks to Plaintiff. (3) Plaintiff's male supervisor asked her out on dates and became angry each time she refused. (4) There were occasional incidents in which the supervisor or another male worker "accidentally" made contact with various parts of Plaintiff's body. (5) No one from company management ever took steps to monitor or limit behavior of this sort. (6) As a result of this behavior, Plaintiff began to suffer from various physical ailments that were related to stress. (7) Plaintiff made no complaint to management about the situation because the job paid very well and there were, to her knowledge, no comparable opportunities that would be available to her if she lost this particular job.

Defendant's answer to the complaint admitted that Plaintiff was an employee and that the individual named as her supervisor was her supervisor. Defendant denied all allegations relating to the alleged sex discrimination.

A well-established affirmative defense is available in cases of this sort if the defendant employer proves that (a) the plaintiff employee was not subject to any adverse job action (firing, demotion, loss of promotion opportunity, etc.), (b) the employer exercised reasonable care to prevent and promptly correct any sexually harassing behavior, and (c) the plaintiff employee unreasonably failed to take advantage of any preventive or corrective opportunities provided by the employer.

In a pretrial deposition, Plaintiff admitted that she had suffered no loss of pay or promotion opportunity. Plaintiff also admitted that she was aware of company policies forbidding sex discrimination and sexual harassment, as well as the procedures that employees could use to complain about perceived discrimination. Plaintiff stated that although she was aware of those policies and procedures, she had not seen any effort on the part of Defendant to enforce the policies and was afraid that she would suffer retaliation if she made use of the procedures available to complain of sex discrimination.

After the close of discovery, Defendant moved to amend its answer to add the affirmative defense set forth above. It also moved for summary judgment, claiming that Plaintiff's deposition testimony sufficiently established the elements of the affirmative defense to warrant a judgment in Defendant's favor.

Plaintiff opposed both motions. The trial judge ruled in Defendant's favor, allowing the amendment and granting summary judgment.

Did the judge err? Explain.

CORPORATIONS AND LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES QUESTION

Acme Inc. manufactures building materials, including concrete, for sale to construction companies. To create a market for its building materials, Acme enters into agreements with construction companies under which Acme and the construction company agree to form a member-managed limited liability company (LLC). The LLC builds the project, purchasing building materials from Acme and contracting for construction services with the construction company.

The operating agreements for these LLCs always provide that Acme has a 55% voting interest, that Acme and the construction company contribute equally to the capital of the venture, and that the parties share in profits at a negotiated rate. The agreements are silent as to the allocation of losses.

Acme entered into such a relationship with Brown Construction Co. LLC (Brown), forming Acme-Brown LLC (A-B LLC) to build 50 homes. The operating agreement for A-B LLC gives Acme a 55% voting interest and provides for a 20%/80% division of profits in favor of Brown.

A-B LLC built all 50 homes and sold them to homeowners. The members received a distribution of profits from the sales, split between them according to their agreement on the division of profits. However, all the concrete manufactured by Acme and sold to A-B LLC for the foundations of the homes proved to be defective. After a year, the concrete dissolved, collapsing the homes and rendering them worthless. In a class action by the homeowners against A-B LLC, the plaintiffs were awarded a $15 million judgment. The LLC has no assets with which to pay the judgment.

Although Acme would be liable to A-B LLC for the loss caused by the defective concrete, A-B LLC has not brought a claim against Acme. Acme has the financial resources to pay damages equal to the amount of the $15 million judgment in the homeowners' lawsuit and to fully cover A-B LLC's liability.

Brown has sent a letter to A-B LLC demanding that A-B LLC bring a claim against Acme to recover those damages and pay the judgment to the plaintiffs, after which A-B LLC would be dissolved. But Acme, as the manager of A-B LLC, has refused to do so.

Acme's lawyer has sent a letter to Brown stating the following:

- (1) Acme has no fiduciary obligations to either A-B LLC or Brown that require it to have A-B LLC bring the concrete claim against Acme.
- (2) Brown cannot bring a claim against Acme.
- (3) Brown does not have sufficient grounds to seek the judicial dissolution of A-B LLC.
- (4) Because the A-B LLC agreement provides for a 20%/80% division of profits, the losses arising from the judgment obtained by the plaintiffs against the LLC should also be allocated 20% to Acme and 80% to Brown.

Is Acme's lawyer correct? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES/CONFLICT OF LAWS QUESTION

Zach died a domiciliary of State A. At Zach's death, he owned a house located in State A. Zach also owned a farm located in State B and had a savings account at a bank in State B.

Zach left a handwritten document containing instructions for the disposition of his assets. The only words on this document were the following:

I, Zach, being of sound and disposing mind, leave my entire estate to my alma mater, University. I appoint Bank as executor of my estate.

Zach's wife predeceased him. Zach was survived by three children, Alex, Brian, and Carrie. Alex was the biological child of Zach and his deceased wife. Brian was the biological child of Zach's deceased wife and her first husband, but Zach adopted Brian when Brian was 12. Carrie was the biological child of Zach and a woman whom Zach never married. Zach's paternity of Carrie was adjudicated during Zach's lifetime.

State A law provides that a holographic will "entirely handwritten and signed at the end by the testator" is valid. State A law also provides that if a decedent dies intestate and leaves no surviving spouse, the decedent's estate passes in equal shares to the decedent's "surviving children." The phrase "surviving children" is defined to exclude "nonmarital children." There are no other relevant statutes in State A.

State B law provides that (1) the will of a nonresident that bequeaths real property located in State B must comply with the law of State B; (2) a will is invalid unless it was signed by the testator and two witnesses; and (3) the estate of an intestate decedent who leaves no surviving spouse passes to the decedent's "biological and adopted children, in equal shares." There are no other relevant statutes in State B.

How should Zach's three assets be distributed? Explain.

TRUSTS AND FUTURE INTERESTS ANALYSIS

(Trusts and Future Interests I.C.2., H., I.; III.B., E.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Is there a material purpose of the trust yet to be performed?
- (2) Do Settlor's children have the only remainder interest in the trust?
- (3) Was the class gift in favor of Settlor's children open to admit Settlor's fourth child?
- (4) Would Trustee breach any fiduciary duties by terminating the trust as requested?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Husband and Settlor's four children may terminate the irrevocable trust if a court finds that they are the only trust beneficiaries and there is no material purpose of the trust yet to be performed. It is unclear whether Settlor's desire to terminate Husband's interest if Husband remarries would be viewed as a material purpose of the trust yet to be performed.

Under the common law, only Husband and Settlor's children have an interest in the trust, as the children's interest is not subject to any conditions. The children's interest is both vested and transmissible. However, if the jurisdiction has adopted a survivorship statute like Uniform Probate Code (UPC) § 2-707, then the children and Husband would not be the only trust beneficiaries. Under that statute, if a child dies before Husband leaving surviving issue, the issue would also have an interest in the trust.

Because Settlor's class gift to "Settlor's children" remained open until Settlor's death, all four children are entitled to share in the trust remainder.

The proposed distribution of principal, which would give Husband more than the actuarial value of Husband's interest, would not breach any fiduciary duty because it would be made at the request of all trust beneficiaries.

Thus, unless UPC § 2-707 or a like statute applies or there is a material purpose of the trust yet to be performed, Trustee's assertions are incorrect.

Point One (35%)

Husband and Settlor's four children may terminate the irrevocable trust if a court finds that there is no material purpose of the trust yet to be performed. However, if a court were to find that the limitation on remarriage was a material purpose, the trust could not be terminated merely with the consent of Husband and the four children.

Generally, even an irrevocable trust can be terminated prior to the death of all income beneficiaries if both the income beneficiaries and the remaindermen unanimously consent. See generally RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 65(1) (2003). See also Point Two. However, if there is a material purpose of the trust yet to be performed, the beneficiaries alone may not terminate the trust. Id. § 65(2).

Here, it is unclear whether there is a material purpose yet to be performed. According to the Restatement, a material purpose should not be inferred from “[t]he mere fact that the settlor . . . created a trust for successive beneficiaries. . . . In the absence of additional circumstances indicating a further purpose, the inference is that the trust was intended merely to allow one or more persons to enjoy the benefits of the property during the period of the trust and to allow the . . . other beneficiaries to receive the property thereafter.” Id. at cmt. However, the trust provision specifying that Husband’s interest terminates upon his remarriage arguably demonstrates that a material purpose of Settlor was ensuring that trust assets did not benefit Husband’s second wife. If Settlor did have such a material purpose, the proposed distribution of $250,000 to Husband could defeat that purpose should Husband remarry.

If the court were to find that Settlor had a material purpose that would be defeated by trust termination, it is unclear whether a court would permit termination of the trust. Under the First and Second Restatements of Trusts, “if the continuance of the trust is necessary to carry out a material purpose of the trust, the beneficiaries cannot compel its termination.” RESTATEMENT (FIRST) OF TRUSTS § 337(2); RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 337(2). Similarly, the Uniform Trust Code § 411(b) provides that “[a] noncharitable irrevocable trust may be terminated upon consent of all of the beneficiaries [only] if the court concludes that continuance of the trust is not necessary to achieve any material purpose of the trust.”

However, under the Third Restatement of Trusts, which no court to date has followed, even if the court finds that the settlor had a material purpose that trust termination might defeat, it may nonetheless approve trust termination if “the reason for termination or modification outweighs the material purpose.” RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 65(2).

If the court were to employ the balancing approach approved by the Third Restatement, it is unclear what decision it would reach on the available facts. The reason for trust termination is to provide Husband with cash for his impending retirement. Without knowing more about Husband’s finances and the income available from the trust, it is impossible to assess how Husband’s goal compares to Settlor’s goal of ensuring that no future spouse of Husband receives benefits traceable to trust assets.

[NOTE: While conditioning the continuation of a child’s income interest on the child’s marriage or divorce is void on public policy grounds, a similar marriage restriction tied to the surviving spouse’s interest is not.]

[NOTE: The Uniform Trust Code has been adopted in Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, the District of Columbia, Florida, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wyoming.]

Point Two (30%)

Under the common law, Settlor’s children are the only trust remaindermen. Because each child’s interest is vested and transmissible, it would pass to the child’s estate, not the child’s issue, should the child predecease Husband. Thus, the four children and Husband are the only beneficiaries of the trust and could consent to terminate the trust. However, under UPC § 2-707 alternative remainder interests are created in the issue of any of Settlor’s children who predecease Husband.

A class gift is a gift to a group of persons described collectively, typically by their relationship to a common ancestor. See RESTATEMENT OF PROPERTY (WILLS AND DONATIVE TRANSFERS) § 13.1 (2004). Here, the gift to “Settlor’s children” is a class gift.

Under the common law, when a class gift is made to a group who are equally related to a common ancestor and the gift is not expressly subject to a condition of survivorship, the gift is not impliedly subject to such a condition. See id. § 15.4 (incorporating the common law rule). If a member of such a class fails to survive until the time of distribution (here, Husband’s death), that member’s share passes to his or her estate, not to his or her issue. Id.

Here, the remainder interest in the trust is limited to a class of “Settlor’s children.” All class members are equally related to a common ancestor, Settlor, and the trust imposes no express condition of survivorship. Therefore, each child has a vested and transmissible interest that would pass to his or her estate should the child die before the distribution date. If the common law applies, then only Husband and the four children are the beneficiaries of the trust and, if there is no material purpose to be performed (see Point One), they could consent to a termination of the trust.

Critics of the common law approach have argued that it fails to carry out the intentions of the typical trust settlor, permits a deceased beneficiary to transmit her share of trust assets to persons who are “strangers” to the settlor, and increases administrative costs by requiring the reopening of deceased beneficiaries’ estates and possibly successive estates. In response to these criticisms, some modern statutes do not follow the common law approach. For example, UPC § 2-707 provides that when a beneficiary does not survive to the distribution date, the beneficiary’s interest passes to his or her issue unless the trust instrument specifies an alternate disposition. Here, under the Uniform Probate Code approach, issue of a deceased child would have beneficial interest in the trust and would have to be part of any termination effort unless their interest could be represented by another.

Section 304 of the Uniform Trust Code provides: “Unless otherwise represented, a minor, incapacitated, or unborn individual, . . . may be represented by and bound by another having a substantially identical interest with respect to the particular question or dispute, but only to the extent there is no conflict of interest between the representative and the person represented.” This statute permits one group of remaindermen to represent another group of remaindermen in the absence of a conflict of interest. Here, the four children and their issue would have a conflict in light of the proposed distribution that would exclude the issue from potentially sharing in any trust assets. Thus, under UPC § 2-707 or a like statute, the trust could not be terminated merely with the consent of Husband and the four children.

[NOTE: Section 2-707 of the Uniform Probate Code has been adopted in Alaska, Arizona, Colorado, Hawaii, Michigan, Montana, New Mexico, North Dakota, and Utah.]

Settlor’s youngest child is entitled to a share of the trust because that child was born and became a class member before the class closed.

As noted under Point Two, the gift to “Settlor’s children” was a class gift. When a class gift is made to a group of individuals, such as the children of a named person, the class does not “close” (that is, additional individuals may join the class by satisfying the class eligibility requirements) until the named person dies or the gift becomes possessory. See WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN AND SHELDON F. KURTZ, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES 429 (3d ed. 2004); RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY (WILLS AND OTHER DONATIVE TRANSFERS) § 15.1 cmt. e.

Here, Settlor's fourth child was born prior to Settlor's death and therefore joined the class before it closed. Thus, this child is entitled to a share of the trust property.

Point Four (10%)

While Trustee has a duty to carry out the terms of the trust, when the trust beneficiaries properly terminate the trust, they can direct that the trust property be distributed in a manner of their own choosing, and a distribution consistent with the beneficiaries' direction is not a breach of trust.

If trust beneficiaries properly terminate a trust, trust assets vest in them. After termination, the beneficiaries may themselves distribute trust assets in any manner they choose. They may also direct a trustee to distribute trust assets as their agent. A trustee who complies with such directions does not violate any fiduciary duty. See UNIF. TRUST CODE § 411.

Here, assuming that the trust beneficiaries may terminate the trust, Trustee may comply with their distribution instructions. The fact that Husband would receive more than the actuarial value of his life estate does not, under these circumstances, constitute a breach of trust. Moreover, even if Trustee were breaching a fiduciary obligation in complying with the children's directions, they would be deemed to waive any claims against Trustee because they ordered the distribution. See, e.g., id. § 1009.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Criminal Law and Procedure I.B.1. & 2.; III.B.; IV.B.1., D.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1)(a) What are the elements of involuntary manslaughter?
- (1)(b) Did Adam act with mens rea required to be guilty of involuntary manslaughter?
- (1)(c) Were Adam's actions the legal cause of the child's death?
- (2) Can Bob be liable as an accomplice for the child's death?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A jury could find Adam guilty of involuntary manslaughter both in a jurisdiction that requires recklessness and in one that requires only gross negligence (sometimes referred to as criminal or culpable negligence). In a jurisdiction that requires recklessness, Adam's statements indicate that he was aware that his conduct created an unreasonable (or high and unreasonable) risk of death or serious bodily injury and that he consciously disregarded that risk. In a jurisdiction that requires gross negligence, a jury could find Adam guilty because a reasonable person under similar circumstances would have been aware that his conduct created an unreasonable (or unreasonable and high) risk of death or serious bodily injury.

Adam's conduct was the cause of the child's death. Adam's conduct was the but-for cause of the child's death because if Adam had not placed the marbles on the road, the child would not have died. The fact that the child was not properly secured in the vehicle does not break the chain of causation because this outcome was foreseeable.

Bob did not commit an act that resulted in the death of the child, nor did he have a duty to stop Adam from committing that act. However, a jury could find Bob liable as an accomplice to Adam's involuntary manslaughter if he assisted in the act with the required mental state. Here, Bob intentionally assisted Adam in the act by driving him to the scene of the crime. In a jurisdiction that requires recklessness, Bob's statements indicate that he was not aware that his assistance created an unreasonable (or high and unreasonable) risk of death or serious bodily injury. Bob is more likely to be found guilty as an accomplice in a state that requires gross/criminal/culpable negligence, if a reasonable person under similar circumstances would have been aware of this risk.

To be guilty of involuntary manslaughter, a person must cause the death of another human being by conduct that creates an unreasonable (or high and unreasonable) risk of death or serious bodily injury. The precise mens rea requirement will vary from jurisdiction to jurisdiction.

In most jurisdictions, a defendant is guilty of involuntary manslaughter when the defendant causes the death of another human being by engaging in conduct that creates an unreasonable (or high and unreasonable) risk of death or serious bodily injury. WAYNE R. LAFAVE, CRIMINAL LAW § 15.4(a) (5th ed. 2010).

The modern and majority view is that the defendant must have acted “recklessly” to be convicted of involuntary manslaughter (i.e., the defendant must have been aware of the unreasonable (or unreasonable and high) risk of death or serious bodily injury that his conduct created). Recklessness is typically defined as conscious disregard of a known risk, see, e.g., MODEL PENAL CODE § 2.02(c).

In other jurisdictions it is enough if the defendant acted with greater than ordinary negligence, which some states call “gross,” “criminal,” or “culpable” negligence. See C.T. Foster, Annotation, Test or Criterion of Term “Culpable Negligence,” “Criminal Negligence,” or “Gross Negligence,” Appearing in Statute Defining or Governing Manslaughter, 161 A.L.R. 10 (1946). In these states, even if the defendant was unaware of the risk, the defendant could be found guilty if an ordinary person in the defendant’s situation would have been aware that her conduct created an unreasonable (or unreasonable and high) risk of death or serious bodily injury.

Adam will be guilty of involuntary manslaughter only if he acted with the requisite degree of culpability and his conduct was the legal cause of the child’s death.

Point One(b) (25%)

A jury could conclude from Adam’s statements and actions that he acted with a mens rea of recklessness or gross negligence.

In order to determine whether Adam has committed involuntary manslaughter, his mens rea with regard to the result must be assessed.

In most jurisdictions, Adam can only be convicted of involuntary manslaughter if the fact finder concludes that he acted “recklessly” by consciously disregarding the unreasonable (or high and unreasonable) risk of death or serious bodily injury that his conduct created. In these jurisdictions, the prosecution will argue that Adam’s statements indicating that he knew that the marbles could cause an accident, including his statements that “When cars come by, they’ll slip on the marbles and they won’t be able to stop,” and that “They’ll have trouble; maybe there will even be a crash,” demonstrate that Adam was aware of the risk. The prosecution will also argue that Adam (like everyone else) knows that serious bodily injury and death are frequent outcomes of car crashes.

Adam will likely respond in several ways. First, he will contend that he was not reckless because he did not consciously disregard an unreasonable (or unreasonable and high) risk of death or serious bodily injury resulting from the accident. His statements indicated, he will argue, that he believed that drivers would lose control of their vehicles and would get mad and that there might be a crash, but did not suggest any awareness of the risk that someone would die or suffer serious bodily injury. He could also argue that no crash occurred while he watched the intersection, that traffic at the intersection was usually light, and that he was not aware of the risk that two cars would crash into each other, particularly at 2 a.m.

On the whole, a jury could conclude that Adam’s statements indicate that he was clearly aware that his actions could cause a car crash and every reasonable person knows that car crashes can cause death or serious bodily injury. Adam’s statement “I’ll bet someone will come” specifically suggests that he believed that cars would drive through the intersection that evening.

To prove that Adam had a mens rea of recklessness, the prosecution does not need to prove that Adam knew the precise time or circumstances of the resulting crash. If, however, the fact finder accepts that Adam did not consciously disregard an unreasonable (or unreasonable and high) risk of death or serious bodily injury from the resulting crash, he would not be guilty of involuntary manslaughter in a jurisdiction that requires recklessness for the crime.

In some jurisdictions, Adam can be convicted of involuntary manslaughter if the fact finder concludes that he acted with “gross,” “criminal,” or “culpable” negligence. In these jurisdictions, Adam can be convicted if a reasonable person in his situation would have been aware that his conduct created an unreasonable (or unreasonable and high) risk of death or serious bodily injury. It is highly likely that a fact finder would conclude that a reasonable person would be aware that conduct likely to cause vehicles to slip at an intersection creates an unreasonable (or unreasonable and high) risk of car crashes and death or serious bodily injury as a result of the crashes.

Adam’s conduct was the but-for cause of the child’s death. His conduct was also the legal cause because no intervening event occurred that would be sufficient to break the chain of causation.

The state will need to prove that Adam caused the child’s death in order for Adam to be found guilty of involuntary manslaughter. Causation requires a showing of both causation in fact—otherwise known as but-for causation—and proximate causation. “[A] defendant’s conduct is a cause-in-fact of the prohibited result if the said result would not have occurred ‘but for’ the defendant’s conduct.” Velazquez v. State, 561 So. 2d 347, 350 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1990) (emphasis in original). Adam was plainly the but-for cause of the child’s death. If Adam had not dumped the marbles at the intersection, the child would not have died.

The next question is whether Adam’s conduct was also the “proximate” cause of the child’s death. Proximate cause under the criminal law is complex to define (Prof. Joshua Dressler, in his hornbook UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 14.03[A] (5th ed. 2009), calls it “obscure”), but its core is foreseeability. Kibbe v. Henderson, 534 F.2d 493, 499 (2d Cir. 1976). Adam may argue that the child would not have died but for the fact that the man did not have his child properly secured in the vehicle. He may argue that this failure was an unforeseeable intervening cause—another but-for cause of the child’s death—and that in this case it should be treated as a superseding cause that should cut off his liability for the result. He may bolster this argument by noting that seat belts are required under state law. This argument should fail. It is true that the man’s failure to properly secure the child was an intervening cause of the child’s death. However, this intervening cause was not unforeseeable. Adam should have anticipated that some people, including children, who ride in cars are not properly secured by seat belts or child restraints.

Adam might also argue that the resulting car crash was such an extraordinary consequence of his action of dumping the marbles at the intersection that it would be unfair to hold him accountable. This argument should also fail because in these circumstances a car crash resulting in the death of a child who was not wearing a seat belt is not such an unusual or extraordinary consequence of Adam’s act as to justify relieving him of liability. See State v. Hallett, 619 P.2d 335, 339 (Utah 1980) (“[W]here a party by his wrongful conduct creates a condition of peril, his action can properly be found to be the proximate cause of a resulting injury, even though later events which combined to cause the injury may also be classified as negligent, so long as the later act is something which can reasonably be expected to follow in the natural sequence of events.”).

Bob intentionally assisted Adam in his act of dumping the marbles on the road, but Bob may not have acted with the mens rea required to be held liable as an accomplice to involuntary manslaughter.

Two elements are necessary for Bob to be found guilty of involuntary manslaughter on a theory of accomplice liability. First, Bob must have assisted Adam in the commission of the crime. DRESSLER, supra, § 30.04[A][1]. Second, Bob must have acted with dual intentions: (1) “the intent to assist the primary party” and (2) “the intent that the primary party commit the offense charged.” Id. § 30.05[A]. In cases where the primary party’s crime is one involving recklessness or negligence, most jurisdictions hold that the second intent element is satisfied if the defendant intended to assist the primary party and otherwise acted with the mens rea required for the underlying offense (i.e., recklessness or negligence, as the jurisdiction requires). Id. § 30.05[B][3].

Here, Bob assisted Adam by driving him to the intersection. Even a small amount of assistance can suffice to create accomplice liability.

[NOTE: An examinee might also argue that Bob assisted Adam by staying with him and watching, on the theory that he provided some kind of encouragement to Adam. However, mere presence at a crime scene is not sufficient to constitute assistance, so accompanying Adam is probably not enough. See State v. Noriega, 928 P.2d 706, 708 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1996).]

Bob also appears to have acted with the intent of assisting Adam. When Bob drove Adam to the intersection, he knew that it was for the purpose of bringing Adam to that place so that Adam could dump the marbles in the intersection. Bob had no other purpose.

The next question is whether Bob’s mens rea with regard to the child’s death was sufficient for involuntary manslaughter. Bob will argue that he had no mens rea at all with regard to the child’s death and therefore can be guilty of no offense. He will also argue that his statements to Adam suggest that he believed (1) that no one was likely to drive through the intersection and (2) that the marbles would not cause any danger to any drivers who would simply drive over them. Accordingly, Bob will argue that he did not act with the culpability required to be held liable as an accomplice to involuntary manslaughter.

In most jurisdictions, Bob must have acted “recklessly” to be convicted as an accomplice to involuntary manslaughter (i.e., he must have been aware of the unreasonable (or unreasonable and high) risk of death or serious bodily injury that his conduct created). Based on Bob’s statements, he does not appear to have been reckless. The prosecution’s best argument would be that Bob knew about the risk because Adam told him that cars might crash. In response, Bob can argue that his statements demonstrate that he thought Adam was wrong about the risks of dumping the marbles.

In some jurisdictions, Bob can be convicted if he demonstrated “gross,” “criminal,” or “culpable” negligence (i.e., if an ordinary person in his situation would have been aware that his conduct created an unreasonable (or unreasonable and high) risk of death or serious bodily injury). In these states, Bob could be found guilty of involuntary manslaughter on a theory of accomplice liability if the fact finder believes that an ordinary person would have realized that placing 2,000 marbles on a road would interfere with the ability of cars to stop when they drove over the marbles, thereby creating an unreasonable (or unreasonable and high) risk of death or serious bodily injury.

In a few jurisdictions, Bob cannot have accomplice liability for involuntary manslaughter as a matter of law. In these jurisdictions, the courts adhere strictly to the requirement that an “accomplice must want the crime to be committed by the other party,” and they reason that it is “logically impossible” for a person to be an accomplice to a crime of recklessness or negligence because one cannot “intend” a negligent or reckless killing. DRESSLER, supra, § 30.05[B][3]. In most jurisdictions, however, courts hold an accomplice responsible for a crime like manslaughter if the accomplice intentionally provided assistance to the principal and acted with recklessness or negligence, as the case may be, with respect to the risk that the principal’s behavior would cause death.

[NOTE: With respect to the “dual intent” issue, the key is whether examinees recognize that accomplice liability requires two levels of culpability. It is less important which approach examinees adopt than that they see the problem—Bob cannot be guilty as an accomplice unless he was culpable with respect to the underlying crime, and Bob, in fact, not only did not intend any car crash or resulting death, he actually did not believe that such an event would occur.]

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Does Congress have authority under the Commerce Clause to regulate employer precautions against workplace violence?
- (2) Do federalism principles bar Congress from applying the Act to state agencies as employers?
- (3) Does the Eleventh Amendment bar the employee's suit against the state?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under the Commerce Clause, Congress has power to regulate economic activities that substantially affect interstate commerce. Here, the Act regulates a non-economic aspect of an economic activity (i.e., the employment relationship) that has a substantial effect ($5 to $10 billion per year) on interstate commerce. This regulation probably falls within the scope of the Commerce Clause, although at least one case can be read to suggest the opposite possibility. The Act does not violate federalism principles embodied in the Tenth Amendment to the Constitution by improperly commandeering states or by regulating state employers differently than private employers. However, the employee's federal court lawsuit is barred by the state agency's Eleventh Amendment immunity, and the Act cannot abrogate that immunity.

Point One (50%)

Congress has power under the Commerce Clause to regulate workplace violence only if the court concludes that the Act regulates an economic activity with a substantial aggregate effect on interstate commerce.

In United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549 (1995), the Supreme Court of the United States clarified that Congress may enact three types of regulations under the Commerce Clause. First, Congress may regulate the channels of interstate commerce, which are the pathways through which interstate travel and communications pass. Examples of the channels include interstate highways and phone lines. Second, Congress may regulate the people and instrumentalities that work and travel in the channels of interstate commerce. Examples include people such as airline pilots and flight attendants, as well as the airplanes on which they travel. Third, Congress may regulate activities that substantially affect interstate commerce.

The Act does not fit within either of the first two Lopez categories. First, the statute applies to any workplace, regardless of its location, and so it does not narrowly regulate the channels of interstate commerce. Second, the Act applies to all employees and not only those people or instrumentalities in the channels of interstate commerce. Consequently, the Act will be valid only if it regulates an activity that substantially affects interstate commerce.

The key to satisfying the substantial effects requirement is the threshold determination of whether the regulated activity is economic or commercial in nature. When Congress regulates an economic or commercial activity, the Court will uphold the regulation if Congress had a rational basis for concluding that the class of activities subject to regulation, in the aggregate, has a substantial effect on interstate commerce. Aggregation on a national scale typically makes this an easy standard to meet. On the other hand, if the regulated activity is not economic or commercial in nature, the Court will not aggregate to find a substantial effect, and the standard becomes extremely difficult to meet. See Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U.S. 1 (2005); United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000); Lopez, supra.

Therefore, the key question is whether violence in the workplace is an economic or commercial activity. In Morrison, the Court held that Congress exceeded its commerce power by enacting a statute giving a cause of action to the victims of gender-motivated violence. It therefore can be argued here, as Morrison held, that acts of violence are not economic or commercial in nature, and thus in applying the substantial effects test, the court may only measure the effect of the particular act of violence at issue in the suit and not the aggregate effect of all acts of violence in the workplace.

One could argue that Morrison is distinguishable because the statute at issue here is limited to violence in the workplace. The workplace is an economic environment, and workplace violence directly impedes productivity of the workplace. The court therefore should conclude that the statute at issue here is an economic regulation and thus is within the commerce power of Congress because, based on the facts given in the problem, Congress had a rational basis for concluding that workplace violence, in the aggregate, has a substantial effect on interstate commerce.

Point Two (20%)

The Act does not violate federalism principles because it regulates both public and private employers on the same terms.

In Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transportation Authority, 469 U.S. 528 (1985), the Supreme Court held that Congress may regulate the states on the same terms as private actors. For example, Garcia upheld application of the federal minimum wage and maximum hour law to both public and private employers. In New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144 (1992), however, the Court held that Congress may not “commandeer” the states to regulate private conduct. In New York v. United States, the Court struck down a federal statute that commandeered states to regulate private disposal of low-level hazardous waste.

The Act does not commandeer the state to regulate private conduct. Instead, the Act merely requires both public and private employers to obey the same federal requirement—to address workplace violence under the threat of civil liability. It is true that the state, as an employer, must adopt policies and regulations to implement the Act’s mandates. But Reno v. Condon, 528 U.S. 141 (2000), clarifies that a federal mandate requiring state personnel to alter their own activities is not unconstitutional commandeering.

Point Three (30%)

The Eleventh Amendment bars the employee’s federal court lawsuit against the state, and the Act does not validly abrogate that immunity.

The Eleventh Amendment provides: “The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.”

Despite the text of the Eleventh Amendment, the Supreme Court has interpreted it to bar lawsuits between a state and one of its own citizens, as well as lawsuits that arise under federal law. See Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida, 517 U.S. 44 (1996). Further, this immunity extends to state agencies. Consequently, the Eleventh Amendment would bar the employee’s lawsuit against the state agency in federal court, unless the Act validly abrogates the state’s immunity.

A federal statute abrogates Eleventh Amendment immunity if, first, the statute unambiguously asserts that it does so, and second, Congress enacted the statute under a power that may abrogate Eleventh Amendment state immunity. Here, the Act satisfies the first requirement because Section 204 unequivocally attempts to abrogate state Eleventh Amendment immunity. The Act fails the second requirement, however, because Congress did not pass the Act under a grant of power that may abrogate state immunity. In Seminole Tribe, the Court held that Article 1, section 8 of the Constitution does not grant Congress power to abrogate state sovereign immunity. (The Supreme Court has held that Congress can abrogate state immunity when it exercises its powers under amendments that postdate the Eleventh Amendment. By way of contrast, Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment does grant Congress that power. See Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445 (1976) (Fourteenth Amendment)). Because the Act does not validly abrogate the state’s Eleventh Amendment immunity, the District Court should dismiss the employee’s lawsuit.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) When a child has no “home state,” what state has jurisdiction to issue a valid child-custody decree?
- (2) Must a court defer to the preference of an older child when awarding custody?
- (3) Under the U.S. Constitution, may a state statute authorize a court to grant a grandparent custody of a child without giving any special weight to the best-interests determination of a fit and available parent?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), when a child has no “home state,” i.e., a state in which the child has resided for the prior six months, a state may exercise jurisdiction based on (1) “significant connections” with the child and at least one parent and (2) the existence of “substantial evidence” relating to child custody in the forum jurisdiction. Here, State A has significant connections with Daughter and Mom; substantial evidence related to child custody exists in State A, where Daughter and Grandparents are currently located and where Daughter was domiciled until very recently. Thus, State A has jurisdiction to make a custody award.

On the merits, a court may deny Grandparents’ custody petition even though Daughter strongly prefers to live with them. In all states, the preferences of a child are relevant to a determination of the child’s best interests in a custody proceeding, but they are not determinative.

However, the State A statute under which Grandparents have brought a custody petition is probably unconstitutional. In Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000), a plurality of the Supreme Court ruled that a state statute which authorized a court to grant visitation to “[a]ny person” based on a finding that such visitation was in “the best interest of the child” unconstitutionally interfered with the fundamental right of parents to rear their children. Although State A’s statute authorizing the award of custody to a nonparent based on the best interest of the child is limited to grandparents, it similarly grants “no special weight” to a parent’s determination of her child’s best interest and thus does not comport with the standards set forth in Troxel.

Point One (40%)

State A has jurisdiction because no state is Daughter’s “home state,” Daughter and Mom both have significant connections with State A, and substantial evidence is available in State A regarding Daughter’s care.

Under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, which has been widely adopted, a state has jurisdiction to make an initial child-custody determination if “this State is the home state of the child on the date of the commencement of the proceeding, or was the home State of the child within six months before the commencement of the proceeding and the child is absent from this State but a parent or person acting as a parent continues to live in this State” and no other state’s courts would have jurisdiction under the above standard or other courts having jurisdiction have declined to exercise it. UCCJEA § 201(a)(1) & (2).

Neither State A nor State B can claim jurisdiction under § 201(a)(1). A “home state” is the state in which the child “lived with a parent or a person acting as a parent for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of a child-custody proceeding.” Id. § 102(7). Here, Daughter and Mom moved to State B only four months before the State A custody petition was filed in State A, so State B is not Daughter’s home state. State A was the home state of Daughter within six months of the proceeding commenced in State A. However, State A does not have home-state jurisdiction because neither statutory condition has been met: a parent (Mom) does not continue to live in State A, and the child is not absent from State A.

Under the UCCJEA, when—and only when—“a court of another state does not have jurisdiction under paragraph 1” (i.e., the home-state rule), a court may exercise jurisdiction over a child-custody determination if

- (2)(A) the child . . . and at least one parent . . . have a significant connection with this State other than mere physical presence; and
- (B) substantial evidence is available in this State concerning the child’s care, protection, training, and personal relationships. Id. § 201(a)(2).

Here, a State A court would have jurisdiction under § 201(a)(2) because Daughter and Mom both have a significant connection with State A and substantial evidence relating to Daughter’s care is available in State A: Mom was married in State A, gave birth to Daughter there, and lived there with Daughter from the time of her birth until four months ago. Daughter is currently in State A, and so are Grandparents. Other evidence related to Daughter’s schooling, friendships, and other personal relationships is also available in State A.

[NOTE: State B would also have jurisdiction under § 201(a)(2): Daughter and Mom both have a significant connection with State B as it is where they both lived until Daughter’s recent return to State A and substantial evidence from Mom, Stepdad, Daughter’s school, etc., is available in State B. However, under UCCJEA § 206(a), a court “may not exercise its jurisdiction . . . if . . . a proceeding concerning the custody of the child has been commenced in a court of another State having jurisdiction substantially in conformity with this [Act] . . .” Thus, State B could not exercise jurisdiction under § 201(a)(2) because a petition has been filed in State A.]

The federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (PKPA) sets out child-custody jurisdictional standards much like those contained in the UCCJEA. Under the PKPA, a State A court would have jurisdiction because no state is Daughter’s home state, “the child and at least one contestant[] have a significant connection with . . . State [A] other than mere physical presence . . . and there is available in such State substantial evidence concerning the child’s present or future care. . . .” 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(c)(2)(B). Like the UCCJEA, the PKPA provides that where a court of another state is exercising jurisdiction that complies with the federal standard, another court shall not exercise jurisdiction. Id. § 1738A(g).

Thus, State A has jurisdiction over the custody action initiated by Grandparents.

[NOTE: In 2012, the UCCJEA had been adopted in all states except Massachusetts.]

Point Two (25%)

Although the wishes of an older child are relevant to a custody determination and are typically given great weight, they are not determinative; a court may thus deny Grandparents' custody petition over the express opposition of Daughter.

In all states, the views of a child who is mature enough to form and express a preference are relevant to a custody determination. The wishes of older children like Daughter are typically given substantial weight. See D.W. O'Neill, Annotation, Child's Wishes as Factor in Awarding Custody, 4 A.L.R. 3d 1396 (1965). However, the child's wishes "are not treated equally in every case":

Sometimes the child's wishes are given controlling effect, while at other times the wishes are disregarded altogether. The circumstances determining what effect, between these two extremes, should be given to a child's wishes in a particular case are, in addition to the comparative effect of objective factors affecting its welfare generally, . . . and in addition to the natural right of the child's parent to have its custody (frequently invoked successfully, at least in the absence of the parent's long-term abandonment of the child to another's custody): the child's age and judgment capacity; the basis for and strength of its preference, generally; the treatment extended to the child by the contestants for its custody; and the wrongful inducement of the child's wishes.

Id. § 2(a). See also Wanda Ellen Wakefield, Annotation, Desire of Child as to Geographic Location of Residence or Domicile as Factor in Awarding Custody or Terminating Parental Rights, 10 A.L.R. 4th 827 (1981).

Although there are a handful of states in which, by statute, the court must defer to the wishes of an older child when choosing between fit parents (see 10 A.L.R. 4th § 4), even if State A has such a statute it would not be applicable here, as the custody contest is between a fit parent and a nonparent.

Thus, although the wishes of Daughter are relevant in an action regarding her custody, a court may disregard those wishes and deny Grandparents' custody petition.

Point Three (35%)

Because the State A statute gives "no special weight" to a parent's determination of her child's best interests, under the Supreme Court's plurality opinion in Troxel v. Granville, the statute is unconstitutional.

In Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000), the Supreme Court addressed the constitutionality of a state statute under which "[a]ny person" could petition for visitation rights "at any time" and authorized a court to grant such visitation whenever it concluded that "visitation may serve the best interest of the child." A plurality of the Court found that the statute provided inadequate protection for a parent's constitutionally protected liberty interest in the care, custody, and control of her child. The statute at issue was, in the Court's view, "breathtakingly broad," and it required the court to give "no special weight at all to [a parent's] . . . determination of her daughter's best interests." 530 U.S. at 67, 69. Moreover, the court that awarded visitation pursuant to the statute used a decision-making framework that "gave no weight" to the parent's having “assented to visitation” on a schedule different from that preferred by the grandparent petitioners and that “contravened the traditional presumption that a fit parent will act in the best interest of his or her child.” Id. at 69.

Under Troxel, the State A grandparent-custody statute is almost certainly unconstitutional. Like the statute struck down in Troxel, the State A statute does not require the court to give any special weight to a parent’s determination of her child’s best interest; in fact, it does not appear to require the court to give any weight to a parent’s determination of a child’s best interest. Moreover, the State A statute permits a much larger intrusion upon parental prerogatives than did the statute considered in Troxel; that statute permitted a court to grant a nonparent visitation, while the State A statute authorizes a court to award a nonparent custody.

Although the State A statute does restrict nonparent custody petitions to grandparents and additionally requires that the child have been abandoned or have a parent who has died, this should not alter the constitutional analysis. These facts are not relevant to the Supreme Court’s reasoning in Troxel. Moreover, Troxel itself involved a visitation petition brought by grandparents whose son had died.

DISCUSSION

Summary

Bank has a perfected security interest in the present and future inventory of Recycled. That security interest covers both the bicycles in the inventory of Recycled and the bicycle helmets bought from Manufacturer. Although, as a general rule, a security interest continues in collateral notwithstanding its sale by the debtor, Bank does not have a claim to Consumer's bicycle. As a buyer in ordinary course of business from Recycled, Consumer took the bicycle free of the security interest in it that Recycled gave to Bank.

Bank also has a perfected security interest in the used computer. Although the computer is not inventory, it was received in exchange for an item of inventory and constitutes proceeds of that inventory to which Bank's security interest extends. Bank's security interest in the computer is superior to Utility's judgment lien, which was created after Bank had obtained its perfected security interest in the computer.

Manufacturer has a security interest in the helmets it sold to Recycled, but its unperfected security interest is subordinate to the perfected security interest of Bank and to Utility's judgment lien.

Point One (34%)

Because Consumer was a buyer in ordinary course of business with respect to the bicycle, Consumer took the bicycle free of Bank's security interest.

While a security interest in collateral generally continues in that collateral even after the collateral has been sold (see UCC § 9-315), that principle is subject to important exceptions. In particular, a buyer in ordinary course of business "takes free of a security interest" created by its seller “even if the security interest is perfected and the buyer knows of its existence.” UCC § 9-320(a).

Here, Recycled sold the bicycle to Consumer. Consumer took free of Bank’s security interest—which was created by Recycled, its seller—if Consumer was a “buyer in ordinary course of business.” A buyer in ordinary course of business is “a person that buys goods in good faith, without knowledge that the sale violates the rights of another person in the goods, and in the ordinary course from a person . . . in the business of selling goods of that kind.” UCC § 1-201(b)(9).

On these facts, Consumer is a buyer in ordinary course of business. First, Consumer bought the bicycle from Recycled, which is in the business of selling goods of the kind that Consumer bought—bicycles. Second, the sale occurred “in the ordinary course,” i.e., in the seller’s usual way. Third, Consumer acted honestly and in a manner consistent with reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing. Thus, Consumer acted in “good faith.” UCC § 1-201(b)(20). Finally, there are no facts to suggest that Consumer knew that the sale was in violation of Bank’s rights.

As a buyer in ordinary course of business, Consumer took the bicycle free of Bank’s security interest, and Bank’s security interest is extinguished.

Point Two (33%)

Although Bank’s security agreement does not cover the equipment of Recycled, the used computer, which is equipment, constitutes proceeds of the inventory of Recycled, and Bank’s security interest in the inventory extends to proceeds of the inventory. Because Bank’s interest was perfected before Utility became a lien creditor, Bank has a prior claim to the used computer.

The security agreement pursuant to which Bank obtained its perfected security interest covers only inventory. The used computer was not held by Recycled for sale or lease, so it is not inventory. UCC § 9-102(a)(48). Rather, it is equipment. UCC § 9-102(a)(33). Thus, it is not included in the description of collateral in the security agreement.

However, Recycled obtained the computer in exchange for a bicycle that was inventory (and, thus, collateral). Because the computer was “acquired upon the . . . exchange . . . of collateral,” the computer is “proceeds” of that collateral. UCC § 9-102(a)(64). A security interest in collateral extends to identifiable proceeds of that collateral. UCC § 9-315(a)(2). Thus, Bank has a security interest in the computer. In addition, the security interest in the computer as proceeds is perfected because the security interest in the original collateral (the bicycle) was perfected by the filing of a financing statement in the same office in which a financing statement would be filed in order to perfect a security interest in the computer. UCC §§ 9-315(c)–(d).

Because Bank has a perfected security interest in the used computer as proceeds, it has priority over Utility’s later judgment lien. UCC § 9-317(a)(2).

Point Three (33%)

Bank’s perfected security interest in the bicycle helmets is superior to Manufacturer’s unperfected security interest and to Utility’s later judgment lien. Manufacturer’s security interest is subordinate to Utility’s judgment lien.

While the contract with Manufacturer provides that Manufacturer retains title to the helmets until Recycled pays for them, the purported retention of “title” is limited in effect to retention of a “security interest.” See UCC § 1-201(b)(35) (§ 1-201(37) in states that have not enacted the Revised Article 1). Manufacturer’s security interest is not perfected because Manufacturer has not filed a financing statement, and there is no other basis for it to claim perfection of its security interest. See UCC §§ 9-308, 9-310.

Bank has a security interest in the inventory of Recycled. Bank perfected that interest by filing a financing statement. See UCC § 9-310(a). Because the bicycle helmets are held for sale by Recycled, they are inventory and are subject to Bank's security interest. See UCC § 9-102(a)(48) (definition of inventory).

Bank's security interest has priority over Manufacturer's security interest because a perfected security interest has priority over an unperfected security interest. See UCC § 9-322(a)(2).

Because Bank has a perfected security interest in the bicycle helmets, it has priority over Utility's later judgment lien. UCC § 9-317(a)(2). However, Utility's judgment lien has priority over Manufacturer's security interest in the bicycle helmets because Manufacturer's interest is unperfected. Id.

[NOTE: An examinee might correctly note that Manufacturer's security interest is a "purchase-money security interest." That point is irrelevant to the answer, however. A perfected purchase-money security interest can, under proper circumstances, have priority over other security interests, but Manufacturer's security interest was not perfected because no financing statement was filed and no other criterion for perfection has been satisfied. Thus, the general rule of UCC § 9-322(a)(2)—a perfected security interest has priority over an unperfected security interest—determines the priority of the competing security interests in this case. An examinee might erroneously state that Manufacturer's purchase-money security interest is automatically perfected without the need for filing pursuant to UCC § 9-309(1). This is incorrect, because only a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods qualifies for this special rule, and the helmets are "inventory" rather than "consumer goods." See definitions in UCC §§ 9-102(a)(23) and 9-102(a)(48).]

DISCUSSION

Summary

A jury could find that University is liable to Susan for failing to take reasonable precautions to protect Susan from foreseeable criminal activity resulting from unauthorized entrance into the dorm. University owed a duty of care to Susan, a resident of a dormitory controlled and maintained by University. University's failure to fix the broken lock or take other steps to prevent entry by an intruder violated that duty; it was also the cause in fact and proximate cause of Susan's physical injuries.

A jury could not find that Jim is liable to Susan unless Susan relied to her detriment on Jim's promise to obtain assistance or unless Jim increased the risk that Susan would suffer harm. Here, there is no evidence of reliance or increased risk as a result of Jim's failure to obtain assistance.

A jury could not find that Ann's Psychiatrist is liable to Susan. Although a therapist may be liable for failing to warn a patient's intended victim of credible threats of violence when that victim is reasonably identifiable, in virtually all jurisdictions, a therapist may not be found liable for failing to warn a victim who is a member of an indeterminate group.

If University is found liable to Susan, it will be responsible for damages related to Susan's PTSD injuries because a tort defendant takes his victim as he finds him.

Point One(a) (30%)

University owed a duty of care to Susan, a resident of a dormitory controlled and maintained by University, to take reasonable precautions to protect Susan from foreseeable criminal activity. University's failure to fix the broken lock or take other precautions against unauthorized entry into Susan's dorm violated that duty. It was also the cause in fact and proximate cause of Susan's physical injuries.

A college does not stand in a parens patriae relationship with its students. See Hegel v. Langsam, Ohio Misc. 2d (Comp. Pl. 1971). However, although the common law imposed almost no duties on landlords to provide safe premises to tenants, modern courts have found that landlords, including landlords like University, have a duty to take reasonable precautions to protect tenants against foreseeable attacks. See Kline v. 1500 Massachusetts Avenue Apartment Corp., 439 F.2d 477 (D.C. Cir. 1970). See also RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS §§ 360, 361.

[NOTE: An examinee might also conclude that University owed a duty of care to Susan because she was an invitee. See DAN B. DOBBS, THE LAW OF TORTS § 235, at 605 (2000) (describing tenant in common areas of building as an example of an invitee encountering obvious dangers).]

Criminal activity of the sort that occurred here was foreseeable. Apartment buildings and college dormitories almost invariably have locked entrances to protect against intrusion by criminals. Indeed, recognizing this risk, University had taken steps to ensure that nonresidents could not enter the dormitory.

A jury could find that University's failure to repair the broken lock or to take other steps to secure the door through which Ann entered the dormitory represented a breach of its duty of care. The lock had broken four days before Ann's entry. Therefore, University employees had ample time to discover the break. Even if repairs were impossible within the relevant time period, University could have taken other steps to prevent the door from being opened from the outside. Such precautions were warranted given the foreseeability that unauthorized persons could enter the dormitory to engage in criminal acts. It is this risk that prompted University to issue key cards to the dormitory residents. See Brauer v. New York Central & H.R.R. Co., 103 A. 166 (N.J. 1918) (finding railroad liable for theft resulting from failure to guard plaintiff's goods when theft foreseeable).

Because Ann's entrance into Susan's dorm was made possible by University's failure to secure the damaged door, a jury could find that University's failure to repair the lock was the cause in fact and proximate cause of Susan's physical injuries.

Point One(b) (25%)

There is no general duty to come to the aid of another. Jim assumed a duty to Susan only if Susan relied to her detriment on Jim's promise to obtain assistance or if Jim left Susan in a worse position. Here, the evidence does not show that Susan relied to her detriment or that Susan was in a worse position after Jim took charge.

Susan and Jim did not have a special relationship that created a duty to come to the aid of another. See DAN B. DOBBS, THE LAW OF TORTS §§ 314–319. However, when an actor “takes charge of another who is helpless adequately to aid or protect himself,” he is subject to liability to the other for bodily harm caused by a) “the failure of the actor to exercise reasonable care to secure the safety of the other while within the actor's charge, or

b) the actor's discontinuing aid or protection, if by doing so he leaves the other in a worse position than when the actor took charge of him.”

RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 324. See also RESTATEMENT OF TORTS § 323 (“One who undertakes, gratuitously or for consideration, to render services to another . . . [is liable] for physical harm resulting from his failure to exercise reasonable care . . . if (a) his failure to exercise such care increases the risk of such harm; or (b) the harm is suffered because of the other's reliance upon the undertaking.”).

Here, Jim's failure to follow up his unsuccessful attempt to report Susan's injuries to the University security office with any other action was arguably negligent. Moreover, Jim's closing the library door made it less likely that anyone else would come to Susan's aid. However, there is no evidence that Susan actually suffered any harm as a result of Jim's conduct. Susan obtained medical assistance herself only half an hour after Jim left her, and there is no evidence that her minor physical injuries or PTSD symptoms were aggravated by delayed treatment.

Thus, because there is no evidence that Jim caused or exacerbated Susan's injuries, Susan cannot recover damages from Jim.

Point One(c) (30%)

A psychotherapist has a duty to warn a reasonably identifiable individual against whom her patient has made credible threats but has no duty to warn any individual who is a member of an indeterminate class against whom the patient has made threats.

In Tarasoff v. Regents of University of California, 551 P.2d 334 (Cal. 1976), the California Supreme Court held that the special relationship between a psychotherapist and patient justified the imposition of a duty to warn “persons threatened by the patient.” Both the holding and reasoning of the Tarasoff court have been widely adopted. Today, in most states, a psychotherapist who fails to warn an intended victim against whom her patient has made credible threats of physical violence may be found liable for that victim's injuries. Many courts have also followed Tarasoff in permitting recovery either (1) when the therapist believed that the patient posed a real risk to the specified victim or (2) when the therapist negligently failed to take the threat seriously.

However, California courts have restricted the duty imposed on psychotherapists in Tarasoff to “potential victims . . . specifically known and designated” by the dangerous patient. Thompson v. County of Alameda, 614 P.2d 728, 736 (Cal. 1980). For example, in Thompson, the court refused to extend Tarasoff to a defendant that had released a youth who had a long history of violence and who had “indicated that he would, if released, take the life of a young child residing in the neighborhood.” Id. at 730. The court held that, in contrast to Tarasoff, “the warnings sought by plaintiffs would of necessity have to be made to a broad segment of the population and would be only general in nature . . . [S]uch generalized warnings . . . would do little as a practical matter to stimulate increased safety measures . . . [and] would be difficult to give.” Id. at 736.

Courts and legislatures in other states have also generally confined the Tarasoff duty to intended victims who are readily ascertainable and subject to a serious threat of physical violence. See, e.g., KY. REV. STATS. ANN. § 202A.400(1) (requiring “actual threat of physical violence against a clearly identifiable victim”); NEB. REV. STAT. § 38-2137(1) (requiring “serious threat of physical violence” against a “reasonably identifiable victim”); N.H. REV. STAT. § 329:31 (requiring “serious threat of physical violence against a clearly identified or reasonably identifiable victim” or “serious threat of substantial damage to real property”); N.J. STAT. ANN. § 2A:62A-16 (requiring “threat of imminent, serious physical violence against a readily identifiable individual”). Cases in which courts have imposed a broader duty have typically involved defendants who directly facilitated the patient's attack. See, e.g., Lundgren v. Fultz, 354

N.W.2d 25 (Minn. 1984) (imposing duty to victims where psychiatrist helped patient to obtain guns confiscated by police).

Under Tarasoff and the case law of most states, the fact that Ann's Psychiatrist did not find Ann's threats credible would not be a defense if the evidence showed that a reasonable therapist would have taken Ann's threats seriously. Here, Ann's Psychiatrist had a therapeutic relationship with Ann because Ann saw Psychiatrist weekly for several months. That relationship imposed on Psychiatrist a duty to warn Ann's ascertainable intended victims if Ann made serious threats of physical violence against them. Psychiatrist's decision not to warn anyone was likely reasonable based on Ann's lack of any history of violent behavior and the ambiguity of her vague threat to ensure that cheaters "get what is coming to them," which is not a clear threat of serious injury. More importantly, Ann's threats were general; she did not specify any ascertainable victims. Thus, in the vast majority of states, a jury could not find that Psychiatrist is liable to Susan.

Point Two (15%)

University is responsible for damages related to Susan's injuries because a tort defendant takes his victim as he finds him.

A tort defendant takes his victim as he finds him. The victim with an "eggshell skull" who suffers injuries greatly in excess of those that a normal victim would suffer is entitled to recover for the full extent of his injuries. See RICHARD A. EPSTEIN AND CATHERINE M. SHAKEY, CASES AND MATERIALS ON TORTS 471–74 (10th ed. 2012).

Here, although Susan sustained only minor physical injuries from Ann's attack, Susan suffered a preexisting condition, PTSD. Susan's PTSD symptoms that emerged after Ann's attack were attributable to her preexisting PTSD. Most of the "eggshell skull" cases involve unusual physical consequences of an underlying precondition. However, there is no reason why, with proper proof, the plaintiff should not also recover damages for mental symptoms such as anxiety or insomnia. See Steinhauser v. Hertz Corp., 421 F.2d 1169 (2d Cir. 1970) (permitting recovery for plaintiff's post-accident schizophrenia when evidence showed that prior concussion created predisposition that was exacerbated by accident for which defendant was liable). Courts have sometimes been reluctant to award tort plaintiffs damages for mental distress unaccompanied by any physical injuries (see Williamson v. Bennett, 112 S.E.2d 48 (N.C. 1960) (disallowing mental-disorder damages when plaintiff suffered no physical harm in accident caused by defendant)). However, here Susan did suffer physical injuries during the attack, and the attack also triggered physical symptoms such as nausea, muscle tension, and sweating.

Thus, if Susan recovers damages from University for her physical injuries, she should also be able to recover damages for her PTSD symptoms.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure IV.A.; VI.B.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Do the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit a defendant to amend its answer after discovery has closed in order to add an affirmative defense that has been suggested by facts revealed in discovery when that defense could have been raised at the outset of the action?
- (2) Should summary judgment be granted when facts revealed in discovery support a defendant's affirmative defense but when there are other facts at issue that would permit a jury to reject the defense?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a)(2), leave to amend should be freely given when justice requires. Here, the merits of the case are advanced by allowing the amendment adding the affirmative defense, and there are no facts to suggest that Plaintiff would be prejudiced in the preparation and presentation of her case by allowing the amendment. Although Plaintiff will be harmed if Defendant is allowed to prove a valid defense, the harm of being subject to a valid defense is not the kind of "prejudice" that would warrant denying an amendment. On the applicable "abuse of discretion" standard, it is unlikely that the appellate court would reverse the trial court's decision on this issue.

The trial court erred in granting Defendant's motion for summary judgment. Under Rule 56(c), the standard for granting such a motion is that there is no genuine issue of material fact raised. Here, Plaintiff's deposition testimony suggests that there are genuine issues of material fact concerning whether Defendant exercised reasonable care to prevent and correct harassment and whether Plaintiff's failure to complain about the harassment was reasonable.

Point One (50%)

The trial court properly granted Defendant leave to amend its answer to the complaint, given that justice favors allowing Defendant to raise a potentially valid affirmative defense and no facts suggest that Plaintiff was unfairly prejudiced by the amendment.

A defendant has the burden of pleading all affirmative defenses. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(c) is very clear when it states that a party defending a claim "must affirmatively state any avoidance or affirmative defense" Defendant had failed to raise a potentially valid affirmative defense in its answer and later sought to amend.

Under Rule 15(a)(2), a district court "should freely give leave [to amend] when justice so requires." The Supreme Court has defined this standard "negatively" by indicating that amendments should be allowed unless they result in a form of injustice. See Foman v. Davis, 371 U.S. 178 (1962). The categories of injustice the Court describes are undue delay, bad faith or dilatory motive, repeated failure to cure defects by amendment, undue prejudice to the party opposing the amendment, or futility of the amendment. Here, the only possible ground that Plaintiff might use to resist the amendment is “undue prejudice.”

Defendant has a strong argument that it would be unjust to deny the amendment because doing so would deny Defendant an opportunity to have the case decided on its legal merits. Indeed, having cases decided on their merits is one of the key goals of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, see, e.g., FED. R. CIV. P. 1 (seeking to achieve a “just, speedy, and inexpensive” determination) and one reason that the Rules direct courts to “freely give leave” to amend. Moreover, allowing a potentially valid defense does not cause “undue prejudice” to Plaintiff. Plaintiff’s legal claim is only as good as its ability to overcome defenses, and it is not unjust to require that she respond to those defenses.

Plaintiff might argue that she is prejudiced by injecting the defense after the close of discovery. But no facts suggest prejudice, and it is difficult to know what the prejudice might be. The defense is supported by testimony of Plaintiff and is based upon matters known to her all along. Moreover, Plaintiff’s counsel knew or should have known about this well-established affirmative defense. Finally, if Plaintiff requires more time for discovery, that is a matter that the court could address by granting more time (if the issue were raised) and is not itself a basis for denying leave to amend. In short, justice seems better served by allowing the amendment to ensure that the case is decided on its merits and not on the basis of Defendant’s failure to plead an affirmative defense in its original answer.

Point Two (50%)

The trial court erred in granting summary judgment. Plaintiff’s deposition answers, which were the basis of Defendant’s summary judgment motion, raise genuine issues of material fact sufficient to preclude entry of judgment as a matter of law.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56(a) allows a summary judgment motion to be granted only if “there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law [JML].” See Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322 (1986); Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 247–48 (1986). An issue of fact is “genuine” if, based on the evidence presented by the nonmoving party, a reasonable jury could return a verdict for that party. A fact is “material” if it is relevant to an element of a claim or defense and its existence would affect the outcome of the case under the governing law. Anderson, 477 U.S. at 248. In determining whether there is a genuine dispute as to material fact, the court should consider the “depositions, documents, electronically stored information, affidavits or declarations, stipulations (including those made for purposes of the motion only), admissions, interrogatory answers, or other materials.” FED. R. CIV. P. 56(c)(1)(A).

Here, Defendant has an affirmative defense to a claim of sex discrimination if Defendant can prove that no adverse job action was taken against Plaintiff, that Defendant exercised reasonable care to prevent and correct harassing behavior, and that the employee unreasonably failed to take advantage of protective or corrective opportunities. When, as here, a party moves for summary judgment on an issue on which it has the burden of persuasion at trial, it “must support its motion with credible evidence . . . that would entitle it to a directed verdict if not controverted at trial.” Celotex Corp., 477 U.S. at 331 (Brennan, J., dissenting). Defendant sought to establish facts supporting the elements of its affirmative defense by relying on Plaintiff’s deposition testimony. The issue is whether that testimony establishes that there is no “genuine issue as to any material fact” relating to Defendant’s affirmative defense and that, accordingly, Defendant should be granted judgment as a matter of law.

Plaintiff admitted that she suffered no adverse job action, that Defendant had policies against sexual harassment, and that procedures were available to her to complain about harassment. However, by itself this is not enough to warrant summary judgment, because Plaintiff’s testimony also raised genuine issues with respect to two facts that are essential to Defendant’s affirmative defense (as described in the facts of this question): whether Defendant exercised reasonable care to prevent and correct any sexually harassing behavior and whether Plaintiff unreasonably failed to take advantage of corrective opportunities provided by Defendant.

Although part of Plaintiff’s deposition testimony suggests that Defendant did make reasonable efforts to address harassment by providing procedures that Plaintiff did not use, Plaintiff also testified that Defendant made no independent effort to enforce its policies (relying on Plaintiff to report or on supervisors to monitor the situation). In considering this evidence, the court must draw those inferences “most favorable to the party opposing the motion” for summary judgment. United States v. Diebold, Inc., 369 U.S. 654, 655 (1962) (per curiam). A jury could reasonably find that this was not reasonable enforcement action for a workplace that had previously not had any women. Furthermore, Plaintiff testified that she was afraid to report the incidents for fear of retaliation. A jury might find her fear of retaliation to be a reasonable basis for her failure to use available procedures, given that the supervisor was himself one of the alleged harassers.

In short, it appears that there are genuine issues about the reasonableness of the employer’s actions to prevent harassment and the reasonableness of Plaintiff’s failure to report the behavior. Without a resolution of those factual issues, it is not clear whether Defendant’s affirmative defense is valid, and summary judgment should not have been granted.

CORPORATIONS AND LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES ANALYSIS (Corporations and Limited Liability Companies V.D.; VI.B.; IX.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Does Acme have fiduciary duties as majority voting member that would require it to have A-B LLC bring the concrete claim against Acme?
- (2) Can Brown bring the concrete claim against Acme?
- (3) Does Brown have sufficient grounds to seek the dissolution of A-B LLC?
- (4) Should A-B LLC's losses be borne by Acme and Brown and allocated between them in the same way as its profits?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Acme's lawyer is wrong in almost every respect. As the member of A-B LLC with management control, Acme has breached its fiduciary duties of loyalty and care by refusing to have the LLC bring the concrete claim. Brown can bring the concrete claim on behalf of the LLC against Acme as a derivative action, though not as a direct action against Acme. Brown may have sufficient grounds to seek judicial dissolution of A-B LLC, because Acme's failure to have the LLC bring the concrete claim likely constitutes oppression. Finally, under the rule of limited liability, the members and managers of an LLC generally are not liable for LLC losses. Thus, the A-B LLC losses arising from the judgment against the LLC are not borne by Acme or Brown, nor are they allocated between them.

[NOTE: The resolution of the issues in this problem would generally be the same in all jurisdictions. The following MEE jurisdictions have adopted the Uniform Limited Liability Company Act (ULLCA) (2006): the District of Columbia, Idaho, Iowa, Nebraska, and Utah.]

Point One (25%)

Acme owes A-B LLC and Brown fiduciary duties of loyalty and care. Refusing to have the LLC bring the concrete claim violates Acme's fiduciary duties because the refusal is self-interested and not in the LLC's best interests.

A-B LLC is a member-managed limited liability company (LLC). The operating agreement varies the statutory default to give Acme a 55% voting interest, which is permissible under ULLCA § 110. In exercising its management powers, Acme has fiduciary duties under ULLCA § 409 as a member in a member-managed LLC to both A-B LLC and Brown. These fiduciary duties include both a duty of loyalty and a duty of care.

The ULLCA does not specifically address whether the duty of loyalty precludes a majority member from refusing to have the LLC bring a surefire claim against the member. But the ULLCA provides that members have a duty of loyalty to “account to the company and to hold as trustee for [the company] any . . . benefit derived by the member . . . in the conduct . . . of the company’s activities.” ULLCA § 409(a)(1)(A). The benefit that Acme derives by virtue of A-B LLC not bringing a claim against Acme is an improper benefit, and thus keeping the benefit is a breach of Acme’s duty of loyalty.

The ULLCA provides that, subject to the business-judgment rule, the duty of care requires the member to “act with the care that a person in a like position would reasonably exercise under similar circumstances and in a manner the member reasonably believes to be in the best interests of the company.” ULLCA § 409(c). Because refusing to have the LLC bring the concrete claim against Acme is self-interested, the business-judgment rule is inapplicable. Under the facts given, Acme cannot reasonably believe that it is in A-B LLC’s best interest to not bring the surefire concrete claim against Acme.

Point Two (25%)

The claim based on the defective concrete sold by Acme to A-B LLC is a claim of the LLC as an entity, not of the LLC’s members. Thus, Brown can maintain a derivative action on behalf of A-B LLC, in which the LLC brings its concrete claim against Acme. But Brown cannot maintain a claim on Brown’s own behalf directly against Acme.

Brown, as a member of the LLC, may maintain a derivative action under ULLCA § 902 to enforce A-B LLC’s concrete claim against Acme. A derivative action in a member-managed LLC may be brought only if (1) a demand is made on the other member to bring an action and the member fails to do so, or (2) such demand would be futile. Here, Brown has made a demand on Acme and Acme has failed to have the LLC bring an action against Acme. Therefore, Brown may bring a derivative action against Acme.

Under ULLCA § 104, an LLC is an entity distinct from its members. The claim based on the faulty concrete is a claim of A-B LLC as an entity, not a claim of its constituent members. For this reason, Brown cannot advance the concrete claim on its own behalf. This is consistent with the direct action provision, ULLCA § 901, under which Brown would have to “plead and prove an actual or threatened injury that is not solely the result of an injury suffered or threatened to be suffered by the limited liability company.”

Point Three (25%)

Based on Acme’s unjustified refusal to advance the concrete claim, Brown may have grounds to seek judicial dissolution of A-B LLC.

Brown could apply to the court for an order of involuntary dissolution under ULLCA § 701(a)(5), alleging that Acme, as the member in control of the company, is acting in a manner that is oppressive and directly harmful to Brown.

The comment to ULLCA § 701 states that courts have begun to apply close corporation “oppression” doctrine to LLCs. Courts in the close corporation context have found oppression when actions by controlling shareholders violate the reasonable expectations of non-controlling shareholders. Thus, the question becomes whether Acme’s refusal to have the LLC bring a surefire claim against Acme violates Brown’s reasonable expectations. At a minimum, Brown had reasonable expectations that Acme would not violate its fiduciary duties (see Point One). In addition, Acme’s refusal to have the LLC bring the concrete claim violates Brown’s reasonable expectation that Acme would manage the LLC in the best interests of the LLC. Finally, Acme’s refusal directly harms Brown, because unless Acme makes good on the LLC losses, Brown will suffer reputational harm for being involved in a construction project where the customers lost all their money.

Point Four (25%)

Under the rule of limited liability, LLC members and managers are not liable beyond their investment in the LLC for losses incurred by the LLC. There are no facts to support piercing the LLC veil, nor did the homeowners bring direct claims against Acme or Brown.

Although allocation of losses among partners in a partnership follows the allocation of profits, no allocation rule applies in an LLC because of limited liability. Under the rule of limited liability, if the LLC becomes indebted, obligated, or otherwise liable to an outside party, no member or manager becomes liable on that debt, obligation, or liability solely by reason of acting as a member or manager. See ULLCA § 304(a)(2). Thus, if A-B LLC lacks the assets to satisfy the judgment awarded to the homeowners, there can be no liability of either Acme or Brown on this judgment—unless a court pierces the LLC veil or finds that one of the members had acted to create direct liability.

Under the facts, there is no indication of fraud or other inequitable conduct in the formation or operation of A-B LLC that would support a piercing claim against Acme or Brown. Although state courts have recognized piercing in the LLC context, there must exist some circumstances that would justify piercing on equitable grounds, such as undercapitalization of the business, failure to follow formalities, commingling of assets, confusion of business affairs, or deception of creditors. None of these factors exists here.

At most, the homeowners may have had a direct claim against Acme for supplying defective concrete, but the homeowners did not bring this claim against Acme. Nor is there any indication that Brown was responsible for losses caused by the defective concrete. Therefore, because no claims were brought against either Acme or Brown, there are no losses for which either of them is liable directly, and there is no basis for allocating losses between them. If A-B LLC lacks the assets to satisfy the judgment awarded against it, any shortfall will be a loss borne by the homeowners.

Legal Problems

- (1) Which state's laws govern the disposition of Zach's bank account, Zach's house, and Zach's farm?
- (2) Is Zach's will valid in (a) State A and (b) State B?
- (3) If Zach's will is invalid, which of Zach's children are entitled to a share of his assets in State A and State B?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The postmortem distribution of personal property is governed by the law of the state in which the decedent was domiciled at the time of his death. The postmortem distribution of real property is governed by the law of the situs. Thus, State A law controls the disposition of Zach's bank account and Zach's house, and State B law controls the disposition of Zach's farm. In State A, Zach's will is invalid because Zach did not sign it at the end. In State B, Zach's will is invalid because it was not signed by two witnesses. Thus, Zach died intestate in both states.

Under the laws of both State A and State B, Alex is entitled to a share of Zach's estate. In State A, Brian is entitled to a share if the word "children" in the State A statute is construed to include adopted children.

Although the State A intestate-distribution statute excludes nonmarital children, Carrie is nonetheless entitled to a share because intestate-distribution laws that exclude nonmarital children whose paternity has been established are unconstitutional.

Under State B law, Alex and Carrie are clearly entitled to shares of Zach's assets. Brian also is entitled to a share because the State B statute specifically includes adopted children.

Point One (30%)

Because the disposition of real property is governed by the law of the situs, State A law will govern the disposition of Zach's house and State B law will govern the disposition of Zach's farm. State A law also governs the distribution of the personal property, the bank account, because State A was the decedent's domicile at the time of his death.

The law of the state where the real property is located governs the disposition of real property. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONFLICT OF LAWS § 223(1). This approach reflects the situs state's interest in the regularity of titles and the interests of third parties who rely on local land records. See Baker v. General Motors Corp., 522 U.S. 222 (1998) (dictum); EUGENE F. SCOLES ET AL., CONFLICT OF LAWS (4th ed. 2004). Therefore the law of State A controls the disposition of the house and the law of State B controls the disposition of the farm. Each state's statutes must be consulted to determine the validity of Zach's will and, if the will is invalid, the rules governing intestate succession. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONFLICT OF LAWS § 236.

The law of the state in which the decedent was domiciled at his death governs the disposition of personal property. Because Zach was a domiciliary of State A, State A law governs the disposition of his bank account even though the account was maintained at a bank in State B.

[NOTE: Comments to the Second Restatement suggest that when the situs state (State B) has a statute recognizing the validity of a will properly executed in the state where the testator was domiciled, it may determine the validity of a landowner's will under the law in his state of domicile (State A). Most states have such will-validation statutes, but the facts provide that State B has no such law and instead expressly requires nonresidents to comply with its will-execution requirements. The question is designed, in part, to test the examinee's ability to read and apply a specific statute. Zach's will is invalid under State A law in any event. See Point Two.]

Point Two (30%)

Zach's will is invalid under the law of State A because Zach did not sign it at the end. The will also is invalid under the law of State B because it was not signed by two witnesses. Therefore, Zach died intestate under the laws of both states.

Although State A permits holographic (i.e., handwritten and unwitnessed) wills, State A law expressly requires the testator to have "signed" the holograph at the end. Zach's will is shown in its entirety in the facts; Zach did not sign it at the end. Therefore, the will is invalid under the laws of State A and Zach's bank account and his house in State A pass in accordance with State A's laws of intestate succession. See Point One.

State B validates signed holographic wills only if they have been signed by two witnesses, and Zach's will was not. Therefore Zach's farm passes in accordance with State B's laws of intestate succession.

Therefore, in both State A and State B, University, the beneficiary under the invalid will, takes nothing.

Point Three(a) (5%)

Alex is entitled to share in the house, the farm, and the bank account under the applicable laws of each state, as Alex is a biological child of Zach and was born in wedlock.

The intestacy laws of both State A and State B provide that the property of an intestate decedent passes to his surviving children. There is no possible argument, under either state's law, that a marital child like Alex would be excluded from the class of surviving children who take.

Point Three(b) (15%)

Brian takes a share of the house and the bank account under State A law if "children" includes adopted children; Brian takes a share of the farm under State B law because adopted children are treated the same as biological children.

Under State A law, an intestate's property passes to his "surviving children," excluding nonmarital children. The statute is silent on the status of adopted children.

At common law, only blood relations could inherit from an intestate decedent. See WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN, JR. & SHELDON F. KURTZ, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES 100 (3d ed. 2001). Although all states today grant adopted children inheritance rights in at least some circumstances, there is typically an explicit statutory command that achieves this result. See, e.g., UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-114. State A has no statutory provision expressly altering the common law. In the absence of such a statute, a court might conclude that had the legislature intended to give adopted children the same rights as biological children, it would have said so; alternatively, it might conclude, based on general nondiscrimination goals, that the legislature must have intended to give adopted children the same rights as biological children. See THOMAS E. ATKINSON, WILLS 87 (2d ed. 1953). There are cases going both ways on this issue. Id.

In State B, Brian clearly inherits because the statute says so.

[NOTE: The examinee's conclusion on this point is less important than his or her demonstrated ability to recognize the statutory ambiguity and formulate arguments in support of a position.]

Point Three(c) (20%)

Because State A's law disallowing inheritance by all nonmarital children does not meet constitutional standards, Carrie is entitled to take as a child of Zach.

Under the common law, a nonmarital child could not inherit from either parent. Today, all states grant nonmarital children the right to inherit from their mothers and to inherit from their fathers when at least one statutorily defined method of establishing paternity has been satisfied. See MCGOVERN & KURTZ, supra, at 93–94. The Supreme Court has held that a statute disallowing inheritance by a nonmarital child from her father when the father's paternity has been adjudicated during his lifetime is unconstitutional. See Trimble v. Gordon, 430 U.S. 762 (1977). See also Reed v. Campbell, 476 U.S. 852 (1986). Because Zach's paternity of Carrie was adjudicated during his lifetime, Carrie would be entitled to a share of Zach's estate despite the language of the State A statute. Carrie also takes under the laws of State B because she is Zach's biological child.

*Used as one of the six questions on the February 2013 Uniform Bar Examination in Alabama, Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, and Utah.

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2013 MEE. Each test includes nine 30-minute questions; user jurisdictions may elect which of the nine questions they wish to use. (Jurisdictions that administer the Uniform Bar Examination [UBE] use a common set of six MEE questions as part of their bar examinations.) In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law. The instructions for the test appear on page iii. For more information, see the MEE Information Booklet, available on the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Federal Civil Procedure question on the February 2013 MEE tested the following area from the Federal Civil Procedure outline: VI.E., Verdicts and judgments—Effect; claim and issue preclusion. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet.

The MEE consists of nine 30-minute essay questions, any of which a jurisdiction may select to include as part of its bar examination. (UBE jurisdictions use a common set of six MEE questions as part of their bar examinations.) It is administered by participating jurisdictions on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. The areas of law that may be covered by the questions on any MEE are Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts, Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Uniform Commercial Code (Negotiable Instruments and Bank Deposits and Collections; Secured Transactions). Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law. (UBE instructions: Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles rather than local case or statutory law.)

REAL PROPERTY QUESTION

In 2008, a landlord and a tenant entered into a 10-year written lease, commencing September 1, 2008, for the exclusive use of a commercial building at a monthly rent of $2,500. The lease contained a covenant of quiet enjoyment but no other covenants or promises on the part of the landlord.

When the landlord and tenant negotiated the lease, the tenant asked the landlord if the building had an air-conditioning system. The landlord answered, "Yes, it does." The tenant responded, "Great! I will be using the building to manufacture a product that will be irreparably damaged if the temperature during manufacture exceeds 81 degrees for more than six consecutive hours."

On April 15, 2012, the building's air-conditioning system malfunctioned, causing the building temperature to rise above 81 degrees for three hours. The tenant immediately telephoned the landlord about this malfunction. The tenant left a message in which he explained what had happened and asked the landlord, "What are you going to do about it?" The landlord did not respond to the tenant's message.

On May 15, 2012, the air-conditioning system again malfunctioned. This time, the malfunction caused the building temperature to rise above 81 degrees for six hours. The tenant telephoned the landlord and left a message describing the malfunction. As before, the landlord did not respond.

On August 24, 2012, the air-conditioning system malfunctioned again, causing the temperature to rise above 81 degrees for 10 hours. Again, the tenant promptly telephoned the landlord. The landlord answered the phone, and the tenant begged her to fix the system. The landlord refused. The tenant then attempted to fix the system himself, but he failed. As a result of the air-conditioning malfunction, products worth $150,000 were destroyed.

The next day, the tenant wrote the following letter to the landlord:

I've had enough. I told you about the air-conditioning problem twice before yesterday's disaster, and you failed to correct it. I will vacate the building by the end of the month and will bring you the keys when I leave.

The tenant vacated the building on August 31, 2012, and returned the keys to the landlord that day. At that time, there were six years remaining on the lease.

On September 1, 2012, the landlord returned the keys to the tenant with a note that said, "I repeat, the air-conditioning is not my problem. You have leased the building, and you should fix it." The tenant promptly sent the keys back to the landlord with a letter that said, "I have terminated the lease, and I will not be returning to the building or making further rent payments." After receiving the keys and letter, the landlord put the keys into her desk. To date, she has neither responded to the tenant's letter nor taken steps to lease the building to another tenant.

On November 1, 2012, two months after the tenant vacated the property, the landlord sued the tenant, claiming that she is entitled to the remaining unpaid rent ($180,000) from September 1 for the balance of the lease term (reduced to present value) or, if not that, then damages for the tenant's wrongful termination.

Is the landlord correct? Explain.

CONTRACTS QUESTION

On January 2, a boat builder and a sailor entered into a contract pursuant to which the builder was to sell to the sailor a boat to be specially manufactured for the sailor by the builder. The contract price was $100,000. The written contract, signed by both parties, stated that the builder would tender the boat to the sailor on December 15, at which time payment in full would be due.

On October 15, the builder's workers went on strike and there were no available replacements.

On October 31, the builder's workers were still on strike, and no work was being done on the boat. The sailor read a news report about the strike and immediately sent a letter to the builder stating, "I am very concerned that my boat will not be completed by December 15. I insist that you provide me with assurance that you will perform in accordance with the contract." The builder received the letter on the next day, November 1.

On November 25, the builder responded to the letter, stating, "I'm sorry about the strike, but it is really out of my hands. I hope we settle it soon so that we can get back to work."

Nothing further happened until December 3, when the builder called the sailor and said, "My workers are back, and I have two crews working overtime to finish your boat. Your boat is task one. Don't worry; we'll deliver your boat by December 15th." The sailor immediately replied, "I don't trust you. As far as I'm concerned, our contract is over. I am going to buy my boat from a shipyard." Two days later, the sailor entered into a contract with a competing manufacturer to buy a boat similar to the boat that was the subject of the contract with the builder.

The builder finished the boat on time and tendered it to the sailor on December 15. The sailor reminded the builder about the December 3 conversation in which the sailor had announced that "our contract is over," and refused to take the boat and pay for it.

The builder has sued the sailor for breach of contract.

1. What was the legal effect of the sailor's October 31 letter to the builder? Explain.
2. What was the legal effect of the builder's November 25 response to the sailor's October 31 letter? Explain.
3. What was the legal effect of the sailor's refusal to take and pay for the boat on December 15? Explain.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW QUESTION

AutoCo is a privately owned corporation that manufactures automobiles. Ten years ago, AutoCo purchased a five-square-mile parcel of unincorporated land in a remote region of the state and built a large automobile assembly plant on the land. To attract workers to the remote location of the plant, AutoCo built apartment buildings and houses on the land and leased them to its employees. AutoCo owns and operates a commercial district with shops and streets open to the general public. AutoCo named the area Oakwood and provides security, fire protection, and sanitation services for Oakwood's residents. AutoCo also built, operates, and fully funds the only school in the region, which it makes available free of charge to the children of its employees.

A family recently moved to Oakwood. The father and mother work in AutoCo's plant, rent an apartment from AutoCo, and have enrolled their 10-year-old son in Oakwood's school. Every morning, the students are required to recite the Pledge of Allegiance while standing and saluting an American flag. With the approval of his parents, the son has politely but insistently refused to recite the Pledge and salute the flag at the school on the grounds that doing so violates his own political beliefs and the political beliefs of his family. As a result of his refusal to say the Pledge, the son has been expelled from the school.

To protest the school's actions, the father walked into the commercial district of Oakwood. While standing on a street corner, he handed out leaflets that contained a short essay critical of the school's Pledge of Allegiance policy. Some of the passersby who took the leaflets dropped them to the ground. An AutoCo security guard saw the litter, told the father that Oakwood's anti-litter rule prohibits leaflet distribution that results in littering, and directed him to cease distribution of the leaflets and leave the commercial district. When the father did not leave and continued to distribute the leaflets, the security guard called the state police, which sent officers who arrested the father for trespass.

1. Did the son's expulsion from the school violate the First Amendment as applied through the Fourteenth Amendment? Explain.
2. Did the father's arrest violate the First Amendment as applied through the Fourteenth Amendment? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

On June 1, a bicycle retailer sold two bicycles to a man for a total purchase price of $1,500. The man made a $200 down payment and agreed to pay the balance in one year. The man also signed a security agreement that identified the bicycles as collateral for the unpaid purchase price and provided that the man “shall not sell or dispose of the collateral until the balance owed is paid in full.” The retailer never filed a financing statement reflecting this security interest.

The man had bought the bicycles for him and his girlfriend to use on vacation. However, shortly after he bought the bicycles, the man and his girlfriend broke up. The man has never used the bicycles.

On August 1, the man sold one of the bicycles at a garage sale to a buyer who paid the man $400 for the bicycle. The buyer bought the bicycle to ride for weekend recreation.

On October 1, the man gave the other bicycle to his friend as a birthday present. The friend began using the bicycle for morning exercise.

Neither the buyer nor the friend had any knowledge of the man’s dealings with the retailer.

1. Does the buyer own the bicycle free of the retailer’s security interest? Explain.
2. Does the friend own the bicycle free of the retailer’s security interest? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

Mother and Son, who are both adults, are citizens and residents of State A. Mother owned an expensive luxury car valued in excess of $100,000. Son borrowed Mother's car to drive to a store in State A. As Son approached a traffic light that had just turned yellow, he carefully braked and brought the car to a complete stop. Driver, who was following immediately behind him, failed to stop and rear-ended Mother's car, which was damaged beyond repair. Son was seriously injured. Driver is a citizen of State B.

Son sued Driver in the United States District Court for the District of State A, alleging that she was negligent in the operation of her vehicle. Son sought damages in excess of $75,000 for his personal injuries, exclusive of costs and interest. In her answer, Driver alleged that Son was contributorily negligent in the operation of Mother's car. She further alleged that the brake lights on Mother's car were burned out and that Mother's negligent failure to properly maintain the car was a contributing cause of the accident.

Following a trial on the merits in Son's case against Driver, the jury answered the following special interrogatories:

Do you find that Driver was negligent in the operation of her vehicle? Yes.

Do you find that Son was negligent in the operation of Mother's car? No.

Do you find that Mother negligently failed to ensure that the brake lights on her car were in proper working order? Yes.

The judge then entered a judgment in favor of Son against Driver. Driver did not appeal.

Two months later, Mother sued Driver in the United States District Court for the District of State A, alleging that Driver's negligence in the operation of her vehicle destroyed Mother's luxury car. Mother sought damages in excess of $75,000, exclusive of costs and interest.

State A follows the same preclusion principles that federal courts follow in federal-question cases.

1. Is Mother's claim against Driver barred by the judgment in Son v. Driver? Explain.
2. Does the jury's conclusion in Son v. Driver that Mother had negligently failed to maintain the brake lights on her car preclude Mother from litigating that issue in her subsequent suit against Driver? Explain.
3. Does the jury's conclusion in Son v. Driver that Driver was negligent preclude Driver from litigating that issue in the Mother v. Driver lawsuit? Explain.

AGENCY QUESTION

Over 5,000 individuals in the United States operate hot-air balloon businesses. A hot-air balloon has four key components: the balloon that holds the heated air, the basket that houses the riders, the propane burner that heats the air in the balloon, and the propane storage tanks.

The owner of a hot-air balloon business recently notified several basket and burner manufacturers that she or her agent might be contacting them to purchase baskets or burners. The owner did not specifically name any person as her agent. Basket and burner manufacturers regularly receive such notices from hot-air balloon operators. Such notices typically include no restrictions on the types of baskets or burners agents might purchase for their principals.

The owner then retained an agent to acquire baskets, burners, and fuel tanks from various manufacturers. The owner authorized the agent to buy only (a) baskets made of woven wicker (not aluminum), (b) burners that use a unique “whisper technology” (so as not to scare livestock when the balloon sails over farmland), and (c) propane fuel tanks.

The agent then entered into three transactions with manufacturers, all of whom had no prior dealings with either the owner or the agent.

(1) The agent and a large manufacturer of both wicker and aluminum baskets signed a contract for the purchase of four aluminum baskets for a total cost of $60,000. The agent never told the manufacturer that he represented the owner or any other principal. The contract listed the agent as the buyer and listed the owner’s address as the delivery address but did not indicate that the address was that of the owner rather than the agent. When the baskets were delivered to the owner, she learned for the first time that the agent had contracted to buy aluminum, not wicker, baskets. The owner immediately rejected the baskets and returned them to the manufacturer. Neither the owner nor the agent has paid the basket manufacturer for them.

(2) The agent contacted a burner manufacturer and told him that the agent represented a well-known hot-air balloon operator who wanted to purchase burners. The agent did not disclose the owner’s name. The agent and the burner manufacturer signed a contract for the purchase of four burners that did not have “whisper technology” for a total price of $70,000. The burner contract, like the basket contract, listed the owner’s address for delivery but did not disclose whose address it was. The burners were delivered to the owner’s business, and the owner discovered that the agent had ordered the wrong kind of burners. The owner rejected the burners and returned them to the manufacturer. Neither the owner nor the agent has paid the burner manufacturer for the burners.

(3) The agent contracted with a solar cell manufacturer to make three cells advertised as “strong enough to power all your ballooning needs.” The agent did not tell the manufacturer that he was acting on behalf of any other person. One week after the cells were delivered to the agent, he took them to the owner, who installed them and discovered that she could save a lot of money using solar cells instead of propane to power her balloons. The owner decided to keep the solar cells, but she has not paid the manufacturer for them.

Assume that the rejection of the baskets and the burners and the failure to pay for the solar cells constitute breach of the relevant contracts.

1. Is the owner liable to the basket manufacturer for breach of the contract for the aluminum baskets? Is the agent liable? Explain.
2. Is the owner liable to the burner manufacturer for breach of the contract for the burners? Is the agent liable? Explain.
3. Is the owner liable to the solar cell manufacturer for breach of the contract for the solar cells? Is the agent liable? Explain. (Do not address liability based upon restitution or unjust enrichment.)

EVIDENCE QUESTION

A woman who owns a motorized scooter brought her scooter to a mechanic for routine maintenance service. As part of the maintenance service, the mechanic inspected the braking system on the scooter. As soon as the mechanic finished inspecting and servicing the scooter, he sent the woman a text message to her cell phone that read, “Just finished your service. When you pick up your scooter, you need to schedule a follow-up brake repair. We’ll order the parts.”

The woman read the mechanic’s text message and returned the next day to pick up her scooter. As the woman was wheeling her scooter out of the shop, she saw the mechanic working nearby and asked, “Is my scooter safe to ride for a while?” The mechanic responded by giving her a thumbs-up. The woman waved and rode away on the scooter.

One week later, while the woman was riding her scooter, a pedestrian stepped off the curb into a crosswalk and the woman collided with him, causing the pedestrian severe injuries. The woman had not had the scooter’s brakes repaired before the accident.

The pedestrian has sued the woman for damages for his injuries resulting from the accident. The pedestrian has alleged that (1) the woman lost control of the scooter due to its defective brakes, (2) the woman knew that the brakes needed repair, and (3) it was negligent for the woman to ride the scooter knowing that its brakes needed to be repaired.

The woman claims that the brakes on the scooter worked perfectly and that the accident happened because the pedestrian stepped into the crosswalk without looking and the woman had no time to stop. The woman, the pedestrian, and the mechanic will testify at the upcoming trial.

The pedestrian has proffered an authenticated copy of the mechanic’s text message to the woman.

The woman plans to testify that she asked the mechanic, “Is my scooter safe to ride for a while?” and that he gave her a thumbs-up in response.

The evidence rules in this jurisdiction are identical to the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Analyze whether each of these items of evidence is relevant and admissible at trial:

1. The authenticated copy of the mechanic’s text message;
2. The woman’s testimony that she asked the mechanic, “Is my scooter safe to ride for a while?”; and
3. The woman’s testimony describing the mechanic’s thumbs-up.

TRUSTS AND FUTURE INTERESTS QUESTION

Ten years ago, Settlor validly created an inter vivos trust and named Bank as trustee. The trust instrument provided that Settlor would receive all of the trust income during her lifetime. The trust instrument further provided that Upon Settlor's death, the trust income shall be paid, in equal shares, to Settlor's surviving children for their lives. Upon the death of the last surviving child, the trust income shall be paid, in equal shares, to Settlor's then-living grandchildren for their lives. Upon the death of the survivor of Settlor's children and grandchildren, the trust corpus shall be distributed, in equal shares, to Settlor's then-living great-grandchildren.

The trust instrument expressly specified that the trust was revocable, but it was silent regarding whether Settlor could amend the trust instrument.

Immediately after creating the trust, Settlor validly executed a will leaving her entire estate to Bank, as trustee of her inter vivos trust, to "hold in accordance with the terms of the trust."

Five years ago, Settlor signed an amendment to the inter vivos trust. The amendment changed the disposition of the remainder interest, specifying that all trust assets "shall be paid upon Settlor's death to University." Settlor's signature on this amendment was not witnessed.

A state statute provides that any trust interest that violates the common law Rule Against Perpetuities "is nonetheless valid if the nonvested interest in the trust actually vests or fails to vest either (a) within 21 years of lives in being at the creation of the nonvested interest or (b) within 90 years of its creation."

Recently, Settlor died, leaving a probate estate of $200,000. She was survived by no children, one granddaughter (who would be Settlor's only heir), and no great-grandchildren. The granddaughter has consulted your law firm and has raised four questions regarding this trust:

1. Was Settlor's amendment of the inter vivos trust valid? Explain.
2. Assuming that the trust amendment was valid, do its provisions apply to Settlor's probate assets? Explain.
3. Assuming that the trust amendment was valid, how should trust assets be distributed? Explain.
4. Assuming that the trust amendment was invalid, how should trust assets be distributed? Explain.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS QUESTION

A chef entered into a contract with a repairman pursuant to which the repairman agreed to repair the chef's commercial oven for $10,000. The repairman agreed to accept as payment a negotiable promissory note for $10,000 payable two months after its issuance.

After the repairman worked on the oven, the chef gave him a $10,000 note as payment for the work. As agreed, the note was signed by the chef as maker, was payable to the order of the repairman, was payable in two months, and fulfilled all criteria for negotiability.

The next day, the repairman sold the note to a buyer for $9,500. To effectuate the sale, the repairman wrote "no warranties" on the back of the note, signed his name immediately below that, and handed the note to the buyer. The buyer bought the note in good faith and without knowledge of any facts relating to the work that the repairman had performed for the chef.

Later, the buyer gave the note to his niece as a gift. To effectuate the gift, the buyer handed the note to the niece but did not indorse it.

Shortly thereafter, the chef discovered that the repair work had been done improperly and the oven still did not function correctly. The chef tried repeatedly to get the repairman to return to correct the repair work, but the repairman ignored all the chef's calls.

On the note's due date, the niece contacted the chef and demanded that he pay the amount of the note to her. The chef refused and told the niece that he would not pay the note because the repairman did not properly repair the oven.

1. What are the niece's rights against the chef? Explain.
2. What are the niece's rights against the repairman? Explain.
3. What are the niece's rights against the buyer? Explain.

Legal Problems

- (1) Does the tenant have a defense to the landlord's action for unpaid rent based on constructive eviction?
- (2) Does the tenant have a defense to the landlord's action for unpaid rent based on the tenant's surrender of the premises?
- (3) What, if anything, may the landlord recover from the tenant for the period after the tenant vacated the building?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under the common law, the tenant does not have a defense to the landlord's action for unpaid rent based on constructive eviction. Constructive eviction is based on the tenant proving that (1) the landlord breached a duty to the tenant, (2) the breach caused a loss by the tenant of the substantial use and enjoyment of the premises, (3) the tenant gave the landlord adequate notice and opportunity to repair, and (4) the tenant vacated the leased premises. Here, there was no constructive eviction because, although the tenant vacated and gave the landlord adequate notice, the landlord breached no express or implied duty to the tenant to repair the premises.

The tenant does not have a defense based on the landlord's acceptance of his surrender of the premises; a landlord's retention of keys does not constitute an acceptance of the tenant's surrender unless the landlord so intended, and here, the landlord's statements to the tenant at the time of the surrender of the keys do not evidence the intent to accept the tenant's surrender.

Under the common law, a landlord has no duty to mitigate damages but also cannot sue for rents due in the future. Under this approach, the landlord can sue only for past-due rents. Using this approach, on November 1, the landlord could recover all the rent past due (i.e., rent for September and October) but could not recover for rents due in the future. However, some courts have authorized recovery for future rent minus the fair market rental value of the premises. It is thus possible that the landlord could recover damages equal to the amount of rent due from September 1 to the end of the six-year lease term ($180,000) minus the property's fair-market rental value over that same period.

Point One (45%)

The tenant was not constructively evicted, because the landlord had no duty to repair the commercial premises that were the subject of the lease.

The landlord and the tenant entered into a term-of-years lease because the lease specified both a beginning and an ending date. HERBERT HOVENKAMP & SHELDON F. KURTZ, THE LAW OF PROPERTY 256 (5th ed. 2001). Although a term-of-years lease normally cannot be terminated by the tenant prior to the end of the term, a tenant may terminate a term-of-years lease if the tenant is constructively evicted. See id. at 286–88. Typically, as here, a claim of constructive eviction is made as a defense to a landlord’s action for damages or unpaid rent.

In order to establish a constructive eviction, the tenant must prove that the landlord breached a duty to the tenant, such as a duty to repair, and that the landlord’s breach caused a loss of the substantial use and enjoyment of the premises. The tenant must also show that he gave the landlord notice adequate to permit the landlord to meet his duty to the tenant and that the tenant vacated the leased premises. Id.; see also JOHN G. SPRANKLING, UNDERSTANDING PROPERTY LAW § 17.04 (2d ed. 2007).

Under the common law, there was no implied duty on the part of a landlord to repair leased premises; such a duty arose only if expressly set forth in the lease. SPRANKLING, supra, § 17.02[B]. Here, the written lease contained no term requiring the landlord to repair the air-conditioning. Even if the conversation created a lease term that the building had air-conditioning, that itself should not create a duty for the landlord to repair it.

Over the past several decades, courts have generally implied a duty to repair in residential leases either as part of a revised constructive eviction doctrine or based on an implied warranty of habitability. JOSEPH W. SINGER, PROPERTY 469–70 (3d ed. 2010). This shift has been justified based on the economic disparity between the typical landlord and tenant as well as the fact that residential tenants generally lack both the authority to authorize repairs to common areas of a building and the incentive to make repairs that will ultimately benefit the landlord.

However, courts have been more reluctant to imply a duty to repair in commercial leases, a context in which the tenant is often a valuable business and in a better position to assess and make repairs than is the landlord. But see, e.g., Davidow v. Inwood North Professional Group, 747 S.W.2d 373 (Tex. 1988). When courts have implied a duty to repair in a commercial lease, it is typically when the repair has been mandated by public authorities and involves work so substantial that it would not ordinarily fall within the tenant’s common law repair duty and/or the value of the repair would primarily inure to the landlord’s reversionary interest. See Brown v. Green, 884 P.2d 55 (Cal. 1994); Eugene L. Grant et al., The Tenant as Terminator: Constructive Eviction in Modern Commercial Leases, 2 THE COMMERCIAL PROPERTY LEASE ch. 15 (ABA 1997). Some courts have also permitted constructive eviction claims by commercial tenants of office buildings based on repairs required in common areas of the building. See id.; Echo Consulting Services, Inc. v. North Conway Bank, 669 A.2d 227 (N.H. 1995).

Here, the tenant is the owner of a valuable manufacturing operation and is the exclusive occupant of the building, the repair has not been mandated by public authorities, and the repair is not structural. To the contrary, the repair involves a feature of the building of unusual importance in the tenant’s manufacturing operation, and the tenant is likely far more knowledgeable than the landlord about the air-conditioning specifications necessary for the manufacture of the tenant’s product.

Based on these facts, it is unlikely that a court will find that the tenant in this case was constructively evicted. Although the tenant can show that he gave adequate notice to the landlord of the air-conditioning malfunction and vacated the premises, the lease was commercial, and it did not contain any promises or covenants by the landlord except a covenant of quiet enjoyment; a covenant of quiet enjoyment does not entail any repair obligations.

[NOTE: An examinee’s conclusion is less important than his or her demonstrated awareness of the elements of constructive eviction and the need to imply a repair duty for such a defense to be viable here. Although the implied warranty of habitability is not available to this tenant, Texas, Minnesota, and Massachusetts imply a warranty of suitability in commercial leases in limited circumstances, and an examinee might argue that this warranty should apply here. If an examinee concludes that this warranty applies, he or she should discuss the other requirements for constructive eviction.

If the examinee wrongly concludes that the first element for a constructive eviction has been met, the examinee will then have to discuss the remaining three elements in order to conclude that the tenant can claim constructive eviction. The tenant would have a strong argument that the second element—substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of the premises—also is met. As indicated above, the landlord was aware that a functioning air-conditioning system was vital to the tenant’s manufacturing operations. The facts further indicate that the system had failed three times in the past few months. The landlord may try to argue that the malfunctions did not substantially interfere with the tenant’s use of the premises because the malfunctions caused the temperature to climb above 81 degrees for only a short period of time—3 hours, 6 hours, and 10 hours, respectively—on each occasion. The tenant will argue, however, that the landlord was aware that the tenant’s manufacturing operations could tolerate temperatures above 81 degrees for no more than 6 hours. The final malfunction exceeded that limit, destroying $150,000 worth of the tenant’s products.

The tenant would also have a strong argument that the third element is met: notice and opportunity to cure. The tenant notified the landlord of the problem immediately upon the system’s first malfunction and did so again when it malfunctioned a second time and then a third time. The landlord might argue that there was insufficient time to cure the problem because the system corrected itself within a few hours on the first and second times. Although the malfunction lasted more than 10 hours the third time, the landlord might argue that the time period was insufficient to get a repair person on the premises. A court would be likely to find this argument unpersuasive, however, because the landlord could have attempted to correct the problem after the first and second malfunctions.

Assuming that the landlord was given sufficient notice and opportunity to cure, a court would be likely to conclude that the tenant also satisfied the final element of vacating the premises within a reasonable time. The landlord might argue that the tenant remained in the premises for almost four months after the air conditioning first failed, which would suggest that the problem was not so severe as to have constructively evicted the tenant. The tenant will argue, however, that he gave the landlord three months to cure the problem after the first two malfunctions threatened (but did not actually harm) his operations. The tenant then moved out shortly after the final malfunction caused temperatures to exceed the tolerance levels of his manufacturing operations.]

The landlord did not accept the tenant’s surrender of the lease.

When a tenant wrongfully moves from leased premises with the intent to terminate the lease, the landlord may either accept the tenant’s surrender of the premises and terminate the lease or hold the tenant to the terms of the lease. See HOVENKAMP & KURTZ, supra, at 295–96. Here, the tenant’s only basis for the claim that the landlord accepted his surrender is the landlord’s retention of the keys. Many courts have considered whether a landlord’s retention of keys delivered by a tenant constitutes acceptance of surrender. The weight of the case law holds that retention of the keys alone does not constitute acceptance of surrender without other evidence showing that the landlord intended to accept the surrender. See generally, 49 AM. JUR. 2d, Landlord and Tenant § 213.

Here, the landlord’s note, saying “I repeat, the air-conditioning is not my problem. You have leased the building, and you should fix it,” strongly suggests that the landlord did not intend to accept the tenant's surrender. The tenant might argue that the landlord's failure to make a similar statement when the keys were sent to her a second time and she retained them evidences a change of heart. However, it is likely that a court would find that the landlord's retention of the keys represented a decision to safeguard the keys, not to accept the tenant's surrender.

[NOTE: An examinee should receive credit for arguing the other way with a well-reasoned argument.]

Point Three (45%)

Under the common law, the landlord had no duty to mitigate damages. Additionally, a landlord was not entitled to recover unpaid rents due in the future but was only entitled to recover rents in arrears at the time of the commencement of the suit. Applying the common law here, the landlord could recover $5,000, the amount of rents due at the commencement of the suit ($2,500 for September and the same for October). Today, some courts allow the landlord, under certain circumstances, to sue the tenant for damages (not rent) equal to the difference, if any, between the unpaid promised rent for the balance of the term (here $175,000) and the property's fair rental value for the balance of the term.

Under the common law, because a lease was viewed as a conveyance instead of a contract, a landlord had no duty to mitigate damages resulting from a tenant's wrongful termination of a lease. A landlord could thus recover the full value of rents that were due and unpaid at the time of the suit. However, under the common law, a landlord could not sue a tenant for rents due in the future because there was always a possibility that the tenant might pay the rent when it was due. See SINGER, supra at 462. Thus, using the common law approach, on November 1, the landlord could only recover the full value of the two months' rent actually due and unpaid, i.e., $5,000 for September and October.

Some courts have rejected the no-mitigation-of-damages rule based on efficiency concerns and society's interest in assuring that resources remain in the stream of commerce rather than lying vacant, see id. at 464–65, and allow landlords to sue tenants who have wrongfully terminated a lease for damages equal to the difference between the unpaid rent due under the lease and the property's fair market rental value. Other courts have abandoned the no-recovery-for-future-rent rule. These courts, responding to the fact that a tenant may well disappear or be judgment-proof by the time a lease term is concluded, have allowed a landlord to collect damages equal to the value of rent over the entire lease term minus the property's fair rental value when a tenant has wrongfully terminated a lease and unequivocally shown an intention not to return to the premises or pay future rent. Under this approach, a landlord receives approximately the same amount he would have received were there a duty to mitigate damages. See Sagamore Corp. v. Willcutt, 180 A. 464 (Conn. 1935).

Here, because the tenant returned the keys to the landlord and said, "I will not be returning to the building or making further rent payments," the landlord could establish abandonment and an intention not to return. It is thus possible that the landlord might recover damages in the amount of $5,000 (for the months of September and October) plus the present value of $175,000 minus the fair market rental value of the property over the remaining months of the lease.

Legal Problems

- (1) What was the legal effect of the sailor's October 31 letter to the builder?
- (2)(a) What was the legal effect of the builder's November 25 response to the sailor's October 31 letter?
- (2)(b) What was the legal effect of the sailor's refusal to take and pay for the boat on December 15?

DISCUSSION

Summary

This is a sale of goods governed by the Uniform Commercial Code. Because the sailor had reasonable grounds for insecurity about the builder's ability to deliver the boat in a timely manner when the sailor learned about the strike on October 31, the sailor was legally justified in sending the letter to the builder seeking adequate assurance of the builder's performance pursuant to the contract. The builder's failure to provide such assurance within a reasonable time operated as a repudiation of the contract. However, the builder was free to retract the repudiation before the sailor either cancelled the contract or materially changed position in reliance on the builder's repudiation. The builder retracted the repudiation when he informed the sailor that the workers were back and that the boat would be delivered by the date stipulated in the parties' contract. Because the sailor had taken no action in response to the original repudiation, he no longer had the right to cancel the contract with the builder. The sailor's subsequent statement that "our contract is over" may have constituted repudiation by the sailor. In any event, when the sailor failed to perform on December 15, that constituted breach.

Point One (35%)

Because the sailor had reasonable grounds for insecurity with respect to the builder's performance, the sailor's letter to the builder was a justified demand seeking assurance of the builder's performance under the contract; failure of the builder to provide such assurance within a reasonable time constituted repudiation of the contract.

The sailor was legally justified in sending the letter to the builder on October 31. Contract parties are entitled to expect due performance of contractual obligations and are permitted to take steps to protect that expectation. UCC § 2-609 states that "[w]hen reasonable grounds for insecurity arise with respect to the performance of either party, the other may in writing demand adequate assurance of due performance" Here, the sailor learned on October 31 that the builder's workers were on strike. This gave the sailor reasonable grounds for insecurity about the builder's ability to complete performance on time and thus gave the sailor the right to seek adequate assurance from the builder. Because the sailor's demand for assurance was justified, the builder was required to provide assurance that was adequate under the circumstances within a reasonable time (not to exceed 30 days) or be held to have repudiated the contract. UCC § 2-609(4).

Point Two(a) (30%)

The builder did not, within a reasonable time, provide the sailor adequate assurance of due performance; this failure to provide assurance constituted a repudiation of the contract.

Because the sailor, with legal justification (see Point One), demanded from the builder assurance of due performance, the builder's failure to provide such assurance within a reasonable time was a repudiation of their contract. See UCC § 2-609(4) ("After receipt of a justified demand[,] failure to provide within a reasonable time not exceeding thirty days . . . assurance of due performance . . . is a repudiation of the contract."). On October 31, the sailor requested that the builder provide adequate assurance regarding the completion of the boat by December 15. The builder did not respond to the sailor's letter until November 25—nearly a month later. Even if that response had been given in a reasonable time, it nonetheless did not provide assurance of due performance. It simply stated, "I'm sorry about the strike, but it is really out of my hands. I hope we settle it soon so that we can get back to work." Therefore, the builder's November 25 response did not provide adequate assurance in response to the sailor's justified request. Thus, the builder had repudiated the contract.

Point Two(b) (35%)

Although the builder repudiated the contract with the sailor, the builder probably retracted that repudiation on December 3 and the sailor was no longer entitled to cancel their contract. Thus, the sailor's failure to perform the sailor's obligations under the contract constituted a breach.

The builder's failure to provide adequate assurance of performance constituted a repudiation of their contract (see UCC § 2-609(4)), but the builder was free to retract that repudiation until the sailor cancelled the contract or materially changed his position or indicated by communication or action that the sailor considered the repudiation to be final. See UCC § 2-611(1) ("Until the repudiating party's next performance is due, he can retract his repudiation unless the aggrieved party has since the repudiation cancelled or materially changed his position or otherwise indicated that he considers the repudiation final.").

Here, the facts state that before the builder's December 3 telephone call to the sailor, the sailor did nothing in response to the builder's repudiation, such as contracting with a third party for a boat. The builder's December 3 call, informing the sailor that the boat would be timely delivered, probably constituted a retraction of the repudiation because it clearly indicated to the sailor that the builder would be able to perform. UCC § 2-611(2). Thus, after being so informed, the sailor did not have the right to treat their contract as cancelled. UCC § 2-611(3). Accordingly, the sailor's failure to perform the sailor's obligations under the contract by taking the boat and paying for it constituted a breach of the contract.

Legal Problems

- (1) Does AutoCo's operation of a "company town" result in its actions counting as those of the state for purposes of constitutional analysis?
- (2) Does the expulsion of a schoolchild for failure to recite the Pledge of Allegiance violate the First Amendment as applied through the Fourteenth Amendment?
- (3) Does the arrest of a pamphleteer in connection with violation of an anti-littering rule, where the littering is done by the recipients of leaflets distributed by the pamphleteer, violate the First Amendment as applied through the Fourteenth Amendment?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The First Amendment, as applied through the Fourteenth Amendment, applies only to state action. It does not typically govern private actors. However, courts have found state action where the private actor has exercised a "public function," such as running a privately owned "company town," as AutoCo has done here. Thus, First Amendment protections apply. By requiring the son to participate in a mandatory Pledge of Allegiance ceremony, AutoCo has compelled the expression of political belief in violation of the First Amendment as applied through the Fourteenth Amendment. The father's arrest in connection with breaching the anti-litter rule also violated the First Amendment as applied through the Fourteenth Amendment. Although state actors can regulate the incidental effects of speech on the public streets on a content-neutral basis, this power is limited and cannot extend to punishing a distributor of literature because of littering by third parties.

Point One (30%)

AutoCo's operation of a company town (including a school) makes it a state actor under the public function strand of the state action doctrine.

The individual rights protections of the Constitution apply only where there is "state action"—either direct action by the government or some action by a private party that is fairly attributable to the government. As a general rule, the actions of a private company like AutoCo or of a private school like the school operated by AutoCo would not constitute state action, and the protections of the Constitution (in this case the First Amendment) would not apply.

However, there are situations in which the actions of a private actor are attributed to the state. One such situation is when the private actor undertakes a public function. There are not many bright-line rules in the Supreme Court's state action doctrine, but one of them is this: Where a private actor undertakes a "public function," the Constitution applies to those actions. Where a corporation operates a privately owned "company town" that provides essential services typically provided by a state actor, the public function doctrine applies and the Constitution binds agents of the town as if they were agents of the government. See, e.g., Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946). Here, AutoCo does more than own the town; it provides security services, fire protection, sanitation services, and a school. Thus the actions of AutoCo constitute state action and are governed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

Point Two (35%)

The son's expulsion for failure to recite the Pledge of Allegiance violates the First Amendment as applied through the Fourteenth Amendment as a compelled expression of political belief.

As explained in Point One, the First Amendment applies to the school as a state actor.

Although children in public schools (and in schools subject to the First Amendment like the Oakwood school) have some First Amendment rights, Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503, 506 (1969), schools have greater leeway to regulate the speech of students and teachers than the state would have outside the school context. Hazelwood School Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988); Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393 (2007). However, the Supreme Court has long held that public schools may not force their students to participate in a flag salute ceremony when it offends the political or religious beliefs of the students or their families. West Virginia Board of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943) (invalidating a mandatory public school flag salute ceremony); see also Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977) (invalidating compelled expression of political belief on state-issued license plates).

In this case, the school requires its students to participate in a flag salute and Pledge of Allegiance ceremony and punishes them when they refuse to participate. Pursuant to this policy, the school has expelled the son. This expulsion violates the First Amendment ban on compelled expression.

Point Three (35%)

Because the father was distributing leaflets in a traditional public forum, his trespass arrest violated the First Amendment as applied through the Fourteenth Amendment.

As explained in Point One, AutoCo is treated as a state actor. Thus, Oakwood's commercial district is treated as government-owned property for purposes of the First Amendment. Thus, the leafleting here is subject to the First Amendment because it is an expressive activity. Schneider v. State of New Jersey, Town of Irvington, 308 U.S. 147 (1939). When expression takes place on government-owned property, government regulation of the expression is assessed under the public forum doctrine. Public streets and sidewalks have long been held to be the classic example of a "traditional public forum" open to the public for expression. Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496, 515–16 (1939). Because the father was distributing leaflets while standing on a street corner in the commercial district, his expressive activity occurred in a traditional public forum.

When a state tries to regulate expressive activity in a traditional public forum, it is prohibited from doing so based on the expressive activity's content unless its regulation is narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling governmental interest ("strict scrutiny"). In this case, however, AutoCo is regulating the father's expressive activity on the ostensibly neutral ground that his expressive activity has produced litter and made the street unsightly. When a state tries to regulate expressive activity without regard to its content, intermediate scrutiny applies. Under intermediate scrutiny, the true purpose of the regulation may not be the suppression of ideas (if so, then strict scrutiny applies), the regulation must be narrowly tailored to achieve a significant governmental interest, and it must leave open ample alternative channels for expressive activity. Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 791 (1989).

Here, the application of the ordinance to the father will fail for two reasons. First, the Supreme Court has held that the government's interest in keeping the streets clean is insufficient to ban leafleting in the public streets, as the government power to regulate with incidental effects on public sidewalk speech is very limited. See, e.g., Schneider, 308 U.S. at 162 (leafleting/littering). Second, the regulation (a blanket ban on distribution that results in littering) is not narrowly tailored to protect expression. A narrowly tailored alternative would be prosecution only of people who litter. Moreover, the effect of the littering rule is likely to be a ban on all leafleting, thus eliminating an entire class of means of expression. This raises the possibility that there are not "ample alternative channels of communication" open to the father as required under the Court's standard of review for content-neutral regulation of speech.

[NOTE: Some examinees might argue that this is a "time, place, and manner" restriction, and that AutoCo might have greater latitude to regulate the public sidewalks under this theory. This argument is incorrect for two reasons. First, the Supreme Court has held that the power to regulate speakers through littering laws is very limited, for the reasons given and in the cases cited above. But more generally, a "time, place, and manner" restriction involves the shifting of speech from one time and place to another or to another manner; here, there is no shifting, but a direct punishment for expressive activity (albeit one couched in content-neutral terms). In addition, some examinees might read the ordinance to be, in effect, a total ban on leafleting, since most leafleting will produce some litter. Those examinees might note that the Court has required total bans on an entire mode of expression to satisfy strict scrutiny and analyze the father's prosecution here accordingly. See United States v. Grace, 461 U.S. 171, 177 (1983) (invalidating ban on display of signs on public sidewalks surrounding U.S. Supreme Court; "[a]dditional restrictions such as an absolute prohibition on a particular type of expression will be upheld only if narrowly drawn to accomplish a compelling governmental interest").]

- (1) Is a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods perfected even though there has been no filing of a financing statement?
- (2) Does a person who buys consumer goods for personal use take those goods free of a prior perfected purchase-money security interest in the goods?
- (3) Does a person who receives consumer goods as a gift take those goods subject to a prior perfected security interest in them?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The retailer's security interest in the bicycles was perfected, even though no financing statement was filed, because it was a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods. A purchase-money security interest in consumer goods is automatically perfected upon attachment.

The buyer is not subject to the retailer's security interest in the bicycle that the buyer bought from the man. Because the bicycle was consumer goods in the hands of the man, and the retailer never filed a financing statement covering the bicycle, the retailer's security interest is not effective against someone, like the buyer, who bought the bicycle for value, without knowledge of the retailer's security interest, and for personal use.

On the other hand, the retailer's security interest continues in the bicycle given to the friend, because the friend did not give value for the bicycle or buy it in the ordinary course of business.

Point One (35%)

The retailer's security interest in the bicycles attached on June 1. Because this interest was a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods, it was automatically perfected when it attached.

The retailer's security interest in the bicycles attached on June 1 when the man bought the bicycles (acquiring rights in the collateral), signed a security agreement containing a description of the collateral, and received value from the retailer (by being given credit with which to purchase the bicycles). UCC § 9-203(a) & (b).

Despite the retailer's failure to file a financing statement, its security interest was perfected. Pursuant to UCC § 9-309(1), a security interest is automatically perfected upon attachment if the goods are "consumer goods" and the security interest is a "purchase-money security interest."

In this case, the bicycles sold by the retailer to the man were consumer goods at the time of sale. The bicycles were "goods" because they were "movable when a security interest attaches.” UCC § 9-102(a)(44). They were also consumer goods because they were “bought for use primarily for personal, family, or household purposes.” UCC § 9-102(a)(23).

The retailer’s security interest in these consumer goods was also a “purchase-money security interest.” A purchase-money security interest is an interest that secures a debt that was incurred in order to “enable the debtor to acquire rights in or the use of the collateral.” UCC § 9-103(a), (b)(1). Here, the man incurred an obligation to the retailer to purchase the bicycles, so the security interest he gave the retailer to secure that obligation was a purchase-money security interest.

Because the retailer’s security interest was a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods, it was automatically perfected on June 1, when the interest attached to the bicycles.

Point Two (35%)

The buyer took the bicycle free of the retailer’s security interest because (i) the retailer did not file a financing statement covering the bicycle, (ii) the bicycle was “consumer goods,” and (iii) the buyer bought the bicycle for value, without knowledge of the retailer’s security interest, and for personal use.

A security interest continues in collateral, even after a sale or other disposition of that collateral, unless the creditor authorized the disposition “free of the security interest” or another Article 9 exception applies. UCC §§ 9-201(a) and 9-315(a)(1).

However, a buyer of goods, like the buyer here, can take free of a prior security interest in those goods under certain circumstances. See UCC §§ 9-317(b) (buyers who give value and receive delivery of goods without knowledge of an unperfected security interest in the goods) and 9-320(a) & (b) (buyer in ordinary course of business; buyer of consumer goods in a consumer-to-consumer transaction who gives value). In this case, the retailer’s security interest was perfected when the buyer purchased the bicycle, so UCC § 9-317(b) does not protect the buyer. The buyer also is not a protected “buyer in ordinary course of business” because he did not purchase from a person who is in the business of selling bicycles. See UCC § 1-201(b)(9).

The buyer can, however, qualify for the protection of UCC § 9-320(b). That section provides that a buyer of goods from a person who used them for personal, family, or household purposes takes free of a perfected security interest in the goods if (1) the buyer had no knowledge of the security interest, (2) the buyer gave value for the goods, (3) the buyer purchased the goods primarily for personal, family, or household purposes, and (4) the purchase occurred before the filing of a financing statement covering the goods.

The buyer met all of these criteria. The man used the bicycle for personal purposes. The buyer purchased the bicycle from the man, and the buyer had no knowledge of the retailer’s security interest. The buyer gave value ($400) for the bicycle, and he bought it “primarily for personal, family, or household purposes,” as he planned to use it for recreation, which is a personal rather than a business use. Finally, no financing statement had been filed. Therefore, under UCC § 9-320(b), the buyer took free of the retailer’s security interest.

Point Three (30%)

The retailer’s security interest continues in the bicycle that the man gave to the friend. Thus, the retailer can recover the bicycle from the friend because the friend did not give value for the bicycle or buy it in the ordinary course of business.

Secured Transactions Analysis

As noted in Point Two, the retailer did not authorize the man to dispose of the bicycle. Consequently, the retailer's security interest continued in the bicycle even after the man transferred ownership of the bicycle to the friend. See UCC §§ 9-201(a) and 9-315(a)(1). The retailer's security interest in the bicycle will be effective against the friend unless some other provision of Article 9 allows the friend to take the bicycle free of that security interest.

Unfortunately for the friend, there is no Article 9 provision that allows him to take free of the retailer's interest. The friend's basic problem is that he is not a buyer of the bicycle—he received the bicycle as a gift and did not give value for it. Thus, the friend is not protected by any of the applicable exceptions. See UCC §§ 9-317(b) (protecting buyers who give value for goods subject to an unperfected security interest), 9-320(a) (protecting buyers in ordinary course of business), and 9-320(b) (protecting buyers of consumer goods who give value).

In short, the retailer's security interest continues in the bicycle that the man gave to the friend. The friend took the bicycle subject to that security interest.

Legal Problems

- (1) Does a judgment in a prior action preclude a nonparty from suing the same defendant on a closely related claim when the nonparty and the original plaintiff are in a family relationship?
- (2) Does a judgment rendered in an earlier action preclude a nonparty from litigating an issue that was actually decided in the first suit?
- (3) May a nonparty to an earlier action invoke the judgment in that action to preclude a party to the prior action from relitigating an issue that the party had a full and fair opportunity to litigate in the earlier action?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Pursuant to the doctrines of claim preclusion (res judicata) and issue preclusion (collateral estoppel), a judgment is binding on the parties thereto. In the absence of privity, nonparties to a prior suit cannot be bound by a judgment rendered in their absence. Thus, in the absence of privity, a nonparty to the first suit is not precluded from presenting her claim in a second suit even if it is factually related to the claims and defenses presented in the first suit; nor is she bound by determinations of issues made in the first suit. A family relationship, without more, does not support a finding of privity. For this reason, Mother, as a nonparty, is not bound by the judgment in the Son-Driver action. She may bring her separate claim for damage to her car, and she is not precluded from litigating the question of whether she was negligent in the maintenance of her car.

Driver, on the other hand, could be precluded from relitigating the issue of her negligence pursuant to the doctrine of non-mutual issue preclusion (also called non-mutual offensive collateral estoppel), which allows a nonparty to a prior action to invoke issue preclusion to prevent a party to that prior action from relitigating determinations of issues made therein. However, Mother may be prevented from invoking non-mutual collateral estoppel in this case because she could easily have joined her claim in the prior action but did not do so.

[NOTE: Federal common law governs the preclusive effect of a judgment rendered by a federal court sitting in diversity. See Semtek Int'l, Inc. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 531 U.S. 497, 508 (2001). But the Semtek Court concluded that federal common law, in this context, incorporates the preclusion law of the state in which the rendering federal court sits (unless the state law is incompatible with federal interests), id. at 508–09. Thus, State A's preclusion law determines the preclusive effect of the judgment rendered in Son's suit against Driver. The problem says that State A preclusion law is identical to federal preclusion law, so the following analysis utilizes general principles of preclusion drawn from Supreme Court case law (announcing federal preclusion rules) and the Restatement (Second) of Judgments.]

Point One (35%)

Under the doctrine of claim preclusion, the judgment rendered in the first action does not preclude Mother, a nonparty, from suing Driver for the damage to her car because the judgment binds only parties or those in privity with them, and Mother and Son are not in privity.

Driver may contend that the doctrine of claim preclusion (res judicata) precludes Mother from presenting a claim arising from the same nucleus of facts that was presented in the first action brought by Son. According to the doctrine of claim preclusion, “when a court of competent jurisdiction has entered a final judgment on the merits of a cause of action, the parties to the suit and their privies are thereafter bound ‘not only as to every matter which was offered and received to sustain or defeat the claim or demand, but as to any other admissible matter which might have been offered for that purpose.’” Commissioner of Internal Revenue v. Sunnen, 333 U.S. 591, 597 (1948) (citation omitted).

However, the doctrine of claim preclusion does not apply to Mother on the facts of this problem. First, Mother was not a party to the earlier case. “It is a principle of general application in Anglo-American jurisprudence that one is not bound by a judgment in personam in a litigation in which he is not designated as a party or to which he has not been made a party by service of process.” Taylor v. Sturgell, 553 U.S. 880, 884 (2008) (citing Hansberry v. Lee, 311 U.S. 32, 40 (1940)); see also RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF JUDGMENTS § 34(3) (1982). This rule reflects our “deep-rooted historic tradition that everyone should have his own day in court.” Martin v. Wilks, 490 U.S. 755, 762 (1989) (citation omitted) (superseded by statute on other grounds). Since Mother was not a party to the first suit, she is not bound by the judgment unless an exception to the general rule applies.

Mother might be bound by the prior judgment if she were considered to have been sufficiently in privity with Son that Son represented her interests in that action. “A person who is not a party to an action but who is represented by a party is bound by and entitled to the benefits of a judgment as though he were a party.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF JUDGMENTS § 41(1). But there is no suggestion in the facts of the problem that Son, who is an adult, purported to represent Mother’s interests in the first suit. “[C]lose family relationships are not sufficient by themselves to establish privity with the original suit’s party, or to bind a nonparty to that suit by the judgment entered therein” Cuauhtli v. Chase Home Finance LLC, 308 Fed. Appx. 772, 773 (5th Cir. 2009) (citation omitted); accord 18A CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT ET AL., FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 4459 (2d ed. 2002).

In Taylor v. Sturgell, supra, the Supreme Court identified other special circumstances in which nonparties may be bound by a prior judgment—when a nonparty consents to be bound; when a nonparty is in a pre-existing substantive legal relationship with a party (such as preceding and succeeding property owners); when a nonparty assumed control of the prior litigation; when a party seeks to relitigate through a proxy; or where a special statutory scheme seeks to foreclose successive litigation by nonparties. See Taylor, 553 U.S. at 893–95. None of these circumstances exists here.

Because Mother was not a party to the first suit and is not in privity with Son, who is an adult, the judgment in the first action does not preclude her from bringing her own claim against Driver.

Point Two (35%)

Under the doctrine of issue preclusion, the judgment rendered in the first action does not preclude Mother, a nonparty, from litigating the issue of her negligence in maintaining her car’s brake lights because the judgment binds only parties or those in privity with them, and Mother and Son are not in privity.

By its affirmative response to a special interrogatory, the jury in the first action expressly concluded that “Mother negligently failed to ensure that the brake lights on her car were in proper working order.” Driver may attempt to invoke the doctrine of issue preclusion to preclude Mother from relitigating this issue in the second action.

[I]ssue preclusion arises in a second action on the basis of a prior decision when the same ‘issue’ is involved in both actions; the issue was ‘actually litigated’ in the first action, after a full and fair opportunity for litigation; the issue was ‘actually decided’ in the first action, by a disposition that is sufficiently ‘final,’ ‘on the merits,’ and ‘valid’; it was necessary to decide the issue in disposing of the first action, and . . . the later litigation is between the same parties or involves nonparties that are subject to the binding effect or benefit of the first action Once these requirements are met, issue preclusion is available not only to defend against a demand for relief, but also as offensive support for a demand for relief. Issue preclusion, moreover, is available whether or not the second action involves a new claim or cause of action.

18 CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT ET AL., FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 4416 at 392–93 (2d ed.); see also RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF JUDGMENTS § 27 (1982).

Here, several of the elements necessary for issue preclusion are present. The same issue is involved in both actions—the issue of Mother’s negligence in failing to maintain the brake lights on her car. That issue was actually litigated in the first action and decided by the jury. There is nothing to suggest anything less than a full and fair opportunity to litigate. The judgment disposing of the issue was final.

Nevertheless, the judgment will not preclude Mother from relitigating the issue for two reasons. First, Mother was not a party to the first action and, as explained above, Mother and Son are not in privity. Therefore, she cannot be denied an opportunity to litigate the issue of her negligence. Second, it does not appear that the jury’s decision as to Mother’s negligence was necessary to the prior judgment against Driver. Nothing suggests that the finding on Mother’s negligence had any bearing on the outcome of the first action.

Point Three (30%)

Under the doctrine of non-mutual issue preclusion, the judgment rendered in the first action might preclude Driver from relitigating the issue of her negligence. However, Driver has a strong argument that such a result would be inconsistent with the policy against offensive use of non-mutual estoppel when the non-party plaintiff easily could have joined as a plaintiff in the first action.

Because Son already convinced the jury in the first action that “Driver was negligent in the operation of her vehicle,” Mother may wish to invoke the doctrine of non-mutual issue preclusion to prevent Driver from relitigating the question of her negligence. As noted above, “issue preclusion arises in a second action on the basis of a prior decision when the same ‘issue’ is involved in both actions; the issue was ‘actually litigated’ in the first action, after a full and fair opportunity for litigation; the issue was ‘actually decided’ in the first action, by a disposition that is sufficiently ‘final,’ ‘on the merits,’ and ‘valid’; it was necessary to decide the issue in disposing of the first action” 18 CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT ET AL., FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 4416 at 392 (2d ed.); see also RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF JUDGMENTS § 27.

Here, these basic requirements for issue preclusion are met. First, the same issue is involved in both suits: whether Driver was negligent in the operation of her car. Second, this issue was actually litigated and decided in the first action; the jury answered a special interrogatory raising this very question. There is nothing to suggest that Driver lacked a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue. Since a judgment was rendered against Driver for the injuries Son sustained as a result of Driver's negligence, resolution of the issue was necessary to dispose of the first action. Driver was a party to the first action, so she may be bound by the judgment.

[NOTE: Traditionally, issue preclusion required mutuality—both the party asserting issue preclusion and the party against whom issue preclusion was asserted were bound by the prior judgment. Under the traditional mutuality rule, Mother could not assert issue preclusion against Driver because Mother would not be bound by the judgment if Driver sought to rely on it. See Point One. There is no mutuality between Mother and Driver with respect to the prior judgment.

This traditional mutuality requirement has been abandoned in most jurisdictions. The Supreme Court rejected a strict mutuality requirement in Blonder-Tongue Laboratories, Inc. v. University of Illinois Foundation, 402 U.S. 313 (1971) (non-mutual defensive collateral estoppel used by a defendant to preclude a plaintiff from relitigating a claim the plaintiff previously litigated), and Parklane Hosiery Co. v. Shore, 439 U.S. 322 (1979) (non-mutual offensive collateral estoppel used by a plaintiff to preclude a defendant from relitigating a claim the defendant previously litigated). In Parklane Hosiery, the Court concluded (as a matter of federal preclusion law) that trial courts should have “broad discretion” to determine whether or not to permit a plaintiff to invoke non-mutual issue preclusion. “The general rule should be that in cases where a plaintiff could easily have joined in the earlier action or where . . . the application of offensive estoppel would be unfair to a defendant, a trial judge should not allow the use of offensive collateral estoppel.” Id. at 331.

The Parklane Hosiery decision identified a number of circumstances that might make it unfair to allow a plaintiff to invoke non-mutual issue preclusion (non-mutual offensive collateral estoppel in the traditional terminology) against a defendant. In particular, the Parklane Hosiery court suggested that issue preclusion may not be appropriate if the plaintiff in the second action “could easily have joined in the earlier action.” Id. Prohibiting plaintiffs from using non-mutual estoppel under such circumstances would promote judicial efficiency by encouraging plaintiffs to join the prior action. It would also discourage plaintiffs from staying out of prior litigation in order to secure, in effect, two bites at the apple: using the prior litigation offensively if the defendant loses and forcing the defendant to litigate a second time if the defendant wins the prior action.

An exceptional exam answer might therefore argue that non-mutual issue preclusion should be denied on these facts. Son and Mother both reside in State A; since they are related, they know each other well, and Son was driving Mother's car when the accident occurred. They could have sued together, and Rule 20 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure would have authorized joinder of their claims because those claims arose from the same transaction or occurrence and raised a common question of law or fact. FED. R. CIV. P. 20(a). The facts do not suggest that Mother had any reason not to join Son's suit other than a desire to see how Son's action concluded before bringing her own claim. Cf. Nations v. Sun Oil Co. (Del.), 695 F.2d 933, 938 (5th Cir. 1983) (concluding that plaintiff “was entitled to await the development of his injuries and their predictable consequences”). Because it appears that Mother may be a “wait-and-see” plaintiff who could easily have joined the original action, a trial court might disallow, as a matter of discretion, her use of non-mutual issue preclusion.]

Legal Problems

- (1) Is the principal or the agent, or both, liable on contracts with a third party when the principal is an “undisclosed principal”?
- (2) Is the principal or the agent, or both, liable on contracts with a third party when the principal is “partially disclosed” or an “unidentified principal”?
- (3) Is the principal or the agent, or both, liable on contracts with a third party for the purchase of goods when the agent exceeded his authority but the principal nonetheless accepts the goods?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The agent, but not the owner, is liable to the basket manufacturer because the owner is an undisclosed principal and the agent acted without actual or apparent authority. Both the agent and the owner, however, are liable on the burner contract because the owner is an unidentified principal and the agent had apparent authority to enter into that contract. With respect to the solar cells contract, whether the owner is liable depends upon whether a court would follow the Second or Third Restatement of Agency, which take different positions on the effect of the ratification of a contract by an undisclosed principal. Under either, the agent would also be liable on the contract, as he was a party to the contract.

[NOTE: The contracts that are the subject of this question are contracts for the sale of goods and, therefore, are governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. Article 2, however, does not contain agency rules. Accordingly, common law concepts of agency are applicable. UCC § 1-103(b).]

Point One (35%)

The agent, but not the owner, is liable to the basket manufacturer. The agent had no actual authority to enter into the contract to buy aluminum baskets, and because the owner was an undisclosed principal, the manufacturer had no reason to believe that the agent had apparent authority. Furthermore, the manufacturer had no reason to believe that the agent was not contracting for his own benefit.

An agent acting on behalf of a principal can bind the principal to contracts if the agent has either actual or apparent authority. An agent has actual authority when contracting on behalf of his principal if he “reasonably believes, in accordance with the principal’s manifestations to the agent, that the principal wishes the agent so to act.” RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 2.01 (2006). Here, the agent was told to buy only wicker baskets, not aluminum baskets. Thus, when he contracted with the basket manufacturer to buy aluminum baskets, he had no actual authority to do so.

Agency Analysis

An agent acts with apparent authority “when a third party [with whom the agent acts] reasonably believes the actor has authority to act on behalf of the principal and that belief is traceable to the principal’s manifestations.” Id. § 2.03. Here the owner notified basket manufacturers that she or her agent might contact them to purchase baskets, but that notification did not specifically name the agent or any other person as the owner’s agent. Furthermore, the basket manufacturer had no prior dealings with the agent or the owner or any reason to think that the agent was acting for the benefit of anyone but himself. Thus, there is no basis to conclude that the basket manufacturer thought that the agent had apparent authority to act for the owner.

Generally, when an agent acts on behalf of an undisclosed principal and the agent lacks authority to enter into the contract, the agent is liable on the contract as a party to the contract, but the principal is not liable. This rule is consistent with the third party’s expectations. “The third party expected the agent to be a party to the contract because the agent presented the deal as if he were acting for himself. Moreover, if the third party is unaware of the principal’s existence, the third party must be relying on the agent’s solvency and reliability when entering into the contract.” See ROBERT W. HAMILTON, JONATHAN R. MACEY & DOUGLAS K. MOLL, CORPORATIONS, INCLUDING PARTNERSHIPS AND LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES 34 (11th ed. 2010). See also RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 6.03, cmt. c. Furthermore, because the third party has no idea that the agent is acting or is seemingly acting on behalf of another, there is no reason to believe that the third party would be expecting an undisclosed principal to be liable on the contract. Id.

Point Two (35%)

Because the owner is an unidentified (as opposed to undisclosed) principal, both she and the agent (as a party to the contract) probably are liable on the contract with the burner manufacturer.

When the agent contracted with the burner manufacturer, he did not have actual authority to do so, as the owner had expressly restricted the agent’s authority to purchase only burners with “whisper technology.” See Point One. However, the agent may have had apparent authority to buy burners without whisper technology.

An agent acts with apparent authority “when a third party [with whom the agent acts] reasonably believes the actor has authority to act on behalf of the principal and that belief is traceable to the principal’s manifestations.” RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 2.03 (2006). The owner indicated that an agent might contact the burner manufacturer. The notice contained no restriction regarding the type of burners that the agent was authorized to purchase. The facts indicate that burner manufacturers regularly receive such notices.

Although the agent told the burner manufacturer that he represented a well-known hot-air balloon operator, he did not disclose the owner’s name. Thus, the owner was a partially disclosed or unidentified principal. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 4(2) (1958) (using term “partially disclosed principal”); RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 1.04(2)(c) (2006) (using term “unidentified principal”). An agent for a partially disclosed principal may have apparent authority. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 159 cmt. e (1958). Based upon (1) the notice sent by the owner, (2) the agent’s revelation that he was acting as an agent, and (3) the fact that burner manufacturers regularly receive such notices and sell to agents, the manufacturer may argue that it reasonably and actually believed that the agent was authorized to purchase burners without whisper technology. The manufacturer may also argue that because the agent revealed that he was an agent, his listing of the owner’s address as the delivery address connects the agent to the notice given by the owner. Arguably this distinguishes the burner contract from the basket contract. Here, there is a strong case to support the conclusion that the agent had apparent authority; if he did, then the owner is liable to the burner manufacturer.

The agent also is liable as a party to the contract because he did not fully disclose his agency relationship. Although he told the burner manufacturer that he represented a well-known hot-air balloon operator, he did not disclose the owner's name. Generally even an authorized agent of a partially disclosed or unidentified principal is liable as a party to a contract with a third person. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 321 (1958) ("unless otherwise agreed"); RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 6.02(2) (2006) ("unless the agent and the third party agree otherwise").

Point Three (30%)

Under the Second Restatement of Agency, the owner is not liable on the contract for solar cells because the agent did not have actual or apparent authority and the owner, as an undisclosed principal, cannot ratify the contract. Under the Third Restatement, the owner could be liable, as she ratified the contract. Under either Restatement, the agent is liable as a party to the contract.

The owner is not liable to the solar cell manufacturer for breach of the contract for the solar cells because the agent had no actual or apparent authority to purchase solar cells on the owner's behalf, and the owner, under the Second Restatement of Agency, did not ratify the contract with knowledge of the material facts. Thus, she is not liable as a ratifier of the contract.

The facts state that the agent had authority to purchase only propane fuel tanks. In addition, he had no apparent authority to purchase solar cells. The owner made no manifestations to the solar cell manufacturer that would lead a reasonable person in the manufacturer's position to believe that the agent had the authority to bind the owner to a contract to purchase solar cells. In fact, the agent made no manifestations at all to the solar cell manufacturer. Unlike with the basket manufacturer and the burner manufacturer, the owner did not notify the manufacturer of solar cells that an agent might contact it to purchase solar cells. In addition, the solar cells were delivered to the agent and not to the owner's address. In sum, the manufacturer was unaware of any relationship between the owner and the agent. As to the solar cell manufacturer, the owner is an undisclosed principal. There can be no apparent authority in the case of an undisclosed principal because there are no manifestations from the principal to the third person. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 8 cmt. a (1958) ("there can be no apparent authority created by an undisclosed principal"); RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 2.03 cmt. f (2006) ("apparent authority is not present when a third party believes that an interaction is with an actor who is a principal").

The owner also did not ratify the contract. Although the owner used the solar cells, generally a principal cannot ratify an unauthorized transaction with a third person "unless the one acting purported to be acting for the ratifier." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 85(1) (1958).

The result differs under the Third Restatement, which expressly rejects the Second Restatement on this issue. The Restatement (Third) of Agency § 4.03 (2006) states, "A person may ratify an act if the actor acted or purported to act as an agent on the person's behalf." According to comment b, "an undisclosed principal may ratify an agent's unauthorized act." Under the Restatement (Third) of Agency rule, the owner probably ratified the transaction. The agent clearly acted on the owner's behalf, and in addition, the owner's conduct in using the solar cells "justifies a reasonable assumption that [she] is manifesting assent that the act shall affect [her] legal relations." See id. § 4.01(2).

Agency Analysis

The agent also is liable to the solar cell manufacturer for breach of the contract for the solar cells because he is a party to the contract. The facts indicate that the agent never told the solar cell manufacturer that he represented the owner or any other principal. Consequently, even if the agent were authorized (which, as discussed above, he is not), he would be liable as a party to the contract. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 322 (1958); RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 6.03(2) (2006). Here, he has no authority or apparent authority and is liable as a party to the contract.

The agent would also be liable under the Third Restatement. Under Restatement (Third) of Agency § 4.02(1) (2006), ratification generally relates back and the transaction is treated as if it were authorized at the time of the transaction. However, this does not relieve the agent of an undisclosed principal who ratifies an unauthorized transaction of liability under the ratified contract. See id. § 6.03(2) (authorized agent for undisclosed principal is a party to the contract) and § 4.03 cmt. b (“An undisclosed principal’s ratification does not eliminate the agent’s liability to the third party on the transaction . . .”).

[NOTE: An examinee may discuss the concept of inherent agency power. This concept is recognized by the Restatement (Second) of Agency § 8 A (1958), but the concept is not used in the Restatement (Third) of Agency (2006). Here, there are no facts to support that the agent had inherent authority.

As to contracts with agents for partially disclosed principals (e.g., the contract for the burners), the basic question is whether the acts done “usually accompany or are incidental to transactions which the agent is authorized to conduct.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 161 (1958). If so, the principal is bound if the other party “reasonably believes that the agent is authorized to do them and has no notice that he is not so authorized.” Id. The purchase of burners without whisper technology was not authorized, nor was it incidental to an authorized transaction. Therefore, there should not be inherent agency power.

As to contracts on behalf of undisclosed principals (e.g., the other two contracts), the basic question is whether the acts done are usual or necessary in the transactions the agent is authorized to transact. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 194 (1958). The other two contracts seem fundamentally different from the authorized transactions. Therefore, there should not be inherent agency power.

Only minimal credit should be given for discussion of inherent agency power.]

Legal Problems

- (1) Is the authenticated copy of the mechanic's text message relevant and admissible?
- (2) Is the woman's question, "Is my scooter safe to drive for a while?" relevant and admissible?
- (3) Is the woman's testimony describing the mechanic's thumbs-up relevant and admissible?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The mechanic's text message to the woman is relevant to whether (1) the woman lost control of the scooter due to its defective brakes, (2) the woman knew that the brakes needed repair, and (3) it was negligent for the woman to drive the scooter knowing that its brakes needed repair.

The mechanic's text message is hearsay if it is offered by the pedestrian to prove that the scooter's brakes needed repair. However, it fits the hearsay exception for present sense impressions and probably also fits the exception for business records. The mechanic's text message is not hearsay if it is instead offered by the pedestrian to prove the woman's state of mind (i.e., that she had notice that her brakes needed repair).

The woman's question to the mechanic and his response are also relevant to whether the brakes caused the accident and whether the woman was negligent. The question is not hearsay because the woman did not make an assertion.

The mechanic's thumbs-up response is nonverbal conduct intended by the mechanic as an assertion and is therefore an out-of-court statement. If the woman offers the mechanic's statement to prove that the scooter was actually safe to ride, the woman's testimony about the statement is hearsay.

However, the mechanic's statement is not hearsay if it is offered by the woman to prove her state of mind. Therefore, the woman's question and the mechanic's response are admissible to prove the woman's state of mind.

Point One(a) (20%)

The mechanic's text message to the woman should be admitted because it is relevant.

Evidence is relevant if it has "any tendency to make a fact more or less probable than it would be without the evidence." FED. R. EVID. 401. "Relevant evidence is admissible," unless it is inadmissible pursuant to some other rule. FED. R. EVID. 402.

The mechanic's text message to the woman, "When you pick up your scooter, you need to schedule a follow-up brake repair. We'll order the parts," is relevant for two reasons. First, this evidence has some tendency to make it more probable that the brakes malfunctioned and caused the accident. Second, it has some tendency to make it more probable that the woman was negligent in riding her scooter after being told by the mechanic that it required further repair.

Point One(b) (30%)

The mechanic's text message fits either the hearsay exception for present sense impressions or the exception for business records, or it is admissible non-hearsay.

The mechanic's text message is a statement under Rule 801(a) because it is "a written assertion." FED. R. EVID. 801(a). The text message is hearsay if the pedestrian offers it to prove the "truth of the matter asserted in the statement" (i.e., that the scooter's brakes required repair), which resulted in the woman losing control of the scooter and causing the accident. FED. R. EVID. 801(c).

However, the mechanic's text message fits the hearsay exception for "present sense impressions" under Rule 803(1) because it is "[a] statement describing or explaining an event or condition made while or immediately after the declarant perceived it." FED. R. EVID. 803(1). Here, the mechanic's text message described the condition of the scooter immediately after he perceived it during the maintenance service.

The mechanic is a person with knowledge of the condition of the scooter, so if text messages regarding repairs were made and kept by the mechanic in the ordinary course of business, this text message also fits the business records exception. Under Rule 803(6), a business record is a record of an act "made at or near the time by . . . someone with knowledge" and "the record was kept in the course of a regularly conducted activity of a business" and "making the record was a regular practice of that activity." FED. R. EVID. 803(6).

However, the text message is not hearsay if it is instead offered to prove that the woman was negligent because she rode her scooter after the mechanic told her it required repair. If offered for this purpose, it would not be offered for the truth of the matter asserted in the statement, but to show the woman's belief about the condition of the scooter (her state of mind).

Point Two (10%)

The woman's question to the mechanic should be admitted because it is not hearsay.

The woman's question to the mechanic is relevant because, along with the mechanic's thumbs-up response (see Point Three), it has some tendency to make it more probable that the woman was not negligent and/or that the scooter brakes did not malfunction and cause the accident. FED. R. EVID. 401. The woman's question does not raise hearsay concerns because it is not an assertion.

Hearsay is defined under Rule 801(a) as "an oral assertion, written assertion, or nonverbal conduct." Although "assertion" is not further defined, "a favorite [definition] of writers in the [evidence] field for at least a century and a half [is that] the word simply means to say that something is so, e.g., that an event happened or a condition existed." 2 MCCORMICK ON EVIDENCE § 246 (6th ed. 2006). Under this definition, the woman's question is not hearsay because it is not an assertion.

The mechanic's thumbs-up to the woman is a nonverbal assertion that is relevant, and the woman's testimony about that response is admissible.

Hearsay is defined under Rule 801(c) as a “statement,” that is, “a person’s oral assertion, written assertion, or nonverbal conduct, if the person intended it as an assertion.” FED. R. EVID. 801(a). Here, when the mechanic responded to the woman’s question (“Is my scooter safe to ride for a while?”) with a thumbs-up gesture, the facts suggest that he intended his nonverbal conduct as an assertion that, in his opinion, the scooter was safe to ride.

The mechanic’s assertion is relevant and admissible to prove that the woman was not negligent because the evidence makes it more probable that, at the time of the accident, she believed that the scooter was safe to ride, despite the fact that the brakes required repair. FED. R. EVID. 401. Admission of the woman’s description of the mechanic’s thumbs-up for this purpose does not raise hearsay concerns because the evidence would not be offered for the truth of the matter asserted, but to show the woman’s belief about the condition of the scooter (her state of mind).

Point Three(b) (20%)

The mechanic’s thumbs-up is relevant to determine whether the scooter’s brakes malfunctioned, causing the accident, but if offered for this purpose it is also hearsay.

The mechanic’s nonverbal assertion is relevant to the determination of whether the scooter’s brakes malfunctioned, causing the accident. However, if offered to prove the “truth of the matter asserted in the statement” (i.e., that the scooter was safe to ride for a while), it is hearsay that does not fit any hearsay exception.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1)(a) Was the revocable trust amendable?
- (1)(b) If the trust was amendable, must the amendment have been executed in accordance with the state Statute of Wills in order to be valid?
- (2) If the trust amendment was valid, does the amendment apply to the probate estate assets passing to the trust pursuant to Settlor's will?
- (3) If the trust amendment was valid, should the trust property be distributed to University?
- (4) If the trust amendment was not valid, should the trust property be distributed to Settlor's grandchild (her only heir) or held in further trust in accordance with the terms of the original trust instrument?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A revocable trust is amendable even if the trust instrument does not expressly grant to the trust settlor a power to amend. Both inter vivos trusts and amendments thereto are valid even though not executed in accordance with the requirements applicable to wills.

Under the Uniform Testamentary Additions to Trusts Act, a revocable trust may be amended at any time prior to the settlor's death, and the amendment applies to the disposition of assets conveyed to the trust pursuant to a will even if the will was executed prior to the date of the amendment.

At Settlor's death, trust assets, including probate assets passing to the trust under Settlor's will, would go to University if, as is the case here, the trust amendment was valid. If the amendment was invalid, the trust assets would continue to be held in further trust because there is no violation of the common law Rule Against Perpetuities.

Point One(a) (30%)

Settlor retained the right to amend the inter vivos trust despite her failure to expressly reserve this power.

At issue here is whether a retained power of revocation includes the power to amend, sometimes referred to as the power to modify. The Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 331 cmt. g provides that if a settlor has a power to revoke, that retained power ordinarily includes a power to modify (amend) as well. Comment g also notes that the power to amend includes both a power to withdraw trust assets and a power to "modify the terms of the trust." The Uniform Trust Code, which provides that a power to revoke includes the power to amend, is consistent with this view.

UNIF. TRUST CODE § 602; accord RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 63 cmt. The theory is that even though a power to amend was not expressly retained by a settlor, the goal of amendment, assuming the power was not included in the power to revoke, could easily be achieved by first revoking the trust and then creating a new trust with the same terms contemplated by the amendment. To require this would put form over substance.

Thus, by expressly retaining the power to revoke the trust, Settlor retained a power to amend the inter vivos trust despite her failure to expressly reserve this power.

[NOTE: Under the common law, a trust is irrevocable unless the settlor expressly retains a power to revoke the trust. Conversely, under the Uniform Trust Code, a trust is revocable unless the terms of the trust expressly provide otherwise. See UNIF. TRUST CODE § 602. The Trust Code's position on revocation follows the minority view in the United States and is inconsistent with prior Restatements of Trusts (see Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 330). Here, the trust is revocable because Settlor expressly retained a power of revocation.

The Uniform Trust Code has been adopted in 24 jurisdictions: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, District of Columbia, Florida, Kansas, Maine, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wyoming.]

Settlor's amendment of the trust was valid despite her failure to have her signature to the trust amendment witnessed.

Neither the common law nor state statutes require a trust instrument or an amendment to a trust instrument to be executed in accordance with the formalities prescribed for execution of a will. Indeed, an inter vivos trust that does not involve real estate can be created orally. Under the Uniform Trust Code, the only requirements for creating a valid inter vivos trust are intent, the specification of beneficiaries, and the designation of a trustee. See UNIF. TRUST CODE § 402; accord RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 13.

Here, the amendment meets the requirements of both the Uniform Trust Code and the common law. Thus, the fact that Settlor's signature was not witnessed when she signed the amendment to the trust does not make the amendment invalid.

Point Two (20%)

Under the Uniform Testamentary Additions to Trusts Act, a revocable trust may be amended at any time prior to the settlor's death, and the amendment applies to probate assets poured into the trust at the settlor's death pursuant to the settlor's will even when the will was executed prior to the date of the amendment.

Historically, property owned by an individual at her death passed to the individual's heirs or to beneficiaries designated in a will executed with the formalities (writing, signing, witnessing) prescribed by state law. However, when a will devises property to the trustee of an inter vivos trust, then the provisions of the trust—which may not have been executed in accordance with the formalities required for wills—effectively determine who will receive the property. Because of this possibility, some early cases held that if an inter vivos trust was not executed with the same formalities required for a valid will, then the trust was ineffective to dispose of probate assets poured into the trust at the settlor's death pursuant to the settlor's will.

This line of cases has been overturned by the Uniform Testamentary Additions to Trusts Act (the Act), now Uniform Probate Code § 2-511. Under the Act, adopted in almost all jurisdictions, a testamentary bequest to the trustee of an inter vivos trust established by the testator during his or her lifetime is valid if the trust is in writing, it is identified in the testator's will, and the trust instrument was executed before, concurrently with, or after the execution of the will. Id. The Act further specifies that such a bequest is valid even if the trust is amendable or revocable and that a later amendment applies to assets passing to the trust by a previously executed will.

Thus, because the trust amendment is valid, its terms apply to assets received by Bank from Settlor's estate.

Point Three (10%)

If the trust amendment was valid, then the trust assets, including assets passing to the trust under Settlor's will, should go to University.

Under the trust amendment, all trust assets (including the assets of Settlor's probate estate poured into the trust) pass to University. The facts provide no basis for failing to comply with Settlor's stated intentions.

Point Four (30%)

If the trust amendment was invalid, trust assets, including assets received pursuant to Settlor's will, should be held in accordance with the terms of the original trust instrument because those terms do not violate the Rule Against Perpetuities.

Under the dispositive terms of the original trust instrument, Settlor created successive income interests in her surviving children and grandchildren with a remainder interest in her great-grandchildren. Because the trust was revocable, the period during which the common law Rule Against Perpetuities requires that interests vest (i.e., 21 years plus lives in being) began to run from the date Settlor no longer had a power of revocation (here, her death), not the date on which the trust was created. See JESSE DUKEMINIER, STANLEY J. JOHANSON, JAMES LINDGREN & ROBERT SITKOFF, WILLS, TRUSTS, AND ESTATES 678 (7th ed. 2005).

Under the common law Rule Against Perpetuities, Settlor's trust is thus valid. At the time of Settlor's death, she was survived by no children, one granddaughter, and no great-grandchildren. Because Settlor cannot have more children after her death, the only income beneficiary of the trust is Settlor's surviving granddaughter. This granddaughter is the only person who can produce great-grandchildren of Settlor; thus, all great-grandchildren must, of necessity, be born during the lifetime of Settlor's only surviving granddaughter, who is a life in being. The granddaughter's interest vested at Settlor's death, and the great-grandchildren's interest will vest at the death of the granddaughter. There is no need to wait the additional 21 years permitted under the Rule. Thus, under the common law and the statute given in the facts, the nonvested interest in the great-grandchildren is valid.

[NOTE: Both modern wait-and-see statutes and the Uniform Statutory Rule Against Perpetuities upon which the statute in the facts is modeled provide that before using either reform to validate an otherwise invalid nonvested interest, one should first determine if the nonvested interest violates the common law Rule. If it does not, then there is no need to reform. This proposition, which is applicable in all MEE user jurisdictions that have not simply abrogated the rule, is tested by this problem.]

Legal Problems

- (1)(a) What rights does a person in possession of a note that has been indorsed in blank by the payee have against the maker of the note?
- (1)(b) Which defenses may the maker of a note raise against a person entitled to enforce it who is not a holder in due course but is a transferee from a holder in due course?
- (2) What rights does a person entitled to enforce a note have against an indorser who transferred it for consideration with no warranties?
- (3) What rights does a person entitled to enforce a note have against a previous holder who transferred it as a gift without indorsing it?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The niece is a holder of the note and is thus a person entitled to enforce it. The chef, the issuer of the note, is obligated to pay it to the niece as the person entitled to enforce it. The niece is not subject to any defense or claim of the chef relating to the improper repair of the oven because the niece has the rights of a holder in due course. When the buyer bought the note from the repairman, the buyer became a holder in due course of the note and thus took it free of any personal defenses the chef had against the repairman. Even though the niece is not herself a holder in due course of the note, the niece succeeded to the buyer's rights as holder in due course and thus took free of the chef's personal defenses.

Because the chef refused to pay the note, the niece can recover from the repairman on the repairman's obligation as indorser. The niece cannot recover on the note against the buyer, however, because the buyer did not indorse the note (and thus incurred no indorser's obligation) and the buyer did not receive any consideration for transfer of the note to the niece (and, therefore, made no transfer warranty).

[NOTE: Although Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code governs the sale of promissory notes (a point that might be correctly noted by examinees), that Article does not determine the answer to any of the questions posed.]

Point One(a) (20%)

The niece is the holder of the note and thus may enforce it against the chef, who is the issuer of the note.

The chef is the maker of the note and, thus, its issuer. See UCC §§ 3-103, 3-105. The issuer of a note is obligated to pay it in accordance with its terms to a "person entitled to enforce" it. UCC § 3-412. The niece is a "person entitled to enforce" the note. This is because the niece is the holder of the note, and a holder of a note is a person entitled to enforce it. UCC § 3-301. The niece is the holder of the note because (i) the repairman's signature on the back of the note not accompanied by words indicating a person to whom the note was made payable was a "blank indorsement," which had the effect of making the note a bearer instrument, (ii) anyone in possession of a bearer instrument is a holder of it, and (iii) the niece is in possession of the note. See UCC §§ 1-201(b)(21)(A), 3-204, and 3-205. Accordingly, the chef has an obligation to the niece to pay the note in accordance with its terms, and the niece may enforce that obligation.

The niece is not a holder in due course of the note, but, because she is a transferee from the buyer, who was a holder in due course, she has the same enforcement rights as the buyer. Because the buyer, as a holder in due course, would have been able to enforce the note against the chef without being subject to defenses or claims arising from the improper repair, the niece has the same rights and will not be subject to the chef's defenses or claims about the repair.

As noted in Point One(a), the chef has an obligation to the niece to pay the note in accordance with its terms. However, except against a person with the rights of a holder in due course, the chef can raise any defenses or claims in recoupment that he would have if the claim on the note were an ordinary contract claim. UCC § 3-305. Thus, except against a holder in due course, the chef would be able to raise the improper repair as a defense or a claim in recoupment (a claim in response to the niece's claim).

But claims in recoupment and most defenses cannot be raised against a person with the rights of a holder in due course. Against a holder in due course, the chef can raise only the four "real" defenses listed in UCC § 3-305(a)(1) (infancy; duress, lack of legal capacity, or illegality that nullifies the obligation of the obligor under other law; fraud in the factum; discharge in insolvency proceedings), none of which is present here.

The niece is not a holder in due course because she did not take the note for value. See UCC §§ 3-302(a)(2)(i) (criteria for holder in due course status) and 3-303(a) (definition of "value"). But this does not mean that the niece is subject to the chef's claim arising out of the improper repair. The buyer was a holder in due course of the note because he took the note for value ($9,500), in good faith, and without notice of any facts that would have alerted him to the chef's defense against the repairman. UCC § 3-302(a)(2). As a holder in due course, the buyer owned the note free of the chef's claim because that claim did not constitute a "real" defense. UCC § 3-305(b). When the buyer gave the note to the niece, this constituted a "transfer" of the note. See UCC § 3-203(a). When a note is transferred, the transferee receives "any right of the transferor to enforce the instrument, including any right as a holder in due course." UCC § 3-203(b). Under this rule (also known as the "shelter principle"), the buyer transferred his freedom from the chef's defenses to the niece and the niece can enforce the note free of the chef's defenses.

Point Two (20%)

Because the chef dishonored the note, the niece can recover from the repairman on the repairman's obligation as indorser.

The chef's refusal to pay the note constituted dishonor. See UCC § 3-502. The repairman, as an indorser of the note (see Point One(a)), incurred the obligations of an indorser under UCC § 3-415(a). When a note has been dishonored, one of the obligations of an indorser is to pay the amount of the note to a person entitled to enforce it. Therefore, the repairman is liable for the amount of the note to the niece, a person entitled to enforce the note (so long as the niece gives proper notice of dishonor to the repairman).

[NOTE: Because the repairman indorsed the note without warranties, there are no transfer warranties. UCC § 3-416 cmt. 5.]

Point Three (20%)

The niece cannot recover on the note against the buyer as either indorser or warrantor because the buyer did not indorse the note and did not receive consideration for transferring the note to the niece.

The buyer did not indorse the note and, therefore, did not incur the obligation of an indorser to pay the note upon dishonor.

The niece cannot recover from the buyer under a transfer warranty theory because transfer warranties are made only by a person “who transfers an instrument for consideration.” Here, the buyer gave the instrument to the niece as a gift. So the buyer made no transfer warranty. UCC § 3-416(a). Therefore, the niece cannot recover from the buyer on that theory.

*Used as one of the six questions on the July 2013 Uniform Bar Examination in Alabama, Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, North Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming.

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the July 2013 MEE. Each test includes nine 30-minute questions; user jurisdictions may elect which of the nine questions they wish to use. (Jurisdictions that administer the Uniform Bar Examination [UBE] use a common set of six MEE questions as part of their bar examinations.) In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law. The instructions for the test appear on page iii. For more information, see the MEE Information Booklet, available on the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, followed by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Federal Civil Procedure question on the July 2013 MEE tested the following areas from the Federal Civil Procedure outline: I.A.1., B. & E., Jurisdiction and venue—Subject matter jurisdiction—Federal courts, Jurisdiction over parties, and Venue, forum non conveniens, and transfer. Subject matter outlines are included in the MEE Information Booklet.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of nine 30-minute essay questions, any of which a jurisdiction may select to include as part of its bar examination. (UBE jurisdictions use a common set of six MEE questions as part of their bar examinations.) It is administered by participating jurisdictions on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. The areas of law that may be covered by the questions on any MEE are Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts, Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Uniform Commercial Code (Negotiable Instruments and Bank Deposits and Collections; Secured Transactions). Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusion. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law. (UBE instructions: Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles rather than local case or statutory law.)

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

A woman was born and raised in the largest city (“the city”) of State A, where she also attended college.

Three years ago, the woman purchased a 300-acre farm and a farmhouse in neighboring State B, 50 miles from the city. She moved many of her personal belongings to the State B farmhouse, registered her car in State B, and acquired a State B driver’s license. She now spends seven months of the year in State B, working her farm and living in the farmhouse. She pays income taxes in State B, but not in State A, and lists State B as her residence on her federal income tax returns.

However, the woman has not completely cut her ties with State A. She still lives in the city for five months each year in a condominium that she owns. She still refers to the city as “home” and maintains an active social life there. When she is living on the farm, she receives frequent weekend visits from her city friends and occasionally spends the weekend in the city at her condominium. She is a member of a health club and a church in the city and obtains all her medical and dental care there. She is also registered to vote and votes in State A.

A food product distributor sells food items to grocery stores throughout a five-state region that includes States A and B. The distributor is a State C corporation. Its corporate headquarters are in State B, where its top corporate officers, including its chief executive officer (CEO), have their offices and staff. The distributor’s food processing, warehousing, and distribution facilities are all located in State A.

Three years ago, the woman and the distributor entered into a 10-year written contract providing that the woman would sell all the produce grown on her farm each year to the distributor. The contract was negotiated and signed by the parties at the distributor’s corporate headquarters in State B.

The woman and the distributor performed the contract for two years, earning her $80,000 per year. Recently, the distributor decided that the woman’s prices were too high. At a meeting at its corporate headquarters, the distributor’s CEO asked the woman to drop her prices. When she refused, the CEO informed her that the distributor would no longer buy produce from her and that it was terminating the contract.

The woman has sued the distributor for anticipatory breach of contract. She seeks $400,000 in damages. She has filed suit in the United States District Court for the District of State A, invoking the court’s diversity jurisdiction.

State A’s long-arm statute provides that “a court of this State may exercise personal jurisdiction over parties to the fullest extent permitted by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.”

The distributor has moved to dismiss the woman’s action for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction and for improper venue.

1. Should the court grant the motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction? Explain.
2. Should the court grant the motion to dismiss for improper venue? Explain.

AGENCY AND TORTS QUESTION

After a dump truck unloaded gravel at a road construction job site, the trucker negligently drove away with the truck bed still in a raised position. The raised truck bed hit an overhead cable, causing it to fall across the highway.

The telephone company that owned the fallen cable sent one of its employees to the scene in a company vehicle. The employee's responsibilities were expressly limited to responding to cable-damage calls, assessing damage, and reporting back to the telephone company so that a repair unit could be dispatched.

The foreman of the road construction job site asked the telephone company employee if the foreman's crew could lift the cable off the highway. Fearful that the cable might be damaged by traffic, the telephone company employee said, "Go ahead, pick it up. Just don't damage the cable." The foreman then directed his crew to stretch the cable over the highway so that traffic could pass underneath.

Shortly thereafter, a bus passing under the telephone cable hit the cable and dislodged it, causing the cable to strike an oncoming car. The driver lost control of the car and hit a truck carrying asphalt to the road construction site. As a result of the collision, hot asphalt spilled and severely burned the foreman.

The foreman is now threatening to sue the telephone company on the ground that it is responsible for its employee's negligence in authorizing the road construction crew to stretch the cable across the highway. The telephone company argues that, even assuming that its employee was negligent, the telephone company is not liable because:

1. the telephone company employee's acts were outside the scope of his employment and thus cannot be attributed to the telephone company;
2. there is no other agency theory under which the foreman could hold the telephone company liable for its employee's acts; and
3. the telephone company employee's acts were not the proximate cause of the foreman's injuries.

Assess each of the telephone company's responses.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Seven years ago, a married couple had a daughter.

Recently, the mother joined a small religious group. The group's members are required to contribute at least half their earnings to the group, to forgo all conventional medical treatments, and to refrain from all "frivolous" activities, including athletic competitions and sports. The mother has decided to adhere to all of the group's rules.

Accordingly, the mother has told the father that she has given half of her last two paychecks to the group and that she plans to continue this practice. The father objects to this plan and has accurately told the mother that "we can't pay all the bills without your salary."

The mother has also said that she wants to stop giving their daughter her prescribed asthma medications. The father opposes this because the daughter has severe asthma, and the daughter's physician has said that regular medication use is the only way to prevent asthma attacks, which can be life-threatening. The mother also wants to stop the daughter's figure-skating lessons. The father opposes this plan, too, because their daughter loves skating. Because the father works about 60 hours per week outside the home and the mother works only 20 hours, the father is afraid that the mother will do what she wants despite his opposition.

The mother, father, and daughter continue to live together. They do not live in a community property jurisdiction.

1. Can the father or the state child welfare agency obtain an order
 - (a) enjoining the mother from making contributions from her future paychecks to the religious group? Explain.
 - (b) requiring the mother to take the daughter to skating lessons? Explain.
 - (c) requiring the mother to cooperate in giving the daughter her prescribed asthma medications? Explain.
2. If the father were to file a divorce action against the mother, could a court award custody of the daughter to him based on the mother's decision to follow the religious group's rules? Explain.

EVIDENCE QUESTION

The city police department received a 911 call regarding a domestic violence incident. The caller said that she was staying with her sister and her sister's boyfriend. The caller said that she had called the police because her sister's boyfriend was becoming violent. The police department records all 911 calls. The relevant portions of the 911 recording are as follows:

Caller: My sister's boyfriend is out of control right now. He just threw a broken beer bottle at my sister. It hit her on the arm. Now he's holding a chair like he's going to throw that at her, too.

Police Dispatcher: Where is your sister?

Caller: She's running toward the bathroom.

Police Dispatcher: Is she injured?

Caller: I see some blood on her arm.

Police Dispatcher: Does he have a gun?

Caller: I don't see a gun.

A nearby police officer arrived on the scene five minutes after the caller telephoned 911. The police officer found the boyfriend pacing in the front yard and ordered him to sit in the rear seat of the patrol car. The boyfriend sat in the patrol car, and the officer locked the door from the outside so that the boyfriend would stay in the car while the officer spoke to the sister.

When the sister saw that her boyfriend was locked in the patrol car, she came out on the porch to speak with the officer. The sister was in a highly agitated and emotional state, and she had several fresh cuts on her right arm. The officer asked her how she got the cuts. The sister replied, "My boyfriend threw a bottle at me which cut my arm." The sister declined the officer's offer of medical assistance but said that she wanted to press charges against her boyfriend. The sister was in tears throughout her conversation with the officer.

The boyfriend was charged in state court with battery and disorderly conduct. The prosecutor made every effort to secure the appearance of both the sister and the caller at trial, but when the trial began, the sister and the caller did not appear.

The prosecutor is attempting to convict the boyfriend without trial testimony from the sister or the caller. The prosecutor plans to introduce the caller's statements to the police dispatcher and to call the officer to testify and to repeat the statements the sister made to him at her house to prove that the boyfriend attacked the sister.

The 911 recording containing the caller's statements to the police dispatcher has been properly authenticated. Defense counsel has objected to the admission of (1) the caller's statements to the police dispatcher on the 911 recording and (2) the officer's testimony repeating the sister's statements to the officer (at her house). Defense counsel asserts the following:

- a) The caller's statements to the police dispatcher are inadmissible hearsay.
- b) Admission of the caller's statements to the police dispatcher would violate the boyfriend's constitutional rights.
- c) The officer's testimony repeating the sister's statements is inadmissible hearsay.
- d) Admission of the officer's testimony repeating the sister's statements would violate the boyfriend's constitutional rights.

This jurisdiction has adopted rules of evidence identical to the Federal Rules of Evidence and interprets the provisions of the Bill of Rights in accordance with relevant United States Supreme Court precedent.

How should the trial court rule on each defense objection? Explain.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS QUESTION

A man asked a friend for a loan. The friend was willing to make the loan so long as the man paid interest at a rate that would enable the friend to make a profit on the transaction. After some discussion, they agreed that the friend would lend the man $4,000, to be repaid one month later together with interest at a rate two percentage points higher than the “prime interest rate” charged by First Bank. (First Bank’s prime interest rate is reported daily in the financial press.)

At dinner that evening, the friend handed the man a check for $4,000, payable to his order, that was drawn on the friend’s account at First Bank. In exchange, the man handed the friend a document signed by him and dated that day. The document read, in its entirety, as follows: “The undersigned hereby agrees to pay to bearer the sum of $4,000, plus interest at a rate two percentage points higher than the prime interest rate charged by First Bank on the date hereof, no later than one month from the date hereof.”

After dinner, as the two waited for a bus together, they were robbed. The robber took the check from the man and the document described above from the friend.

The next day, the robber forged the man’s signature on the back of the check and then sold the check to a check-cashing business, handing the check to the manager of the business in exchange for $3,500 in cash. The business and its employees acted in good faith and had no reason to believe that the check did not belong to the robber or that the man’s signature had been forged. The following day, the robber sold the document that he had stolen from the friend to a local investor, handing the investor the document in exchange for $2,500 in cash. The investor acted in good faith and had no reason to believe that the document did not belong to the robber.

A few days later, the manager of the check-cashing business took the check to First Bank, handed the check to the teller, and asked that the amount of the check be paid. But the teller refused to pay because the friend had contacted First Bank and stopped payment on the check. Accordingly, the teller handed the check back to the manager.

On the date on which the document signed by the man called for him to pay, the investor contacted the man and demanded payment. The man responded that he would not pay because his promise had been made to his friend, not to the investor, and, moreover, he should not have to pay because the friend’s check had been stolen from him with the result that he never received the money that his friend was supposed to loan him.

1. Does the check-cashing business have a right to recover the amount of the check from the friend? Explain.
2. Is the document signed by the man a negotiable instrument? Explain.
3. Assuming that the document is a negotiable instrument, does the investor have a right to recover from the man the amount that the man promised to pay in the document he gave to the friend? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

On February 2, Alice, Bob, and Carla formed ABC Hospitality, LLC (ABC), a member-managed limited liability company, for the purpose of building, owning, and running a 100-room luxury hotel in their hometown. ABC soon began to experience unexpected financial problems, prompting Bob to look for other investment opportunities.

On March 10, Bob told Alice and Carla that, although he would remain as a member of ABC, he would no longer contribute any capital to ABC, and he was also becoming a co-owner of the Metro Inn, an existing 200-room hotel in the same town near the ABC hotel project. Alice and Carla objected to Bob's plan, fearing that he might put the interests of the Metro Inn ahead of his existing obligations to ABC. In response, Bob cited § 5.1 of ABC's Operating Agreement, which states as follows:

Members of ABC shall not in any way be prohibited from or restricted in managing, owning, or otherwise having an interest in any other business venture that may be competitive with the business of ABC.

Shortly after Bob became a co-owner of the Metro Inn, ABC's financial situation worsened. Alice and Carla worried that ABC would not be able to pay a bill it owed to its concrete supplier. Alice proposed to pay the concrete supplier's bill from her own personal funds and then obtain reimbursement from ABC once the hotel project was completed. Alice wanted to do this so that she could file a personal financial statement which underreported her assets and so enable her son to qualify for student financial aid. Carla agreed to this proposal. Alice and Carla also agreed to alter ABC's financial records so that it would appear as if ABC had paid the concrete supplier's bill out of its own accounts, without showing the obligation to reimburse Alice for that amount.

In the weeks following Alice's payment to the concrete supplier, several other of ABC's bills became due. Alice tried to pay as many of these bills as she could using her personal funds, but despite her best efforts, it soon became clear that ABC was rapidly approaching insolvency. On August 15, the hotel's designer left a message for Carla seeking payment of an overdue bill.

Alice and Carla were concerned about the solvency of the company. Without responding to the designer, Alice and Carla, acting with Bob's consent, sold all of ABC's property and remaining assets. Alice and Carla each kept one-third of the sale proceeds and gave the remaining one-third to Bob. They did not file articles of dissolution with the state. When the designer later called Carla again about the bill, she responded that ABC had been "dissolved" and that no payment would be forthcoming.

1. Did Alice and Carla have any legal basis to object to Bob's co-ownership of the Metro Inn? Explain.
2. Under what theory or theories could Alice, Bob, or Carla be personally liable to the designer? Explain.

CONTRACTS QUESTION

On May 1, a manufacturer and a chef met at a restaurant trade show. The manufacturer showed the chef some carving knives that were on sale for $100 each. After examining the knives, the chef said, "I love these knives! I'll take 10 of them. Please send them to my restaurant within the month. As soon as I receive them, I'll send you a check for $1,000." The manufacturer said, "I'll ship the 10 knives to your restaurant in a few weeks," and he took the chef's address for shipping purposes.

On May 15, the manufacturer sent six knives to the chef. Enclosed in the shipping box was a document on the manufacturer's letterhead that stated in its entirety: "It is a pleasure to do business with you. Enclosed, pursuant to our agreement, are six knives. Please remit $600 at your earliest convenience."

On May 17, the chef sent the manufacturer a check for $600 and included in the envelope an unsigned note to the manufacturer, handwritten on plain paper, requesting the remaining four knives. The manufacturer did not respond to the note.

The knives were particularly well-suited for the chef's uses, and the $100 price was a bargain, so the chef was very eager for the manufacturer to deliver the remaining four knives. On June 17, the chef wrote to the manufacturer claiming that the manufacturer was contractually bound to sell the chef 10 knives and that the manufacturer had breached that contract by furnishing only 6 knives. The manufacturer did not reply to the chef's letter.

Is there an enforceable contract against the manufacturer that binds him to sell 10 knives to the chef? Explain.

REAL PROPERTY QUESTION

Two years ago, a builder constructed a house for a woman and conveyed that house to her for $300,000 at the closing by a warranty deed, which was promptly recorded. The sale contract contained no express warranties relating to the condition of the house. To finance the purchase, the woman borrowed $200,000 from a local bank secured by a mortgage on her new house. The mortgage note provided that in the event of the woman's failure to make two consecutive monthly mortgage payments, the balance would become immediately due and payable. The mortgage was promptly recorded.

One year ago, the woman accepted a new job and moved. At that time, her house was worth $360,000 and there was a balance on the mortgage of $195,000. She sold the house to a man and delivered a quitclaim deed to him in exchange for $160,000. The quitclaim deed was promptly recorded and made no reference to the woman's mortgage obligation. The mortgage obligation was not discharged at the closing. However, the man immediately began to make the woman's monthly mortgage payments to the bank after the closing.

Nine months ago, water seeped into the basement of the house during a major storm, causing substantial damage. It is undisputed that the seepage was due to defective concrete used by the builder and not to any negligence on the builder's part. The man called the builder, told him about the seepage, and demanded that the builder fix the concrete. The builder responded: "That's your problem." The man then repaired the concrete at a cost of $80,000.

Thereafter, the man sued the builder to recover the $80,000 he had spent to repair the concrete. While the case was pending, the man stopped making mortgage payments. The bank sued the man to foreclose on the mortgage and, if necessary, obtain a deficiency judgment against him on the note if the sale proceeds were insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt. The man has joined the woman as a third-party defendant in the lawsuit.

1. Is the man likely to prevail against the builder to recover the $80,000 he spent to repair the concrete? Explain.
2. Is the man personally liable for the outstanding balance on the mortgage note between the woman and the bank? Explain.
3. If the bank is successful in its foreclosure action, will the man be able to recover damages from the woman? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

Twenty years ago, John and Mary were married. One month before their wedding, John and Mary signed a valid prenuptial agreement in which each of them waived "any property rights in the estate or property of the other to which he or she might otherwise be legally entitled upon the termination of their marriage by death or divorce."

Seventeen years ago, John executed a valid will, which provided as follows:

I, John, leave my entire estate to my wife, Mary. However, if I should hereafter have children, then I leave three-fourths of my estate to my wife, Mary, and one-fourth of my estate to my children who survive me, in equal shares.

Fifteen years ago, John had an extramarital affair with Beth, who gave birth to their child, Son. Both Beth and John consented to Son's adoption by Aunt. At the time of the adoption, Beth, John, and Aunt agreed that Son would not be told that he was the biological child of Beth and John.

Three years ago, Aunt died, and Son moved into John and Mary's home. At that time, John admitted to Mary that he had had an extramarital affair with Beth which had resulted in Son's birth.

Three months ago, Mary filed for divorce. Nonetheless, she and John continued to live together.

One month ago, before John and Mary's divorce decree was entered, John was killed in a car accident. John's will, executed 17 years ago, has been offered for probate. John's will did not designate anyone to act as the personal representative of his estate.

John was survived by Mary, Son, and John's mother.

1. To whom should John's estate be distributed? Explain.
2. Who should be appointed as the personal representative of John's estate? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure I.A.1., B. & E.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

(1)(a) What requirements must be met for a federal court to have jurisdiction in a case based on diversity?

(1)(b) For purposes of diversity jurisdiction, is the woman a citizen of State B, where she maintains a home and conducts her farming business, or of State A, where she has lived for most of her life and to which she returns for several months each year, and which she calls “home”?

(1)(c) For purposes of diversity jurisdiction, is the distributor a citizen of State A (where it has its food processing, warehousing, and distribution facilities), State B (where it has its corporate headquarters), and/or State C (where it is incorporated)?

(2) Is venue proper in State A, even though the acts and omissions giving rise to the woman’s claim occurred in State B and the distributor’s corporate headquarters and state of incorporation are outside State A?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Because the woman’s claim is based on state law and the amount in controversy exceeds the jurisdictional amount ($75,000), the key issue in determining whether subject-matter jurisdiction exists is whether the plaintiff, the woman, and the defendant, the distributor, are citizens of different states. The woman is most likely a domiciliary and therefore a citizen of State A, where she has lived continuously all her life and which she still calls “home.” While an argument can be made that she has become a citizen of State B, the fact that she spends the majority of her time each year in State B and treats it as her residence for certain purposes probably does not amount to an abandonment of her State A domicile under the circumstances.

For diversity purposes, corporations may have dual citizenship. The distributor is a citizen of State C, where it is incorporated. The distributor is also a citizen of State B, the state where it has its principal place of business. Because the distributor is a citizen of States B and C, and the woman is probably a citizen of State A, complete diversity exists and the court should not dismiss the action for lack of jurisdiction.

Assuming that diversity jurisdiction exists, venue is proper in State A, and the court should not dismiss for improper venue. In an action founded solely on diversity, venue is proper in a district in which the defendant resides. Corporate defendants are deemed to “reside” in any state where they are subject to personal jurisdiction. Although the distributor is incorporated in State C and its headquarters are in State B, it conducts sufficient business activities to subject it to personal jurisdiction in State A, and thus is deemed to reside there for venue purposes.

Point One(a) (10%)

A federal court has jurisdiction of a complaint based on state law if the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000 and there is complete diversity between the parties. Here, the amount-in-controversy requirement is satisfied.

Federal district courts have original jurisdiction over state-law-based suits involving citizens of different states where the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000. 28 U.S.C. § 1332. In determining the amount in controversy, a court will accept the plaintiff's good faith allegations as to damages unless it appears to a legal certainty that the plaintiff cannot recover that amount. St. Paul Mercury Indemnity Co. v. Red Cab Co., 303 U.S. 283 (1938). Here, the woman's claim for $400,000 in damages appears to have been made in good faith, given that the woman had earned $80,000 a year in the first two years of the contract and that the distributor breached the contract with eight years remaining. Certainly, there is nothing to suggest that the woman will recover less than $75,000 to a legal certainty. Accordingly, the key issue is whether the woman and the distributor are citizens of different states.

Point One(b) (35%)

The woman is probably a citizen of State A. But an argument can be made that she has acquired a new domicile in State B and therefore has become a citizen of State B.

To determine an individual U.S. citizen's state citizenship for diversity purposes, courts look to the state of the individual's domicile when the complaint was filed. Newman-Green, Inc. v. Alfonzo-Larrain, 490 U.S. 826, 830–31 (1989). A person's domicile is generally determined by two elements: (1) residence in a state, and (2) an intent to remain in that state. In cases like this one, where an individual resides for extended periods in more than one state, the determination of domicile often turns on "a complex inquiry into an individual's intent." Ner Tamid Congregation of North Town v. Krivoruchko, 620 F. Supp. 2d 924, 931 (N.D. Ill. 2009). Courts look at a variety of facts, none of which is dispositive on its own (and many of which can be manipulated by the individual concerned) in an attempt to determine the individual's true, fixed, permanent home and the place to which the individual intends to return when absent. Relevant facts include the individual's residence, the location of the person's property, the person's voting behavior, the location of bank accounts, the individual's memberships and personal associations, automobile registration, place of employment, and other matters. 13E CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT, ARTHUR R. MILLER & EDWARD H. COOPER, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 3612 (3d ed. 2009).

It is unclear whether the woman is domiciled in State A or State B. The woman was clearly a domiciliary of State A, the only state in which she had ever lived, until she bought the farm and farmhouse in State B. Despite her purchase of the State B farm, she maintains many social connections with State A, continues to secure medical and dental treatment in State A, returns to State A to live every winter, and continues to vote and attend church there. One could argue that these facts show that the woman never intended to abandon her State A domicile, but always retained the intent to return there.

On the other hand, the woman did acquire property in State B, she moved many of her personal belongings there, and she lives there for most of the year. Moreover, she took several steps that suggest her intent to establish a State B domicile, including registering her car there, obtaining a State B driver's license, filing state income taxes only in State B, and listing State B as her residence on her federal tax returns.

Although the matter is debatable, the facts suggest that the woman did not move to State B with the requisite intent to remain there. Instead, it appears that she always intended that State A would remain her home, although her livelihood requires her presence in State B for much of the year. In cases of this sort, some courts seek to determine the “center of gravity” of an individual’s life. See, e.g., Galva Foundry Co. v. Heiden, 924 F.2d 729 (7th Cir. 1991). Despite the fact that the woman lives in State B for two months more of the year than she lives in State A, it appears that the “center of gravity” of her life is State A, and that a court would conclude that she is a domiciliary and therefore a citizen of State A.

[NOTE: Examinees who demonstrate an understanding of the complexity of this issue, and who use the key facts to develop a cogent argument, should receive full credit regardless of their conclusion on this point.]

Point One(c) (25%)

The distributor is a citizen of both State C, where it is incorporated, and State B, where it has its principal place of business (i.e., where its corporate headquarters are located).

By statute, a corporation is a citizen both where it is incorporated and where it has its principal place of business. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1). The distributor is incorporated in and therefore is a citizen of State C. So the question is where the distributor has its principal place of business.

Until the Supreme Court’s decision in Hertz Corp. v. Friend, 559 U.S. 77 (2010), the federal courts were divided about how to identify a corporation’s principal place of business. See generally JACK H. FRIEDENTHAL, MARY KAY KANE & ARTHUR R. MILLER, CIVIL PROCEDURE 36–37 (4th ed. 2005). Some courts used a nerve-center test that focused on where the corporation’s decision-making authority was located. Other courts applied a corporate-activities/operating-assets test that focused on where a corporation’s business activities occurred.

In Hertz Corp., the Supreme Court decided that a corporation’s principal place of business for diversity purposes would be deemed to be “the place where a corporation’s officers direct, control, and coordinate the corporation’s activities,” its so-called “nerve center.” 559 U.S. at 92–93. In this case, the distributor’s corporate headquarters are in State B, its top officers have their offices and staff in State B, and its decisions regarding the contract with the woman were made in State B. All of these facts suggest that State B is the place where the corporate officers “direct, control, and coordinate” the distributor’s activities, and that State B is therefore the distributor’s principal place of business.

The distributor, therefore, is a citizen of State B (as well as of State C). If the woman is a domiciliary of State A (see Point One(b)), there is complete diversity of citizenship and the motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction should be denied.

[NOTE: If an examinee previously concluded that the woman is a domiciliary of State B, then that examinee should also conclude that the action must be dismissed for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction because there would not be diversity of citizenship between the woman and the distributor.]

Point Two (30%)

Because the distributor has sufficient contacts with State A to be subject to personal jurisdiction there, the distributor resides in State A for purposes of venue.

The woman brought this action in the United States District Court of State A. The issue, therefore, is whether a State A venue can be justified under the general federal venue statute. When, as here, a federal court’s jurisdiction is based on diversity, 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b) provides that venue is proper (1) in any district where a defendant resides if all defendants reside in the same state, or (2) in any district where a substantial part of the acts or omissions giving rise to the action occurred, or (3) in any district where any defendant is subject to personal jurisdiction, if there is no other district in which the action might be brought.

A State A venue is appropriate if the distributor “resides” in the District of State A for purposes of the venue statute. According to 28 U.S.C. § 1391(c), a corporation resides where it is subject to personal jurisdiction at the time the action is commenced. So the question is whether the distributor is subject to personal jurisdiction in State A.

Rule 4(k) indicates that a federal district court may exercise personal jurisdiction to the same extent as a state court of general jurisdiction in the state where the district court sits. State A’s long-arm statute extends jurisdiction as far as the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment allows. The Due Process Clause permits the exercise of personal jurisdiction over out-of-state defendants like the distributor if they have minimum contacts with the forum state such that the exercise of jurisdiction would not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310 (1945). The nature of the contacts required depends on whether the suit arises out of or is related to the defendant’s contacts with the forum state.

Here, the distributor maintains its business facilities in State A, including food processing, warehousing, and distribution facilities. Regardless of whether the woman’s cause of action is deemed to be related to those contacts, these continuous and substantial business connections with State A would warrant a State A court to exercise jurisdiction over the distributor. Moreover, requiring the distributor to defend this action in State A is not likely to be viewed by the court as unfair or unreasonable. Whether the exercise of personal jurisdiction is fair and reasonable depends on various considerations such as the burden on the defendant of having to litigate in the forum state, the plaintiff’s interest in a convenient forum for obtaining relief, the state’s interest in providing a forum, and the interests of the interstate judicial system in efficient resolution of disputes. Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 477 (1985). Given modern transportation and communication, the distributor’s burden of defending in a state where it does continuous and substantial business is minimal even if the suit is unrelated to the distributor’s business in that forum.

While the woman lives in State B for most of the year, the State A federal court is located close to her home in the city, where she lives for part of the year. Furthermore, because the woman is a part-year resident of State A, State A has some interest in providing a forum where she can obtain redress for legal harms. On the other hand, adjudication in State A is not particularly efficient. Aside from the woman, who resides in State A for part of the year, it appears that the bulk of the evidence and witnesses relevant to her case will be located in State B. Nonetheless, that fact alone would not be enough to defeat State A’s jurisdiction over the distributor in this case.

Because State A could assert personal jurisdiction over the distributor at the commencement of the action (had the issue been raised), the distributor will be deemed to “reside” in State A, rendering the District of State A an appropriate venue under 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b)(1). The motion to dismiss for improper venue should be denied.

[NOTE #1: By failing to raise the defense of personal jurisdiction in its motion, the distributor waived the defense. See FED. R. CIV. P. 12(b) & (h). However, the venue statute asks whether the distributor was subject to personal jurisdiction at the commencement of the suit, so the distributor’s waiver of possible personal jurisdiction defense does not affect the venue inquiry. An examinee should receive credit for a personal jurisdiction analysis ONLY if it is offered in the context of determining where the distributor “resides” for venue purposes.]

[NOTE #2: Here, neither the second nor the third basis for venue is applicable. As to the second basis for venue (a district where a “substantial part” of the relevant acts occurred), the woman’s claim is based on an alleged breach of contract. The facts state that this contract was negotiated in State B, that performance occurred in State B, and that the decision to stop performing on the contract was made in State B. It does not appear that any of the acts or omissions giving rise to the woman’s claim occurred in the District of State A.

The third basis for venue is applicable only if there is no other district where the case could be brought. Here, as just noted, the actions giving rise to the woman’s claim took place in State B, and there were no impediments to her bringing the claim there. Because there is another district where suit could have been brought, a State A venue cannot be based on the absence of such a district.]

AGENCY AND TORTS ANALYSIS

(Agency II.B.; III. / Torts II.E.1. & F.1.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Was the employee acting within the course and scope of his employment when he authorized the foreman to lift the cable?
- (2) Did the telephone company cloak the employee with apparent authority that was relied upon by the foreman, resulting in his injury?
- (3) Were the employee's actions the proximate cause of the foreman's injuries?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The telephone company is liable to the foreman for the telephone company employee's negligence if the employee was acting within the course and scope of his employment with the telephone company when he authorized the foreman to direct the crew to stretch the cable over the highway. Here the employee probably was. Even if the employee was acting outside the scope of his employment with the telephone company, the telephone company would be liable to the foreman if the foreman relied on statements or conduct by the employee that were within the employee's apparent authority. Although the type of harm the foreman suffered (burns) was different from the harm risked by the employee's actions (being stuck by the cable), the employee's actions are probably the proximate cause of the foreman's injuries.

Point One (35%)

The telephone company is liable for torts committed by its employee while acting within the course and scope of his employment with the telephone company. Because the employee was motivated by a desire to serve the telephone company, he was acting within the scope of his employment.

Under the doctrine of respondeat superior, employers are liable for the actions of an employee when the employee is acting within the scope of his employment. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 2.04.

Here, the employee had no express authority to authorize the raising of the cable. His only duty was to determine whether a cable was down and, if so, to assess the damage and report to the telephone company. However, the employee's unauthorized conduct may fall within the scope of his employment. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 7.07 cmt. c ("conduct is not outside the scope of employment merely because an employee disregards the employer's instructions"). Section 7.07 of the Restatement (Third) of Agency states that "[a]n employee acts within the scope of employment when performing work assigned by the employer or engaging in a course of conduct subject to the employer's control. An employee's act is not within the scope of employment when it occurs within an independent course of conduct not intended by the employee to serve any purpose of the employer."

Here, the employee's action (authorizing the raising of the cable) was motivated by a desire to protect the cable from further damage. Thus, the employee was clearly acting with the intent to serve the telephone company's purposes. The cable which ultimately caused the injury to the foreman was the property of the telephone company. The telephone company should have reasonably expected that when the employee arrived at the scene he would take necessary action to prevent further damage to its property if he were in a position to do so. Although it is not certain, the telephone company is probably liable to the foreman under the doctrine of respondeat superior.

Point Two (30%)

The telephone company could also be liable to the foreman under an apparent authority theory.

A principal will sometimes be liable for torts committed by its agents even if the conditions of respondeat superior liability (i.e., an employer/employee relationship and conduct within the scope of employment) are not satisfied.

For example, a principal can be liable if the principal was negligent or reckless in the selection of the agent. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 7.05(1). Nothing in the facts suggests that the telephone company was negligent in its hiring of the employee.

A principal can also be liable for an agent's torts if the principal has a special relationship with the injured person that imposed a special duty on the principal to take care to protect against the risk that the agent would harm the injured person. See id. § 7.05(2). Nothing on these facts suggests that the telephone company had any such special relationship with the foreman.

Finally, a principal is liable for a tort committed by an agent when the agent "appears to deal or communicate on behalf of [the] principal and the agent's appearance of authority enables the agent to commit [the] tort" See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF AGENCY § 7.08, cmt a. On the facts of this problem, the employee had apparent authority vis-à-vis the foreman. "Apparent authority . . . is created by a person's manifestation that another has authority to act with legal consequences for the person who makes the manifestation, where a third party reasonably believes the actor to be authorized and the belief is traceable to the manifestation." Id. § 3.03. An agent has apparent authority with respect to a third party only "when the third party reasonably believes that the agent . . . has authority to act on behalf of the principal." Id. § 7.08, cmt b. Here, the telephone company made manifestations to the foreman about the employee's authority when it sent its employee to the job site in a company vehicle. This would give the foreman a basis to believe that the employee was acting on the telephone company's behalf.

The principal is liable under an apparent authority theory only when the injured person's belief in the agent's authority "enables the agent to commit the tort." As noted, the employee arrived at the job site in the telephone company's vehicle. This was sufficient to create a reasonable belief that the employee was acting on behalf of the company on all matters relating to the fallen cable. As a result of this reasonable belief, the foreman, acting on the employee's authorization, raised the cable, creating the circumstances leading to his injury.

Thus, on an apparent authority theory the company could be liable assuming respondeat superior did not apply. See Point One.

Point Three (35%)

The employee's acts were probably the proximate cause of the foreman's injuries.

In a negligence action, a defendant is liable only if his conduct was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. Here, it is likely that a court would find that the foreman's harm was proximately caused by the employee's negligence.

Even when a defendant is negligent, his conduct must have “such an effect in producing the harm as to lead reasonable men to regard it as a cause, using that word in the popular sense, in which there always lurks the idea of responsibility, rather than in the so-called ‘philosophic sense,’ which includes every one of the great number of events without which any happening would not have occurred.”

RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 431, cmt. a.

Intervening actors or events that produce harm different in kind from that which one would normally anticipate may break the chain of causation and lead a court to conclude that the defendant’s acts are not the proximate cause of the plaintiff’s injury. Thus, a plaintiff who negligently exceeds a speed limit and therefore happens to be on the spot where a tree falls during a violent windstorm may still recover for injuries caused by the tree (see Berry v. Sugar Notch Borough, 43 A. 240 (Pa. 1899)), and a defendant who negligently drops a passenger off at the wrong train station is not liable for the passenger’s burns caused by a malfunctioning kerosene lamp in the hotel where she is forced to stay for the night. See Central Georgia Ry. Co. v. Price, 32 S.E. 77 (Ga. 1898). In evaluating whether intervening acts break the chain of causation, courts typically analyze both their foreseeability and their degree of dependence on the defendant’s negligence. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 431.

Here, it was entirely foreseeable that a vehicle would strike the raised cable, causing impact damage to cars and persons within the range of the cable’s fall; that is what made the employee’s conduct negligent. Given that the cable was stretched over a highway, it was also foreseeable that a car struck by a cable would go out of control and cause injuries to other vehicles or bystanders, and that is exactly what happened here: the driver lost control of the car, hitting another vehicle and thereby causing serious personal injury to a bystander, the foreman. Although the source of the foreman’s injuries (burns from hot asphalt) would not normally be anticipated from the fall of a cable, the foreman was within the zone of foreseeable risk and suffered injuries in the course of a foreseeable, reasonably direct chain of circumstances. A court is thus likely to find that the employee’s negligence was the proximate cause of the foreman’s injuries.

FAMILY LAW ANALYSIS

(Family Law II.B; IV.A.; VI.E.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

(1)(a) On what, if any, basis could a court enjoin the mother from making contributions from her future paychecks to the religious group?

(1)(b) On what, if any, basis could a court order one parent to follow the child-rearing preferences of the other parent when both parents and their child are living together in an intact family?

(1)(c) On what, if any, basis could a court order a parent to cooperate in ensuring that a child obtains medical treatments necessary to protect the child's health and life?

(2) In a divorce action, could a court grant custody to one parent based on the other parent's religious practices when those practices pose risks to the child?

DISCUSSION

Summary

There is no basis for a court to order the mother to stop making contributions from her paychecks to the religious group. Because the mother and father live in a common-law jurisdiction in an intact household, the father has no management powers with respect to the mother's earnings. Although, in most states, the mother has a support obligation toward the father that would enable a creditor to recover from the mother the value of "necessaries" furnished to the father, the father may not personally obtain a court order requiring the mother to spend her earnings in a particular way, nor may a state child welfare agency.

Based on the family privacy doctrine, a court may not order one parent to follow the child-rearing preferences of the other parent when the parents live together with their child in an intact family. Thus, a court will not order the mother to take the daughter to skating lessons.

However, based on its neglect jurisdiction, a court could order a parent to take steps to preserve a child's health or safety, even when the parent's actions are religiously motivated. The proper party to initiate a child neglect action is the state, not a parent. Thus, a court could order the mother to follow the physician's medical recommendations and order appropriate services for the daughter if the mother refused to do so and the state's child welfare agency filed a neglect petition on the daughter's behalf.

Although a court may not deny a parent custody based on a parent's religious faith, it may deny custody based on a threat to the child's health or safety. Because failing to take asthma medications appears to be life-threatening, if the father were to file a divorce action against the mother, a court could award the father custody of his daughter if the mother persists in her refusal to provide the daughter with her asthma medication.

Point One(a) (30%)

There is no basis for a court to order the mother to stop making contributions from her paycheck to the religious group. Because the mother and father live in an intact household in a non-community-property state, the father has no management powers with respect to the mother's earnings. Although the mother has a support obligation toward the father that would enable a creditor to recover from the mother the value of "necessaries" furnished to the father, the father could not personally obtain a court order requiring the mother to spend her earnings in a particular way, nor could a state child welfare agency.

Under the common law, when a woman married, her identity was swallowed up in her husband's. As a result of this marital-unity doctrine, a married woman could not own property. Beginning in the mid-19th century, legislatures began to enact so-called "Married Women's Property Acts" that restored to the married woman the rights she had when unmarried, including the right to acquire, own, or transfer property. By the end of the 19th century, every state had passed such a statute.

Under the Married Women's Property Acts, title determines asset ownership and management rights; "[t]he wife is given the power to contract and full rights to her own earnings" HARRY D. KRAUSE AND DAVID D. MEYER, FAMILY LAW IN A NUTSHELL 99 (5th ed. 2007). Because each spouse has full management rights with respect to his or her earnings, a court may not overrule the spending decisions of a spouse based on his or her partner's conclusion that those decisions are ill-advised.

Marriage does, however, create support obligations and, since the Supreme Court's decision in Orr v. Orr, 440 U.S. 268 (1979), those obligations have been gender neutral. Based on this mutual support obligation, a creditor who has furnished "necessaries" to a husband or wife may, in most states, sue the spouse of the purchaser and recover on the debt. See KRAUSE AND MEYER, supra, at 94–95.

However, the necessities doctrine is available only to a creditor who has already provided goods or services. Such a creditor has no power to obtain an order altering a spouse's future spending. The doctrine does not go so far as to allow one spouse to enjoin expenditures by the other because, as here, he or she is concerned that the bills of the family won't get paid. Nor, because of the family privacy doctrine (see Point 2), may a spouse who disagrees with his partner's spending decisions obtain an order requiring a different spending pattern or obtain a support award.

A state child welfare agency may intervene in family decision making only when the decision at issue endangers the well-being of a child or another family member incapable of protecting his own interests. Here, there is no evidence that the mother's decision to donate a portion of her earnings to the religious group endangers her daughter. Thus, the state agency cannot obtain an order requiring the mother to alter her spending patterns any more than can the father.

Point One(b) (20%)

Because the mother and father are living with their daughter in an intact family and failure to take skating lessons does not endanger the daughter, a court may not require the mother to follow the father's preference with respect to continuing the daughter's skating lessons.

American courts have consistently treated the disputes of intact families as private matters that should be resolved at home. Thus, they have refused to decide such disputes when a spouse has brought one to court:

The inherent jurisdiction of courts of equity over infants is a matter of necessity, . . . assumed by the courts only when it is forfeited by a natural custodian incident to a broken home. . . . The judicial mind and conscience is repelled by the thought of disruption of the sacred marital relationship, and usually voices the hope that the breach may somehow be healed by mutual understanding between the parents themselves.

Kilgrow v. Kilgrow, 107 So. 2d 885, 888–89 (Ala. 1958); see also McGuire v. McGuire, 59 N.W.2d 336 (Neb. 1958). Even when the spouse who comes to court wishes to enforce a premarital agreement, courts have refused to intervene in the disputes of couples who are living together. See Kilgrow, supra (refusing to enforce provision of premarital agreement requiring child’s education at religious school).

Here, the mother and father are still living together with their daughter. Until and unless they separate, a court will not intervene in their dispute regarding the daughter’s skating lessons and issue an order supporting the views of either parent.

Again, the state child welfare agency may intervene in family decision making only when the decision at issue endangers the well-being of a child or another family member incapable of protecting his own interests. Here, because there is no evidence that the mother’s failure to continue skating lessons would endanger the daughter, the state agency cannot obtain an order requiring the mother to continue the lessons any more than can the father.

Point One(c) (30%)

Because failing to take asthma medications poses a serious risk to the daughter’s health and safety, if the mother’s actions prevent the daughter from receiving her prescribed medications, a court may find that the daughter is neglected and order the mother to give the daughter her medications.

Although courts will not intervene in disputes between parents in an intact household, the state, pursuant to its jurisdiction over child abuse and neglect, may obtain an order overruling a parental decision and ordering appropriate services, including medical care, whenever the parental child-rearing decisions endanger the child.

The fact that parental rights are constitutionally protected does not alter this result, even when the parental choice is religiously motivated: “the power of the parent, even when linked to a free exercise claim, may be subject to limitation . . . if it appears that parental decisions will jeopardize the health or safety of the child, or have a potential for significant social burdens.” Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 234–35 (1972). See also Petersen v. Rogers, 433 S.E.2d 770, 775 (N.C. Ct. App. 1993) (although court may not inquire into parent’s general religious beliefs, it may inquire into “religious practices . . . if such practices may adversely affect the physical or mental health or safety of the child.”); Jay M. Zitter, Annot., Power of Court or Other Public Agency to Order Medical Treatment Over Parental Religious Objections for Child Whose Life Is Not Immediately Endangered, 21 A.L.R. 5th 248 (1994).

[NOTE: Here, a child-neglect action would most likely be triggered by the daughter’s physician, who is almost certainly a mandated neglect reporter under state law. However, the father could also file a neglect report. A neglect action is typically commenced after someone with knowledge of a situation that endangers the child files a report with the appropriate state agency. State laws typically require health care workers, among others, to report suspected abuse and neglect. After receiving a report, the agency investigates and files a neglect petition on the child’s behalf if its investigation confirms the allegations of neglect. If the court finds that a child is neglected, it may order parents to undertake appropriate actions, order a state agency to provide the child with services in the home, or even remove the child from parental custody and place her in foster care.]

Point Two (20%)

Although a court may not deny a parent custody based on the parent's religious faith, it may deny custody based on a threat to the child's health or safety. Because failing to take asthma medications is life-threatening, a court could, in a divorce action filed by the father, award custody to the father if the court finds that the mother will persist in her refusal to provide the daughter with her medications.

A child custody contest between parents is decided on the basis of the child's best interests. Under the best interests test, the court is free to consider a wide range of factors.

With respect to parental religion, the Establishment Clause forbids a court to favor one religion over another. However, although "[t]he court cannot evaluate the religion, [it can] . . . instead evaluate[] the parent's ability to provide for the physical and mental health needs of the child." WALTER WADLINGTON & RAYMOND C. O'BRIEN, FAMILY LAW IN PERSPECTIVE 162 (2001). Because of the sensitivity of the constitutional issues at stake, courts have typically refused to consider religion unless the evidence shows that the parent's religious practice would imperil the child's well-being. See id. Some courts have additionally required that a custody order "make the least possible infringement upon the parent's liberty interests consistent with the child's well-being." Osier v. Osier, 410 A.2d 1027, 1030 (Me. 1980). See also Carl E. Schneider, Religion and Child Custody, 25 U. MICH. J. L. REFORM 879 (Spring/Summer 1992).

Here, the daughter's physician has said that failure to take asthma medications is life-threatening. Given that the daughter is only seven and needs parental supervision in order to ensure medication compliance, should the father file a divorce action, a court may thus deny the mother custody based on her refusal to administer the medications, and may award custody to the father.

Legal Problems

- (1) Do the caller's statements to the police dispatcher fit a hearsay exception?
- (2) Would admission of the caller's statements to the police dispatcher violate the Confrontation Clause?
- (3) Do the sister's statements to the officer fit a hearsay exception?
- (4) Would admission of the sister's statements to the officer violate the Confrontation Clause?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The court should allow admission of the caller's out-of-court statements to the police dispatcher on the authenticated 911 recording because they fit the hearsay exceptions for "present sense impressions" and "excited utterances." The caller's statements may also fit the exception for "statements made for medical diagnosis or treatment."

Admission of these statements would not violate the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Although the caller is unavailable to testify and the boyfriend will have had no pretrial opportunity to cross-examine her, the caller's statements are not testimonial because the evidence demonstrates that the reasonable and objective primary purpose of both the caller and the police dispatcher was to address an ongoing emergency.

The sister's statements to the officer fit the hearsay exception for "excited utterances."

However, admission of the sister's statements through the testimony of the officer would violate the Confrontation Clause because the sister is unavailable to testify, the boyfriend will have had no opportunity to cross-examine her, and her statements are testimonial. The sister's statements are testimonial because the reasonable and objective primary purpose of the sister and the officer was not to address an ongoing emergency, but to establish past events potentially relevant to a later criminal prosecution of the boyfriend.

Point One (20%)

If offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, that the boyfriend attacked the sister, the caller's statements to the police dispatcher are hearsay. However, her statements fit the hearsay exceptions for "present sense impressions" and "excited utterances," and probably fit the exception for statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis.

As an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of what the caller told the police dispatcher (i.e., that her sister's boyfriend was "out of control," had thrown a broken beer bottle at her sister, and that her sister was bleeding), the caller's statements on the authenticated 911 recording are hearsay. However, the court should overrule defense counsel's hearsay objection because the caller's out-of-court statements fit two hearsay exceptions.

First, the caller's statements fit the hearsay exceptions for "present sense impressions." Pursuant to Rule 803(1), a present sense impression is "[a] statement describing or explaining an event or condition made while or immediately after the declarant perceived it." FED. R. EVID. 803(1) (emphasis added). In this case, the caller described the events to the police dispatcher as they were happening.

Second, the caller's statements also fit the hearsay exception for "excited utterances," pursuant to Rule 803(2). An excited utterance is "[a] statement relating to a startling event or condition, made while the declarant was under the stress or excitement that it caused." FED. R. EVID. 803(2). Here, the caller telephoned 911 while she was watching her sister's boyfriend violently assault her sister. The caller's statements related to the startling event of the assault on her sister. Moreover, because the caller made the statements as she watched the assault, she would have been under the stress caused by the assault on her sister at the time her statements were made.

Third, some of the caller's statements probably also fit the hearsay exception for "statements made for medical diagnosis or treatment." Statements that fit this exception must have been "made for—and [] reasonably pertinent to—medical diagnosis or treatment; and describe[] medical history; past or present symptoms or sensations; their inception; or their general cause." FED. R. EVID. 803(4). Here, the police dispatcher asked specific questions about the sister's injuries and the caller stated that her sister had blood on her arm. Thus, this portion of the caller's statement was relevant to the sister's medical condition and the fact that she might need medical treatment.

[NOTE: The questions from the police dispatcher are not hearsay because they are not assertions.]

Point Two (25%)

The Confrontation Clause does not bar the admission of an out-of-court statement when the objective primary purpose of the interrogation was to address an ongoing emergency.

Even when, as here, an out-of-court statement falls within a hearsay exception, the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment of the United States Constitution will sometimes preclude the admission of the statement at trial. The Confrontation Clause gives a defendant in a criminal case the right to be confronted by the witnesses against him. U.S. CONST. AMEND. VI ("In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him."). In Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004), the Supreme Court held that the admission of out-of-court "testimonial" statements violates a defendant's right to confrontation if the witness is unavailable to testify at trial and the defense has not had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the witness. Id. at 59. In this case, the caller is unavailable because the prosecutor's efforts to secure her appearance at trial have been unsuccessful, and the defense has not had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the caller.

Thus, the critical constitutional question is whether the caller's statements to the police dispatcher were "testimonial." After Crawford, many statements made to police officers in the course of an interrogation are testimonial. Id. at 52–53 ("interrogations by law enforcement officers fall squarely within that class [of testimonial statements]"). However, in Davis v. Washington, the Court clarified that when witnesses make statements to the police "under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency," these statements are not testimonial. See Davis

v. Washington, 547 U.S. 813, 822 (2006). More recently, in Michigan v. Bryant, 131 S.Ct. 1143 (2011), the Court elaborated on the “primary purpose of the interrogation” standard, noting that primary purpose should be determined using “a combined inquiry that accounts for both the declarant and the interrogator.” Bryant, 131 S.Ct. at 1160. The Bryant Court also specified that “[a]n assessment of whether an emergency that threatens the police and public is ongoing cannot narrowly focus on whether the threat solely to the first victim has been neutralized because the threat to first responders and to the public may continue,” id. at 1158, and that “the duration and scope of an emergency may depend in part on the type of weapon employed,” id., and/or “[t]he medical condition of the victim,” id. at 1159.

Here, the caller telephoned the police for assistance while the boyfriend was assaulting the sister. The sister was injured and bleeding, and the boyfriend could have posed a threat to the caller and/or first responders. Thus, it is clear that the caller made statements to the police dispatcher while the emergency was ongoing. This conclusion is reinforced by the fact that the police dispatcher’s questions were aimed at addressing the ongoing emergency (i.e., the dispatcher attempted to ascertain the extent of the concurrent violence, the level of danger, the parties involved, and whether anybody was injured). Based on these facts, the caller and the police dispatcher both had a primary purpose of resolving the ongoing emergency created by the boyfriend’s violent physical assault of the sister. Thus, the caller’s statements were not testimonial and admission of these statements does not violate the Confrontation Clause. See Bryant, 131 S.Ct. at 1162; Davis, 547 U.S. at 827.

Point Three (25%)

The sister’s statements to the officer fall under the “excited utterance” exception to the hearsay rule.

The court should overrule defense counsel’s hearsay objection to admission of the sister’s statements to the officer. Testimony repeating the sister’s out-of-court statements would be hearsay because the prosecution is seeking to use the statements to prove the truth of the matter asserted by the sister (that the boyfriend had just attacked her). However, the sister’s statements would be admissible pursuant to the “excited utterance” exception to the hearsay rule. FED. R. EVID. 803(2). As discussed above in Point One, an excited utterance is “[a] statement relating to a startling event or condition made while the declarant was under the stress or excitement that it caused.” Id. Certainly the boyfriend’s violent attack was a startling event and the sister was clearly still “under the stress or excitement that it caused” when the officer arrived at her house five minutes later. The statements were made within minutes of the boyfriend’s violent conduct, the sister was in a highly emotional and agitated state (she was in tears when she spoke to the officer), and her statements related directly to the boyfriend’s attack, which was the event that caused her to be excited and upset.

[NOTE: The sister’s statements here do not fit the hearsay exception for statements made for the purpose of medical treatment, FED. R. EVID. 803(4), because she specifically declined the medical assistance offered by the officer.]

Point Four (30%)

The Confrontation Clause prohibits the use of the sister’s statements to the officer because they are testimonial. The objective primary purpose of this interrogation was not to address an ongoing emergency, but to establish past events potentially relevant to a later criminal prosecution.

The dispositive question is whether admission of this out-of-court statement would be precluded under the Confrontation Clause. As discussed above in Point Two, the Supreme Court defined testimonial out-of-court statements that require confrontation in Crawford, Davis, and Bryant. Unlike the caller's statements to the police dispatcher during the boyfriend's attack, the sister's statements to the officer were made when the emergency was over and described what the boyfriend had done in the past. Although just a short period of time had passed and the sister was clearly still upset about the boyfriend's attack, the boyfriend was now locked in the back of the police car and no longer posed any danger to the sister, the officer, or anyone else.

In 2006, in Davis v. Washington, the Supreme Court focused on the question of whether the primary purpose of each interrogation was to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. In 2011, the Bryant Court significantly elaborated on the operation of the standard in a range of contexts. The Bryant Court cautioned that "[a]n assessment of whether an emergency that threatens the police and public is ongoing cannot narrowly focus on whether the threat solely to the first victim has been neutralized because the threat to first responders and to the public may continue." Bryant, 131 S. Ct. at 1158.

Here, the facts indicate that the emergency was resolved by the time the sister made her statement. See State v. Wright, 726 N.W.2d 464, 476 (Minn. 2007) (finding no ongoing emergency after alleged assailant was placed in a police car). Under these circumstances, the primary purpose of the interrogation was not to resolve an ongoing emergency but to establish past events potentially relevant to a later criminal prosecution of the boyfriend. See Davis, 547 U.S. at 822. Because the sister's statements were testimonial, she is unavailable to testify at trial, and the boyfriend has had no opportunity to cross-examine her, the admission of the sister's statements through the trial testimony of the officer would violate the Confrontation Clause.

The facts specify that the prosecutor seeks to admit the caller's and the sister's statements to prove the attack (i.e., as substantive evidence). However, if either statement were admitted for a non-truth purpose (e.g., to prove the caller's or the sister's state of mind), it would not be barred by the Confrontation Clause.

Legal Problems

- (1) May a person in possession of a check on which the payee's indorsement has been forged recover from the drawer if the drawee refuses to pay the check?
- (2) Is a promise to pay to the order of bearer a fixed amount of money plus an interest rate determined by reference to an external standard a negotiable instrument and, thus, a note?
- (3) Must the maker of a note that is payable to bearer pay a person to whom the note has been transferred for value if the maker has defenses against the payment obligation of which the transferee had no notice?

DISCUSSION

Summary

If a check is dishonored, the drawer owes the amount of the check to a person entitled to enforce it. Because the check was stolen from the man and the man's indorsement was forged, the check-cashing business was not a "holder" of the check and was not entitled to enforce it. Thus, the friend, as drawer of the check, has no obligation to the check-cashing business.

The document that the robber sold to the investor was a negotiable note. Because the note was payable to bearer, the investor became a holder of the note when the investor gained possession of it. As a result, the investor is entitled to enforce the note. It can be enforced against the man because the man was the maker of the note. The investor is also a holder in due course and is therefore not subject to the man's defense of never having received the loan.

Point One (30%)

The obligation of the drawer of a check is that, upon dishonor of the check, the drawer will pay the amount of the check to a person entitled to enforce it. Because the check was payable to the man, who did not indorse it or transfer it, the check-cashing business will not qualify as a person entitled to enforce the check, and the friend has no obligation to pay it.

The friend was the drawer of the check. Upon dishonor of a check, the drawer is obligated to pay the amount of the check to a person entitled to enforce it. Thus, the check-cashing business has a legal right to recover from the friend only if the business is a person entitled to enforce the check. UCC § 3-414.

The check-cashing business would be entitled to enforce the check if it was a holder of the check, or if it was in possession of it and had the rights of a holder. UCC § 3-301.

A holder is a person in possession of a check that is payable to that person or to bearer. UCC § 1-201(b)(21)(A). Although the check-cashing business had possession of the check, the check was not payable to that business nor to bearer. As written, the check was payable to the order of the man. The man didn't sign the back of the check—his signature was forged by the robber. If the man had signed the back of the check, the signature would have qualified as an indorsement in blank, which would have had the effect of converting the check to a bearer instrument. UCC § 3-205(b). Or the man could have indorsed the check to the check-cashing business, making it payable to that business. But the robber's forgery of the man's signature does not count as the man's signature. UCC § 3-403(a). As a result, the check is still payable to the order of the man and the check-cashing business cannot qualify as a holder of it.

The check-cashing business would also be entitled to enforce the check if it had "the rights of a holder." UCC § 3-301(ii). A person can obtain the "rights of a holder" by taking the check by "transfer" from a holder. UCC § 3-203(b). Here, the robber did transfer the check to the check-cashing business, see UCC § 3-203(a), but the robber was not a holder of the check, nor did the robber have rights of a holder that he could transfer to the check-cashing business. The robber was not a holder because the check was not payable to the robber. The robber did not have the "rights of a holder," i.e., the man's rights, because the man did not voluntarily deliver the check to the robber. See UCC § 3-203(a) ("transfer" of an instrument is a voluntary delivery for purpose of giving the transferee the right to enforce an instrument); the robber stole the check and did not become a holder or acquire the rights of a holder. Because the robber did not have the rights of a holder, the robber's delivery of the check to the check-cashing business did not transfer such rights to the business.

Accordingly, the check-cashing business is not a person entitled to enforce the check and the friend has no obligation to it.

[NOTE #1: Some examinees might mention that the check-cashing business could theoretically qualify as a person entitled to enforce a check if the business were a person who was entitled to enforce the check at the time when it was lost, stolen, or destroyed. UCC § 3-301(iii). But no facts support such an argument.]

[NOTE #2: Some examinees might also argue that the friend has no obligation to pay the check because it was not technically dishonored, given that it was never presented for payment by a person entitled to enforce it. This would be a correct analysis, see UCC §§ 3-502(b)(2) and 3-501(a), and an examinee who concludes that the friend has no obligation on the check because it was not dishonored should receive full credit.]

Point Two (30%)

The document signed by the man and given to the friend was a negotiable instrument because it was an unconditional promise to pay a fixed amount of money to bearer and contained no other promises or undertakings. The fact that the note bore interest at a rate requiring reference to an external source does not prevent it from qualifying as a negotiable instrument.

A negotiable instrument is an unconditional promise or order to pay a fixed amount of money, with or without interest, if it is payable to bearer or to order and does not state any other undertaking or instruction. UCC § 3-104(a). A "promise" is a written undertaking to pay money signed by the person undertaking to pay. UCC § 3-103(a)(12). Based on the facts presented, the man's undertaking clearly qualifies as a "promise." Since the promise was unconditional, it was payable to bearer, the amount of money was fixed in the promise, and the promise did not state any other undertakings or instructions, it qualifies as a negotiable instrument. A negotiable instrument that is a promise qualifies as a "note." UCC § 3-104(e).

The fact that determination of the amount of interest requires reference to the prime interest rate of First Bank does not mean that the promise is not for a fixed amount of money. Interest may be stated at a fixed or variable rate, and may require reference to information not contained in the instrument. UCC § 3-112(b).

Point Three (40%)

The investor was a holder of the note, so the man had an obligation to pay the investor the amount of the note when it was due. The investor qualified as a holder in due course, so the man's defense that he never received the amount of the loan could not be raised against the investor.

As maker of the note, the man had an obligation to pay the amount of the note when due to a person entitled to enforce it. UCC § 3-412. The investor was a holder of the note because the investor was in possession of it and it was payable to bearer. UCC § 1-201(b)(21). Accordingly, the investor qualified as a person entitled to enforce it. UCC § 3-301(i).

If the man's failure to receive the money from the friend would qualify, as a matter of contract law, as a defense to his obligation to repay a loan, he could raise that as a defense to his obligation to pay the investor on the note. But such a defense cannot be raised against a person who qualifies as a holder in due course. This is because a holder in due course is subject to no defenses except the so-called "real defenses" listed in UCC § 3-305(a)(1), none of which is applicable here. The man's defense that he failed to receive consideration for the note cannot be asserted against a holder in due course. UCC § 3-305(a)(2), comment 2 ("instruments issued without consideration or for which promised performance has not been given" can be enforced by a holder in due course).

On the facts of this problem, the investor meets all requirements to qualify as a holder in due course. As described above, the investor was a holder. The investor paid $2,500 for the note, thus taking it for value. The facts state that the investor took the note in good faith and without notice of any claims, defenses, or defects affecting the note. UCC § 3-302(a). Thus, the investor was a holder in due course.

As a holder in due course, the investor is not subject to the man's defense on the note and has a legal right to recover the amount of the note from the man.

- (1) Did Alice and Carla have any legal basis to object to Bob's co-ownership of the Metro Inn?
- (2) Is the designer entitled to hold Alice, Bob, and/or Carla personally liable to the designer
 - (a) because the winding up was improper, or
 - (b) because of the piercing-the-veil theory?

DISCUSSION

Summary

ABC is a limited liability company (LLC) governed by state LLC law and the terms of its operating agreement. Alice and Carla most likely do not have any legal basis to object to Bob's ownership interest in a competing business because of the express terms of ABC's operating agreement.

Alice, Bob, and Carla likely are personally liable to the designer for ABC's debt up to the amount each member received from the sale of ABC's assets because the attempted dissolution and winding up of ABC was improper. Alternatively, they may be personally liable to the designer on a piercing-the-veil theory because their siphoning of the proceeds from the sale of ABC's assets was inequitable, though not necessarily because the company's books failed to reflect Alice's payment of company debts.

Point One (30%)

Alice and Carla most likely do not have any legal basis to object to Bob's decision to own an interest in a competing business in light of the express terms of the ABC operating agreement.

ABC is a limited liability company (LLC). An LLC is a form of business association that combines many of the most attractive features of corporations and partnerships. Like corporations, an LLC generally provides its investors—called “members”—with limited liability for firm debts. Like general partnerships, LLCs provide members with considerable flexibility in developing rules for decision making and control. Because LLCs are a relatively new form of business association bearing many similarities to corporations and partnerships, courts often turn to either corporate or partnership law to analyze issues in the LLC context.

Here, the issue of whether Alice and Carla have any legal basis to object to Bob's ownership of an interest in a competing firm will turn on the duties and obligations that Bob owes to his fellow LLC members. Courts generally hold that members of an LLC, like partners in a general partnership, are in a “fiduciary relationship.” See McConnell v. Hunt Sports Enterprises, 725 N.E.2d 1193, 1214–16 (Ohio Ct. App. 1999). This fiduciary relationship is defined as a relationship in which members owe one another the duty of utmost trust and loyalty. Id. As a result, in an LLC, as in a general partnership, direct competition by members would ordinarily be precluded as a violation of the duty of loyalty. Id.; see also ULLCA § 409(b)(3) (members have a duty to “refrain from competing with the company in the conduct of the company’s activities before the dissolution of the company”).

Although the question does not state that ABC’s 100-room luxury hotel project and the 200-room Metro Inn would compete, their similarity and proximity in the same town suggest that they would likely compete. Further, the fact that Alice and Carla are bothered by Bob’s interest in Metro Inn suggests that competition is a strong possibility.

However, here the LLC operating agreement expressly allows members to have an interest in a business that competes with the firm. Under most LLC statutes, members of an LLC can agree to restrict or limit the duty of loyalty, provided the opt-out is specified in the operating agreement. Thus, the operating agreement controls over the provisions of the statute. In this case, when they became members of ABC, Alice and Carla agreed to abide by the terms of the operating agreement, which expressly allow any member (i.e., Bob) to manage, own, and otherwise have an interest in a business that competes with the firm.

States differ slightly on how the opt-out must be structured in order to be effective. Some states, including Delaware, provide for total freedom of contract. See Elf Atochem North America, Inc. v. Jaffari, 727 A.2d 286 (Del. 1999) (applying Delaware LLC Act § 18-1101(b)). In these states, the terms of the operating agreement govern, unless they conflict with a mandatory statutory provision designed to protect third parties. Id. at 292. Since Bob’s interest in Metro Inn involves only the relationship between the contracting members—Alice, Bob, and Carla—this exception is not implicated.

However, most states that permit opt-outs of the duty of loyalty follow the general approach set forth in the Uniform Limited Liability Company Act (2006). According to ULLCA § 110(d)(1)(C), “If not manifestly unreasonable, the operating agreement may . . . restrict or eliminate the duty . . . to refrain from competing with the company in the conduct of the company’s business before the dissolution of the company.” In addition, so long as it is not “manifestly unreasonable,” the operating agreement may also “identify specific types or categories of activities that do not violate the duty of loyalty.” Id. § 110(d)(2).

In this case, the operating agreement is not a general waiver of the duty of loyalty, but specifies the activities that do not violate the duty, namely “managing, owning, or otherwise having an interest” in any competing business. Further, most courts would likely find this provision not “manifestly unreasonable.” See McConnell, 725 N.E.2d at 1193.

Whether the provision is “manifestly unreasonable” is a question of fact. Nonetheless, assuming that Alice and Carla each had notice of the provision when they signed the operating agreement, it will be difficult for them to claim surprise. The provision clearly allowed each member to manage, own, or otherwise have an interest in a competing business. This type of provision, which is typical in commercial real estate deals, appears reasonable. Many investors will likely want to be free to invest and exercise ownership rights in other similar real estate ventures in the same area or town.

Point Two(a) (35%)

The designer may be able to hold Alice, Bob, and Carla proportionately liable, up to the amount of the proceeds each received in dissolution, for ABC’s debt to the designer because the winding up of ABC following dissolution was improper.

Like a corporation, the LLC provides limited liability for its members. ULLCA § 304(a). This means that members of an LLC may not generally be held personally liable for the debts of the firm. The general rule, however, does not apply in a few situations, including when (1) the proper procedures for dissolution and winding up have not been followed, and (2) a court decides to “pierce the LLC veil.”

Here, the designer may be able to hold Alice, Bob, and Carla liable for ABC’s debts on the ground that the winding up of ABC was improper. In the absence of a contrary agreement or court order, dissolution of an LLC requires consent of all the members. ULLCA § 701(a)(2). In this case, the requirement of unanimous consent has been met since Bob gave his consent to Carla and Alice selling all of ABC’s assets and property. Although ABC was properly dissolved by the unanimous consent of the three members, see id., the problem was that the winding up process was flawed.

After dissolution, as part of the winding up process, the LLC must provide notice of the dissolution to creditors so that they can make claims against the dissolving entity. ULLCA §§ 702(b)(1), 703 (notice procedure for “known claims”); see also New Horizons Supply Cooperative v. Haack, No. 98-1865, 1999 WL 33499 (Wis. Ct. App. Jan. 28, 1999); LARRY E. RIBSTEIN & ROBERT R. KEATINGE ON LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES § 11.6 (2d ed. 2004). The notice sent to creditors must outline the steps that are necessary for enforcing their claims. ULLCA § 703(b). Here, it is clear from Carla’s statement that the designer’s claim was known at the time of dissolution and that ABC did not provide sufficient notice to the designer of the dissolution.

When such procedures have not been followed, and if the LLC’s assets have been liquidated and distributed to the members, then a creditor’s claim against the LLC may be enforced against each of the LLC members to the extent of the member’s proportionate share of the claim or to the extent of the assets of the LLC distributed to the member in liquidation, whichever is less. ULLCA § 704(d)(2). However, a member’s total liability for creditor claims may not exceed the total value of assets distributed to the member in dissolution. Id.

While the facts state that no articles of dissolution were filed with the state, the filing of such notice is not required for a proper dissolution of an LLC. See ULLCA § 702(b)(2)(A). As a result, the designer can recover proportionately from Alice, Bob, and Carla personally for ABC’s debt up to the amount that each member received in the improper winding up after dissolution.

Point Two(b) (35%)

The designer may be able to hold Alice, Bob, and Carla jointly and severally liable for the debt it is owed from ABC on a “piercing the LLC veil” theory.

As an alternative basis for holding Alice, Bob, and Carla personally liable for ABC’s debts, the designer could pursue a claim for piercing the LLC veil. Piercing the veil in the LLC context is a common-law equitable doctrine that prevents members from hiding behind the veil of limited liability in situations where they have improperly used the LLC form. See Kaycee Land and Livestock v. Flahive, 46 P.3d 323 (Wy. 2002). To pierce the LLC veil, courts generally apply the same analysis and factors as in cases where a third party attempts to pierce the corporate veil and hold shareholders of a corporation personally liable for firm debts. This requires analyzing whether members have treated the LLC as a separate entity or whether it has instead become the “alter ego” of the members. If the latter is true, members will not be permitted to “enjoy immunity from individual liability for the LLC’s acts that cause damage to third parties.” Id. at 327. Each member for whom the veil is pierced becomes subject to joint and several liability to the creditor bringing the claim.

Among the factors that courts have used under the alter ego doctrine in the corporate context is whether the “dominant shareholder siphoned corporate funds,” a factor also used in the LLC context. See Wilson v. Thorn Energy, LLC, 787 F. Supp. 2d 286, 295 (S.D.N.Y. 2011). In arguing for piercing the LLC veil, the designer will likely assert that the three members of ABC improperly distributed to themselves the proceeds of the asset sale, thus disregarding the separateness of firm and personal finances. The use of business funds for personal use is a frequent factor for piercing in both the corporate and LLC contexts.

Alice, Bob, and Carla, all of whom received the proceeds of the asset sale when ABC was liquidated, will have a difficult time arguing that this distribution was not inequitable. Although they did not misrepresent ABC's weak financial situation to the designer, their siphoning of assets would seem to be conclusive. See Comment to ULLCA § 304(b) ("key piercing factor" is the disregard of LLC's "economic separateness" from its owners, such as when owner "writes checks on the company's account for personal expenses"). In fact, in the corporate context when courts determine that business assets have been intermingled and used for personal use, piercing follows in about 85 percent of the cases. See Robert B. Thompson, Piercing the Corporate Veil: An Empirical Study, 76 CORNELL L. REV. 1036, 1063 (1991).

In addition, courts have identified the intermingling of personal and business funds as a factor for piercing in the corporate context, as well as in the LLC context. See Sea-Land Services, Inc. v. Pepper Source, 941 F.2d 519 (7th Cir. 1991). The designer might point to Alice's use of personal funds to pay the concrete supplier and other creditors of ABC, expecting that ABC would later reimburse her. The designer might further assert that Carla and Alice engaged in "fraud" by altering ABC's financial statements to cover up Alice's personal payments, as further justification for piercing the LLC veil on equitable grounds.

Nonetheless, Alice, Bob, and Carla may be able to argue that the failure to follow corporate formalities in the accounting of Alice's "advances of funds" to the LLC (that is, her undisclosed payment of firm debts, subject to later reimbursement) is not enough to pierce the veil. The LLC statutes in most states, including those that follow the Uniform Limited Liability Company Act, provide that "the failure of a limited liability company to observe any particular formalities relating to . . . management of its activities" is not a proper ground for imposing personal liability on members for debts of the firm. See ULLCA § 304(b). Moreover, because Alice and Carla were trying to keep the business afloat during difficult financial times, Alice's undisclosed advances of funds did not harm the firm's creditors, but actually worked to their advantage. In this sense, Alice's payments could be equated to additional capital contributions to the firm, not the improper siphoning of assets. Thus, taken alone, the off-the-books advances by Alice to ABC might not be sufficient to justify piercing, but this does not "cleanse" the inequitable nature of the distribution of proceeds to the three members when ABC was dissolved while the firm's debts remained unpaid.

[NOTE: The question specifically asks whether Alice, Bob, and Carla are "personally" liable to the designer and not whether the three might be liable to the LLC as members who consented to an improper distribution by the LLC—that is, a distribution that rendered the company unable to pay its debts as they became due. See ULLCA § 406(a) (imposing liability on members in a member-managed LLC who consent to an improper distribution, as defined in ULLCA § 405).]

[NOTE: California, Idaho, Iowa, Nebraska, Utah, and Wyoming have enacted the 2006 act. (Kansas and Minnesota are considering doing so.)]

CONTRACTS ANALYSIS

(Contracts I.A.1.; II.G.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Is there a contract between the manufacturer and the chef for the purchase and sale of 10 knives?
- (2) Is enforceability of the contract between the manufacturer and the chef subject to the statute of frauds?
- (3) Does the document sent by the manufacturer to the chef satisfy the applicable statute of frauds?
- (4) Is the chef's handwritten note to the manufacturer a "record in confirmation" of the contract sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds?
- (5) Does the manufacturer's shipment of 6 knives and the chef's acceptance of those 6 knives establish the existence of a contract sufficiently to allow its enforcement as to all 10 knives?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The manufacturer and the chef clearly entered into a contract pursuant to which the manufacturer agreed to sell 10 knives to the chef for $1,000. Because it is a contract for the sale of goods, the contract is governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. Even though the contract exists, a contract for the sale of goods for a price of $500 or more is not enforceable against a party unless there is a writing sufficient to indicate that a contract has been made that is signed by that party (or unless an exception applies).

Here, the contract price is more than $500, so a writing signed by the manufacturer is required in order to enforce the contract against it unless an exception applies. The document included with the knives is a writing sufficient to indicate that a contract has been made, but it is not clear whether that writing has been "signed" by the manufacturer. If the document constitutes a writing signed by the manufacturer, the contract is enforceable against the manufacturer for only six knives—the quantity mentioned in that writing—and not for the remaining four knives. Even if the document does not constitute a writing signed by the manufacturer, the fact that the manufacturer delivered, and the chef paid for, six knives would make the contract enforceable for the six knives but not the remaining four knives.

Point One (20%)

The manufacturer and the chef entered into a contract at the trade show when they agreed that the chef would buy 10 knives from the manufacturer for $100 each.

Because the knives are goods (see UCC § 2-105(1)), the situation presented by these facts is governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. UCC § 2-204(1) provides that “[a] contract for sale of goods may be made in any manner sufficient to show agreement, including conduct by both parties which recognizes the existence of such a contract.” The conversation between the manufacturer and the chef clearly shows an agreement pursuant to which the manufacturer would sell, and the chef would buy, 10 knives at $100 each. Thus, UCC § 2-204 is satisfied and there is a contract for the chef to buy 10 knives from the manufacturer.

Point Two (15%)

The contract between the manufacturer and the chef is a contract for the sale of goods for a price of $500 or more and therefore is subject to the statute of frauds in Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code.

UCC § 2-201(1) provides that “a contract for the sale of goods for the price of $500 or more is not enforceable by way of action or defense unless there is some writing sufficient to indicate that a contract for sale has been made between the parties and signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought” Here, the contract between the manufacturer and the chef was for the sale of goods (the knives) for a price of $1,000. Therefore, it is subject to the writing requirement of UCC § 2-201(1) unless an exception applies.

Point Three (25%)

The document enclosed in the shipping box with the knives is sufficient to indicate that a contract has been made, but it is not clear that it has been “signed” by the manufacturer—the party against whom enforcement is sought. If it is a sufficient writing, it makes the contract enforceable, but only to the quantity of goods stated in the writing: six knives.

UCC § 2-201(1) requires that, for a contract within its scope to be enforceable, there be a writing sufficient to indicate that a contract for sale has been made that is signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought. The facts indicate that the document enclosed with the six knives that were shipped to the chef stated in its entirety: “It is a pleasure to do business with you. Enclosed, pursuant to our agreement, are six knives. Please remit the balance due of $600 at your earliest convenience.” This document is a writing. See UCC § 1-201(b)(43). Further, its contents clearly indicate that a contract for sale has been made: it states that the knives are enclosed “pursuant to our agreement” and expresses “pleasure to do business with” the chef.

In order for the contract to be enforceable against the manufacturer under UCC § 2-201(1), the document must be “signed” by the manufacturer. The facts do not state that the document bore a signature (in the conventional sense of that term) of the manufacturer, but they do state that the document was on the manufacturer’s letterhead. As the term “signed” is used in § 2-201(1), the meaning is broader than simply bearing a conventional signature. “‘Signed’ includes using any symbol executed or adopted with present intention to adopt or accept a writing.” UCC § 1-201(39). The Official Comment to UCC § 1-201 states that “in appropriate cases [the symbol] may be found in a billhead or letterhead.” Accordingly, some cases have held that a document on company letterhead can constitute a signed writing as long as the requisite intent is present. See, e.g., Automotive Spares Corp. v. Archer Bearings Co., 382 F. Supp. 513 (N.D. Ill. 1974). Thus, it is possible, but not certain, that the requirement of a signed writing is satisfied by the document, depending on whether the letterhead was used “with a present intention to adopt or accept” the document.

Although the writing referred to in UCC § 2-201(1) need not contain detailed information about the contract, “the contract is not enforceable . . . beyond the quantity of goods shown in such writing.” Here, the document included by the manufacturer with the knives that were shipped showed a quantity of only 6 knives. Accordingly, even if the document qualifies as a writing signed by the manufacturer, the document is not sufficient to make the contract enforceable beyond 6 knives. Thus, this writing alone does not provide a basis for the chef to enforce the manufacturer’s obligation to ship the remaining 4 knives pursuant to the oral agreement for a sale of 10 knives.

[NOTE: Some examinees may mention that the manufacturer’s shipment of only 6 knives (when 10 knives were ordered) violates the perfect tender rule and that the chef could have rejected those knives. That is true, but irrelevant. The chef was entitled to accept a less than perfect tender, and such acceptance will not preclude the chef from enforcing the contract for the full amount—if the chef can overcome the statute of frauds problem.]

Point Four (20%)

The chef’s note is arguably a letter of confirmation of a contract for the sale of 10 knives. If it is, then it satisfies the statute of frauds because the manufacturer failed to object to it within 10 days. However, because the note was unsigned, it is unlikely to be given this effect.

The statute of frauds can be satisfied in a contract between merchants if the party seeking enforcement of the contract has sent the other party a confirmation of the contract that would itself satisfy the statute of frauds against the enforcing party. In other words, if the chef sends a written contract confirmation to the manufacturer that would bind the chef, the confirmation will also bind the manufacturer if the manufacturer does not object to it promptly (i.e., within 10 days). See UCC § 2-201(2).

Here, both the chef and the manufacturer are merchants. The manufacturer deals in goods of the kind at issue, and the chef’s occupation is such that he would have “knowledge or skills peculiar to the . . . goods involved in the transaction” (restaurant-quality carving knives). See UCC § 2-104(1).

However, in all likelihood, no confirmation that would satisfy the statute of frauds was sent by the chef on these facts. Although the chef sent a note to the manufacturer requesting the remaining four knives, that note must have been signed in order to satisfy the statute of frauds. While the note was handwritten and accompanied by a signed check, the note itself was not “signed” by the chef as that term is defined in UCC § 1-201(39). It did not contain any “symbol executed or adopted with present intention to authenticate” the writing. A creative examinee might argue that the chef’s decision to handwrite the note indicates an intent to authenticate by using handwriting alone, but the UCC definition of “signed” seems clearly to contemplate some authenticating symbol in addition to the content of the writing itself.

Point Five (20%)

The chef’s acceptance and payment for six knives eliminates the statute-of-fraud problem as to those six knives, but does not make the contract enforceable as to the remaining four knives.

A contract that does not satisfy the statute of frauds is nonetheless enforceable as to “goods for which payment has been made and accepted or which have been received and accepted.” See UCC § 2-201(3)(c). In this case, however, payment has been made for only six knives, and only six knives have been received and accepted. Thus, this exception would not enable enforcement of the contract for the remaining four knives but, rather, only for the six knives already delivered.

[NOTE: There are other exceptions to the statute of frauds that are not at issue on these facts, but that might be discussed by some examinees. One of those exceptions applies if the goods are specially manufactured for the buyer and are not suitable for sale to others. See UCC § 2-201(3)(a). Here, there is no indication that the knives are specially manufactured.

Another exception applies if the party against whom enforcement is sought admits in pleading, testimony, or otherwise in court that a contract was made. See UCC § 2-201(3)(b). Here, there is no indication of such admission by the manufacturer.

Some examinees may also note that the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA) and/or the federal Electronic Signature in Global and National Commerce Act (E-SIGN) allow the writing requirement of UCC § 2-201 to be satisfied by an electronic communication. This is true, but it does not change the answer or the analysis, as there is no electronic communication that would satisfy the requirements of UCC § 2-201.]

REAL PROPERTY ANALYSIS

(Real Property III.B.4. & F.; IV.A.1. & C.1.; V.B.1.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1)(a) Is there an implied warranty against latent defects in a newly constructed home?
- (1)(b) Does an implied warranty against latent defects protect a remote grantee?
- (2) Is a buyer who purchases real property from a mortgagor personally liable on the mortgage debt even if the buyer has not expressly assumed the mortgage obligation?
- (3) What are the obligations of a grantor who has conveyed title to real property with a quitclaim deed?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Although under the common law, there were no implied warranties in the sale of a home, this caveat emptor approach has been abandoned with respect to builders of new homes who impliedly warrant that the home is free of latent defects. However, courts are divided as to whether this implied warranty runs to remote grantees who are not in privity with the home builder. Some courts require privity; others do not, reasoning that harm to a remote grantee is foreseeable.

A purchaser of real estate from a mortgagor has no liability on the mortgage obligation unless he expressly or impliedly assumes that obligation. Here, the man did not expressly assume the woman's mortgage obligation, but it is unclear if he impliedly assumed it. If the bank successfully forecloses on the man's house, he has no right to recover his loss from the woman because he took under a quitclaim, not a warranty, deed.

Because there is an implied warranty against latent defects in the sale of a new home running from the builder to the buyer, the builder would be liable to the woman, the original buyer, for damages caused by the defective concrete.

Under the doctrine of caveat emptor, a home builder makes no implied warranties regarding the condition of the premises. See generally HERBERT HOVENKAMP & SHELDON F. KURTZ, The Law of Property 534 (6th ed. 2005). Today, however, American courts have largely rejected the caveat emptor approach. This rejection is based on the view that a home buyer does not stand on an "equal footing" with the builder and relies upon the builder's skill and integrity, as well as the fact that ordinary home buyers are not in a position to discover latent defects. See, e.g., Petersen v. Hubschman Construction Co., 389 N.E.2d 1154 (Ill. 1979); Terlinde v. Neely, 271 S.E.2d 768, 769 (S.C. 1980). Although courts have variously described the home builder's warranty as an implied warranty against latent defects, an implied warranty of fitness, or an implied warranty of habitability, it is now recognized in almost all states, and it extends to latent defects such as faulty concrete. See generally Sheed, The Implied Warranty of Habitability, New Implications, New Applications, 8 REAL ESTATE L.J. 281 (1980).

Although the implied warranty is typically called an implied warranty of habitability, in most states it is not necessary for the man to prove that the house would have been uninhabitable but for his repair. It is enough that the defect is major, given its nature and the dollar value of the problem. In this respect, the content of the implied warranty of habitability for the sale of new homes closely resembles the Uniform Commercial Code implied warranty of merchantability that arises upon the sale of goods by a merchant. Indeed, some of the courts that first developed the warranty of habitability patterned it after the UCC warranty.

Thus, under the law of most states today, the builder would be liable for damages to the woman, the original buyer, for losses caused by the defective concrete.

Point One(b) (25%)

In many, but not all, jurisdictions the home builder's warranty against latent defects extends to a remote grantee like the man.

Not all courts have extended the implied warranty of latent defects to remote grantees. Courts that apply a privity bar have typically done so on the ground that the warranty is contractual in nature and thus should only run in favor of parties in privity with each other. See Sensenbrenner v. Rust, Orling, & Neale, Architects, Inc., 374 S.E.2d 55 (Va. 1988). Other courts, perhaps influenced by the foreseeability standards of tort law, but also relying on the equal vulnerability of both initial and remote grantees, have extended the warranty to subsequent purchasers. For example, in Redarowicz v. Ohlendorf, 441 N.E.2d 324 (Ill. 1982), the Illinois Supreme Court stated:

The warranty of habitability is a creature of public policy. It is a judicial innovation that has evolved to protect purchasers of new houses upon discovery of latent defects in their homes. While the warranty of habitability has roots in the execution of the contract for sale, we emphasize that it exists independently. Privity of contract is not required. Like the initial purchaser, the subsequent purchaser has little opportunity to inspect the construction methods used in building the home. Like the initial purchaser, the subsequent purchaser is usually not knowledgeable in construction practices and must, to a substantial degree, rely upon the expertise of the person who built the home. If construction of a new house is defective, its repair costs should be borne by the responsible builder-vendor who created the latent defect. The compelling public policies underlying the implied warranty of habitability should not be frustrated because of the short intervening ownership of the first purchaser; in these circumstances the implied warranty of habitability survives a change of hands in the ownership.

441 N.E.2d at 330 (internal citations omitted). A similar approach has been adopted in Iowa. See Speight v. Walters Development Co., Ltd., 744 N.W.2d 108 (Iowa 2008).

Whether the man, as a remote grantee, is protected by the warranty running from the builder to the woman depends upon which approach governs.

Point Two (35%)

In most, but not all, jurisdictions the man is not liable on the woman's mortgage obligation because he did not expressly assume that mortgage obligation. In some jurisdictions, the man could be held liable on the woman's mortgage obligation on the theory that he implicitly assumed this obligation.

Because the woman's mortgage obligation to the bank was recorded, the man took the home subject to the mortgage, and the bank's interest had priority over the man's. Because the bank has priority, it can foreclose on the home if the mortgage is in default. However, the recording of a mortgage does not make the mortgagor's grantee personally liable for the mortgagor's obligation.

The predominant rule in the United States is that if a remote grantee takes subject to a mortgage which the grantee does not assume, the remote grantee is not personally liable on the debt. See GRANT S. NELSON & DALE A. WHITMAN, REAL ESTATE FINANCE LAW 273–74 (5th ed. 2007). Of course, that does not mean that the remote grantee will not want to voluntarily make payments on the mortgage in order to prevent the mortgagee from foreclosing on the debt. But it does mean that if the mortgagee forecloses on the property, it cannot hold the remote grantee personally liable on the debt or liable for any deficiency resulting from a mortgage foreclosure. Following this approach, the man would be personally liable on the woman's mortgage obligation if the man assumed (i.e., made a commitment to pay) the mortgage. There is no evidence of an express assumption agreement here. The deed from the woman to the man made no mention of the woman's mortgage, and the facts do not describe any express agreement.

In some jurisdictions, a remote grantee who did not expressly assume a mortgage may be deemed to have impliedly assumed it where, as here, the remote grantee paid the seller only the difference between what the house was worth and the outstanding balance on the mortgage obligation. The rationale for this approach is that “[the grantee’s] retention of the vendor’s money for the payment of the mortgage imposes upon him the duty of protecting the vendor against the mortgage debt. This must be so . . . for it would seem to be almost intolerably unjust to permit him to keep back the . . . [money he would have otherwise paid the vendor to purchase the property].” Heid v. Vreeland, 30 N.J. Eq. 591, 591 (1879). States that follow this approach include Connecticut, Illinois, Iowa, Maryland, Michigan, Oklahoma, and South Carolina. See generally NELSON & WHITMAN, supra, 285.

Here, the man was clearly aware of the mortgage; the mortgage was recorded, and the man paid the woman only $160,000, considerably less than the house was worth ($360,000). Moreover, the man began making mortgage payments immediately after buying the house and continued making payments to the bank for a year.

Thus, in a jurisdiction that follows the implied assumption approach, the man may be liable to the bank. In a jurisdiction that requires express assumption of a mortgage obligation, the man would not be liable because there is no evidence that he expressly assumed the mortgage.

[NOTE: If the man is deemed to have impliedly assumed the mortgage, then the woman is merely a surety and would be liable for any deficiency not paid by the man. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF SURETYSHIP AND GUARANTY § 1, illustration 29 (1996).]

Point Three (15%)

If the bank successfully forecloses on the man's home, he cannot recover his loss from the woman because she gave the man a quitclaim deed and quitclaim deeds contain no warranties of title on which a buyer can sue.

If a seller conveys land on which there is an unsatisfied encumbrance such as a mortgage, and that encumbrance has priority against the buyer, the seller is liable to the buyer for any loss borne by the buyer only if the seller warranted that there was no such encumbrance against the property. Had the woman conveyed the land to the man by a warranty deed, that deed would have impliedly included a covenant against encumbrances, and the woman would have been liable to the man for a breach of this covenant.

Here, however, the woman conveyed the home to the man by a quitclaim deed. A quitclaim deed contains no warranties of title, and the buyer taking under a quitclaim deed has no claim against the seller for damages resulting from encumbrances against the property having a priority over the buyer's interest. Here the bank has priority over the man's interest because its mortgage was recorded prior to the quitclaim deed to the man, and thus the man had notice of the mortgage from the record. The man also had actual notice of the mortgage as evidenced by his making of mortgage payments to the bank. See WILLIAM B. STOEBUCK & DALE A. WHITMAN, The Law of Property 905, 908–09 (3d ed. 2000). Thus, the man is not entitled to any damages from the woman for the loss he sustained as a result of the foreclosure.

[NOTE: If the examinee concludes that the man is liable for any deficiency (see Point Two), the man would have a claim against the woman to recover that deficiency on the ground that he was her surety to guarantee payment of the deficiency.]

DECEDENTS' ESTATES ANALYSIS

(Decedents' Estates II.F.2., I.12. & L.; III.A.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

(1)(a) Is Mary barred from taking under John's will because she and John signed a prenuptial agreement?

(1)(b) Is Mary barred from taking under John's will because, at the time of John's death, there was a divorce action pending between them?

(1)(c) Under John's will, is John's biological, but adopted-out, child entitled to take a share of John's estate?

(2) Who should be appointed as the personal representative of John's estate?

DISCUSSION

Summary

At least three-fourths of John's estate should be distributed to Mary. A prenuptial agreement waiving a share of a spouse's estate does not bar a surviving spouse from taking a bequest that was voluntarily made after the agreement was signed, and a pending divorce does not revoke a testamentary disposition in favor of a spouse. In states that have adopted Uniform Probate Code § 2-119(c) or a like statute, Son is entitled to one-quarter of John's estate. In other states, it is unclear whether one-quarter of John's estate should be distributed to Son; in these states, the court will construe John's intent, and there are arguments for and against the claim that John intended Son to take under his will. The court will appoint Mary as the personal representative of John's estate because a surviving spouse has first priority to serve in this capacity. Son may not be appointed personal representative of the estate because Son is a minor.

Point One(a) (25%)

A prenuptial agreement waiving rights that a spouse might otherwise assert against the estate of the other does not preclude a surviving spouse from taking a bequest voluntarily devised to the surviving spouse by a deceased spouse. Thus, Mary is not precluded from taking a share of John's estate by the prenuptial agreement that she signed.

A prenuptial agreement in which spouses waive rights to a share of each other's assets upon death or divorce does not bar either party from making subsequent gifts or bequests to the other spouse. In re Estate of Geyer, 533 A.2d 423, 427 (Pa. 1987); In re Hillegass' Estate, 244 A.2d 672 (Pa. 1968); L.S. Tellier, Spouse's Right to Take Under Other Spouse's Will as Affected by Antenuptial or Postnuptial Agreement or Property Settlement, 53 A.L.R. 2d 475 (1957). Such an agreement bars only claims that do not arise from a voluntary gift or bequest. Thus, the prenuptial agreement signed by John and Mary does not bar Mary from taking a share of John's estate under his will.

Although divorce bars a former spouse from taking a bequest under a will executed prior to the divorce, the filing of a divorce action does not. Thus, Mary is entitled to take under John's will notwithstanding the pendency of a divorce action at the time of his death.

A bequest may be revoked by operation of law when a change in circumstance occurs that makes it unlikely that the testator would have wanted a beneficiary named in the will to take under the will. All states provide that if, after the execution of a decedent's will, the decedent is divorced, a bequest in favor of the decedent's former spouse is revoked by operation of law. See UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-804. However, the typical statute does not apply if a divorce proceeding is pending when one of the spouses dies. This approach derives from the fact that, until the divorce is finalized, no property division order will be entered; thus the moral and legal claims of each spouse in the property of the other have not yet been satisfied.

Point One(c) (35%)

In most states, Son will be entitled to a share of John's estate only if the court concludes that John intended to include an adopted-out child in the bequest to "my children who survive me." However, John's adopted-out child, Son, is entitled to a share of John's estate under UPC § 2-119(c) or a like statute.

Under the terms of John's will, one-fourth of John's estate is distributable to John's "children who survive me." Son is a biological child of John who survived John. However, John consented to Son's adoption by Aunt, and an adoption typically severs the parent-child relationship between the child and his biological parents. See UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-119(a). A few states do not sever the parent-child relationship when the child is adopted by a relative of a biological parent. See, e.g., 755 ILL. COMP STAT. 5/2-4(d)(1); UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-119(c) (2008) (adopted in North Dakota and Utah). In these states, Son would take under John's will.

In most states, Son would take only if the court concluded that John, when using the words "my children" in his will, intended to include an adopted-out child. The evidence on this question is far from determinative. On the one hand, John gave Son up for adoption to a relative, Aunt, and he took Son into his own home after Aunt's death. John also told Mary that he was Son's father, and he did so after the will was executed. On the other hand, there is no evidence that John attempted to formalize his relationship with Son. It is thus unclear whether Son would take a share of John's estate.

Point Two (15%)

Mary will be appointed personal representative of John's estate.

An individual named as personal representative in a decedent's will has priority to receive letters testamentary from the court overseeing the administration of the estate. See UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 3-203(a)(1). Where, however, the will is silent regarding the appointment of the personal representative, the court will appoint a person granted priority under the governing statute if that person is otherwise qualified. Typically, the decedent's surviving spouse is the individual with the first priority. See id. § 3-203(a)(2).

Under the Uniform Probate Code, a surviving spouse has first priority only if the spouse is a devisee of the decedent. Mary satisfies that condition. Therefore, Mary will be appointed personal representative of the estate. Even if Mary were not a devisee, she would still be entitled to be appointed under the Code because John's devisees (i.e., "my children") are not qualified to be appointed personal representatives because Son is a minor. See UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 3-203(a)(4).

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2014 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Federal Civil Procedure question on the February 2014 MEE tested the following area from the Federal Civil Procedure outline: IV.D., Pretrial procedures—Discovery (including e-discovery).

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NBCE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute essay questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by participating jurisdictions on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. The areas of law that may be covered by the questions on any MEE are Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts, Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Uniform Commercial Code (Negotiable Instruments and Bank Deposits and Collections; Secured Transactions). Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

NOTE: Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles rather than local case or statutory law.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW QUESTION

A city ordinance required each downtown business to install high-powered halogen floodlights that would illuminate the property owned by that business and the adjoining sidewalks. A study commissioned by the city estimated that installation of the floodlights would cost a typical business about $1,000, but that increased business traffic due to enhanced public safety, especially after dark, would likely offset this cost.

A downtown restaurant applied to the city for a building permit to construct an addition that would increase its seating capacity. In its permit application, the restaurant accurately noted that its current facility did not have sufficient seating to accommodate all potential customers during peak hours. The city approved the permit on the condition that the restaurant grant the city an easement over a narrow strip of the restaurant's property, to be used by the city to install video surveillance equipment that would cover nearby public streets and parking lots. The city based its permit decision entirely on findings that the increased patronage that would result from the increased capacity of the restaurant might also attract additional crime to the neighborhood, and that installing video surveillance equipment might alleviate that problem.

The restaurant has challenged both the ordinance requiring it to install floodlights and the easement condition imposed on approval of the building permit.

1. Under the Fifth Amendment as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment, is the city ordinance requiring the restaurant to install floodlights an unconstitutional taking? Explain.
2. Under the Fifth Amendment as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment, is the city's requirement that the restaurant grant the city an easement as a condition for obtaining the building permit an unconstitutional taking? Explain.

TRUSTS AND FUTURE INTERESTS QUESTION

Ten years ago, a testator died, survived by his only children: a son, age 26, and a daughter, age 18.

A testamentary trust was created under the testator's duly probated will. The will specified that all trust income would be paid to the son during the son's lifetime and that upon the son's death, the trust would terminate and trust principal would be distributed to the testator's "grandchildren who shall survive" the son. The testator provided for his daughter in other sections of the will.

Five years ago, the trustee of the testamentary trust purchased an office building with $500,000 from the trust principal. Other than this building, the trust assets consist of publicly traded securities.

Last year, the trustee received $30,000 in rents from the office building. The trustee also received, with respect to the securities owned by the trust, cash dividends of $20,000 and a stock dividend of 400 shares of Acme Corp. common stock distributed to the trust by Acme Corp.

Eight months ago, the trustee sold the office building for $700,000.

Six months ago, the son delivered a letter to the trustee stating: "I hereby disclaim any interest I may have in the income interest of the trust." On the date the son delivered this letter to the trustee, the son had no living children; the daughter had one living minor child.

A statute in this jurisdiction provides that "a disclaimer of any interest created by will is valid only if made within nine months after the testator's death, and if an interest is validly disclaimed, the disclaiming party is deemed to have predeceased the testator."

1. How should the rents, sales proceeds, cash dividends, and stock dividends received prior to the trustee's receipt of the son's letter have been allocated between trust principal and income? Explain.
2. How, if at all, does the son's letter to the trustee affect the future distribution of trust income and principal? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

On March 1, the owner of a manufacturing business entered into negotiations with a bank to obtain a loan of $100,000 for the business. The bank loan officer informed the business owner that the interest rate for a loan would be lower if the repayment obligation were secured by all the business's present and future equipment. The loan officer also informed the business owner that the bank could not commit to making the loan until its credit investigation was completed, but that funds could be advanced faster following loan approval if a financing statement with respect to the transaction were filed in advance. Accordingly, the business owner signed a form on behalf of the business authorizing the bank to file a financing statement with respect to the proposed transaction. The bank properly filed a financing statement the next day, correctly providing the name of the business as the debtor and indicating "equipment" as the collateral.

On March 15, the business owner had heard nothing from the bank about whether the loan had been approved, so the business owner approached a finance company for a loan. The finance company quickly agreed to lend $100,000 to the business, secured by all the business's present and future equipment. That same day, the finance company loaned to the business $100,000, and the business owner signed an agreement obligating the business to repay the loan and granting the finance company a security interest in all the business's "present and future equipment" to secure the repayment obligation. Also on that day, the finance company properly filed a financing statement correctly providing the business's name as the debtor and indicating "equipment" as the collateral.

On March 21, the bank loan officer contacted the business owner and indicated that the loan application had been approved. On the next day, March 22, the bank loaned the business $100,000. The loan agreement, signed by the owner on behalf of the business, granted the bank a security interest in all the business's "present and future equipment."

On April 10, the business sold an item of manufacturing equipment to a competitor for $20,000. This was the first time the business had ever sold any of its equipment. The competitor paid the purchase price in cash and took possession of the equipment that day. The competitor acted in good faith at all times and had no knowledge of the business's prior transactions with the bank and the finance company.

The business has defaulted on its obligations with respect to the loans from the bank and the finance company. Each of them has asserted a claim to all the business's equipment as well as to the item of equipment sold to the business's competitor.

Assume that the business owner had the authority to enter into all these transactions on behalf of the business.

1. As between the bank and the finance company, which has a superior claim to the business's equipment? Explain.
2. Do the claims of the bank and the finance company to the business's equipment continue in the item of equipment sold to the competitor? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

A builder constructed a vacation house for an out-of-state customer on the customer's land. The house was completed on June 1, at which point the customer still owed $200,000 of the $800,000 contract price, which was payable in full five days later.

On June 14, the basement of the house was flooded with two inches of water during a heavy rainfall. When the customer complained, the builder told the customer, "The flooding was caused by poorly designed landscaping. Our work is fine and fully up to code. Have an engineer look at the foundation. If there's a problem, we'll fix it."

The customer, pleased by the builder's cooperative attitude, immediately hired a structural engineer to examine the foundation of the house. On June 30, the engineer provided the customer with a written report on the condition of the foundation, which stated that the foundation was properly constructed.

Unhappy with the conclusions in the engineer's report, the customer then hired a home inspector to evaluate the house. The home inspector's report concluded that the foundation of the house had been poorly constructed and was inadequately waterproofed.

On July 10, the customer sent the builder the home inspector's report with a note that said, "Until you fix this problem, you won't get another penny from me." The builder immediately contacted an attorney and directed the attorney to prepare a draft complaint against the customer for nonpayment. Hoping to avoid litigation, the builder sent several more requests for payment to the customer. The customer ignored all these requests.

On September 10, the builder filed suit in federal district court, properly invoking the court's diversity jurisdiction and seeking $200,000 in damages for breach of contract. The customer's answer denied liability on the basis of alleged defective construction of the house's foundation.

Several months later, the case is nearly ready for trial. However, two discovery disputes have not yet been resolved.

First, despite a request from the builder, the customer has refused to provide a copy of the report prepared by the structural engineer who examined the foundation of the house. The customer claims that the report is "work product" and not discoverable because the customer does not intend to ask the engineer to testify at trial. The builder has asked the court to order the customer to turn over the engineer's report.

Second, the customer has asked the court to impose sanctions for the builder's failure to comply with the customer's demand for copies of all emails concerning construction of the foundation of the house. The builder has truthfully informed the customer that all such emails were destroyed on August 2. This destruction was pursuant to the builder's standard practice of permanently deleting all project-related emails from company records 60 days after construction of a project is complete. There is no relevant state records-retention law.

1. Should the court order the customer to turn over the engineer's report? Explain.
2. Should the court sanction the builder for the destruction of emails related to the case, and if so, what factors should the court consider in determining those sanctions? Explain.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE QUESTION

A defendant was charged under state law with felony theft (Class D) and felony residential burglary (Class C). The indictment alleged that the defendant entered his neighbors' home without their consent and stole a diamond ring worth at least $2,500.

Defense counsel filed a pretrial motion to dismiss the charges on the ground that prosecuting the defendant for both burglary and theft would constitute double jeopardy. The trial court denied the motion, and the defendant was prosecuted for both crimes. The only evidence of the ring's value offered at the defendant's jury trial was the owner's testimony that she had purchased the ring two years earlier for $3,000.

At trial, the judge issued the following jury instruction on the burglary charge prior to deliberations:

If, after consideration of all the evidence presented by the prosecution and defense, you find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant entered the dwelling without the owners' consent, you may presume that the defendant entered with the intent to commit a felony therein.

The jury found the defendant guilty of both offenses.

At the defendant's sentencing hearing, an expert witness called by the prosecutor testified that the diamond ring was worth between $7,000 and $8,000. Over defense objection, the judge concluded, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the value of the stolen ring exceeded $5,000. The judge sentenced the defendant to four years' incarceration on the theft conviction. On the burglary conviction, the defendant received a consecutive sentence of seven years' incarceration.

In this state, residential burglary is defined as "entry into the dwelling of another, without the consent of the lawful resident, with the intent to commit a felony therein." Residential burglary is a Class C felony for which the minimum sentence is five years and the maximum sentence is ten years of incarceration.

In this state, theft is defined as "taking and carrying away the property of another with the intent to permanently deprive the owner of possession." Theft is a Class D felony if the value of the item(s) taken is between $2,500 and $10,000. The sentence for a Class D felony theft is determined by the value of the items taken. If the value is between $2,500 and $5,000, the maximum sentence is three years' incarceration. If the value of the items exceeds $5,000, the maximum sentence is five years' incarceration.

This state affords a criminal defendant no greater rights than those mandated by the United States Constitution.

1. Did the trial court err when it denied the defendant's pretrial motion to dismiss on double jeopardy grounds? Explain.
2. Did the trial court err in its instruction to the jury on the burglary charge? Explain.
3. Did the trial court err when it sentenced the defendant to an additional year of incarceration on the theft conviction based on the expert's testimony? Explain.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

Five years ago, Adam and Ben formed a general partnership, Empire Partnership (Empire), to buy and sell antique automobiles at a showroom in State A. Adam contributed $800,000 to Empire, and Ben contributed $200,000. Their written partnership agreement allocated 80% of profits, losses, and control to Adam and 20% to Ben. No filings of any type were made in connection with the formation of Empire.

Three years ago, a collector purchased one of Empire's antique cars for $3,400,000. The collector was willing to pay this price because of Ben's false representation (repeated in the sales contract) that a famous movie star had once owned the car. Without the movie-star connection, the car was worth only $100,000. One month later, when the collector discovered the truth, he sued Adam, Ben, and Empire for $3,300,000 in damages. The lawsuit is still pending.

Two years ago, Adam and Ben admitted a new partner, Diane, to Empire in return for her contribution of $250,000. The three agreed to allocate profits, losses, and control 75% to Adam, 10% to Ben, and 15% to Diane. Before joining the partnership, Diane learned of the collector's claim and stated her concern to Adam and Ben that she might become liable if the claim were reduced to a judgment.

Following Diane's admission to Empire, the three partners sought to convert Empire into a limited liability partnership (LLP). Adam's lawyer proposed to file with State A a "statement of qualification" making an LLP election and declaring the name of the partnership to be "Empire LLP." Ben's lawyer stated that this would not work and that a new LLP had to be formed, with the assets of the old partnership transferred to the new one. In the end, the conversion was done the way Adam's lawyer suggested with the approval of all three partners.

One year ago, a driver purchased a vintage car from Empire LLP, based on the representation that the car was "fully roadworthy and capable of touring at 70 mph all day." The driver took the car on the highway at 50 mph, whereupon the front suspension collapsed, resulting in a crash in which the car was destroyed and the driver killed. The driver's estate sued Adam, Ben, Diane, and Empire LLP for $10,000,000. The lawsuit is still pending.

Although profitable, Empire LLP does not have resources sufficient to pay the collector's claim or the claim of the driver's estate.

Assume that the Uniform Partnership Act (1997) applies.

1. Before the filing of the statement of qualification,
 - (a) was Adam personally liable on the collector's claim? Explain.
 - (b) was Diane personally liable on the collector's claim? Explain.
2. After the filing of the statement of qualification, was Adam, Ben, or Diane personally liable as a partner on (a) the collector's claim or (b) the driver's estate's claim? Explain.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ANALYSIS

(Constitutional Law IV.D.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Is the city ordinance requirement that businesses install floodlights a taking?
- (2) Is conditioning the approval of a building permit on the grant of an easement to install surveillance equipment a taking of property?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The ordinance requiring businesses to install floodlights is not a per se taking under Loretto, because it does not force a private landowner to allow a third party to enter and place a physical object on the land. Here, the city ordinance requires the business—not a third party—to install the floodlights.

The ordinance is likely not a regulatory taking under the Penn Central balancing test. While the ordinance will impose a cost on business owners, that cost may be offset by the expected increase in business due to the ordinance, and the ordinance does not appear to interfere with the owner's primary use of the property as a restaurant.

The permit condition, however, is likely an uncompensated taking of property. While the condition has an essential nexus with the city's legitimate interest in promoting public safety, the city has not made an individualized determination that the easement condition is roughly proportional to the possibility of increased crime due to the restaurant's proposed addition. Thus, the permit condition likely violates the Fifth Amendment as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment.

Point One (50%)

The ordinance requiring that businesses install floodlights is not a per se taking under Loretto. It is not a regulatory taking under the Penn Central balancing test because the cost of compliance with the ordinance may be offset by an expected increase in business and compliance does not interfere with the business's primary use of its property as a restaurant.

The city ordinance requiring a business to install floodlights does not effect a per se taking of the sort described in Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp., 458 U.S. 419 (1982), because no property is physically taken by the government and the ordinance does not involve a physical invasion of private property by a third party.

Even though the ordinance does not constitute an occupation of the property by either the government or a third party, it is still subject to the three-factor balancing test under Penn Central Transportation Co. v. City of New York, 438 U.S. 104 (1978), to determine whether it is a "regulatory taking." Under Penn Central, a court must balance (1) "[t]he economic impact of the regulation on the claimant," (2) "the extent to which the regulation has interfered with distinct investment-backed expectations," and (3) "the character of the governmental action." Id. at 124. Here, each factor weighs against finding that the ordinance is a taking.

First, the ordinance requirement likely has a minimal economic impact on the restaurant. Compliance with the ordinance is estimated to cost $1,000, and the city has found that businesses will likely recoup that cost in increased sales. Also, because the ordinance does not interfere with the operation of the restaurant, the owner may still earn a reasonable return on its investment in the property.

Second, the ordinance does not interfere with the business's investment-backed expectations. As in Penn Central, the challenged law does not interfere with the owner's "primary expectation" for use of the property—in Penn Central, as a railroad terminal, and here, as a restaurant. Further, the ordinance does not prevent the restaurant from expanding to meet the changing business environment.

Third, the character of the government action does not weigh in favor of a taking. While Penn Central does say that a "physical invasion" is more likely to pose a taking, Loretto suggests that the Court's main concern is with physical invasions by third parties. Also, like the landmark law challenged in Penn Central, the ordinance here "adjust[s] the benefits and burdens of economic life to promote the common good." Id. In Penn Central, the landmark law restricted development of the railroad terminal to promote the common interest in preserving historic landmarks. Here, the ordinance requires the businesses to install floodlights to promote the common interest in crime prevention and public safety.

Because the ordinance is clearly a valid exercise of the police power, it satisfies the takings clause's public-use requirement. Kelo v. City of New London, 545 U.S. 469 (2005).

In sum, all three factors weigh against finding a taking under the Penn Central balancing test.

Point Two (50%)

The permit condition may be unconstitutional as an uncompensated taking of property because the city has not made an individualized determination that the easement condition is roughly proportional to the impact of the restaurant's proposed addition.

In Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 U.S. 374 (1994), the Supreme Court set forth the test for determining whether an exaction imposed by a government in exchange for a discretionary benefit conferred by the government, such as a condition on the approval of a building permit in this case, constitutes an uncompensated taking under the Fifth Amendment. The exaction is not a taking if (1) there is an "essential nexus" between the "public need or burden" to which the proposed development contributes and "the permit condition exacted by the city," id. at 386, and (2) the government makes "some sort of individualized determination that the required dedication is [roughly proportional] both in nature and extent to the impact of the proposed development." Id. at 391; see also Nollan v. California Coastal Commission, 483 U.S. 825 (1987).

Here, the city likely can meet the nexus requirement. In Dolan, the landowner sought to double the size of its business, which would have increased traffic on nearby roadways. In exchange for approving the development, the city sought an easement for a bike and pedestrian path. The Court found the required nexus between the easement and the city's "attempt to reduce traffic congestion by providing for alternative means of transportation." 512 U.S. at 387. Here, a similar nexus likely exists between the requested easement and the city's interest in crime prevention and public safety. Increased patronage and economic activity at the restaurant might attract additional crime to the area, and the requested easement to install surveillance equipment would attempt to address that increased crime.

The exaction here, however, may fail the second prong of the Dolan test—that the exaction be roughly proportional to the anticipated impact of the requested development. As noted, the city in Dolan claimed that a bike and pedestrian path was needed to offset the increase in traffic due to the proposed doubling of the business. The Court explained that the government must demonstrate that the additional traffic reasonably was related to the requested exaction and that the government must “make some effort to quantify its findings in support of the dedication for the pedestrian/bicycle pathway beyond the conclusory statement that it could offset some of the traffic demand generated.” Id. at 395. Here, the city did not carry its burden. The city simply speculates that increased patronage of the restaurant “might” increase crime, and that the surveillance equipment “might” alleviate this increased crime. Because the city has not made “some effort to quantify its findings” in support of the easement, it has not shown that the burden of the easement is roughly proportional to the benefits thought to flow from it.

Thus, the exaction appears to be an uncompensated taking of property in violation of the Fifth Amendment as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment.

TRUSTS AND FUTURE INTERESTS ANALYSIS

(Trusts and Future Interests I.E.3., I.5.; III.A. & B.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

(1) How should rents, dividends, and sales proceeds received by the trustee prior to receipt of the son's letter have been allocated between trust income and principal?

(2)(a) Did the remainder interest in the trust accelerate and become immediately payable to the daughter's minor child upon the trustee's receipt of the son's letter, and, if not, how should the trustee handle the distribution of the principal in the future?

(2)(b) Following the trustee's receipt of the son's letter, how should the trustee distribute future receipts of income prior to the distribution of the principal?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Prior to the trustee's receipt of the son's letter, cash dividends and rents should have been allocated to trust income and were distributable to the son, the income beneficiary of the trust; sales proceeds and stock dividends should have been allocated to principal.

Because the son's letter to the trustee did not result in a valid disclaimer under state law (having been made more than nine months after the testator's death), the son is not deemed to have predeceased the testator. Because the son is still living, the class gift to the testator's grandchildren who survive the son has not closed and is not possessory; it will not become possessory until the son dies. The daughter's minor child, being the testator's only living grandchild, is not currently entitled to a distribution of trust principal. Trust principal will instead be distributable upon the son's death to the testator's then-living grandchildren or, if there are none, to the testator's then-living heirs.

As for future income, the trustee should either distribute the trust income to the son and the daughter as the testator's heirs, accumulate the income for future distribution to those individuals ultimately entitled to the trust principal, or distribute it to those presumptively entitled to the principal upon the son's death, i.e., the daughter's minor child.

Point One (45%)

Cash dividends and rents are allocable to income; sales proceeds and stock dividends are allocable to principal. Items allocable to income for the period prior to the son's attempted disclaimer were distributable to the son.

Receipts earned during the administration of a trust are allocable either to income or to principal. Almost all states have adopted the most recent or an earlier version of the Uniform Principal and Income Act (the Act), which specifies how such receipts should be allocated.

Under the Act, rents (UNIF. PRIN. & INC. ACT (2000) § 405; UNIF. PRIN. & INC. ACT (1962) § 3(a)(1)) and cash dividends received from a corporation (UNIF. PRIN. & INC. ACT (2000) § 401(b); UNIF. PRIN. & INC. ACT (1962) § 6(d)) are allocable to income and are distributable to the income beneficiary of the trust.

Sales proceeds (UNIF. PRIN. & INC. ACT (2000) § 404(2); UNIF. PRIN. & INC. ACT (1962) § 3(b)(1)) and dividends paid in the stock of the distributing corporation (UNIF. PRIN. & INC. ACT (2000) § 401(c)(1); UNIF. PRIN. & INC. ACT (1962) § 3(b)(4)) are allocable to principal and added to the principal of the trust.

Here, the cash dividends and office building rents should have been allocated to income and, until the trustee received the son's letter, should have been distributed to him as the sole income beneficiary of the trust. The stock dividend and proceeds from the sale of the office building should have been allocated to principal and held by the trustee for future distribution to the ultimate remaindermen of the trust.

[NOTE: The 2000 Uniform Principal and Income Act has been adopted in Alabama, Arkansas, Colorado, Connecticut, the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Idaho, Iowa, Kentucky, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, and West Virginia.]

Point Two(a) (45%)

Because the son did not disclaim within nine months of the testator's death, there is no valid disclaimer under state law. Therefore, the son is not deemed to have predeceased the testator. Furthermore, because of the express survivorship contingency in the will, the remainder in the trust does not accelerate and become distributable until the son in fact dies. When the son dies, the trust principal will be distributable to the testator's then-living grandchildren, or if none, then to the testator's then-living heirs.

When a trust remainder is given to a class, the class closes (i.e., no new persons can join the class) when there is no outstanding income interest, and at least one member of the class is then entitled to demand possession of his or her share of the remainder. This principle is called the rule of convenience. See generally HERBERT HOVENKAMP & SHELDON F. KURTZ, PRINCIPLES OF PROPERTY LAW 199–200 (6th ed. 2005). A class member may demand possession of his or her share of the remainder upon termination of the income interest only when the class member's interest is not otherwise subject to a condition precedent. See id.

When a beneficiary timely disclaims an interest in a trust, that beneficiary is treated as if he had predeceased the testator. Here, had the son disclaimed within nine months of the testator's death as required by the state statute, he would have been deemed to have predeceased the testator. This would have closed the class of remaindermen, and the testator's then-living grandchildren (i.e., the daughter's child) would have been entitled to the trust principal. However, under the state statute, the son's disclaimer was not timely because he did not disclaim within nine months of the testator's death. Thus, because the statute is inapplicable and the son is still alive, the class of grandchildren entitled to share in trust principal did not close.

Because, here, the statute is inapplicable due to the son's failure to comply with the statutory time requirements, then presumably the common-law rule allowing disclaimers (a/k/a renunciations) at any time should apply. Under the common law, if a life estate is renounced, the remainder interest accelerates and becomes immediately distributable to the remaindermen of the trust if the remainder is vested but not if the remainder is contingent. JESSE DUKEMINIER & ROBERT H. SITKOFF, WILLS, TRUSTS, AND ESTATES 844–845 (9th ed. 2013). Here, because the remainder is contingent upon there being grandchildren who survive the son, the remainder will not accelerate. It will remain open until the son dies, leaving open the possibility that additional grandchildren will be included in the class, or the daughter's child could fall out of the class because that child fails to survive the son.

And if none of the testator's grandchildren survive the son, the trust principal will be distributed to the testator's heirs living at the son's death.

Point Two(b) (10%)

Until the trust terminates, the trustee must continue to hold the trust assets. The distribution of income in the meantime is unclear. There are at least three possibilities. Income earned on the undistributed assets could be distributed to the son and daughter as the testator's heirs, accumulated and added to principal for distribution to the ultimate remaindermen, or distributed from time to time to those persons who are presumptively remaindermen.

When trust principal is not immediately distributable, the trustee must continue to hold trust assets until the ultimate remaindermen are ascertained. During this period, trust income will be distributed or retained according to any instructions contained in the trust instrument. See WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN, JR., SHELDON F. KURTZ & DAVID M. ENGLISH, WILLS, TRUSTS & ESTATES § 10.2 (4th ed. 2010).

Here, the testator did not specify what the trustee should do with trust income in the event the son's disclaimer did not comply with the state statute. There are at least three approaches. One approach would have the trustee distribute the trust income to the testator's heirs on the theory that the income represents property that was not disposed of by the testator's will and which thus passes by partial intestacy to the testator's heirs. A second approach would have the trustee accumulate trust income for distribution to the ultimate remaindermen. Under this approach, only those individuals ultimately entitled to the principal would share in the income. A third approach would have the trustee distribute trust income to those individuals who would be the remaindermen if the trust were to terminate when the income is received by the trustee; under this approach, trust income would be distributed to the daughter's minor child until another presumptive remainderman is born. This approach could result in individuals not ultimately entitled to principal, say because they do not survive the son, receiving income. It could also result in a disproportionate distribution of income among the individuals ultimately entitled to income.

[NOTE: Examinees should demonstrate a recognition and understanding of the income-allocation problem and the alternatives available to address that issue. There is no widely accepted solution to the problem. Examinees who cite any of these possible problem-solving approaches may receive credit.]

- (1)(b) What is the nature of the finance company's claim to the business's equipment?
- (1)(c) As between the bank and the finance company, whose claim to the business's equipment has priority?
- (2) Do the claims of the bank and the finance company continue in the item of equipment sold by the business to the competitor?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The bank and the finance company both have perfected security interests in the business's equipment. Even though the finance company's perfected security interest was created first, the bank's perfected security interest has priority because the bank's financing statement was filed before the finance company's financing statement. The security interests of the bank and the finance company continue in the item of equipment sold by the business to the competitor because their security interests were perfected and the competitor was not a buyer in ordinary course of business.

Point One(a) (25%)

The bank has a perfected security interest in the business's equipment.

The bank has met all criteria necessary for it to have an attached and enforceable security interest in the business's equipment. First, value must be given. UCC § 9-203(b)(1). This criterion is fulfilled by the loan made by the bank to the business. Second, the debtor must have rights in the collateral. UCC § 9-203(b)(2). Clearly, the business has rights in its equipment. Third, either the secured party must take possession of the collateral or the debtor must authenticate a security agreement containing a description of the collateral. UCC § 9-203(b)(3). The agreement that the business owner signed is a "security agreement" because it is an agreement that creates or provides for a security interest. UCC § 9-102(a)(74). By signing the security agreement, the business owner authenticated it. UCC § 9-102(a)(7). Therefore, all three criteria are fulfilled, and the bank has an enforceable and attached security interest.

A security interest is perfected when it has attached and when any additional steps required for perfection have occurred. UCC § 9-308(a). Generally speaking, the additional steps will either be possession of the collateral by the secured party or the filing of a financing statement with respect to the collateral. See UCC §§ 9-310, 9-313. In this case, the bank filed a financing statement naming the debtor and sufficiently indicating the collateral. The collateral indication is sufficient because it identifies the collateral by type of property. See UCC §§ 9-504, 9-108. The fact that the financing statement was filed before the security interest was created is not a problem. Even though the security agreement had not yet been signed, the business had authorized the filing of the financing statement in an authenticated record. UCC § 9-509(a)(1). Moreover, the financing statement may be filed before the security agreement is created. UCC § 9-502(d).

Point One(b) (10%)

The finance company also has a perfected security interest in the business's equipment.

The finance company's security interest is enforceable and attached for the same reasons as the bank's security interest. The loan from the finance company to the business constitutes value, the business has rights in the collateral, and the business owner has authenticated a security agreement containing a description of the collateral. The finance company's security interest is perfected because the finance company filed a financing statement with respect to it that provides that the business is the debtor and indicates that the collateral is equipment.

Point One(c) (30%)

The bank's security interest has priority over the finance company's security interest because the bank's financing statement was filed first.

As between two perfected security interests, the general rule is that the security interest that was the earlier to be either perfected or the subject of a filed financing statement has priority. UCC § 9-322(a)(1). While the finance company's security interest was perfected before the bank's (March 15 vs. March 22), the bank's financing statement was filed even earlier, on March 2. Thus, under the first-to-file-or-perfect rule of UCC § 9-322(a)(1), the bank's security interest has priority. No exceptions to the general rule apply here.

Point Two (35%)

A security interest in collateral continues notwithstanding its sale unless an exception applies. Because the security interests of the bank and the finance company were perfected and the competitor was not a buyer in ordinary course of business, no exception applies and the security interests of both creditors continue in the equipment sold to the competitor.

As a general rule, a security interest in collateral continues notwithstanding the fact that the debtor has sold the collateral to another person. UCC § 9-315(a)(1). Thus, unless an exception applies, the security interests of the bank and the finance company will continue in the item of equipment sold to the competitor.

A buyer of goods will take free of an unperfected security interest in those goods. See UCC § 9-317(a)(2). However, when the competitor bought the business's equipment, both the bank and the finance company had perfected security interests in the equipment.

A buyer can take free even of a perfected security interest in goods if the buyer is a "buyer in ordinary course of business." See UCC § 9-320(a). However, the competitor was not a buyer in ordinary course of business. To be a "buyer in ordinary course of business," a buyer must buy goods from a seller that is in the business of selling goods of that kind. See UCC § 1-201(b)(9). The competitor bought this equipment from a seller that is not in the business of selling goods of this kind, so the competitor was not a buyer in ordinary course of business with respect to these goods.

Because no exception applies, the security interests of the bank and the finance company continue even after the item of equipment was sold to the competitor.

Legal Problems

(1) Is a document prepared in the course of a contract dispute protected from discovery as “work product” when there is no evidence that the document was prepared in anticipation of litigation?

(2)(a) Is a party’s failure to provide relevant electronically stored information excused when the information was destroyed pursuant to a routine document retention scheme at a time when litigation was contemplated by the destroying party?

(2)(b) What sanctions should be imposed on a party for allowing the destruction of evidence that is relevant to potential future litigation?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The report prepared by the structural engineer is probably not work product and is thus discoverable. The engineer examined the foundation of the house at the customer’s request, and the engineer’s findings are potentially relevant to the customer’s claim that the foundation is defective. The report was not prepared in anticipation of litigation. The customer appears to have sought the engineer’s opinion in response to the builder’s offer to fix any problems with the foundation that an engineer might identify. Because the report was not prepared in anticipation of litigation, it is not protected by the work-product doctrine.

The builder should have taken appropriate steps to preserve evidence, including suspending its document retention program, as soon as it began planning for litigation—i.e., on July 10. Its destruction of potentially relevant material after that date was wrongful. However, a court is unlikely to impose severe sanctions on the builder because there are no facts indicating that the builder acted in bad faith and the customer can prove that the foundation is defective without the destroyed emails.

Point One (40%)

The customer must turn over the engineer’s report because it was not prepared in anticipation of litigation.

In general, a party to a lawsuit in federal court “may obtain discovery regarding any nonprivileged matter that is relevant to any party’s claim or defense.” FED. R. CIV. P. 26(b)(1) (2009). This includes the right to inspect and copy documents in the other party’s possession. FED. R. CIV. P. 34(a)(1). Here, the customer hired a structural engineer to examine the foundation of the house. The engineer’s report on the foundation is likely to include information that would be relevant to the customer’s claim that the foundation was defectively constructed.

The so-called “work product” rule allows a party to refuse to turn over “documents . . . that are prepared in anticipation of litigation or for trial” by that party’s representative, including a consultant. Thus, if the customer had hired the structural engineer to prepare a report “in anticipation of litigation,” that report might not be discoverable. See FED. R. CIV. P. 26(b)(3).

In this case, however, the customer hired the engineer to evaluate the foundation of the house as part of the customer’s negotiation with the builder concerning the house’s flooding problem. The builder told the customer that the house’s landscaping was the reason for the flooding, and the builder told the customer, “Have an engineer look at the foundation. If there’s a problem, we’ll fix it.” The customer appears to have acted in response to that statement. There is no indication that the customer anticipated any kind of legal action at the time that the structural engineer was hired. Accordingly, the structural engineer’s report is discoverable and the court should order the customer to turn it over.

[NOTE: If an examinee concludes that the structural engineer’s report was prepared in anticipation of litigation, then the examinee should also conclude that the report is not discoverable. Documents prepared in anticipation of litigation do not need to be disclosed to an adverse party unless that party can demonstrate a “substantial need” for the documents and an inability to obtain substantially equivalent information without “undue hardship.” FED. R. CIV. P. 26(b)(3)(A)(ii). Furthermore, a report prepared by an expert who is not expected to testify is not discoverable in the absence of “exceptional circumstances” making it “impracticable” to obtain the information in another way. FED. R. CIV. P. 26(b)(4)(D)(ii). The builder probably cannot make these showings here, unless the engineer’s report deals with circumstances that have since changed. There is no evidence that the structural engineer would have had access to any information or facts that the builder would not already know as a result of its construction and subsequent inspection of the house. In addition, if necessary, the builder could ask the court for permission to arrange for a further inspection of the house by a structural engineer hired by the builder. See FED. R. CIV. P. 34(a)(2). Accordingly, if an examinee concludes that the report was prepared in anticipation of litigation, the examinee should also conclude that the builder is not entitled to see the report.]

Point Two(a) (30%)

Because the builder anticipated that it might be involved in litigation concerning its contract with the customer, the builder acted wrongfully in destroying emails that were relevant to the house’s construction, even though the emails were destroyed pursuant to a routine document retention plan.

As noted above, a party to a lawsuit in federal court “may obtain discovery regarding any nonprivileged matter that is relevant to any party’s claim or defense.” FED. R. CIV. P. 26(b)(1). This includes emails and other electronically stored information. FED. R. CIV. P. 34(a)(1)(A). Here, the customer has requested all the builder’s emails pertaining to work done on the foundation of the house. Ordinarily, the builder would be obliged to turn over this information, which is relevant to the customer’s defense that the house’s foundation was poorly constructed.

Unfortunately, the emails in question no longer exist because the builder destroyed them on August 2.

In general, spoliation of evidence (destruction or alteration of evidence) is improper if the party who destroyed or altered the evidence “has notice that the evidence is relevant to litigation or . . . should have known that the evidence may be relevant to future litigation.” Fujitsu Ltd. v. Federal Express Corp., 247 F.3d 423, 436 (2d Cir. 2001). It is improper for a party to destroy electronic information relevant to pending litigation, even if the destruction occurs before there is any request or order seeking the information. See, e.g., Leon v. IDX Sys. Corp., 464 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2006) (plaintiff’s intentional destruction of computer files warranted dismissal even though spoliation occurred before order compelling discovery). Similarly, the duty to preserve evidence applies to a party who anticipates litigation, even if litigation has not yet been commenced. See THE SEDONA PRINCIPLES: BEST PRACTICES RECOMMENDATIONS & PRINCIPLES FOR ADDRESSING ELECTRONIC DOCUMENT PRODUCTION 70, cmt. 14a (2d ed. 2007).

The builder destroyed the emails on August 2. At that time, the builder knew that litigation was a possibility because the builder had already directed its attorney to prepare a draft complaint for possible filing. Knowing that litigation was a possibility, the builder had a duty to take steps to preserve evidence, including the emails in question. See generally Fujitsu Ltd.

In this case, the builder's destruction of the emails was pursuant to a routine document retention plan. The Federal Rules provide expressly that, in the absence of "exceptional circumstances," parties should not be sanctioned for the loss of electronically stored information when the loss occurs pursuant to "routine, good-faith operation of an electronic information system." FED. R. CIV. P. 37(e). However, when a party anticipates litigation, "it must suspend its routine document retention/destruction policy and put in place a 'litigation hold' to ensure the preservation of relevant documents." Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 220 F.R.D. 212, 218 (S.D.N.Y. 2003).

Thus, the builder's destruction of potentially relevant emails at a time when it knew that litigation was a possibility was improper. It had a duty to preserve evidence, and it breached that duty.

[NOTE: Because courts have used different words to describe the test for when evidence must be preserved, an examinee's precise formulation of the test is not critical.]

Point Two(b) (30%)

In determining appropriate sanctions for spoliation, courts consider both the level of culpability of the spoliating party and the degree of prejudice the loss of evidence has caused the other party. Here, the builder's destruction of evidence does not appear to have been willful, nor is it likely to pose a significant obstacle to the customer's defense. Any sanctions imposed by the court should be modest.

Federal courts have inherent power to control the litigation process and can sanction misbehavior, including spoliation, even when there has been no specific violation of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. See generally Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32 (1991) (discussing court's inherent power to control the litigation process). The range of available sanctions is broad. It can include such sanctions as the payment of expenses incurred by the other party as a result of the destruction of the evidence, an instruction to the jury authorizing it to draw an adverse inference from the destruction of the evidence, a shifting of the burden of proof on the relevant issue, or even judgment against the responsible party. See, e.g., Residential Funding Corp. v. DeGeorge Financial Corp., 306 F.3d 99, 108 (2d Cir. 2002) (adverse inference); Silvestri v. General Motors Corp., 271 F.3d 583, 593 (4th Cir. 2001) (possibility of dismissal). Cf. FED. R. CIV. P. 37(b)(2)(A) (listing remedies for failure to comply with discovery obligations).

In determining appropriate sanctions for spoliation, courts consider both the level of culpability of the spoliating party and the degree of prejudice the loss of evidence has caused the other party. Many courts impose severe sanctions (such as an adverse-inference instruction or the entry of judgment against the spoliating party) only when there is evidence of bad faith in the form of an intentional effort to hide information. E.g., Greyhound Lines, Inc. v. Wade, 485 F.3d 1032, 1035 (8th Cir. 2007) (spoliation sanction requires intentional destruction out of desire "to suppress the truth"). However, other courts have said that negligence in preserving evidence can support an adverse-inference instruction. See Residential Funding, 306 F.3d at 108 (negligence enough under some circumstances).

Although a court might well order an evidentiary hearing on the issue of sanctions, the facts presented do not seem appropriate for severe sanctions. First, the evidence was destroyed pursuant to the builder's standard document retention plan, and there is no evidence that the builder deliberately failed to suspend its usual procedures with the purpose of allowing the destruction of evidence. Second, the loss of this evidence will not severely hinder the customer's presentation of his case. The central issue is whether the foundation of the house was properly constructed. If the construction job was poorly done, the customer can present evidence, derived from inspection of the premises, to prove that point. The customer can also depose witnesses about any issues that arose during construction.

Under the circumstances, a court is not likely to impose particularly severe sanctions, although it might shift the burden to the builder to show that the foundation was properly constructed, or it might require the builder to reimburse any expenses the customer incurs to discover and prove the facts about issues or disputes that arose during construction of the foundation.

[NOTE: The result reached by the examinee is less important than the examinee's recognition that (a) a range of sanctions is available to the court and (b) the appropriate sanction depends both on the culpability of the builder and the prejudice suffered by the customer.]

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Criminal Law and Procedure II.A. & D.; V.E. & F.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Did charging the defendant with both theft and burglary constitute double jeopardy?
- (2) Did the jury instruction violate the due process clause either by relieving the prosecution of the burden of proving the element of intent or by shifting the burden to the defendant to disprove that element?
- (3) Did the sentence imposed in this case for the theft conviction unconstitutionally deprive the defendant of his right to a jury trial on the issue of the value of the stolen item?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The trial court properly denied the defendant's pretrial motion to dismiss the charges on double jeopardy grounds. The defendant may be charged with, and convicted of, both theft and burglary. Each of the charges has an element that the other does not. Neither charge is a lesser-included offense, nor are they multiplicitous. Thus, charging both theft and burglary does not violate double jeopardy.

The jury instruction on the burglary charge was constitutionally flawed. It could have been reasonably understood by the jury as either (1) an irrebuttable conclusive presumption (which relieved the prosecution of proving the element of intent and removed the issue from the jury) or (2) a rebuttable mandatory presumption (which unconstitutionally shifted the burden of proof on an element of a charged offense from the prosecution to the defendant).

Because the four-year sentence imposed by the judge was based on the judge's finding, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the value of the stolen ring exceeded $5,000, the sentence violates the defendant's right to a jury determination, beyond a reasonable doubt, of the value of the ring.

Point One (30%)

Charging the defendant with theft and burglary did not constitute double jeopardy.

The Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment provides that a person shall not be twice put in jeopardy for the "same offense." Thus, the question is whether the elements of the theft charge are wholly contained in the burglary charge or vice versa. If the elements of the lesser charge (theft) are not wholly contained in the greater charge (burglary)—i.e., if each charge requires proof of a fact that the other does not—then convicting the defendant of both crimes would not violate double jeopardy even when the two offenses occurred at the same time and are thus arguably part of the "same transaction." Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299, 304 (1932). See also Albernaz v. United States, 450 U.S. 333, 344 n.3 (1981); United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688, 704 (1993).

Here, theft and burglary each require proof of an element not required for the other crime. Burglary may be defined differently in different jurisdictions. However, it almost invariably requires entry into a building or dwelling of another with the specific intent to commit a felony therein, and the crime of burglary is complete upon the entry into the building or dwelling with such intent. See, e.g., Cannon v. Oklahoma, 827 P.2d 1339, 1342 (Okla. Crim. App. 1992). In contrast, theft, which also may be defined differently in different states, almost invariably requires the taking and carrying away of an item of personal property belonging to another with the intent to steal or permanently deprive the owner of possession.

Here, the “taking” or “stealing” element is not contained in the definition of burglary, and the “entry” element of burglary is not contained in the definition of theft. Because theft is not a lesser-included offense of burglary and burglary is not a lesser-included offense of theft, charging the defendant for both burglary and theft did not violate double jeopardy and the court properly denied the defense motion on those grounds. Yparrea v. Dorsey, 64 F.3d 577, 579–80 (10th Cir. 1995), citing Blockburger, 284 U.S. at 304.

Finally, the defendant’s motion to dismiss all the charges on double jeopardy grounds was improper because, if both charges were for the same offense, the motion should have requested dismissal of one charge, not both.

Point Two (35%)

The jury instruction on the burglary charge violated the Due Process Clause because it created either (1) an irrebuttable conclusive presumption (which relieved the prosecution of proving the element of intent and removed that issue from the jury) or (2) a rebuttable mandatory presumption (which unconstitutionally shifted the burden of proof on an element of a charged offense to the defendant).

The Supreme Court has interpreted the Due Process Clause of the U.S. Constitution to require that the prosecution prove all elements of an offense beyond a reasonable doubt. See In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 364 (1970). The burden of proof cannot be shifted to the defendant by presuming an essential element upon proof of other elements of the offense, because shifting the burden of persuasion with respect to any element of a criminal offense is contrary to the Due Process Clause. See Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975).

The crime of burglary includes entry into a building or dwelling with the specific intent to commit a felony therein. The requirement that the prosecutor prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant had this specific intent distinguishes burglary from general-intent crimes like trespass. See Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510, 523 (1979).

Here, the jury was instructed that if, “after consideration of all the evidence presented by the prosecution and defense, you find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant entered the dwelling without the owners’ consent, you may presume that the defendant entered with the intent to commit a felony therein.” This instruction was unconstitutional because it created either an irrebuttable conclusive presumption or a rebuttable mandatory presumption.

A conclusive presumption is “an irrebuttable direction by the court to find intent once convinced of the facts triggering the presumption.” Id. at 517. Here, the jurors were instructed that once the prosecutor established that the defendant entered the neighbors’ house without consent, they “may presume” that he intended to commit a felony therein. The jurors may have reasonably concluded from this instruction that if they found that the defendant intended to enter his neighbors’ home without permission, they must further find that he entered with the specific intent to commit a felony therein. Because this instruction could operate as a conclusive irrebuttable presumption by eliminating intent “as an ingredient of the offense,” it violated due process by relieving the prosecution of the burden of proof for this element. Id. at 522.

In the alternative, the jury instruction could have been reasonably understood to create a rebuttable mandatory presumption, which “tells [the jury] they must find the elemental fact upon proof of the basic fact, at least unless the defendant has come forward with some evidence to rebut the presumed connection between the two facts.” County Court of Ulster County, New York v. Allen, 442 U.S. 140, 157 (1979). The due process problem created by rebuttable mandatory presumptions is that “[t]o the extent that the trier of fact is forced to abide by the presumption, and may not reject it based on an independent evaluation of the particular facts presented by the State, the analysis of the presumption’s constitutional validity is logically divorced from those facts and based on the presumption’s accuracy in the run of cases.” Id. at 159.

Unlike irrebuttable conclusive presumptions, rebuttable mandatory presumptions are not always per se violations of the Due Process Clause. However, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that jury instructions that could reasonably be understood as shifting the burden of proof to the defendant on an element of the offense are unconstitutional. Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307 (1985). Here, the argument that the jury instruction operated as a rebuttable mandatory presumption is supported by the fact that the judge also instructed the jury to “consider[] . . . all the evidence presented by the prosecution and defense.” However, even if the instruction created a rebuttable mandatory presumption, it would be unconstitutional because it shifted the burden to the defense on an element of the offense. Sandstrom, 442 U.S. at 524; Mullaney, 421 U.S. at 686.

Point Three (35%)

The trial court violated the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial on an essential element of the offense when it found, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the ring was worth over $5,000 and increased the defendant’s sentence based on this finding.

In the statutory scheme under which the defendant was tried and convicted, a Class D felony theft is defined as theft of item(s) with a value between $2,500 and $10,000. The jury found that the value of the diamond ring was at least $2,500 and convicted the defendant of felony theft. However, at sentencing, the trial court made a separate finding, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the value of the ring was greater than $5,000. Following the statute’s two-tiered sentencing scheme, the judge then imposed on the defendant a sentence that was one year longer than the maximum that would otherwise have been allowed.

The judge’s sentence was unconstitutional because it violated the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial on this question. The Supreme Court held in Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000), that “[o]ther than the fact of a prior conviction, any fact that increases the penalty for a crime beyond the prescribed statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury, and proved beyond a reasonable doubt” because “[i]t is unconstitutional for a legislature to remove from the jury the assessment of facts that increase the prescribed range of penalties to which a criminal defendant is exposed [because] such facts must be established by proof beyond a reasonable doubt.” Id. The Court reaffirmed Apprendi in Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296 (2004), holding that the “‘statutory maximum’ for Apprendi purposes is the maximum sentence a judge may impose solely on the basis of the facts reflected in the jury verdict or admitted by the defendant.” Id. at 303 (emphasis in original). In United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005), the Court relied on Blakely and Apprendi to conclude that protecting a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial required that "[a]ny fact . . . which is necessary to support a sentence exceeding the maximum authorized by the facts established by a plea of guilty or a jury verdict must be admitted by the defendant or proved to a jury beyond a reasonable doubt." Id. at 244.

Thus, in order to constitutionally increase a sentence above the statutory maximum of three years, the jury must have found beyond a reasonable doubt that the value of the ring exceeded $5,000. Here, the court made the finding based on an appraisal proffered by the prosecutor only at sentencing, and the judge's finding was by a preponderance of the evidence rather than beyond a reasonable doubt.

AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP ANALYSIS

(Agency and Partnership V.A. & C.; VI.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Is a partner in a general partnership personally liable on a claim arising from misrepresentations by another partner made in the course of the partnership business?
- (2) Does a newly admitted partner in a general partnership become personally liable on existing claims against the partnership?
- (3) After the filing by a general partnership of a statement of qualification as a limited liability partnership, are the partners personally liable as partners on (a) an existing claim against the general partnership and (b) a claim against the partnership that arose after the filing?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Adam and Ben formed a general partnership, under which they were jointly and severally liable for obligations of the partnership. Thus, Adam was personally liable for misrepresentations by Ben made in the ordinary course of the partnership business.

Upon joining the general partnership, Diane became personally liable for the obligations of the partnership arising after her admission, but not for obligations pre-existing her admission, such as the collector's claim.

By filing a statement of qualification, the three partners properly elected limited liability partnership status. As partners in an LLP, none of the three partners is personally liable as a partner for partnership obligations arising after the election, such as the claim by the driver's estate. The election, however, does not change their personal liability on pre-existing claims that arose before the election, such as the collector's claim.

Point One (30%)

As a general partner of Empire, a general partnership, Adam became personally liable on the collector's claim, a valid claim against the partnership that arose because of Ben's wrongful act in the ordinary course of the partnership business.

When the collector's claim arose, Empire was a general partnership composed of Adam and Ben. Under UPA (1997) § 306(a), partners of a general partnership are liable jointly and severally for all obligations of the partnership. Under UPA (1997) § 305(a), the partnership could become obligated for the loss caused to the collector as a result of the misrepresentation by Ben, provided he was acting in the ordinary course of the partnership business. Because there was no statement that limited his partnership authority, Ben as partner was "an agent of the partnership for the purpose of its business." See UPA (1997) § 301(1). Ben's misrepresentation to the collector, even if intentional, appears to be in the ordinary course of the partnership's business of dealing in antique cars. Thus, Ben's wrongful act created a partnership obligation for which Adam was jointly and severally liable.

[NOTE: Generally, a partnership creditor must "exhaust the partnership's assets before levying on a judgment debtor partner's individual property where the partner is personally liable for the partnership obligation" as a result of his status as a partner. UPA (1997) § 307 cmt. 4. As the UPA comments explain, this places Adam more in the position of guarantor than principal debtor on the partnership obligation. Id., cmt. 4. Although an examinee might discuss this point, the call focuses on whether Adam is personally liable, not how the liability might be enforced.]

Point Two (30%)

Because the collector's claim arose before Diane joined Empire, Diane did not become personally liable on the claim.

Diane was admitted to Empire when it was a general partnership and after the collector's claim arose. While the general rule under UPA (1997) § 306(a) is that the partners of a general partnership are liable jointly and severally for all obligations of the partnership, there is a special rule for partners who are admitted during the duration of the partnership. Under UPA (1997) § 306(b), a person admitted to an existing partnership is not personally liable for any partnership obligations incurred before the person's admission. Because Diane was admitted to Empire after the collector's claim arose, Diane is not personally liable on the claim.

Diane's knowledge of the pre-existing claim and her stated concern about becoming liable on the collector's claim do not change her personal nonliability to the collector. Although partners who have a liability shield can assume liability to third parties through private contractual guarantees or modifications to the partnership agreement, Diane's stated concern constituted neither a guaranty to the collector nor "an intentional waiver of liability protections." See UPA (1997) § 306, cmt. 3 (describing methods for waiver of liability protections under § 306(c) applicable in limited liability partnerships).

At most, Diane will lose her investment in the partnership as a result of the collector's claim. Although Diane did not become personally liable on the collector's claim when she joined the partnership, the $250,000 she contributed to the partnership is "at risk for the satisfaction of existing partnership debts." UPA (1997) § 306 cmt. 2.

Point Three (40%)

Filing the statement of qualification was effective to elect limited liability partnership status. Despite this new status, Adam and Ben remain personally liable on the collector's claim, which arose before the election. But as partners in an LLP, neither Adam, Ben, nor Diane is personally liable as a partner on the driver's estate's claim, which arose after the election.

Under UPA (1997) § 1001, a general partnership can make an election and become a limited liability partnership—if the partners approve the conversion by a vote equivalent to that necessary to amend the partnership agreement and the partnership then files a statement of qualification that specifies the name of the partnership, its principal office, and its election to be an LLP. Here the partners agreed unanimously—sufficient to amend their agreement under UPA (1997) § 401(j)—and the statement of qualification was filed. In addition, the name of Empire LLP properly included an appropriate ending, "LLP." See UPA (1997) § 1002.

Although another way to effectuate a "conversion" (as suggested by Ben's lawyer) is to form a new LLP and transfer the assets of the old general partnership to the new LLP, the method used here (approval by the partners and the filing of a statement of qualification) is also sufficient to create LLP status.

Thus, Empire became Empire LLP as of the date of filing of the statement of qualification. See UPA (1997) § 1001. What effect did this have on the collector's claim, which predated the filing? According to UPA (1997) § 306(c), an obligation incurred while a partnership is an LLP is solely a partnership obligation. As the collector's claim predated the LLP, Adam and Ben remain personally liable on the collector's claim. Diane, on the other hand, was not personally liable on the collector's claim, either before or after the filing of the statement of qualification. See Point Two above.

The driver's estate's claim arose after Empire became Empire LLP. Under UPA (1997) § 306(c), an obligation incurred while a partnership is an LLP is solely a partnership obligation. Thus, Adam, Ben, and Diane as partners are all protected from personal liability on the driver's estate's claim. But there may be personal liability if any of them was negligent or otherwise acted wrongfully by not informing the buyer of the bad suspension that caused the accident.

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the July 2014 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Federal Civil Procedure question on the July 2014 MEE tested the following areas from the Federal Civil Procedure outline: III., Injunctions and provisional remedies; and IV.C., Pretrial procedures—Joinder of parties and claims (including class actions).

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by user jurisdictions as part of the bar examination on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Areas of law that may be covered on the MEE include the following: Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts, Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Federal Civil Procedure, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Uniform Commercial Code (Negotiable Instruments and Bank Deposits and Collections; Secured Transactions). (Effective with the February 2015 MEE administration, Uniform Commercial Code Articles 3 and 4 [Negotiable Instruments and Bank Deposits and Collections] is no longer being tested.) Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

NOTE: Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles rather than local case or statutory law.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE QUESTION

While on routine patrol, a police officer observed a suspect driving erratically and pulled the suspect's car over to investigate. When he approached the suspect's car, the officer detected a strong odor of marijuana. The officer immediately arrested the suspect for driving under the influence of an intoxicant (DUI). While the officer was standing near the suspect's car placing handcuffs on the suspect, the officer observed burglary tools on the backseat.

The officer seized the burglary tools. He then took the suspect to the county jail, booked him for the DUI, and placed him in a holding cell. Later that day, the officer gave the tools he had found in the suspect's car to a detective who was investigating a number of recent burglaries in the neighborhood where the suspect had been arrested.

At the time of his DUI arrest, the suspect had a six-month-old aggravated assault charge pending against him and was being represented on the assault charge by a lawyer.

Early the next morning, upon learning of her client's arrest, the lawyer went to the jail. She arrived at 9:00 a.m., immediately identified herself to the jailer as the suspect's attorney, and demanded to speak with the suspect. The lawyer also told the jailer that she did not want the suspect questioned unless she was present. The jailer told the lawyer that she would need to wait one hour to see the suspect. After speaking with the lawyer, the jailer did not inform anyone of the lawyer's presence or her demands.

The detective, who had also arrived at the jail at 9:00 a.m., overheard the lawyer's conversation with the jailer. The detective then entered the windowless interview room in the jail where the suspect had been taken 30 minutes earlier. Without informing the suspect of the lawyer's presence or her demands, the detective read to the suspect full and accurate Miranda warnings. The detective then informed the suspect that he wanted to ask about the burglary tools found in his car and the recent burglaries in the neighborhood where he had been arrested. The suspect replied, "I think I want my lawyer here before I talk to you." The detective responded, "That's up to you."

After a few minutes of silence, the suspect said, "Well, unless there is anything else I need to know, let's not waste any time waiting for someone to call my attorney and having her drive here. I probably should keep my mouth shut, but I'm willing to talk to you for a while." The suspect then signed a Miranda waiver form and, after interrogation by the detective, made incriminating statements regarding five burglaries. The interview lasted from 9:15 a.m. to 10:00 a.m.

In addition to the DUI, the suspect has been charged with five counts of burglary.

The lawyer has filed a motion to suppress all statements made by the suspect to the detective in connection with the five burglaries.

The state supreme court follows federal constitutional principles in all cases interpreting a criminal defendant's rights.

1. Did the detective violate the suspect's Sixth Amendment right to counsel when he questioned the suspect in the absence of the lawyer? Explain.

Criminal Law and Procedure Question

2. Under Miranda, did the suspect effectively invoke his right to counsel? Explain.
3. Was the suspect's waiver of his Miranda rights valid? Explain.

CONTRACTS QUESTION

A music conservatory has two concert halls. One concert hall had a pipe organ that was in poor repair, and the other had no organ. The conservatory decided to repair the existing organ and buy a new organ for the other concert hall. After some negotiation, the conservatory entered into two contracts with a business that both repairs and sells organs. Under one contract, the business agreed to repair the existing pipe organ for the conservatory for $100,000. The business would usually charge a higher price for a project of this magnitude, but the business agreed to this price because the conservatory agreed to prepay the entire amount. Under the other contract, the business agreed to sell a new organ to the conservatory for the other concert hall for $225,000. As with the repair contract, the business agreed to a low sales price because the conservatory agreed to prepay the entire amount. Both contracts were signed on January 3, and the conservatory paid the business a total of $325,000 that day.

Two weeks later, before the business had commenced repair of the existing organ, the business suffered serious and unanticipated financial reversals. The chief financial officer for the business contacted the conservatory and said,

Bad news. We had an unexpected liability and as a result are in a real cash crunch. In fact, even though we haven't acquired the new organ from our supplier or started repair of your existing organ, we've already spent the cash you gave us, and we have no free cash on hand. We're really sorry, but we're in a fix. I think that we can find a way to perform both contracts, but not at the original prices. If you agree to pay $60,000 more for the repair and $40,000 more for the new organ, we can probably find financing to finish everything. If you don't agree to pay us the extra money, I doubt that we will ever be able to perform either contract, and you'll be out the money you already paid us.

After receiving this unwelcome news, the conservatory agreed to pay the extra amounts, provided that the extra amount on each contract would be paid only upon completion of the business's obligations under that contract. The business agreed to this arrangement, and the parties quickly signed documents reflecting these changes to each contract. The business then repaired the existing organ, delivered the new organ, and demanded payment of the additional $100,000.

The conservatory now has refused to pay the business the additional amounts for the repair and the new organ.

1. Must the conservatory pay the additional $60,000 for the organ repair? Explain.
2. Must the conservatory pay the additional $40,000 for the new organ? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

In 1994, a man and a woman were married in State A.

In 1998, their daughter was born in State A.

In 2010, the family moved to State B.

In 2012, the husband and wife divorced in State B. Under the terms of the divorce decree:

- (a) the husband and wife share legal and physical custody of their daughter;
- (b) the husband must pay the wife $1,000 per month in child support until their daughter reaches age 18;
- (c) the marital residence was awarded to the wife, with the proviso that if it is sold before the daughter reaches age 18, the husband will receive 25% of the net sale proceeds remaining after satisfaction of the mortgage on the residence; and
- (d) the remaining marital assets were divided between the husband and the wife equally.

Six months ago, the husband was offered a job in State A that pays significantly less than his job in State B but provides him with more responsibilities and much better promotion opportunities. The husband accepted the job in State A and moved from State B back to State A.

Since returning to State A, the husband has not paid child support because, due to his lower salary, he has had insufficient funds to meet all his obligations.

One month ago, the wife sold the marital home, netting $10,000 after paying off the mortgage. She then moved to a smaller residence. The husband believes that he should receive more than 25% of the net sale proceeds given his financial difficulties.

Last week, when the wife brought the daughter to the husband's State A home for a weekend visit, the husband served the wife with a summons in a State A action to modify the support and marital-residence-sale-proceeds provisions of the State B divorce decree. The husband brought the action in the State A court that adjudicates all domestic relations issues.

1. Does the State A court have jurisdiction to modify
 - (a) the child support provision of the State B divorce decree? Explain.
 - (b) the marital-residence-sale-proceeds provision of the State B divorce decree? Explain.
2. On the merits, could the husband obtain
 - (a) retroactive modification of his child support obligation to the daughter? Explain.
 - (b) prospective modification of his child support obligation to the daughter? Explain.
 - (c) modification of the marital-residence-sale-proceeds provision of the State B divorce decree? Explain.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

The United States Forest Service (USFS) manages public lands in national forests, including the Scenic National Forest. Without conducting an environmental evaluation or preparing an environmental impact statement, the USFS approved a development project in the Scenic National Forest that required the clearing of 5,000 acres of old-growth forest. The trees in the forest are hundreds of years old, and the forest is home to a higher concentration of wildlife than can be found anywhere else in the western United States.

The USFS solicited bids from logging companies to harvest the trees on the 5,000 acres of forest targeted for clearing, and it ultimately awarded the logging contract to the company that had submitted the highest bid for the trees. However, the USFS has not yet issued the company a logging permit. Once it does so, the company intends to begin cutting down trees immediately.

A nonprofit organization whose mission is the preservation of natural resources has filed suit in federal district court against the USFS. The nonprofit alleges that the USFS violated the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) by failing to prepare an environmental impact statement for the proposed logging project. Among other remedies, the nonprofit seeks a permanent injunction barring the USFS from issuing a logging permit to the logging company until an adequate environmental impact statement is completed. The nonprofit believes that the logging project would destroy important wildlife habitat and thereby cause serious harm to wildlife in the Scenic National Forest, including some endangered species.

Assume that federal subject-matter jurisdiction is available, that the nonprofit has standing to bring this action, and that venue is proper.

1. If the logging company seeks to join the litigation as a party, must the federal district court allow it to do so as a matter of right? Explain.
2. What types of relief could the nonprofit seek to stop the USFS from issuing a logging permit during the pendency of the action, what must the nonprofit demonstrate to obtain that relief, and is the federal district court likely to grant that relief? Explain.

EVIDENCE QUESTION

A prison inmate has filed a civil rights lawsuit against a guard at the prison, alleging that the guard violated the inmate's constitutional rights during an altercation. The inmate and the guard are the only witnesses to this altercation. They have provided contradictory reports about what occurred.

The trial will be before a jury. The inmate plans to testify at trial. The guard's counsel has moved for leave to impeach the inmate with the following:

- (a) Twelve years ago, the inmate was convicted of felony distribution of marijuana. He served a three-year prison sentence, which began immediately after he was convicted. He served his full sentence and was released from prison nine years ago.
- (b) Eight years ago, the inmate pleaded guilty to perjury, a misdemeanor punishable by up to one year in jail. He paid a $5,000 fine.
- (c) Seven years ago, the inmate was convicted of felony sexual assault of a child and is currently serving a 10-year prison sentence for the crime. The victim was the inmate's daughter, who was 13 years old at the time of the assault.

The inmate's counsel objects to the admission of any evidence related to these three convictions and to any cross-examination based on this evidence.

The guard also plans to testify at trial. The inmate's counsel has moved for leave to impeach the guard with the following:

Last year, the guard applied for a promotion to prison supervisor. The guard submitted a résumé to the state that indicated that he had been awarded a B.A. in Criminal Justice from a local college. An official copy of the guard's academic transcript from that college indicates that the guard dropped out after his first semester and did not receive a degree.

The guard's counsel objects to the admission of this evidence and to any cross-examination based on this evidence.

The transcript and the résumé have been properly authenticated. The trial will be held in a jurisdiction that has adopted all of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

1. What evidence, if any, proffered by the guard to impeach the inmate should be admitted? Explain.
2. What evidence, if any, proffered by the inmate to impeach the guard should be admitted? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

Mega Inc. is a publicly traded corporation incorporated in a state whose corporate statute is modeled on the Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA). Mega's articles of incorporation do not address the election of directors or amendment of the bylaws by shareholders.

Well within the deadline for the submission of shareholder proposals for the upcoming annual shareholders' meeting, an investor, who was a large and long-standing shareholder of Mega, submitted a proposed amendment to Mega's bylaws. The proposal, which the investor asked to be included in the corporation's proxy materials and voted on at the upcoming shareholders' meeting, read as follows:

Section 20: The Corporation shall include in its proxy materials (including the proxy ballot) for a shareholders' meeting at which directors are to be elected the name of a person nominated for election to the Board of Directors by a shareholder or group of shareholders that beneficially have owned 3% or more of the Corporation's outstanding common stock for at least one year.

This Section shall supersede any inconsistent provision in these Bylaws and may not be amended or repealed by the Board of Directors without shareholder approval.

Mega's management decided to exclude the investor's proposal from the corporation's proxy materials and explained its reasons in a letter to the investor:

The investor's proposed bylaw provision would be inconsistent with relevant state law because the Board of Directors has the authority to manage the business and affairs of the Corporation. Generally, shareholders lack the authority to interfere with corporate management by seeking to create a method for the nomination and election of directors inconsistent with the method chosen by the Board of Directors.

Furthermore, at its most recent meeting, the Board of Directors unanimously approved an amendment to the Corporation's bylaws that provides for proxy access for director nominations by a shareholder or a group of shareholders holding at least 10% of the Corporation's voting shares for at least three years. This procedure takes precedence over any nomination methods that might be sought or approved by shareholders.

The investor is considering bringing a suit challenging management's refusal to include the investor's proposed bylaw provision and challenging the board's amendment of the bylaws at its recent meeting.

1. Is the investor's proposed bylaw provision inconsistent with state law? Explain.
2. If the investor's proposed bylaw provision were approved by the shareholders, would the bylaw amendment previously approved by the board take precedence over the investor's proposed bylaw provision? Explain.
3. Must the investor make a demand on Mega's board of directors before bringing suit? Explain.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Criminal Law and Procedure V.A., B., D.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Did the detective violate the suspect's Sixth Amendment right to counsel when he questioned the suspect about the burglaries without the lawyer present, given that the lawyer represented the suspect in an unrelated criminal matter?
- (2) Under Miranda, did the suspect effectively invoke his right to counsel when he said, "I think I want my lawyer here before I talk to you"?
- (3) Was the suspect's waiver of his right to remain silent under Miranda valid?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The Sixth Amendment right to counsel, as applied to states through the Fourteenth Amendment, is offense-specific. Although the suspect had an attorney representing him on his pending assault charge, he had no Sixth Amendment right to the assistance of counsel with respect to the five uncharged burglaries because formal adversarial proceedings had not yet commenced on those charges. The suspect's Sixth Amendment right to counsel was not violated by the detective's failure to inform him that the lawyer was present or of the lawyer's demands.

However, a person undergoing custodial interrogation also has an independent constitutional right to counsel during custodial interrogation under Miranda. When a suspect invokes his right to counsel under Miranda, custodial interrogation must immediately cease for a period of at least 14 days. However, the invocation of the right to counsel must be unambiguous and clearly convey that the suspect has requested counsel. Here, because the suspect's statement, "I think I want my lawyer here before I talk to you," was ambiguous, he did not invoke his Miranda right to counsel.

A waiver of rights must be knowing, intelligent, and voluntary. Here, the suspect waived his right to remain silent under Miranda when he signed the waiver form. The fact that the detective did not correct the suspect's assumption that the lawyer would need to drive to the jail—by telling him that the lawyer was in the waiting room and was demanding to see him—did not affect the validity of the suspect's waiver.

Point One (35%)

The suspect's Sixth Amendment right to counsel was not violated because the right does not attach on new charges until formal adversarial judicial proceedings have commenced on those charges.

The Sixth Amendment, as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment, provides that "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defense." The right to counsel does not attach with respect to particular charges until formal adversarial judicial proceedings have commenced (i.e., "at or after the initiation of adversary judicial criminal proceedings—whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment [or in some states, arrest warrant],” McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171, 175 (1991) (internal quotations omitted)). Once a suspect’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel has attached, any attempts to “deliberately elicit” statements from him in the absence of his attorney violate the Sixth Amendment. See Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964); Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387 (1977).

The Sixth Amendment right to counsel is charge- or offense -specific. Representation by counsel in one prosecution does not, in itself, guarantee counsel for uncharged offenses. See McNeil, 501 U.S. at 175; Texas v. Cobb, 532 U.S. 162 (2001). Here, the suspect’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel had attached only for the pending aggravated assault charge. The suspect’s right to counsel for the aggravated assault case did not guarantee counsel for the five unrelated and uncharged burglaries that were the subject of the detective’s interrogation. Thus, because formal adversarial judicial proceedings against the suspect for the uncharged burglaries had not begun, he had no Sixth Amendment right to counsel.

Finally, the detective’s failure to inform the suspect of the lawyer’s presence and demands to speak with him does not implicate the suspect’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel, which had not yet attached. See id.; Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 428–31 (1986).

Point Two (30%)

The suspect did not effectively invoke his right to counsel under Miranda because his statement was not unambiguous.

A suspect subject to custodial interrogation has a right to consult with counsel and to have an attorney present during questioning. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966). When a suspect invokes his right to counsel during an interrogation, law enforcement must immediately cease all questioning. See Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477, 484–85 (1981). Custodial interrogation cannot be reinitiated unless and until the suspect has been re-advised of his Miranda rights, has provided a knowing and voluntary waiver, and (1) counsel is present and (2) the suspect himself initiated further communication with the police, see id. at 484, or (3) (if the suspect was released from custody after the initial interrogation) at least 14 days have passed. Maryland v. Shatzer, 559 U.S. 98, 110 (2010).

To invoke the right to counsel, a suspect’s request must be “unambiguous.” This means that the suspect must articulate the desire for counsel sufficiently clearly that a reasonable officer would understand the statement to be a request for counsel. Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452, 459 (1994). If the request is ambiguous, the police are not required to stop the interrogation.

In this case, the suspect’s statement, “I think I want my lawyer here before I talk to you,” was not an unambiguous request for counsel. The most reasonable interpretation of this statement is that the suspect might be invoking his right to counsel. Id. at 461 (“maybe I should talk to a lawyer” is not an unequivocal request for counsel). See also Burket v. Angelone, 208 F.3d 172, 197–98 (4th Cir. 2000) (“I think I need a lawyer” is not an unambiguous request for an attorney); Soffar v. Cockrell, 300 F.3d 588, 594–95 (5th Cir. 2002) (discussion of various statements that did not constitute unequivocal requests for counsel).

Under these circumstances, the detective was not required to cease the custodial interrogation of the suspect. Nor was the detective required to clarify or ask follow-up questions to determine whether the suspect in fact wanted an attorney. Davis, 512 U.S. at 459–60.

Point Three (35%)

The suspect's waiver of his Miranda rights was knowing, intelligent, and voluntary despite the fact that he was never told of the lawyer's presence in the jail or of the lawyer's demands.

A valid waiver of Miranda rights must be "voluntary"—i.e., the product of a free or deliberate choice rather than intimidation, coercion, or deception. Berghuis v. Thompson, 560 U.S. 370, 382–83 (2010). In addition, the waiver must be knowing and intelligent. That is, it "must have been made with a full awareness of both the nature of the right being abandoned and the consequences of the decision to abandon it." Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 421 (1986).

In this case, the suspect signed a Miranda waiver form after receiving proper warnings. There is no evidence "that the police resorted to physical or psychological pressure to elicit the statements." Id. The entire interview lasted only 45 minutes. The only issue is whether the suspect knowingly and intelligently waived his Miranda rights despite the fact that the detective did not tell the suspect about the lawyer's presence and her demands.

The Supreme Court has said that "[e]vents occurring outside of the presence of the suspect and entirely unknown to him surely can have no bearing on the capacity to comprehend and knowingly relinquish a constitutional right." Id. at 422. If the suspect "knew that he could stand mute and request a lawyer, and . . . was aware of the State's intention to use his statements to secure a conviction," then the waiver is valid regardless of the information withheld. Id. at 422–23.

Here, the suspect was correctly informed of his rights. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. at 467–73. His comments demonstrate that he understood that he could have a lawyer present if he desired (i.e., wondering whether he should call his attorney) and that he understood that there might be consequences to speaking with the detective ("I probably should keep my mouth shut, but I'm willing to talk to you for a while."). His comment, "[L]et's not waste any time waiting for someone to call my attorney and having her drive here," along with his signature on the Miranda waiver form, show that his waiver was valid under the constitutional standard.

The fact that the detective did not tell the suspect about the lawyer's presence and demands has no bearing on the validity of the suspect's waiver because "such conduct is only relevant to the constitutional validity of a waiver if it deprives a defendant of knowledge essential to his ability to understand the nature of his rights and the consequences of abandoning them." Moran, at 424. The Supreme Court has specifically declined to adopt a rule requiring that law enforcement tell a suspect of an attorney's efforts to contact him, id. at 425 ("Nor are we prepared to adopt a rule requiring that the police inform a suspect of an attorney's efforts to reach him.").

[NOTE: An examinee might also recognize that this general rule is further supported by the Supreme Court's decision in Florida v. Powell, 559 U.S. 50 (2010), approving state Miranda warnings that do not explicitly warn suspects that they have a right to have counsel present during custodial interrogation.]

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) In the case of a service contract (governed by the common law of contracts), is a modification enforceable when a party agrees to pay more for the same performance than was originally promised?
- (2) In the case of a contract for the sale of goods (governed by Article 2 of the UCC), is a modification enforceable when a party agrees to pay more for the same goods than was originally promised?
- (3) May a party avoid an agreement on the basis of economic duress?

DISCUSSION

Summary

There are two arguments that the conservatory can make to support the claim that it is not bound to pay the higher prices: lack of consideration and economic duress.

The organ repair contract is governed by the common law of contracts. Under the common law, the business would have difficulty recovering the additional $60,000 for the organ repair because, under the “preexisting duty rule,” the agreement of the conservatory to pay the extra price was not supported by consideration. However, the business might argue that the modification is enforceable under an exception to the preexisting duty rule for fair and equitable modifications made in light of unanticipated circumstances.

The organ sale contract is governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. The business would likely recover the additional amount under that contract because Article 2 provides that consideration is not required for a modification to be binding.

In both cases, the conservatory could seek to avoid its agreement on the grounds of economic duress, but that argument is not likely to succeed.

Point One (45%)

The business probably cannot recover the additional $60,000 for the organ repair because the conservatory’s promise to pay more money was not supported by consideration.

The general rule is that, to be enforceable, a promise must be supported by consideration. Under RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 71, a promise is supported by consideration if it is bargained for in exchange for a return promise or performance. However, under the “preexisting duty rule” (exemplified in RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 73 and Alaska Packers’ Ass’n v. Domenico, 117 F. 99 (9th Cir. 1902)), promise of performance of a legal duty already owed to a promisor which is neither doubtful nor the subject of honest dispute is not consideration.

If the business had promised the conservatory anything new or different in exchange for the agreement to pay the additional $60,000 (such as, for example, repairing the pipe organ more quickly or using better parts), that would constitute consideration, especially in light of the principle that courts do not inquire into the adequacy of consideration. Here, however, the business already had a legal duty under the original contract and did not agree to do anything else in exchange for the conservatory's promise to pay $60,000 more.

However, an exception to the preexisting duty rule is sometimes applied in situations of unanticipated changed circumstances. Under RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 89, followed in many jurisdictions, a promise modifying a duty under a contract not fully performed on either side is binding even if not supported by consideration, if the modification is fair and equitable in view of circumstances not anticipated by the parties when the contract was made.

If a court applies the rule in Restatement § 89, the critical issues will be whether the modification was in fact “fair and equitable” and whether it can be justified in light of unanticipated circumstances. In many cases in which modifications have been upheld, a party encountered difficulties or burdens in performing far beyond what was knowingly bargained for in the original contract, with the result bordering on impracticability, such as having to excavate solid rock instead of soft dirt, or having to remove garbage far in excess of the amounts contemplated. The conservatory would argue that the business's performance difficulties were not of this sort at all—nothing about repairing the pipe organ itself was any different from or more difficult than originally contemplated, except that the business itself encountered financial distress unrelated to its burdens in performing its obligations under these contracts.

Even if the business satisfies that element of the rule in Restatement § 89, the business must also demonstrate that the circumstances that gave rise to the need to modify the contract were “unanticipated” at the time the original contract was made. Here, the facts suggest that when the business entered into the original contract, it expected that the price paid by the conservatory would enable it to perform. However, any evidence that the business knew or had reason to know at the time of execution that it would need more money from the conservatory to be able to perform would mean that the request to modify was not “unanticipated.”

[NOTE: Some cases, such as Schwartzreich v. Bauman-Basch, Inc., 231 N.Y. 196, 131 N.E. 887 (1921), find that if the parties mutually agreed to rescind the original contract and then, after rescission, entered into an entirely new contract for a higher price, the new contract is supported by consideration. There is no evidence that such a rescission followed by a new contract took place here.]

Point Two (45%)

The business can recover the additional $40,000 for the new organ because no consideration is required under Article 2 of the UCC for good-faith contract modifications.

The contract to buy a new organ is a contract for the sale of goods and therefore is governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. UCC § 2-102. Under Article 2, unlike the common law, an agreement modifying a contract needs no consideration to be binding. UCC § 2-209(1). Section 2-209(1) thus obviates the preexisting duty rule entirely in contracts for the sale of goods.

Even though consideration is not required, modifications governed by § 2-209 must satisfy the obligation of good faith imposed by the UCC. UCC § 1-304. See also Official Comment 2 to UCC § 2-209. Good faith means “honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing.” UCC § 1-201(b)(20). In this context, the obligation of good faith means that “[t]he effective use of bad faith to escape performance on the original contract terms is barred, and the extortion of a ‘modification’ without legitimate commercial reason is ineffective as a violation of the duty of good faith.” Official Comment 2 to UCC § 2-209. Here, because the business's financial reversals were serious and apparently unanticipated at the time that the business entered into the contract with the conservatory, and commitment of the extra money was needed to enable the business to perform, a court would likely find that the business acted in good faith. Thus, a court would likely uphold the enforceability of the conservatory's promise to pay the additional $40,000.

Point Three (10%)

The conservatory is unlikely to be able to defend against enforcement of its promises to pay additional money under the theory of economic duress, because the business probably did not make an improper threat.

Under the common law of contracts, parties may raise the defense of duress. This common law defense also applies to contracts governed by UCC Article 2. See UCC § 1-103(b).

A contract is voidable on the ground of economic duress by threat when it is established that a party's manifestation of assent is induced by an improper threat that leaves the party no reasonable alternative. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 175. See also, e.g., Austin Instrument Inc. v. Loral Corp., 272 N.E.2d 533 (N.Y. 1971) (a threat to withhold essential goods can constitute duress). In order to void its agreement to pay the additional sum because of economic duress, the conservatory must demonstrate that (1) the business made a threat to the conservatory, (2) the threat was "improper" or "wrongful," (3) the threat induced the conservatory's manifestation of assent to the modification, and (4) the threat was sufficiently grave to justify the conservatory's assent.

Here, it appears that three of the four elements are likely satisfied. The business plainly made a threat. Moreover, the threat induced the conservatory's assent to the modification, and the threat was sufficiently grave to justify that assent. If the conservatory had not agreed to pay the business the extra amounts, the conservatory would have lost its entire $325,000 investment. In light of this potential loss, a court could easily conclude that the conservatory had no reasonable alternative.

However, the business has a strong argument that its threat (indicating that it would breach the contracts unless the prices were increased) was not wrongful or improper, but was instead nothing more than a communication of the reality of its own perilous situation to the conservatory.

A mere threat to breach a contract is not, in and of itself, improper so as to support an action of economic duress or business compulsion. Something more is required, such as a breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing, as was present in Austin Instrument Inc., supra. Because the business could not perform the original contract without the requested modification, the economic duress claim for the conservatory would likely fail for much the same reason that the business would be able to enforce the modification. At the time the modification was requested, the business was not trying to extort a price increase because of the conservatory's vulnerability, but instead was simply stating the reality that the business could not perform without more money.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Does the State A court have jurisdiction to modify the State B child support order?
- (1)(b) Does the State A court have jurisdiction to modify the marital-residence-sale-proceeds provision of the State B property-division decree?
- (2)(a) May a child support order be modified retroactively?
- (2)(b) May a child support order be modified prospectively based on a change of employment with a lower salary?
- (2)(c) May a property-division order be modified after entry of a divorce decree?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The State A court may exercise personal jurisdiction over the wife because she was personally served in State A. However, subject-matter jurisdiction over the interstate modification of child support is governed by the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA). Under UIFSA, State A does not have jurisdiction to modify the order for the daughter's support because the wife is still a resident of State B. UIFSA, on the other hand, does not govern property distributions, and thus a State A court is not precluded from hearing the husband's petition to modify the marital-residence-sale-proceeds provision of the divorce decree.

A child support order may not be modified retroactively. A child support order may be modified prospectively based on a substantial change in circumstances. Courts agree that a significant decrease in income is a substantial change in circumstances. All states treat voluntary income reductions differently than involuntary reductions but employ different approaches for evaluating the impact of a voluntary reduction. Whether the husband could obtain prospective modification of the child support order depends on which approach is applied.

A property-division order is not subject to post-divorce modification based on a change in circumstances. Thus, the husband may, in some states, obtain prospective modification of the order for the daughter's support, but he may not obtain modification of the marital-residence-sale-proceeds provision.

Point One(a) (25%)

Personal jurisdiction over a nonresident respondent does not confer subject-matter jurisdiction over child support modification. Under UIFSA, a State A court may not modify a child support order issued by a State B court when, as here, the child or either parent continues to reside in State B, the jurisdiction that issued the child support order.

The State A court may exercise personal jurisdiction over the wife. The wife was personally served in State A, and a state may exercise jurisdiction based on in-state personal service. See Burnham

v. Superior Court, 495 U.S. 604 (1990). But personal jurisdiction over the wife is not enough to give a State A court jurisdiction to modify the State B support order.

The interstate enforcement and modification of child support is governed by the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA), which has been adopted by all states. Under UIFSA, the state that originally issued a child support order (here, State B) has continuing, exclusive jurisdiction to modify the order if that state remains the residence of the obligee, the child, or the obligor and all parties do not consent to the jurisdiction of another forum. See UIFSA § 205. See also UIFSA § 603 (“A tribunal of this State shall recognize and enforce, but may not modify, a registered order if the issuing tribunal had jurisdiction.”). The wife and daughter continue to reside in State B, and the wife has not consented to the jurisdiction of another forum. Thus, a State A court does not have jurisdiction to modify the State B child support order.

[NOTE: Examinees who do not discuss personal jurisdiction but fully discuss UIFSA may receive full credit.]

Point One(b) (15%)

UIFSA does not apply to disputes over property division. Thus, the State A court may exercise jurisdiction over the husband’s petition to modify the marital-residence-sale-proceeds provision of the State B divorce decree because it has personal jurisdiction over the wife.

The State A court in which the husband brought his action has jurisdiction to adjudicate domestic relations issues. The husband’s petition to modify the property settlement is a domestic relations issue. The courts of State A may exercise personal jurisdiction over the wife because she was personally served in State A. See Burnham v. Superior Court, 495 U.S. 604 (1990); see Point One(a).

UIFSA does not apply to divorce property-division disputes. Thus, although a State A court may not adjudicate the husband’s petition to modify his child support obligations, it may adjudicate his property-division claims. (Even though the court has jurisdiction, it may not modify the property-division award on the merits. See Point Two(c).)

Point Two(a) (20%)

A child support order may not be modified retroactively.

State courts have long held that obligations to pay child support ordinarily may not be modified retroactively. “If the hardship is particularly severe, the courts sometimes devised a way to protect the obligor, but in most instances the courts hold that retroactive modification of this kind is beyond their power and indeed the governing statute may so provide.” HOMER H. CLARK, THE LAW OF DOMESTIC RELATIONSHIPS IN THE UNITED STATES 725 (2d ed. 1987).

Federal law now goes further and requires the states, as a condition of federal child-support funding, to adopt rules that absolutely forbid retroactive modification of the support obligation. See 42 U.S.C. § 666(a)(9)(C). The states have adopted rules consistent with the federal requirements.

Point Two(b) (25%)

It is unclear whether the husband could obtain prospective downward modification of his child support based on his voluntary acceptance of a job with a lower salary.

Prospective modification of a child support order is typically available only when the petitioner can show a substantial change in circumstances. See ROBERT E. OLIPHANT & NANCY VER STEEGH, FAMILY LAW 213–15 (3d ed. 2010). A significant decrease in income is typically viewed as a substantial change.

However, when a parent seeks to modify a child support obligation because he has voluntarily reduced his income, a court will not modify the obligation based solely on the income loss. Some courts refuse to modify whenever the income shift was voluntary. See, e.g., Aguiar v. Aguiar, 127 P.3d 234 (Idaho Ct. App. 2005). Others look primarily to the petitioner’s intentions and permit downward modification if he has acted in good faith. See, e.g., In re Marriage of Horn, 650 N.E.2d 1103 (Ill. App. Ct. 1995). Many courts use a multifactor approach. See OLIPHANT & VER STEEGH, supra, 217–18.

Here, there is no question that the husband’s loss of income was voluntary. In a jurisdiction in which voluntary income reduction bars support modification, the husband’s petition would be denied.

In a jurisdiction employing a good-faith or multifactor approach, it is possible, but not certain, that the husband could obtain downward modification. The evidence supports the husband’s good faith: his change in employment appears to be based on his new job’s greater responsibilities and better promotion possibilities. In a jurisdiction using a multifactor approach, the court would likely also consider the impact of such a shift on the daughter, the likely duration of the husband’s income loss, and the likelihood of a promotion that would ultimately inure to the daughter’s benefit. Thus, on these facts, it is possible, but by no means certain, that the husband could prospectively obtain downward modification of his child support obligation to his daughter.

Point Two(c)(15%)

A divorce property-division award is not subject to modification.

A support order is aimed at meeting the post-divorce needs of the supported individual. Because the future is unpredictable, courts are empowered to modify a support award to take account of changed circumstances that may occur during the period in which support is paid.

By contrast, a property-distribution award divides assets of the marriage based on the equities at the time of divorce. Because the past can be ascertained, a property-division award is not subject to post-divorce modification. See HARRY A. KRAUSE ET AL., FAMILY LAW: CASES, COMMENTS, AND QUESTIONS 691 (6th ed. 2007).

Here, the husband is seeking modification of a property-division award with respect to an asset owned by the parties at the time of divorce. Thus, the husband may not obtain a modification of the marital-residence-sale-proceeds provision of the divorce decree based on his reduced income.

FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Federal Civil Procedure III.; IV.C.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Is the logging company entitled to join this action as a matter of right?
- (2)(a) May the nonprofit organization obtain a temporary restraining order to stop the USFS from issuing a logging permit?
- (2)(b) May the nonprofit organization obtain a preliminary injunction to stop the USFS from issuing a logging permit during the pendency of the action?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The logging company is entitled to intervene in this action as a matter of right because it has an interest in the property or transaction that is the subject of the action and is so situated that its interest may be impaired or impeded as a practical matter if the action goes forward without it. The logging company's interest is not adequately represented by the USFS's presence in the lawsuit.

The nonprofit organization may seek a temporary restraining order (TRO), followed by a preliminary injunction, to prevent the USFS from issuing a logging permit pending the outcome of the action. The nonprofit is likely to obtain a TRO if it can demonstrate a risk of immediate and irreparable injury. The nonprofit is also likely to obtain a preliminary injunction if it can demonstrate a significant threat of irreparable harm and a likelihood of success on the merits of its National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) claim.

Point One (50%)

Rule 24(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure requires federal courts to allow a person to intervene in an action as a matter of right if the person a) is interested in the property or transaction that is the subject of the action, b) is so situated that its interest may be impaired or impeded if the litigation goes forward without it, and c) is not adequately represented by existing parties. Here, the logging company likely meets all three requirements and should be allowed to intervene as a matter of right.

Rule 24 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure governs intervention, the process by which a non-party to an action may join the litigation. Under Rule 24(a) (intervention of right), a person must be permitted to intervene if three conditions are met: (1) the movant "claims an interest relating to the property or transaction that is the subject of the action," (2) the movant "is so situated that disposition of the action may as a practical matter impair or impede the movant's ability to protect its interest," and (3) "existing parties" do not "adequately represent [the movant's] interest." FED. R. CIV. P. 24(a). The three requirements for intervention of right are often "very interrelated." 7C CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT ET AL., FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 1908, at 297 (2007 & 2011 Supp.).

Here, the court should find that the logging company meets this test. First, the logging company has a strong interest in the property or transaction that is the subject of this action. The USFS has accepted the logging company's bid, and the logging company is merely awaiting issuance of a logging permit to begin logging. The nonprofit organization is seeking to prevent this logging. The logging company therefore has a strong, direct, and substantial interest in the subject matter of the lawsuit and in having its winning bid honored and a logging permit issued. See, e.g., Kleissler v. U.S. Forest Serv., 157 F.3d 964, 972 (3d Cir. 1998) (stating that "[t]imber companies have direct and substantial interests in a lawsuit aimed at halting logging"); see also Natural Resources Defense Council v. U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Comm'n, 578 F.2d 1341, 1343–44 (10th Cir. 1978) (holding that applicants whose license renewals were pending had Rule 24(a)(2) interests where the lawsuit sought to halt the license-issuing process pending preparation of environmental impact statements). See generally 7C WRIGHT ET AL., supra, § 1908.1, at 309 ("If there is a direct substantial legally protectable interest in the proceedings, it is clear that this requirement of the rule is satisfied.").

Second, the logging company's interest in receiving a logging permit may well be impaired, as a practical matter, by the outcome of the lawsuit. If the USFS loses the lawsuit, it will have to prepare an environmental impact statement before issuing the logging company's permit. This will, at a minimum, delay the logging company's ability to exercise its rights and may, in the long run, mean that no logging permit is ever issued. Intervention of right is not limited to those that would be legally bound as a matter of preclusion doctrine. Id. § 1908.2, at 368. Rather, "[t]he rule is satisfied whenever disposition of the present action would put the movant at a practical disadvantage in protecting its interest." Id. § 1908.2, at 369. Here, that condition is easily satisfied. See Kleissler, 157 F.3d at 972 ("Timber companies have direct and substantial interests in a lawsuit aimed at halting logging . . .").

Given that the logging company has an interest that may be impaired by disposition of the action, it should be allowed to intervene unless the court is persuaded that the USFS adequately represents the logging company's interest. See Rule 24(a)(2); 7C WRIGHT ET AL., supra, § 1909. Here, it could be argued that the USFS adequately represents the logging company's interest because the USFS presumably wants the court to uphold its development plan and allow it to proceed with issuance of the logging permit, which is the same relief that the logging company would seek. However, whether representation is truly adequate depends upon "[a] discriminating appraisal of the circumstances." 7C WRIGHT ET AL., supra, § 1909, at 440. Although both the government and the logging company wish to avoid the preparation of an environmental impact statement, their interests are distinct. The USFS's interest is proper management of the national forest system, while the logging company's interest is making a profit from logging the 5,000-acre tract. The USFS's handling of the litigation is likely to be affected by a variety of policy concerns and political considerations that have nothing to do with the logging company's purely economic interest in securing the right to cut trees in the Scenic National Forest. See, e.g., Kleissler, 157 F.3d at 973–74 ("[T]he government represents numerous complex and conflicting interests in matters of this nature. The straightforward business interests asserted by intervenors here may become lost in the thicket of sometimes inconsistent governmental policies.").

[NOTES: (1) Examinees who mistakenly analyze the logging company's case for joinder under the related but incorrect Rule 19 "Required Joinder of Parties" may receive credit. Rule 19 allows existing parties to demand joinder of non-parties (or seek dismissal of the case if they can't get it). There is a close relationship between Rule 24 and Rule 19 and both contain a similar standard for determining when "interested" third parties are "entitled" or "required" to be in the lawsuit. Indeed, the two prongs of the Rule 24 intervention test that are discussed above are nearly identical to the two prongs of the Rule 19(a) required joinder test. Examinees who discuss and apply the test should receive credit even if they cite Rule 19 rather than Rule 24.

(2) Examinees may discuss permissive joinder. Although permissive joinder is a possibility here, the question asks only whether the logging company can join the action as a matter of right, and a permissive joinder analysis is not responsive to the question. To the extent an examinee discusses permissive joinder, the analysis will focus on whether the logging company “has a claim or defense that shares with the main action a common question of law or fact.” FED. R. CIV. P. 24(b)(1)(B). The district court also “must consider whether the intervention will unduly delay or prejudice the adjudication of the original parties’ rights.” FED. R. CIV. P. 24(b)(3). On our facts, the logging company’s claim for the issuance of a logging permit would certainly share common questions of law and fact with the USFS’s defense against the nonprofit’s claim. There are no facts suggesting that the logging company’s presence would unduly delay or otherwise prejudice adjudication of the original action. Thus, the district court would have discretion to permit the logging company to intervene even if it denied intervention of right.]

Point Two(a) (25%)

The nonprofit organization could seek and would likely obtain a temporary restraining order to stop the USFS from issuing a logging permit, pending a hearing on an application for a preliminary injunction.

The first type of interim relief the nonprofit could seek to stop the USFS from issuing a logging permit to the logging company is a temporary restraining order (TRO) prohibiting the USFS from issuing the logging permit. A TRO can be issued without notice to the adverse party, but only in limited circumstances and only for a limited time. FED. R. CIV. P. 65(b). To secure a TRO without notice, the nonprofit would need to submit an affidavit containing specific facts that demonstrate a risk of “immediate and irreparable injury” if a permit is issued. FED. R. CIV. P. 65(b)(1). In deciding whether to grant a TRO, courts will also consider the same factors that are relevant in deciding whether to grant a preliminary injunction (e.g. the moving party’s likelihood of success on the merits, the balance of hardships, and the public interest). See Point Two(b), infra. The TRO would last only long enough for the court to consider and resolve a request by the nonprofit for a preliminary injunction, but no longer than 14 days (unless the court extends it for good cause or the adverse party consents to an extension). In addition, bond is required.

Here, the court is likely to grant the nonprofit’s request. The nonprofit could plausibly claim that cutting down 5,000 acres of old-growth forest in an area that is home to the highest concentration of wildlife in the western United States would have “an immediate and irreparable” adverse impact on the environment and cause irreparable harm to the nonprofit’s interest in preserving and protecting natural resources, including wildlife habitat.

Point Two(b) (25%)

The nonprofit could also seek, and would likely obtain, a preliminary injunction to stop the USFS, which is likely to be granted if the nonprofit’s claim that the USFS violated NEPA has a strong basis in fact and law.

Because the TRO would be temporary, the nonprofit would need to move for a preliminary injunction to prevent the USFS from issuing a logging permit throughout the pendency of the litigation. Preliminary injunctions are injunctions that seek to “protect [the] plaintiff from irreparable injury and to preserve the court's power to render a meaningful decision after a trial on the merits." 11A CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT ET AL., FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 2947, at 112 (2013). Rule 65 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure sets out the procedural requirements for preliminary injunctions. Preliminary injunctions may be granted only upon notice to the adverse party, FED. R. CIV. P. 65(a)(1), and only if the movant "gives security in an amount that the court considers proper to pay the costs and damages sustained by any party found to have been wrongfully enjoined or restrained." FED. R. CIV. P. 65(c).

While Rule 65 sets out the procedural requirements for preliminary injunctive relief, it does not specify the substantive grounds upon which it may be granted. The court's discretion in ruling upon a motion for a preliminary injunction "is exercised in conformity with historic federal equity practice." 11A WRIGHT ET AL., supra, § 2947, at 114. The court typically considers four factors:

- (1) the significance of the threat of irreparable harm to the plaintiff if the injunction is not granted,
- (2) the balance between this harm and the injury that granting the injunction would inflict on the defendant,
- (3) the probability that the plaintiff will succeed on the merits, and
- (4) the public interest.

Id. § 2948, at 122–24; accord Habitat Educ. Center v. Bosworth, 363 F. Supp. 2d 1070, 1088 (E.D. Wis. 2005). The most important of these factors is the risk of irreparable harm to the plaintiff. 11A WRIGHT ET AL., supra, § 2948.1, at 129. If the plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law (e.g., if money damages can compensate the plaintiff for its loss), then a preliminary injunction will be denied. Id. § 2948.1.

Here, a court would likely conclude that the potential for environmental damage to the forest creates a significant threat of irreparable harm. "[E]nvironmental injury is often irreparable. . . . Courts have recognized that logging such as would occur [here] can have long-term environmental consequences and thus satisfy the irreparable injury criterion." Habitat Educ. Center, 363 F. Supp. 2d at 1089 (citing Idaho Sporting Congress, Inc. v. Alexander, 222 F.3d 562, 569 (9th Cir. 2000) (noting that the imminent and continuing logging activities presented "evidence of environmental harm . . . sufficient to tip the balance in favor of injunctive relief")); Neighbors of Cuddy Mountain v. U.S. Forest Service, 137 F.3d 1372, 1382 (9th Cir. 1998) (stating that "[t]he old growth forests plaintiffs seek to protect would, if cut, take hundreds of years to reproduce") (internal citation omitted)); see also 11C WRIGHT ET AL., supra, § 2948.1, at 151 (noting that "a preliminary injunction has been issued to prevent harm to the environment").

The second factor, the balance between the harm to the plaintiff and the harm the defendant will suffer if the injunction is issued, also appears to support issuance of a preliminary injunction here. The USFS will have to wait before it can develop the Scenic National Forest, and the logging company may lose money if the delay is prolonged. These economic harms could be compensated monetarily if an injunction is issued inappropriately. Where "an injunction bond can compensate [the] defendant for any harm the injunction is likely to inflict, the balance should be struck in favor of [the] plaintiff." Id. § 2948.2, at 192. See also Habitat Educ. Center, 363 F. Supp. 2d at 1089 (stating that "the relative absence of harmful effects on the Forest Service weighs in favor of granting the injunction").

The third factor is the likelihood that the plaintiff will prevail on the merits. Although there is limited information concerning the merits of the action, the nonprofit alleges that the federal statute (NEPA) requires an environmental impact statement and further states that the USFS created no environmental impact analysis or statement at all. Assuming that those allegations are correct, it seems plausible to conclude that the nonprofit will be able to show a likelihood of success on the merits.

Finally, courts deciding whether or not to issue preliminary injunctive relief are to consider the public interest. “Focusing on this factor is another way of inquiring whether there are policy considerations that bear on whether the order should issue.” 11C WRIGHT ET AL., supra, § 2948.4, at 214. If the court concludes that the nonprofit is likely to succeed on its NEPA claim because the USFS wrongfully failed to conduct an environmental impact assessment, it is likely to find that the public interest would be served by restraining the USFS from proceeding with logging in a national forest. See Heartwood, Inc. v. U.S. Forest Service, 73 F. Supp. 2d 962, 979 (S.D. Ill. 1999), aff’d on other grounds, 230 F.3d 947 (7th Cir. 2000) (“violations by federal agencies of NEPA’s provisions as established by Congress harm the public as well as the environment”).

Thus, a court is very likely to grant a preliminary injunction if it concludes that the nonprofit has a significant likelihood of success on the merits.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

(1) Under what circumstances can evidence of prior convictions be used to impeach a witness's credibility in a civil case?

(1)(a) May the inmate's credibility be impeached by evidence of a 12-year-old felony drug conviction, if he was released from prison 9 years ago?

(1)(b) May the inmate's credibility be impeached by evidence of an 8-year-old misdemeanor perjury conviction that was punishable by 1 year in jail, if he pleaded guilty and was sentenced only to pay a $5,000 fine?

(1)(c) May the inmate's credibility be impeached by evidence of a 7-year-old sexual assault conviction if the inmate is still serving a 10-year prison sentence and the victim was his 13-year-old daughter?

(2)(a) May the guard's credibility be impeached by cross-examination regarding specific instances of misconduct (i.e., lying on his résumé) relevant to credibility?

(2)(b) May the guard's credibility be impeached by admission of extrinsic evidence (his résumé and academic transcript) offered to prove specific instances of misconduct relevant to credibility?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under the Federal Rules of Evidence, witnesses can be impeached with evidence of prior convictions and/or specific instances of misconduct. Whether evidence of prior convictions should be admitted to impeach generally depends on the nature of the crime, the amount of time that has passed, and (only in criminal cases) whether the "witness" is the defendant. FED. R. EVID. 609(a).

In this civil case, evidence of the inmate's conviction for distribution of marijuana should be admitted to impeach the inmate because he was convicted of a felony and was released from prison fewer than 10 years ago. FED. R. EVID. 609(a)(1). Credibility is critically important in this case because the jury will hear conflicting testimony from the two disputing parties and there were no other eyewitnesses to the altercation. Under Rule 609(a)(1), the inmate's conviction should be admitted because it has some bearing on his credibility and its probative value is not substantially outweighed by concerns of unfair prejudice, confusion, or delay. Id.

Evidence of the inmate's misdemeanor conviction for perjury must be admitted because the crime "required proving—or the witness's admitting—a dishonest act or false statement" by the inmate. FED. R. EVID. 609(a)(2).

Evidence of the inmate's felony conviction for sexual assault should be excluded because its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the inmate based on the heinous nature of the crime. FED. R. EVID. 609(a)(1). In the alternative, the judge could limit the evidence relating to this conviction by excluding details of the inmate's crime.

In all civil (and criminal) cases, witnesses can also be impeached with evidence of specific instances of prior misconduct that did not result in a conviction. FED. R. EVID. 608(b). Pursuant to Rule 608(b), misconduct probative of untruthfulness can be inquired into on cross-examination but cannot be proved through extrinsic evidence. Id. Thus, the inmate's counsel should be permitted to cross-examine the guard regarding the false statement in the guard's résumé. However, extrinsic evidence of the guard's misconduct (i.e., the guard's authenticated résumé and transcript from the local college) should not be admitted, even if the guard denies wrongdoing or refuses to answer cross-examination questions about these matters. Id.

Point One (10%)

The Federal Rules of Evidence permit impeachment of witnesses with evidence of prior convictions.

Whether convictions should be admitted to impeach generally depends on the nature of the crime, the amount of time that has passed, and (only in criminal cases) whether the "witness" is the defendant. FED. R. EVID. 609(a). Under Rule 609(a), evidence of prior convictions may be admitted for the purpose of "attacking a witness's character for truthfulness." Id.

There are two basic types of convictions that can be admitted for the purpose of impeachment:

- (1) convictions for crimes "punishable by death or by imprisonment for more than one year" (which generally correlates to "felonies"), FED. R. EVID. 609(a)(1); and
- (2) convictions "for any crimes regardless of the punishment . . . if the court can readily determine that establishing the elements of the crime required proving—or the witness's admitting—a dishonest act or false statement." FED. R. EVID. 609(a)(2).

Pursuant to Rule 609(a)(1), in civil cases, the admission of evidence of a felony conviction is "subject to Rule 403 [which says that a court may exclude relevant evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by other factors]." FED. R. EVID. 609(a)(1). However, Rule 403 does not protect the witness against admission of prior convictions involving dishonesty—which must be admitted by the court. FED. R. EVID. 609(a)(2).

Finally, Federal Rule of Evidence 609(b) contains the presumption that a conviction that is more than 10 years old, or where more than 10 years has passed since the witness's release from confinement (whichever is later), should not be admitted unless "its probative value, supported by specific facts and circumstances, substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect" and the proponent has provided the adverse party with reasonable written notice. FED. R. EVID. 609(b).

Point One(a) (25%)

The court should admit evidence of the inmate's 12-year-old felony marijuana distribution conviction.

The inmate's conviction for marijuana distribution was for a felony punishable by imprisonment for more than one year. See FED. R. EVID. 609(a)(1). Moreover, although the conviction was 12 years ago, the 10-year time limit of Rule 609(b) is not exceeded because that time limit runs from the date of either “the witness’s conviction or release from confinement for it, whichever is later.” FED. R. EVID. 609(b). Because the inmate served three years in prison, he was released from confinement nine years ago.

However, pursuant to Rule 609(a)(1), the admission of felony convictions to impeach a witness in a civil case is “subject to Rule 403.” FED. R. EVID. 609(a)(1). Neither Rule 609(a) nor the advisory committee notes specify which factors courts should consider when balancing the probative value of a conviction against the dangers identified in Rule 403 (which include (1) unfair prejudice, (2) confusion of the issues, (3) misleading the jury, (4) waste of time or undue delay, and (5) needless presentation of cumulative evidence). FED. R. EVID. 403.

In this case, credibility is very important because the evidence consists primarily of the testimony of the disputing parties and there were no other eyewitnesses to the altercation. This enhances the probative value of any evidence bearing on the inmate’s credibility. A court is likely to conclude that the inmate’s prior felony drug conviction is relevant to his credibility. See, e.g., United States v. Brito, 427 F.3d 53, 64 (1st Cir. 2005) (“Prior drug-trafficking crimes are generally viewed as having some bearing on veracity.”). Although the probative value of any conviction diminishes with age, see, e.g., United States v. Brewer, 451 F. Supp. 50, 53 (E.D. Tenn. 1978), the inmate’s ongoing problems with the law suggest that he has continued (and even escalated) his criminal behavior over the past nine years. The court should admit this evidence because its probative value is not substantially outweighed by any Rule 403 concerns. Specifically, any prejudice to the inmate would be slight because the conviction is unrelated to the altercation at issue and the conviction was not for a heinous crime that might inflame the jury.

Point One(b) (15%)

The court must admit evidence of the inmate’s eight-year-old misdemeanor conviction because perjury is a crime of dishonesty.

Rule 609(a)(2) provides that evidence of a criminal conviction “must be admitted if the court can readily determine that establishing the elements of the crime required proving—or the witness’s admitting—a dishonest act or false statement.” FED. R. EVID. 609(a)(2). The inmate’s conviction for perjury would have necessarily required proving that the inmate engaged in an act of dishonesty. This conviction occurred within the past 10 years, so it “must be admitted” because, in contrast to Rule 609(a)(1) (discussed in Point One(a)), admission under Rule 609(a)(2) is mandatory and not subject to Rule 403.

Point One(c) (20%)

The court should exclude evidence of the inmate’s seven-year-old felony sexual assault conviction because the probative value of this evidence is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. In the alternative, the details of the prior conviction could be excluded.

The inmate’s conviction for felony sexual assault was seven years ago, and he has not yet been released from incarceration, so Rule 609(a) but not 609(b) is applicable here. FED. R. EVID. 609(a). This conviction is therefore admissible to impeach the inmate, unless its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or any other Rule 403 concern. Id. Sex crimes are generally not considered relevant to credibility, see Hopkins v. State, 639 So. 2d 1247, 1254 (Miss. 1993), so the probative value of this conviction is relatively low. Moreover, the heinous nature of the inmate's crime (sexual assault on his daughter) makes the danger of unfair prejudice to the inmate very high. Thus, the court should exclude evidence of the conviction because it was for a heinous offense that is likely to inflame the jury and it has little bearing on credibility. See, e.g., United States v. Beahm, 664 F.2d 414, 419 (4th Cir. 1981).

As an alternative to excluding this evidence, the judge could minimize the unfair prejudice to the inmate by permitting limited cross-examination but refusing to allow specific questions about the nature of the inmate's conviction. For example, a court could limit cross-examination to the fact that the inmate was convicted of a "felony" or perhaps that he was convicted of a "sexual assault" without identifying the victim. However, because evidence of the inmate's prior convictions can be admitted solely for the purpose of enabling the jury to assess his credibility and because his two earlier convictions should have already been admitted, the court should exclude all evidence of the felony sexual assault conviction.

Point Two(a) (15%)

The court should permit the inmate's counsel to cross-examine the guard regarding the false statement in his résumé because the guard's misconduct bears on his truthfulness.

The inmate wishes to cross-examine the guard about his prior dishonest behavior—lying on his résumé—that did not involve a criminal conviction. Rule 608(b) allows witnesses to be cross-examined about specific instances of prior non-conviction misconduct probative of untruthfulness "in order to attack . . . the witness's character for truthfulness." FED. R. EVID. 608(b).

The court's decision to allow cross-examination about the guard's prior dishonest behavior depends on the probative value of such evidence balanced against the danger of unfair prejudice to the guard or any other Rule 403 concern. FED. R. EVID. 403. Here, the guard's false statement on his résumé that he obtained a degree in Criminal Justice is highly probative of his untruthfulness because it grossly misrepresents his actual academic record, was made recently, and was made with the intent to deceive. Because the probative value of this evidence is very strong and is not substantially outweighed by any Rule 403 concerns, cross-examination of the guard on this topic should be permitted. The court may also consider it fair to permit this cross-examination of the guard on these matters, assuming that one or more of the inmate's prior convictions have been admitted to impeach his credibility.

Point Two(b) (15%)

The court should exclude extrinsic evidence of the guard's non-conviction misconduct, even if the guard denies wrongdoing or refuses to answer questions about the matter.

Although Rule 608(b) allows cross-examination about specific instances of prior misconduct probative of untruthfulness, "extrinsic evidence" offered to prove such misconduct is not admissible. FED. R. EVID. 608(b). The rationale for this rule is that allowing the introduction of extrinsic evidence of prior misconduct by witnesses, when these acts are relevant only to the witnesses' truthfulness and not to the main issues in the case, would create too great a risk of confusing the jury and unduly delaying the trial. The court does not have discretion to admit this extrinsic evidence. See, e.g., United States v. Elliot, 89 F.3d 1360, 1368 (8th Cir. 1996).

Here, the inmate's counsel may cross-examine the guard about the false statement on his résumé. However, the inmate's counsel must accept the guard's response. Even if the guard denies wrongdoing or refuses to answer questions about the matter, the inmate's counsel cannot introduce the guard's résumé or the transcript from the local college to prove the guard's misconduct.

CORPORATIONS ANALYSIS

(Corporations V.A.2.; IX.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems

- (1) Do shareholders have the authority to amend a corporation's bylaws with respect to director nominations?
- (2) Do board-approved bylaws on a particular subject, here nomination of directors, preempt subsequent conflicting bylaw amendments by shareholders?
- (3) Is a suit challenging both management's refusal to include the proposed bylaw amendment in Mega's proxy statement and the board's amendment of the bylaws dealing with nomination of directors a direct or derivative suit?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The voting and litigation rights of the shareholders of Mega are subject to the provisions of the Model Business Corporations Act (MBCA).

The investor's proposed bylaw provision is not inconsistent with state law. Under the MBCA, shareholders may amend the bylaws when the amendment deals with a proper matter for the corporation's bylaws, such as procedures for nominating directors.

The Mega board's bylaw amendment does not preempt the investor's proposed bylaw provision or the Mega shareholders' power to approve it. While shareholders can limit the board's power to amend or repeal the bylaws, the board cannot limit the shareholders' power.

Whether the investor must make a demand on Mega's board depends on how the investor frames its claim. If the investor claims a violation of shareholder voting rights, the claim is direct and pre-suit demand on the board is not required. If, on the other hand, the investor claims that the directors violated their fiduciary duties by amending the bylaws to entrench themselves, the claim is derivative and a pre-suit demand is required.

Point One (30%)

Shareholders may amend the corporation's bylaws where the proposed bylaw provision relates to procedural matters typically included in the bylaws, such as the nomination of directors.

Internal affairs of the corporation, such as the conduct of shareholder meetings and election of directors, are subject to the corporate law of the state of incorporation. See McDermott Inc. v. Lewis, 531 A.2d 206 (Del. 1987) (applying law of jurisdiction where corporation was incorporated in case involving voting rights). This state's corporate statute is modeled on the MBCA.

Under the MBCA, "shareholders may amend . . . the corporation's bylaws." MBCA § 10.20(a). Thus, the only question is whether the bylaws can specify the procedures for shareholder nomination of directors.

The MBCA states that the bylaws “may contain any provision that is not inconsistent with law or the articles of incorporation.” MBCA § 2.06(b). In addition, the MBCA was revised in 2009 to address shareholder nomination of directors in public corporations (known as “proxy access”) and specifies that the bylaws “may contain . . . a requirement that . . . the corporation include in its [proxy materials] one or more individuals nominated by a shareholder.” MBCA § 2.06(c)(1); see Committee on Corporate Laws, ABA Section of Business Law, Report on the Roles of Boards of Directors and Shareholders of Publicly Owned Corporations and Changes to the Model Business Corporations Act—Adoption of Shareholder Proxy Access Amendments to Chapters 2 and 10, 65 BUS. LAWYER 1105 (2010).

The inclusion of director-nomination procedures in the bylaws is consistent with practice and is recognized by the Delaware courts, whose views on corporate law carry significant weight. Typically, the procedures for nomination of directors are found in the bylaws. See 1 COX & HAZEN, TREATISE ON THE LAW OF CORPORATIONS § 3.12 (3d ed. 2011); see also 4 FLETCHER, CORP. FORMS ANN. PART III, ch. 21 (2013) (including sample bylaws that permit nomination of directors by shareholders). The Delaware Supreme Court has confirmed that the bylaws may “define the process and procedures” for director elections. See CA, Inc. v. AFSCME Employees Pension Plan, 953 A.2d 227 (Del. 2008) (concluding that bylaw amendment requiring reimbursement of election expenses to certain successful shareholder nominators is “proper subject” under Delaware law).

[NOTE: The question of the proper scope of the bylaws can be answered using the more general MBCA § 2.06(b) or the 2009 MBCA revision adding § 2.06(c)(1) (adopted in CT, ME, VA). In addition, some examinees might raise the point that shareholder proposals may not compel the board to take action, such as by including shareholder nominations in the company’s proxy materials, on the theory that the “business and affairs” of the corporation are to be managed by the board. See MBCA § 8.01(b). Although shareholders are generally limited to adopting precatory resolutions that recommend or encourage board action, this limitation does not apply when shareholders have specific authority to take binding action on their own—such as to amend the bylaws.]

Point Two (30%)

Shareholders can amend (or repeal) board-approved bylaws. Further, shareholders can limit the board’s power to later amend and repeal a shareholder-approved bylaw.

Under the MBCA, shareholders have the power to amend the bylaws. See Point One. The board shares this power with the shareholders, unless (1) the corporation’s articles “reserve that power exclusively to the shareholders” or (2) “the shareholders in amending, repealing, or adopting a bylaw expressly provide that the board of directors may not amend, repeal, or reinstate that bylaw.” See MBCA § 10.20(b).

Shareholder-approved bylaw provisions can amend or repeal existing bylaw provisions, whether originally approved by the board or by shareholders. See ALAN R. PALMITER, CORPORATIONS: EXAMPLES AND EXPLANATIONS § 7.1.3 (7th ed. 2012). Thus, the Mega board’s bylaw amendment—which set more demanding thresholds for shareholder nomination of directors than the investor’s proposed bylaw provision—would be superseded (repealed) if Mega’s shareholders were to approve the investor’s proposal.

Further, a shareholder-approved bylaw generally can limit the power of the board to later amend or repeal it. See MBCA § 10.20(b)(2). Thus, if Mega’s shareholders approved the bylaw provision proposed by the investor, Mega's board could not repeal the provision because it includes a "no board repeal" clause.

The revision to the MBCA in 2009 dealing with shareholder proxy access does not change this conclusion. That revision specifies that a shareholder-approved bylaw dealing with director nominations may not limit the board's power to amend, add, or repeal "any procedure or condition to such a bylaw in order to provide for a reasonable, practicable and orderly process." MBCA § 2.06(d). Thus, according to the revision, if shareholders approve a bylaw amendment that limits further board changes, the board would nonetheless retain the power to "tinker" with the bylaw to safeguard the voting process, but could not repeal the shareholder-approved bylaw. The Official Comment to MBCA § 2.06(d) makes clear that the revision is "not intended to allow the board of directors to frustrate the purpose of the shareholder-adopted proxy access . . . provision." Thus, if Mega's shareholders were to approve the bylaw provision proposed by the investor, Mega's board could only amend the provision regarding its procedures or conditions in a manner consistent with its purpose of permitting proxy access for Mega's shareholders.

[NOTE: The board's attempted interference with a shareholder voting initiative may also have been a violation of the directors' fiduciary duties. See Blasius Indus., Inc. v. Atlas Corp., 564 A.2d 651 (Del. Ch. 1988) (finding that directors breached their fiduciary duties by amending bylaws and expanding size of board to thwart insurgent's plan to amend bylaws and seat a majority of new directors). The call, however, asks examinees to consider whether shareholders or the board have "precedence" over amending the corporate bylaws. Thus, an examinee's answer should be framed in terms of "power" and not "duty."]

Point Three (40%)

The investor need not make a demand on the board if the investor states a direct claim, such as an allegation that the board interfered with the investor's right to amend the bylaws. But the investor must make a demand on the board if the investor states a derivative claim (on behalf of the corporation), such as an allegation that the directors sought to entrench themselves by interfering with the proposed proxy access.

The MBCA generally requires that shareholders make a demand on the board of directors before initiation of a derivative suit. MBCA § 7.42 (shareholder may not bring derivative proceeding until written demand has been made on corporation and 90 days have expired). A derivative suit is essentially two suits in one, where the plaintiff-shareholder seeks to bring on behalf of the corporation a claim that vindicates corporate rights, usually based on violation of fiduciary duties. PALMITER, supra, § 18.1.1 (6th ed. 2009). The demand permits the board to investigate the situation identified by the shareholder and take suitable action. No demand on the board is required, however, if the shareholder brings a direct suit to vindicate the shareholder's own rights, not those of the corporation.

Is the suit brought by the investor derivative or direct? The MBCA defines a "derivative proceeding" as one brought "in the right of a domestic corporation." MBCA § 7.40(1). Thus, the answer to how the investor's suit should be characterized turns on what rights the investor seeks to vindicate. If the investor frames its claim as one of fiduciary breach by directors—for example, for failing to become adequately informed about voting procedures or for seeking to entrench themselves in office by manipulating the voting structure to avoid a shareholder insurgency—then the suit is "derivative" and the investor must make a demand on the board. See MBCA Ch. 7, Subch. D Introductory Comment ("the derivative suit has historically been the principal method of challenging allegedly illegal action by management").

If, however, the investor frames its claim as one to vindicate shareholder rights, the suit is direct and no demand is required. For many courts, the direct-derivative question turns on who is injured and who is to receive the relief sought by the plaintiff-shareholders. See Tooley v. Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette, Inc., 845 A.2d 1031 (Del. 2004) (characterizing a merger-delay claim as direct because delay of merger only harmed shareholders, not corporation). Thus, if the investor claims that management's refusal to include its proposed bylaw amendment in the corporation's proxy materials violates its shareholder rights to initiate corporate governance reforms, the suit will be direct. Courts have not questioned the ability of shareholders to bring direct suits challenging board action to exclude their proposed bylaw amendments from the corporation's proxy materials. See JANA Master Fund, Ltd. v. CNET Networks, Inc., 954 A.2d 335 (Del. Ch. 2008) (upholding shareholder's direct challenge to board's interpretation of advance-notice bylaw); Chesapeake Corp. v. Shore, 771 A.2d 293 (Del. Ch. 2000) (upholding shareholder's direct challenge to actions by board that effectively prevented it from proposing bylaw amendments in contest for control).

Is the way that the investor frames its claim conclusive? Courts have permitted shareholder-plaintiffs to challenge a transaction in a direct suit, even though the same transaction could also be challenged as a fiduciary breach. See Eisenberg v. Flying Tiger Line, Inc., 451 F.2d 267 (2d Cir. 1971) (permitting direct suit challenging a corporate reorganization as a dilution of shareholder voting power, even though reorganization may have involved conflicts of interest and thus constituted a fiduciary breach). Thus, the investor's choice to pursue a claim challenging the legality of management's decision to exclude the investor's proposal from the corporation's proxy materials—rather than a possible breach of fiduciary duty—is likely to be respected. See 3 COX & HAZEN, supra, § 15.3 (describing situations in which a claim can be framed as derivative or direct).

[NOTE: Some issues under Delaware corporate law regarding pre-suit demand are not relevant here. For example, whether the Mega directors are independent and disinterested is not relevant to the MBCA requirement of a pre-suit demand. As the Official Comment to MBCA § 7.42 points out, the MBCA's requirement of "universal demand" gives the board "the opportunity to reexamine the act complained of in the light of a potential lawsuit and take corrective action," even when the directors might be non-independent or have conflicts of interest.

Nor is it relevant to the MBCA pre-suit demand requirement that the statutory 90-day waiting period may be onerous. The first paragraph of MBCA § 7.42 requires a pre-suit demand without exception; the second paragraph of the section imposes a 90-day waiting period before a derivative suit may be brought, which can be shortened if the board rejects the demand or "irreparable injury to the corporation would result by waiting for the expiration of the 90-day period." The call, as written, asks only whether a pre-suit demand should be made and does not ask examinees to address whether the post-demand waiting period should be shortened under the "irreparable injury" standard.]

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2015 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Constitutional Law question on the February 2015 MEE tested the following areas from the Constitutional Law outline: II.A.3., The separation of powers—The powers of Congress—Power to enforce the 13th, 14th, and 15th Amendments; and IV.C., Individual rights—Equal protection.

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by user jurisdictions as part of the bar examination on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Areas of law that may be covered on the MEE include the following: Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Civil Procedure, Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts, Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Uniform Commercial Code (Secured Transactions). Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

NOTE: Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles rather than local case or statutory law.

AGENCY/TORTS QUESTION

For many years, a furniture store employed drivers to deliver furniture to its customers in vans it owned.

Several months ago, however, the store decided to terminate the employment of all its drivers. At the same time, the store offered each driver the opportunity to enter into a contract to deliver furniture for the store as an independent contractor. The proposed contract, labeled “Independent-Contractor Agreement,” provided that each driver would

- (1) provide a van for making deliveries;
- (2) use the van only to deliver furniture for the store during normal business hours and according to the store’s delivery schedule; and
- (3) receive a flat hourly payment based upon 40 work hours per week, without employee benefits.

The proposed Independent-Contractor Agreement also specified that the store would not withhold income taxes or Social Security contributions from payments to the driver.

The store also offered each driver the opportunity to lease a delivery van from the store at a below-market rate. The proposed lease required the driver to procure vehicle liability insurance. It also specified that the store would reimburse the driver for fuel and liability insurance and that the lease would terminate immediately upon termination of the driver’s contract to deliver furniture for the store.

All the drivers who had been employed by the store agreed to continue their relationships with the store and executed both an Independent-Contractor Agreement and a lease agreement for a van.

Three months ago, a driver delivered furniture to a longtime customer of the store during normal business hours. The customer asked the driver to take a television to her sister’s home, located six blocks from the driver’s next delivery, and offered him a $10 tip to do so. The driver agreed, anticipating that this delivery would add no more than half an hour to his workday.

In violation of a local traffic ordinance, the driver double-parked the delivery van in front of the sister’s house to unload the television. A few minutes later, while the driver was in the sister’s house, a car swerved to avoid the delivery van and skidded into oncoming traffic. The car was struck by a garbage truck, and a passenger in the car was seriously injured.

The passenger has brought a tort action against the store to recover damages for injuries resulting from the driver’s conduct. Pretrial discovery has revealed that delivery vans routinely double-park; survey evidence suggests that, in urban areas like this one, 80% of deliveries are made while the delivery van is double-parked.

In this jurisdiction, there is no law that imposes liability on a vehicle owner for the tortious acts of a driver of that vehicle solely on the basis of vehicle ownership.

Agency/Torts Question

The store argues that it is not liable for the passenger's injuries because (a) the driver is an independent contractor; (b) even if the driver is not an independent contractor, the driver was not making a delivery for the store when the accident occurred; and (c) the driver himself could not be found liable for the passenger's injuries.

1. Evaluate each of the store's three arguments against liability.
2. Assuming that the store is liable to the passenger for the passenger's injuries, what rights, if any, does the store have against the driver? Explain.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW QUESTION

State A, suffering from declining tax revenues, sought ways to save money by reducing expenses and performing services more efficiently. Accordingly, various legislative committees undertook examinations of the services performed by the state. One service provided by State A is firefighting. The legislative committee with jurisdiction over firefighting held extensive hearings and determined that older firefighters, because of seniority, earn substantially more than younger firefighters but are unlikely to perform as well as their younger colleagues. In particular, exercise physiologists testified at the committee's hearings that, in general, a person's physical conditioning and ability to work safely and effectively as a firefighter decline with age (with the most rapid declines occurring after age 50) and that, as a result, firefighting would be safer and more efficient if the age of the workforce was lowered.

State A subsequently enacted the Fire Safety in Employment Act (the Act). The Act provides that no one may be employed by the state as a firefighter after reaching the age of 50.

A firefighter, age 49, is employed by State A. He is in excellent physical condition and wants to remain a firefighter. His work history has been exemplary for the last two decades. Nonetheless, he has been told that, as a result of the Act, his employment as a firefighter will be terminated when he turns 50 next month.

The firefighter is considering (a) challenging the Act on the basis that it violates his rights under the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause, and (b) lobbying for the enactment of a federal statute barring states from setting mandatory age limitations for firefighters.

1. Does the Act violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment? Explain.
2. Would Congress have authority under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment to enact a statute barring states from establishing a maximum age for firefighters? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

Acme Violins LLC (Acme) is in the business of buying, restoring, and selling rare violins. Acme frequently sells violins for prices well in excess of $100,000. In addition to restoring violins for resale, Acme also repairs and restores violins for their owners. In most repair transactions, Acme requires payment in cash when the violin is picked up by the customer. It does, however, allow some of its repeat customers to obtain repairs on credit, with full payment due 30 days after completion of the repair. In those cases, the payment obligation is not secured by any collateral and the payment terms are handwritten on the receipt.

Acme maintains a stock of rare and valuable wood that it uses in violin restoration. Acme also owns a variety of tools used in restoration work, including a machine called a “Gambretti plane,” which is used to shape the body of a violin precisely.

Six months ago, Acme borrowed $1 million from Bank. The loan agreement, which was signed by Acme, grants Bank a security interest in all of Acme’s “inventory and accounts, as those terms are defined in the Uniform Commercial Code.” On the same day, Bank filed a properly completed financing statement in the appropriate state filing office. The financing statement indicated the collateral as “inventory” and “accounts.”

Last week, Acme sold the most valuable violin in its inventory, the famed “Red Rosa,” to a violinist for $200,000 (the appraised value of the instrument), which the violinist paid in cash. The sale was made by Acme in accordance with its usual practices. The violinist, who has done business with Acme for many years, was aware that Acme regularly borrows money from Bank and that Bank had a security interest in Acme’s entire inventory. The violinist did not, however, know anything about the terms of Acme’s agreement with Bank.

Acme is 15 days late in making the payment currently due on its loan from Bank. Bank’s loan officer, who is worried about Bank’s possible inability to collect the debt owed by Acme, has asked whether the following items of property are collateral that can be reached by Bank as possible sources of payment:

- (1) Acme’s rights to payment from customers for repair services obtained on credit
- (2) Used violins for sale in Acme’s store
- (3) Violins in Acme’s possession that Acme is repairing for their owners
- (4) Wood in Acme’s repair room that Acme uses in repairing violins
- (5) The Gambretti plane, used by Acme in violin restoration
- (6) The Red Rosa violin that was sold to the violinist

Yesterday, a creditor of Acme obtained a judicial lien on all of Acme’s personal property.

1. In which, if any, of the items listed above does Bank have an enforceable security interest? Explain.
2. For the items in which Bank has an enforceable security interest, is Bank’s claim superior to that of the judicial lien creditor? Explain.

REAL PROPERTY QUESTION

Seventeen years ago, a property owner granted a sewer-line easement to a private sewer company. The easement allowed the company to build, maintain, and use an underground sewer line in a designated sector of the owner's three-acre tract. The easement was properly recorded with the local registrar of deeds.

Fifteen years ago, a man having no title or other interest in the owner's three-acre tract wrongfully entered the tract, built a cabin, and planted a vegetable garden. The garden was directly over the sewer line constructed pursuant to the easement the owner had granted to the sewer company. The cabin and garden occupied half an acre of the three-acre tract. The man moved into the cabin immediately after its completion and remained in continuous and exclusive possession of the cabin and garden until his death. However, he did not use the remaining two and one-half acres of the three-acre tract in any way.

Eight years ago, the man died. Under the man's duly probated will, he bequeathed to his sister "all real property in which I have or may have an interest at the time of my death." The man's sister took possession of the cabin and garden immediately after the man's death and remained in exclusive and continuous possession of them for one year, but she, too, did not use the remaining two and one-half acres of the tract.

Seven years ago, the man's sister executed and delivered to a buyer a general warranty deed stating that it conveyed the entire three-acre tract to the buyer. The deed contained all six title covenants. Since this transaction, the buyer has continuously occupied the cabin and garden but has not used the remaining two and one-half acres.

A state statute provides that "any action to recover the possession of real property must be brought within 10 years after the cause of action accrues."

Last month, the property owner sued the buyer to recover possession of the three-acre tract.

1. Did the buyer acquire title to the three-acre tract or any portion of it? Explain.
2. Assuming that the buyer did not acquire title to the entire three-acre tract, can the buyer recover damages from the sister who sold him the three-acre tract? Explain.
3. Assuming that the buyer acquired title to the entire three-acre tract or the portion above the sewer-line easement, can the buyer compel the sewer company to remove the sewer line under the garden? Explain.

CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

MedForms Inc. processes claims for medical insurers. Last year, MedForms contracted with a data entry company (“the company”) to enter information from claims into MedForms’s database. MedForms hired a woman to manage the contract with the company.

A few months after entering into the contract with the company, MedForms began receiving complaints from insurers regarding data-entry errors. On behalf of MedForms, the woman conducted a limited audit of the company’s work and discovered that its employees had been making errors in transferring data from insurance claims forms to the MedForms database.

The woman immediately reported her findings to her MedForms supervisor and told him that fixing the problems caused by the company’s errors would require a review of millions of forms and would cost millions of dollars. In response to her report, the supervisor said, “I knew we never should have hired a woman to oversee this contract,” and he fired her on the spot.

The woman properly initiated suit against MedForms in the United States District Court for the District of State A. Her complaint alleged that she had been subjected to repeated sexual harassment by her supervisor throughout her employment at MedForms and that he had fired her because of his bias against women. Her complaint sought $100,000 in damages from MedForms for sexual harassment and sex discrimination in violation of federal civil rights law.

After receiving the summons and complaint in the action, MedForms filed a third-party complaint against the company, seeking to join it as a third-party defendant in the action. MedForms alleged that the company’s data-entry errors constituted a breach of contract. MedForms sought $500,000 in damages from the company. MedForms served the company with process by hiring a process server who personally delivered a copy of the summons and complaint to the company’s chief executive officer at its headquarters.

MedForms is incorporated in State A, where it also has its headquarters and document processing facilities. The woman is a citizen of State A. The company’s only document processing facility is located in State A, but its headquarters are located in State B, where it is incorporated and where its chief executive officer was served with process.

State A and State B each authorize service of process on corporations only by personal delivery of a summons and complaint to the corporation’s secretary.

The company has moved to dismiss MedForms’s third-party complaint for (a) insufficient service of process, (b) lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, and (c) improper joinder.

How should the District Court rule on each of the grounds asserted in the company’s motion to dismiss? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

A husband and wife were married in 2005.

In 2009, the husband transferred $600,000 of his money to a revocable trust. Under the terms of the properly executed trust instrument, upon the husband's death all trust assets would pass to his alma mater, University.

In 2012, the husband properly executed a will, prepared by his attorney based on the husband's oral instructions. Under the will, the husband bequeathed $5,000 to his best friend and the balance of his estate "to my wife, regardless of whether we have children." The husband failed to mention the revocable trust to his attorney during the preparation of this will, and the attorney did not ask the husband whether he had made any significant transfers in prior years.

In 2013, the husband and wife had a daughter.

In 2014, the husband was killed in an automobile accident. After his death, the wife found the husband's will and the revocable trust instrument on his desk. On the first page of the will, beginning in the left-hand margin and extending over the words setting forth the bequests to the husband's best friend and his wife, were the following words: "This will makes no sense, as most of my assets are in the trust for University and neither my wife nor my daughter seems adequately provided for. Estate plan should be changed. Call lawyer to fix." The statement was indisputably in the husband's handwriting. The wife also found a voice message on the phone from the husband's lawyer, which said, "Calling back. I understand you have concerns about your will."

The husband is survived by his wife, their daughter, and the husband's best friend. The assets in the revocable trust are now worth $900,000. The husband's probate estate is worth $300,000. He owed no debts at his death.

All the foregoing events occurred in State A, which is not a community property state. State A has enacted all of the customary probate statutes, but of particular relevance to the wife are the following:

- (i) If a decedent dies intestate survived by a spouse and issue, the decedent's surviving spouse takes one-half of the estate and the decedent's surviving issue take the other half.
 - (ii) A revocable trust created by a decedent during the decedent's marriage is deemed illusory and the decedent's surviving spouse is entitled to receive one-half of the trust's assets.
1. How should the assets of the husband's probate estate be distributed? Explain.
 2. How should the assets of the revocable trust be distributed? Explain.

AGENCY/TORTS ANALYSIS

(Agency and Partnership III.; IV.A./Torts II.B.2., F.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is the driver an independent contractor or an employee of the store?
- (2) Did the driver's violation of the store's delivery rules place his act outside the scope of his employment?
- (3) May the driver be found liable to the passenger in the car for personal injuries resulting from his violation of a double-parking ordinance?
- (4) If the store pays damages to the passenger, is it entitled to indemnification from the driver?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The driver is likely to be characterized as an employee, not as an independent contractor, because his conduct was subject to the store's control. Under the respondeat superior principle, an employer is liable for the tortious acts of its employee if those acts were performed within the scope of the employee's employment. Here, the driver's violation of the store's delivery rules likely did not place his act outside the scope of his employment because the driver did not deviate substantially from his route and the risks caused by his deviation were not different from the risks inherent in his authorized activities. In virtually all jurisdictions, the driver could be found liable for the passenger's injuries. The driver was negligent in violating a traffic ordinance and the type of harm that occurred, a traffic accident, was among those that the ordinance was aimed to avert. Finally, if the store is found liable for the driver's negligence and pays damages to the passenger, under common law principles the store is entitled to indemnification from the driver because the store was not itself at fault in causing the accident.

Point One (30%)

Although the store characterized the driver as an independent contractor, the store had the right to control his conduct and thus the driver was an employee of the store.

The store can be found liable under these facts if the driver is treated as its employee acting within the scope of his employment. The store is not liable for torts committed by the driver if the store employed him as an independent contractor to deliver furniture. RESTATEMENT (THIRD) AGENCY §§ 2.04 & 7.03; RESTATEMENT (SECOND) AGENCY § 250.

The test of whether a person is an employee is whether the person's "physical conduct in the performance of the services is subject to the [employer's] control or right to control." RESTATEMENT (SECOND) AGENCY § 220(1); see also RESTATEMENT (THIRD) AGENCY § 7.07(3)(a) ("[A]n employee is an agent whose principal controls or has the right to control the manner and means of the agent's performance of work.”). This is generally a question of fact. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) AGENCY § 220 cmt. c. A number of factors are relevant, including the level of skill required to perform the work, who supplies the instrumentalities used, the duration of the relationship, and whether the work is part of the principal's regular business. No single factor is determinative. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) AGENCY § 220; RESTATEMENT (THIRD) AGENCY § 7.07 cmt. f.

Here, the Restatement factors strongly suggest that the store had a right to control the driver's work. First, the job of furniture delivery driver does not require a tremendous amount of skill as compared to occupations such as plumber or electrician that are typically performed by independent contractors. Second, while the “Independent-Contractor Agreement” between the parties required the driver to supply the van used in the deliveries, the store was primarily responsible for the van: the store leased the van to the driver at a below-market rate; the store was responsible for the expenses of operating the van; and the lease terminated upon the termination of the driver's relationship with the store. Third, the driver's relationship with the store was ongoing, indefinite, and substantial; it was not specific to a single delivery or series of deliveries. Fourth, the driver was paid by the hour, not by the job, and worked a regular 40-hour week. Fifth, furniture delivery was a regular part of the store's business. Finally, although the “Independent-Contractor Agreement” between the store and the driver provided that the driver was an independent contractor and had discretion over the means and manner of performing the terms of the contract, “[i]t is not determinative that the parties believe or disbelieve that the relation of [employer] and [employee] exists, except insofar as such belief indicates an assumption of control by the one and submission to control by the other.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) AGENCY § 220 cmt. m. In sum, the facts strongly suggest that the driver was the store's employee.

[NOTE: The Restatement (Second) of Agency uses the terminology “master” and “servant”; the Restatement (Third) of Agency uses the terminology “employer” and “employee.” This shift in terminology does not affect the analysis. The test is still control of, or the right to control, the performance of the agent's work.]

Point Two (30%)

The driver was acting within the scope of his employment because his conduct was substantially similar to authorized acts, and the driver did not deviate substantially from his route or likely consume a substantial amount of time by deviating.

If the driver is characterized as an employee instead of an independent contractor, the store will be liable for the driver's tortious conduct only if it occurred within the scope of his employment. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) AGENCY § 219(1); RESTATEMENT (THIRD) AGENCY § 7.07(1). Whether an employee was acting within the scope of his employment is generally a question of fact. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) AGENCY § 228 cmt. d. An employee's conduct is within the scope of his employment if (1) it is of the kind that the employee is employed to perform; (2) it occurs substantially within the authorized time and space limits; and (3) it is motivated, at least in part, by a purpose to serve the employer. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) AGENCY § 228(1)(a)–(c); see also RESTATEMENT (THIRD) AGENCY § 7.07(2) (“An employee acts within the scope of employment when performing work assigned by the employer or engaging in a course of conduct subject to the employer’s control.”). The fact that the act was not authorized is not determinative. Id.

Here, it is highly likely that the driver will be found to have been acting within the scope of his employment. First, the conduct that caused the accident, parking, was exactly the kind of conduct that the driver was employed to perform, and the risks of double-parking were characteristic of those his employment entailed. See Ira S. Bushey & Sons v. United States, 398 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1968). Second, the time and space deviations from his authorized activities were not substantial: the driver drove a mere six blocks out of the way; he did so during regular business hours; and as an experienced furniture delivery person, the driver would probably have used no more than half an hour for the deviation. Finally, the driver may have been motivated at least in part by a desire to serve the store. The driver may have believed that making the delivery of the television for a longtime customer would generate goodwill for the store. In sum, the delivery of the television appears to have been a minor detour that did not take the driver out of the scope of employment. Cf. RESTATEMENT (THIRD) AGENCY § 7.07(2) (“An employee’s act is not within the scope of employment when it occurs within an independent course of conduct not intended by the employee to serve any purpose of the employer.”) (emphasis added).

[NOTE: While the formulation of the scope of employment doctrine in the Restatement (Third) of Agency “is phrased in more general terms” than in the Restatement (Second), the drafters state that the definition “reflects the definition of scope of employment applied in most cases and in most jurisdictions.” RESTATEMENT (THIRD) AGENCY § 7.07 cmt. b. In sum, the results under both formulations should be similar.]

Point Three (25%)

The driver may be found negligent per se in causing the passenger’s injuries because a purpose of the double-parking prohibition was almost certainly to prevent traffic accidents. The fact that the driver’s violation of the statute conformed to custom does not alter this conclusion.

“An actor is negligent if, without excuse, the actor violates a statute that is designed to protect against the type of accident the actor’s conduct causes, and if the accident victim is within the class of persons the statute is designed to protect.” RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TORTS: LIABILITY FOR PHYSICAL AND EMOTIONAL HARM § 14 (2010). Health and safety statutes, like traffic ordinances, are typically deemed to protect the public at large. See RICHARD A. EPSTEIN, TORTS 150 (1999).

In order to make use of a statutory standard to establish negligence, the plaintiff must show that the type of injury is one the statute is aimed against. However, “courts are astute at finding multiple and subsidiary statutory purposes.” EPSTEIN, supra, at 151. Here, the double-parking ordinance was almost certainly aimed at preventing both traffic congestion and damage resulting from traffic accidents; vehicles parked in the path of moving traffic are a hazard that forces drivers into lanes of oncoming traffic. The damage resulting from traffic accidents includes personal injuries, so the passenger's injuries involve the right type of harm.

The fact that the driver's actions conformed to custom does not mean that he cannot be found negligent; "there are precautions so imperative that even their universal disregard will not excuse their omission." The T.J. Hooper, 60 F.2d 737, 740 (2d Cir. 1932). Courts have sometimes read into statutes customary exceptions to a custom embodied by the statute. See Tedla v. Ellman, 19 N.E.2d 987, 989 (N.Y. 1939) (interpreting statute that required pedestrians to walk on the left—the common-law custom—to include the common-law exception which required pedestrians to walk with the traffic when traffic coming from behind was much lighter than oncoming traffic). They have done so on the theory that a legislature would not have intended to decree that individuals should follow a general rule of conduct "even under circumstances where observance would subject them to unusual risk." Id. Here, there is no evidence that double-parking was a safer alternative than parking legally or that the driver was following any custom dictated by safety concerns. Therefore, a jury could properly conclude that the driver was negligent per se in violating the double-parking ordinance and that the driver's negligence was the legal cause of the passenger's injuries.

Point Four (15%)

If the driver's negligence subjects the store to liability and the store pays damages to the passenger, under the common law the store is entitled to indemnification from the driver because there is no evidence that the store itself engaged in tortious conduct related to the passenger's injuries.

Indemnification (full reimbursement for damages paid to the plaintiff) is available to a tort defendant who has paid the plaintiff's damage award when, as between the paying and nonpaying defendants, the paying defendant was not at fault in causing the plaintiff's injuries and the nonpaying defendant was at fault. By contrast, a joint tortfeasor who was at fault in causing the plaintiff's injuries is entitled only to contribution, i.e., partial reimbursement for damages paid to the plaintiff. See EPSTEIN, supra, at 235–36. A classic case in which indemnification is appropriate is that of an employer, like the store, who is liable to the plaintiff based solely on the principle of respondeat superior. See id. at 236–39.

Consequently, if the store is required to pay damages to the passenger, the driver will be liable to the store for the amount paid.

[NOTE: In some states, this common law principle has been modified by statutes or court decisions that prevent employers from seeking indemnification from employees in certain circumstances.]

[NOTE: An examinee who concludes that the store's delivery drivers routinely double-parked, and that the store had actual or implied notice of that practice, should conclude that the store could be found negligent and that contribution but not indemnification would be available to the store.]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ANALYSIS

(Constitutional Law II.A.3.; IV.C.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does the Act violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment?
- (2) Would Congress have authority under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment to enact a statute barring states from establishing a maximum age for firefighters?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The lowest level of equal protection scrutiny—so-called “rational basis” scrutiny—applies when a state government engages in age-based discrimination. The question is whether the distinctions drawn by the Act on the basis of age are rationally related to a legitimate governmental purpose. The court is likely to answer that question in the affirmative because safe and efficient firefighting is a legitimate governmental purpose and, in light of the legislative committee’s findings, the Act is rationally related to that purpose.

With respect to Congress’s power to enact a statute barring states from establishing a maximum age for firefighters, Congress has the power to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment pursuant to its powers under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment. However, Congress can exercise its authority only if it does so in a way that is “congruent and proportional” to any constitutional violation that it may be addressing. A federal statute prohibiting states from having a mandatory retirement age for firefighters would not meet that standard. The statute would be unconstitutional because it would ban conduct by a state that is not itself unconstitutional and that is not related to any constitutional violations by the state.

Point One (50%)

A court would assess the constitutionality of the Act under the “rational basis” test. Here, the state has a “legitimate interest” in promoting safe and efficient firefighting, and lowering the retirement age is “rationally related” to achieving this interest. Thus, a court is likely to conclude that State A has not violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The applicable constitutional provision is the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which states: “Nor shall any State . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.” Amend. XIV, Sec. 1. The allegedly unconstitutional discrimination is age-based discrimination because employees like the firefighter cannot continue as firefighters once they reach 50 years of age.

The Supreme Court has developed three levels of scrutiny for equal protection claims: strict, intermediate, and the lowest, “rational basis.” The Court has consistently applied rational basis scrutiny to age-based classifications. See Massachusetts Bd. of Retirement v. Murgia, 427 U.S.

307 (1976) (upholding 50-year-old retirement age for state police); Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62 (2000) (applying rational basis review to age-based classification).

Under the rational basis test, the issues are whether State A has a “legitimate interest” that is served by the discriminatory classification and whether the means used to achieve this legitimate state interest are “reasonably related” or “rationally related” to that state interest. The Court generally applies this test with substantial deference to legislative judgment. See, e.g., Railway Express Agency, Inc. v. New York, 336 U.S. 106 (1949).

Here, the firefighter will likely argue that State A is violating his right to the “equal protection of the laws” by depriving him, and other firefighters, of employment solely because they have reached the age of 50. More specifically, he will argue that he and the other firefighters 50 and older are being forced to retire without regard to whether they are capable firefighters, an action not taken against those under the age of 50.

State A will likely argue that lowering the retirement age for firefighters will improve workforce quality, enhance public safety, and reduce expenses. Because these are “legitimate” state interests, this argument is likely to succeed.

Given the legitimacy of State A’s objectives, the question then becomes whether a mandatory retirement at age 50 is reasonably related to attaining those objectives. Although the firefighter may be a qualified firefighter notwithstanding his age, that is not the relevant question. The question is whether State A has reason to believe that one’s physical fitness and ability to be a firefighter, in general, decline with age. The question specifies that the legislature heard evidence from relevant professionals in support of that position. Hence, the conclusion that a mandatory retirement age would, in general, improve the fitness of the workforce is reasonable. Under the rational basis test, it is not necessary for the fit between ends and means to be perfect. The fit merely has to be “reasonable” or “rational.” See generally JOHN E. NOWAK & RONALD D. ROTUNDA, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 756–58 (8th ed. 2010) (discussing application of rational basis test to mandatory retirement rules).

The fact that State A may have also enacted the statute to save money does not alter this analysis. One legitimate purpose to which the lines drawn by the statute are rationally related is sufficient to uphold a statute under the lenient rational basis test. Because State A has a legitimate governmental purpose for enacting this statute, and because lowering the retirement age is rationally related to the achievement of this purpose, a court is likely to conclude that the Act does not violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Point Two (50%)

Because age-based discrimination, in the form of a mandatory retirement age, is not a plausible constitutional injury, Congress does not have the authority under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment to enact legislation to remedy that injury.

Congress's powers are limited to those expressed or implied in the Constitution. To enact a law on a particular topic, Congress must rely on some identified grant of legislative authority in the Constitution. See McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819). Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment is one such grant of authority. See City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997).

While a mandatory retirement age for firefighters does not violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (see Point One), “[l]egislation which deters or remedies constitutional violations can fall within the sweep of Congress’[s] enforcement power even if in the process it prohibits conduct which is not itself unconstitutional” Id. at 518. Congress’s power, however, is remedial. It has been given the power “to enforce,” not the power to determine what constitutes a constitutional violation. Id. at 519. In drawing “the line between measures that remedy or prevent unconstitutional actions and measures that make a substantive change in the governing law,” the Court, in City of Boerne v. Flores, stated that the constitutional question is whether there is a “congruence and proportionality between the [constitutional] injury to be prevented or remedied and the means adopted to that end.” Id. at 519–20. Lacking such a connection, legislation may become substantive in operation and effect. The proportionality requirement of Flores allows Congress to outlaw conduct that courts likely would hold unconstitutional under existing judicial precedent. Congress may also outlaw a broader range of conduct to prevent constitutional violations. But Congress cannot rely on its Fourteenth Amendment enforcement power to prohibit a kind of behavior that is unlikely to involve a constitutional violation at all.

Because age is not a suspect classification under the Equal Protection Clause, states may discriminate on the basis of age without offending the Fourteenth Amendment if the age classification in question is rationally related to a legitimate state interest. The proposed federal statute would prohibit mandatory retirement requirements that courts likely would find constitutional. See Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62 (2000) (holding that a federal statute generally prohibiting age discrimination by employers (including states) exceeded the power of Congress to legislate pursuant to Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment). Indeed, Congress’s primary goal here would be to outlaw a kind of discrimination that does not violate the Fourteenth Amendment. Flores clearly held that Congress cannot, under its Fourteenth Amendment power, legislate to prohibit constitutional behavior where there is no constitutional injury to be prevented or remedied. Therefore, a court would likely hold that Congress would not have the power under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment to enact a statute barring age requirements for firefighters.

[NOTE: This question does not raise any questions about sovereign immunity under the Eleventh Amendment inasmuch as Congress can abrogate that immunity when it acts pursuant to Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment. In addition, this question does not ask whether Congress could pass such a statute under its Commerce Power. See, e.g., the Age Discrimination in Employment Act.]

DISCUSSION

Summary

Bank has an enforceable and attached security interest in the property described in the loan and security agreement—Acme's "inventory and accounts."

The amounts owed to Acme by customers for violins repaired on credit are "accounts" covered by Bank's security interest. The used violins for sale in Acme's store are "inventory" covered by Bank's security interest. The violins that Acme is repairing for others are not subject to the security interest because they are not held by Acme for sale or lease and thus are not "inventory." The wood used in repairing violins is "inventory" subject to Bank's security interest. The Gambretti plane is equipment, rather than inventory or accounts, and not covered by Bank's security interest.

Although the Red Rosa violin was inventory subject to Bank's security interest, Bank's interest was cut off by the sale of Red Rosa to a buyer in ordinary course of business.

Because Bank's enforceable and attached security interest was perfected, it is superior to the rights of a judicial lien creditor that arose subsequent to perfection.

Point One (15%)

Bank has an enforceable and attached security interest in the property described in the loan and security agreement.

A security agreement is enforceable and attached if the three criteria described in UCC § 9-203(b) are satisfied. The first criterion is that “value has been given.” UCC § 9-203(b)(1). This is satisfied by the loan from Bank to Acme. The second criterion is that the debtor “has rights in the collateral or the power to transfer rights in the collateral to a secured party.” UCC § 9-203(b)(2). This is satisfied with respect to Acme’s inventory and accounts. The third criterion is satisfied because Acme has authenticated (signed, in this case) a security agreement that provides a description of the collateral. UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(A). Thus, since all three criteria have been satisfied, Bank’s security interest in the property described in the loan and security agreement is enforceable and attached.

Point Two(a) (10%)

Acme’s rights to payment from customers who obtained repair services on credit are “accounts” subject to Bank’s security interest.

Bank’s security interest covers “accounts,” as the term is defined in the Uniform Commercial Code. Acme’s rights to payment for repair services provided on credit are accounts because they are “right[s] to payment . . . for services rendered or to be rendered.” UCC § 9-102(a)(2)(ii). Thus, these rights to payment are subject to Bank’s security interest.

Point Two(b) (5%)

The used violins that are for sale in Acme’s store are “inventory” subject to Bank’s security interest.

Bank’s security interest covers “inventory.” The used violins that are for sale in Acme’s store are “inventory” under UCC § 9-102(a)(48) because they are “. . . goods . . . which . . . are held by a person for sale . . .” Thus, those violins are subject to Bank’s security interest.

Point Two(c) (10%)

The violins in Acme’s possession that it is repairing for others are not covered by Bank’s security interest because they are not “inventory” and are not owned by Acme.

Bank’s security interest does not cover the violins that Acme is repairing for their owners. This conclusion can be reached in either of two ways. First, those violins are not “inventory” because they are not held by Acme for sale or lease. UCC § 9-102(a)(48)(B). Second, because the violins are not owned by Acme, but rather are owned by the individuals who brought them to Acme to be repaired, the security interest would not attach because Acme has neither rights in those violins nor the power to transfer rights in them to a secured party. UCC § 9-203(b)(2).

[NOTE: An examinee might argue that Acme has some rights in the violins it holds for repair because it has lawful possession of them, the right to repair them, the right to collect payment for repairs, and (in some jurisdictions) the right to assert an artisan’s lien if a repair bill is unpaid. An examinee who makes an argument of this sort should also note that these limited rights will not help Bank for two reasons. First, as already noted, the violins don't fall within the scope of the security interest in any event, because they are not "inventory" or "accounts." Second, even if the violins held for repair were within the scope of the security agreement, Bank's rights against the owners of the violins would be no greater than Acme's and it could, at best, arrange for repairs to be performed and collect amounts due. Moreover, while it is possible that, because Acme deals in violins and the owners of the violins brought to Acme for repair entrusted them to Acme, buyers in ordinary course of business of those violins would get good title to them under UCC § 2-403(2), that provision does not give rights to secured parties.]

Point Two(d) (5%)

The wood used by Acme in repairing violins is "inventory" and subject to Bank's security interest.

Bank's security interest in inventory covers the wood that Acme uses to repair violins. "Inventory" includes "raw materials" that are consumed in the business of the debtor. See UCC § 9-102(a)(48)(D) and cmt. 4(a). Thus, Bank has a security interest in the wood as inventory.

Point Two(e) (5%)

The Gambretti plane is not included in Bank's collateral.

The Gambretti plane that Acme uses to shape the violins it repairs is not "inventory" because it is not held for sale or lease by Acme and does not otherwise fit into the other categories of "inventory" under UCC § 9-102(a)(48). Rather, the Gambretti plane is "equipment" (see UCC § 9-102(a)(33)) and not covered by Bank's security interest.

Point Three (25%)

The Red Rosa violin was subject to Bank's security interest prior to its sale, but the violinist was probably a buyer in ordinary course of business and therefore took the violin free of Bank's security interest under UCC § 9-320(a).

Bank's security interest in inventory covered the violin "Red Rosa" when it was held by Acme for sale. UCC § 9-102(a)(48). Furthermore, under UCC § 9-315(a)(1), except as otherwise provided in Article 9 "a security interest . . . continues in collateral notwithstanding sale . . . unless the secured party authorized the disposition free of the security interest"

Here, there are no facts to indicate that Bank authorized the disposition of Red Rosa free of its security interest. Nonetheless, the violinist's interest in Red Rosa is likely to prevail over Bank's security interest because the violinist probably qualifies as a "buyer in ordinary course of business."

Under UCC § 9-320(a), ". . . a buyer in ordinary course of business . . . takes free of a security interest created by the buyer's seller, even if the security interest is perfected and the buyer knows of its existence." Under UCC § 1-201(b)(9), a buyer in ordinary course of business is "a person that buys goods in good faith, without knowledge that the sale violates the rights of another person in the goods, and in the ordinary course from a person . . . in the business of selling goods of that kind.”

Acme is in the business of selling rare violins like Red Rosa, and the violinist apparently bought Red Rosa in the ordinary course of Acme’s business. There are no facts to indicate that the purchase was in bad faith or irregular in any way. Although the violinist was aware of Bank’s security interest in Acme’s inventory, there was no indication that the sale to the violinist violated any of Bank’s rights. Thus, while the violinist was aware of the existence of the security interest, that knowledge does not disqualify the violinist as a buyer in ordinary course who takes free of a security interest. See UCC § 9-320(a). As a buyer in ordinary course of business, the violinist would take Red Rosa free of Bank’s security interest.

Point Four (25%)

Bank’s security interest in its collateral was perfected; therefore, the security interest is superior to the rights of a judicial lien creditor that arose subsequently.

A security interest is subordinate to the rights of a person who becomes a lien creditor before the security interest is perfected. UCC § 9-317(a)(2). Thus, if Bank’s security interest was not perfected at the time that creditor obtained its judicial lien, the security interest would be subordinate to that lien. Bank’s security interest was perfected, however. A security interest is perfected when it has attached and the other elements of perfection have been satisfied. UCC § 9-308(a). As described in Point One, Bank’s security interest in its collateral was attached. The filing of the financing statement was sufficient to perfect this attached security interest. UCC § 9-310(a). Thus, both elements of perfection were satisfied and Bank’s security interest was perfected before the lien creditor obtained its lien. Therefore, the security interest is superior to the rights of the lien creditor. See also UCC § 9-201(a).

REAL PROPERTY ANALYSIS

(Real Property II.B.; V.A., B.1.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Were the acts of possession by the man, his sister, and the buyer sufficient to acquire a title by adverse possession?
- (1)(b) Can the periods of possession during which the man, his sister, and the buyer occupied the cabin and garden be aggregated for the purpose of satisfying the statutory possession requirement?
- (1)(c) If the acts of possession were sufficient to acquire a title by adverse possession, did the adverse possession claim extend to the entire three-acre tract or only to the portion of land on which the cabin and garden were located?
- (2) Can the buyer recover damages from the man's sister, who gave a warranty deed for the three-acre tract?
- (3) Did the buyer take subject to an underground sewer-line easement created before the adverse possession began?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The possessory acts of the man, his sister, and the buyer were sufficient to acquire title by adverse possession as to the half acre of the three-acre tract on which the cabin and garden are located because they were (1) actual, (2) open and notorious, (3) exclusive, (4) continuous, and (5) hostile and under claim of right. Because the man, his sister, and the buyer were in privity with one another, their aggregate time of possession determines whether the 10-year statute of limitations has run. Here, the aggregate time of possession exceeds 10 years. Thus, the buyer acquired title to this one-half acre by adverse possession. However, because there were no possessory acts with respect to the remaining two and one-half acres, the buyer did not acquire title by adverse possession to the entire three-acre tract.

Because the buyer did not acquire title to the entire three-acre tract, the buyer can successfully sue the sister for damages because the sister purported to convey the entire three-acre tract by warranty deed and, under the warranty deed, she covenanted that she had good title to the entire three-acre tract.

The adverse possessors took subject to the sewer-line easement, as their acts of possession probably did not interfere with that easement or give the sewer company a cause of action against them. Thus, the buyer cannot compel the company to remove the sewer line.

Point One(a) (35%)

The acts of possession of the man, his sister, and the buyer were sufficient to acquire title by adverse possession to the one-half acre actually possessed by them.

To acquire title by adverse possession, the possession must be (1) actual, (2) open and notorious, exclusive, (4) continuous, and (5) hostile and under claim of right. HERBERT HOVENKAMP AND SHELDON F. KURTZ, THE LAW OF PROPERTY § 4.3 (5th ed. 2001). Here, all of these requirements were satisfied as to the one-half acre on which the cabin was built and the garden planted. The facts state that the possession of the man, his sister, and the buyer was exclusive and continuous, satisfying these two requirements of the test.

To be actual, acts of possession must be consistent with how a reasonable owner of land would have used it if in possession. Id. at 64–66. Here, the acts of possession included building and occupying a cabin as well as planting, harvesting, and maintaining a garden. These acts are consistent with how a reasonable owner would have used the one-half acre.

To be open and notorious, the acts of possession must be such that they would have put an owner on notice of the adverse possession had the owner inspected the land. Here, the cabin and garden occupied a half acre and were visible. When the owner acquired the land, it was vacant. Had the owner inspected, he would have determined that someone else was in possession.

Most courts and scholars agree that hostility and claim of right are present when a possessor is on the land without the owner's permission. See generally WILLIAM B. STOEBUCK & DALE A. WHITMAN, THE LAW OF PROPERTY 857–859 (3d ed. 2000). Some courts do hold that to acquire title by adverse possession, the possessor must have a good-faith belief that she has a good title to the land; others hold that the possessor must believe that she does not have a good title to the land. See, e.g., Carpenter v. Ruperto, 315 N.W.2d 782 (Iowa 1982) (good-faith belief required); Mid-Valley Resources Inc. v. Engelson, 13 P.3d 118 (Ct. App. Or. 2000) (subjective intent to show adverse possessor intended to take title away from the record owner); see generally JOSEPH WILLIAM SINGER, PROPERTY 151–156 (4th ed. 2014). But most courts and scholars reject these contradictory “subjective hostility” tests. See, e.g., Chaplin v. Sanders, 676 P.2d 431, 435–436 (Wash. 1984) (claimant's subjective intent is irrelevant); Nickell v. Southview Homeowners Ass'n, 271 P.3d 973, 978 (Ct. App. Wash. 2012); STOEBUCK & WHITMAN, supra. Thus, in the vast majority of jurisdictions (also including Missouri, Alabama, Montana, and Minnesota), the fact that the man, his sister, and the buyer were on the tract of land without the permission of the owner would suffice to satisfy the hostility and claim of right requirement.

Thus, the man, his sister, and the buyer satisfied the requirements for acquiring title by adverse possession as to the one-half-acre portion of the three-acre tract that they actually possessed.

Point One(b) (20%)

Although neither the man, nor his sister, nor the buyer individually possessed the property for the statutory 10-year period, their periods of possession can be aggregated because they were all in privity with one another. Thus, the 10-year statute has run, and the buyer has acquired title to the one-half acre.

The period during which possession must endure to create title by adverse possession is determined by statute. Here, the local statute provides that “any action to recover the possession of real property must be brought within 10 years after the cause of action accrues.”

A cause of action to recover possession of real property “accrues” when a wrongful act of possession occurs. See RDG Partnership v. Long, 350 S.W.3d 262, 270 (Tex. App. 2011). Here, the initial cause of action thus accrued when the man wrongfully entered a portion of the three-acre tract 15 years ago.

Here, the man possessed the property for seven years, the man’s sister possessed it for one year, and the buyer possessed it for seven years. Although none of these individual periods of possession equals the 10-year statutory period, when multiple adverse possessors are in “privity” with one another, the period of their respective possessions can be aggregated for the purpose of determining whether the statutory period (here, 10 years) has run against the holder of the cause of action. In this context, privity denotes a relationship between possessors arising because of a voluntary transfer between them, descent under the laws of intestacy, or testamentary succession as the result of a bequest. Fredericksen v. Henke, 209 N.W. 257, 259 (Minn. 1926). Here, the man and his sister were in privity as a result of testamentary succession, namely the bequest in the man’s will of all real property “in which I have or may have an interest” to his sister. The sister and the buyer were also in privity because of the voluntary transfer between them. See generally HOVENKAMP & KURTZ, supra, at 74–75.

Thus, because the 10-year statutory period has elapsed, the buyer has acquired title by adverse possession to the one-half-acre portion of the three-acre tract that he, the sister, and the man actually possessed.

Point One(c) (15%)

The buyer did not acquire title to the unpossessed two and one-half acres because he did not possess or use that portion of the tract.

The buyer acquired title by adverse possession only to the portion of the tract for which he met all requirements of the five-prong test. (See Point One(a).) Because the man, his sister, and the buyer never possessed (or even used) any of the two and one-half acres beyond the garden, the buyer cannot claim title by adverse possession to those acres.

The doctrine of constructive adverse possession does not alter this result. Under this doctrine, if a possessor enters under color of title (i.e., an instrument creating the possibility of a title in the grantee who enters under the instrument) and the possessor takes possession of only a portion of the land described in the instrument, the possessor’s possession is deemed to constructively extend to the portion of the described land. Here, neither the man nor his sister entered under color of title. Although the buyer did enter with a deed and, arguably, color of title, his constructive possession endured only seven years, short of the statutory period in which the legal title holder may regain possession. See HOVENKAMP & KURTZ, supra, at 78–80.

Point Two (15%)

The buyer is entitled to damages from the sister because the sister did not convey title to the three-acre tract by a general warranty deed.

A warranty deed includes numerous covenants. Two of them—the covenant of seisin and the right to convey—are essentially the same, and they guarantee that the seller owns the conveyed land. Here, the sister did not own the three-acre tract when she purported to convey it to the buyer by a general warranty deed. Thus, she was in breach of the covenant of seisin and the right to convey, and the buyer is entitled to damages for that breach.

[NOTE: Some examinees may confuse the warranty issue with the concept of marketable title. It is true that the man's sister did not have a marketable title when she conveyed to the buyer because her adverse possession claim was clearly subject to the risk of litigation. Nonetheless the buyer agreed to go forward with the transfer, and the sister gave the buyer a warranty deed. Had she given the buyer a quitclaim deed, no warranties would have been breached.]

While the deed also includes a covenant of quiet enjoyment and a covenant of warranty, no facts suggest that these have been breached here, as the buyer has not been evicted.]

Point Three (15%)

The buyer cannot compel the company to remove the sewer line from under the garden because he took subject to the sewer-line easement and probably did not interfere with that easement.

Where an adverse possessor acquires title by adverse possession, the nature of the acquired title is no greater than the title of the holder of the cause of action who was barred by the running of the statute of limitations. Here, the owner's title was subject to the properly recorded sewer-line easement at the time the man wrongfully entered the land.

The man, his sister, and the buyer cannot claim to have adversely possessed the easement unless their possession interfered with the rights of the sewer company, giving it a cause of action against the man, the sister, and the buyer while they were in possession. There is nothing in the facts, however, suggesting that planting and maintaining a garden interfered with the sewer company's access to the sewer line. In the absence of such interference, the company has no cause of action against the possessors, in which case the buyer acquired the owner's title only—a title subject to the sewer-line easement. III AMER. LAW OF PROPERTY § 15.13 at 826 (1952).

Examinees who make a plausible argument that possession of the garden did interfere with the easement should conclude that the buyer could compel the sewer company to remove the sewer line. In that case, its failure to do so within the 10-year statutory period would result in the buyer acquiring a title that is superior to both the owner and the sewer company.

CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Civil Procedure I.A., B., C.; III.D.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Do the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit service of process on a corporation to be made by delivery of the summons and complaint to a chief executive officer of the corporation at corporate headquarters when the relevant state law requires service on the corporation's secretary?
- (2) Are two corporations diverse for purposes of federal jurisdiction when they are incorporated and headquartered in different states but their main facilities are located in the same state, which is also the state of incorporation of one of the businesses?
- (3) Can a third-party defendant be joined to a case when the claim against that third-party defendant is factually related to the plaintiff's original cause of action but the claimant does not allege that the third-party defendant is liable to the original plaintiff or responsible for the original plaintiff's damages?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The company was properly served. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 4(h) provides that service of process may be made on a corporation by delivering a copy of the summons and complaint to a corporate officer or to a general or managing agent. Because the Federal Rules explicitly authorized this manner of service, it does not matter that it did not comply with State A or State B law.

The District Court has diversity jurisdiction over MedForms's state-law claim against the company. The amount at stake ($500,000) satisfies the amount-in-controversy requirement, and the parties are diverse. MedForms is a citizen of State A, where it is incorporated and has its headquarters. The company is a citizen of State B, where it is incorporated and has its headquarters. The fact that the document processing facilities for both companies are in State A does not prevent them from being diverse.

However, the third-party complaint should be stricken. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 14(a) authorizes a defendant to bring a complaint against a nonparty (a "third-party complaint") only in situations in which the original defendant asserts that the third-party defendant is somehow liable for whatever the original defendant might owe the original plaintiff. Here, MedForms is not asserting that the company is liable to MedForms for any damages owed to the woman. Rather, MedForms seeks to obtain relief for separate injuries it suffered as a result of the company's breach of contract. It cannot bring such a claim as a third-party complaint in this action.

Point One (30%)

MedForms's delivery of the summons and complaint to the company's CEO satisfies the requirements of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 4(h) and of the Constitution.

Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 4(h), service upon a corporation may be effected within a United States judicial district by “following state law for serving a summons in an action brought in courts of general jurisdiction in the state where the district court is located or where service is made,” or “by delivering a copy of the summons and of the complaint to an officer, a managing or general agent.” Here, MedForms did not serve the secretary of the company and therefore did not comply with the service laws of either State A, where the District Court sits, or State B, where service was made. However, MedForms nonetheless properly served the company under Rule 4(h) because it delivered a copy of the summons and complaint to the company’s CEO. This service was explicitly authorized by Rule 4(h). Rule 4(h) does not specify which corporate representatives count as “officers” for the purpose of receiving service of process, but a court would almost certainly conclude that service on a CEO satisfies the rule because such an official would be “so integrated with the corporation sued as to make it a priori supposable that he will realize his responsibilities and know what he should do with any legal papers served on him.” Courtesy Chevrolet, Inc. v. Tennessee Walking Horse Breeders’ and Exhibitors’ Assoc. of America, 344 F.2d 860, 866 (9th Cir. 1965) (quoting 19 C.J.S. Corporations § 1312).

It is irrelevant that the manner of service chosen by MedForms was in violation of state law. Rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which governs the service of process, regulates procedural matters and thus is controlling law in federal diversity suits, notwithstanding any conflict with state service law. See Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460 (1965). Finally, this method of service (personal delivery of the summons and complaint to the CEO) was reasonably calculated to provide the company with actual notice of the case and therefore satisfies constitutional requirements. See Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank & Trust, 339 U.S. 306 (1950).

Point Two (35%)

The District Court has diversity jurisdiction over MedForms’s breach of contract claim because the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000 and MedForms and the company are citizens of different states.

MedForms’s breach of contract claim against the company is created by state law and therefore cannot support federal-question jurisdiction. See 28 U.S.C. § 1331. Original jurisdiction will exist, if at all, under 28 U.S.C. § 1332 (diversity jurisdiction).

Federal district courts can exercise jurisdiction over claims between citizens of different states where the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000. 28 U.S.C. § 1332. Here, MedForms has claimed damages of $500,000, and the court will accept this as the amount in controversy unless the allegation was made in bad faith or it appears to a legal certainty that the plaintiff cannot recover that amount. There is nothing in the facts of this problem to suggest that MedForms’s claim was made in bad faith or that its damages were less than $75,000 to a legal certainty. Hence, the amount-in-controversy requirement is satisfied.

The question is therefore whether MedForms (the third-party plaintiff) and the company (the third-party defendant) are citizens of different states. For diversity purposes, corporations have dual citizenship. A corporation is a citizen both of the state where it is incorporated and also of the state where it has its principal place of business. A corporation's principal place of business is the corporation's "nerve center" (i.e., "the place where a corporation's officers direct, control, and coordinate the corporation's activities"). Hertz Corp. v. Friend, 559 U.S. 77, 92–93 (2010). Ordinarily, this will be "the place where the corporation maintains its headquarters," unless the facts indicate that the corporation's designated "headquarters" is not really its "nerve center" but is simply an office for occasional meetings. Id.

In this case, MedForms is incorporated in State A. It also has its principal place of business in State A, as that is where its headquarters is located. There is no evidence that its headquarters is not its nerve center. Therefore, MedForms is a citizen of State A.

On the other hand, the company is incorporated in State B. Its principal place of business is also in State B, as that is where its headquarters is located. There is no evidence that its headquarters is not its nerve center. The fact that the company's only document processing facility is in State A does not matter. In Hertz Corp., the Supreme Court determined that a corporation's principal place of business (and citizenship) for diversity purposes would be determined by the location of the corporation's headquarters or "nerve center," rather than by the location of its business activities. Thus, the company is a citizen of State B.

Hence, MedForms and the company are citizens of different states and diversity exists.

[NOTE: An examinee who incorrectly concludes that there is no diversity jurisdiction should go on to analyze whether the district court could exercise supplemental jurisdiction over MedForms's claim. 28 U.S.C. § 1367 would authorize the district court to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over MedForms's claim against the company if it is part of the same constitutional "case or controversy" as the woman's discrimination claim against MedForms. In this case, there would be no supplemental jurisdiction because the two claims are not part of the same case or controversy.]

Claims form part of the same case or controversy if they arise out of a common nucleus of operative facts. See United Mine Workers of America v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715 (1966). Here, the woman's and MedForms's claims arise from related facts, but they do not arise from a common nucleus of operative facts. The operative facts underlying the woman's claim are based on how her MedForms supervisor treated her and his allegedly gender-based firing of her. MedForms's claim rests on the company's unsatisfactory performance of its data-entry obligations under the contract. The main operative facts that form the basis of the two claims are completely separate—the supervisor's alleged harassment and biased action on the one hand, and the company's alleged inadequate contract performance on the other.]

Point Three (35%)

MedForms's joinder of the company as a third-party defendant is improper because a third-party defendant may be joined by the original defendant only when the original defendant claims that the third party is liable for all or part of the plaintiff's original claim.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 14(a) authorizes a defendant to bring a nonparty into an action only in very limited circumstances. If the defendant claims that the nonparty “is or may be liable to [the defendant] for all or part of the claim against it,” then the defendant may bring a third-party complaint against the nonparty and the nonparty may be joined as a third-party defendant.

Here, MedForms has attempted to bring the company into the action by alleging that the company breached its contract with MedForms. MedForms does not claim that the company is or might be liable for any damages that MedForms might be ordered to pay to the woman. Moreover, there are no facts that suggest that the company played any role in, or had any obligation to indemnify MedForms for, the behavior of MedForms’s supervisor that is the basis for the woman’s claim against MedForms. In short, any liability that the company might have to MedForms is entirely independent of any liability MedForms may incur to the woman. Thus, MedForms’s attempt to bring a third-party complaint against the company exceeds the bounds of proper joinder, and MedForms’s complaint should be stricken.

[NOTE: In the facts, the company moves to “dismiss MedForms’s third-party complaint for . . . (c) improper joinder.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 14(a)(4) allows a “motion to strike” a third-party claim for improper impleader, but makes no mention of a motion to dismiss a third-party complaint. Litigants, however, commonly move to dismiss, and courts regularly grant such motions, without regard to terminology. See, e.g., AIG Europe Limited v. General System, Inc., 2013 WL 6654382 (D. Md. 2013). Similarly, although Rule 14 does not use the word “joinder,” litigants, courts, and scholars commonly refer to third-party complaints as a form of joinder. See, e.g., FRIEDENTHAL, KANE & MILLER, CIVIL PROCEDURE 83 (4th ed. 2005) (“It is important to distinguish impleader from the other claim-joinder devices that are available.”)]

Many examinees may discuss this issue in terms of the joinder standards of Rule 18 (Joinder of Claims) or Rule 19 (Required Joinder of Parties). These examinees fail to recognize that the standards for Rule 14 impleader are different. Those who take this approach might be given some credit if they recognize that it is proper to strike MedForms’s claim against the company because that claim is only tangentially related to the claim of the original plaintiff (the woman) against MedForms. However, full credit is appropriate only if the examinee also recognizes that a third-party complaint is not appropriate merely because the claims are related or arise out of the same transaction. A third-party claim must be based on some legal theory of derivative liability (e.g., that the third-party defendant has a legal obligation to indemnify the original defendant in the event of the original defendant’s liability).]

DECEDENTS' ESTATES ANALYSIS

(Decedents' Estates II.F.3., K.4.; III.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Was the husband's will revoked by physical act because of the handwritten statement across the bequests to his wife and his best friend?
- (2) Is the husband's daughter, born after the execution of his will, entitled to a share of his probate estate?
- (3) How should the assets of the revocable trust deemed illusory under state law be distributed upon the husband's death after the wife claims her one-half share in those assets?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A will can be revoked by a physical act, such as a cancellation, when the marks of cancellation are placed on the text of the will with the intent to revoke the will. Here, the words the husband wrote on the will evidence only an intent to have the will re-evaluated. Thus, the will was not revoked and its terms, subject to a possible claim by his daughter, will be given effect.

Under some state pretermitted (a/k/a "afterborn" or "omitted") child statutes, the husband's daughter, born after the execution of his will, would be entitled to that share of his probate estate she would have taken by intestacy unless the will otherwise provides. In other states, however, she would not be entitled to a share of the husband's probate estate because his will left the bulk of his probate estate to his wife, the daughter's other parent. Here, there are two reasons the daughter may not take a pretermitted child's share: (1) the phrase "regardless of whether we have children" evidences the husband's intent that the daughter not take that share, or (2) the assumed state law bars the share if the will left the whole or substantially all of the estate (as here) to the child's surviving parent.

Under the state statute, the wife is entitled to a one-half share of the revocable trust created by the husband. It is unclear whether the remaining half would pass to the wife as residuary legatee under his will or to University, the named remainderman of the revocable trust. Case law is divided on this point.

[NOTE: If the will was revoked, the husband's probate estate of $300,000 would pass $150,000 to each of the wife and the daughter and nothing would pass to the friend; if not revoked, the friend takes $5,000 and the wife $295,000 from the probate estate, subject to any claim the daughter might have. Since the pretermitted child's claim is weak here, the conservator for the daughter has an incentive to challenge the will.]

Point One (55%)

The husband's will was not revoked because there is no evidence that he intended to revoke the will when he wrote on it.

A will may be revoked by the execution of a new will or by some physical act, such as cancellation or other writings on the will, if the testator (or someone acting at the testator's direction) performs the physical act with the intent to revoke the will. The burden of proof to establish that a validly executed will has been revoked is upon the party seeking to revoke the will. See WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN, SHELDON F. KURTZ & DAVID M. ENGLISH, WILLS, TRUSTS & ESTATES 260 (4th ed. 2010).

Here, that burden cannot be met. The husband's handwritten statement on the will does not show intent to revoke the will. Instead, it suggests that he wanted to re-evaluate his overall estate plan in light of the fact that a large portion of his assets were held in the revocable trust and that he did not believe that either his wife or his daughter was adequately provided for. The phrases "estate plan should be changed" and "call lawyer to fix" show intent to do something in the future after consultation with his attorney, not to revoke the will now. In addition, the discovery of the documents found on the husband's desk, his sudden death, and the voice message on his phone from his lawyer suggest that the husband had only recently discovered the problem and called his lawyer to work it out, not that he had revoked his will.

Thus, because the will was not revoked, the friend should take $5,000 under the husband's will and his wife should take $295,000, the balance of the probate estate (possibly increased by assets from the trust (see Point Three) but subject to the daughter's claim, if any (see Point Two)).

[NOTE: Alternatively, the markings on the will might be construed as evidencing an intent to revoke the will. The husband appears to have recognized that the will made no sense in light of his family circumstances. The markings state that the plan should be changed and that the husband will take steps to make that change by calling his lawyer which, in fact, he did. Thus, so the argument goes, the will was revoked by cancellation. If the will was revoked, then the husband died intestate and half the estate would pass to the wife and half to the daughter under the intestacy law of the state.]

[NOTE: The argument claiming that there was an intent to revoke is not as strong as the argument in favor of no revocation because of the language of futurity in those markings.]

Point Two (15%)

Most likely the husband's daughter is not entitled to a pretermitted child's share. The phrase in the will "regardless of whether we have children" suggests that the husband wanted the wife to take even if they had children, thus evidencing his intent that the pretermitted child statute not apply.

Most states have "pretermitted child" statutes aimed at ensuring that children born after the execution of a will are not inadvertently disinherited. Many of these statutes provide that, under certain circumstances, a child born to a testator after the testator's will is executed is entitled to whatever share of the testator's estate the child would have received if the testator had died intestate. In states with such statutes, bequests in favor of an afterborn child's other parent are irrelevant. See, e.g., IOWA CODE § 633.267 (a surviving spouse who is the parent of the decedent's surviving child is entitled to the entire estate (see IOWA CODE § 633.211), and the daughter would take nothing); 755 ILL. REV. STAT. 5/4-10 (a surviving spouse is only entitled to one-half of an intestate decedent's estate (see 755 ILL. REV. STAT. 5/2-1), and the daughter's share would be one-half of the estate). However, a testator can avoid the consequences of such a statute if the will evidences intent to do so. Here, that seems to be the husband's intent as evidenced by the phrase "regardless of whether we have children."

In other states, an afterborn child is denied a share of the decedent parent's estate if the decedent parent bequeathed all or substantially all of his estate to the child's other parent. See, e.g., UNIF. PROB. CODE § 2-302(a)(1). In states that follow the UPC approach, the daughter would not be entitled to any share of the husband's estate because her mother (the wife) is entitled to substantially all of the husband's estate.

[NOTE: Regardless of how examinees conclude Point One, there were enough signals in the question to have prompted discussion of this issue even if they concluded that the will had been revoked.]

Point Three (30%)

The wife is entitled to take one-half of the revocable trust under the state statute. Either the wife, as residuary legatee under the husband's will, or University, as remainderman of the trust, is entitled to the other half.

Under the law of the state, the wife is entitled to a one-half share of the revocable trust created by the husband because the trust was in existence during the marriage. This leaves open the question of who is entitled to the balance of the trust's assets. Under the statute, the trust is characterized as "illusory." This characterization is ambiguous regarding whether it is just illusory as to the wife or illusory for all purposes. If the former, then the wife is entitled to her half share, as that share only is illusory, and the balance of the trust (not deemed illusory) should pass to University, as the designated remainderman. See Montgomery v. Michaels, 301 N.E.2d 465 (Ill. 1973). On the other hand, if a court deems the trust illusory for all purposes, then the trust is void and the trust assets are distributed to the wife as residuary legatee of the husband's estate, assuming that the will is valid. See Newman v. Dore, 9 N.E.2d 966 (N.Y. 1937). If, however, the will is invalid, the trust assets pass equally to the wife and her daughter as intestate property.

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the July 2015 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Civil Procedure question on the July 2015 MEE tested the following areas from the Civil Procedure outline: I.A., B.; III.D. Jurisdiction and venue—Federal subject matter jurisdiction (federal question, diversity, supplemental, and removal), Personal jurisdiction; and Pretrial procedures—Joinder of parties and claims (including class actions).

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by user jurisdictions as part of the bar examination on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Areas of law that may be covered on the MEE include the following: Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Civil Procedure, Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts, Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Uniform Commercial Code (Secured Transactions). Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

NOTE: Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles rather than local case or statutory law.

TORTS QUESTION

A boy lives in a northern state where three to four feet of snow typically blankets the ground throughout the winter, creating excellent conditions for snowmobiling. The boy is an experienced snowmobiler and a member of a club that maintains local snowmobile trails by clearing them of rocks, stumps, and fallen tree limbs that could cause an accident when buried under the snow. In January, the boy received a snowmobile as a present on his 12th birthday. The following Sunday, the boy took his friend, age 10, out on the boy's new snowmobile, which was capable of speeds up to 60 miles per hour. The friend had never been snowmobiling before.

The boy and his friend went snowmobiling on a designated and marked snowmobile trail that follows the perimeter of a rocky, forested state park near the friend's home. The trail adjoins forested property owned by a private landowner. Neither the boy nor his friend had previously used this trail.

The landowner's property is crossed by a private logging trail that intersects the snowmobile trail. The logging trail is not marked or maintained for snowmobiling, and access to it is blocked by a chain approximately 30 inches above ground level on which a "No Trespassing" sign is displayed. However, on the day in question, both the chain and the sign were covered by snow.

On impulse, the friend, who was driving the snowmobile, turned the snowmobile off the designated snowmobile trail and onto the logging trail. The snowmobile immediately struck the submerged chain and crashed. Both the boy and the friend were thrown from the snowmobile and injured. As a result of the accident, the snowmobile was inoperable.

About an hour after the accident, a woman saw the boy and his friend as she was snowmobiling on the snowmobile trail. After the woman returned to her car, she called 911, reported the accident and its location, and then went home. Emergency personnel did not reach the boy and his friend for two hours after the woman's departure. No one other than the woman passed the accident site before emergency personnel arrived.

As a result of the accident, the boy suffered several broken bones and also suffered injuries from frostbite. These frostbite injuries could have been avoided had the boy been rescued earlier.

The boy has brought a tort action against the friend, the landowner, and the woman.

1. Could a jury properly find the friend liable to the boy for his injuries? Explain.
2. Could a jury properly find the landowner liable to the boy for his injuries? Explain.
3. Could a jury properly find the woman liable to the boy for his injuries? Explain.

CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

A woman attended a corporation's sales presentation in State A. At this presentation, the corporation's salespeople spoke to prospective buyers about purchasing so-called "super solar panels," rooftop solar panels that the corporation's salespeople said were 100 times as efficient as traditional solar panels. The salespeople distributed brochures that purported to show that the solar panels had performed successfully in multiple rigorous tests. The brochures had been prepared by an independent engineer pursuant to a consulting contract with the corporation.

Based on what she was told at this presentation and the brochure she received, the woman decided to purchase solar panels from the corporation for $20,000. The corporation shipped the panels to the woman from its manufacturing facility in State B. The woman had the panels installed on the roof of her house in State A. The panels failed to work as promised, even though they were properly installed.

A federal statute prohibits "material misstatements or omissions of fact in connection with the sale or purchase of solar panels" and provides an exclusive civil remedy for individuals harmed by such statements. This remedy preempts all state-law claims that would otherwise apply to this purchase.

Relying on this federal statute, the woman has sued the corporation and the independent engineer in the U.S. District Court for the district of State A. She alleges that the statements made by the engineer in the brochure and the statements made by the corporation's salespeople at the presentation were false and misleading with respect to the solar panels' performance and value. She seeks damages of $30,000 (the cost of the solar panels plus the expense of installing them).

The woman is a State A resident. The corporation is incorporated in State B and has its principal place of business in State B. The engineer, who has never been in State A, is a State B resident with his principal place of business in State B. He prepared the brochures in State B and delivered them to the corporation there. He knew that the brochures would be distributed to prospective buyers at sales presentations around the country.

The federal statute has no provision on personal jurisdiction. State A's long-arm statute has been interpreted to extend personal jurisdiction as far as the U.S. Constitution allows.

The engineer has timely moved to dismiss the complaint against him for lack of subject-matter and personal jurisdiction. The engineer has also filed an answer (subject to his motion to dismiss) denying the claims against him and asserting a cross-claim against the corporation. The engineer's cross-claim alleges that the corporation must indemnify the engineer for any damages he may have to pay the woman. The indemnity claim is based on the terms of the consulting contract between the corporation and the engineer.

The corporation has filed timely motions to dismiss the woman's complaint for lack of subject-matter and personal jurisdiction and to dismiss the engineer's cross-claim for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

1. Does the State A federal district court have personal jurisdiction over
 - (a) the corporation? Explain.
 - (b) the engineer? Explain.
2. Assuming that there is personal jurisdiction over both defendants, does the State A federal district court have subject-matter jurisdiction over
 - (a) the woman's claim against the corporation and the engineer? Explain.
 - (b) the engineer's cross-claim against the corporation? Explain.

CONTRACTS QUESTION

A seller and a buyer both collect antique dolls as a hobby. Both live in the same small city and are avid readers of magazines about antique dolls. The seller placed an advertisement in an antique doll magazine seeking to sell for $12,000 an antique doll manufactured in 1820.

On May 1, the buyer saw the advertisement and telephoned the seller to discuss buying the doll. During this conversation, the seller and the buyer agreed to a sale of the doll to the buyer for $12,000 and also agreed that the seller would deliver the doll to the buyer's house on May 4, at which time the buyer would pay the purchase price.

The next day, May 2, the buyer changed his mind and decided not to buy the doll. He signed and mailed a letter to the seller, which stated in relevant part:

I have decided not to buy the 1820 doll that we agreed yesterday you would sell to me.

The seller received the letter on May 3, immediately telephoned the buyer, and said, "I consider your letter of May 2 to be the final end to our deal. I will sell the doll to someone else and will hold you responsible for any loss."

On May 4, the seller received a telephone call from another antique doll collector. The collector had seen the seller's advertisement for the doll and expressed interest in buying it. After some discussion, the seller and the collector agreed to a sale of the doll to the collector for $11,000. Because the collector lived in a distant part of the state, the agreement provided that the seller, at her expense, would arrange for delivery of the doll by an express delivery service. The express delivery service that they selected charges $150 for deliveries of this type. The sale, the method of delivery, and the fee were all commercially reasonable. The seller acted in good faith in entering into this agreement with the collector.

On May 5, the buyer telephoned the seller and said, "I made a mistake when I sent the letter, and I will buy the doll from you on the terms we agreed to. Come to my house tomorrow—I'll have the $12,000 for you." The seller replied, "You're too late. I've already sold the doll to someone else." The seller then took the doll to the delivery service and paid the $150 delivery fee. The delivery service delivered the doll to the collector, who immediately wired the $11,000 payment to the seller. Two weeks later, the seller sued the buyer for breach of contract.

1. Is there a contract for the sale of the doll that is enforceable against the buyer? Explain.
2. Assuming that there is a contract enforceable against the buyer, did the buyer breach that contract? Explain.
3. Assuming that there is a contract enforceable against the buyer and that the buyer breached that contract, how much can the seller recover in damages? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

The board of directors of a commercial real estate development corporation consists of the corporation's chief executive officer (CEO) and three other directors, who are executives at various other firms.

The corporation owns a commercial office tower, the value of which is approximately 10 percent of the corporation's total holdings. The corporation uses one floor of the tower as its corporate headquarters, but it wants to vacate that floor as soon as it locates suitable replacement space.

Two years ago, the board obtained an independent appraisal of the tower, which indicated a fair market value of between $12 and $15 million. After considering that appraisal, the board authorized the corporation's CEO to seek a purchaser for the tower.

The CEO immediately showed the tower to several sophisticated real estate investors and received offers ranging from $8 million to $13 million. The CEO decided that these offers were insufficient, and after he reported back to the board, no further action to sell the tower was taken.

Two months ago, the CEO and the other three directors of the corporation formed a limited liability company (LLC) in which each holds a 25 percent ownership interest.

One month ago, the corporation's board unanimously authorized the corporation's sale of the tower to LLC for $12 million. The minutes of the board's meeting at which the tower sale was authorized reflect that the meeting lasted for 10 minutes and that the only document reviewed by the corporation's directors was the two-year-old appraisal of the tower.

The minutes of the board's meeting further state that the transaction was to be carried out with "a friendly company so that the corporation will have time to relocate to a new headquarters" and that the board "authorized the transaction because the $12 million price is toward the high end of the range of offers received in the past from sophisticated real estate investors and is within the range of fair market values listed in the appraisal."

After the board's authorization of the tower sale, the corporation entered into a contract to sell the tower to LLC. The board did not seek shareholder approval of the transaction.

A non-director shareholder of the corporation is upset with the board's decision authorizing the sale of the tower to LLC. The shareholder believes that the corporation could have obtained a higher price for the tower.

1. Does the business judgment rule apply to the board's decision to have the corporation sell the tower to LLC? Explain.
2. Did the directors breach their fiduciary duties by authorizing the tower sale? Explain.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE QUESTION

On his way to work one morning, a man stopped his car at a designated street corner where drivers can pick up passengers in order to drive in the highway's HOV (high-occupancy vehicle) lanes. When the man, who was driving alone, opened his car door and announced his destination, a woman (a stranger) jumped into the front seat.

As soon as the man drove his car onto the busy highway, the woman took a knife from her backpack and held it against the man's throat. She said to him, "I am being followed by photographers from another planet where I am a celebrity. Pictures of me are worth a fortune, so I never give them away for free. Forget the speed limit and get me out of here fast, or else."

With the woman holding the knife at his neck, the man sped up to 85 miles per hour (30 mph over the posted speed limit of 55 mph), weaving in and out of traffic to avoid other cars, while the woman urged him to drive faster. While attempting to pass a motorcycle at a curve in the highway, the man lost control of the car, which struck and killed the motorcyclist before crashing into a railing.

A police car arrived at the scene a few minutes later. The man and the woman were treated for minor injuries at the scene and then arrested and taken to the police station.

While in custody, the woman was examined by two psychiatrists. Both psychiatrists submitted written reports stating that the woman suffers from schizophrenia and that, at the time of the accident, her delusions about alien photographers were caused by her schizophrenia.

The State A prosecutor has charged the woman with felony murder for the motorcyclist's death based on her kidnapping of the man, but is not sure whether to charge the man with any crime.

In State A, the rules governing crimes and affirmative defenses follow common law principles. However, in State A the Not Guilty by Reason of Insanity ("NGRI") defense is defined by statute as follows:

To establish the defense of NGRI, the defendant must show that, at the time of the charged conduct, he or she suffered from a severe mental disease or defect and, as a result of that mental disease or defect, he or she did not know that his or her conduct was wrong. The defendant has the burden to prove all elements of the defense by a preponderance of the evidence.

Assume that the two psychiatric reports will be admitted into evidence.

1. Can the woman establish an NGRI defense? Explain.
2. With what crimes, if any, can the man be charged as a result of the motorcyclist's death? Explain.
3. What defenses, if any, will be available to the man if he is charged with a crime related to the motorcyclist's death? Explain.

TRUSTS QUESTION

In 1995, a man and his friend created a corporation. The man owned 55% of the stock, and the friend owned 45% of the stock. When the man died in 2005, he left all of his stock in the corporation to his wife.

In 2009, the wife died. Under her duly probated will, the wife bequeathed the stock her husband had left her to a testamentary trust and named her husband's friend as trustee. Under the wife's will, the trustee was required to distribute all trust income to the wife's son "for so long as he shall live or until such time as he shall marry" and, upon the son's death or marriage, to distribute the trust principal to a designated charity. The stock, valued at $500,000 at the wife's death, comprised the only asset of this trust.

In 2013, after the stock's value had risen to $1.5 million, the trustee's lawyer properly advised the trustee to sell the stock in order to comply with the state's prudent investor act. Because of this advice, the trustee decided to sell the stock. However, instead of testing the market for potential buyers, the trustee purchased the stock himself for $1.2 million. Thereafter, on behalf of the trust, the trustee invested the $1.2 million sales proceeds in a balanced portfolio of five mutual funds (including both stocks and bonds) with strong growth and current income potential.

Recently, both the son and the charity discovered the trustee's sale of the stock to himself and his reinvestment of the proceeds from the stock's sale. They learned that, due to general economic conditions, the stock in the corporation that had been purchased by the trustee for $1.2 million had declined in value to $450,000 and the value of the trust's mutual-fund portfolio had declined from $1.2 million to $1 million. Both the son and the charity have threatened to sue the trustee.

The son has also decided that he wants to get married and has notified the trustee that he believes the trust provision terminating his income interest upon marriage is invalid.

1. Would the son's interest in the trust terminate upon the son's marriage? Explain.
2. Did the trustee breach any duties by buying the trust's stock and, if yes, what remedies are available to the trust beneficiaries if they sue the trustee? Explain.
3. Did the trustee breach any duties in acquiring and retaining the portfolio of mutual funds and, if yes, what remedies are available to the trust beneficiaries if they sue the trustee? Explain.

TORTS ANALYSIS

(Torts II.A., B.1., E.2., G.1.; IV.A.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Could a jury properly find that the friend, a 10-year-old child with no snowmobiling experience, was negligent?
- (2) Did the landowner have a duty to reveal hidden dangers and, if yes, could a jury properly find that there was a breach of that duty?
- (3) Did the woman owe the boy a duty of care?
- (4) Could a jury properly find that the boy was negligent and, if yes, what impact will his negligence have on his claim?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Because snowmobiling involves motorized vehicles traveling at high speeds, it is an adult activity. When a minor engages in an adult activity, he can be found negligent if he fails to exercise the same degree of care that a prudent adult would exercise in the same circumstances. A jury could thus properly find that the friend failed to exercise reasonable care by operating a snowmobile on an unmarked trail in a rocky, forested area where there was a risk of hitting hidden objects.

In most jurisdictions, a jury could properly conclude that the landowner owed the boy a duty to reveal hidden dangers such as a chain obscured by snow only if the boy is categorized as a licensee or, alternatively, if the boy is categorized as a trespasser and the landowner is found to have created an attractive nuisance. It is unclear whether the boy could establish that he was a licensee on these facts. If he is classified as a trespasser, rather than a licensee, it is unclear whether the landowner owed him a duty of care based on the attractive-nuisance doctrine because the boy was engaged in an adult activity.

The woman owed no duty of care to the boy because she did not increase the risk of harm by calling 911 and did not induce detrimental reliance.

A jury could properly find that the boy was negligent in entrusting his snowmobile to a 10-year-old who had never been snowmobiling before. In comparative negligence jurisdictions, a finding that the boy was negligent could reduce his damages; in contributory negligence jurisdictions (AL, DC, MD, NC, and VA), a finding that the boy was negligent precludes any recovery.

Point One (25%)

A jury could properly find that the friend is liable to the boy based on a finding that the friend was engaged in an adult activity and that he was negligent in turning off a designated snowmobile trail onto an unmarked logging trail.

Unless a child is engaged in an adult activity, his conduct is to be measured against that of a child of like age, intelligence, and experience. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 283A. Under this standard, it is doubtful that a jury could find the friend negligent: he was only 10 years old, and he had not previously engaged in snowmobiling.

However, when a minor engages in a hazardous activity which is “normally undertaken only by adults, and for which adult qualifications are required . . . , he may be held to the standard of adult skill, knowledge, and competence, and no allowance may be made for his immaturity.” Id. at cmt. c. Driving a motorized vehicle like a snowmobile is a classic example of an adult activity. Indeed, the Restatement (Third) of Torts provides as examples of dangerous adult activities, “driving a car, a tractor, and a motorcycle, and operating other motorized vehicles such as minibikes, motorscooters, dirt bikes, and snowmobiles.” RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TORTS § 10 cmt. f.

A reasonably prudent adult snowmobiler operating a snowmobile in a rocky, forested area would perceive that turning off a marked and designated snowmobiling trail onto a trail not designated for snowmobiling presents a foreseeable risk of injury. An unmarked trail is unlikely to have been prepared for snowmobiling. As the facts make clear, trails in this area often contain hidden hazards—for example, rocks, fallen tree limbs, and stumps—that pose the risk of a collision and that may not be readily visible under the snow on which a snowmobile travels. Thus, a jury could find that the friend was negligent in turning off a marked and designated snowmobile trail onto a logging trail unmarked for snowmobiling.

[NOTE: An examinee may appropriately note that, if the jury finds that the friend was negligent, it should also find that his negligence was the cause-in-fact and proximate cause of the boy’s injuries; the accident would not have happened but for the friend’s action in turning onto the unmarked trail, and hitting a hidden object is an immediate, foreseeable risk of such an action. These conclusions as to cause-in-fact and proximate cause are so obvious that an examinee should not be penalized for failing to note them.]

Point Two (35%)

A jury could find the landowner liable to the boy if he is classified as a licensee to whom a limited duty of care is owed. If the boy is found to be a trespasser rather than a licensee, the jury could find that the landowner is liable only if the attractive-nuisance doctrine applies.

In most states, the landowner’s duty to the boy depends on whether the boy is classified as a trespasser or a licensee. A trespasser is one who enters or remains upon land owned or possessed by another without a privilege to do so. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 329. Because the boy and his friend had no privilege to enter the landowner’s property, they may be classified as trespassers.

However, if “in light of all the surrounding circumstances, a reasonable person would interpret the possessor’s words or conduct as manifesting that he is in fact willing for another to enter . . . upon his land,” then the entrant is a licensee, not a trespasser. EDWARD J. KIONKA, TORTS IN A NUTSHELL 250 (5th ed. 2010). The presence of a path may manifest consent. Id.

Although posting a “no trespassing” sign would normally negate an implication of consent, the landowner’s “no trespassing” sign was not visible, and thus the boy could be classified as a licensee if the trier of fact concludes that it was reasonably foreseeable to the landowner that snow would obscure the sign and chain during the winter.

If the boy is classified as a licensee, in most jurisdictions the landowner would owe him a duty to reveal hidden dangers of which the landowner “knows or has reason to know” and which the boy was not likely to discover. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 342. Here, because the landowner’s property is typically covered with three to four feet of snow during the snowmobiling season, a jury could properly conclude that the landowner knew or had reason to know of the hazard posed by a chain and a “no trespassing” sign only 30 inches above the ground and that he should have posted a higher and more visible warning.

If, however, the boy is classified as a trespasser, in most jurisdictions the landowner would owe him no duty of care to make the premises reasonably safe or to warn of hidden dangers (see id. § 333) unless the court finds that the landowner has created an “attractive nuisance.” Under the attractive-nuisance doctrine, a possessor of land is subject to liability for physical harm to a trespassing child when that harm is caused by an artificial condition on the land and

- (a) the place where the condition exists is one upon which the possessor knows or has reason to know that children are likely to trespass, and
- (b) the condition is one of which the possessor knows or has reason to know and which he realizes or should realize will involve an unreasonable risk of death or serious bodily harm to such children, and
- (c) the children because of their youth do not discover the condition or realize the risk involved in intermeddling with it or in coming within the area made dangerous by it, and
- (d) the utility to the possessor of maintaining the condition and the burden of eliminating the danger are slight as compared with the risk to children involved, and
- (e) the possessor fails to exercise reasonable care to eliminate the danger or otherwise to protect the children.

Id. § 339.

Here, the landowner likely had reason to know that a logging trail intersecting a snowmobile trail would offer a tempting detour to young snowmobilers and that the landowner should have foreseen that a chain and sign only 30 inches above the ground could easily become obscured by snow, posing a serious risk of accident and injury to a snowmobiler who deviated onto the logging trail. There is no question that the boy and his friend did not discover the dangerous condition (i.e., the hidden chain); the friend, the driver, clearly did not appreciate the risk and the boy, his passenger, had no opportunity to avoid it. The burden of eliminating the risk is small; all that would be necessary is posting a sign warning of the hazard at a sufficient height to ensure that it remains snow-free. Thus, had the boy and his friend not been engaged in an adult activity, the boy’s claim against the landowner would be strong.

However, the attractive-nuisance doctrine is almost invariably applied when the trespassing child is engaged in an activity appropriate for children; indeed, most of the cases involve “rather young children, usually under 12.” KIONKA, supra, at 243. The landowner’s duty “is only to exercise reasonable care to keep the part of the land upon which he should recognize the likelihood of children’s trespassing free from those conditions which . . . are likely not to be observed by children, or which . . . are beyond the imperfect realization of children.” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 339 cmt. j. Here, the risk inherent in the hidden chain was a risk only to snowmobilers. The landowner could argue that, because snowmobiling is an adult activity, the attractive-nuisance doctrine would not apply. See Gaines v. General Motors Corp., 789 F. Supp. 38 (D. Mass. 1991) (refusing to apply attractive-nuisance doctrine to minor engaged in unforeseeable adult criminal activity).

Because of the difficulties inherent in classifying entrants onto real property, about half of the states have modified the classifications so as to establish a general duty of reasonable care under the circumstances. But only a handful of states have fully abolished the categories; most have retained the trespasser status and the rules that go with it. See KIONKA, supra, at 258–59.

Thus, if the boy is classified as a licensee, a jury may find that the landowner violated his duty of care. If the boy is classified as a trespasser, a jury may find that the landowner violated his duty of care only if it applies the attractive-nuisance doctrine, and a fact-finder may choose not to apply that doctrine given that the boy and his friend were engaged in an adult activity. In a state that has abolished these classifications, the boy may recover if the fact-finder finds that the chain posed a foreseeable risk to foreseeable entrants.

[NOTE: An examinee’s conclusions on trespasser/licensee categorization and whether the attractive-nuisance doctrine is available are less important than a demonstrated understanding of the relevant legal categories. As in Point One, an examinee who concludes that the boy can recover might also appropriately note that the fact-finder should also find that the landowner’s actions were the cause-in-fact and proximate cause of the boy’s injuries. Again, however, these conclusions are so obvious that an examinee should not be penalized for failing to discuss them.]

Point Three (25%)

A jury could not properly find that the woman had a duty to the boy because she did not increase the risk of harm to him beyond that which existed before she called 911, and the boy did not rely on the woman’s exercise of reasonable care to his detriment.

Generally, there is no duty to come to the aid of another. See KIONKA, supra, at 121. An actor who undertakes to render services designed to reduce the risk of harm to another does acquire a duty of reasonable care toward the other if

- a) the failure to exercise such care increases the risk of harm beyond that which existed without the undertaking, or
- b) the person to whom the services are rendered or another relies on the actor’s exercising reasonable care in the undertaking.

RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TORTS § 42.

Here, the woman did not increase the risk of harm beyond that which existed without the undertaking to call for help. Although the time that elapsed between the accident and the boy's rescue caused frostbite injuries, the woman caused no delay; indeed, if she had not called 911, aid would likely have arrived even later than it did. Nor did any individual rely on the woman. She told the 911 dispatcher that she was leaving the scene, and her call did not prevent the boy or anyone else from reporting the accident or taking steps to avoid the harm. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 324 ("One who . . . takes charge of another who is helpless . . . is subject to liability to the other for any bodily harm caused to him by . . . the actor's discontinuing his aid . . . , if by so doing he leaves the other in a worse position than when the actor took charge of him.").

Point Four (15%)

A jury could properly find that the boy was negligent in entrusting a snowmobile to an inexperienced 10-year-old. A finding of negligence would reduce the boy's damages award but, in almost all jurisdictions, would not deprive him of his claim.

Because the boy was an experienced snowmobiler who should have been aware of the risks of driving a snowmobile without any training or experience, a jury could find that the boy was negligent in allowing his friend to drive the snowmobile even if it applied the standard of care applicable to children. See Point One.

At common law, if the jury found that the plaintiff's negligence was a cause in fact and proximate cause of his injuries, the plaintiff was precluded from recovering damages from the defendant. In other words, if the plaintiff's negligence contributed to the plaintiff's injuries, the plaintiff could not recover from the defendant even though the defendant was also negligent. This contributory-negligence doctrine applies in Alabama, the District of Columbia, Maryland, North Carolina, and Virginia. All other states, however, have abandoned the contributory-negligence doctrine in favor of a comparative-negligence doctrine.

Under the modern "comparative negligence" approach, if the jury finds that two or more parties are negligent, it may apportion fault among them. The amount of damages apportioned to the plaintiff because of the plaintiff's negligence is subtracted from the total damages awarded by the jury. Thus, a finding that the boy was negligent should not deprive him of his cause of action. There are some comparative-negligence jurisdictions in which apportionment is not available unless the jury concludes that the plaintiff is less than 50 percent at fault; in those jurisdictions, if the jury concludes that the boy was 50 percent or more at fault, he cannot recover.

- (2)(b) Can a federal district court assert supplemental jurisdiction over a cross-claim asserted by one defendant against another defendant when the claim is part of the same case or controversy as the plaintiff's claim but the cross-claim is based on state law and the defendants are not diverse from each other?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The court has personal jurisdiction over the corporation. The corporation sent representatives to State A where those representatives made a presentation on the corporation's behalf. That presentation, which the woman alleges contained statements that were false, is the basis of the woman's claim. By performing activities in State A, the corporation purposely availed itself of the benefit and protection of State A law, and opened itself to being sued in State A on any claim that might arise from its activities.

Whether the court can assert personal jurisdiction over the consulting engineer is a much closer question. On the one hand, the engineer provided materials to the corporation that he knew would be distributed to prospective buyers across the country. He could reasonably foresee that buyers in other states (including State A) might rely on the brochures in making their purchasing decisions. On the other hand, the engineer's activities (preparing brochures for the corporation) occurred entirely within State B. The engineer was never in State A and did not take any action of his own directed at that state in particular. In the absence of any action by the engineer that was purposefully directed at State A, a court is likely to deny personal jurisdiction over the engineer.

The woman's cause of action is based on federal law. The court therefore has federal-question jurisdiction over the claim. See 28 U.S.C. § 1331.

The court also has subject-matter jurisdiction over the engineer's cross-claim. The cross-claim is part of the same case or controversy as the woman's claim, and the court can therefore exercise supplemental jurisdiction over it. See 28 U.S.C. § 1367. In some cases a court can decline to take supplemental jurisdiction over a claim over which it would not otherwise have jurisdiction, but no grounds for declining jurisdiction are present here.

Point One(a) (25%)

The corporation has sufficient connection with State A to permit a court to exercise jurisdiction over it with respect to a claim arising out of those contacts.

Federal district courts may exercise personal jurisdiction to the same extent as the courts of general jurisdiction of the state in which the district court sits. See FED. R. CIV. P. 4(k)(1)(A). Here, State A's long-arm statute authorizes its courts to exercise jurisdiction as far as the U.S. Constitution allows. So the question is whether the defendants have sufficient contacts with State A such that a State A court could constitutionally exercise jurisdiction over them.

The due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment permits states to assert personal jurisdiction over nonresident defendants who have established minimum contacts with the state such that the exercise of personal jurisdiction would not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310 (1945). This test may be met even if a nonresident defendant has only a few contacts with the state, so long as the contacts relate directly to the causes of action asserted. This is referred to as specific jurisdiction. Helicopteros Nacionales v. Hall, 466 U.S. 408 (1984). Under the test for specific jurisdiction, a nonresident defendant is subject to specific jurisdiction when its contacts with the forum state demonstrate purposeful availment of the benefits of the forum state, and the cause of action is related to those contacts. Id. See also Hanson v. Denckla, 357 U.S. 235, 253 (1958).

In this case, the corporation sent salespeople to State A to solicit the woman to purchase its product. During this visit, the corporation presented information aimed at inducing the woman to buy the super solar panels, and its sales presentation succeeded. It also shipped its product to the woman in State A. By these actions, the corporation purposefully availed itself of the privilege of doing business in State A and received the benefits that State A generally provides to businesses operating in the state—for example, roads, transportation facilities, and police protection. The woman's claim arises directly out of the corporation's contacts with the state, and the corporation could certainly foresee that it might be haled into a State A court if its conduct during its sales presentations in State A was wrongful. Here, the corporation had sufficient contacts with State A to warrant a court in exercising jurisdiction over the corporation.

Even when a nonresident defendant has the necessary minimum contacts with the forum state, the exercise of personal jurisdiction over the defendant may offend due process if it is inconsistent with traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. The burden is on the defendant to make a compelling case that the fairness considerations outweigh the existence of minimum contacts. Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 477 (1985). See also Asahi Metal Indus. Co. Ltd. v. Superior Court of California, 480 U.S. 102 (1987). Here, there are good reasons for the litigation to be in State A rather than anywhere else (e.g., the woman lives there, the defendant engaged in the tortious activity there, and the panels were installed there), and there is nothing to suggest that litigating in State A would impose a particularly onerous burden on the corporation. The court has jurisdiction over the corporation.

Point One(b) (15%)

The engineer is probably not subject to jurisdiction in State A, given that his activities were confined to State B and he did not purposefully avail himself of the benefits or protections of State A law.

The engineer has never been physically present in State A, and there is no evidence that the engineer does business in State A. There is also no evidence that the engineer's activities specifically targeted State A in any way. On the other hand, the engineer did prepare material designed to induce people to purchase super solar panels, with the knowledge that the material would be distributed to potential buyers at sales presentations throughout the country. Furthermore, it was reasonably foreseeable to the engineer that a prospective buyer in another state, including State A, might rely on the accuracy of the information in the brochure when making a purchase decision. The engineer has, in effect, placed the brochure in the stream of commerce and thus reached out across state lines to communicate with and affect the decisions of State A purchasers.

In J. McIntyre Machinery, Ltd. v. Nicastro, 131 S.Ct. 2780 (2011), the Supreme Court rejected the so-called "stream of commerce" theory of personal jurisdiction and held that merely placing a product in the stream of commerce with awareness that it might reach a particular state was not a sufficient basis to exercise jurisdiction over the manufacturer of the product. "[T]he exercise of judicial power is not lawful," said the four-justice plurality, "unless the defendant 'purposefully avails itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State . . .'" Id. at 2785. In particular, according to the plurality, the transmission of goods (e.g., the brochure) to the forum is a sufficient basis for jurisdiction "only where the defendant can be said to have targeted the forum; as a general rule, it is not enough that the defendant might have predicted that its goods will reach the forum State." Id. at 2788. Two concurring justices agreed with the rejection of the "stream of commerce" theory, although they felt that a flexible approach needed to be taken with regard to what additional facts might warrant jurisdiction in a particular case.

Here, the only connection between the engineer and State A is that the engineer put the brochure into the stream of commerce with awareness that it might be relied upon in other states (including, perhaps, State A). Under the decision in Nicastro, that connection is simply not enough. In the absence of any facts to suggest that the engineer targeted State A when he prepared the brochure and supplied it to the corporation for distribution, or that the engineer has other connections with State A, the State A court should dismiss the action against the engineer for lack of personal jurisdiction.

Point Two(a) (20%)

The federal district court has subject-matter jurisdiction over the woman's claim because it arises under a federal statute.

Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1331, federal courts have “original jurisdiction of all civil actions arising under the . . . laws . . . of the United States.” This provision gives a federal court subject-matter jurisdiction over any case in which a plaintiff's well-pleaded complaint alleges a cause of action based on federal law. See Louisville & Nashville R.R. v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149, 152 (1908).

In this case, the woman's claim is based on allegations that the defendants made false representations in violation of the federal statute. Whether the woman has a claim on these facts, and whether the defendants' alleged actions did, indeed, violate the federal statute, are questions of federal law central to her claim. Because the claim the woman is asserting is created by federal statutory law, it lies squarely within the district court's original federal-question jurisdiction under § 1331.

[NOTE: The court does not have diversity jurisdiction over the case because the woman is seeking only $30,000, well below the $75,000 amount-in-controversy requirement that applies to diversity actions. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a).]

Point Two(b) (40%)

The federal court has supplemental jurisdiction over the engineer's cross-claim, and there is no reason for it to decline to exercise that jurisdiction.

There is no basis on which a federal court could hear the engineer's cross-claim if it had been brought as an independent action. The claim is an ordinary contract claim based on state law, so there is no federal-question jurisdiction. Furthermore, because the engineer is a resident of State B and the corporation is incorporated and has its principal place of business in State B, they are both considered citizens of that state, so the court would have no diversity jurisdiction. Even if they were diverse, the amount in controversy (a $30,000 claim for indemnity) is inadequate for diversity jurisdiction.

However, once a court has original jurisdiction over some claims in the action, it may also exercise supplemental jurisdiction over additional claims that are part of the same case or controversy. 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a). See also United Mine Workers of America v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715 (1966). As noted, in the present problem the federal court could exercise federal-question jurisdiction over the woman's claims against the two defendants. The question, therefore, is whether the engineer's cross-claim is sufficiently related to the woman's claim to be part of the same case or controversy. There are significantly overlapping facts indicating that the two claims really are part of a single case. The engineer alleges that the corporation owes him indemnity based on the terms of contract between the corporation and the engineer pursuant to which the engineer prepared the very material that the woman alleges was false. The material in question, and its accuracy or inaccuracy, is central to the woman's claim, and the contract between the engineer and the corporation for the production of that material will probably be relevant to an assessment of her allegations against each party. Second, the two claims are legally linked. For the corporation to be liable to the engineer under the contract, the engineer must first be found liable to (or must settle with) the plaintiff.

Assuming that the court finds that the § 1367(a) standard is met, then the court must consider whether there are any discretionary reasons to decline to exercise jurisdiction, as set forth in § 1367(c). The discretionary grounds for declining jurisdiction include the presence of novel or complex issues of state law in the case (see § 1367(c)(1)), state-law claims that predominate over the federal claim in the case (§ 1367(c)(2)), or the district court's dismissal of all the claims over which it had original jurisdiction (§ 1367(c)(3)). In the present case, none of the identified grounds for refusing jurisdiction are applicable, and there are no exceptional circumstances that provide a compelling reason for declining jurisdiction.

CONTRACTS ANALYSIS

(CONTRACTS II.G.; IV.; V.A., B.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is an oral contract for the sale of goods for a price of $500 or more enforceable against a buyer who later sends a signed letter that indicates that the contract exists?
- (2) If a party sends a letter stating a clear intention not to perform in accordance with a contract, but later tries to withdraw that statement, may the other party bring an action for breach of contract?
- (3) What is the measure of damages if a buyer breaches a contract for the sale of goods and the seller resells the goods?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The parties' agreement created a contract for the sale of goods governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). Under the statute-of-frauds provision in Article 2 of the UCC, a contract for the sale of goods for a price of $500 or more is not enforceable unless there is a writing signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought that is sufficient to indicate that a contract for the sale of goods has been made between the parties. Although the writing need not state all the terms of the contract, the quantity must be stated.

The buyer's signed letter to the seller, indicating that he would not buy in accordance with the agreement between them, is sufficient to indicate that a contract for the sale of goods was made, and the letter clearly indicates that the agreement was for only one doll, so the quantity requirement is satisfied. As a result, the contract is enforceable against the buyer.

The buyer's letter was also a repudiation of the contract. When a party repudiates, the other party may await performance or immediately resort to any remedy for breach. While a repudiating party may sometimes "retract" its repudiation, the buyer's attempt to do so here was unsuccessful because the seller had materially changed her position in reliance on the repudiation and had indicated that she considered the repudiation to be final.

Because the seller resold the doll to the collector for $1,000 less than the contract price with the buyer, the seller is entitled to that $1,000 difference plus the additional delivery costs of $150 incurred by the seller.

Point One (30%)

The parties entered into a contract for the sale of goods governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. Because the contract price was $500 or more, the contract would not be enforceable against the buyer unless the buyer signed a writing sufficient to indicate that a contract for the sale of goods had been made (or an exception to that rule was applicable). The buyer's letter stating his intention not to perform the contract is sufficient to indicate that a contract was made. Therefore, the contract is enforceable against the buyer.

Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code applies to transactions in goods. UCC § 2-102. “Goods” are “things moveable” at the time of identification to the contract. UCC § 2-105(1). The doll was clearly moveable at the time of identification, so the transaction is governed by Article 2.

Under UCC Article 2, a contract may be formed in any manner sufficient to show agreement. UCC § 2-204(1). The telephone conversation between the seller and the buyer clearly satisfies this requirement and created a contract to sell the doll to the buyer.

However, a contract for the sale of goods for a price of $500 or more is not enforceable against a party unless there is a writing signed by that party sufficient to indicate that a contract for sale has been made (or an exception to this rule applies). UCC § 2-201(1). Here, the contract price for the doll was $12,000, so this writing requirement is applicable. The writing need not contain all the terms of the contract, but the contract is not enforceable against the party beyond the quantity of the goods shown in writing. Id. (This rule is generally interpreted as indicating that a writing does not suffice unless it contains a quantity term. See UCC § 2-201, comment 1 paragraph 3.)

Although the contract was oral, the letter the buyer sent to the seller on May 2 was signed by the buyer and is sufficient to indicate that a contract for sale was made between them. After all, it states that the parties “agreed” to the sale of the doll. As to the quantity requirement, the letter refers to “the” 1820 doll, clearly indicating that the contract was for the sale of only one doll. Hence, the buyer’s letter to the seller is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the Article 2 statute of frauds. Accordingly, the contract is enforceable by the seller against the buyer.

Point Two (40%)

The buyer repudiated the contract, and his attempt to retract that repudiation was unsuccessful. Therefore, the seller has a cause of action against the buyer for breach of the contract.

UCC § 2-610 provides that if “either party repudiates the contract with respect to a performance not yet due the loss of which will substantially impair the value of the contract to the other” the aggrieved party may for a reasonable time await performance by the repudiating party or resort to any remedy for breach. Although Article 2 does not define “repudiation,” Comment 1 to UCC § 2-610 states that repudiation “centers upon an overt communication of intention or an action which renders performance impossible or demonstrates a clear determination not to continue with performance.”

Here, the buyer’s letter said: “I have decided not to buy the 1820 doll that we agreed yesterday you would sell to me.” That positive and unequivocal statement that the buyer will not perform “demonstrates a clear determination not to continue with performance.” In addition, the buyer’s failure to buy the doll would clearly “substantially impair the value of the contract” to the seller. Thus, the buyer’s action constituted repudiation and would entitle the seller to pursue remedies for breach.

A repudiating party may, under some circumstances, retract its repudiation. UCC § 2-611(1). On May 5, the buyer indicated that he would perform when he said, “I made a mistake when I sent the letter, and I will buy the doll from you on the terms we agreed to.” But the power to retract a repudiation terminates when the aggrieved party has done any of the following: (1) cancelled, (2) materially changed his position, or (3) otherwise indicated that he considers the repudiation to be final. UCC § 2-611(1).

Here, the seller materially changed her position in reliance on the buyer's repudiation when she agreed to resell the doll to the collector, because the seller committed herself to a substitute transaction inconsistent with performing the contract with the buyer. Moreover, the seller clearly indicated to the buyer on May 3 that she considered the buyer's letter to be "the final end" to their deal. Therefore, the buyer lost the ability to retract the repudiation no later than May 3, two days before the buyer attempted to retract his repudiation. Hence, the buyer's attempted retraction of his repudiation was ineffective.

Point Three (30%)

The seller resold the doll and, accordingly, is entitled to damages equal to the $1,000 difference between the contract price and the resale price plus incidental damages of $150.

The purpose of remedies under the UCC is to put the aggrieved party "in as good a position as if the other party had fully performed." UCC § 1-305(a). This is another way of stating the "expectation" principle of contract remedies. Here, if the buyer had performed, the seller would have sold the doll to the buyer for $12,000 and would have incurred no additional delivery costs (other than the negligible costs of driving to the buyer's home in the same city). After the buyer's breach, the seller sold the doll for only $11,000 and incurred an additional cost of $150 to transport the doll to the collector.

Under UCC Article 2, when a buyer breaches or repudiates, the seller has several remedies, including the remedy of reselling the goods. UCC § 2-703(d). If the resale is made in good faith and in a commercially reasonable manner, the seller can recover the difference between the contract price and the resale price plus incidental and consequential damages. UCC § 2-706(1). If the resale is by private sale (as opposed to, say, by a public auction), this remedy is available only if the seller gives the buyer reasonable notification of the seller's intention to resell. UCC § 2-706(3). Here, the facts indicate that when the seller sold the doll to the collector, the seller acted in good faith and in a commercially reasonable manner. Moreover, the seller told the buyer on May 3 that she intended to resell the doll and hold the buyer responsible for any damages, thus providing the buyer with notice of the seller's intention to resell the goods.

Accordingly, the seller is entitled to recover the $1,000 difference between the contract price ($12,000) and the resale price ($11,000). The seller is also entitled to recover "incidental damages," which include "any commercially reasonable charges [or] expenses . . . incurred . . . in connection with return or resale of the goods." UCC § 2-710. Here, the seller incurred $150 in commercially reasonable transportation costs in connection with the resale of the doll to the collector, and as a result, the seller's incidental damages would be $150. There are no facts indicating that the seller suffered any consequential damages. Hence, the seller's total damages would be $1,000 + $150, for a total of $1,150.

CORPORATIONS ANALYSIS

(Corporations VI.A.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Was the corporation's sale of the tower a "director's conflicting interest transaction"?
- (2) Was the board's authorization of the sale of the tower protected by the business judgment rule?
- (3) Did the corporation's directors breach their fiduciary duty of loyalty by authorizing the sale?
- (4) Did the corporation's directors breach their fiduciary duty of care in the way they authorized the sale?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The sale of the tower is subject to judicial scrutiny as a "director's conflicting interest transaction" because it was a transaction between the corporation and an entity in which the corporation's directors had a material financial interest. The business judgment rule does not protect the board's authorization of the sale because all the directors who authorized the transaction had a material financial interest in the sale, by virtue of their interest in LLC. Nor was there any shareholder approval.

The directors likely breached their duty of loyalty. Because this was a self-dealing transaction, the directors bear the burden of demonstrating that the sale was substantively and procedurally fair to the corporation. It is unlikely that they can demonstrate substantive fairness because nothing in the facts presented would support a finding that the price of the tower at the time of the sale was fair. It is also unlikely that the directors can demonstrate procedural fairness given their failure to obtain an up-to-date independent appraisal or to undertake another "market test" of the property's value.

The directors also likely breached their duty of care by failing to diligently and adequately consider the transaction's fairness to the corporation. The directors exhibited gross negligence in not inquiring about the continuing validity of the dated appraisal and by not considering other means to ensure the fairness of the transaction to the corporation.

[NOTE: The analysis of this question tracks the analysis specified by Subchapter F of the Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA). Similar analysis would apply in a jurisdiction that has not adopted Subchapter F, but either has an interested-director provision modeled on former MBCA § 8.31 (1984) or relies on modern common law principles applicable to director self-dealing transactions.]

Point One (20%)

The sale of the tower was a “director’s conflicting interest transaction” (or director self-dealing) because the directors of the corporation had adverse financial interests as owners of LLC.

The corporation’s directors were on both sides of the transaction, both authorizing it for the corporation and standing to gain from it as owners of LLC. The MBCA defines a “director’s conflicting interest transaction” as one effected by the corporation “respecting which . . . the director had knowledge and a material financial interest.” MBCA § 8.60(1)(ii). The sale of the tower meets this definition of director self-dealing and is subject to special scrutiny.

The directors’ financial interest in the transaction is clearly “material.” Each director’s one-fourth ownership of LLC is likely to have impaired his or her objectivity in considering the transaction. See Official Comment 4 to MBCA § 8.60 (materiality of financial interest measured under objective standard). In addition, all the directors were aware that the transaction was with their LLC.

In a jurisdiction with an “interested director” statute, the sale of the tower would qualify as a “director’s conflicting interest transaction” given that it was a transaction with the corporation and one in which the directors had a direct or indirect interest. See former MBCA § 8.31; Del. GCL § 144 (“transaction between a corporation . . . and any other corporation . . . in which one or more of its directors . . . have a financial interest”). The conflict of interest is indirect because the directors of the corporation have a “material financial interest” in the other party, here the new LLC. See MBCA § 8.31(a).

[NOTE: In jurisdictions without an “interested director” statute, the common law would treat the transaction as one involving classic director self-dealing. See Cookies Food Products, Inc. v. Lakes Warehouse Distributing, Inc., 430 N.W.2d 447 (Iowa 1988) (duty of loyalty “derives from ‘the prohibition against self-dealing that inheres in the fiduciary relationship’”).]

Point Two (30%)

The board’s authorization of the sale of the tower is not protected by the business judgment rule because the transaction was not authorized by a majority of informed, disinterested directors.

A “director’s conflicting interest transaction” (that is, a director self-dealing transaction) is not absolutely prohibited. Instead, modern corporate law permits such transactions—with the consequence that the business judgment rule applies if, after full disclosure of all relevant facts, qualified directors authorized the transaction. See MBCA § 8.61(b) (safe harbor); Del. GCL § 144. See also Benihana of Tokyo, Inc. v. Benihana, Inc., 906 A.2d 114 (Del. 2006) (holding that § 144 creates safe harbor for interested director transactions, resulting in application of business judgment rule, provided material facts are disclosed or known to board, and majority of disinterested directors in good faith authorize transaction). If, however, the self-dealing transaction is not shown to have been properly authorized, the business judgment rule does not apply and the transaction must be shown to have been fair to the corporation.

Here, the MBCA safe harbor for proper board authorization does not apply. There was no authorization of the sale of the tower by qualified directors—that is, by directors who did not have an interest in the transaction. See MBCA § 1.43(a)(3)(i) (defining “qualified director” for purposes of director-authorization safe harbor as not including “director as to whom the transaction is a director’s conflicting interest transaction”). As elaborated in Point One, the only directors who authorized the transaction were those who had a conflict of interest. Thus, the presumption of the business judgment rule that the directors were informed and acted in good faith is not available because each of the directors had a material conflicting interest in the sale of the tower. See Aronson v. Lewis, 473 A.2d 805, 812 (Del. 1984) (presumption that in making business decisions, the directors acted on informed basis, in good faith, and in best interests of corporation not available to interested directors).

[NOTE: Approval or ratification of the transaction by qualified shareholders, after full disclosure of all relevant facts, would in some jurisdictions remove the transaction from further judicial review and in others subject it only to review for waste. But here there was no such approval or ratification.]

Point Three (30%)

The directors likely breached their duty of loyalty because it is unlikely they could show that the transaction was substantively and procedurally fair to the corporation.

Even if the sale of the tower was not properly authorized, the directors can satisfy their fiduciary duty of loyalty by showing that “the transaction, judged according to the circumstances at the relevant time, was fair to the corporation.” See MBCA § 8.61(b)(3); see also Marciano v. Nakash, 535 A.2d 400, 405 n.3 (Del. 1987).

The directors have the burden to show that the transaction as a whole was fair in terms of “fair price” and “fair dealing.” This means courts will inquire into (1) whether the transaction price was comparable to what might have been obtained in an arm’s-length transaction, given the consideration received by the corporation, and (2) whether the process followed by the directors in reaching their decision was appropriate. See Official Comment 6 to MBCA § 8.60. A breach of the directors’ duty to deal fairly with the corporation can result in personal liability. See MBCA § 8.31(a)(2)(v) (receipt of financial benefit to which director not entitled under applicable law).

Here, the directors may argue that the $12 million price paid by LLC for the tower made the transaction substantively fair because the price was within the range of offers ($8 to $13 million) received by the corporation when the tower was offered for sale two years before. See HMG/Courtland Properties Inc. v. Gray, 749 A.2d 94 (Del. Ch. 1999) (price within range of offers is fair). The directors may point out that the sales price was also within the range of values of the appraisal ($12 to $15 million). Additionally, the directors may argue that even if the sale was not at the highest valuation received by the corporation for the tower, the sale gave the corporation non-economic advantages by enabling it to “have time to relocate to a new headquarters.” Finally, the directors may argue that the transaction was procedurally fair because information about the value of the tower was already known to them and there was no reason to make further inquiries.

It is unlikely, however, that the directors’ arguments would meet their burden to show the transaction’s fairness. As to substantive fairness, the offers and appraisal relied on by the directors occurred two years before the sale to LLC, and the $12 million sales price is less than the $13 million offer that the CEO had rejected as insufficient. As to procedural fairness, the directors did not conduct a new market test or seek other purchasers. The process of the board's decision was flawed: the meeting was conducted in 10 minutes, there was no discussion of whether market circumstances had changed since the two-year-old appraisal or whether to seek another appraisal, and there was no consideration of looking for other purchasers or conducting another market test. Finally, the directors did not consider whether another buyer other than LLC would be willing to accommodate the corporation's need for time to locate and move to new headquarters.

Point Four (20%)

The directors likely breached their fiduciary duty of care in authorizing the sale of the tower because they did not become adequately informed prior to their decision.

Under the MBCA, a director is called on to exercise “the care that a person in a like position would reasonably believe appropriate under similar circumstances” in “becoming informed in connection with their decision-making function.” MBCA § 8.30(b). A director may be liable for harm to the corporation from a board decision where it is proven that the director was “not informed to an extent the director reasonably believed appropriate in the circumstances.” MBCA § 8.31(a)(2)(ii)(B); see also Smith v. Van Gorkom, 488 A.2d 858, 873 (Del. 1985) (directors breach duty of care when grossly negligent in informing themselves about board decision).

Normally, “the party attacking a board decision as uninformed must rebut the presumption that its business judgment was an informed one.” Smith v. Van Gorkom, 488 A.2d at 872; see also MBCA § 8.31(a)(2)(ii) (to similar effect). But here the presumption of the business judgment rule does not apply, given that the directors were each financially interested in the transaction (see Point Two).

A strong case can be made that the directors were grossly negligent in informing themselves about the sale of the tower to LLC, and thus that they breached their fiduciary duty of care. As discussed in Point Three, the directors decided to sell the tower at a board meeting that lasted 10 minutes; the only document they reviewed was a two-year-old appraisal; they did not discuss whether market circumstances had changed since the appraisal; they did not seek another appraisal; they did not consider looking for other purchasers, including an accommodating purchaser, or conducting another market test; and they did not discuss how the CEO had conducted the earlier market test. See Smith v. Van Gorkom, 488 A.2d 858 (finding directors were grossly negligent for authorizing cash-out merger in reliance on 20-minute oral presentation by corporation's chief executive officer without written summary of merger terms or documentation to support price adequacy).

[NOTE: For the shareholder to recover money damages based on a claim that the directors breached their duty of care, the shareholder would have to prove that the corporation was harmed by a sales price that was below market and that the sales price was proximately caused by the directors' failure to become adequately informed. See MBCA § 8.31(b)(1). These showings, however, are not elements of whether the directors breached their duty of care.]

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

(Criminal Law and Procedure I.B.2., B.3.; IV.C.1., E.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Can the woman establish the affirmative defense of not guilty by reason of insanity by showing that, under the State A statute, at the time of the charged crime (a) she suffered from a severe mental disease or defect and (b) as a result of that mental disease or defect, she did not know that her actions were wrong?
- (2) Do the facts support charging the man with manslaughter based on proof that (a) he caused the death of another person, (b) he should have been aware of a substantial risk that another human being could be killed by his conduct, (c) his actions were a gross deviation from the standard of care that a reasonable person would have exercised in the same situation, and (d) his actions were in violation of traffic laws?
- (3) If the man is charged with manslaughter, do the facts support the affirmative defense of duress?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The defense of not guilty by reason of insanity (“NGRI”) is not supported by the evidence and likely cannot be established by the woman. Under State A’s NGRI statute, the woman must show that (1) she suffered from a severe mental disease or defect at the time of the charged crime and (2) as a result of that mental disease or defect, she did not know that her conduct was wrong. The two psychiatric reports support a finding that the woman suffered from a severe mental disease (schizophrenia) that caused her to experience delusional beliefs regarding alien photographers. But the evidence does not support a finding that the woman’s delusions prevented her from knowing that it was wrong to kidnap the man and force him at knifepoint to drive 85 mph on a busy highway just to avoid having her picture taken without compensation.

The facts support charging the man with some form of involuntary manslaughter (e.g., criminal-negligence manslaughter or unlawful-act manslaughter). First, the man’s actions caused the death of the motorcyclist. Second, anyone who drives 85 mph on a busy highway and tries to pass a motorcyclist (a relatively exposed and vulnerable highway user) on a curve while weaving in and out of traffic should be aware of a substantial and unjustifiable risk that another human being could be killed as a result of his conduct. Third, the man’s actions were a gross deviation from the standard of care that a reasonable person would have exercised in the same situation. Fourth, the man’s speeding and reckless driving were serious traffic violations sufficient to make the man criminally accountable for the resulting death in many jurisdictions.

However, if the man is charged with manslaughter, he will almost certainly raise the affirmative defense of duress. Here, the facts support a legal finding of duress. The man’s conduct was caused by his reasonable belief that obeying the woman's demand to drive faster was the only way for him to avoid imminent death or serious bodily injury. Moreover, because he was already driving the car on a busy highway when the woman pulled out the knife and placed it against his neck, he had no opportunity to extricate himself from the threatening situation. Finally, although duress generally cannot excuse a charge of intentional homicide, here the facts do not support a finding that the man's killing of the motorcyclist was intentional.

Point One (40%)

Even with the admission of the two psychiatric reports, the evidence does not support the affirmative defense of not guilty by reason of insanity.

State A, like most states that provide a not guilty by reason of insanity ("NGRI") defense, limits the defense to a defendant who can show that, at the time of the charged crime, she suffered from a "severe mental disease or defect," and that, as a result of that mental disease or defect, "she did not know that her conduct was wrong." See generally WAYNE R. LAFAVE, CRIMINAL LAW, CHAPTER 7: INSANITY DEFENSE (5th ed. 2010). This is essentially the M'Naghten version of the NGRI defense, derived from the opinion in M'Naghten's Case, 8 Eng. Rep. 718 (1843).

Although there is no universal definition of mental illness that satisfies the legal requirement of a "severe mental disease or defect," a serious mental disease like schizophrenia should qualify, especially when accompanied by delusions or other significant impairments of a defendant's capacity to recognize reality. See, e.g., Billiot v. State, 515 So. 2d 1234, 1237 (Miss. 1987) (finding that a schizophrenic individual with a delusional thought process had a severe mental disease). Thus, if the jury finds that the woman was suffering from schizophrenia accompanied by delusional beliefs at the time of the charged crime, this finding should establish that she suffered from the type of severe mental disease or defect contemplated by the State A NGRI statute. See RICHARD J. BONNIE ET AL., A CASE STUDY IN THE INSANITY DEFENSE: THE TRIAL OF JOHN W. HINCKLEY JR. 28–31 (3d ed. 2008) (discussing this famous case involving an insanity defense premised on evidence that the defendant suffered from schizophrenia). See also State v. Becker, 2011 WL 3925431 (Iowa Ct. App. 2011) (unpublished) (noting that expert testimony that defendant suffered from paranoid schizophrenia had been introduced to support his insanity defense).

However, a finding that the woman was suffering from a "severe mental disease or defect" at the time of the charged crime is necessary but insufficient to establish her NGRI defense. The jury must also find that, as a result of that mental disease or defect, the woman did not know that her conduct was "wrong." See, e.g., State v. Milton, 142 So. 3d 157 (La. Ct. App. 2014) (rejecting defendant's defense (under a similar NGRI statute) because the defendant had failed to prove that his mental disease left him unable to distinguish right from wrong and noting that a propensity to commit wrong acts does not necessarily entail an inability to differentiate right from wrong); People v. Stoffel, 794 N.Y.S.2d 230 (N.Y. App. Div. 2005) (affirming defendant's conviction, despite substantial defense proof that at the time of the charged crime he suffered from paranoid schizophrenia and delusional beliefs, because his delusions did not prevent him from knowing right from wrong).

States differ as to the definition of “wrong” for NGRI purposes. Some states provide the defense only if the defendant’s severe mental disease or defect prevented her from knowing that her acts were criminal. Other states provide the defense even if the defendant knew that her actions were legally wrong (i.e., against the law) but did not know that her actions were morally wrong (i.e., the type of acts that society would condemn). Finally, other states have not explained whether they define “wrong” as legally or morally wrong. See LAFAVE, supra, § 7.2(b) at 406–07.

Here, there is no evidence that the woman’s schizophrenia prevented her from knowing that it was legally wrong to kidnap the man and force him at knifepoint to drive well above the speed limit on a busy highway. As the woman explained, her actions were motivated by her concern that alien photographers might take her picture for profit without providing her with compensation. Moreover, the fact that she told the man to “forget the speed limit” provides evidence that she was aware that the speeding was illegal.

There is also no evidence that the woman’s schizophrenia prevented her from knowing that her actions were morally wrong. The lack of evidence on this point is significant because, in some jurisdictions, a defendant can be found NGRI—even if she knows that her actions are illegal—if she does not know that they are morally wrong. See, e.g., State v. Castillo, 713 S.E.2d 190, 194–95 (N.C. Ct. App. 2011) (noting that North Carolina applies a version of M’Naghten under which a defendant can be exonerated if he did not think that his acts were morally wrong). Here, there is no evidence that the woman’s schizophrenic delusion that celebrity-stalking aliens should pay for her photograph prevented her from recognizing the immorality of her decision to kidnap the man and force him at knifepoint to speed on a busy highway. See id.; see also State v. Potter, 842 P.2d 481, 486–87 (Wash. Ct. App. 1992) (rejecting defendant’s defense (under a similar NGRI statute) that a defendant can be adjudged insane who has cognitive ability (the ability to know an act is wrong, legally and morally), but lacks volitional control (the ability to control one’s behavior despite cognitive ability)).

[NOTE: Some jurisdictions provide that the insanity defense is available to a defendant who, as a result of a severe mental disease or defect, “lacks substantial capacity” to “appreciate” the wrongfulness of the behavior. See LAFAVE, supra, § 7.5(a) at 420, fn. 2. This test is not the rule in State A, and an examinee should receive no credit for analyzing it. This test is generally understood to broaden the insanity defense to cover cases where a mental disease results in a significant affective or emotional impairment. In these jurisdictions, unlike in State A, a defendant who knew that her behavior was wrong might still be found NGRI, if the defense proved that her mental disease prevented her from emotionally appreciating the wrongfulness of her conduct. In such a jurisdiction, the woman would have a somewhat higher likelihood of establishing the insanity defense on the facts of this problem, although she still might be unsuccessful.]

Point Two (40%)

The facts support charging the man with manslaughter.

In most jurisdictions, a person who recklessly causes the death of another can be charged with so-called “depraved-heart” murder if the person acted with “extreme indifference to the value of human life.” MODEL PENAL CODE § 210.2(1)(b). Generally, however, reckless driving alone would not lead to a charge of depraved-heart murder. Such a charge would be appropriate only if the reckless driving was combined with intoxication or other aggravating factors. See, e.g., Cook v. Commonwealth, 129 S.W.3d 351 (Ky. 2004) (defendant was intoxicated and driving at an excessive speed); State v. Woodall, 744 P.2d 732 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1987) (intoxicated, driving almost 70 mph on a 40-mph double curve). Here, there are no additional aggravating factors, so it is unlikely that the man would be charged with depraved-heart murder.

A manslaughter charge, on the other hand, is quite possible. In most jurisdictions, a defendant whose conduct causes the death of another human being can be charged with manslaughter if the defendant acted with criminal negligence, which can include the criminally negligent operation of a motor vehicle. See generally WAYNE R. LAFAYE, CRIMINAL LAW § 15.4 (5th ed. 2010).

The man likely satisfied the actus reus of criminally negligent manslaughter. He engaged in the act of driving his car in a manner that violated the traffic laws and his high speed and weaving through traffic created a substantial risk of an accident and serious injury to others. See, e.g., McGuire v. State, No. 01-11-01089-CR, 2012 WL 344952, at *2 (Tex. App. Houston (1st Dist.), Feb. 2, 2012) (unpublished) (citing cases in which courts found that driving automobiles in violation of traffic laws satisfied the actus reus requirement of negligent homicide). His conduct also was both the actual (“but for”) and proximate cause of the motorcyclist’s death. The death was the direct result of the man striking the motorcyclist with his car, and there were no unforeseeable superseding causes. See, e.g., People v. Prue, 779 N.Y.S.2d 271 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept. 2004) (finding that the defendant was the direct cause of the victim’s death because the victim was alive before the accident and would not have died but for the accident).

The only question is whether the man acted with the requisite mens rea required for manslaughter. In some states, criminal negligence is present whenever a person’s conduct creates a substantial risk of death and the defendant’s actions were a gross deviation from the standard of care that a reasonable person would have exercised in the same situation. In other states, it is also necessary to prove that the defendant was aware of the fact that the conduct created a substantial risk of death. See LAFAYE, supra, § 15.4(a).

Here, the man was driving at the excessive speed of 85 mph on a busy highway, was weaving in and out of traffic, and tried to pass a motorcycle on a curve. Based on these facts, a fact-finder could conclude that the man had the requisite mens rea for criminal-negligence manslaughter. An ordinary person would have been aware that this kind of driving created a substantial and unjustifiable risk that a driver would lose control of the car, hit the motorcyclist or others on the highway, and cause death. The man’s actions were also a gross deviation from the standard of care that a reasonable person would have exercised in the same situation. Courts have upheld jury verdicts finding that defendants acted with criminal negligence under similar circumstances. See, e.g., State v. Donato, No. IN89-06-0858, 1990 WL 140073, at *2 (Del. Super. Aug. 15, 1990) (denying defendant's motion for a judgment of acquittal when the jury found him guilty of negligent homicide after he struck and killed the victim while going 20 mph over the speed limit and not paying attention to the road). If State A requires actual awareness of a substantial risk of death, a manslaughter charge would still be warranted because the man must have been aware that his driving could easily cause a fatal accident.

In some states, manslaughter is also committed when a death occurs as a result of a defendant's commission of an unlawful act. Here, the man's excessive speeding and dangerous weaving through traffic were both serious traffic violations sufficient to serve as predicate offenses for a charge of unlawful-act manslaughter. See LAFAVE, supra, § 15.5.

Point Three (20%)

The facts support the affirmative defense of duress because the man's conduct was caused by his reasonable belief that obeying the woman's instructions to drive faster was the only way to avoid imminent death or serious bodily injury.

The typical affirmative defense of duress excuses defendants from criminal liability if their conduct was committed "under the pressure of an unlawful threat from another human being to harm" the defendant. See WAYNE R. LAFAVE, CRIMINAL LAW § 9.7(a) (5th ed. 2010). The unlawful threat must cause the defendant to reasonably believe that "the only way to avoid imminent death or serious bodily injury to himself or to another is to engage in conduct which violates the literal terms of the criminal law." Id. § 9.7. The defendant must also prove that he engaged in the criminal behavior because of the threat and not for some other reason. The rationale for the duress defense is that "even though he has done the act the crime requires and has the mental state which the crime requires, his conduct violating the literal language of the criminal law is excused because he 'lacked a fair opportunity to avoid acting unlawfully.'" Id. § 9.7(a) at 520 (internal citation omitted).

Here, the man almost certainly will succeed with an affirmative defense of duress. His physical conduct (driving at an excessive rate of speed and in a reckless manner) was in response to the woman's direct threat of death or serious bodily harm. Under the circumstances, it was reasonable for him to fear for his life because his assailant was holding a knife to his throat in a car, and her behavior indicated that she was mentally unbalanced, making it more likely that she would carry out her threat. Because the man was already driving the car on a busy highway when the woman pulled out the knife and placed it against his neck, he had no opportunity to extricate himself from the threatening situation. See United States v. Johnson, 416 F.3d 464 (6th Cir. 2005).

The Model Penal Code defines the affirmative defense of duress as a threat such that a person of reasonable firmness would be unable to resist it. See MODEL PENAL CODE § 2.09(1). This standard, which is followed in several jurisdictions, is also satisfied here. A person of reasonable firmness of character would very likely be unable to resist the threat posed by the woman under these circumstances. At the common law, and in most jurisdictions today, duress is not available as a defense to any kind of intentional homicide. LAFAVE, supra, § 9.7(b). In this case, however, the man had no intention of killing the motorcyclist. Thus, there is no bar to his asserting the defense against a charge of negligent homicide.

TRUSTS ANALYSIS

(Trusts I.H., I.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is the trust condition providing for the termination of an income interest upon marriage invalid as a matter of public policy?
- (2) Did the trustee violate his duty of loyalty by purchasing the stock of the closely held corporation from the trust and, if so, what damages or other remedies are the trust beneficiaries likely to obtain?
- (3) Did the trustee violate the prudent investor rule by investing trust principal in a balanced portfolio of mutual funds with potential for growth and current income and retaining those investments after they declined in value?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A trust condition that provides for the termination of a beneficiary's interest upon marriage is void as against public policy, except when the beneficiary is the trust creator's spouse. Thus, the son's interest would not terminate upon his marriage.

A trustee's purchase of trust assets is an act of self-dealing and a breach of the duty of loyalty. The trust beneficiaries can either rescind the transaction or seek damages. Where, as here, the value of the asset has substantially declined, the beneficiaries are more likely to seek money damages (here, $300,000) for the breach.

Neither the investment of trust assets in a balanced portfolio of mutual funds with potential for growth and current income nor the retention of those assets during a period of general economic decline violates the prudent investor rule. Thus, neither the son nor the charity is entitled to damages here.

Point One (30%)

The son's income interest in the trust would not terminate upon his marriage because the condition against marriage is void as a matter of public policy.

Provisions of trusts that violate public policy are void. RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 29. Trust provisions that restrain a first marriage have generally been held to violate public policy. Id. Comment j; RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF PROPERTY § 6.1 (a provision restraining any first marriage is invalid and the transfer takes effect "as though the restriction had not been imposed."). In his hornbook, Professor Bogert states: "[T]he common law has a well-defined interest in preserving freedom of marriage . . . and in the preservation of the family relation Hence provisions in a trust instrument which provide that a beneficiary shall have no interest under the trust unless he obeys the instructions of the settlor regarding marriage may be held illegal as against public policy.” Although courts have upheld some restrictions on marriage—for example, remarriage—none have upheld a complete restraint on a first marriage. GEORGE G. BOGERT, TRUSTS § 48 (6th ed. 1987) (footnote omitted; emphasis added). See also RESTATEMENT (FIRST) OF PROPERTY § 424–426 (1944). Thus, because the son’s income interest would terminate upon his marriage, no matter what the circumstances of that marriage, the provision is void and the son’s income interest continues.

A restraint on marriage might be upheld if the trustee’s motive was merely to provide support for a beneficiary while the beneficiary is single. Here, there are no facts to support that motive. In fact, because this is a mandatory income payout trust, the trust income is payable to the son without regard to his support needs.

Point Two (35%)

The trustee breached his duty of loyalty by purchasing stock from the trust, an act of self-dealing. In such a case, trust beneficiaries may obtain an order setting aside the transaction or seek damages based on the difference between the purchased assets’ fair market value at the time of purchase and the sales price paid by the trustee.

A trustee owes a fiduciary duty of loyalty to a trust; self-dealing, such as a purchase of trust assets by the trustee in his individual capacity, violates this obligation. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 170(1) (1959); UNIF. TRUST CODE § 802. Under the “no further inquiry” rule, there is no need to inquire into the motivation for the self-dealing transaction or even its fairness. See MCGOVERN, KURTZ & ENGLISH, PRINCIPLES OF WILLS, TRUSTS, AND ESTATES (2d. ed. 2012) at 560.

Any trust beneficiary can cause a self-dealing purchase by a trustee to be set aside or obtain a damages award. See UNIF. TRUST CODE § 802. If a beneficiary elects to set aside the transaction, the trust property purchased by the trustee is returned to the trust and the amount the trustee paid for the property is refunded by the trust. If a beneficiary seeks damages, those damages are based on the difference in the fair market value of the trust assets at the time of the self-dealing transaction and the amount paid by the trustee. Id. Where, as here, the assets purchased by the trustee have declined in value since the self-dealing transaction, trust beneficiaries are likely to seek damages instead of setting aside the transaction.

Here, the beneficiaries should elect to seek damages from the trustee, not rescission. First, with rescission, the trustee would return the shares to the trust, and the trust would have to refund the purchase price to the trustee. This would leave the trust with assets worth only $450,000. Furthermore, because of the market declines, the trust assets are currently worth only $1,000,000; thus the trust doesn’t have sufficient assets to refund the purchase price. On the other hand, by seeking damages, the trust would collect $300,000, representing the difference between the value of the shares when purchased by the trustee ($1,500,000) and the purchase price ($1,200,000), leaving the trust with $1,300,000 in assets.

The trustee also breached his duty of care when selling the stock because of his failure to test the market.

Point Three (35%)

A trustee has a duty to invest trust assets in a prudent manner. Here, there are no facts suggesting that the trustee breached any prudent investment duty with respect to the selection and management of the investments he made.

A trustee shall administer “the trust as a prudent person would . . . [using] reasonable care, skill, and caution.” See UNIF. TRUST CODE § 804. See also UNIF. PRUDENT INVESTOR ACT § 2(a) (1995); RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS: PRUDENT INVESTOR RULE § 227 (1992); RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS § 90 (2007). One of the hallmarks of prudent investing is diversification. A balanced portfolio reduces aggregate risk by investing in different investment categories. Diversification thus is strong evidence of prudent investing. Indeed, failure to diversify is likely the reason why the trustee in this case was advised to sell the closely held corporate stock. See MCGOVERN, KURTZ & ENGLISH, supra, at 575–77.

“A trustee’s investment and management decisions respecting individual assets must be evaluated not in isolation but in the context of the trust portfolio as a whole and as a part of an overall investment strategy having risk and return objectives reasonably suited to the trust.” UNIF. PRUDENT INVESTOR ACT § 2(b); accord, RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TRUSTS: PRUDENT INVESTOR RULE § 227(a). The trustee should consider the purposes, terms, distribution requirements, and other circumstances affecting the trust. UNIF. PRUDENT INVESTOR ACT § 2(a). The prudent investor rule applies to both investment and management decisions. Management includes monitoring; thus, the trustee has a duty to monitor investments prudently made to assure that retention of those investments remains prudent. If retention is not prudent, the trustee should sell the imprudent investments and reinvest the proceeds in prudent investments. A trustee, however, is not liable for declines in value due to a downturn resulting from general economic conditions. See generally, UNIF. PRUDENT INVESTOR ACT § 2, cmt.

Here, the trustee’s investment of the sale proceeds seems to satisfy the diversification requirement. The trustee selected a balanced group of mutual funds; the portfolio included both stock and bond funds; it contained both growth and income funds. The trustee also appears to have considered the needs of both the income beneficiary and remainderman; growth funds are aimed at achieving principal appreciation and income funds at producing current income. The funds’ decline in value during a period of general economic decline—when most types of investments may well have fallen in value—does not evidence lack of prudence, and there are no facts to show any failure to monitor the portfolio.

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2016 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Constitutional Law question on the February 2016 MEE tested the following areas from the Constitutional Law outline: II.A.1. The separation of powers—The powers of Congress—Commerce, taxing, and spending powers.

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by user jurisdictions as part of the bar examination on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Areas of law that may be covered on the MEE include the following: Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Civil Procedure, Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts, Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Real Property, Secured Transactions (UCC Article 9), Torts, and Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests). Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

NOTE: Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles rather than local case or statutory law.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

Two years ago, a retailer of home electronic equipment borrowed $5 million from a finance company. The loan agreement, signed by both parties, provided that the retailer granted the finance company a security interest in all of the retailer's present and future inventory to secure the retailer's obligation to repay the loan. On the same day that it made the loan, the finance company filed in the appropriate state filing office a properly completed financing statement reflecting this transaction.

Six months ago, a buyer purchased a home entertainment system from the retailer for a total price of $7,000. The buyer paid $1,000 as a down payment on the system and agreed to make 12 additional monthly payments of $500 each. The buyer signed a "credit purchase agreement" memorializing the financial arrangement with the retailer and providing that the retailer would "retain title" to the entertainment system until the buyer's obligation to the retailer was paid in full. The buyer then returned home with her new home entertainment system. The buyer had no knowledge of the retailer's agreement with the finance company and acted in good faith in acquiring the home entertainment system. The retailer did not file a financing statement with respect to this transaction.

Two months ago, the buyer decided that she could no longer afford her monthly $500 payments for the home entertainment system. She contacted her friend, who had often expressed interest in acquiring a home entertainment system. After a brief discussion, the friend agreed to buy the home entertainment system from the buyer for $4,000 if the friend could pay the price 90 days later, when he anticipated receiving a bonus at work. The buyer accepted the friend's proposal, and the friend gave the buyer a check for $4,000. The buyer promised to hold the $4,000 check for 90 days before depositing it. The friend took the entertainment system and began using it at his own home. The friend had no knowledge of the buyer's agreement with the retailer or of the retailer's agreement with the finance company.

The retailer is in financial distress and has missed a payment owed to the finance company. Meanwhile, since the friend bought the home entertainment system from the buyer, the buyer has not made any of her monthly payments to the retailer.

1. Does the finance company have an interest in the home entertainment system? Explain.
2. Does the retailer have an interest in the home entertainment system? Explain.
3. Does the retailer have an interest in the $4,000 check? Explain.

EVIDENCE QUESTION

A victim had just walked out of a jewelry store carrying a package containing a diamond bracelet when someone grabbed him from behind, put a gun to his back, and demanded the package. The victim handed the package over his shoulder to the robber. The robber said, "Close your eyes and count to 20. I'll be watching, and if you mess up, I'll shoot you." The victim did as he was told, and when he opened his eyes, the robber was gone. The victim immediately called 911 on his cell phone.

The victim did not see the robber. A witness on the other side of the street saw the entire encounter. While the victim was speaking to the 911 operator, the witness ran over to the victim and shouted, "Are you all right? I saw it all!"

A police officer arrived five minutes later and took a statement from the witness, who was wringing her hands and pacing. The police officer asked the witness, "What did you see?" The witness responded, "The robber is about six feet tall. He has brownish hair, almost buzzed to the scalp. He was wearing jeans and a blue jacket." The police officer called in the description to the police station.

The defendant, who is over six feet tall and has buzzed brown hair, was picked up 30 minutes later. When the police officer stopped him, he was six blocks from the scene of the robbery. The defendant was wearing jeans and a blue jacket but did not have a gun or the bracelet in his possession. He was brought to the police station for questioning and was placed in a lineup.

The police officer brought the witness to the police station to view the lineup. The witness viewed the lineup and identified the defendant as the robber. The defendant was arrested and charged with robbery.

One week after the robbery, the witness moved overseas. One year later, at the time of the defendant's trial, the witness could not be found.

The victim and the police officer both testified at trial for the prosecution. The police officer testified as follows:

Question: When you arrived at the scene of the robbery, did you obtain a description of the robber?

Answer: Yes. The witness said that the robber was about six feet tall, with very short, brownish hair, almost buzzed to the scalp, and that he was wearing jeans and a blue jacket.

Question: Did you gather any other evidence indicating that the defendant committed this robbery?

Answer: Yes. When I was walking into the police station with the victim, we overheard the defendant in an adjoining room. As soon as the victim heard the defendant's voice, the victim said, "That's the voice of the guy who robbed me."

Question: What do you know about the defendant?

Answer: He's a known drug dealer who had been hanging around in the area where the jewelry store is located for six months before the robbery, constantly causing trouble.

The trial was held in a jurisdiction that has rules identical to the Federal Rules of Evidence. Defense counsel made timely objections to the admission of the following evidence:

- (a) The police officer's testimony recounting the witness's statement at the scene.
- (b) The police officer's testimony recounting the victim's statement while walking into the police station.
- (c) The police officer's testimony that the defendant is a "known drug dealer who had been hanging around in the area where the jewelry store is located for six months before the robbery, constantly causing trouble."

The trial judge overruled all of defense counsel's objections.

Was this evidence properly admitted? Explain.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

Four years ago, a man and a woman properly formed a partnership to own and manage a multi-million-dollar apartment complex. They qualified the partnership as a limited liability partnership (LLP). The complex required a good deal of maintenance, and they anticipated regular borrowings of up to $25,000 to cover maintenance expenses as is customary in this industry.

While the partnership agreement contained no limitations on the authority of the partners to act for LLP, two months after LLP was formed the man and the woman agreed that neither partner would have authority to incur indebtedness on behalf of LLP in excess of $10,000 without the consent of the other partner. They then signed a statement of partnership authority describing this limitation, but this statement was never filed.

Over the next two years, the man regularly borrowed amounts from LLP's bank to cover the complex's ordinary maintenance expenses. The amounts borrowed ranged from $5,000 to $9,000, and the man did not ask for the woman's consent when he entered into these loans on behalf of LLP.

Earlier this year, the man, without the woman's knowledge, asked the bank to loan $25,000 to LLP. The man told the bank's loan officer that the funds would be used for ordinary maintenance of the apartment complex. This amount, though greater than LLP's previous borrowings from the bank for maintenance, was in line with loans made by the bank for maintenance to other similar apartment complexes.

When the loan officer asked the man if he had authority to borrow the money on behalf of LLP, the man handed the loan officer a copy of the partnership agreement. The man, however, did not give the officer a copy of the statement of partnership authority, nor did he tell the loan officer that it existed. The bank had no actual knowledge of the limitation on the man's authority to obtain the loan on behalf of LLP.

Without contacting the woman, the bank loaned $25,000 to LLP. The loan agreement was signed only by the man and the bank's loan officer. The woman, though she had knowledge of the earlier borrowings from the bank, had no knowledge of this loan.

The man then used the $25,000 to pay his personal gambling debts. LLP has not made any payments to the bank on the loan.

1. Is LLP liable to the bank on the loan? Explain.
2. Is the woman personally liable to the bank on the loan? Explain.
3. Is the man liable for breaching his fiduciary duties and, if so, to whom is he liable? Explain.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW QUESTION

State A, a leader in wind energy, recently enacted the “Green Energy Act” (“the Act”).

Section 1 of the Act requires that 50% of the electricity sold by utilities in the state come from “environmentally friendly energy sources.” Wind energy, which is produced in State A, is classified by the Act as an “environmentally friendly energy source.” Natural gas, which is not produced in State A, is not classified by the Act as environmentally friendly. The preamble of the Act contains express findings that the burning of natural gas releases significant quantities of greenhouse gases into the atmosphere and requires the diversion of scarce water resources for use in gas-burning thermoelectric plants.

Section 2 of the Act prohibits the Public Service Commission of State A from approving any new coal-burning power plants in the state, unless it finds that “the construction of the plant is necessary to meet urgent energy needs of this state.” A public utility in neighboring State B has applied for a permit to build a coal-burning power plant on property it owns across the border in State A. The Commission has denied the utility’s application based on its finding that there is no evidence of any urgent energy needs in State A. The State B utility presented undisputed evidence of severe energy shortages in State B, but the Commission rejected this evidence as irrelevant to the statutory exception.

Section 3 of the Act requires State A, whenever possible, to buy goods and services only from “environmentally friendly vendors located within the state.” To qualify as an “environmentally friendly vendor,” a firm must meet specified standards concerning energy efficiency, chemical use, and use of recycled materials. A vendor located outside of State A meets all the standards to qualify as an environmentally friendly vendor. The vendor has sought to sell goods and services to State A. The relevant State A agencies have refused to purchase from this vendor, pointing out that the Act requires them to purchase, if possible, only from “environmentally friendly vendors located within the state,” of which there are several.

There is no federal statute or regulation relevant to this problem.

Which provisions, if any, of the Green Energy Act unconstitutionally burden or discriminate against interstate commerce? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES QUESTION

Last year, a patient, age 80, was diagnosed with cancer. Shortly after receiving the cancer diagnosis, the patient signed a durable health-care power of attorney (POA) designating her son as her “agent to make all health-care decisions on my behalf when I lack capacity to make them myself.” The POA contained no other provisions relevant to the commencement or duration of the agent’s authority. The patient thereafter underwent several cancer therapies which were so successful that, two months ago, the patient’s doctor said that, in his opinion, the patient’s cancer was in “complete remission.”

Last week, the patient was struck by an automobile, suffered serious injuries to her head and neck, and underwent emergency surgery for those injuries. Following surgery, the patient’s doctor explained to her son that there was a more than 50% risk that the patient would not regain consciousness and would need to be maintained on life-support systems to provide her with food, hydration, and respiration. The doctor also noted that, during the next few days, there was a large risk of a stroke or cardiac arrest, which would substantially increase the risk that the patient would never regain consciousness, and which could be fatal.

The patient’s son was confident that his mother would not want to be kept on life support if she were permanently unconscious but believed that she would want to be maintained on life support until her status was clear. He thus instructed the doctor to put the patient on life support but not to resuscitate her if she were to experience a stroke or cardiac arrest. The son issued these instructions after conferring with the doctor and with his two sisters. The sisters disagreed with their brother’s decision and told the doctor to ignore the instructions “because we have as much right to say what happens to Mom as he does, and we want her resuscitated in all events.” Nonetheless, the doctor thereafter placed a “do not resuscitate” (DNR) order in the patient’s chart.

Four days ago, the patient, who had not regained consciousness, suffered a cardiac arrest. Following the DNR order, the nursing staff did not attempt to resuscitate the patient, and she died.

The patient’s valid will devised her estate to her three children in equal shares. All three children survived the patient.

This jurisdiction has a typical statute authorizing durable health-care powers of attorney. This jurisdiction also has a statute providing that “[n]o person shall share in the estate of a decedent when he or she intentionally caused the decedent’s death.”

The patient’s two daughters have consulted an attorney, who has advised them that (1) the patient’s son had no authority to instruct the doctor to write the DNR order; (2) in a wrongful death action, the son would be liable for the patient’s death; and (3) the son is barred from taking under the patient’s will because his actions intentionally caused her death.

Is the attorney correct? Explain.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

Eight years ago, a woman and a man began living together. The woman worked as an investment banker, and the man worked part-time as a bartender while he struggled to write his first novel. The couple lived in a condominium that the woman had purchased shortly before the man moved in. The woman had purchased the condominium for $300,000 using her own money and had taken title in her own name.

Four years ago, the woman and the man were married at City Hall. One week before the wedding, the woman presented the man with a proposed premarital agreement and an asset list. The asset list correctly stated that the woman owned the condominium, then worth $350,000, and a brokerage account, then worth $500,000. The agreement specified that, in the event of divorce, each spouse would be entitled to retain “all assets which he or she then owns, whether or not those assets are acquired during the marriage.” The man was surprised when the woman gave him the agreement to sign, and he contacted a lawyer friend for advice. The lawyer urged the man not to sign the agreement. Nonetheless, the man signed the agreement, telling the woman, “I’m a little hurt, but I guess I understand that you want to keep what you earn.” The woman signed the agreement as well.

After their wedding, the woman and the man continued to live in the woman’s condominium and to work at the jobs each held before the marriage. The man also continued to work on his novel.

Six months ago, the man’s novel was accepted by a publisher. The novel will be released next spring. The publisher has estimated that the royalties may total as much as $200,000 over the next five years.

Two months ago, the woman and the man separated. The woman remained in the condominium, now worth $400,000 as a result of market appreciation. The woman’s brokerage account, worth $500,000 when she and the man married, is now worth $1,000,000 as a result of market appreciation and additional investments that the woman made with employment bonuses she received during the marriage. The woman has made no withdrawals from this account.

One month ago, the woman won, but has not yet received, a $5 million lottery jackpot.

One week ago, the man filed for divorce. In the man’s divorce petition, he asks the court to invalidate the premarital agreement and seeks half of all assets owned by the woman, i.e., the woman’s brokerage account, her condominium, and her right to the lottery payment. The man owns no assets except for personal effects and the book contract under which he will receive future royalties based on sales of his novel.

This jurisdiction has adopted the Uniform Premarital Agreement Act, which in relevant part provides that “the party against whom enforcement [of the premarital agreement] is sought must prove (1) involuntariness or (2) both that ‘the agreement was unconscionable when it was executed’ and that he or she did not receive or waive a ‘fair and reasonable’ disclosure and ‘did not have or reasonably could not have had . . . an adequate knowledge’ of the other’s assets and obligations.”

Family Law Question

The jurisdiction's divorce law requires "equitable distribution" of all marital (community) assets and prohibits the division of separate assets.

1. Is the premarital agreement enforceable? Explain.
2. Assuming that the agreement is unenforceable, what assets are subject to division in the divorce action, and what factors should a court consider in distributing those assets? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS ANALYSIS

Secured Transactions I.B.; II.D., E.; III.B.; IV.A., B., C.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does a security interest in a store's inventory survive sale of an item of that inventory to a buyer who acquires the item in good faith in an ordinary-course transaction?
- (2) What are the rights of a seller of goods who "sells" those goods on credit to a consumer but purports to retain title to the goods until the full purchase price is paid? Do the seller's rights survive a resale of those goods by the buyer to another consumer?
- (3) Does a secured party obtain an interest in the proceeds of a debtor's sale of the secured party's collateral?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The finance company had a perfected security interest in the home entertainment system when it was owned by the retailer. The buyer acquired the home entertainment system from the retailer free of that security interest because the buyer was a buyer in ordinary course of business. Because the buyer owned the home entertainment system free of the security interest, the buyer sold it to her friend free of the finance company's interest.

The retailer had a perfected security interest in the home entertainment system while it was owned by the buyer. The friend acquired the home entertainment system from the buyer free of that security interest because both the buyer and the friend used the home entertainment system for personal purposes, the friend acquired it without knowledge of the retailer's security interest, and the retailer had not filed a financing statement with respect to its security interest.

Because the retailer had a security interest in the home entertainment system when it was owned by the buyer, the retailer obtained a security interest in the $4,000 check as proceeds of the home entertainment system. The retailer's security interest in the check was perfected because its security interest in the home entertainment system had been perfected and the check constituted "cash proceeds."

Point One (40%)

The buyer obtained the home entertainment system free of the finance company's perfected security interest because the buyer was a buyer in ordinary course of business. Because the buyer owned the home entertainment system free of the security interest, the buyer's sale to the friend was free of that interest.

The finance company had an enforceable, attached security interest in all of the retailer's inventory, including the home entertainment system later sold to the buyer. All three elements of enforceability and attachment under UCC § 9-203 were satisfied: value was given (the loan), the debtor (the retailer) had rights in the inventory, and the debtor (the retailer) authenticated a security agreement containing a description of the collateral. See UCC §§ 9-203(b), 9-203(a), and 9-108. Moreover, the finance company's security interest was perfected by the filing of the financing statement. See UCC §§ 9-308, 9-310.

As a general rule, a security interest continues notwithstanding the sale of collateral. UCC § 9-315(a)(1). But this general rule is subject to several exceptions. In particular, a "buyer in ordinary course of business" (BIOCOB) takes free of a security interest created by its seller even if the security interest was perfected. UCC § 9-320(a). Under these facts, the buyer was a BIOCOB. She appears to have bought the home entertainment system in good faith and in the ordinary course from a person in the business of selling goods of the kind (the retailer) without knowledge that the sale to her violated the rights of a third party. UCC § 1-201(b)(9). Because the buyer was a BIOCOB, she acquired the home entertainment system free of the finance company's security interest.

Under the "shelter principle," once the buyer acquired the home entertainment system free of the finance company's security interest, any subsequent transfer of the system by the buyer to someone else was also free of the finance company's security interest. Accordingly, when the friend acquired the home entertainment system from the buyer, it was free of the finance company's security interest. See FREDERICK MILLER, CARL BJERRE, AND NEIL COHEN, 9B HAWKLAND UCC SERIES § 9-320:2 [Rev.]. See also PEB Commentary No. 6, Section 9- 301(1) (March 10, 1990); UCC § 2-403(1).

Point Two (40%)

The retailer's retention of title to the home entertainment system in the credit sale to the buyer was a security interest in the system. While the security interest was automatically perfected, the friend acquired the system free of the retailer's security interest.

While the agreement between the retailer and the buyer indicated that the retailer was retaining title to the home entertainment system, the substance-over-form rules of secured transactions law indicate that the retailer's interest was not ownership but, rather, a security interest. See UCC § 1-201(b)(35) [1-201(37) in Missouri, which has not yet enacted revised Article 1 of the UCC]; see also UCC § 9-109(a)(1) (Article 9 governs any transaction regardless of form that creates a security interest in personal property by contract). All the elements of attachment and enforceability of this security interest were satisfied. (See UCC § 9-203 and the analysis in Point One above.)

The retailer's security interest was perfected even though the retailer did not file a financing statement. This is because the retailer's security interest was a "purchase-money security interest" in "consumer goods." The security interest was a purchase-money security interest because it was retained by the seller to secure payment of the remainder of the sales price. See UCC § 9-103. The home entertainment system constituted "consumer goods" because it was used primarily for personal, family, or household purposes. See UCC § 9-102(a)(23). A purchase-money security interest in consumer goods perfects upon attachment without the filing of a financing statement. UCC § 9-309(1). Therefore, the retailer's security interest in the home entertainment system was a perfected security interest while the system was owned by the buyer.

As a general rule, a security interest continues notwithstanding the sale of collateral. UCC § 9-315(a)(1). Thus, under this general rule, the retailer's security interest in the home entertainment system would continue after the buyer's sale of the system to the friend. But this general rule is subject to several exceptions. In this case, the friend acquired the system free of the retailer's security interest under the consumer-to-consumer exception in UCC § 9-320(b) because the home entertainment system was used for personal, family, or household purposes of the buyer before the sale and of the friend after the sale, and the friend acquired the system for value, without knowledge of the retailer's security interest, and before a financing statement was filed with respect to that security interest. (As noted above, the retailer was not required to file a financing statement to perfect its security interest because it was a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods.)

Point Three (20%)

Because the retailer had a perfected security interest in the home entertainment system at the time of its sale to the friend, the retailer obtained a security interest in the $4,000 check as proceeds from the sale of the system; the security interest in the check was perfected for 20 days and remained perfected thereafter because the check constituted "cash proceeds."

The check constituted "proceeds" of the home entertainment system because that term includes, inter alia, whatever is obtained on the sale of collateral. UCC § 9-102(a)(64)(A). When collateral is disposed of, a secured party automatically obtains a security interest in identifiable proceeds of the collateral. UCC § 9-315(a)(2). Accordingly, when the home entertainment system was sold by the buyer to the friend, and the buyer received the check in return, the check constituted proceeds of the home entertainment system and the retailer (which had a security interest in the system) thereby obtained a security interest in the check. Because the retailer's security interest in the system had been perfected, its security interest in the check as proceeds was perfected as well. UCC § 9-315(c). That perfection ceases after 20 days, however, unless one of three criteria in UCC § 9-315(d) is satisfied. In this case, UCC § 9-315(d)(2) was satisfied because the check was "cash proceeds." See UCC § 9-102(a)(9). Thus, the retailer's security interest in the check was continuously perfected after the sale of the system to the friend.

EVIDENCE ANALYSIS

Evidence II.C.1.; V.A.1., B.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Is a witness's out-of-court description of a robber provided to the police just minutes after viewing the robbery inadmissible hearsay?
- (1)(b) Does admission of a nontestifying witness's out-of-court statement, provided in response to police questioning just minutes after viewing the crime, violate the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment?
- (2) Is an out-of-court vocal identification of a defendant inadmissible hearsay?
- (3) Can the prosecutor introduce testimony that a criminal defendant was a known drug dealer who had been hanging around for six months constantly causing trouble?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The witness's out-of-court description of the robber is hearsay. However, the statement fits either the hearsay exception for present sense impressions or the exception for excited utterances.

Even if the statement falls within a hearsay exception, its admission may have violated the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The witness was unavailable to testify at trial, and the defendant had no opportunity to cross-examine the witness. Whether admission of this out-of-court statement violated the Confrontation Clause depends on whether the statement was testimonial. If the objective primary purpose of the witness's interrogation was to help the police to resolve an ongoing emergency—the need to apprehend an armed and dangerous robber—the witness's statement was nontestimonial and the admission of the statement did not violate the Confrontation Clause. However, if the objective primary purpose of the witness's interrogation was to help the police investigation or if the witness reasonably believed that her statement would be used at trial, her statement was testimonial and its admission violated the Confrontation Clause. A reasonable argument on this point could be made either way.

Because the victim testified at trial and could have been cross-examined, the officer's testimony that the victim had stated "That's the voice of the guy who robbed me" was admissible as a statement of vocal identification made after perceiving (hearing) the defendant.

The officer's testimony that the defendant is a "known drug dealer who had been hanging around in the area where the jewelry store is located for six months before the robbery, constantly causing trouble" was inadmissible character evidence. This evidence could not be admitted to prove that the defendant acted in conformity with his character as a drug dealer or criminal. The evidence also could not be admitted to prove other crimes, wrongs, or acts because it was too vague and served no relevant non-propensity purpose.

Point One(a) (35%)

The witness's description of the robber is hearsay. The police officer's testimony repeating that out-of-court statement was properly admitted because the statement was a present sense impression or an excited utterance.

The witness's description of the robber is an out-of-court statement. This statement was offered at trial to prove the truth of the matter asserted in the statement—that the person who perpetrated the crime matched the witness's description. Thus, the witness's statement is inadmissible hearsay, unless it falls within a hearsay exception. See FED. R. EVID. 801(c).

The witness's out-of-court statement falls within two hearsay exceptions. FED. R. EVID. 803(1) and 803(2). Both exceptions apply regardless of whether the witness (the declarant) is available to testify at trial.

First, the witness's description is admissible as a "present sense impression." Rule 803(1) permits the use of a hearsay statement "describing or explaining an event or condition made while the declarant was perceiving the event or condition or immediately thereafter." Here, the witness saw the robbery, ran across the street to the victim, and provided a description of the robber to the police officer a few minutes later. "A few minutes' pause . . . is within the period contemplated in Rule 803(1)." United States v. Obayagbona, 627 F. Supp. 329, 340 (E.D.N.Y. 1985).

Second, the witness's description of the robber is admissible as an "excited utterance." See FED. R. EVID. 803(2). The witness's description is a statement "relating to a startling event or condition made while the declarant was under the stress of excitement that it caused." Id. Here, the witness had just seen an armed robbery, which is certainly a startling event for victims and spectators. See, e.g., Cole v. Tansy, 926 F.2d 955 (10th Cir. 1991). The witness's description of the robber related to the startling event of the robbery. Moreover, the fact that the witness was wringing her hands and pacing up and down while she made the statement indicates that she was still "under the stress of excitement" of the event. See id. at 958. Finally, although the witness's description was made in response to the police officer's question, this normally has no impact on the operation of the excited utterance exception unless the police questioning was suggestive. See United States v. Phelps, 168 F.3d 1048, 1055 (8th Cir. 1999).

[NOTE: Rule 801(d)(1)(c) does not apply here because under this rule the declarant must testify and be subject to cross-examination. See Point Two.]

Point One(b) (20%)

Whether admission of the police officer's testimony repeating the witness's description of the robber violated the Confrontation Clause depends on whether the objective primary purpose of the interrogation was to assist the police to resolve an ongoing emergency or to assist in the investigation and prosecution of the crime. Here, the facts support reasonable arguments either way.

The Sixth Amendment of the Constitution gives defendants the right to confront witnesses against them. The use of an out-of-court statement by the prosecutor violates a defendant's Sixth Amendment rights, even if the statement falls within a hearsay exception, if (1) the statement was "testimonial," (2) the witness who made the statement is unavailable to testify at trial, and (3) the defendant has not had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness before trial. See Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004); JACK B. WEINSTEIN & MARGARET A. BERGER, 5 WEINSTEIN'S FEDERAL EVIDENCE 804.06[5][a] (2d ed. 1997).

In Crawford, the Supreme Court noted that statements made to police officers in the course of an interrogation are often testimonial. See id. at 52–53 ("interrogations by law enforcement officers fall squarely into that class [of testimonial statements]"). The Crawford Court also suggested that statements that a witness reasonably believed would be used as part of a criminal prosecution are testimonial. See id. at 51–52 (testimonial statements are "made under circumstances that would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial").

Two years later, in Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. 813 (2006), the Court drew a distinction between (1) statements made to the police to assist in the investigation and prosecution, which should be considered testimonial; and (2) statements made to the police to enable them to meet an ongoing emergency, which should be considered nontestimonial. Thus, after Davis, statements to the police "under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency" are nontestimonial. See id. at 822.

In Michigan v. Bryant, 562 U.S. 344 (2011), the Court elaborated on its objective "primary purpose of the interrogation" standard, noting that it requires "a combined inquiry that accounts for both the declarant and the interrogator." Id. at 367. The Bryant Court also set forth a range of factors that might be used to determine the existence of an "ongoing emergency." These include

- (1) the nature of the dispute,
- (2) the scope of the potential harm to the victim,
- (3) the threat to additional identifiable victims,
- (4) the existence of a more generalized threat to the public,
- (5) the suspect's choice of weapon, and
- (6) whether the suspect remained "at large" or had been located (but not yet apprehended) by the police and/or any other "first responders."

See id. at 362–78. Finally, in Ohio v. Clark, 135 S.Ct. 2173 (2015), the Court reiterated that "the question is whether, in light of all the circumstances, viewed objectively, the 'primary purpose' of the conversation was to 'creat[e] an out-of-court substitute for trial testimony.'" Id. at 2180 (quoting Michigan v. Bryant, 562 U.S. at 392).

Here, the witness's out-of-court statement to the police officer could be viewed as nontestimonial because it was made under emergency circumstances. A robbery had recently occurred, the dispute was not private, the suspect was apparently armed, he may have posed a threat to other victims and/or the general public, and he was still "at large." Under these circumstances, the "primary purpose of the interrogation," from the perspective of the reasonable declarant and the interrogator, could have been to assist the police to resolve an ongoing emergency. If the statement is deemed nontestimonial, its admission would not violate the Confrontation Clause.

On the other hand, there are facts that suggest that the witness's statement was testimonial. The witness provided the robber's identity in response to police questioning about a crime, the robber was no longer present at the scene, and there was no clear ongoing emergency insofar as the witness was concerned. Based on these facts, the judge could conclude that the objective "primary purpose of the interrogation" was to assist in the investigation and prosecution of the robbery. Because the witness was not available to testify and the defendant had no prior opportunity to cross-examine the witness, if the statement were deemed testimonial, its admission would violate the Confrontation Clause.

The facts support reasonable arguments either way on this issue.

Point Two (20%)

The victim's statement "That's the voice of the guy who robbed me" is admissible as an out-of-court statement of identification.

The victim's statement, "That's the voice of the guy who robbed me," is an out-of-court statement offered for the truth of the matter asserted. Nonetheless, "[a] statement . . . is not hearsay [when] [t]he declarant testifies and is subject to cross-examination about a prior statement, and the statement . . . identifies a person as someone the declarant perceived earlier." FED. R. EVID. 801(d)(1)(C). Most courts have found that statements identifying a person after hearing the person's voice qualify as statements of identification under Rule 801(d)(1)(C). See United States v. Ramirez, 45 F.3d 1096, 1101 n.1 (7th Cir. 1995). Lay witness voice identification based on prior familiarity with a voice is typically admissible unless it has been tainted by impermissibly suggestive questioning or investigative procedures. See United States v. Garcia-Alvarez, 541 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2008). Expert testimony is not normally required.

Here, because the victim testified at trial and could have been recalled and cross-examined concerning his out-of-court statement, the statement was correctly admitted under Rule 801(d)(1)(C) as a statement of identification.

The victim's statement is not hearsay under the rules, so it need not fit any of the hearsay exceptions to be admissible. However, credit could be given to examinees who conclude that the victim's statement falls within the hearsay exception for an excited utterance or a present sense impression. See Point One. The victim's statement was arguably an excited utterance because it was made in response to an event (the victim hearing the defendant's voice) that was evidently "startling" to the victim, it occurred close in time to the event, and the victim was "under the stress" of the excitement of the event when making the statement. FED. R. EVID. 803(2).

Similarly, the victim's statement was a present sense impression: it "describ[ed] . . . an event" (hearing "the voice of the guy who robbed me") and was made immediately after the event. FED. R. EVID. 803(1).

Point Three (25%)

The police officer's testimony that the defendant was a "known drug dealer who had been hanging around in the area where the jewelry store is located for six months before the robbery, constantly causing trouble" is inadmissible character evidence.

In relevant part, Federal Rule of Evidence 404(a)(1) provides that "[e]vidence of a person's character or a character trait is not admissible to prove that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with the character or trait." Here, the only apparent purpose of the police officer's testimony is to impugn the defendant's character and suggest that he is the sort of person who would commit a robbery.

The testimony is not admissible under Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b)(2), which provides that evidence of crimes, wrongs, or other acts "may be admissible for another [non-propensity] purpose, such as proving motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, absence of mistake, or lack of accident." It is unlikely that the police officer's vague reference to the defendant's "constantly causing trouble" would be considered evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts under Rule 404(b).

Even in the unlikely event that the judge concluded that a vague reference to causing trouble was evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts, this evidence does not support any relevant non-propensity issue. For example, some courts have allowed prosecutors to admit evidence of a defendant's drug habit to establish the motive for a crime (i.e., to prove that a defendant needed to acquire money to purchase more drugs), see, e.g., United States v. Cody, 498 F.3d 582, 590–91 (6th Cir. 2007). Here, there is no indication that the defendant had a drug habit or that his previous behavior provided a motive for this robbery.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP ANALYSIS

Agency and Partnership V.C.; VI.; VII.C., D.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is LLP liable to the bank on the loan undertaken by a partner acting beyond his actual authority, but within the partnership's ordinary course of business?
- (2) Is the woman personally liable to the bank on the loan it made to LLP?
- (3)(a) Did the man breach his fiduciary duties by entering into an unauthorized transaction and appropriating partnership assets for his own use?
- (3)(b) If the man breached any fiduciary duties, does the woman and/or LLP have a claim against the man?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Although the man had no actual authority to enter into the loan with the bank, the man was acting within the partnership's ordinary course of business and thus had apparent authority to bind LLP on the loan. Thus, LLP is liable on the loan.

The woman is not liable to the bank on the loan because a partner in a limited liability partnership does not incur personal liability on partnership obligations solely by reason of being a partner. The woman did not engage in any misconduct that would warrant an exception to this rule of limited liability.

The man breached his fiduciary duties (duty of care and duty of loyalty) when he wrongfully incurred LLP debt and misappropriated the $25,000 for his personal use. Either the woman or the partnership can maintain an action against the man to recover damages for losses resulting from the man's breach. The woman can also bring an accounting action to have the partnership recover damages for losses resulting from the man's breach of his duty of loyalty.

[NOTE: Because this is a limited liability partnership, the question is analyzed under the Revised Uniform Partnership Act, RUPA (1997, as revised 2013), not the prior act, Uniform Partnership Act, UPA (1914). RUPA has been adopted in the following MEE jurisdictions: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Connecticut, the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, and West Virginia. The analysis would be substantially the same in states that continue to use UPA (1914) and have adopted additional provisions for limited liability partnerships.]

Point One (30%)

LLP is liable to the bank on the loan because the man, as a partner of LLP, had apparent authority.

Even if a partner lacks actual authority, a limited liability partnership can be bound by the acts of a partner, “including the execution of an instrument in the partnership name,” if the partner was “apparently carrying on in the ordinary course the partnership business or business of the kind carried on by the partnership” RUPA § 301(1). From the bank’s perspective, the man acting as a partner had apparent authority to incur the debt because borrowing $25,000 to pay for ordinary maintenance expenses of a multi-million-dollar apartment complex was entirely consistent with LLP’s ordinary business. This is evident from the facts that the partners anticipated the need for such loans when they formed the LLP, the LLP had previously borrowed from the bank for such maintenance expenses, and the bank had previously made similar loans to other apartment complexes.

Apparent authority did not exist, however, if the bank had actual knowledge that the man lacked authority. Under the RUPA (1997), a third party is bound by a limitation of authority only if that party “knew or had notice that the partner lacked authority.” See RUPA § 301(1). Here, there are no facts suggesting that the bank had notice or knowledge of the limitation on authority. See RUPA § 103 (“knowledge” is generally limited to actual knowledge, and “notice of a fact” arises from “all the facts known to the person at the time in question”). The bank asked the man if he had authority and the man, in response, gave the bank a copy of the partnership agreement containing no limits on his authority. The man did not give the bank a copy of the statement of partnership authority evidencing the man’s lack of actual authority. Nor did the bank have knowledge of this statement, which was never filed.

[NOTE: If an examinee concludes that borrowing $25,000 was not in the ordinary course of business, then the examinee must conclude that there was no apparent authority either.]

Point Two (30%)

The woman is not personally liable to the bank on its claim under the loan agreement.

As a partner in LLP, the woman has limited liability for any partnership debts and thus is not liable to the bank. RUPA provides that a partner in a limited liability partnership is not liable for partnership obligations “solely by reason of being or acting as a partner.” RUPA § 306(c). The loan obligation arises out of contract, and thus the woman would not be liable for it unless there were some basis for asserting liability against her other than her being a partner.

Partners can become liable, however, for partnership obligations based on their own personal misconduct. Here, there is no indication of fraudulent or inequitable conduct by the woman that would justify liability for personal misconduct or piercing the entity veil. See Comments to RUPA § 306(c), (d) (limited liability irrelevant to claim of partner’s own misconduct; doctrine of “piercing the corporate veil” applies in limited liability partnerships); see also Red River Wings, Inc. v. Hoot, Inc., 751 N.W.2d 206 (N.D. 2008) (“Principles for piercing a corporate veil apply to limited liability partnerships”).

[NOTE: Under some statutes, though not RUPA, partners in a limited liability partnership may also become liable for “the negligence, wrongful acts or misconduct of any person under the partner’s direct supervision and control.” See ARIZ. REV. STAT. ANN. § 29-215(C) (Supp. 1994); see also CARTER G. BISHOP & DANIEL S. KLEINBERGER, LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES: TAX AND BUSINESS LAW ¶ 15.02[3][e][iii] (2015) (collecting limited liability partnership statutes that include supervisor liability). Under this type of statute, the bank may argue that the woman failed to supervise the man when he entered into the loan without authority. There is nothing, however, to suggest that the man warranted supervision or that the woman was negligent for not supervising the man. In a partnership, each partner is deemed to be the co-equal of the other partners, and no partner is under the control of the other partners. See RUPA § 401(h) (“Each partner has equal rights in the management and conduct of the partnership’s business”).]

By improperly obtaining the bank loan and then misappropriating the loan proceeds, the man breached his fiduciary duty of loyalty and his duty of care.

Under RUPA, a partner owes to the partnership and the other partners the duties of loyalty and care. RUPA § 409(a). Partners are liable for damages to the partnership and co-partners for breach of these duties. Claims for breach of duties by partners in a limited liability partnership are not subject to the rule of limited liability applicable to claims by outside parties. Here, the man’s conduct breached his fiduciary duty of loyalty, as well as his broader duty of care.

The fiduciary duty of loyalty includes the obligation to refrain from appropriating partnership assets for personal use. See RUPA § 404(b)(1) (partner’s duty of loyalty includes duty “to account to the partnership . . . for . . . any property, profit, or . . . benefit derived by the partner in the conduct . . . of the partnership business”). The man breached this duty by misappropriating the proceeds of the loan from the bank made to the partnership.

The duty of care, which is remediable in damages, includes a duty not to engage in intentional misconduct and knowing violations of law. See RUPA § 409(c) (partner’s duty of care includes “refraining from . . . intentional misconduct, or a knowing violation of law”). The man breached this duty by not mentioning or providing the loan officer with the statement of partnership authority, which limited his ability to borrow more than $10,000 without the other partner’s consent.

[NOTE: RUPA, as revised in 2013, treats a partner’s duty of loyalty as a fiduciary duty, the breach of which gives rise to a full range of legal and equitable remedies. On the other hand, the revision does not refer to a partner’s duty of care as a fiduciary duty, because “the duty of care applies in many non-fiduciary situations.” See Comment to RUPA § 410(c) (describing label change as “merely semantics, no change in the law is intended”). Thus, an examinee who refers to the duty of care as a fiduciary duty in the context of this question should receive full credit.]

Point Three(b) (20%)

The woman (or the partnership) can bring a direct action against the man for breaching his duties of loyalty and care. The woman can also bring an accounting action seeking to have the man pay damages to the partnership for his loyalty breach.

The duties of loyalty and care run to both “the partnership and the other partners.” See RUPA § 409(a); cf. RUPA § 404 (1997). Thus, the partnership can maintain an action against a partner for violating his fiduciary duties to the partnership and thus causing harm to the partnership. RUPA § 410(a). In addition, a partner can maintain an action against another partner, with or without an accounting, to enforce the partner’s rights under the partnership act, including an action for violations of duties. RUPA § 410(b).

Here, the woman can bring a direct action seeking to have the man make her whole for any losses to her caused by his misconduct that breached his duties of loyalty and care. She can also bring an accounting action to have the man account to the partnership for the money he took from the partnership. Although the partnership could seek damages for these breaches as well, in this two-person partnership it is unlikely that the man would agree to have the partnership sue him.

[NOTE: Some examinees might conclude that the woman can bring a direct action only for the man’s care breach, and the woman would have to pursue an accounting action with respect to the loyalty breach. Although this seems to have been the approach of RUPA (1997), this approach was abandoned in the 2013 revisions to ensure that partners can bring direct claims to protect their interests. See Comments to RUPA §§ 409, 410(b). Finally, some examinees might point out that derivative actions are not permitted on behalf of a partnership. See Comment to RUPA § 310(b) (noting that “statutory language does not contemplate derivative actions”); see also Adams v. Land Services, Inc., 194 P.3d 429 (Colo. Ct. App. 2008) (holding that UPA (1914) does not allow derivative actions). This analysis does not affect the conclusion that the woman can bring a direct action against the man for breaching his duties of loyalty and care, given that both of these duties run to both “the partnership and the other partners.” See RUPA § 409(a).]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ANALYSIS

Constitutional Law II.A.1.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) May a state enact a law that has the effect of favoring an in-state industry at the expense of an out-of-state industry where there are environmental reasons to favor the in-state industry?
- (2) May a state deny an out-of-state utility a permit to construct a coal-burning power plant because the plant, although it meets urgent out-of-state energy needs, does not meet urgent energy needs of the permitting state?
- (3) May a state favor in-state vendors when purchasing goods and services?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Even when Congress has not acted, the Commerce Clause of the United States Constitution imposes by negative implication a limitation on state laws that discriminate against or unduly burden interstate commerce.

Section 1 of the Act probably passes constitutional muster under the Commerce Clause. It is not facially discriminatory because it applies equally to in-state and out-of-state utilities; and it does not impede the import or export of electricity. The law's incidental effect of favoring an in-state industry (wind) at the expense of an out-of-state industry (natural gas production) probably does not trigger strict scrutiny. Moreover, the burden on interstate commerce is not clearly excessive in light of the in-state benefits.

Section 2 of the Act, as applied, probably does not pass constitutional muster. A state law or administrative decision that explicitly discriminates against nonresidents violates the Commerce Clause unless it is narrowly tailored to meet a legitimate, nonprotectionist purpose. The legislative ban on new coal-burning power plants, with its limited exception when State A has urgent energy needs, is discriminatory because it blocks the export of coal-produced electricity to other states. Even if reducing pollution from coal-burning power plants is a legitimate, nonprotectionist purpose, the permit denial likely fails strict scrutiny because there are other, nondiscriminatory means to accomplish the purpose.

Section 3 of the Act should pass constitutional muster. The Commerce Clause does not limit state action when the state acts as a "market participant." Thus, State A may favor in-state vendors when purchasing goods and services.

Point One (40%)

Section 1 of the Act, which requires utilities to use environmentally friendly energy sources, is probably valid given that it is not facially discriminatory against out-of-state energy producers and its discriminatory impact is not in the market being regulated (generation of electricity), but instead affects another market (natural gas production). Further, the law appears to satisfy the Pike balancing test, given that its burdens on interstate commerce are not clearly excessive in light of the putative in-state benefits.

State laws that discriminate against out-of-state commerce in favor of in-state commerce—either on their face or in practical effect—are subject to strict scrutiny and thus a nearly per se rule of invalidity. Even if not discriminatory, state laws that affect interstate commerce can also be invalidated if the burden on interstate commerce is clearly excessive in relation to the putative in-state benefits. Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc., 397 U.S. 137 (1970).

Section 1 is not facially discriminatory. Utilities may meet the requirement that 50% of their electricity come from environmentally friendly energy sources by acquiring electricity from out-of-state wind or other environmentally friendly energy sources; natural gas does not qualify as an environmentally friendly energy source regardless of where it is produced.

Section 1, however, may be discriminatory in practical effect because it favors an in-state industry (wind) over an out-of-state industry (natural gas). See Hunt v. Washington State Apple Advertising Comm'n, 432 U.S. 333 (1977) (invalidating state statute that imposed labeling requirements on out-of-state apple producers, effectively advantaging in-state apple producers). This discriminatory-impact argument, however, likely fails under Exxon Corp. v. Governor of Maryland, 437 U.S. 117 (1978) (upholding ban on refiner-owned service stations by state in which no refiners were located). In Exxon the Court read the Hunt discriminatory-impact test to apply to a direct impact on out-of-state firms in the primary market (apples) regulated by the state. Exxon, 437 U.S. at 126. In Exxon, the discriminatory impact was in a market (refining) different from the one regulated by the state (service stations), and so the state law was not found to be discriminatory. Here, the discriminatory impact of Section 1 is felt in a market (natural gas production) different from the one being regulated (generation of electricity). See also Minnesota v. Cloverleaf Creamery Co., 449 U.S. 456 (1981) (upholding state law requiring milk to be sold in paper cartons, even though it favored in-state paper industry over out-of-state plastics industry). Although evidence of protectionist motives (such as statements in the legislative history) might be relevant to whether the law is discriminatory in practical effect, see Kassel v. Consolidated Freightways Corp., 450 U.S. 662 (1981), the facts do not suggest any such motive.

Further, Section 1 does not appear to burden interstate commerce in ways that are clearly excessive in relation to the putative in-state benefits. See Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc., supra. There is no indication of an especially significant burden on interstate commerce. Cf. Bibb v. Navajo Freight Lines, Inc., 359 U.S. 520 (1959) (invalidating state law obstructing flow of interstate commerce); Edgar v. MITE Corp., 457 U.S. 624 (1982) (invalidating state law that imposed extraterritorial regulations on out-of-state activities). Conversely, the findings of the legislature indicate that the law's goal is to promote environmentally friendly energy sources, which could reduce air pollution and generate other significant local benefits (e.g., less use of water in electricity production).

Point Two (35%)

Section 2 of the Act, as applied by the Public Service Commission, is likely unconstitutional because it discriminates against out-of-state consumers by preventing the export of electricity from new coal-burning power plants. Although the environmental purposes of the law are legitimate, the law is not narrowly tailored to meet them.

Section 2 of the Act, and the Public Service Commission's denial of a permit for an out-of-state utility's coal-burning power plant, are discriminatory on their face. While a general ban on the construction of coal-burning power plants would not be discriminatory because it would treat resident and nonresident producers and consumers alike, the State A law creates an exception for the urgent energy needs of state residents only. Thus, the law treats in-state electricity consumers more favorably than out-of-state consumers and effectively bans the export of electricity from new in-state coal-burning plants. See H.P. Hood & Sons, Inc. v. du Mond, 336 U.S. 525 (1949) (invalidating denial of license for plant to process milk for export to another state).

The permit denial here discriminates against out-of-state consumers. If the application had been for the sale of electricity to meet the urgent needs of consumers in State A, the application could have been approved. Instead, it was denied because the State B utility only identified the urgent needs of consumers in State B. The case is analogous to City of Philadelphia v. New Jersey, 437 U.S. 617 (1978), where the Court invalidated a New Jersey law prohibiting the disposal of out-of-state waste in New Jersey landfills, effectively precluding the export of waste disposal services and preferring in-state consumers. In City of Philadelphia, the Court made clear that it does not matter whether the law has a legitimate environmental purpose; the state may not use discriminatory means to accomplish it.

Insofar as the law is discriminatory, it is invalid unless it is narrowly tailored to meet a legitimate, nonprotectionist purpose. See Maine v. Taylor, 477 U.S. 131 (1986) (upholding ban on importation of live baitfish because of threat of parasites introduced into in-state waters). In particular, a law is not narrowly tailored if there are less discriminatory alternative means to accomplish the state's purpose. See, e.g., Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S. 322 (1979). Thus, although reducing air pollution from coal-burning plants (the apparent reason for Section 2) may be a legitimate, nonprotectionist purpose, the law is not narrowly tailored. There are less discriminatory alternatives that would better accomplish the state's objectives, such as (1) strict environmental regulation of all in-state coal-burning power plants, (2) an across-the-board ban on all in-state coal-burning power plants (without any exception), and (3) an exception for such plants for urgent energy needs that does not discriminate against out-of-state consumers.

Point Three (25%)

Section 3, even though it discriminates against out-of-state vendors by requiring the state to prefer in-state vendors, is a valid exercise of the state's role as a "market participant."

The state may discriminate in favor of residents when buying or selling goods and services because the state is acting as a "market participant" rather than as a regulator of an economic activity. See Reeves v. Stake, 447 U.S. 429 (1980) (state-owned cement plant could confine sales to state residents during cement shortage). Thus, State A may limit its purchases to vendors in the state. See Hughes v. Alexandria Scrap Corp., 426 U.S. 794, 810 (1976) (state bounty for scrap automobiles may favor in-state processors of junked vehicles). Thus, even though the out-of-state vendor meets all of State A's requirements for an "environmentally friendly" vendor, State A is still entitled to favor in-state vendors over the out-of-state vendor.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES ANALYSIS

Decedents' Estates II.I.6.; IV.D.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did the patient's son, her health-care agent designated under a durable power of attorney, have the power to instruct the doctor to enter a DNR order?
- (2) Could the patient's son be found liable for the patient's death in a wrongful death action?
- (3) Is the patient's son barred from taking a share of the patient's estate under the state statute?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The attorney is incorrect on all counts.

An agent acting under a durable health-care power of attorney (POA) is authorized to make health-care decisions on behalf of the principal whenever the principal lacks the capacity to make a decision herself. A duly appointed agent may make decisions on behalf of the principal without the concurrence of the principal's relatives. A durable power is not dependent upon a particular diagnosis and remains in effect until and unless rescinded by the principal. Here, because the patient was unconscious and unable to make health-care decisions, the son, her duly appointed agent, was authorized to direct the doctor to enter a DNR order, even though the patient signed the power when faced with a different medical condition. The opposition of the patient's other children is irrelevant.

Typical health-care durable powers statutes provide that agents acting in "good faith" are immune from civil suit (such as a wrongful death action). Here, because there is no evidence of bad faith, the son is likely immune from liability for the patient's death.

The statute which precludes distribution of a share of a decedent's estate to an individual who caused the decedent's death should be deemed inapplicable to the son. On the facts, there is a strong argument that the son did not intentionally kill his mother. Moreover, most durable powers statutes specify that a death resulting from the withholding of treatment at the agent's directive is not to be treated as a homicide or an intentional taking of the patient's life. The statute also appears to be a form of slayer statute, which generally applies only to intentional and felonious killing.

Point One (40%)

An agent acting under a durable health-care POA is empowered to make health-care decisions whenever the principal lacks capacity to make a health-care decision. Thus, the patient's son could authorize the doctor to enter the DNR order here.

All states have adopted statutes authorizing advance directives and durable health-care powers. An advance directive (sometimes called a living will) specifies the patient's (non)treatment preferences should he or she become incapacitated. A durable health-care POA empowers a designated agent to make health-care decisions for the principal in the event of the principal's incapacity. See generally Bretton J. Hottor, A Survey of Living Will and Advanced Health Care Directives, 74 N.D. L. REV. 233 (1998) (surveying the relevant laws of all states).

Unless a durable POA specifies otherwise, a designated agent is empowered to make health-care decisions for the principal whenever the principal lacks capacity; the power is not limited to a particular illness or for a particular time period. See UNIF. HEALTH-CARE DECISIONS ACT §§ 2(c), 4; see also § 1(5) (discussed in Point Two below). Here, there is no language in the power conditioning the agent's authority to act for the principal except the patient's incapacity. Thus, the fact that the patient was motivated to execute the power because of a cancer diagnosis does not limit her designated agent's power to cancer-related decisions.

In the absence of specific instructions, a designated agent shall make decisions for the principal "in accordance with the agent's determination of the principal's best interest . . . [considering] the principal's personal values to the extent known to the agent." UNIF. HEALTH-CARE DECISIONS ACT § 2(e). Here, the facts specify that the patient's son was confident that his mother would not want to be kept on life support if permanently unconscious. Given that a cardiac arrest would substantially increase the already high risk of permanent unconsciousness, the son's instruction not to resuscitate appears to be consistent with the patient's best interest. This conclusion is arguably supported by the fact that the doctor does not seem to have disagreed with entry of a DNR order. Indeed, if the doctor did not believe that entry of a DNR order was consistent with the patient's interests and the applicable standard of care, he could—and probably should—have declined to issue a DNR order. See id. § 7(f).

Had the patient not executed a durable health-care power, a majority of the siblings would have had to agree upon health-care decisions for their mother. See id. § 5(e). However, when, as here, an agent has been designated by the patient, the agent may act on behalf of the patient without consulting family members who are not designated agents of the patient. See id. § 5(a).

[NOTE: In some cases of family conflict about treatment for an incapacitated principal, courts have required a surrogate decision maker to provide clear and convincing evidence of the patient's wishes as a precondition to withdrawing life-sustaining treatment. See In re Martin, 450 Mich. 204, 538 N.W.2d 399 (1995); In re Wendland, 26 Cal. 4th 519 (2001). However, in none of the reported cases did the surrogate hold a durable power, and at least one state high court has noted that the clear and convincing evidence requirement is not applicable to an agent with a durable power. Wendland, supra.]

Point Two (30%)

An agent who acts in good faith is not liable for damages in a wrongful death action. Here, because there is no evidence that the son did not act in good faith, he would not be liable for damages in a wrongful death action.

State laws governing durable health-care powers of attorney typically insulate an agent who has acted in good faith from civil and criminal liability. See, e.g., UNIF. HEALTH-CARE DECISIONS ACT § 9(b) (“An individual acting as an agent . . . is not subject to civil or criminal liability . . . for health-care decisions made in good faith.”). A health-care decision includes directions “to provide, withhold, or withdraw . . . all other forms of health care.” Id. § 1(6). Health care means “any care, treatment, service or procedure to maintain, diagnose, or otherwise affect an individual’s physical . . . condition.” Id. § 1(5).

Here, the son appears to have acted in good faith. The facts specify that the son was confident that the patient, his mother, would not want to be maintained in a permanently unconscious condition, there was more than a 50 percent chance of permanent unconsciousness, the patient was of advanced age, both cardiac arrest and stroke presented the risk of additional brain damage, and the doctor’s acquiescence suggests that a DNR order was consistent with the standard of care applicable to the patient. There are no facts suggesting that the son acted in bad faith. The fact that the patient named her son as agent may also indicate that she trusted his judgment and understanding of her values.

Point Three (30%)

The son is not barred from claiming a share of the patient’s estate. The statute bars claimants who “intentionally” cause the decedent’s death, which the son did not do. Moreover, the son is not the type of claimant the statute is intended to bar.

The state statute provides: “No person shall share in the estate of a decedent when he or she intentionally caused the decedent’s death.” The statute appears to be a so-called “slayer statute,” which typically bars those who have feloniously and intentionally killed a decedent from taking a portion of the decedent’s estate. See, e.g., UNIF. PROBATE CODE § 2-803(b) (person who “feloniously and intentionally kills the decedent forfeits all benefits . . .”).

Here, the statute applies to slayers who “intentionally cause[] the decedent’s death,” creating an argument that it applies to the patient’s son. Thus, statutes such as UNIF. HEALTH-CARE DECISIONS ACT § 13(b), providing that “[d]eath resulting from the withholding . . . of health care in accordance with this [Act] does not for any purpose constitute suicide or homicide . . .,” do not resolve the question whether an actor “caused” a death. However, there is a strong argument that the patient’s son did not “intentionally cause” his mother’s death as that phrase is used in the statute. Moreover, factually the son did not cause his mother’s death. The son specified only that medical personnel should not resuscitate the patient in given circumstances, and the doctor agreed and entered a DNR order on the patient’s chart. The immediate cause of the patient’s death was cardiac arrest, and it is not even clear that a resuscitation attempt would have been successful. Moreover, medical ethicists do not typically regard withholding of treatment as the cause of death, and this perspective has found judicial support. See, e.g., Woods v. Commonwealth, 142 S.W.3d 24, 45 (Ky. 2004) (“In letting die, the cause of death is seen as the underlying disease process or trauma”); accord, Baxter v. State, 224 P.3d 1211 (Mont. 2009).

Decedents' Estates Analysis

Applying the state slayer statute to the son would also be inconsistent with the typical immunity provision in power of attorney statutes. For example, Uniform Health-Care Decisions Act § 9 immunizes agents acting in good faith from civil liability (see Point Two), and disinheritance is akin to civil liability, as both result in the loss of assets to which the penalized individual is otherwise entitled. Applying the statute to the son would also undermine an important purpose of durable power of attorney statutes, ensuring that individuals can choose who makes decisions on their behalf in the event of incapacity. Individuals typically choose as agents close relatives who are potential heirs or distributees; many of these individuals would be reluctant to serve if they stood to lose a share of the estate based on making a good-faith decision which led to the principal's death.

Thus, the son should not be barred from taking a share of his mother's estate.

[NOTE: An examinee who concludes that the patient's son caused, or contributed to, his mother's death but finds that the slayer statute does not apply should receive credit.]

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is the premarital agreement enforceable under the Uniform Premarital Agreement Act?
- (2)(a) What assets owned by the man and the woman are subject to division at divorce? (2)(b) Under an equitable distribution rule, what factors will a court consider in distributing the couple's divisible assets?

Summary

DISCUSSION

Under the UPAA, adopted in this state, a premarital agreement will be enforced unless the party against whom enforcement is sought (1) did not execute the agreement voluntarily or (2) both (a) did not receive or waive fair and reasonable disclosure of assets of the other party and (b) can show that the agreement was unconscionable when executed. Here, the agreement is likely enforceable because the woman fully disclosed her assets and the facts do not support a finding that the man entered into the agreement involuntarily.

At divorce, most states permit the division of only marital or community property (i.e., property acquired during the marriage except by gift, descent, or devise). Marital property typically continues to accrue until the date a divorce is final, although some states use an earlier date, typically the date of separation or divorce filing. An increase in the value of a premarital asset resulting from significant spousal effort during marriage is divisible; an increase in the value of a premarital asset resulting solely from market appreciation remains separate. Thus, the woman's lottery winnings are probably divisible because the woman purchased the winning ticket before a divorce action was filed. The fact that the woman may receive the lottery winnings after divorce does not alter this result. The woman's condominium is not divisible marital property because it was acquired before marriage and its increased value is due to market forces. Some portion of the woman's brokerage account is divisible, as the woman made contributions with marital earnings. At least some of the man's future royalties are divisible because the man expended significant effort during the marriage on the novel from which those royalties will derive. Again, the fact that the man will receive the royalties after divorce does not alter their divisibility at divorce.

When equitably dividing marital property, courts consider need, contribution (both monetary and nonmonetary), and marital duration. Here, the marriage was short, the man is the needier spouse, and the woman has made larger financial contributions to the marriage. It is difficult to ascertain who made more nonmonetary contributions to the marriage.

Point One (35%)

Under the UPAA, a premarital agreement entered into after full disclosure of assets and obligations is binding unless it was entered into involuntarily. Here, the woman fully disclosed her assets, and the facts do not support a finding that the man signed the agreement involuntarily. Thus, the agreement is likely enforceable.

Although courts were once hostile to premarital agreements, today all states permit spouses to contract premaritally with respect to rights and obligations in property whether acquired before or during the marriage. In all states, the enforceability of such an agreement turns on three factors: voluntariness, fairness, and disclosure. How courts apply these factors varies significantly from one state to the next. In many states, an agreement is unenforceable if the party against whom enforcement is sought succeeds in showing either involuntariness, unfairness, or lack of adequate disclosure.

However, under the UPAA, which has been adopted in 25 states and the state in which this question is set, the party against whom enforcement is sought must prove (1) involuntariness or (2) both that “the agreement was unconscionable when it was executed” and that he or she did not receive or waive a “fair and reasonable” disclosure and “did not have or reasonably could not have had . . . an adequate knowledge” of the other’s assets and obligations. UPAA § 6(a). Thus, a court may not refuse to enforce a premarital agreement based on substantive unfairness unless it also finds lack of adequate disclosure or knowledge.

Here, the man cannot show inadequate disclosure because the woman gave him an accurate asset list with the agreement. Under the UPAA, the man thus must show that the execution of the agreement was involuntary in order to avoid its enforcement.

In considering whether a premarital agreement was voluntarily executed, courts look to whether there was fraud, duress, or coercion. They agree that one party’s insistence on signing the agreement as a condition of the marriage does not, of itself, render the agreement involuntary, but there is no consensus on what additional facts are sufficient to establish involuntariness. See PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF FAMILY DISSOLUTION: ANALYSIS & RECOMMENDATIONS § 7.04 cmt. c (2002). Many of the reported cases, like this one, involve a claim of involuntariness based on presentation of an agreement very close to the wedding. In analyzing whether an agreement signed under these circumstances is voluntary, courts have looked at a wide range of factors, including the difficulty of conferring with independent counsel, other reasons for proceeding with the marriage (for example, a preexisting pregnancy), and financial losses and embarrassment arising from cancellation of the wedding. The older cases tend to be more sympathetic to a spouse who receives a last-minute demand; “[i]n recent years, more courts have accepted [last-minute] agreements.” See id. § 7.04 cmt. d, reporter’s notes.

Here, the woman presented the agreement to the man only a week before the wedding. But the man had time to confer with independent counsel, and he did so. The man ultimately rejected the advice of the lawyer he consulted. The man and the woman were married at City Hall, and there are no facts suggesting any hardship that the man would have suffered from canceling or postponing the ceremony. On these facts, it is unlikely that the man can establish involuntariness. Under the UPAA, the premarital agreement thus is likely enforceable.

Point Two(a) (50%)

Assets acquired before marriage or by inheritance are separate, not marital, property. In most jurisdictions, neither separate property nor appreciation in its value is subject to division at divorce. However, significant spousal effort during the marriage that adds value to a separate asset does create divisible marital property. Thus, the woman's condominium is separate and nondivisible; the woman's lottery winnings are marital and divisible; and some portion of the woman's brokerage account and at least some of the man's royalties are also marital and divisible.

In all states (whether community property or common law jurisdictions), a divorce court may divide marital (community) property without regard to title. In this and the vast majority of jurisdictions, a divorce court may not divide separate property. In a minority of jurisdictions—so-called “hotchpot” jurisdictions—the court may divide all assets, whenever or however acquired; a few states permit the division of separate property in special circumstances, such as hardship. See J. THOMAS OLDHAM, DIVORCE, SEPARATION AND THE DISTRIBUTION OF PROPERTY § 13.02[i] n.66 (2006) (listing state regimes).

An asset is marital if it was acquired during the marriage by any means other than gift, descent, or devise. In the majority of states, marital property continues to accrue until a final divorce decree is entered. See HARRY D. KRAUSE, LINDA D. ELROD, MARSHA GARRISON, and J. THOMAS OLDHAM, FAMILY LAW CASES, COMMENTS, AND QUESTIONS 756 (6th ed. 2007). In some states, however, marital property ceases to accrue after the date of permanent separation (see, e.g., N.C. GEN. STAT. § 50-20) or the date of divorce filing (see, e.g., N.Y. DOM. REL. L. § 236B). However, expectancies created during the marriage are still marital even if payment will not be received until after the marriage ends. Even contingent expectancies such as unvested pension rights are subject to division at divorce if they were acquired through spousal effort during the marriage. See KRAUSE ET AL., supra, note at 773–76.

An asset that is initially separate property may be partially transformed into divisible marital property if marital funds or significant effort by the owner-spouse enhance its value or build equity. In the vast majority of states, the appreciation of separate assets during the marriage does not create marital property. See J. THOMAS OLDHAM, supra, § 5.03(4). But see COLO. REV. STAT. § 14-10-113.

Here, unless the woman and the man live in a state in which marital property ceases to accrue after separation, the woman's lottery award is marital property because the woman purchased the winning ticket before the man filed for divorce. It does not matter that the woman may not receive any winnings before the divorce filing.

The entire value of the woman's condominium is separate property because she purchased the condominium outright before marriage, and the facts indicate that its increased value is due entirely to market forces, not spousal efforts or marital funds.

Some portion of the woman's brokerage account is divisible marital property because the woman contributed her employment bonuses during the marriage to that account; only the portion attributable to investments the woman made before marriage remains separate.

Some, if not all, of the royalties the man will receive in the future are divisible marital property despite the fact that the man began the novel before marriage. Significant spousal effort during marriage that enhances the value of a separate asset creates marital property, and the man worked at paid employment only part-time throughout the marriage in order to work on the novel. The facts do not specify how much the man worked on the novel during the marriage. If the man completed a significant portion of the novel during the marriage, the value of the novel would be apportioned into separate and marital components. See KRAUSE ET AL., supra, at 763; Cockrill v. Cockrill, 601 P.2d 1334 (Ariz. 1979) (describing apportionment principles). It is irrelevant that the royalties will not be received until after the marriage ends. See KRAUSE ET AL., supra, at 756.

[NOTE: The above analysis applies in both common law and community property jurisdictions. Although the rules governing asset management and distribution at death vary depending on whether the jurisdiction is a common law or community property state, today, all states disregard title in defining the pool of assets available for divorce. Indeed, the marital property rules applicable in common law states are sometimes referred to as "deferred" community property.]

Point Two(b) (15%)

In dividing marital assets, divorce courts look at contribution (monetary and nonmonetary), need, and marital duration. Here, the marriage was short, the man is the needier spouse, and the woman made greater financial contributions to the marriage, contributions which may have enabled the man to complete his novel.

In an equitable distribution state, courts have broad authority to divide property fairly. Typically, either by statute or by case law, courts are given a list of relevant, non-exclusive factors to consider. Relevant factors usually include the duration of the marriage; indicators of each spouse's future needs (including age, health, resources, and occupational opportunities); and contributions of the parties to the marriage and the acquisition of assets. See OLDHAM, supra, § 13.02[1].

Here, the woman appears to have made much larger financial contributions to the marriage than the man, and she appears to be better off now than the man because of her occupation as an investment banker and her lottery winnings. The couple has no children, so the man has made no significant nonfinancial contributions as a parent; there are also no facts to suggest that he has made significant nonfinancial contributions as a homemaker. Instead, the woman's support freed the man to work on his novel.

The broad discretion given courts to distribute property equitably often makes it impossible to predict with certainty how a court will divide marital property. See IRA MARK ELLMAN ET AL., FAMILY LAW: CASES, TEXT, PROBLEMS 323 (5th ed. 2010).

[NOTE: An examinee may appropriately note that the uncertain value of the man's expected royalties may play a role in determining how a property award should be fashioned. With a pension of uncertain value to be paid in the future, courts often order payment of a specified percentage of pension payments when those payments are actually made instead of requiring the title-holding spouse to compensate the other spouse at the time of divorce.]

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the July 2016 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Civil Procedure question on the July 2016 MEE tested the following areas from the Civil Procedure outline: I.A., B., D. Jurisdiction and venue—Federal subject-matter jurisdiction (federal question, diversity, supplemental, and removal); Personal jurisdiction; Venue, forum non conveniens, and transfer.

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by user jurisdictions as part of the bar examination on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Areas of law that may be covered on the MEE include the following: Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Civil Procedure, Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts (including Article 2 [Sales] of the Uniform Commercial Code), Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Article 9 [Secured Transactions] of the Uniform Commercial Code. Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

NOTE: Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles rather than local case or statutory law.

QUESTION

Two siblings, a brother and a sister, decided to start a bike shop with their cousin. They filed a certificate of organization to form a limited liability company. The brother and the sister paid for their LLC member interests by each contributing $100,000 in cash to the LLC. Their cousin paid for his LLC member interest by conveying to the LLC five acres of farmland valued at $100,000; the LLC then recorded the deed.

Neither the certificate of organization nor the members' operating agreement specifies whether the LLC is member-managed or manager-managed. However, the operating agreement provides that the LLC's farmland may not be sold without the approval of all three members.

Following formation of the LLC, the company rented a storefront commercial space for the bike shop and opened for business.

Three months ago, purporting to act on behalf of the LLC, the brother entered into a written and signed contract to purchase 100 bike tires for $6,000 from a tire manufacturer. When the tires were delivered, the sister said that they were too expensive and told her brother to return the tires. The brother was surprised by his sister's objection because twice before he had purchased tires for the LLC at the same price from this manufacturer, and neither his sister nor their cousin had objected. The brother refused to return the tires, pointing out that the tires "are perfect for the bikes we sell." The sister responded, "Well, pay the bill with your own money; you bought them without my permission." The brother responded, "No way. I bought these for the store, I didn't need your permission, and the company will pay for them." To date, however, the $6,000 has not been paid.

One month ago, purporting to act on behalf of the LLC, the cousin sold the LLC's farmland to a third-party buyer. The buyer paid $120,000, which was well above the land's fair market value. Only after the cousin deposited the sale proceeds into the LLC bank account did the brother and sister learn of the sale. Both of them objected.

One week ago, the brother wrote in an email to his sister, "I want out of our business. I don't want to have anything to do with the bike shop anymore. Please send me a check for my share."

1. What type of LLC was created—member-managed or manager-managed? Explain.
2. Is the LLC bound under the tire contract? Explain.
3. Is the LLC bound by the sale of the farmland? Explain.
4. What is the legal effect of the brother's email? Explain.

EVIDENCE/CRIMINAL LAW & PROCEDURE QUESTION

A defendant was tried before a jury for a robbery that had occurred at Jo-Jo's Bar on November 30. At trial, the prosecutor called the police officer who had investigated the crime. Over defense counsel's objection, the officer testified as follows:

Officer: I arrived at the defendant's home on the morning of December 1, the day after the robbery. He invited me inside, and I asked him, "Did you rob Jo-Jo's Bar last night?" The defendant immediately started crying. I decided to take him to the station. Before we left for the station, I read him Miranda warnings, and he said, "Get me a lawyer," so I stopped talking to him.

Prosecutor: Did the defendant say anything to you at the station?

Officer: I think he did, but I don't remember exactly what he said.

Immediately after this testimony, the prosecutor showed the officer a handwritten document. The officer identified the document as notes she had made on December 2 concerning her interaction with the defendant on December 1. The prosecutor provided a copy of the document to defense counsel. The document, which was dated December 2, stated in its entirety:

The defendant burst into tears when asked if he had committed the robbery. He then received and invoked Miranda rights. I stopped the interrogation and didn't ask him any more questions, but as soon as we arrived at the station the defendant said, "I want to make a deal; I think I can help you." I reread Miranda warnings, and this time the defendant waived his rights and said, "I have some information that can really help you with this case." When I asked him how he could help, the defendant said, "Forget it—I want my lawyer." When the defendant's lawyer arrived 30 minutes later, the defendant was released.

The officer then testified as follows:

Prosecutor: After reviewing your notes, do you remember the events of December 1?

Officer: No, but I do remember making these notes the day after I spoke with the defendant. At that time, I remembered the conversation clearly, and I was careful to write it down accurately.

Over defense counsel's objection, the officer was permitted to read the document to the jury. The prosecutor also asked that the notes be received as an exhibit, and the court granted that request, again over defense counsel's objection. The testimony then continued:

Prosecutor: Did you speak to the defendant any time after December 1?

Officer: Following my discovery of additional evidence implicating the defendant in the robbery, I arrested him on December 20. Again, I read the defendant his Miranda rights. The defendant said that he would waive his Miranda rights. I then asked him if he was involved in the robbery of Jo-Jo's Bar, and he said, "I was there on November 30 and saw the robbery, but I had nothing to do with it."

Defense counsel objected to the admission of this testimony as well. The court overruled the objection.

The defendant's trial for robbery was held in a jurisdiction that has adopted all of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Were the following decisions by the trial court proper?

1. Admitting the officer's testimony that the defendant started crying. Explain.
2. Permitting the officer to read her handwritten notes to the jury. Explain.
3. Admitting the officer's handwritten notes into evidence as an exhibit. Explain.
4. Admitting the officer's testimony recounting the defendant's statement, "I have some information that can really help you with this case." Explain.
5. Admitting the officer's testimony recounting the defendant's statement, "I was there on November 30 and saw the robbery, but I had nothing to do with it." Explain.

TORTS QUESTION

Six months ago, a man visited his family physician, a general practitioner, for a routine examination. Based on blood tests, the physician told the man that his cholesterol level was somewhat elevated. The physician offered to prescribe a drug that lowers cholesterol, but the man stated that he did not want to start taking drugs because he preferred to try dietary change and “natural remedies” first. The physician told the man that natural remedies are not as reliable as prescription drugs and urged the man to come back in three months for another blood test. The physician also told the man about a recent research report showing that an herbal tea made from a particular herb can reduce cholesterol levels.

The man purchased the herbal tea at a health-food store and began to drink it. The man also began a cholesterol-lowering diet.

Three months ago, the man returned to his physician and underwent another blood test; the test showed that the man’s cholesterol level had declined considerably. However, the test also showed that the man had an elevated white blood cell count. The man’s test results were consistent with several different infections and some types of cancer. Over the next two weeks, the physician had the man undergo more tests. These tests showed that the man’s liver was inflamed but did not reveal the reason. The physician then referred the man to a medical specialist who had expertise in liver diseases. In the meantime, the man continued to drink the herbal tea.

Two weeks ago, just before the man’s scheduled consultation with the specialist, the man heard a news bulletin announcing that government investigators had found that the type of herbal tea that the man had been drinking was contaminated with a highly toxic pesticide. The investigation took place after liver specialists at a major medical center realized that several patients with inflamed livers and elevated white blood cell counts, like the man, were all drinking the same type of herbal tea and the specialists reported this fact to the local health department.

All commercially grown herbs used for this tea come from Country X, and are tested for pesticide residues at harvest by exporters that sell the herb in bulk to the five U.S. companies that process, package, and sell the herbal tea to retailers. U.S. investigators believe that the pesticide contamination occurred in one or more export warehouses in Country X where bulk herbs are briefly stored before sale by exporters, but they cannot determine how the contamination occurred or what bulk shipments were sent to the five U.S. companies. The companies that purchase the bulk herbs do not have any control over these warehouses, and there have been no prior incidents of pesticide contamination. The investigators have concluded that the U.S. companies that process, package, and sell the herbal tea were not negligent in failing to discover the contamination.

Packages of tea sold by different companies varied substantially in pesticide concentration and toxicity, and some packages had no contaminants. Further investigation has established that the levels of contamination and toxicity in the herbal tea marketed by the five different U.S. companies were not consistent.

The man purchased all his herbal tea from the same health-food store. The man is sure that he purchased several different brands of the herbal tea at the store, but he cannot establish which brands. The store sells all five brands of the herbal tea currently marketed in the United States.

The man has suffered permanent liver damage and has sued to recover damages for his injuries. It is undisputed that the man's liver damage was caused by his herbal tea consumption. The man's action is not preempted by any federal statute or regulation.

1. Is the physician liable to the man under tort law? Explain.
2. Are any or all of the five U.S. companies that processed, packaged, and sold the herbal tea to the health-food store liable to the man under tort law? Explain.
3. Is the health-food store liable to the man under tort law? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS/REAL PROPERTY QUESTION

Two years ago, PT Treatment Inc. (PTT), incorporated in State A, decided to build a new $90 million proton-therapy cancer treatment center in State A. The total cost to PTT for purchasing the land and constructing the building to house the treatment facility was $30 million. PTT financed the purchase and construction with $10 million of its own money and $20 million that it borrowed from Bank. To secure its obligation to Bank, PTT granted Bank a mortgage on the land and all structures erected on the land. The mortgage was properly recorded in the county real estate records office, but it was not identified as a construction mortgage.

Two months after the mortgage was recorded, PTT finalized an agreement for the purchase of proton-therapy equipment from Ion Medical Systems (Ion) for $60 million. PTT made a down payment of $14 million and signed a purchase agreement promising to pay the remaining $46 million in semi-annual payments over a 10-year period. The purchase agreement provided that Ion has a security interest in the proton-therapy equipment to secure PTT's obligation to pay the remaining purchase price. On the same day, Ion filed a properly completed financing statement with the office of the Secretary of State of State A (the central statewide filing office designated by statute), listing "PT Treatment Inc." as debtor and indicating the proton-therapy equipment as collateral.

Shortly thereafter, Ion delivered the equipment to PTT and PTT's employees installed it. The equipment was attached to the building in such a manner that, under State A law, it is considered a fixture and an interest in the equipment exists in favor of anyone with an interest in the building.

The new PTT Cancer Treatment Center opened for business last year. Unfortunately, it has not been an economic success. For a short period, PTT contracted with State A Oncology Associates (Oncology) for the latter's use of the proton-therapy equipment pursuant to a lease agreement, but Oncology failed to pay the agreed fee for the use of the equipment, so PTT terminated that arrangement. To date, PTT has been unsuccessful in its efforts to collect the amounts that Oncology still owes it. PTT's own doctors and technicians have not attracted enough business to fully utilize the cancer treatment center or generate sufficient billings to meet PTT's financial obligations. PTT currently owes Ion more than $30 million and is in default under the security agreement. Ion is concerned that PTT will soon declare bankruptcy.

In a few days, Ion will be sending a technician to the PTT facility to perform regular maintenance on the equipment. Ion is considering instructing the technician to complete the maintenance and then disable the equipment so that it cannot be used by PTT until PTT pays what it owes.

1. In view of PTT's default, if Ion disables the proton-therapy equipment, will it incur any liability to PTT? Explain.
2. If PTT does not pay its debts to either Bank or Ion, which of them has a superior claim to the proton-therapy equipment? Explain.
3. Does Ion have an enforceable and perfected security interest in any of PTT's assets other than the proton-therapy equipment? Explain.

CONTRACTS QUESTION

A homeowner and his neighbor live in houses that were built at the same time. The two houses have identical exteriors and are next to each other. The homeowner and his neighbor have not painted their houses in a long time, and the exterior paint on both houses is cracked and peeling. A retiree, who lives across the street from the homeowner and the neighbor, has complained to both of them that the peeling paint on their houses reduces property values in the neighborhood.

Last week, the homeowner contacted a professional housepainter. After some discussion, the painter and the homeowner entered into a written contract, signed by both of them, pursuant to which the painter agreed to paint the homeowner's house within 14 days and the homeowner agreed to pay the painter $6,000 no later than three days after completion of painting. The price was advantageous for the homeowner because, to paint a house of that size, most professional housepainters would have charged at least $8,000.

The day after the homeowner entered into the contract with the painter, he told his neighbor about the great deal he had made. The neighbor then stated that her parents wanted to come to town for a short visit the following month, but that she was reluctant to invite them. "This would be the first time my parents would see my house, but I can't invite them to my house with its peeling paint; I'd be too embarrassed. I'd paint the house now, but I can't afford the going rate for a good paint job."

The homeowner, who was facing cash-flow problems of his own, decided to offer the neighbor a deal that would help them both. The homeowner said that, for $500, the homeowner would allow the neighbor to take over the homeowner's rights under the contract. The homeowner said, "You'll pay me $500 and take the contract from me; the painter will paint your house instead of mine, and when he's done, you'll pay him the $6,000." The neighbor happily agreed to this idea.

The following day, the neighbor paid the homeowner $500 and the homeowner said to her, "The paint deal is now yours." The neighbor then invited her parents for the visit that had been discussed. The neighbor also remembered how annoyed the retiree had been about the condition of her house. Accordingly, she called the retiree and told him about the plans to have her house painted. The retiree responded that it was "about time."

Later that day, the homeowner and the neighbor told the painter about the deal pursuant to which the neighbor had taken over the contract from the homeowner. The painter was unhappy with the news and stated, "You can't change my deal without my consent. I will honor my commitment to paint the house I promised to paint, but I won't paint someone else's house."

There is no difference in magnitude or difficulty between the work required to paint the homeowner's house and the work required to paint the neighbor's house.

1. If the painter refuses to paint the neighbor's house, would the neighbor succeed in a breach of contract action against the painter? Explain.
2. Assuming that the neighbor would succeed in the breach of contract action against the painter, would the retiree succeed in a breach of contract action? Explain.

Contracts Question

3. If the painter paints the neighbor's house and the neighbor does not pay the $6,000 contract price, would the painter succeed in a contract claim against the neighbor? Against the homeowner? Explain.

CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

A woman and a man have both lived their entire lives in State A. The man once went to a gun show in State B where he bought a gun. Otherwise, neither the woman nor the man had ever left State A until the following events occurred.

The woman and the man went hunting for wild turkey at a State A game preserve. The man was carrying the gun he had purchased in State B. The man had permanently disabled the gun's safety features to be able to react more quickly to a turkey sighting. The man dropped the gun and it accidentally fired, inflicting a serious chest wound on the woman. The woman was immediately flown to a hospital in neighboring State C, where she underwent surgery.

One week after the shooting accident, the man traveled to State C for business and took the opportunity to visit the woman in the hospital. During the visit, the woman's attorney handed the man the summons and complaint in a suit the woman had initiated against the man in the United States District Court for the District of State C. Two days later, the woman was released from the hospital and returned home to State A where she spent weeks recovering.

The woman's complaint alleges separate claims against the man: 1) a state-law negligence claim and 2) a federal claim under the Federal Gun Safety Act (Safety Act). The Safety Act provides a cause of action for individuals harmed by gun owners who alter the safety features of a gun that has traveled in interstate commerce. The Safety Act caps damages at $100,000 per incident, but does not preempt state causes of action. The woman's complaint seeks damages of $100,000 on the Safety Act claim and $120,000 on the state-law negligence claim. Both sets of damages are sought as compensation for the physical suffering the woman experienced and the medical costs the woman incurred as a result of the shooting.

The man has moved to dismiss the complaint, asserting (a) lack of personal jurisdiction, (b) lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, and (c) improper venue. State C's jurisdictional statutes provide that state courts may exercise personal jurisdiction "to the limits allowed by the United States Constitution."

With respect to each asserted basis for dismissal, should the man's motion to dismiss be granted? Explain.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) What type of LLC is created when neither its certificate of organization nor its operating agreement specifies whether it is member-managed or manager-managed?
- (2) In a member-managed LLC, does a member who purchases goods for the business have authority (actual or apparent) to bind the LLC when the member acted without the express approval of the other members?
- (3) In a member-managed LLC, does a member who sells land on behalf of an LLC that operates a bike shop bind the LLC when the member acted without the approval of the other members as required in their operating agreement?
- (4) In a member-managed LLC, does a member who withdraws unilaterally dissolve the LLC, thus forcing a winding up of the LLC's business and distribution of its net assets?

DISCUSSION

Summary

This LLC is member-managed. The default rule is that an LLC is member-managed unless the certificate of organization or the operating agreement specifies otherwise. Thus, the brother (as a member of the LLC) had the actual and apparent authority to bind the LLC to contracts involving the carrying out of the LLC's ordinary business, such as the tire-purchase contract.

On the other hand, the LLC is not bound by the farmland sale. The cousin lacked actual authority, given the specific limitation in the LLC's operating agreement concerning sale of the company's farmland. In addition, the cousin lacked apparent authority to sell the farmland; the sale was outside the scope of the company's ordinary business and there was no other manifestation by the company that the cousin had authority to sell the farmland.

The withdrawal of the brother resulted in his dissociation from the LLC, but he has no right to payment for his member interest or to have the LLC dissolved and wound up. Instead, the brother is entitled to distributions only if and when made by the continuing members.

Point One (20%)

The LLC is member-managed, given that neither its certificate of organization nor its operating agreement specifies otherwise.

When the certificate of organization fails to specify whether the LLC is member-managed or manager-managed, the LLC is presumed to be member-managed, unless the members' operating agreement specifies how the LLC is to be managed. See REVISED UNIFORM LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANY ACT (RULLCA) § 407(a) (2006). Here, given the absence of an express election to be manager-managed in either the certificate or the operating agreement, the LLC is member-managed.

[NOTE: Some examinees may discuss whether an LLC was properly formed. This question is not raised in the call and does not warrant additional credit. Generally, an LLC is formed when the certificate of organization (a.k.a. articles of organization) is filed with the Secretary of State and the LLC has at least one member. RULLCA § 201(d)(1). Here the certificate was filed and, after the three acquired their membership interests, the LLC had at least one member.]

Point Two (20%)

The LLC is bound by the tire-purchase contract, given that the brother had both actual and apparent authority to act on behalf of the LLC.

Under RULLCA, “each member [in a member-managed LLC] has equal rights in the management and conduct of the company’s activities.” RULLCA § 407(b)(2). Thus, consistent with general agency law principles and with the approach of other acts governing LLCs, each member of a member-managed LLC can bind the company to contracts for apparently carrying on the ordinary business of the company unless the member lacks authority to do so and the other party to the contract has notice that the member lacks such authority. See, e.g., UNIFORM LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANY ACT (ULLCA) § 301(a) (1996). Thus, a member of a member-managed LLC has the authority—both actual and apparent—to bind the LLC, much as a partner in a general partnership.

Here, the brother had actual authority to bind the LLC, given that he was a member of the LLC and was carrying out the company’s ordinary business by purchasing tires for the bike shop, even though the other members had not expressly approved these purchases. He also had apparent authority, given that the tire manufacturer had previously sold tires to the bike shop and could rely on the appearance that the brother was again properly acting for the LLC.

Point Three (30%)

The LLC is likely not bound by the farmland sales contract, given that the cousin lacked actual authority under the operating agreement and lacked apparent authority because the sale was outside the ordinary course of the LLC’s activities.

Whether there is actual authority for a non-ordinary transaction depends on the operating agreement of the LLC, which governs “relations . . . between the members and the limited liability company” and “the activities of the company.” RULLCA § 110(a)(1), (3). Here, the members’ operating agreement specified that sale of the company’s land required consent of all members. Thus, the cousin did not have actual authority to transfer the land without the consent of the other two members. That the cousin sold the land above fair market value is not relevant to the question of authority.

The 2006 RULLCA does not provide for “statutory” apparent authority, but instead leaves questions of a member’s authority to agency law principles. See RULLCA § 301(a), (b) (2006) (“A person’s status as a member does not prevent or restrict law other than this [act] from imposing liability on a limited liability company because of the person’s conduct.”). Under agency law principles, the cousin lacked actual authority to sell the farmland because the LLC’s operating agreement required consent by all the members for the sale of the company’s farmland.

In addition, the cousin lacked apparent authority to sell the land because the buyer could not reasonably rely on the cousin’s sole signature on behalf of the LLC. There is no indication that the LLC made any manifestations to the third-party buyer that the cousin was authorized to enter into the sale of the farmland or that the sale of farmland by a bike shop was in the ordinary course of the LLC’s business. See RULLCA § 407(b)(4) (in a member-managed LLC, matters “outside the ordinary course of the activities of the company” require the consent of all members).

Nonetheless, some earlier LLC acts provide that, absent a contrary provision in the certificate of organization, an LLC member has authority to sign and deliver a deed of the company’s interest in real property and “the instrument is conclusive” in favor of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. See ULLCA § 301(c) (1996). Under these earlier statutes, acts of members not “in the ordinary course of the company’s business” bind the company only if authorized by the other members. Id. § 301(a)(2). Here, given that the ordinary business of the LLC was operating a bike shop, the buyer would not have been a bona fide purchaser because he should have had doubts that one LLC member alone could bind the company in the sale of land. Moreover, there is no indication that the buyer had reason to believe that the other LLC members had authorized the farmland sale.

[NOTE: Examinees might address whether the LLC could set aside the sale or seek a remedy against the cousin for his violation of fiduciary duties. This should not receive any credit, as the question asks only whether the LLC is bound by the sale of the farmland.]

Point Four (30%)

The brother’s withdrawal constitutes a “dissociation” from the LLC, but does not cause a “dissolution” and winding up of the business. Upon dissociation, he becomes entitled to distributions from the LLC only if and when made by the continuing members.

Under RULLCA, the express will of a member to withdraw results in “dissociation.” RULLCA § 602(1) (2006). Dissociation does not result in dissolution of the LLC. Dissolution under RULLCA requires the consent of all the members. Id. § 701(a)(2). Here, the brother’s email reflects an express will to withdraw, thus causing him to be dissociated from the LLC. The brother’s dissociation results in (1) loss of his rights to participate in the LLC and (2) rights to distributions (payments by the LLC) only if and when made by the continuing members. Id.

§§ 502(b), 603(a)(1), (3). He has no right to payment for his LLC interest, unless the operating agreement specifies that a withdrawing member has a right to payment upon dissociation, that the remaining members are to agree to have the LLC buy his interest, or that the other members are to consent to dissolution (and winding up of the business).

The result under the 2006 RULLCA (and other more modern LLC acts) is different from the result under some older LLC acts, including the 1996 ULLCA, which generally treat the withdrawal of a member of an at-will LLC (no term) in much the same way as the withdrawal of a partner in an at-will general partnership. See ULLCA § 601(1) (dissociation occurs on notice of member's express will to withdraw), § 603(a)(1) (dissociated member's interest in at-will LLC must be purchased by LLC), and § 701(a)(1) (providing that such interest be purchased by the LLC for "fair value" at time of dissociation).

[NOTE: Examinees might notice that the rights of a withdrawing LLC member are not like those of a partner in an at-will partnership, but rather more like those of a minority shareholder in a closely held corporation. Partner withdrawal in an at-will partnership, unless agreed otherwise, causes the dissolution of the partnership and a right to cash payment for the pro rata share of the withdrawing partner's interest, after satisfying any creditor claims. The withdrawal of a minority shareholder in a closely held corporation results neither in dissolution of the corporation nor in any right to pro rata payment of the corporation's net assets. Instead, the minority shareholder remains entitled to dividends and other distributions only if and when the board of directors (majority shareholders) chooses to authorize such payments.]

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did the admission of the officer's testimony that the defendant started crying violate the defendant's Miranda rights? Was this evidence inadmissible hearsay?
- (2) Was the officer properly permitted to read her handwritten notes to the jury?
- (3) Were the officer's notes properly received into evidence as an exhibit?
- (4) Did the admission of the officer's testimony recounting the defendant's statement "I have some information that can really help you with this case" violate the defendant's Miranda rights? Was this evidence inadmissible hearsay?
- (5) Did the admission of the officer's testimony recounting the defendant's statement "I was there on November 30 and saw the robbery, but I had nothing to do with it" violate the defendant's Miranda rights? Was this evidence inadmissible hearsay?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The trial court properly permitted the officer to testify that the defendant began crying after the officer asked him, "Did you rob Jo-Jo's Bar last night?" Crying (that does not include speaking) is not the type of compelled communication or testimony protected by the privilege against self-incrimination or the Miranda rule. Furthermore, Miranda warnings are required only when a suspect is both in custody and under interrogation. The defendant was under interrogation, but he was not in custody when he burst into tears. Finally, the defendant's crying did not raise hearsay concerns because it was not a statement.

The trial court properly permitted the officer to read her notes to the jury. Although the notes are hearsay, they are admissible under the hearsay exception for recorded recollections. They concern a matter about which the officer once had knowledge but now has inadequate recollection to testify fully and accurately, they were made by the officer at a time when the events were fresh in her memory, and she has testified that the notes are accurate. Thus, the notes were properly admitted and read into evidence.

However, the trial court erred by receiving the notes as an exhibit. A written document admitted as "recorded recollection" may be read to the jury, but it may not be received as an exhibit unless it is offered as such by the adverse party. Here, the adverse party (defense counsel) did not offer the document but, in fact, objected to its admission.

The trial court properly permitted the officer to recount the defendant's statement "I have some information that can really help you with this case." There was no Miranda violation because the defendant initiated communication with the officer. Under the Federal Rules of Evidence, the out-of-court statement is not hearsay because it is an “opposing party’s statement.”

The trial court properly permitted the officer to recount the defendant’s December 20 statement. Even though the defendant had invoked his right to counsel on December 1, the officer arrested him on December 20 and interrogated him without counsel being present. Nonetheless, the defendant’s December 20 statement—“I was there on November 30 and saw the robbery, but I had nothing to do with it.”—was properly admitted. First, at the time he was arrested on December 20, the defendant had been out of police custody for over two weeks. This was sufficient time to terminate the officer’s obligation to honor the defendant’s December 1 invocation of the right to counsel. Second, the officer gave proper Miranda warnings on December 20, prior to reinitiating interrogation, and the defendant waived his rights. Finally, under the Federal Rules of Evidence, the out-of-court statement is not hearsay because it is an opposing party’s statement.

Point One (25%)

The officer’s testimony that the defendant started crying did not violate the defendant’s Miranda rights because crying is not testimonial/communicative evidence and the defendant was not in custody when he burst into tears. This testimony is not hearsay because crying is not a statement.

The trial court properly permitted the officer to testify that the defendant began crying after she asked him, “Did you rob Jo-Jo’s Bar last night?” The testimony did not violate Miranda, because crying is not the type of compelled communication or testimony protected by the privilege against self-incrimination. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966). Miranda has consistently been interpreted to protect only testimonial/communicative evidence. See Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757, 761 (1966) (“We hold that the privilege protects an accused only from being compelled to testify against himself, or otherwise provide the State with evidence of a testimonial or communicative nature”) Here, the defendant’s crying would not be considered a testimonial communication. Doe v. U.S., 487 U.S. 201, 210 (1988) (“[I]n order to be testimonial, an accused’s communication must itself, explicitly or implicitly, relate a factual assertion or disclose information.”).

Moreover, Miranda protections apply only when a suspect is both in custody and under interrogation. The defendant was under interrogation because the officer had asked him a direct question. See Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 300 (1980) (defining interrogation as “either express questioning or its functional equivalent”). But for Miranda purposes, custody can only be established if a reasonable person under similar circumstances would believe that she was in custody. See Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 (1984). Here, when the defendant burst into tears, he was not entitled to Miranda protections, as he was not in custody because a reasonable person who had just voluntarily admitted a police officer into his home would not believe that he was in custody. See Beckwith v. United States, 425 U.S. 341 (1976) (daytime interrogation in the suspect’s home by several government agents not viewed as custody without a more “significant” deprivation of the suspect’s freedom of action).

Finally, crying does not raise hearsay concerns because it is not a statement. Hearsay is an out-of-court statement “offer[ed] in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted in the statement.” FED. R. EVID. 801(c). Here, the defendant burst into tears, but did not assert or communicate anything while he was crying.

Point Two (25%)

The notes made by the officer are hearsay, but the officer was properly permitted to read the notes to the jury as a recorded recollection. Statements by the defendant contained in the notes are nonhearsay opposing-party’s statements.

The trial court properly permitted the officer to read her notes to the jury. The document containing the officer’s notes is hearsay because it is an out-of-court statement that is “offer[ed] in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted in the statement.” FED. R. EVID. 801(c). However, the notes are admissible under the hearsay exception for recorded recollections. FED. R. EVID. 803(5). A recorded recollection is “[a] record that . . . is on a matter the witness once knew about but now cannot recall well enough to testify fully and accurately [and] was made . . . when the matter was fresh in the witness’s memory” Id. The officer’s notes are a recorded recollection because the officer, who once had knowledge of the contents of those notes, prepared them herself but had insufficient recollection of the events they described to testify fully and accurately at trial regarding those matters.

The Federal Rules of Evidence also permit the use of a writing, such as the notes, to refresh a witness’s recollection for the purpose of testifying. FED. R. EVID. 612. Here, the prosecutor’s effort to use the notes to refresh the officer’s recollection was not successful because even after reading the notes, the officer still had insufficient recollection to enable her to testify fully and accurately. However, the officer also testified that she remembered making the notes and that she was careful to write the notes correctly. Thus, the court properly admitted the notes into evidence and permitted the officer to read them to the jury. FED. R. EVID. 803(5).

The notes themselves recount additional out-of-court statements made by the defendant (a second level of hearsay), but these statements are deemed nonhearsay by the hearsay exception for out-of-court statements by opposing parties. FED. R. EVID. 801(d)(2).

Point Three (10%)

The trial court erred by receiving the officer’s notes as an exhibit.

Although the officer’s notes fit the hearsay exception for recorded recollections, under this exception “[i]f admitted, the record may be read into evidence but may be received as an exhibit only if offered by an adverse party.” FED. R. EVID. 803(5). Here, the notes were used by the prosecutor and offered as an exhibit by the prosecutor, not by an adverse party. Therefore, it was error for the court to admit them as an exhibit.

[NOTE: The officer’s notes are not admissible under the hearsay exception for public records under Federal Rule of Evidence 803(8) because the rule specifically exempts statements by law enforcement personnel when offered in a criminal case.]

Point Four (25%)

The admission of the officer's testimony recounting the defendant's statement "I have some information that can really help you with this case" did not violate the defendant's Miranda rights because the defendant initiated communication with the officer. This testimony also is not hearsay because it is an opposing-party statement.

The trial court properly permitted the officer to testify recounting the defendant's statement "I have some information that can really help you with this case." On December 1, the officer provided the defendant with Miranda warnings and the defendant invoked his right to counsel by stating, "Get me a lawyer." After the defendant's invocation of his right to counsel, the officer was required to cease the interrogation. Miranda, 384 U.S. at 474. Here, the officer immediately stopped the interrogation.

However, if a custodial suspect who has invoked his right to counsel initiates post-invocation communication with the police, the suspect's subsequent statements may be admissible. See Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981). Although a suspect's questions/comments "relating to routine incidents of the custodial relationship" will not be treated as initiation of communication with the police, Oregon v. Bradshaw, 462 U.S. 1039, 1045 (1983), statements from a suspect that clearly indicate a willingness to speak to the police about matters relating to the investigation will be treated as initiation of communication. Id. at 1045–1046.

Here, when the defendant said, "I want to make a deal; I think I can help you," he was clearly initiating communication with the officer. Following this initiation of communication by the defendant, the officer properly provided new Miranda warnings and obtained a waiver of rights. Edwards, 457 U.S. at 484–485. Admission of the defendant's subsequent statements did not violate his constitutional rights.

Finally, although the defendant's statement was made out of court because it was made by the defendant and offered by the prosecutor against the defendant, it is an opposing-party statement and not considered hearsay. FED. R. EVID. 801(d)(2).

Point Five (15%)

The admission of the officer's testimony recounting the defendant's December 20 statement "I was there on November 30 and saw the robbery, but I had nothing to do with it" did not violate the defendant's Miranda rights because, following the defendant's second invocation of his right to counsel of December 1, the defendant was released from interrogative custody for 19 days. This testimony is nonhearsay because it is an opposing-party statement.

As discussed in Point Four, on December 1 the defendant received Miranda warnings from the officer, invoked his right to counsel by saying "Get me a lawyer," initiated communication with the officer, received a fresh set of Miranda warnings, waived his rights, made a statement, and then re-invoked his right to counsel by saying, "Forget it—I want my lawyer." Following the defendant's second invocation, he was provided with counsel and released. He was not questioned again until more than two weeks later, when he was arrested and given fresh Miranda warnings.

The Supreme Court has concluded that if a suspect has been released from interrogative custody, the police obligation to honor an invocation of the Miranda right to counsel terminates after 14 days. Maryland v. Shatzer, 559 U.S. 98 (2010). Although the defendant invoked his right to counsel on December 1 by saying “Forget it—I want my lawyer,” after Shatzer, that earlier invocation by the defendant of his right to counsel was no longer binding on the officer when she re-arrested the defendant on December 20.

On December 20, the officer properly provided the defendant with new Miranda warnings. The defendant waived his rights and made a voluntary statement to the officer. Admission of the statement into evidence did not violate the defendant’s constitutional rights. Moreover, the statement is not hearsay because it is a statement by an opposing party. FED. R. EVID. 801(d)(2).

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Can the man recover damages under tort law from the physician?
- (2)(a) When may a producer of a defective product be found liable for injuries caused by that product?
- (2)(b) Can the man recover from any of the five U.S. companies when he cannot show what company's product caused his injuries?
- (3) Can the man recover damages from the health-food store?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A doctor is liable to a patient only when the evidence shows that he has failed to comply with the standard of care for the relevant specialty and medical community, and his failure causes the patient's injury. Because liver specialists did not make the link between the herbal tea and symptoms like the man's until after being presented with a group of patients, the family physician's conduct did not fall below the standard of care either at the initial consultation or thereafter.

A producer is liable in tort for a defective product that is unreasonably dangerous and that causes the plaintiff's injury. A product that does not meet the producer's own specifications is defective; an herbal tea contaminated with toxic pesticide is unreasonably dangerous.

However, the man cannot show which of the five U.S. companies who process, package, and sell the herbal tea caused his injury because he consumed more than one brand. None of the doctrines that permit a plaintiff to meet the causation requirement without direct proof of causation are available here. Thus, because the man cannot show which company caused his injury, he cannot recover against any of the five herbal tea producers.

A retail seller is strictly liable in tort for defective products it sells even if it had no control over the production process. Thus, the health-food store may be found liable to the man because the man purchased all of the herbal tea he consumed from that health-food store, and the evidence shows that the herbal tea caused the man's injury.

Point One (25%)

A doctor is liable to a patient only when the evidence shows that the doctor has failed to comply with the standard of care for the relevant specialty and medical community and the failure caused the patient's injury. Because the facts here do not establish such a failure, the physician would not be liable for the man's injury.

A medical doctor is liable to a patient only when the evidence shows that he has failed to comply with the standard of care for the relevant specialty and medical community and his failure causes the patient's injury. In assessing whether a doctor has met this test, most courts compare the doctor's conduct to national standards rather than those that prevail in his or her locality. Because the standard requires assessment of typical doctor conduct, expert testimony is almost invariably necessary to establish a doctor's negligence. See RICHARD A. EPSTEIN, TORTS § 6.2 (1999); Brune v. Belinkoff, 235 N.E.2d 793 (Mass. 1968).

Here, there are two possible negligence claims against the physician. The man might argue that the physician was negligent in suggesting that drinking the herbal tea might lower his cholesterol. The man also might argue that, in his follow-up visit, the physician was negligent in failing to determine that his symptoms were due to the herbal tea if the man could establish that the delay in diagnosis worsened his medical condition. To succeed with either argument, the man would have to show that, if the physician had complied with the standard of care for general practitioners, the man would have followed a different course of action. Additionally, the man would have to show that the physician's failure to comply with the standard of care caused him harm. Based on the available evidence, it appears highly unlikely that expert testimony will be available to make such a showing.

Here, there is no indication that the physician failed to comply with the standard of care by suggesting that this type of herbal tea lowered cholesterol levels. There is no indication that the physician was aware that this type of herbal tea would be contaminated with toxic pesticides. Moreover, there is no indication that complying with the standard of care for general practitioners would have required him to be aware of such contamination. The facts establish that the physician advised the man that a prescription drug was the most reliable method of lowering cholesterol levels and told the man to come back for another test in three months. The physician only mentioned the herbal tea when the man refused a prescription drug in favor of "natural" methods and dietary change and did so because of a recent research report. Indeed, the herbal tea may have played a role in lowering the man's cholesterol.

With respect to the physician's failure to correctly diagnose the source of the man's symptoms, the facts establish that the physician responded to the man's elevated white blood cell count promptly and ordered additional tests. After these tests revealed a liver inflammation, the physician promptly referred the man to a specialist. More importantly, the facts show that even liver specialists were able to determine the link between the herbal tea and symptoms like the man's only when they had a cluster of patients with similar symptoms and discovered that all of the patients were drinking the same herbal tea.

Thus, based on the available evidence, the physician may not be found liable to the man.

Point Two(a) (20%)

The producer of goods that cause injury to a person may be liable to the injured person in tort if the seller was negligent, if the goods were defective, or if they did not satisfy the implied warranty of merchantability. Here, the herbal tea that the man purchased was defective because it was contaminated with pesticide.

“One who sells any product in a defective condition unreasonably dangerous to the user or consumer . . . is subject to liability for physical harm thereby caused. . . .” RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 402A (1965); see also RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TORTS: PRODUCTS LIABILITY § 1 (1998).

Products that fail to meet the producer’s own specifications are typically described as having a “manufacturing” defect. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TORTS: PRODUCTS LIABILITY § 2 (1998). In the case of food products, the presence of a harmful ingredient is generally considered a manufacturing defect “if a reasonable consumer would not expect the food product to contain that ingredient.” Id. § 7. The herbal tea that the man consumed falls into the manufacturing defect category even though it is not a manufactured product in the traditional sense because a reasonable consumer would expect the herbal tea to be free of contamination when processed and packaged. Given the severe harm caused to consumers by the pesticide residue, its presence clearly rendered the product unreasonably dangerous. Thus, the processor selling tea with this defect would be liable in tort for resulting injuries.

In order to recover for injuries sustained because of a manufacturing defect, a plaintiff need not show that the producer was negligent. A producer is strictly liable whenever “the product departs from its intended design even though all possible care was exercised in the preparation and marketing of the product” Id. § 2.

The man could also rely on the implied warranty of merchantability to establish the U.S. companies’ liability. Because the sale of the herbal tea by the producers is a sale of goods, it is governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. See UCC §§ 2-102, 2-105(1). The producers are “merchant(s)” with respect to those goods (see UCC § 2-104(1)), so the contract of sale included an implied warranty of merchantability. UCC § 2-314(1). (There is no evidence that this warranty was excluded or modified in any of the contracts under which those companies sold herbal tea. See UCC § 2-316.) To be merchantable, goods must, inter alia, be “fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used.” UCC § 2-314(2)(c). Clearly, the contaminated herbal tea was not fit for the ordinary purpose for which the herbal tea is used. Thus, the producers breached the implied warranty of merchantability and are liable for that breach. See UCC §§ 2-714 – 2-715.

Under both warranty theory and strict products liability, the producers may not rely on the fact that the contamination took place before the herbal tea came into their hands to evade liability. In a warranty action, the only issue is whether the herbal tea was merchantable. How it came to be unmerchantable is irrelevant. In a strict products liability action, the issue is whether the product was defective. Thus, the man could recover against a producer of the herbal tea without proof of negligence if he could show that any given producer sold the product that caused his injury. See Point Two(b).

[NOTE #1: In some states, privity requirements may be applied to prevent the man from recovering from a seller with whom he is not in privity. However, in many states, privity rules have been relaxed or modified sufficiently to permit a remote purchaser like the man to assert an implied warranty claim against the seller of a food product.]

[NOTE #2: Some examinees might note that complete analysis of the warranty claim requires knowledge of whether the relevant contract effectively disclaimed the warranty of merchantability. However, this would not affect the tort liability claim.]

Point Two(b) (35%)

Because the man consumed several brands of the herbal tea, he cannot show which producer of the herbal tea supplied the product that caused his injury, and none of the doctrines that permit a plaintiff to meet the causation requirement without direct proof of causation are available here.

Like all tort plaintiffs, the plaintiff in a products liability action must establish that the defendant caused his injury. Had the man consumed only one brand of the herbal tea, causation might be established by showing the link between the tea's toxicity and the man's symptoms. However, the man drank the herbal tea produced by more than one producer, and he cannot link any particular defendant's product to his injury.

There are several doctrines that permit the jury to find a defendant liable when the plaintiff cannot directly meet the causation requirement. However, none of these doctrines would help the man to establish causation here.

The "market share" liability doctrine permits the jury to apportion damages based on the market shares of manufacturers of a defective product. But virtually all courts have held that this doctrine is available only if the manufacturers' defective products are fungible in relation to their capacity to cause harm. See Sindell v. Abbott Laboratories, 607 P.2d 924 (Cal. 1980) (market theory applied; DES drug was fungible product manufactured by several companies using identical formula); Skipworth v. Lead Indus. Ass'n, 690 A.2d 169, 173 (Pa. 1997) (market-share liability doctrine did not apply in lead paint case; lead paint was produced using various formulas with different amounts of lead and so differed in potential toxicity). Here, the man cannot make such a showing; what caused the man's injury was pesticide-contaminated herbal tea, and the facts specify that the contamination was not uniform. Some packages were heavily contaminated and some not at all. Thus, market-share liability is unavailable.

The "alternative liability" doctrine permits a jury to find two defendants liable when each was negligent and either could have caused the plaintiff's injuries. See Summers v. Tice, 199 P.2d 1 (Cal. 1948); RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 433B(3). Here, there are five defendants, and there is no evidence that any producer was negligent.

The "joint venture" or "joint enterprise" doctrine allows the jury to impute one defendant's tortious conduct to other defendants who are engaged in a common project or enterprise and who have made an explicit or implied agreement to engage in tortious conduct. See EPSTEIN, supra, § 9.1. Here, however, there is no evidence that the producers had any control over the warehouses in which the pesticide contamination originated, let alone that they collaborated in tortious conduct.

In sum, based on the evidence at hand, none of the producers could be held liable for the man's injury because no evidence links a particular producer to that injury and no exception to this requirement applies.

Point Three (20%)

The health-food store from which the man bought the contaminated herbal tea may be found strictly liable in tort even though the store did not produce the tea.

Strict products liability applies to all commercial sellers; even a retailer who had no control over the design and manufacture of a product may be found strictly liable if that retailer sells a defective product. Because the health-food store is a commercial seller, it may be found liable to the man for the defective herbal tea that the man purchased there. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 402A.

The man could also recover on an implied warranty theory (see Point Two(a)) against the health-food store in all jurisdictions because he was in privity with the store.

Just as with the herbal tea producers, the man has the burden of showing causation. But the facts specify that the man purchased all the herbal tea he consumed from the same health-food store. The identification problem that makes causation impossible to establish with respect to the producers thus does not arise with respect to the health-food store.

Thus the health-food store may be found liable for the man's injury based on the fact that it sold a defective product that caused the man's injury. Some states have statutes that exclude strict liability in tort for retailers who sell products in closed packages.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) When the debtor is in default under a security agreement, does the secured creditor have the right to disable equipment that is part of the collateral?
- (2) When collateral becomes a fixture, what are the relative rights of a person who has a security interest in the collateral and a mortgagee of the real property to which the collateral is affixed?
- (3) Does a person who has a security interest in equipment also have a security interest in the debtor's right to be paid by a lessee who leased the equipment? If so, is the security interest perfected?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Ion Medical Systems (Ion) has a security interest in the proton-therapy equipment and may disable that equipment after PTT's default, so long as that can be done without a breach of the peace.

While Ion has a security interest in the equipment, Bank also has a claim to that equipment under the mortgage because the equipment has become a fixture. Bank's interest is superior to that of Ion because Ion did not make a fixture filing in the real estate filing office.

PTT's rights against Oncology under the lease of the proton-therapy equipment constitute proceeds of the equipment and thus are also collateral of Ion. Because Ion's security interest in the equipment is perfected, its security interest in the lease proceeds is perfected.

Point One (40%)

Because PTT defaulted under its security agreement with Ion, Ion is entitled to take possession of the equipment that is collateral for that obligation or leave the equipment at PTT's premises and render it unusable.

Ion has an enforceable security interest in the proton-therapy equipment under the criteria set forth in UCC § 9-203(b). The security interest is enforceable because (i) Ion gave value to PTT by providing credit to PTT, which PTT used to purchase the proton-therapy equipment, (ii) PTT acquired rights in the proton-therapy equipment when it purchased the equipment from Ion, and (iii) PTT authenticated (i.e., signed or its electronic equivalent) a security agreement that described the proton-therapy equipment and granted Ion a security interest in it.

Following a debtor's default, if the collateral is "equipment," a secured party may leave the equipment in place and render it unusable. UCC § 9-609(a)(2). The secured party may pursue this option "without judicial process, if it proceeds without breach of the peace." UCC § 9-609(b)(2). (Although "breach of the peace" is not defined, courts may look to, inter alia, public harm or loss of public order.)

"Equipment" is a defined term under Article 9 of the UCC, referring to "goods other than inventory, farm products, or consumer goods." UCC § 9-102(a)(33). The term "goods" means "all things that are movable when a security interest attaches" and also includes fixtures. UCC § 9-102(a)(44). Here, the proton-therapy equipment clearly constitutes goods, and it is not inventory, farm products, or consumer goods (as those terms are defined in UCC § 9-102), so it is "equipment."

Accordingly, because PTT has defaulted, Ion is entitled to disable the equipment if it can do so without breach of the peace. UCC § 9-609(b)(2). Here, its technician will be in the facility performing routine maintenance on the equipment and can disable it at that time. The technician will be lawfully in the facility, and there is nothing to indicate that the technician would have to engage in any violent, disruptive, or illegal behavior to prevent the equipment from being used. Without some reason to believe that there will be a breach of the peace, Ion can lawfully instruct its technician to disable the equipment.

[NOTE: Examinees may note that Ion's security interest is perfected. While analysis of perfection is necessary in order to answer Point Three, it is not necessary in order to answer this question.]

Point Two (40%)

Because the equipment has become a fixture and Ion did not make an effective "fixture filing," Bank's interest in the equipment is superior to that of Ion.

Bank has a mortgage on the land and the building in which the proton-therapy equipment is housed. The facts also state that, as a result of the installation, the equipment became a fixture. Accordingly, Bank's mortgage extends to the equipment.

Ion has a perfected security interest in the proton-therapy equipment. The security interest is enforceable under UCC § 9-203(b), and thus (in the absence of an agreement to the contrary under UCC § 9-203(a)) the security interest is attached. This is because all three elements of UCC § 9-203(b) have been satisfied: "value" has been given (the proton-therapy equipment has been delivered to PTT), PTT has rights in the proton-therapy equipment, and the signed purchase agreement qualifies as a security agreement that contains a description of the collateral. Ion's security interest is perfected under UCC §§ 9-308 and 9-310 because a financing statement properly listing the debtor and indicating the collateral was filed in the office of the State A Secretary of State. (State A is the correct state in which to file the financing statement because perfection of this security interest is governed by the law of the state in which PTT is located; in this case, PTT is located in State A because, as a corporation, PTT is a "registered organization" and, thus, is located in the state under whose laws it is organized. See UCC §§ 9-301, 9-307.)

[NOTE: Inasmuch as State A is the only state mentioned in this problem, examinees who do not do this conflict-of-laws analysis should nonetheless be able to receive full credit.]

A security interest in fixtures (such as that of Ion), even if perfected, is ordinarily subordinate to a conflicting interest of an “encumbrancer . . . of the related real property,” such as Bank. UCC § 9-334(c). There are, however, a number of exceptions to this rule. One exception relates to the priority of a “purchase-money security interest” in fixtures as against an encumbrancer of the related real property. (Ion has a purchase-money security interest in the equipment because the equipment secures credit given by Ion to allow PTT to buy the equipment. UCC § 9-103.) Because the security interest of Ion is a purchase-money security interest, had Ion made a “fixture filing” before the equipment became a fixture or within 20 days thereafter, the security interest of Ion would have had priority over Bank’s mortgage. UCC § 9-334(d). Ion did not make a fixture filing, though. While Ion did perfect its security interest by filing the financing statement with the Secretary of State (see above), that financing statement did not qualify as a “fixture filing” because a fixture filing must provide a description of the real property to which the collateral is related and must be filed in the office in which a mortgage on the related real estate would be filed, not in the state’s central filing office. UCC §§ 9-501(a)(1)(B), 9-502(b). Therefore, no exception to the general rule is applicable and the security interest of Ion in the equipment is subordinate to the interest of Bank.

Point Three (20%)

Ion has a security interest in PTT’s rights under the lease with Oncology because those rights are proceeds of its collateral. Because the security interest of Ion in the equipment was perfected by filing, its security interest in the rights to payment is perfected.

A secured party that has a security interest in collateral also has a security interest in any identifiable “proceeds” of the collateral. UCC § 9-315(a)(2). Proceeds include “whatever is acquired upon the . . . lease of collateral.” UCC § 9-102(a)(64)(A). Thus, PTT’s rights under the lease with Oncology are proceeds of the proton-therapy equipment in which it has a security interest. As a result, Ion has a security interest in PTT’s rights against Oncology under the lease. UCC § 9-315(a)(2).

Whether Ion’s security interest in the rights under the lease is perfected is important because this will determine Ion’s rights compared to those of other parties who have a claim to the rights under the lease. A security interest in proceeds of collateral is perfected for at least 20 days if the security interest in the original collateral was perfected. UCC § 9-315(c). Ion’s security interest in the proton-therapy equipment was perfected by the filing of the financing statement with the Secretary of State. (See Point Two above.) As a result, Ion’s security interest in the proceeds of that equipment (the rights against Oncology under the lease) is perfected for at least 20 days. The security interest will remain perfected after the 20-day period if, inter alia, the security interest in the original collateral was perfected by a filing in the same office in which a security interest in the proceeds could be perfected by filing (see UCC § 9-315(d)). Here, PTT’s rights under the lease with Oncology constitute chattel paper because the lease evidences both a monetary obligation and a lease of specific goods. UCC § 9-102(a)(11). A security interest in chattel paper may be perfected by filing a financing statement in the Secretary of State's office in State A, the same office in which PTT filed the financing statement with respect to the equipment. See UCC § 9-501(a)(2) (state designates a single statewide office for filing of all security interests except certain real-estate-related interests). Thus, the security interest in the chattel paper (the proceeds) is perfected not only for the first 20 days but thereafter as well.

CONTRACTS ANALYSIS

Contracts I.A., A.4.; VI.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) May a contractual right to the performance of services be assigned without the obligor's consent, giving the assignee the right to enforce the contract, when the assignment would not change the obligor's duty in any material respect?
- (2) If the obligor does not perform, may a third party who would have benefitted from performance enforce the contract?
- (3) If the obligor performs the services for the assignee pursuant to the assigned contract, is the assignee liable for payment? Is the assignor liable for payment?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The homeowner's rights against the painter can be assigned to the neighbor because the substitution of neighbor for homeowner will not materially change the painter's duty or increase the painter's burden. Because those rights have been assigned, the neighbor can enforce them against the painter. The retiree cannot enforce those rights because he is not a party to the contract (either initially or by assignment) and does not qualify as a third-party beneficiary of it. The assignment of rights to the neighbor does not relieve the homeowner of his payment obligation; if the painter paints the neighbor's house and the neighbor does not pay the painter, the painter will have causes of action against both homeowner and neighbor.

Point One (45%)

The homeowner's rights against the painter are assignable because the substitution of neighbor for homeowner does not materially change the painter's duty or materially increase the burden imposed on the painter, and would not materially increase the painter's risk or chance of obtaining return performance, or materially reduce the value of the contract to him.

While contract rights are generally assignable, a contract is not assignable if the assignment (i) would materially change the duty of the obligor (here, the painter), (ii) would materially increase the burden or risk imposed on the obligor, (iii) would materially impair the obligor's chance of obtaining return performance or materially reduce the value of that return performance to the obligor, (iv) is forbidden by statute or precluded by public policy, or (v) is validly precluded by contract. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 317(2). In this case, there is no indication of a statute or public policy that would forbid or preclude the assignment, and no contractual provision prohibiting assignment. Thus, the only questions are whether the assignment would materially change the duty of the painter or increase the burden imposed on the painter, and whether the assignment would materially impair the painter's chance of obtaining return performance or materially reduce the value of that return performance to the painter.

Under these facts, which specify that there is no difference in magnitude or difficulty between the work required to paint the homeowner's house and the work required to paint the neighbor's house, the assignment from the homeowner to the neighbor does not materially increase the painter's duty or risk. The facts specify that the exterior of the neighbor's house is identical to the exterior of the homeowner's house, that both are peeling, and that the labor to paint each house would be comparable in magnitude and difficulty. Moreover, the neighbor's house is next door to the homeowner's house, so no additional travel burden would be placed on the painter by painting the neighbor's house rather than the homeowner's house. Thus, a court would likely conclude that the assignment from the homeowner to the neighbor would neither materially change the painter's duty nor materially increase the burden imposed on the painter.

There is no indication under these facts that the assignment would materially impair the painter's chance of obtaining return performance (the agreed $6,000 payment), or materially reduce the value of the contract to the painter. Id. § 317(2)(a). None of these factors is present here, particularly in light of the fact that the assignor (here, the homeowner) remains liable to pay the painter if the painter fulfills his obligation and the assignee (here, the neighbor) will be liable as well. (See Point Four below.)

All that is generally necessary for an effective assignment is (a) that the assignor manifest his or her intent to transfer the right to the assignee, without reserving any right to confirm or nullify the transfer (RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 324), and (b) that the assignee manifest assent to the assignment. Id. § 327(1). Here, both conditions are satisfied by the conversation between the homeowner and the neighbor. No action or manifestation of assent is required from the obligor. No particular form is required for the assignment. With minor exceptions not relevant here, the relevant manifestations of assent may be made either orally or in writing. Id. § 324.

If the painter does not paint the neighbor's house, the neighbor has a cause of action against the painter. Id. § 317(1) (by virtue of the assignment, "the assignor's right to performance by the obligor is extinguished . . . and the assignee acquires a right to such performance").

[NOTE: Some examinees might argue against assignability of the contract because there are inevitable differences between the paint jobs, such as the relative ease of dealing with the homeowners. If well-reasoned, such analysis should receive credit.]

Point Two (20%)

The retiree is neither an assignee of the contract nor a third-party beneficiary of the painter's promise; accordingly, the retiree cannot enforce the painter's obligations.

The retiree has no cause of action for the painter's breach. The homeowner's rights under the contract have been assigned to the neighbor, not to the retiree; therefore, the retiree may not enforce the contract as an assignee.

Moreover, the retiree does not qualify as a third-party beneficiary who can enforce the contract. While the retiree would benefit from the painter's performance of his obligations, not all who benefit from performance of a promise may enforce it. Rather, contract law distinguishes between "incidental" beneficiaries and "intended" beneficiaries, and only the latter can enforce a promise of which he or she is not the promisee. The retiree is not an intended beneficiary inasmuch as there is no indication that benefitting him was in the contemplation of any of the parties when the contract was entered into. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 302 and comment e and Illustration 16.

Point Three (35%)

The painter's right to be paid for the completed paint job is enforceable against the delegatee (the neighbor) and also against the original/delegator (the homeowner).

The transaction between the homeowner and the neighbor is not only an assignment to the neighbor of the homeowner's rights against the painter, but also a delegation to the neighbor of the homeowner's obligation to the painter. This is shown by the fact that the neighbor assented to the homeowner's idea of the neighbor paying the painter. See also RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS § 328(1) (assignment in general terms includes "a delegation of [the assignor's] unperformed duties under the contract"). As a result, if the painter completes the paint job and is not paid in accordance with the terms of the contract, then he has a cause of action against the neighbor, even though the neighbor was not a party to the original contract.

The homeowner's delegation to the neighbor of the duty to pay the painter does not, however, relieve the homeowner of that payment responsibility in the absence of the painter's agreement to the discharge of the homeowner. See id. § 318(3). As a result, if the painter is not paid in accordance with the terms of the contract, then the painter retains a cause of action against the homeowner as well.

CIVIL PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

Civil Procedure I.A., B., D.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) May the U.S. District Court for the District of State C exercise personal jurisdiction based on personal service on the man while he was temporarily in State C?
- (2)(a) Does the U.S. District Court for the District of State C have subject-matter jurisdiction over the woman's Safety Act claim?
- (2)(b) Does the U.S. District Court for the District of State C have subject-matter jurisdiction over the woman's state-law negligence claim?
- (3) Is venue proper in the U.S. District Court for the District of State C?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Personal service of process on an individual who is voluntarily physically present in a state is sufficient to give the courts of the state (including federal courts located in the state) jurisdiction over that individual. In this case, there are no facts that would warrant a departure from the ordinary rule allowing a court to exercise such "transient jurisdiction." Accordingly, the court has personal jurisdiction over the man.

The U.S. District Court for the District of State C possesses federal-question jurisdiction over the woman's Safety Act claim and supplemental jurisdiction over the woman's negligence claim.

However, the District of State C is not an appropriate venue for the woman's suit. The man does not reside there, and the events giving rise to the woman's claims occurred in State A. The fact that the woman received medical treatment and may have experienced pain and suffering in State C is not a sufficient basis for venue when the acts causing injury occurred elsewhere. The man's motion to dismiss for improper venue should be granted.

Point One (25%)

Personal service of process on the man while he was voluntarily present in State C is sufficient to warrant the U.S. District Court's exercise of personal jurisdiction over the man.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 4(k)(1)(A) provides that a federal court can take personal jurisdiction over a defendant "who is subject to the jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction in the state where the district court is located." Thus, the U.S. District Court's jurisdiction over the man in this action depends on whether the state courts of State C would take jurisdiction over the man under the circumstances of the case. The facts of the problem indicate that State C courts generally will take jurisdiction over a defendant whenever the U.S. Constitution permits them to do so.

Here, the man was personally served with process while he was voluntarily present in State C. In Burnham v. Superior Court of California, 495 U.S. 604 (1990), a unanimous Supreme Court held that a court’s exercise of such “transient jurisdiction,” i.e., jurisdiction based on physical presence alone, is generally consistent with due process. A plurality concluded that transient jurisdiction is constitutional simply “because it is one of the continuing traditions of our legal system that define the due process standard” Id. at 619 (opinion of Justice Scalia for four members of the Court). Although five members of the Court believed that tradition alone did not warrant upholding the constitutionality of transient jurisdiction, they did all agree at least that “the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment generally permits a state court to exercise jurisdiction over a defendant if he is served with process while voluntarily present in the forum State.” Id. at 629 (concurring opinion of Justice Brennan).

Here, as in Burnham, the man was physically present in State C when he was served with process, and his presence in State C was voluntary. Furthermore, given that transient jurisdiction has long been the rule in American courts, the man was on notice that his presence within State C could, upon service, subject him to personal jurisdiction. Moreover, by traveling to State C, the man availed himself of various benefits provided by State C, such as the benefits of “police, fire, and emergency medical” protection; access to the state’s transportation system; and “fruits of the State’s economy.” See id. at 637–38. At the same time, the burden on the man of defending the suit in neighboring State C is insubstantial in light of modern communication and transportation and the man’s demonstrated ability to travel to State C.

Thus, the man’s motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction should be denied.

[NOTE: Although no facts suggest that the Federal Gun Safety Act has special rules related to service of process and personal jurisdiction, some examinees may mention that possibility.]

Point Two(a) (15%)

The U.S. District Court has federal-question jurisdiction over the woman’s Safety Act claim.

Under 28 U.S.C. § 1331, district courts may exercise subject-matter jurisdiction over “all civil actions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States.” As a general rule, causes of action that are created by federal law qualify for federal-question jurisdiction while those created by state law do not. See Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149 (1908). In this case, the allegations of the woman’s well-pleaded complaint state a Safety Act claim that is created by federal law. As a result, federal-question jurisdiction exists over the woman’s Safety Act claim.

Point Two(b) (35%)

The U.S. District Court does not have diversity jurisdiction over the state-law negligence claim, but it may nonetheless hear the claim pursuant to its supplemental jurisdiction.

As noted above, the U.S. District Court for the District of State C does not have federal-question jurisdiction over the woman’s state-law negligence claim. The court also lacks diversity jurisdiction over that claim because the woman and the man are not citizens of different states. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332. State citizenship for individual U.S. citizens is determined by their domicile: the true, fixed, permanent home to which the individual intends to return when absent. See, e.g., Mas v. Perry, 489 F.2d 1396, 1399–1400 (5th Cir. 1974). The facts make clear that the woman and the man are both domiciled in (and therefore citizens of) State A, where they have lived their entire lives, and where they both currently live. While the woman was convalescing in a hospital in State C when the suit was brought, the woman exhibited no intent to change domicile, and she returned to State A upon her release from the hospital. Because both parties are State A citizens, the fundamental requirement for diversity jurisdiction is not met.

However, under 28 U.S.C. § 1367, a district court may exercise supplemental jurisdiction over claims that form part of the same “case or controversy under Article III” as claims over which the district court has original jurisdiction. It is generally understood that claims are part of the same case or controversy if they arise from a common nucleus of operative facts. See United Mine Workers of America v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 725 (1966).

Here, the woman’s Safety Act and negligence claims arise from a common nucleus of operative facts: the man’s disabling of his gun’s safety features and the resulting accidental shooting of the woman. As a result, the U.S. District Court possesses supplemental jurisdiction over the woman’s state-law negligence claim.

Although a court has power to exercise supplemental jurisdiction, it need not do so in all cases. Under § 1367(c), a “district court[] may decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction” under certain conditions, including when “the claim [over which the court has only supplemental jurisdiction] substantially predominates over the claim . . . over which the district court has original jurisdiction.”

Here, one might argue that the woman’s negligence claim substantially predominates over the federal-question claim because the damages sought on the woman’s negligence claim are larger than the damages sought on the woman’s federal claim. See, e.g., Rivera Flores v. P.R. Tel. Co., 776 F. Supp. 61, 71–72 (D.P.R. 1991) (declining supplemental jurisdiction when non-federal claims seek $6 million in damages and federal claim seeks only injunctive relief and back pay). Nonetheless, the U.S. District Court is unlikely to dismiss the negligence claim given the factual and evidentiary overlap in the two claims and the resulting efficiency of resolving them together. See Gard v. Teletronics Pacing Sys., Inc., 859 F. Supp. 1349 (D. Col. 1994) (where facts needed to prove each claim are similar or identical, it cannot be said that state claims predominate); Borough of West Mifflin v. Lancaster, 45 F.3d 780 (3rd Cir. 1995) (where state-law negligence claim is based on same facts as federal claim, “it will be the rare case” where the state issues will substantially predominate).

In short, the U.S. District Court has federal-question jurisdiction over the woman’s Safety Act claim and possesses supplemental jurisdiction over the woman’s state-law negligence claim. As a result, the man’s motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction should be denied.

Point Three (25%)

Venue is not appropriate in the U.S. District Court for the District of State C because the man does not reside in State C, the events giving rise to the woman's claims did not occur there, and there is another district (in State A) where venue would have been proper.

28 U.S.C. § 1391(b) governs venue in this action. Under § 1391(b), venue is appropriate “in (1) a judicial district in which any defendant resides, if all defendants are residents of the State in which the district is located, (2) a judicial district in which a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred, . . . or (3) if there is no district in which an action may otherwise be brought . . . , any judicial district in which any defendant is subject to the court's personal jurisdiction with respect to such action.”

The man does not reside in the district of State C, so venue cannot be based on § 1391(b)(1).

State C also does not qualify as an appropriate venue pursuant to § 1391(b)(2) because it is not “a judicial district in which a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred.” Here, the events giving rise to the woman's claims were the disabling of the gun's safety features and the accidental shooting—both of which occurred in State A. One might argue that a substantial part of the events giving rise to the claim occurred in State C because the woman received medical treatment there and, as a result, it was in State C that the woman experienced much of the harm (physical suffering and medical expenses) for which she seeks to recover damages. See, e.g., 14D CHARLES A. WRIGHT, ARTHUR R. MILLER, EDWARD H. COOPER, AND RICHARD D. FREER, FEDERAL PRACTICE & PROCEDURE § 3806 (4th ed. 2013) (in tort cases, place where harms were felt could be considered place where “substantial part of the events or omissions occurred”). However, most courts that have considered this statutory language in the context of personal injury torts have concluded that venue is proper in the district where the defendant's tortious acts occurred, but not in a district that is connected to the incident only because the plaintiff received medical treatment there. See, e.g., Wisland v. Admiral Beverage Corp., 119 F.3d 733, 736 (8th Cir. 1997) (venue is proper where alleged tortious acts occurred, not where medical treatment for injuries was received); Bryan v. Hyatt Corp., 2008 WL 205246 (E.D. Mich. 2008) (same); Arriaga v. Imperial Palace, Inc., 252 F. Supp. 2d 380, 387–88 (S.D. Tex. 2003) (same); Smith v. Fortenberry, 903 F. Supp. 1018, 1020 (E.D. La. 1995) (same).

Nor would venue be appropriate in State C on the § 1391(b)(3) grounds that the man was found there at the time of service. Although the man was in State C at the time of service, § 1391(b)(3) is a backup provision that applies only when no other district qualifies as an appropriate venue. Here, the man resides in State A and the acts giving rise to the cause of action occurred there. Accordingly, a relevant district in that state would qualify as an appropriate venue under either § 1391(b)(1) or § 1391(b)(2). So § 1391(b)(3) is inapplicable.

Thus, the man's motion to dismiss for improper venue should be granted.

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2017 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Agency question on the February 2017 MEE tested the following areas from the Agency outline: II.A.,B. Power of agent to bind principal—Authority; Apparent authority.

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by user jurisdictions as part of the bar examination on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Areas of law that may be covered on the MEE include the following: Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Civil Procedure, Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts (including Article 2 [Sales] of the Uniform Commercial Code), Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Article 9 (Secured Transactions) of the Uniform Commercial Code. Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Answer all questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

NOTE: Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles rather than local case or statutory law.

CONTRACTS QUESTION

On June 15, a professional cook had a conversation with her neighbor, an amateur gardener with no business experience who grew tomatoes for home use and to give to relatives. During the conversation, the cook mentioned that she might be interested in “branching out into making salsa” and that, if she did branch out, she would need to buy large quantities of tomatoes. Although the gardener had never sold tomatoes before, he told the cook that, if she wanted to buy tomatoes for salsa, he would be willing to sell her all the tomatoes he grew in his half-acre home garden that summer for $25 per bushel.

Later on June 15, shortly after this conversation, the cook said to the gardener, “I’m very interested in the possibility of buying tomatoes from you.” She then handed a document to the gardener and asked him to sign it. The document stated, “I offer to sell to [the cook] all the tomatoes I grow in my home garden this summer for $25 per bushel. I will hold this offer open for 14 days.”

The gardener signed the document and handed it back to the cook.

On June 19, the proprietor of a farmers’ market offered to buy all the tomatoes that the gardener grew in his home garden that summer for $35 per bushel. The gardener, happy about the chance to make more money, agreed, and the parties entered into a contract for the gardener to sell his tomatoes to the proprietor.

On June 24, the cook, who had not communicated with the gardener since the June 15 conversation, called the gardener. As soon as the cook identified herself, the gardener said, “I hope you are not calling to say that you want my tomatoes. I can’t sell them to you because I have sold them to someone else.” The cook replied, “You can’t do that. I called to accept your offer to sell me all your tomatoes for $25 per bushel. You promised to hold that offer open for 14 days. I accept your offer!”

Is the gardener bound to sell the cook all the tomatoes he grows that summer for $25 per bushel? Explain.

TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS QUESTION

Forty years ago, Settlor, a successful businesswoman, married a less-than-successful writer. Settlor and her husband had two children, a son and a daughter.

Two years ago, Settlor transferred most of her wealth into a revocable trust. Under the terms of the trust instrument, a local bank was designated as trustee, and the trustee was directed to distribute all trust income to Settlor during her lifetime. The trust instrument further provided that “upon Settlor’s death, the trustee will distribute trust principal to one or more of Settlor’s children as Settlor shall appoint by her duly probated last will or, in the absence of such appointment, to Charity.” The trust instrument also stated that Settlor’s power of revocation was exercisable only “during Settlor’s lifetime and by a written instrument.”

Following the creation of the trust, Settlor gave written direction to the trustee to accumulate trust income instead of distributing the income to Settlor as specified in the trust instrument. The trustee did so.

Six months ago, Settlor executed a valid will. The will, exercising the power of appointment created under Settlor’s revocable trust, directed the trustee of Settlor’s trust, upon Settlor’s death,

- (1) to distribute half of the trust assets to Settlor’s daughter,
- (2) to hold the other half of the trust assets in continuing trust and pay income to Settlor’s son during the son’s lifetime, and
- (3) upon the son’s death, to distribute the trust principal in equal shares to the son’s surviving children (grandchildren of Settlor).

Settlor also bequeathed $50,000 “to my descendants, other than my children, in equal shares,” and she left the residue of her estate to her husband, whom she also named as the executor of her estate.

Two months ago, Settlor died. At Settlor’s death, the trust assets were worth $500,000 and Settlor’s probate assets were worth $100,000. Settlor was survived by her husband, her daughter, her son, and her son’s child (Settlor’s grandchild, age 18).

A statute in this jurisdiction provides that a decedent’s surviving spouse is entitled to a “one-third elective share of the decedent’s probate estate.” There are no other relevant statutes.

1. Was it proper for the trustee to accumulate trust income during Settlor’s lifetime? Explain.
2. Under Settlor’s will and the trust instrument, what, if any, is Charity’s interest in the trust assets? Explain.
3. Does Settlor’s husband have a valid claim to any trust or probate assets? Explain.

FAMILY LAW/CONFLICT OF LAWS QUESTION

In 2005, Andrew and Brenda began living together in State A while both were attending college there. Andrew proposed marriage to Brenda, but she refused. However, after learning that she was pregnant, Brenda told Andrew that she wanted to marry him before the baby was born. Andrew was thrilled and told her that they were already married “in the eyes of God.” Brenda agreed.

Andrew and Brenda did not obtain a marriage license or have a formal wedding. Nonetheless, Brenda started using Andrew’s last name even before their daughter, Chloe, was born. After Andrew graduated from college and started a new job, he listed Brenda as his spouse so that she could qualify for benefits through Andrew’s employer. They also filed joint income tax returns.

In March 2007, just after Chloe’s first birthday, Andrew and Brenda decided to separate. They had little property to divide and readily agreed to its disposition. Andrew agreed that Brenda should have sole custody of Chloe, and Brenda, desiring the cleanest break possible, agreed that Andrew would not be responsible for any child support. Andrew told Brenda that no formal divorce was necessary because they had never formally married.

In June 2007, Brenda and Chloe moved to start a new life in State B. Andrew sent Chloe an occasional card or birthday gift, but otherwise maintained no contact with Chloe or Brenda. Not long after settling in State B, Brenda met and fell in love with Daniel.

In 2008, Brenda and Daniel obtained a State B marriage license and wed. Thereafter, Daniel formed a close and loving bond with Chloe. Indeed, with only very infrequent contact from Andrew, Chloe regarded Daniel as her father and called him “Dad.”

In January 2017, Brenda purchased a lottery ticket. The ticket won a jackpot of $5 million, which was paid that month. Shortly thereafter, Brenda informed Daniel that she wanted a divorce and that she intended to use her lottery winnings to launch a new life with Chloe in a distant state and break off all contact with Daniel. When Chloe learned about this, she became very upset because she continues to regard Daniel as her father.

State A recognizes common law marriage. State B formerly allowed common law marriage until a statute, enacted in 2001, prospectively barred the creation of new common law marriages within the state. Neither State A nor State B is a community-property state.

1. On what basis, if any, would Andrew have a claim to a share of Brenda’s lottery winnings? Explain.
2. Assuming that Andrew and Brenda have a valid marriage, on what basis, if any, would Daniel have a claim to a share of Brenda’s lottery winnings? Explain.
3. If Brenda cuts off all contact between Chloe and Daniel, can Daniel obtain court-ordered visitation with Chloe? Explain.

CORPORATIONS QUESTION

A shareholder owns 100 shares of MEGA Inc., a publicly traded corporation. MEGA is incorporated in State A, which has adopted the Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA).

The shareholder read a news story in a leading financial newspaper reporting that MEGA had entered into agreements to open new factories in Country X. According to the story, MEGA had paid large bribes to Country X government officials to seal the deals. If made, these bribes would be illegal under U.S. law, exposing MEGA to significant civil and criminal penalties.

On May 1, the shareholder sent a letter to MEGA asking to inspect the minutes of meetings of MEGA's board of directors relating to the Country X factories mentioned in the news story, along with any accounting records not publicly available relevant to the alleged foreign bribes. The shareholder explained that she was seeking the information to decide whether to sue MEGA's directors for permitting such possible illegal conduct.

In her letter, the shareholder also demanded that the MEGA board investigate the possible illegal bribes described in the news story and take corrective measures if any illegality had occurred.

On June 1, MEGA responded to the shareholder in a letter, which stated in relevant part:

The corporation will not give you access to any corporate documents or take any action regarding the matters raised in your letter. We cannot satisfy the whim of every MEGA shareholder based on unsubstantiated news stories. Furthermore, given our continuing operations in Country X, the board of directors will not investigate or take any other action regarding the matters raised in your letter because doing so would not be in the best interest of the corporation.

On October 1, the shareholder filed a lawsuit in a State A court. Her petition includes (1) a claim against MEGA seeking inspection of the documents previously requested and (2) a derivative claim against all of the MEGA directors alleging a breach of their fiduciary duties for failing to investigate and take action concerning the alleged foreign bribes.

MEGA's board has asked the corporation's general counsel the following questions:

- (1) Is the shareholder entitled to inspect the documents she requested?
- (2) May the board obtain dismissal of the shareholder's derivative claim if the board concludes that it is not in the corporation's best interest to continue the lawsuit, even though the board has not investigated the allegations of illegal foreign bribes?
- (3) Is the board's decision not to investigate or take further action with respect to alleged illegal foreign bribes consistent with the directors' duty to act in good faith, and is that decision protected by the business judgment rule?

How should the general counsel answer these questions? Explain.

AGENCY QUESTION

An inventor retained a woman to act as his agent to purchase 25 computer chips, 25 blue lenses, and 25 lawn mower shutoff switches. The inventor told her to purchase only:

- Series A computer chips,
- blue lenses that cost no more than $300 each, and
- shutoff switches that could shut down a lawn mower in less than one second after the mower hits a foreign object.

The woman contacted a chip manufacturer to purchase the Series A computer chips. She told the manufacturer that she was the inventor's agent and that she wanted to purchase 25 Series A computer chips on his behalf. The manufacturer told her that the Series A chips cost $800 each but that she could buy Series B chips, with functionality similar to that of the Series A chips, for only $90 each. Without discussing this with the inventor, the woman agreed to purchase 25 Series B chips, signing the contract with the chip manufacturer "as agent" of the inventor. The Series B chips were shipped to her, but when she then took them to the inventor and explained what a great deal she had gotten, the inventor refused to accept them. He has also refused to pay the manufacturer for them.

The woman also contacted a lens manufacturer for the purchase of the blue lenses. She signed a contract in her name alone for the purchase of 25 blue lenses at $295 per lens. She did not tell the lens manufacturer that she was acting as anyone's agent. The lenses were shipped to her, but when she took them to the inventor, he refused to accept them because he had decided that it would be better to use red lenses. The inventor has refused to pay for the blue lenses.

The woman also contacted a switch manufacturer to purchase shutoff switches. She signed a contract in her name alone for switches that would shut down a lawn mower in less than five seconds, a substantially slower reaction time than the inventor had specified to her. When she signed the contract, she told the manufacturer that she was acting as someone's agent but did not disclose the identity of her principal. The switches were shipped to her. Although the inventor recognized that the switches were not what the woman had been told to buy, he nonetheless used them to build lawn mowers, but now refuses to pay the manufacturer for them.

All elements of contract formation and enforceability are satisfied with respect to each contract.

1. Who is liable to the chip manufacturer: the inventor, the woman, or both? Explain.
2. Who is liable to the blue-lens manufacturer: the inventor, the woman, or both? Explain.
3. Who is liable to the shutoff-switch manufacturer: the inventor, the woman, or both? Explain.

REAL PROPERTY QUESTION

On January 1, 2015, a landlord who owned a multi-unit apartment building consisting only of one-bedroom apartments leased an apartment in the building to a tenant for a two-year term ending on December 31, 2016, at a monthly rent of $2,000. The tenant immediately took possession of the apartment.

The lease contained the following provision:

Tenant shall not assign this lease without the Landlord's written consent. An assignment without such consent shall be void and, at the option of the Landlord, the Landlord may terminate the lease.

On May 1, 2015, the tenant learned that her employer was transferring her to a job overseas to begin on August 1, 2015. On May 2, the tenant emailed the landlord that she needed to vacate the apartment on August 1, but that she had found a well-to-do and well-respected lawyer in the community who was willing to take over the balance of the lease term at the same rent. The landlord immediately emailed the tenant that he would not consent to the lawyer taking over the lease. He wrote, "I don't rent to lawyers because I've learned from personal experiences with them as tenants that they argue about everything, make unreasonable demands, and make my life miserable. Find somebody else."

On July 25, 2015, the tenant vacated the apartment and removed all her personal property from it. She left the apartment keys in an envelope in the landlord's mail slot. The envelope also contained a note in which the tenant wrote, "As you know, I am moving overseas and won't be back before my lease ends. So here are the keys. I won't pay you any rent from August 1 on."

On July 26, 2015, the landlord sent the tenant an email acknowledging that he had found the keys and the note. In that email, the landlord wrote: "Although this is a problem you created, I want to be a nice guy and help you out. I feel pretty confident that I can find a suitable tenant who is not a lawyer to rent your apartment."

As of August 1, 2015, the landlord had four apartments, including the tenant's apartment, for rent in the building. The landlord put an "Apartments for Rent" sign in front of the apartment building and placed advertisements in the newspaper and on a website listing all the apartments for rent. However, because of a recent precipitous decline in the local residential rental property market, the landlord listed the apartments for a monthly rent of $1,000. The landlord showed all four vacant apartments, including the tenant's apartment, to each prospective tenant.

By September 1, 2015, the landlord was able to rent only two of the apartments at $1,000. The landlord was unable to rent the two remaining apartments, including the tenant's, at any price throughout the rest of 2015 and all of 2016, notwithstanding his continued efforts to rent them.

On January 2, 2017, the landlord sued the tenant to recover 17 months of unpaid rent, covering the period August 1, 2015, through December 31, 2016.

Identify and evaluate the arguments available to the landlord and the tenant regarding the landlord's claim to 17 months of unpaid rent.

CONTRACTS ANALYSIS

CTR I.A.1.; B.1.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) What body of contract law governs the dealings between the gardener and the cook?
- (2) Was the gardener entitled to revoke his offer before the cook accepted it?
- (3) Did the gardener revoke that offer before the cook accepted it, thereby preventing the formation of a contract?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Because tomatoes are “goods,” the gardener-cook transaction is within the scope of Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), although common law principles remain applicable to the extent that they are not displaced by the UCC. The gardener made an offer to the cook to sell the cook his tomatoes for $25 per bushel and promised to hold that offer open for 14 days. That promise was not supported by consideration, however, and it is not binding on the gardener because no exception in the UCC overrides the requirement of consideration in order to make such a promise binding. The gardener revoked that offer before the cook accepted it when he informed the cook that he had sold his tomatoes to the proprietor of the farmers’ market before the cook told the gardener that she accepted the offer. Thus, the gardener’s revocation is effective and the gardener is not bound to sell the tomatoes to the cook.

Point One (10%)

Tomatoes are “goods,” and, therefore, the transaction between the cook and the gardener is governed by Article 2 of the UCC. Further, the document signed by the gardener was an “offer” for a contract under the UCC.

UCC Article 2 governs “transactions in goods.” UCC § 2-102. The term “goods” includes, among other things, growing crops (such as tomatoes). UCC § 2-105(1). Thus, the transaction in question is a transaction in goods that is governed by Article 2 of the UCC. Common law principles remain applicable, though, to the extent not displaced by the UCC. UCC § 1-103(b).

The document signed by the gardener, which was capable of being accepted, constituted an “offer” for a contract under UCC § 2-206. See also Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 24.

Point Two (60%)

Generally, an offer to buy or sell goods may be revoked at any time before acceptance unless the offeror promised to hold the offer open and that promise is supported by consideration, or revocation of the offer is barred by UCC § 2-205.

Contracts Analysis

A person makes an offer when the person communicates to another a statement of “willingness to enter into a bargain, so made as to justify” the other person “in understanding that his assent to that bargain is invited and will conclude it.” Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 24; Nordyne, Inc. v. Int’l Controls & Measurements Corp., 262 F.3d 843 (8th Cir. 2001). Here, the gardener’s statement in the document that he signed was an offer because it expressed the gardener’s willingness to enter into a bargain in a way that justified the cook in understanding that assent would create a contract.

Under the common law of contracts, an offer may be revoked by the offeror at any time before acceptance unless an option contract is created limiting the power of revocation. Restatement (Second) of Contracts §§ 25, 87. No option contract is created here because there was no consideration for the gardener’s promise to keep the offer open, and there was no writing reciting a purported consideration. Id. § 25, cmt. c, and § 87(1)(a). As a result, the promise to hold the offer open is not enforceable under the general rule requiring consideration for such a promise.

As the Restatement notes, a promise to hold an offer open may also be made binding by statute. Id. § 87(1)(b). Because the tomatoes constitute goods, Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code is the relevant statute. In some circumstances, the “firm offer” rule in UCC § 2-205 makes a promise to hold open an offer to buy or sell goods binding even in the absence of consideration. UCC § 2-205 does not apply in this situation, however, because it applies only to an offer by a “merchant.” The term “merchant” is defined in UCC § 2-104(1) as “a person who deals in goods of the kind or otherwise by his occupation holds himself out as having knowledge or skill peculiar to the practices or goods involved in the transaction . . .” Here, the gardener is an amateur gardener with no business experience who has never sold tomatoes. Under these facts, the gardener is not a merchant. As a result, UCC § 2-205 does not make the gardener’s promise to hold the offer open binding in the absence of consideration.

In some cases, “an offer which the offeror should reasonably expect to induce action or forbearance of a substantial character on the part of the offeree before acceptance and which does induce such action or forbearance is binding as an option contract.” Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 87(2). There is nothing in these facts, however, that would justify application of this rule.

In sum, the gardener was not bound by his promise to hold the offer open for 14 days and could revoke it at any time.

[NOTE: Even if the gardener were a merchant, UCC § 2-205 would not prevent revocation of this offer. This is because the promise to hold the offer open was on a form supplied by the cook (the offeree) and UCC § 2-205 requires that, when the term of assurance is on a form supplied by the offeree, that term of assurance must be “separately signed” by the offeror. There is no indication that the promise to hold the offer open was separately signed by the gardener (such as by placing his initials next to that sentence).]

[NOTE: Nonetheless, an examinee should receive credit if he or she concludes that the gardener had become a merchant by virtue of the sale of all of his tomato crop and then goes on to discuss the gardener's liability to the cook under a theory of promissory estoppel.]

Point Three (30%)

The gardener revoked his offer to sell all his tomatoes to the cook for $25 per bushel when he told her that he could not sell the tomatoes to her because he had sold them to someone else before the cook told him that she accepted his offer.

An offer is revoked when the offeree "receives from the offeror a manifestation of an intention not to enter into the proposed contract." Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 42; Normile v. Miller, 326 S.E.2d 11 (N.C. 1985) ("notice of the offeror's revocation must be communicated to the offeree to effectively terminate the offeree's power to accept the offer"). Here, the gardener told the cook that he could not sell her tomatoes because he had sold them to the proprietor of the farmers' market. The gardener's statement is a clear manifestation of an intention not to enter into the proposed contract and is a revocation of the gardener's offer to sell his tomatoes to the cook. The revocation occurred before the cook accepted the gardener's offer. Thus, the cook's power to accept the offer and create the contract was terminated before her acceptance and there is no contract between them with respect to the tomatoes. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 36(1)(c).

TRUSTS AND FUTURE INTERESTS ANALYSIS

TRU I.C.1., G., I.5.; II.D.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Can the trustee of a revocable trust, who is required by the terms of the trust instrument to pay all trust income to the settlor, accumulate income upon the settlor's written direction?
- (2)(a) Can the holder of a testamentary power of appointment exercisable in favor of the holder's children exercise the power by appointing trust assets to the holder's grandchildren?
- (2)(b) Who takes trust assets that have been impermissibly appointed?
- (3) Can the surviving spouse of the decedent settlor of a revocable trust claim an elective share of assets in that trust even though the spouse is not a named beneficiary of the trust?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A trustee is obligated to administer a trust in accordance with the trust terms. However, when the settlor of a trust has the power to revoke, she also has the power to amend the terms of the trust. Here, the trust was revocable, Settlor had the power to amend, and the accumulation of trust income at Settlor's written direction was the equivalent of an amendment to the trust. Thus, the trustee properly accumulated trust income.

A power of appointment can only be exercised in favor of a permissible object of the power; any property impermissibly appointed passes to the taker in default of appointment. Here, the trust instrument gave Settlor a special testamentary power of appointment; the only permissible objects of the power were Settlor's son and daughter. Thus, Settlor's appointment of trust assets to her grandchildren was impermissible. Settlor's testamentary appointment to the son's children cannot be treated as a valid trust amendment because Settlor's retained power of revocation was exercisable only during her lifetime and, here, the appointment was by her will. Because the testamentary appointment of trust assets to the son's children was impermissible, the share that would have passed to them upon the son's death passes to Charity, the taker in default of appointment.

The power to appoint trust assets includes the power to appoint in further trust. Thus, Settlor's appointment of her son's share of trust assets in trust was proper. Accordingly, Charity cannot reach the son's interest in the trust by claiming that the appointment to the son in trust was impermissible.

Settlor's husband is entitled to a one-third elective share of the probate estate. If he could not reach the trust assets, he would not make the election but would merely claim the $50,000 left to him under the will, as that amount exceeds one-third of the probate estate. If, as is more likely, he could reach the trust assets, the probate and trust estates would have an aggregated value of $600,000 and he would be entitled to a $200,000 elective share. Presumably, in satisfying that share he would take $50,000 from the probate estate, which was left to him by Settlor's will, and the rest from the trust.

Point One (25%)

It was proper for the trustee to accumulate trust income because Settlor retained a power to revoke the trust during her lifetime in a written instrument, and the trustee accumulated income based on written directions from Settlor during her lifetime.

A retained power to revoke a trust includes the power to modify or amend the trust instrument. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 63 cmt. (g). Courts have taken this position to avoid the triumph of form over substance; the contrary position would require a settlor who wants to amend a trust and lacks clear authority to do so to first revoke, and then to completely restate, the terms of the trust with the intended amendment. Such cumbersome formalities should not be encouraged; thus, the power to revoke includes the power to amend.

The Uniform Trust Code (UTC) follows this approach; under UTC § 602, a trust is both revocable and amendable unless the trust instrument expressly provides otherwise. Under the UTC, the power to revoke or amend is exercisable by will unless, as here, the trust instrument provides otherwise. See Unif. Trust Code § 602(c).

Here, the trust instrument required the trustee to distribute all trust income to Settlor during her lifetime; Settlor retained the power to revoke the trust "during Settlor's lifetime"; and the trustee accumulated trust income at Settlor's written direction, drafted during her lifetime. Settlor's written direction effectively amended the terms of the trust as initially created. Thus, no improper accumulation of income occurred.

Point Two(a) (25%)

Settlor could not appoint an interest in the trust to her son's children (Settlor's grandchildren) because they were not permissible objects of her power of appointment.

The donee of a special (nongeneral) power can appoint the property over which the power is exercisable only to "permissible appointees" or "objects" of the power. Restatement (Third) of Property: Wills and Other Donative Transfers § 19.14 (2011). See also Restatement (Second) of Property: Donative Transfers § 19.3. Permissible appointees are "the persons to whom an appointment is authorized." Id. § 17.2(c). Appointments to impermissible appointees are invalid. Id. § 19.15. However, objects of a power include only those who receive a "beneficial interest." Thus, when, as here, property is appointed in further trust, the trustee is not an impermissible appointee. See id. § 19.15 cmt. e.

Although the trustee is not an impermissible appointee, Settlor's grandchildren (her son's children) are impermissible appointees. Under the trust instrument, Settlor's "children" were the only permissible objects of her testamentary power of appointment. It might be argued that Settlor intended to include more remote descendants, such as grandchildren, when she used the word "children" when creating the power of appointment. However, Settlor's will—executed contemporaneously with the trust instrument—includes a $50,000 bequest to her "descendants other than my children," clearly evidencing Settlor's ability to distinguish between children and more remote descendants. The argument that Settlor intended to include more remote descendants in the term "children" is thus highly likely to fail, and Settlor's appointment of trust assets to the children of Settlor's son thus should be ineffective.

The trust instrument allowed for amendments during Settlor's lifetime by a written instrument. However, the appointment in Settlor's will cannot be treated as an amendment made during Settlor's lifetime by a written instrument.

Point Two(b) (20%)

As the named taker in default of appointment, Charity is entitled to the portion of the trust ineffectively appointed to Settlor's grandchildren. It is not entitled to any interest appointed to the son.

"If part of an appointment is ineffective and another part, if standing alone, would be effective, the effective part is given effect, except to the extent that the donee's scheme of disposition is more closely approximated by concluding that some or all of the otherwise effective part should be treated as ineffective." Restatement (Third) of Property: Wills and Other Donative Transfers § 19.20 (2011). To the extent that a power is ineffectively appointed, the ineffectively appointed property passes to the so-called "taker in default of appointment" (here, Charity) designated by the donor of the power (here, Settlor). See id.

Thus, assuming that the appointment to Settlor's son's children is ineffective, the share they would have received upon the son's death passes to Charity. The appointment in trust to the son is permissible. Thus, Charity has no claim to the trust income interest appointed to the son.

Point Three (30%)

Settlor's husband may be entitled to an elective (i.e., forced) share of Settlor's revocable trust assets under the illusory-transfer doctrine, the fraudulent-transfer doctrine, or a like doctrine. He is also entitled to one-third of the probate assets.

Although many states have statutes under which a surviving spouse's elective (forced) share of the decedent spouse's estate extends to assets placed into a revocable trust by the decedent spouse (see, e.g., Unif. Probate Code §§ 2-201 et seq.), here, the jurisdiction's elective-share statute provides that the spousal right of election extends only to probate assets. Because the disposition of assets in a revocable trust is determined by the terms of the trust instrument, trust assets are not probate assets. Thus, the statute does not give Settlor's husband any claim to assets in her revocable trust. Assuming that the husband has no claim to the trust assets, he will not claim an elective share because that share ($33,333) would be less than the amount he is entitled to under the will ($50,000).

However, in many states, case law permits a surviving spouse to claim an elective share of assets contained in a revocable trust under either the illusory-transfer doctrine, the fraudulent-transfer doctrine, or a like doctrine.

Under the illusory-transfer doctrine, a surviving spouse can reach assets transferred during the marriage by the deceased spouse into a revocable trust on the theory that the transfer is economically “illusory” because, by the simple expedient of exercising the power of revocation—typically with nothing more than a signature on a piece of paper—the deceased spouse could have recaptured the assets she had placed in the trust. See, e.g., Newman v. Dore, 9 N.E.2d 966 (N.Y. 1937).

Under the fraudulent-transfer doctrine, a surviving spouse can reach assets transferred into a revocable trust on the theory that, as to the surviving spouse, the transfer was “fraudulent.” The assumption behind this doctrine is that a state statute providing surviving spouses with an elective-share entitlement gives spouses a legitimate expectancy in assets that would have been included in the decedent spouse’s probate estate but for their transfer into a revocable trust; such a transfer is treated as defrauding the surviving spouse of his or her expectancy. See, e.g., In re Estate of Froman, 803 S.W.2d 176 (Mo. Ct. App. 1991).

Thus, if this jurisdiction recognizes one of these doctrines or another similar doctrine, Settlor’s husband will be entitled to receive one-third of the combined probate ($100,000) and trust estate ($500,000) or $200,000 (1/3 of $600,000). However, this $200,000 would be reduced to $150,000 to take account of the fact that he received $50,000 under the will.

Not all jurisdictions recognize such a doctrine, however. In those jurisdictions that do not, the husband would receive nothing beyond the $50,000 he would receive under the will because that amount exceeds the elective share (1/3 of $100,000).

[NOTE: If an examinee concludes that the husband can elect against the trust assets, the examinee may also discuss who would bear the burden of paying the husband’s share. No credit should be given for this discussion, as the payment issue is beyond the scope of the question.]

- (3) Can Daniel, a nonparent, obtain court-ordered visitation with Chloe despite Brenda's objection and her assertion of parental rights?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Andrew and Brenda established a valid common law marriage in State A, which they did not dissolve by divorce. Under generally accepted conflict-of-laws principles, State B will recognize the validity of Andrew and Brenda's marriage in State A, notwithstanding its own policy against common law marriage. Because Brenda remains married to Andrew in most states, her lottery winnings qualify as "marital property" subject to equitable distribution, although a court would be unlikely to award Andrew much, if any, of the prize.

Because Brenda is married to Andrew, her attempted marriage to Daniel is void, and Daniel will not be able to claim a share of the lottery winnings as "marital" property. However, although not a spouse, in many states Daniel could assert a claim to some share of the lottery winnings under the putative-spouse doctrine. In states that do not recognize the putative-spouse doctrine, Daniel might still be able to claim a share of the lottery winnings under a statute allowing a party to a void marriage to obtain a share of "marital" assets or under a cohabitation-contract theory.

Because Daniel has acted as a parent to Chloe, it is probable, but not certain, that he will obtain visitation with Chloe, notwithstanding Brenda's assertion of parental rights.

Point One(a) (15%)

Andrew and Brenda formed a valid common law marriage in State A and remain married.

Formation of a valid common law marriage requires that the partners (1) cohabited, (2) agreed to be married, and (3) held themselves out to others as a married couple. See In re Estate of Duval, 777 N.W.2d 380, 384 (S.D. 2010); Smith v. Deneve, 285 S.W.3d 904, 909–10 (Tex. Ct. App. 2009). Andrew and Brenda satisfied all of these requirements. While living together, they agreed to marry and appeared to regard themselves as married; they consistently held themselves out as married to friends, to Andrew’s employer, and to governmental authorities. In a state recognizing common law marriage, this conduct would establish a valid marriage.

When Andrew and Brenda separated, they did not divorce and thus continued to be married to each other. A common law marriage, just like a ceremonial marriage, must be dissolved through a divorce. See Homer H. Clark, The Law of Domestic Relations § 2.1 (2d ed. 1987); Henry D. Krause and David D. Meyer, Family Law in a Nutshell 54–55 (5th ed. 2007).

Point One(b) (10%)

State B will recognize a common law marriage entered into in another state.

Under generally accepted conflict-of-laws principles, a marriage valid under the law of the state where it was contracted is valid elsewhere unless it violates the strong public policy of another state which has the most significant relationship to the spouses and the marriage. See Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws § 283(2) cmt. f; Godfrey v. Spano, 920 N.E.2d 328, 337–38 (N.Y. 2009) (Ciparick, J., concurring); Duval, 777 N.W.2d at 382. Perhaps because the vast majority of states once permitted common law marriage, courts in states that do not recognize common law marriage have consistently held that it does not violate any strong public policy to recognize an out-of-state common law marriage. See Restatement, Conflict of Laws § 123 (1934) (“A marriage without any formal ceremony is valid everywhere if the acts alleged to have created it took place in a state in which such a marriage is valid.”); accord Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws § 283 cmts. (g) & (h). Thus, a State B court will recognize Brenda’s common law marriage to Andrew.

Point One(c) (15%)

In most states, Andrew could recover a share of the lottery proceeds in a divorce action against Brenda, but a court is unlikely to award him a significant share of Brenda’s winnings.

Property acquired by either spouse during an ongoing marriage, other than by gift or inheritance, is marital property subject to division on divorce. See Smith v. Smith, 687 S.E.2d 720, 729 (S.C. Ct. App. 2009). Although some states provide that marital property ceases to accrue after the parties’ separation, most hold that marital property continues to accrue until the marriage is dissolved. See, e.g., Larsen-Ball v. Ball, 301 S.W.3d 228 (Tenn. 2010). Accordingly, because Brenda remains married to Andrew, her lottery winnings are likely to be considered marital property. Thus, Andrew could seek to obtain a share of the lottery winnings in a divorce action.

Some states divide marital property equally, but most grant judges authority to divide the property equitably. Although Andrew, in a divorce action, will likely be able to seek an equitable distribution of Brenda's lottery winnings as part of the marital property, it is unlikely that a judge would award him a significant (or perhaps any) share of the lottery money given the relatively short duration of their cohabitation, the absence of any contributions by Andrew to the marital estate, and the parties' long and near-total estrangement. See In re Marriage of Palacios, 656 N.E.2d 107 (Ill. App. Ct. 1995).

Point Two(a) (15%)

Because Brenda was already married when she purported to marry Daniel, her marriage to Daniel is void. Because he is not her legal spouse, he is not entitled to a share of her lottery winnings as marital property.

Bigamy is illegal in all states; no individual may have more than one legal spouse at a time. Because of the ban on bigamy, when a first marriage has not been legally terminated, a second marriage has no legal effect. See Clark, supra, § 2.7. Because Brenda and Andrew did not divorce, application of this rule suggests that Brenda and Daniel are not married, and Daniel would have no claim to a share of marital property because they have no "marital" property.

One potential impediment to that conclusion is the presumption that the latest in a series of marriages is valid. The presumption is "one of the strongest known to the law" and can be rebutted only by "strong . . . evidence that the prior marriage still subsists or by cogent and conclusive evidence." Id. The presumption is designed to protect the parties' expectations; thus, some cases hold that the presumption's strength increases with the lapse of time and the birth of children in the later marriage.

Once Daniel establishes his marriage ceremony with Brenda, to overcome the presumption of validity, Brenda must show that she previously entered into a valid common law marriage with Andrew and that this marriage was not terminated by divorce or annulment. Most courts have held that the presumption may be rebutted with a showing that court records in all jurisdictions where the first spouse has lived do not evidence a divorce. See id., n. 38 (listing cases). See also Lott v. Toomey, 477 So. 2d 316 (Ala. 1985); Pigford Bros. Const. Co. v. Evans, 83 So. 2d 622 (Miss. 1955). Thus, if Brenda can show that she had a common law marriage with Andrew, and if there is no evidence that a State A court terminated that marriage, the State B court should find that she is still Andrew's wife. Because the facts specify that Andrew and Brenda were not divorced, it seems likely that Brenda can meet her burden of proof, in which case Daniel will not obtain an equitable distribution of the lottery proceeds or other property through a divorce.

Point Two(b) (25%)

In some jurisdictions, Daniel may be entitled to a share of the lottery proceeds under the putative-spouse doctrine, or under a statute permitting a party to a void marriage to obtain a share of "marital" assets, or under a cohabitation-contract theory.

The putative-spouse doctrine permits a would-be spouse, who participated in a marriage ceremony with a good-faith but mistaken belief in its validity, to be treated like a spouse for purposes of equitable distribution of the property acquired by the couple during their invalid marriage. See In re Marriage of Tejada, 102 Cal. Rptr. 3d 361 (Ct. App. 2009); Williams v. Williams, 97 P.3d 1124 (Nev. 2004). In this case, it appears that Daniel believed in good faith that he was married to Brenda and was wholly unaware of the defect in their marriage. (Indeed, even Brenda appears to have been unaware of the defect, as she appears to have accepted Andrew's mistaken assurance that they needed no formal divorce to dissolve their common law marriage.) Accordingly, Daniel would qualify as a putative spouse and could seek an equitable distribution of any property that would have been classified as marital property had the parties been validly married, including Brenda's lottery winnings. See id. Given the duration of their relationship, Daniel's equitable claim is likely to be substantial.

In states that do not recognize the putative-spouse doctrine, Daniel might still be able to recover some share of the lottery winnings. Some states that have not recognized the putative-spouse doctrine nonetheless permit distribution of "marital" assets in a proceeding to declare a marriage void. See, e.g., N.Y. Dom. Rel. Law § 236B(5)(a). "The trend of modern statutes . . . is increasingly to blur the line not only between void and voidable marriages but even between them and valid marriages in an attempt to equalize the consequences of termination of marital relationships on whatever ground." Krause, supra, at 60. In such a state, Daniel could obtain a share of "marital" assets even though his marriage to Brenda is void.

It is also conceivable that Daniel could claim a share of the lottery proceeds under the law governing unmarried cohabitants. In states following the California Supreme Court's ruling in Marvin v. Marvin, 557 P.2d 106 (Cal. 1976), property or support rights between cohabitants can be founded upon an express or implied contract to share assets. See Annot., Property Rights Arising from Relationship of Couple Cohabiting Without Marriage, 69 A.L.R. 5th 219 (1999 & Supp.) (surveying state laws). Although the Marvin theory is almost invariably applied to cohabiting couples who have not entered into a ceremonial marriage, Brenda and Daniel's attempted marriage does imply an agreement to share their property as would a married couple. However, some states refuse, on public policy grounds, to enforce cohabitation agreements. See, e.g., Hewitt v. Hewitt, 394 N.E.2d 1204 (Ill. 1979); Malone v. Odom, 657 So. 2d 1112 (Miss. 1995).

Point Three (20%)

It is probable that Daniel will succeed in obtaining court-ordered visitation with Chloe, notwithstanding Brenda's objection.

Although Chloe regards Daniel as a father, he is not her legal parent. The Supreme Court of the United States has recognized that parents have a fundamental constitutional right to control the upbringing of their children, including decisions about with whom their children will visit. See Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 66 (2000). A fit parent is presumed to act in the best interests of her children, and courts are constitutionally required to give "special weight" to a parent's reasons for objecting to visitation with a third party before overriding the parent's objection and granting visitation. See id. at 68–69.

Accordingly, a court would be required to carefully consider Brenda's reasons for objecting to Daniel's further contact with Chloe, but would be permitted to grant visitation if the balance of considerations strongly favored ongoing contact. Here, Daniel has lived with Chloe for 9 of her 11 years, and he has played an active parental role. Chloe calls Daniel "Dad" and regards him as her father. Daniel could thus be considered a "de facto parent."

There are facts to support a finding that Chloe would be harmed by termination of contact with Daniel. Chloe became "very upset" when she learned that Brenda planned to cut off contact. Moreover, Brenda plans to cut off all contact with Daniel. In Troxel, in explaining why deference to the parent's objection was appropriate, the plurality emphasized that the mother sought only to limit the access of the paternal grandparents and did not seek to cut them off entirely. Brenda's plan to cut off all contact with the man Chloe regards as her father thus will probably weigh against her. See Peters v. Costello, 891 A.2d 705 (Pa. 2005) (holding that grandparents who served as caregivers of child, in loco parentis, had standing to seek visitation notwithstanding mother's objection under state's Grandparents Visitation Act). Chloe also does not have an active relationship with her biological father and regards Daniel as her dad. In some states, this could tip the balance in Daniel's favor. See Utah Code Annotated 30-5a-103(2)(g); In re C.M.F., 314 P.3d 1109 (Wash. 2013).

State law on nonparent visitation rights varies substantially, however. Thus, it is probable, but not certain, that Daniel will obtain visitation with Chloe.

CORPORATIONS ANALYSIS

COR VI.A.; IX.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does the shareholder have a “proper purpose” in seeking to inspect MEGA’s board minutes and accounting records to determine whether to bring (and maintain) a suit concerning the alleged foreign bribes?
- (2) May the board obtain dismissal of the shareholder’s derivative claim if the board concludes that it is not in the corporation’s best interest to continue the lawsuit, even though the board has not investigated the allegations of illegal foreign bribes?
- (3) Is the decision of the MEGA directors not to investigate or take action on the shareholder’s allegations of illegal corporate behavior a breach of the directors’ duty to act in good faith, and is that decision protected by the business judgment rule?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The shareholder had a “proper purpose” when she sought to inspect board minutes and accounting records relevant to alleged foreign bribes to determine whether to bring a lawsuit concerning possible illegal corporate conduct. Therefore, the shareholder is entitled to inspect the requested minutes and accounting records.

Because the MEGA board did not conduct a reasonable inquiry before concluding that it was not in the corporation’s best interest to investigate and remediate alleged illegal activities, the court is not required to dismiss the shareholder’s suit, and her claim can proceed.

The MEGA directors have a fiduciary duty to act in “good faith,” which encompasses an obligation not to condone illegal corporate conduct and to investigate credible evidence of such illegality. The business judgment rule does not protect decisions of directors to condone or disregard illegal corporate conduct, even if such conduct may be profitable for the corporation.

Point One (30%)

The shareholder has a right to inspect board minutes and accounting records if she has a “proper purpose.” Gathering information to decide whether to bring a lawsuit alleging a breach of fiduciary duties arising from illegal corporate behavior is a proper purpose.

A shareholder, whether of record or who beneficially owns her shares, has a right to inspect minutes of board meetings and “accounting records” for a proper purpose. Model Business Corp. Act (MBCA) § 16.02(b), (c), (f). See also Del. Gen. Corp. L. § 220(b) (inspection right encompasses “corporate books and records”). A proper purpose is a purpose reasonably related to a person’s interest as a shareholder, “such as a desire . . . to determine whether improper transactions have occurred.” Official Comment, MBCA § 16.02(d) (2011). See also Del. Gen. Corp. L. § 220(b).

Here, the shareholder has an interest in determining whether the directors permitted the corporation to engage in illegal conduct that could result in the corporation paying civil and criminal penalties. An inspection request must be granted whenever the shareholder articulates a purpose to address “economic risks” to the corporation. See Conservative Caucus v. Chevron Corp., 525 A.2d 569 (Del. Ch. 1987) (permitting inspection of shareholders’ list by shareholder seeking to propose that corporation stop doing business in communist Angola, based on alleged economic risks to corporation).

A shareholder seeking inspection of corporate documents must offer credible evidence that there was mismanagement or other improper conduct. See Security First Corp. v. U.S. Die Casting and Dev. Co., 687 A.2d 563 (Del. 1997) (shareholder has burden to show credible evidence of possible mismanagement to obtain inspection of books and records).

Here, the news story in a leading financial newspaper, coupled with the board’s failure to investigate or to deny the truth of the allegations in the news story, appears to constitute a credible basis for concluding that MEGA may have engaged in illegal conduct. Moreover, although MEGA’s response to the shareholder indicated that the news story about the illegal foreign bribes was “unsubstantiated,” there is no indication in the facts, nor did MEGA make the assertion, that the news story was untrue.

Under the MBCA, the shareholder’s right to inspect corporate documents relevant to the alleged bribery is subject to certain limitations. The MBCA allows a shareholder to inspect “only relevant excerpts of [board] minutes . . . directly connected with the shareholder’s purpose.” Official Comment to MBCA § 16.02(c) (2011). The MBCA also allows inspection of “accounting records,” although this category is not as broad as the “books and records” category found in other corporate statutes. According to the Official Comment, accounting records are “records that permit financial statements to be prepared which fairly present the financial position and transactions of the corporation.” Official Comment to MBCA § 16.01(b). Many documents related to the payment of foreign bribes could be seen to be “accounting records,” to the extent that they relate to how such transactions would be presented in the corporation’s financial statements. Under the MBCA, the corporation could refuse to allow inspection of non- financial documents related to the alleged foreign bribery.

In sum, the shareholder has a right to inspect MEGA’s board minutes and accounting records related to the alleged bribery of Country X officials because her purpose is connected to bringing a lawsuit to protect her economic interest in MEGA.

[NOTE: Under the MBCA, a “proper purpose” need not be shown for the inspection of minutes of shareholders’ meetings. See MBCA §§ 16.01(e), 16.02(a). But here the shareholder asked for board minutes, for which a “proper purpose” must be shown. See MBCA § 16.02(d)(1).

Under the MBCA, the shareholder's inspection rights were not terminated when she filed her derivative claim against the MEGA directors. The MBCA instead specifies that shareholders who have been denied inspection may apply for a court order permitting inspection, which the court is to decide "on an expedited basis." MBCA § 16.04(b). Courts have encouraged shareholders to first seek inspection of corporate documents before bringing suits alleging improper corporate transactions and breaches of fiduciary duty. See Brehm v. Eisner, 746 A.2d 244 (Del. 2000). But the right to inspection has been recognized even while a lawsuit is proceeding. See King v. VeriFone Holdings, Inc., 12 A.3d 1140, 1145–46 (Del. 2011).]

Point Two (30%)

The board may not obtain dismissal of the shareholder's derivative claim, even if the board concludes that it is not in the corporation's best interest to continue the lawsuit, because the board's conclusion was not based on a reasonable investigation into the shareholder's allegations.

Under the MBCA, the board can seek dismissal of the shareholder's derivative action if a majority of the board's "qualified directors"—those directors who do not have a material interest in the derivative action, see MBCA § 1.43(a)(1)—determine in good faith, after conducting a reasonable inquiry upon which its conclusions are based, that continuance would be contrary to the corporation's best interests. MBCA § 7.44(a) & (b). Although the Official Comment to MBCA § 7.44 suggests that a full-blown board investigation is not necessary, the board's request for dismissal must have "some support in the findings of the inquiry." Failure to investigate credible allegations of corporate illegality constitutes lack of "good faith." Stone v. Ritter, 911 A.2d 362, 364–65 (Del. 2006) (stating that directors breach duty of good faith if they "knew or should have known" of violations of law and failed to act).

Here, given the apparent lack of any inquiry or corrective action by the board, as evidenced by the letter of June 1 to the shareholder, the court should not grant the motion to dismiss the derivative action or accept the board's conclusion that proceeding with the lawsuit would be contrary to the corporation's best interests.

[NOTE: Directors breach their fiduciary duties by failing to act upon "red flags" of corporate illegality. See Graham v. Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., 188 A.2d 125, 130 (Del. 1963) (directors breach their duties by ignoring "obvious danger signs" of illegal corporate conduct). Here, the MEGA board's failure to investigate the shareholder's allegations based on a report in a leading financial newspaper, which the board did not deny, suggests bad faith on the part of the directors, thus excusing demand. See In re Abbott Laboratories Derivative Shareholders Litig., 325 F.3d 795, 806 (7th Cir. 2003) (excusing demand when shareholders alleged that directors had known of illegal activity and allowed it to continue).]

[NOTE: The question does not call for a discussion of the MBCA's demand requirement. MBCA § 7.42 (90-day waiting period before bringing derivative claim). Thus, discussion of the demand requirement is irrelevant. Cf. Aronson v. Lewis, 473 A.2d 805 (Del. 1984) (requiring demand, unless excused as futile); see also Marx v. Akers, 666 N.E.2d 1034 (N.Y. 1996) (adopting Aronson approach and excusing demand when current board is “interested” in challenged transaction, board decision was not appropriately informed, or challenged transaction was so egregious that it could not be product of sound business judgment).]

Point Three (40%)

The MEGA directors’ disregard of the legality of the corporation’s conduct is a failure to act in good faith and is not protected by the business judgment rule, even if the directors believed the conduct to be in the corporation’s best interests.

A director is liable to the corporation for the director’s decisions or failures to take action that were “not in good faith.” MBCA § 8.31(a)(2)(i). The Official Comment to this section states:

Conduct involving knowingly illegal conduct that exposes the corporation to harm will constitute action not in good faith, and belief that decisions made (in connection with such conduct) were in the best interests of the corporation will be subject to challenge as well.

Courts applying the duty of good faith have made clear that corporate directors cannot consciously violate—or permit the corporation to violate—legal norms, even when such violations may be profitable to the corporation. The Official Comment to MBCA § 8.31 states that “a lack of good faith is presented . . . where a transaction . . . is known to constitute a violation of applicable positive law.” See Gagliardi v. TriFoods Int’l Inc., 683 A.2d 1049, 1051 (Del. Ch. 1996); Hillary A. Sale, “Monitoring Caremark’s Good Faith,” 32 Del. J. Corp. L. 719 (2007) (collecting and summarizing cases where directors were alleged to have failed to monitor illegal corporate conduct).

In addition, the duty to act in good faith requires corporate directors to establish procedures to ensure the corporation’s compliance with legal norms. See Stone v. Ritter, supra, at 369–70. Thus, courts have required corporate directors to establish “[corporate] information and reporting systems” that provide “timely, accurate information . . . concerning both the corporation’s compliance with law and its business performance.” In re Caremark Int’l, Inc. Derivative Litig., 698 A.2d 959, 970 (Del. Ch. 1996); see also Official Comment to MBCA § 8.30 (citing Caremark for proposition that board of directors must ensure that the corporation “has information and reporting systems in place to provide directors with appropriate information . . . to permit them to discharge their responsibilities”).

The “good faith” standard requires that directors, among other things, not approve (or condone) wrongful or illegal activity. See In re Walt Disney Co. Derivative Litig., 825 A.2d 275, 289 (Del. Ch. 2003) (holding that attitude of “we don’t care about risks” breaches duty of good faith). In particular, directors violate their fiduciary duties by approving bribery of foreign government officials, even when the practice is widespread. See Gall v. Exxon Corp., 418 F. Supp. 508 (S.D.N.Y. 1976).

Even when disregard of legal norms might result in a net financial benefit to the corporation, directors are required to comply with the law. See In re Caremark Int'l, Inc., supra (requiring internal controls even with no net financial benefit to corporation); see also Guttman v. Huang, 823 A.2d 492, 506 (Del. Ch. 2003) (fiduciary cannot manage entity in illegal fashion, even if fiduciary believes illegal activity will result in profits for the entity). Here, the failure of MEGA's directors to investigate or take corrective action regarding alleged illegal foreign bribes exposes the corporation to significant penalties and constitutes action not in good faith.

The business judgment rule does not protect decisions by directors not acting in good faith. As the Official Comment to MBCA § 8.31 summarizing the business judgment rule states:

In basic principle, a board of directors enjoys a presumption of sound business judgment . . . that, in making a business decision, directors act in good faith, on an informed basis, and in the honest belief that the action taken is in the best interests of the corporation. See Aronson v. Lewis, 473 A.2d 805, 812 (Del. 1983).

Specifically, the business judgment rule, while normally protecting the honest business judgment of directors, does not apply upon a showing of “illegality.” See Shlensky v. Wrigley, 237 N.E.2d 776, 778 (Ill. App. Ct. 1968) (business judgment rule applies “unless there is a showing of fraud, illegality, or conflict of interest”).

Directors breach their fiduciary duties—and the business judgment rule provides no protection—when they approve illegal business operations (or refuse to investigate alleged illegal business activities), even though the illegal business may be profitable to the corporation. See Roth v. Robertson, 118 N.Y.S. 351 (Sup. Ct. 1909) (bribery of state officials to protect an amusement park's illegal Sunday operations); Miller v. AT&T, 507 F.2d 759, 761 (3d Cir. 1974) (corporation's failure to collect loan to political party, in violation of campaign finance laws).

Thus, the MEGA directors would not be protected by the business judgment rule.

AGENCY ANALYSIS

AGC II.A., B.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) When an agent enters into a contract with a third party on behalf of a disclosed principal on terms that were not authorized by the principal, who is liable to the third party: the agent, the principal, or both?
- (2) When an agent enters into a contract with a third party on behalf of an undisclosed principal on terms authorized by the principal, who is liable to the third party if the principal later repudiates the contract: the agent, the principal, or both?
- (3) When an agent enters into a contract with a third party on behalf of a partially disclosed principal for goods different from those authorized by the principal, who is liable to the third party if the principal accepts the different goods: the agent, the principal, or both?

DISCUSSION

Summary

As a general matter, an agent binds a principal to a contract, whether or not the principal is disclosed to the third party, if the agent had either actual or apparent authority to enter into the contract. Without that authority, the agent alone is liable on the contract unless the principal becomes liable by subsequently ratifying the contract. An agent acting with authority is not liable on the contract if the principal's identity is disclosed to the third party, but is liable if the principal's identity is not disclosed or only partially disclosed, unless the contract provides otherwise.

Applying these principles here, because the woman disclosed that she was acting for the inventor on the chip contract, but purchased different chips from those specified by the inventor, the inventor is not liable because the woman did not have authority to enter into the contract; the woman is also liable on the chip contract because she impliedly warranted that she had authority.

Both the woman and the inventor are liable on the blue-lens contract. Although the woman did not disclose that she was acting for the inventor on the blue-lens contract, the inventor is liable on this contract because he had given the woman actual authority to buy the blue lenses on his behalf; the woman is also liable because she signed the contract in her own name.

Finally, both the inventor and the woman are liable on the shutoff-switch contract that the woman entered into on behalf of the partially disclosed inventor, even though the switches were different from those authorized. The inventor became liable by ratifying the contract when he accepted the different switches, and the woman became liable by signing a contract on behalf of a partially disclosed principal.

[NOTE: While the contracts in this question are for the sale of goods and, thus, governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code, the UCC does not contain agency rules resolving the issues in this question. Thus, common law principles govern. UCC § 1-103(b).]

Point One (30%)

With respect to the chips, the woman (agent) is liable on the contract, but the inventor (principal) is not because the woman, notwithstanding her disclosure that she was acting as his agent, lacked actual or apparent authority to enter into the contract on behalf of the inventor with the chip manufacturer.

A principal is not liable on a contract entered into by an agent unless the agent had actual or apparent authority. See generally Restatement (Second) of Agency § 140; accord, Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.01. In the absence of actual or apparent authority, it is irrelevant whether the agent disclosed to the third party that the agent was acting on behalf of a disclosed principal. See generally Restatement (Second) of Agency § 144; accord, Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.01.

Actual authority exists when the principal by written or spoken words or other conduct “causes the agent to believe that the principal desires . . . [the agent] to act on the principal’s account.” Restatement (Second) of Agency § 26. While rephrased, the Third Restatement is similar and provides that “[an] agent acts with actual authority when, at the time of taking action that has legal consequences for the principal, the agent reasonably believes, in accordance with the principal’s manifestations to the agent, that the principal wishes the agent so to act.” Restatement (Third) of Agency § 2.01.

Apparent authority is created with respect to a third person when “by written or spoken words or any other conduct” the principal causes the third person “to believe that the principal consents to have the act done on his behalf by the person purporting to act for him.” Restatement (Second) of Agency § 27. The Third Restatement is similar: “[a]pparent authority . . . is created by a person’s manifestation that another has authority to act with legal consequences for the person who makes the manifestation, when a third person reasonably believes the actor to be authorized and the belief is traceable to the manifestation.” Restatement (Third) of Agency § 3.03.

Here, the inventor is not liable on the Series B chips contract because the woman had neither actual nor apparent authority to purchase these chips on the inventor’s behalf. First, there is no basis to conclude that the woman had actual authority to buy Series B chips. The inventor instructed the woman to buy only Series A chips; thus, the woman only had actual authority to purchase the Series A chips and no others. She exceeded her actual authority when she purchased the Series B chips.

Next, there was no apparent authority here. There are no facts to suggest that the inventor (as opposed to the woman) manifested to the chip manufacturer that the woman had authority to acquire Series B chips. Without such evidence, there is no apparent authority.

Agency Analysis

While the inventor (principal) is not liable to the chip manufacturer on the chip contract, the woman (agent) would be liable to the chip manufacturer for damages because she breached the implied warranty to the manufacturer that she had authority to act on behalf of the inventor. A person who “purports to make a contract . . . with a third party on behalf of another person, lacking power to bind that person, gives an implied warranty of authority to the third party and is subject to liability to the third party for damages for loss caused by the breach of that warranty, including loss of the benefit expected from performance by the principal.” Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.10; accord, Restatement (Second) of Agency §§ 329–330. Because she breached this warranty, she is liable to the manufacturer.

Point Two (30%)

Both the inventor and the woman are liable to the blue-lens manufacturer on the contract for blue lenses. The inventor is liable because the woman acted with actual authority; the woman is liable as a party to the contract because the principal was undisclosed.

“An undisclosed principal is bound by contracts . . . made on his account by an agent acting within his authority.” Restatement (Second) of Agency § 186; accord, Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.03.

An agent who purports to act on his own account, but in fact is making a contract on behalf of an undisclosed principal, is also a party to the contract. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 322; accord, Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.03. The rationale for this rule is that the third party has every reason in the case of an undisclosed principal and agency to assume that the person with whom it contracts expects to be liable on the contract. Additionally, to the extent the third party was relying on the financial solvency of the person on the other side of the contract, the third party would have no basis to rely on anyone but the agent who signed the contract.

Here, the woman had actual authority from the inventor to purchase blue lenses at a price not to exceed $300 per unit. By contracting to purchase blue lenses for $295 per unit, the woman acted with actual authority in entering into the blue-lens contract. Thus, the inventor became bound to the contract, even though the third party had no reason to know that the woman was acting on behalf of the inventor. The inventor had no right to refuse to accept the shipment and refuse to pay for the blue lenses.

The woman is also liable on the contract because she purported to act on her own behalf. The blue-lens manufacturer relied on the woman being bound by the contract.

[NOTE: Because the inventor (not the woman) was the person who expected to reap the benefit of the contract with the blue-lens manufacturer, as between them the inventor has the primary responsibility to carry out the terms of the contract, and the agent acts as a surety for that obligation. Thus, if the manufacturer were to sue the woman and recover, the woman could seek to be recompensed by the inventor. If the manufacturer were to sue the inventor and then sue the woman, the woman would be entitled to raise all defenses available to a surety. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 335.

In addition, in some jurisdictions the third party may be required, prior to judgment, to elect whether to take judgment against the undisclosed principal or the agent. See Restatement (Second) of Agency § 210A. In such an election jurisdiction, either the inventor (undisclosed principal) or the woman (agent) could escape liability by making a demand on the third-party manufacturer to elect to take judgment against the other. This “election rule” has been heavily criticized and has been abandoned in some jurisdictions in favor of a “satisfaction rule” that allows the third party to take judgment against both the undisclosed principal and the agent, but entitles the third party to only one satisfaction of the judgment. See Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.09. Thus, in a satisfaction jurisdiction, if both the inventor and the woman are sued, neither of them can escape judgment by demanding that the third-party manufacturer make an election.]

Point Three (40%)

Both the inventor and the woman are liable on the contract for the shutoff switches. The inventor is liable by ratifying the contract; the woman is liable because she acted on behalf of a partially disclosed principal, and there is no indication that the third party agreed to look solely to the partially disclosed principal for payment.

When a third party contracts with a person that the third party knows is acting in an agency capacity for another but the third party is unaware of the identity of the principal, the principal for whom the agent acts is called a “partially disclosed principal.” Restatement (Second) of Agency § 4(2). Here, the shutoff-switch manufacturer knew that the woman was acting as someone’s agent but there is nothing to indicate that the manufacturer was aware of the principal’s identity. Thus, the inventor is a “partially disclosed principal.” A partially disclosed principal can be liable on a contract entered into by an agent who had actual or apparent authority. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 144; accord, Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.02(1). Here, the woman acted without actual or apparent authority, so this cannot be the basis to hold the inventor liable on the contract. See Point One.

On the other hand, even though the woman acted without actual or apparent authority, the inventor accepted the shutoff switches and used them in the production of the mowers. This amounts to a ratification of the contract between the woman and the switch manufacturer. Where the principal ratifies the act of an agent, the principal is liable on the contract just as if the agent had acted with actual authority. Restatement (Third) of Agency § 4.01(1). Ratification occurs if the principal’s conduct “justifies a reasonable assumption that” the principal consents to the act performed on the principal’s behalf. Id. § 4.01(2)(b); accord, Restatement (Second) of Agency §§ 82–83. Here, the inventor’s use of the switches justifies a reasonable assumption of consent.

As for the woman, she is also liable on the contract. Unless the agent and the third party agree otherwise, an agent acting on behalf of a partially disclosed principal is a party to the contract if the agent acted with actual or apparent authority. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 321; Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.02(2). Here, because of the inventor’s ratification of the contract, the woman is deemed to have acted with actual authority, and there is no indication that the manufacturer agreed to look solely to the partially disclosed principal for payment.

Agency Analysis

[NOTE: In addition, there is no requirement that the manufacturer “elect” either a remedy against the agent or a remedy against the principal where, as here, there is a partially disclosed principal. See Restatement (Second) of Agency § 336; Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.09. Thus, neither the inventor nor the woman can escape liability by making a demand on the manufacturer to make an election to take judgment against the other.]

REAL PROPERTY ANALYSIS

RLP I.C., D.3

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Can the landlord argue that he (a) lawfully withheld his consent to the assignment of the lease, (b) did not accept the tenant's surrender of the apartment, and (c) had no duty to mitigate, but even if he did have a duty to mitigate, he had fulfilled that duty?
- (2) Can the tenant argue (a) that the landlord unreasonably refused to consent to the assignment of the lease, (b) that the landlord accepted her surrender of the apartment and therefore is not entitled to unpaid rent, and (c) that even if the surrender was not accepted, the landlord had a duty to mitigate and failed to do so?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The landlord will argue that the lease provision restricting assignment without his consent was valid and that he could lawfully refuse to accept the tenant's proposed assignee for any reason or no reason at all. The landlord will also argue that, even if this jurisdiction requires that his refusal to consent had to be reasonable, it was reasonable in light of his prior experiences with lawyers as tenants. He will also argue that he did not accept the tenant's surrender of the apartment and that he had no duty to mitigate. The landlord will argue that even if he did have a duty to mitigate, he fulfilled that duty by trying (albeit unsuccessfully) to re-let the apartment. The landlord will claim that there was no market for the tenant's apartment and that he is thus entitled to 17 months of unpaid rent.

The tenant should concede that, because the restraint on assignment was valid, her purported assignment of the lease required the landlord's written consent. However, the tenant will argue that the landlord had to be reasonable if he was going to withhold his consent to an assignment, and that he was unreasonable in refusing to rent to lawyers. The tenant will argue that the landlord accepted her surrender and therefore is not entitled to sue for any unpaid rent. Alternatively, she will argue that even if the landlord did not accept the surrender, he had a duty to mitigate and he failed to do so, and thus is not entitled to any unpaid rent.

On the whole, the landlord here has the better arguments and should be entitled to recover 17 months of unpaid rent from the tenant.

[NOTE: The call of this question requires examinees to construct arguments relating to the following issues: (1) Did the landlord properly withhold consent to an assignment? (2) Did the landlord accept the tenant's surrender of the apartment? (3) Did the landlord have a duty to mitigate? and (4) If the landlord had a duty to mitigate, did he fulfill that duty? The question tests examinees' ability to identify the issues regarding consent to the assignment, surrender, and mitigation, and to marshal facts in support of each party's arguments.]

Point One(a) (20%)

The landlord will argue that the lease provision prohibiting assignment without his written consent was valid and that he could withhold consent for any reason or for no reason at all. The landlord will also argue that, even if this jurisdiction's law requires that his refusal to accept the assignment be reasonable, his decision to withhold consent here was reasonable, given his past experiences with lawyers as tenants.

Here, the tenant attempted to assign her lease—that is, to transfer the balance of the lease term—to a lawyer. A restriction on assignment is a valid restraint on alienation. William B. Stoebuck & Dale A. Whitman, The Law of Property 379 (3d ed. 2000). Because a restraint on transfer by assignment is valid, the lease provision here prohibiting an assignment without the landlord's consent was valid.

The landlord will argue that he was free to withhold his consent for any reason or for no reason at all. The clause in the tenant's lease is commonly described as a "silent" consent clause because it does not include an express standard or condition for the giving or withholding of consent. John G. Sprankling, Understanding Property Law 286 (3d ed. 2012). Under the traditional rule—still the majority rule today—a silent consent clause gives the landlord the right to withhold consent for any reason or for no reason—even if the withholding of consent is arbitrary and unreasonable. Id. at 287. (That rule, however, is subject to statutory housing discrimination laws that are not at issue here.)

Alternatively, the landlord will argue that, even if this jurisdiction is one of the minority group in which refusal to consent to an assignment must be reasonable, his refusal was reasonable in light of his personal experiences renting to lawyers; his refusal represented a legitimate business judgment.

[NOTE: Some examinees may conclude that the lease did not prohibit a sublet. But the tenant informed the landlord that the lawyer "was willing to take over the balance of the [tenant's] lease term" (emphasis added). This statement evidences that the tenant was purporting to assign the lease and not sublet. This transfer should be construed as an assignment, the making of which was restricted under the lease. Therefore, the tenant would not have the right to transfer the lease to the lawyer without the landlord's consent.]

Point One(b) (15%)

The landlord will argue that the tenant's actions (removing her possessions and leaving the keys in the landlord's mail slot with a note) constituted an abandonment of the apartment without cause. Further, the landlord will argue that he did not accept a surrender of the apartment.

Abandonment occurs when a tenant vacates the leased premises before the end of the term, has no intent to return, and defaults in the payment of rent. Sprankling, supra, at 293. Under traditional common law principles, a landlord has three options when a tenant abandons the premises: (1) accept a surrender of the premises, thereby extinguishing the tenant's duty to pay rent due after the acceptance of surrender; (2) re-let or attempt to re-let the premises on the tenant's behalf, and recover from the tenant damages based on the difference between what the tenant owed for rent and what the landlord collected from re-letting; or (3) leave the premises vacant and sue the tenant for unpaid rent as it accrues. Id. at 294; Stoebuck & Whitman, supra, at 403.

Here, on July 25, 2015, the tenant vacated the apartment and left the keys in an envelope in the landlord's mail slot with a note stating that she was moving abroad, would not return before the end of the lease, and would not pay any rent from August 1 onward. The landlord emailed the tenant the next day and acknowledged that he had found the keys and the note. "Although this is a problem you created," he wrote, "I want to be a nice guy and help you out. I feel pretty confident that I can find a suitable tenant who is not a lawyer to rent your apartment."

The landlord will argue that he did not voluntarily accept the keys; they were merely placed in his mail slot and the statement in his email was merely an offer to attempt to re-let the premises on the tenant's behalf. His email emphasized, "this is a problem you created," which implied that it was the tenant's problem to resolve. This interpretation is bolstered by the landlord's statement of his willingness to "help [the tenant] out." Nowhere in the email did the landlord state that he was releasing the tenant from her obligations under the lease.

Furthermore, the facts state that local residential rents had declined precipitously since early July, and it is unlikely that the landlord would voluntarily suffer any financial loss resulting from a re-let at a reduced rent.

Point One(c) (15%)

The landlord will argue alternatively that he had no duty to mitigate or, if he did, that he discharged it. Either way, he will claim that he can recover the 17 months of unpaid rent.

In a jurisdiction following the common-law no-mitigation rule, the landlord will argue that he had no duty to mitigate and that, because he did not accept the tenant's surrender (see Point One(b)), he is entitled to the 17 months of unpaid rent. In a jurisdiction that has enacted a statute requiring the landlord to mitigate, he will argue that that duty was satisfied. See Unif. Residential Landlord Tenant Act § 1.105(a) (1972). He advertised available apartments with a sign in front of the building, in a newspaper, and on a website, and that should be sufficient mitigation. The landlord also showed the tenant's apartment along with the other vacant apartments to prospective tenants, thereby providing a fair chance that the tenant's apartment would be rented before other apartments in the landlord's rental pool. On these facts, a court most likely would find that the landlord made reasonable efforts to mitigate.

Of those states requiring mitigation, none requires that mitigation be successful; in fact, if a court determined that the landlord made reasonable efforts to mitigate but was unsuccessful, the court would find that the landlord would be entitled to damages equal to the difference between the tenant's promised rent ($2,000/month) and the apartment's fair rental value. Given that the landlord took reasonable steps to mitigate and was unable to rent the tenant's unit "at any price," it appears that the fair rental value of the tenant's unit is $0. Thus, the landlord's position would be that he is entitled to $34,000 in damages ($2,000/month for 17 months). In other words, if the landlord did not accept the surrender, then regardless of whether the landlord had a duty to mitigate, the landlord is entitled to the 17 months of unpaid rent.

Point Two(a) (20%)

The tenant will argue that although the landlord's consent to an assignment was required, withholding consent must be reasonable, and here the landlord did not act reasonably.

The tenant should concede that the lease required the landlord's consent to an assignment. However, she will argue that the law requires the landlord to act reasonably in rejecting the proposed assignment and here the landlord was unreasonable. There is an emerging modern trend that a landlord's consent not be unreasonably withheld, which is based upon the principle that leases are subject to the good faith requirements of contracts in general. Thus, a minority of courts require that a landlord have a reasonable basis for withholding consent to a proposed transfer. See Kendall v. Ernest Pestana, Inc., 709 P.2d 837 (Cal. 1985) (commercial leases); see Siewert v. Casey, 80 So. 3d 1114, 1116 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2012) (residential lease); Pac. First Bank v. New Morgan Park Corp., 876 P.2d 761, 768 (Or. 1994); Basnett v. Vista Village Mobile Home Park, 699 P.2d 1343, 1346–47 (Colo. Ct. App. 1984), rev'd on other grounds, 731 P.2d 700, 704 (Colo. 1987) (residential leases).

Factors that may be considered under a reasonableness test include the proposed assignee's financial ability to pay, the suitability of the premises for the proposed assignee's use, and the need for alterations to accommodate the proposed assignee's use. Kendall, supra, at 842. It is not commercially reasonable to deny consent solely on the basis of personal taste, convenience, or sensibility. Id. Here, the facts suggest that the lawyer had the financial ability to pay the rent, and there is no indication that the lawyer intended to use the apartment for anything other than a residence. The tenant will also argue that the landlord's stated objection—"I've learned from personal experiences with [lawyers] as tenants that they argue about everything, make unreasonable demands, and make my life miserable"—is merely a matter of personal taste or convenience, and thus the landlord's refusal to consent was unreasonable.

Point Two(b) (15%)

The tenant will argue that the landlord accepted the surrender of the apartment, thus ending her obligation to pay rent.

The tenant will argue that the landlord accepted her surrender of the premises when he accepted the keys and emailed her, stating, "Although this is a problem you created, I want to be a nice guy and help you out. I feel pretty confident that I can find a suitable tenant who is not a lawyer to rent your apartment." Those words could be construed as a willingness to help the tenant by releasing her from her obligations under the lease. If the lease was terminated by the landlord's acceptance of the surrender, the landlord had no right to any rent after he accepted the keys and sent that email on July 26, 2015.

Point Two(c) (15%)

The tenant will argue that even if the landlord did not accept the surrender, he still had a duty to mitigate and failed to do so.

Alternatively, the tenant will argue that even if the landlord did not accept the surrender, he still had a duty to mitigate damages and that he failed to fulfill that duty. While most jurisdictions today reject the common-law rule that a landlord has no duty to mitigate, there is little guidance as to what efforts are sufficient to satisfy the mitigation requirement. Sprankling, supra, at 299. Some statutes have defined reasonable efforts as “steps which the landlord would have taken to rent the premises if they had been vacated in due course, provided that those steps are in accordance with local rental practice for similar properties.” Me. Rev. Stat. Tit. 14 § 6010-A (2); Wis. Stat. § 704.29(2). The tenant might argue that the landlord should have shown the tenant’s apartment to the exclusion of other vacant apartments in the landlord’s rental pool. She might also argue that there was some other deficiency in the landlord’s efforts. Her arguments on this point are weak, as noted above in Point One(c).

Lastly, the tenant will claim that because the landlord’s efforts to mitigate were insufficient, his claim that he could not rent the tenant’s apartment at any price is irrelevant. The tenant will further argue that the landlord is not entitled to 17 months of unpaid rent ($34,000) under the lease but would only be entitled to the difference between the rent owed under the lease and the fair rental value (i.e., the amount of rent the landlord could have recovered if he had made reasonable attempts to secure a substitute tenant). The fair rental value is presumably $1,000 a month in light of the fact that he was able to rent two of the other apartments for that amount. That would reduce the landlord’s damages to $17,000 (unpaid rent of $34,000 for the 17 months less $17,000, the fair rental value of the apartment over the 17-month period). Sprankling, supra, at 299.

In some jurisdictions, a landlord’s failure to mitigate would relieve the tenant of any liability for rent or damages after the date of abandonment because by failing to mitigate, the landlord is deemed to have accepted the surrender. See Unif. Residential Landlord and Tenant Act § 4.203(c). In those jurisdictions, the landlord would be entitled to no damages.

[NOTE: As explained in Point One(b), at common law if a tenant abandoned his or her apartment and the landlord did not accept the surrender, the landlord had no duty to mitigate damages. However, the landlord could sue the tenant only for past-due rents and, because rent was not due until the payment date, the landlord could not sue for future rents. There is an emerging doctrine applying contract principles to a lease that states that even if the landlord accepts surrender, the landlord is entitled to damages as a result of a tenant’s anticipatory repudiation of the lease. Sprankling, supra, at 294. Under this theory, a tenant would be liable for the difference, if any, between the rent due under the lease and the fair rental value of the premises plus the landlord’s consequential damages of advertising the unit for rent and the costs associated with showing it to prospective tenants. However, that possibility is written out of this question. Of course, if the duty to mitigate applies, contract damages rules apply.]

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the July 2017 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Constitutional Law question on the July 2017 MEE tested the following areas from the Constitutional Law outline: I.B.2. The nature of judicial review—Jurisdiction—The Eleventh Amendment and state sovereign immunity; III.B.1. The relation of nation and states in a federal system—Federalism-based limits on state authority—Negative implications of the commerce clause.

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by user jurisdictions as part of the bar examination on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Areas of law that may be covered on the MEE include the following: Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Civil Procedure, Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts (including Article 2 [Sales] of the Uniform Commercial Code), Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Article 9 (Secured Transactions) of the Uniform Commercial Code. Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles. Examinees in non-UBE jurisdictions should answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

TORTS QUESTION

On the evening of July 4, a woman went to the end of her dock to watch a fireworks display on the lake where her house was located. The woman's husband remained inside the house. The fireworks display was sponsored by the lake homeowners association, which had contracted with a fireworks company to plan and manage all aspects of the fireworks display.

The fireworks display was set off from a barge in the middle of the lake. During the finale, a mortar flew out horizontally instead of ascending into the sky. The mortar struck the woman's dock. She was hit by flaming debris and severely injured. When the woman's husband saw what had happened from inside the house, he rushed to help her. In his hurry, he tripped on a rug and fell down a flight of stairs, sustaining a serious fracture.

All the fireworks company employees are state-certified fireworks technicians, and the company followed all governmental fireworks regulations. It is not known why the mortar misfired.

The woman and her husband sued the homeowners association and the fireworks company to recover damages for their injuries under theories of strict liability and negligence. At trial, they established all of the above facts. They also established the following:

- 1) Nationally, accidents involving fireworks cause about 9,000 injuries and 5 deaths each year. About 15% of these accidents are caused by mortars misfiring in the course of professional fireworks displays, and some of these accidents occur despite compliance with governmental fireworks regulations.
- 2) Even with careful use by experts, fireworks mortars can still misfire.
- 3) Although a state statute requires a "safety zone" of 500 feet from the launching site of fireworks when those fireworks are launched on land, the statute does not refer to fireworks launched on water. Neither the homeowners association nor the fireworks company established such a zone.
- 4) The average fireworks-to-shore distance for this display was 1,000 feet. The woman's dock is 450 feet from the location of the fireworks barge; at only three other points on the lake is there land or a dock within 500 feet of the fireworks barge location.

After the conclusion of the plaintiffs' case, both the homeowners association and the fireworks company moved for a directed verdict on the basis that the facts established by the evidence did not support a verdict for the plaintiffs.

The trial judge granted the motion, based on these findings:

1. Fireworks displays are not an abnormally dangerous activity and thus are not subject to strict liability.
2. Based on the evidence submitted, a reasonable jury could not conclude that the conduct of the fireworks company was negligent.
3. The misfiring mortar was not the proximate cause of the husband's injuries.
4. The homeowners association cannot be held liable for the fireworks company's acts or omissions.

As to each of the judge's four findings, was the judge correct? Explain.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW QUESTION

Businesses in the United States make billions of dollars in payments each day by electronic funds transfers (also known as “wire transfers”). Banks allow their business customers to initiate payment orders for wire transfers by electronic means. To ensure that these electronic payment orders actually originate from their customers, and not from thieves, banks use a variety of security devices including passwords and data encryption. Despite these efforts, thieves sometimes circumvent banks’ security methods and cause banks to make unauthorized transfers from business customers’ bank accounts to the thieves’ accounts.

To combat this type of fraud, State A recently passed a law requiring all banks that offer funds transfer services to State A businesses to use biometric identification (e.g., fingerprints or retinal scans) to verify payment orders above $10,000. Although experts dispute whether biometric identification is significantly better than other security techniques, the State A legislature decided to require it after heavy lobbying from a State A–based manufacturer of biometric identification equipment.

A large bank, incorporated and headquartered in State B, provides banking services to businesses in every U.S. state, including State A. Implementation of biometric identification for this bank’s business customers in State A would require the bank to reprogram its entire U.S. electronic banking system at a cost of $50 million. The bank’s own security experts do not believe that biometric identification is a particularly reliable security system. Thus, instead of complying with State A’s new law, the bank informed its business customers in State A that it would no longer allow them to make electronically initiated funds transfers. Many of the bank’s business customers responded by shifting their business to other banks. The bank estimates that, as a result, it has lost profits in State A of $2 million.

There is no federal statute that governs the terms on which a bank may offer funds transfer services to its business customers or the security measures that banks must implement in connection with such services. The matter is governed entirely by state law.

The bank’s lawyers have drafted a complaint against State A and against State A’s Superintendent of Banking in her official capacity. The complaint alleges all the facts stated above and asserts that the State A statute requiring biometric identification as applied to the bank violates the U.S. Constitution. The complaint seeks $2 million in damages from State A as compensation for the bank’s lost profits. The complaint also seeks an injunction against the Superintendent of Banking to prevent her from taking any action to enforce the allegedly unconstitutional State A statute.

1. Can the bank maintain a suit in federal court against State A for damages? Explain.
2. Can the bank maintain a suit in federal court against the state Superintendent of Banking to enjoin her from enforcing the State A statute? Explain.
3. Is the State A statute unconstitutional? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

A garment manufacturer sells clothing to retail stores on credit terms pursuant to which the retail stores have 180 days after delivery of the clothing to pay the purchase price. Not surprisingly, the manufacturer often has cash-flow problems.

On February 1, the manufacturer entered into a transaction with a finance company pursuant to which the manufacturer sold to the finance company all of the manufacturer's outstanding rights to be paid by retail stores for clothing. The transaction was memorialized in a signed writing that described in detail the payment rights that were being sold. The finance company paid the manufacturer the agreed price for these rights that day but did not file a financing statement.

On March 15, the manufacturer borrowed money from a bank. Pursuant to the terms of the loan agreement, which was signed by both parties, the manufacturer granted the bank a security interest in all of the manufacturer's "present and future accounts" to secure the manufacturer's obligation to repay the loan. On the same day, the bank filed a properly completed financing statement in the appropriate filing office. The financing statement listed the manufacturer as debtor and the bank as secured party. The collateral was indicated as "all of [the manufacturer's] present and future accounts."

There are no other filed financing statements that list the manufacturer as debtor.

On May 25, the manufacturer defaulted on its repayment obligation to the bank. Shortly thereafter, the bank sent signed letters to each of the retail stores to which the manufacturer sold clothing on credit. The letters instructed each retail store to pay to the bank any amounts that the store owed to the manufacturer for clothing purchased on credit. The letter explained that the manufacturer had defaulted on its obligation to the bank and that the bank was exercising its rights as a secured party.

The finance company recently learned about the bank's actions. The finance company informed the bank that the finance company had purchased some of the rights to payment being claimed by the bank. The finance company demanded that the bank cease its efforts to collect on those rights to payment.

Meanwhile, some of the retail stores responded to the bank's letters by refusing to pay the bank. These stores contend that they have no obligations to the bank and that payment to the manufacturer will discharge their payment obligations.

1. As between the bank and the finance company, which (if either) has a superior right to the claims against the retail stores for the money the retail stores owe the manufacturer for clothing they bought on credit before February 1? Explain.
2. Are the retail stores correct that they have no obligations to the bank and that paying the manufacturer will discharge their payment obligations? Explain.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES/TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS QUESTION

In 2012, Testator wrote by hand a document labeled "My Will." The dispositive provisions in that document read:

A. I give $50,000 to my cousin, Bob;

B. I give my household goods to those persons mentioned in a memorandum I will write addressed to my executor; and

C. I leave the balance of my estate to Bank, as trustee, to hold in trust to pay the income to my child, Sam, for life and, when Sam dies, to distribute the trust principal in equal shares to his children who attain age 21.

After Testator finished writing the will, he walked into his kitchen where his cousin (Bob) and his neighbor were sitting. After showing them the will and telling them what it was but not what it said, Testator signed it at the end in their presence. Testator then asked Bob and his neighbor to be witnesses. They agreed and then signed, as witnesses, immediately below Testator's signature. The will did not contain an attestation clause or a self-proving will affidavit.

When the will was signed, Sam and his only child, Amy, age 19, were living. Testator also had an adult daughter.

In 2015, Testator saw an attorney about a new will because he wanted to change the age at which Sam's children would take the trust principal from 21 to 25. The attorney told Testator that he could avoid the expense of a new will by executing a codicil that would republish the earlier will and provide that, when Sam died, the trust principal would pass to Sam's children who attain age 25. The attorney then prepared a codicil to that effect, which was properly executed and witnessed by two individuals unrelated to Testator.

Two months ago, Testator died. The documents prepared by Testator and his attorney were found among Testator's possessions, together with a memorandum addressed to his executor in which Testator stated that he wanted his furniture to go to his aunt. This memorandum was dated three days after Testator's codicil was duly executed. The memorandum was signed by Testator, but it was not witnessed.

Testator is survived by his aunt, his cousin Bob, and Sam's two children, Amy, age 24, and Dan, age 3. (Sam predeceased Testator.) Testator is also survived by his adult daughter, who was not mentioned in any of the documents found among Testator's possessions.

This jurisdiction does not recognize holographic wills. Under its laws, Testator's daughter is not a pretermitted heir. The jurisdiction has enacted the following statute:

Any nonvested interest that is invalid under the common law Rule Against Perpetuities is nonetheless valid if it actually vests, or fails to vest, within 21 years after some life in being at the creation of the interest.

To whom should Testator's estate be distributed? Explain.

EVIDENCE/CRIMINAL LAW & PROCEDURE QUESTION

A woman is on trial for the attempted murder of a man whom she shot with a handgun on March 1. According to a State A police report:

The woman started dating the man in August. A few months later, after the woman broke up with him, the man began calling the woman's cell phone and hanging up without saying anything. In February, the man called and said, "I promise you'll be happy if you take me back, but very unhappy if you do not." The following week, to protect herself against the man, the woman lawfully bought a handgun.

On March 1, the woman was working late in her office. At 10:00 p.m., the man entered the woman's office without knocking. The woman immediately grabbed the gun and shot the man once, hitting him in the shoulder.

The police arrived at the scene at 10:10 p.m. By this time, a number of people had gathered outside the doorway of the woman's office. A police officer entered the office, and his partner blocked the doorway so that the woman could not leave and no one could enter. The officer immediately seized the gun from the woman and asked her, without providing Miranda warnings, "Do you have any other weapons?" She responded, "I have a can of pepper spray in my purse. Is that a weapon?"

At 10:20 p.m., after the woman had been arrested and the man taken to the hospital, a custodian told the police officer, "I didn't see the shooting, but I heard some noises in the hall around 10 and then a loud bang and screaming."

A few hours later, at the hospital, the man told the police officer that he had entered the woman's office just to speak with her and that the woman had shot him without provocation.

The woman will defend against the attempted murder charge on the ground that she acted in self-defense. In State A, self-defense is defined as "the use of force upon or toward another person when the defendant reasonably believes that such force is immediately necessary for the purpose of protecting himself against the use of unlawful force by such other person on the present occasion."

State A has adopted evidence rules identical to the Federal Rules of Evidence. State A follows the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States when interpreting protections provided to criminal defendants under the U.S. Constitution.

The prosecution and the defense have fully complied with all pretrial notice requirements, the authenticity of all the evidence has been established, and the court has rejected defense objections based on the Confrontation Clause.

The woman, the man, and the police officer will testify at trial. The custodian is unavailable to testify at trial.

Evidence/Criminal Law & Procedure Question

Under the Miranda doctrine and the rules of evidence, explain how the court should rule on the admissibility of the following evidence:

1. Testimony from the woman, offered by the defense, repeating the man's statement, "I promise you'll be happy if you take me back, but very unhappy if you do not."
2. Testimony from the police officer, offered by the prosecution, repeating the woman's statement, "I have a can of pepper spray in my purse. Is that a weapon?"
3. Testimony from the police officer, offered by the prosecution, repeating the custodian's statement, "I didn't see the shooting, but I heard some noises in the hall around 10 and then a loud bang and screaming."

CIVIL PROCEDURE/CONFLICT OF LAWS QUESTION

Taxes Inc. (“Taxes”) is a tax preparation business incorporated in State A, where it has its corporate headquarters. Taxes operates five tax preparation offices in the “Two Towns” metropolitan area, which straddles the border between State A and State B. Three of the Taxes tax preparation offices are located in Salem, State A; the other two are in Plymouth, State B.

A woman, a recent college graduate, was hired by Taxes and trained to work as a tax preparer in one of its offices in Salem, State A. The woman and Taxes entered into a written employment contract in State A that included a noncompete covenant prohibiting her from working as a tax preparer in the Two Towns metropolitan area for a period of 24 months after leaving Taxes’s employment. The employment contract also provided that it was “governed by State A law.”

After working for Taxes for three years, the woman quit her job with Taxes, moved out of her parents’ home in State A (where she had been living since her college graduation), and moved into an apartment she had rented in Plymouth, State B. Two weeks later, she opened a tax preparation business in Plymouth.

Taxes promptly filed suit against the woman in the federal district court for State A, properly invoking the court’s diversity jurisdiction. The complaint alleged all the facts stated above, claimed that the woman was preparing taxes in violation of the noncompete covenant in her employment contract, and sought an injunction of 22 months’ duration against her continued preparation of tax returns for any paying customers in the Two Towns metropolitan area.

Taxes delivered a copy of the summons and complaint to the home of the woman’s parents in State A (the address that she had listed as her home address when she was employed by Taxes). The process server left the materials with the woman’s father.

Each state has service-of-process rules identical to those in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

Under State A law, covenants not to compete are valid so long as they are reasonable in terms of geographic scope and duration. The State A Supreme Court has previously upheld noncompete covenants identical to the covenant at issue in this case. When determining whether to give effect to a contractual choice-of-law clause, State A follows the Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws.

Under State B law, covenants not to compete are also valid if they are reasonable in scope and duration. However, the State B Supreme Court has held that noncompete covenants are unreasonable and unenforceable as a matter of law if they exceed 18 months in duration. While State B generally gives effect to choice-of-law clauses in contracts, it has a statute that provides that choice-of-law clauses in employment contracts are unenforceable. When there is no effective choice-of-law clause, State B follows the lex loci contractus approach to choice of law in contract matters.

Rather than file an answer to Taxes’s complaint, the woman filed a motion pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) to dismiss the action for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. The woman’s motion argued that the noncompete covenant is invalid and unenforceable as a matter of law. Two days after filing the motion to dismiss, and before Taxes had responded to the motion, the woman filed an “amended motion to dismiss.” The amended motion sought dismissal on the same basis as the original motion (failure to state a claim), but also asked the court to dismiss the action for insufficient service of process.

1. Should the court consider the woman’s motion to dismiss for insufficient service of process? Explain.
2. If the court considers the woman’s motion to dismiss for insufficient service of process, should it grant that motion? Explain.
3. In ruling on the woman’s motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, which state’s choice-of-law approach should the court follow? Explain.
4. Which state law should the court apply to determine the enforceability of the noncompete covenant? Explain.

TORTS ANALYSIS

TOR II.E.1., F.2.; III.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is a public fireworks display an abnormally dangerous activity subject to strict liability?
- (2) Based on the evidence submitted by the woman and her husband, could a reasonable jury find that the conduct of the fireworks company was negligent?
- (3) When is an actor's creation of a dangerous situation the proximate cause of injuries suffered by a person who was rushing to respond to the danger?
- (4) When is a person liable for the acts or omissions of an independent contractor employed by that person?

DISCUSSION

Summary

It is unclear whether the trial judge erred in ruling that a public fireworks display is not an abnormally dangerous activity subject to strict liability. Such a display is not a matter of common usage, as traditionally defined, and it presents substantial risks that cannot be eliminated with the exercise of reasonable care. However, some courts, relying on the Second Restatement of Torts factors, have found that public fireworks displays are not abnormally dangerous because of their value to the community.

The judge erred in directing a verdict for the defendants on the negligence claim because adherence to a statutory standard does not insulate a defendant from liability for negligence, and the evidence showed a foreseeable risk of harm and precautions that would have eliminated the risk without undue burden.

Because danger invites rescue, the trial judge erred in concluding that the misfiring mortar was not the proximate cause of the husband's injuries. The judge also erred in concluding that the homeowners association could not be held liable for the acts of the fireworks company, because one who employs an independent contractor is subject to liability for the contractor's failure to take reasonable precautions when there is a special danger inherent in the work, and the harm that occurred here was the result of a special danger inherent in fireworks displays.

Point One (40%)

The trial court's finding that a public fireworks display is not an abnormally dangerous activity subject to strict liability may or may not have been correct. A public fireworks display is not a matter of common usage and has substantial risks that cannot be eliminated. But some courts, relying on the Second Restatement of Torts factors, have found that public fireworks are nonetheless not abnormally dangerous because of their value to the community.

The modern doctrine of strict liability for abnormally dangerous activities derives from Fletcher v. Rylands, 159 Eng. Rep. 737 (1865), rev'd, 1 L.R.-Ex. 265, [1866] All E.R. 1, 6, aff'd sub nom. Rylands v. Fletcher, 3 L.R.-H.L. 330, [1868] All E.R. 1, 12, in which the defendant's reservoir flooded mine shafts on the plaintiff's adjoining land. Rylands has come to stand for the rule that "the defendant will be liable when he damages another by a thing or activity unduly dangerous and inappropriate to the place where it is maintained, in the light of the character of that place and its surroundings." W. Page Keeton et al., Prosser and Keeton on Torts § 78, at 547–48 (5th ed. 1984).

Today, the determination of whether an activity is unduly dangerous, and thus subject to strict liability, is generally governed by factors outlined in the Restatement of Torts. Under the First Restatement, strict liability applied to an "ultra-hazardous" activity. Under the Second and Third Restatements, strict liability applies to an "abnormally dangerous activity." Section 520 of the Restatement (Second) lists six factors that are to be considered in determining whether an activity is abnormally dangerous:

- (a) existence of a high degree of risk of some harm to the person, land or chattels of others;
- (b) likelihood that the harm that results from it will be great;
- (c) inability to eliminate the risk by the exercise of reasonable care;
- (d) extent to which the activity is not a matter of common usage;
- (e) inappropriateness of the activity to the place where it is carried on; and
- (f) extent to which its value to the community is outweighed by its dangerous attributes.

Restatement (Second) of Torts § 520 (1977). Comments to the Restatement explain that "several [factors are] ordinarily . . . required for strict liability [but] . . . it is not necessary that each of them be present. . . . The essential question is whether the risk created is so unusual, either because of its magnitude or because of the circumstances surrounding it, as to justify the imposition of strict liability for the harm that results from it, even though it is carried on with all reasonable care." Id., comment f. The Second Restatement continued to define "common usage" narrowly. To be a matter of common usage, an activity must be carried on "by the great mass of mankind or by many people in the community." Id. at comment i (identical to comment e in the Restatement (First)).

As in the First Restatement, under the relatively new Third Restatement, the strict liability determination is based on only two factors. An activity is abnormally dangerous if (1) the activity creates a foreseeable and highly significant risk of physical harm even when reasonable care is exercised by all actors; and (2) the activity is not one of common usage. Restatement of Torts (Third) § 20(b). However, the Third Restatement employs a much broader definition of "common usage" than that of the First and Second Restatements. Under the Third Restatement, “activities can be in common use even if they are engaged in by only a limited number of actors”:

Consider the company that transmits electricity through wires. . . . The activity itself is engaged in by only one party. Even so, electric wires . . . are pervasive within the community. Moreover, most people, though not themselves engaging in the activity, are connected to the activity. . . . The concept of common usage can be extended further to activities that, though not pervasive, are nevertheless common and familiar within the community. If in this sense the activity is normal, it is difficult to regard the activity as exceptional or abnormally dangerous.

Id., comment j.

On the other hand, § 20 comment k specifies that “the value that the defendant or others derive from the activity is not a direct factor in determining whether the activity is abnormally dangerous.” Id., comment k. It is thus unclear whether, under the Third Restatement, more or fewer activities would be classified as abnormally dangerous than under the Second Restatement.

The classic example of an abnormally dangerous activity is blasting. Courts in virtually all jurisdictions have held that this activity is subject to strict liability, citing its potential for extensive harm, the fact that it is not a matter of common usage, and the actors’ inability to eliminate risk. See, e.g., Spano v. Perini Corp., 250 N.E.2d 31 (N.Y. 1969).

Courts have divided as to whether legal fireworks displays should be classified as abnormally dangerous and thus subject to strict liability. Compare Miller v. Westcor Ltd. Partnership, 831 P.2d 386 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1992), and Klein v. Pyrodyne Corp., 810 P.2d 917 (Wash. 1991) (imposing strict liability), with Litzmann v. Humboldt County, 273 P.2d 82, 88 (Cal. Dist. Ct. App. 1954); Cadena v. Chicago Fireworks Mfg. Co., 697 N.E.2d 802 (Ill. App. Ct. 1998); and Haddon v. Lotito, 161 A.2d 160 (Pa. 1960) (finding no strict liability).

Courts that have classified fireworks displays as abnormally dangerous have tended to focus on the fact that fireworks are much like blasting in that “[a]nytime a person ignites aerial shells or rockets with the intention of sending them aloft to explode in the presence of large crowds of people, a high risk of serious personal injury or property damage is created. . . . Furthermore, no matter how much care pyro-technicians exercise, they cannot entirely eliminate the high risk inherent in setting off powerful explosives such as fireworks near crowds.” Klein, supra. Courts that have declined to classify legal fireworks displays as abnormally dangerous have tended to focus on their value to the community. See Lipka v. DiLungo, No. CV-407399, 2000 WL 295355 (Conn. Super. Ct. Mar. 8, 2000).

Under the limited factors of the First and Third Restatements, the case for holding that public fireworks displays are abnormally dangerous is very strong. This activity is not one carried on by the “mass of men” given that it is legally performed only by trained, licensed personnel. Its risks, given the large number of people who watch such displays, cannot be eliminated.

Torts Analysis

Using the multiple-factor approach of the Second Restatement, one can justify a finding that fireworks displays are not abnormally dangerous based on their popularity and value to the community and relatively low risk to any particular individual. Under the Third Restatement, the value of fireworks to the community would be irrelevant, but it might be characterized as a matter of common usage given that fireworks, like electrical wires, are pervasive, at least on certain holidays.

Thus, it is unclear whether the trial court erred in finding that public fireworks displays are not an abnormally dangerous activity. However, if the court relied on the Second Restatement, other courts have reached the same conclusion. The court's conclusion could also be justified under the Third Restatement given its novel definition of common usage.

[NOTE: An examinee's conclusion is less important than his or her reasoning on whether a public fireworks display is an abnormally dangerous activity. A good answer need not analyze each theory discussed above.]

Point Two (25%)

The trial judge incorrectly directed a verdict for the fireworks company on the negligence claim. Adherence to a statutory standard does not insulate a defendant from liability for negligence, and the evidence showed a foreseeable risk of harm that precautions would have reduced without undue burden.

Although the unexcused violation of a statutory standard of care is negligence per se, the converse is not true: an actor who has complied with all statutory standards may still be found negligent if his conduct is not reasonable under the circumstances. In judging whether an actor's conduct is reasonable, the trier of fact will consider the burden of taking precautions as compared to the risks inherent in the actor's conduct and the probability that those risks will materialize. See Richard A. Epstein, Torts § 6.5 (1999).

Here, all the fireworks company's employees were state-certified fireworks technicians, and the company followed all governmental fireworks regulations. However, the plaintiffs' evidence established that there was a foreseeable risk of a misfiring mortar even when the fireworks display was performed with due care; the risk of misfire cannot be eliminated. The evidence also established that a misfiring mortar can cause death or serious injury to a bystander. Nationally, accidents involving fireworks cause about 9,000 injuries and 5 deaths each year. About 15% of fireworks accidents are caused by mortars misfiring in the course of professional fireworks displays, and some of these accidents occur despite compliance with governmental fireworks regulations.

In recognition of the risks associated with the discharge of fireworks, a state statute imposes a 500-foot safety zone for fireworks displays on land. Although the statute does not refer to fireworks displays on water, it arguably provides a reasonable standard for determining a safety zone for a fireworks display on water. The evidence also showed that a 500-foot safety zone would not have hindered spectators at the lake fireworks display to any significant extent, as only four potential viewing spots lie within this area. Because the fireworks company's employees were all state-certified fireworks technicians, a reasonable jury could have concluded that both the risk of injury and the utility of a 500-foot safety zone were known to the fireworks company. It could also have concluded that the fireworks company or the homeowners association, with very little cost or inconvenience, could have identified the four viewing spots within the 500-foot safety zone and warned potential spectators of the hazard of watching from those locations.

Thus, the court erred in directing a verdict for the fireworks company on the negligence issue: adherence to a statutory standard does not insulate an actor from liability, and there was evidence on which a jury could have based a negligence finding.

Point Three (15%)

The trial court incorrectly found that the misfiring mortar was not the proximate cause of the husband's injuries because danger invites rescue.

Liability typically extends only to individuals within the zone of risk. If an actor's conduct "creates a recognizable risk of harm only to a particular class of persons, the fact that it causes harm to a person of a different class, to whom the actor could not reasonably have anticipated injury, does not render the actor liable to the persons so injured." Restatement (Second) of Torts § 281, comment c. Liability also typically extends only to foreseeable hazards. The actor whose conduct is responsible for an altogether unexpected type of injury usually escapes liability. See Palsgraf v. Long Island Railroad, 162 N.E. 99 (N.Y. 1928).

Here, because the husband was inside his house, he was probably outside the area in which risks from a fireworks display were to be anticipated. He also suffered a different injury (fracture) from that which one would usually anticipate (burns, impact harm) from fireworks exposure.

However, courts have long held that injuries sustained when running from danger are foreseeable. See, e.g., Tuttle v. Atlantic City R.R., 49 A. 450 (N.J. 1901). They have also held that "danger invites rescue." Wagner v. International Ry. Co., 133 N.E. 437 (N.Y. 1921). "The wrong that imperils life is a wrong . . . to his rescuer." Id. Thus, because the husband was a rescuer and his injuries are typical of those an individual rushing from (or to) a dangerous situation would sustain, the trial court erred in concluding that the acts and omissions of the homeowners association and the fireworks company were not the proximate cause of his injuries.

Point Four (20%)

The trial court incorrectly found that the homeowners association could not be held liable for the fireworks company's acts or omissions. One who employs an independent contractor is subject to liability for the contractor's failure to take reasonable precautions as to danger inherent in the work.

An independent contractor is one who, by virtue of his contract, possesses independence in the manner and method of performing the work he has contracted to perform for the other party to the contract. Independent contractors are usually paid by the job instead of receiving ongoing salaries; the individual who hires an independent contractor typically does not supervise the contractor's activities or retain a right to control his activities. See Epstein, supra, § 9.11. The fireworks company is an independent contractor: it was hired by the homeowners association for a specific job, to plan and manage the fireworks display. The homeowners association did not supervise the fireworks company's work or have any control over its operations.

Typically, one who employs an independent contractor is not vicariously liable for the contractor's acts or omissions. But when an actor "employs an independent contractor to do work involving a special danger to others which the employer knows or has reason to know to be inherent in or normal to the work . . . [he] is subject to liability for physical harm caused to such others by the contractor's failure to take reasonable precautions against such danger." Restatement (Second) of Torts § 427.

Here, the homeowners association had reason to know that fireworks are inherently risky; thousands of fireworks injuries occur each year, and the risk cannot be eliminated even when fireworks are used by experts. Thus, the trial court's conclusion that the association could not be held liable for the fireworks company's acts was erroneous.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Can a private company maintain a suit against a state in federal court seeking damages based upon a claim that the state injured its business by enforcing an unconstitutional law?
- (2) Can a private company maintain a suit against a state official in federal court to enjoin that official from enforcing an allegedly unconstitutional law?
- (3) Does a state law that requires a multistate business to adopt expensive security measures as a condition of providing certain services in the state impose an unconstitutional burden on interstate commerce?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The bank cannot maintain a suit against State A for damages in federal court. The Eleventh Amendment precludes the federal court from exercising jurisdiction over a suit by a private party seeking to recover damages from a state.

The court can hear the bank's claim against the Superintendent of Banking because the bank has sued the superintendent in her official capacity and is seeking injunctive relief only.

Although the statute does not discriminate against interstate commerce, it does impose a significant burden on interstate commerce. A court could conclude that the law unconstitutionally burdens interstate commerce if the court finds that the burden imposed is clearly excessive in relation to the purported benefits. A balancing of benefits and burdens would require the court to evaluate the extent of the actual burden the statute imposes on the bank and whether the statute has substantial fraud-protection benefits.

Point One (30%)

Because states are immune under the Eleventh Amendment from suits for damages in federal court, a federal court would dismiss the bank's damages claim against State A if State A made a claim of sovereign immunity.

The Eleventh Amendment provides that "the Judicial power of the United States" does not extend to "any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State" U.S. Const. amend. XI. As "one of the United States," State A is immune from suit unless it agrees to be sued. While this immunity of States from suits has been described as an "anachronistic survival of monarchical privilege," it is nonetheless firmly established. Kennecott Copper Corp. v. State Tax Comm., 327 U.S. 573, 580 (1946)

(Frankfurter, J., dissenting). While a state may waive its immunity, see Clark v. Barnard, 108 U.S. 436, 447 (1883), there is no evidence that State A has done so in this case. Here, the bank, a resident of State B, is suing State A for damages in federal court; this is barred by the Eleventh Amendment.

[NOTE: A state's Eleventh Amendment immunity may be abrogated in certain circumstances by congressional action under Congress's enforcement powers in the Fourteenth Amendment. There is no such action by Congress in this case, so the exception is not germane.]

Point Two (30%)

Pursuant to the doctrine of Ex parte Young, a suit against State A's Superintendent of Banking to enjoin the enforcement of an allegedly unconstitutional statute is not barred by the Eleventh Amendment.

"Official-capacity actions [against state officials] for prospective relief are not treated as actions against the State." Kentucky v. Graham, 473 U.S. 159, 167 n. 14 (1985), citing Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908). Thus, even when a damages claim against the state is barred under the Eleventh Amendment, a suit against public officials in their official capacity seeking an injunction may be maintained.

Here, the bank could maintain an action in federal court against State A's Superintendent of Banking in her official capacity to enjoin enforcement of an allegedly unconstitutional law.

[NOTE: An examinee might also point out that the federal court would have jurisdiction over this suit because the bank's claim raises a federal question.]

Point Three (40%)

Although the statute does not discriminate against interstate commerce, it does impose a significant burden on interstate commerce. A court could conclude that the law unconstitutionally burdens interstate commerce if the court determines that the burden imposed is clearly excessive in relation to the purported benefits.

The Supreme Court of the United States has long held that the Constitution's grant to Congress of the power to regulate interstate commerce also limits, by implication, the right of state or local governments to adopt laws that regulate interstate commerce. See John E. Nowak & Ronald D. Rotunda, Constitutional Law § 8.1 (8th ed. 2010). This is often referred to as "dormant commerce clause" analysis. A state law that discriminates against interstate commerce in a way "that operates as . . . a tariff or trade barrier against out-of-state interests" is subject to strict review and is virtually per se unconstitutional. Id. See, e.g., C & A Carbone, Inc. v. Clarkstown, 511 U.S. 383 (1994). A nondiscriminatory state law that imposes an "incidental" burden on interstate commerce will nonetheless be unconstitutional if the burden it imposes is "clearly excessive in relation to the putative local benefits." Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc., 397 U.S. 137, 142 (1970).

The State A law in this case is facially nondiscriminatory. It applies equally to local banks and to banks from other states. There are also no facts to suggest that it operates in a discriminatory fashion or that it imposes a heavier burden on out-of-state banks offering services to State A businesses than it imposes on in-state banks.

Because the law “regulates evenhandedly,” the question is whether it “effectuate[s] a legitimate local public interest” and whether the burden, if any, is “clearly excessive in relation to the putative local benefits.” Id.

State A plainly has a “legitimate local public interest” in protecting local businesses from the significant losses that can result from electronic funds transfer fraud. State A’s law seeks to reduce such fraud by requiring banks to adopt certain security measures that the legislature believes will reduce the risk of such fraud. The legislature’s judgment that biometric identification is superior to other anti-fraud techniques is not a judgment that a court will normally second-guess. State A adopted its law in response to lobbying by a local business that stands to benefit from the law. But that does not mean that the law does not serve a legitimate state interest. Cf. Minnesota v. Clover Leaf Creamery Co., 449 U.S. 456, 466 (1981) (court accepts judgment of Minnesota legislature that a ban on plastic nonreturnable milk containers serves environmental goals despite contrary evidence suggesting that such a ban would cause continued use of “ecologically undesirable paperboard milk containers.”). However, it is unclear whether the security measures required by State A produce real and substantial benefits.

The benefits of the law must be weighed against the burden it imposes. The law burdens interstate commerce by increasing the expenses of out-of-state banks that wish to offer certain electronic banking services to State A businesses. Compliance with the law would require the bank to make substantial changes to its entire electronic banking system at a cost of $50 million. This cost is substantial enough to deter the bank from offering certain services in State A at all. A court could find that this is a real and substantial burden placed on interstate commerce.

In sum, if the benefits of the security measures required by State A are substantial enough to justify the burdens, the statute is constitutional. Otherwise, it is not.

DISCUSSION

Summary

The sale of payment rights from the manufacturer to the finance company is a sale of accounts governed by Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code. Because the finance company did not file a financing statement, it has an unperfected security interest in the accounts. By contrast, the bank subsequently was granted a security interest in the same accounts, and that security interest was perfected. Accordingly, the perfected security interest of the bank has priority over the finance company's unperfected interest in the accounts.

The retail stores are incorrect that they have no obligations to the bank. Because the retail stores received an authenticated (signed) notification of the assignment of their accounts to the bank, they can discharge their obligations only by paying the bank.

Point One(a) (30%)

The sale by the manufacturer to the finance company of the right to be paid by the retail stores for items of clothing is a sale of accounts governed by Article 9 of the UCC, and the finance company is said to have a "security interest." Because the finance company did not file a financing statement, this security interest is unperfected.

The sale by the manufacturer to the finance company of the right to be paid by the retail stores is a sale of "accounts" as that term is defined in Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code. UCC § 9-102(a)(2). A sale of accounts is governed by UCC Article 9 even though the transaction is not one in which property secures an obligation. UCC § 9-109(a)(3). (There are a few exceptions to Article 9's coverage of sales of accounts, but they are not germane to this problem. See generally UCC § 9-109(c)–(d).) Because Article 9 governs a sale of accounts, Article 9 vocabulary is applied to the sale, so that the rights of the buyer of the accounts are referred to as a “security interest,” the sold accounts are “collateral,” the seller (the garment manufacturer in this problem) is the “debtor,” and the buyer (the finance company in this problem) is the “secured party.” See UCC §§ 1-201(b)(35) and 9-102(a)(12), (28), and (73). Moreover, because the agreement of sale is “an agreement that creates or provides for a security interest,” it is a security agreement. UCC § 9-102(a)(74).

The finance company’s security interest is enforceable and has attached because the three criteria in UCC § 9-203(b) are satisfied: (i) “value” has been given inasmuch as the finance company has paid the purchase price (see UCC § 1-204), (ii) the debtor (the manufacturer) had rights in the collateral (the accounts sold), and (iii) the debtor “authenticated” (signed or its electronic equivalent, see UCC § 9-102(a)(7)) a security agreement containing a description of the collateral. The finance company’s security interest, however, is not “perfected” because no financing statement has been filed with respect to the transaction. See UCC §§ 9-308, 9-310.

Accordingly, the finance company has an unperfected security interest in the rights to be paid by the retail stores.

Point One(b) (30%)

The manufacturer granted to the bank an enforceable and attached security interest in the right to be paid by the retail stores. Because the bank filed a financing statement with respect to this security interest, the bank’s security interest is perfected.

The bank also has an enforceable and attached security interest in the right to be paid by the retail stores that bought clothing from the manufacturer on credit. First, value has been given because the bank loaned money to the manufacturer. See UCC § 9-203(b)(1). Second, the debtor (the manufacturer) still had rights in the collateral. See UCC § 9-203(b)(2). This is the case because even though the manufacturer had already sold the accounts to the finance company, the finance company’s interest was unperfected. See UCC § 9-318(b). Third, the manufacturer authenticated (signed, in this case) a security agreement containing a description of the collateral (the accounts). See UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(A).

Unlike the finance company’s security interest, the bank’s security interest is perfected because the bank filed a properly completed financing statement. See UCC §§ 9-308, 9-310(a).

[NOTE: An examinee might mistakenly assert that the bank does not have an enforceable security interest in the pre-February 1 accounts because one of the three elements of an enforceable and attached security interest (that the debtor had rights in the collateral) is not satisfied inasmuch as the garment manufacturer had previously sold those accounts to the finance company. This assertion would be accurate if the finance company had perfected its interest, but, as indicated in UCC § 9-318(b) and noted in Point One(b) of the analysis, if a buyer of accounts does not perfect its interest, the seller is treated as continuing to have rights in those accounts. Thus, in this case, the manufacturer continues to have sufficient rights in the pre-February 1 accounts for the bank’s security interest to attach.

Nonetheless, an examinee who makes that mistaken assertion should receive some credit for recognizing that a debtor must have rights in the collateral for a creditor to have an enforceable security interest in that collateral. Such an examinee should also conclude that, because the bank has obtained no rights in the pre-February 1 accounts from the garment manufacturer, the retail stores would have no obligation to pay the bank amounts due on those accounts even after receiving the notifications of assignment from the bank. See Point Two. An examinee who reaches that conclusion based on the mistaken assertion should receive full credit if the examinee also correctly notes that the bank has a right to collect from the retailers on the post-February 1 accounts (which were not sold to the finance company). Conversely, an examinee who asserts, in answer to the first question, that the bank does not have an enforceable security interest but nonetheless concludes, in answer to the second question, that the retail stores must pay the bank to discharge their payment obligation on the pre-February 1 accounts, should not receive credit for that conclusion inasmuch as, under UCC § 9-406(a), the bank would not be an assignee and its notice to the retail stores would have no effect.]

Point One(c) (20%)

The finance company's unperfected security interest in the rights to be paid by the retail stores is subordinate to the bank's perfected security interest in those rights.

An unperfected security interest is subordinate to a perfected security interest in the same property (see UCC §§ 9-317(a)(1) and 9-322(a)(2)). Therefore, because the finance company's security interest in the rights to be paid by the retail stores is unperfected while the bank's security interest in those rights is perfected, the finance company's interest in those rights is subordinate to the bank's security interest in them. This is the case even though the sale of the rights to the finance company occurred before the bank was granted a security interest in them.

Point Two (20%)

Because the retail stores received authenticated (signed) notifications of the assignment of their accounts to the bank and directions to pay the bank, they can discharge their obligations on the accounts only by paying the bank, the assignee.

The retail stores are "account debtors" on the accounts. UCC § 9-102(a)(3). Under UCC § 9-406(a), an account debtor with respect to assigned accounts is entitled to discharge its obligation by paying the assignor only until the account debtor receives notice of the assignment to the assignee, authenticated by either the assignor or the assignee, directing the account debtor to make payment to the assignee. Once such a notice has been received, the account debtor is entitled to discharge only by paying the assignee. The retail stores have received a notice of the assignment authenticated (signed) by the assignee (the bank) directing them to pay the assignee. Accordingly, under UCC § 9-406(a), the retail stores can discharge their obligations on the accounts only by paying the bank (the assignee).

[NOTE: When an account debtor receives notification of an assignment, the account debtor may request reasonable proof that the assignment has been made and, until such proof is furnished, may still discharge its obligation by paying the assignor. See UCC § 9-406(c). Under these facts, there is no indication that any of the retail stores (the account debtors) requested such proof.]

DECEDENTS' ESTATES/TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS ANALYSIS

DEC II.A.4., A.5., C. / TRU II.F.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Was Testator's will validly executed?
- (2) Is Bob, an interested witness, entitled to take the $50,000 bequest because Testator's codicil stated that he republished his will?
- (3) Is the handwritten memorandum signed by Testator disposing of his household goods valid to distribute that property to his aunt?
- (4) Under this jurisdiction's statute, is Testator's bequest of the balance of his estate to Sam's children who attain age 25 valid, or does it pass to Testator's heirs?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Testator's will was validly executed because it was executed in a manner that satisfies the statute of wills in every state: Testator declared the document to be his will to the witnesses, the witnesses acted at his request, Testator signed it at the end, in the presence of the witnesses, and they signed in his presence and in the presence of each other.

Although, at common law, a will was invalid if witnessed by an interested witness (a witness taking a bequest under the will), that is not the law in any state today. Instead, if a will is witnessed by an interested witness, it is valid, but the bequest to the interested witness is either unaffected or, in many states, is forfeited unless the will was also witnessed by two disinterested witnesses. However, even in the latter states, the bequest to Bob would be saved because the codicil, which was witnessed by two disinterested witnesses, republished the will in its entirety. Thus, the original will is deemed to have been witnessed by the witnesses to the codicil and not by Bob and the neighbor.

Many states statutorily validate the bequest of tangibles even though contained in an unwitnessed holographic writing signed after the will was executed. However, without such a statute, the memorandum would not be valid under the incorporation-by-reference doctrine to dispose of Testator's household goods because it was not in existence when the will or the codicil was signed.

The bequest to the grandchildren is valid under the common law Rule Against Perpetuities. Because Sam predeceased Testator, the grandchildren are the validating measuring lives under the Rule Against Perpetuities. Thus, the residue of Testator's estate passes to Sam's children who reach 25, or if none, to Testator's heirs.

Point One (30%)

Testator's will was validly executed.

Every statute of wills has formalities that must be met for a will to be validly executed. These invariably include a writing, a signature of the testator, and at least two witnesses. All of these requirements were met here. Additional requirements may apply, including a requirement that the will be declared as such to the witnesses, that the testator request the witnesses to sign, and that the testator sign the will at the end. These requirements were met here, too. Thus, the will complies with every statute of wills. See generally William M. McGovern, Sheldon F. Kurtz & David M. English, Wills, Trusts, and Estates 197–200 (4th ed. 2010).

Under the common law, Testator's will would be invalid because one of the witnesses was an interested witness (i.e., a witness to whom a bequest was made under the will). Id. at 206. Today, however, no state applies that harsh rule. See, e.g., Unif. Prob. Code § 2-505(b) ("The signing of a will by an interested witness does not invalidate the will or any provision of it.").

[NOTE: The fact that the will was handwritten does not alter this analysis because the will was signed and witnessed. Therefore, it is not governed by the laws relating to holographic wills.]

Point Two (30%)

The bequest to Bob, an interested witness, was not forfeited. In some states, this is because Testator's will was republished by a codicil that was witnessed by two disinterested witnesses. In other states, this is because bequests to interested witnesses are never forfeited.

Some states provide by statute that a bequest to an interested witness is void unless the will is witnessed by two disinterested witnesses. See, e.g., Iowa Code § 633.281; NY EPTL § 3-3.2. The policy underlying these interested-witness statutes is to discourage fraud or undue influence.

However, under the republication-by-codicil doctrine, defects in a previously validly executed will can be cured if the will is "republished" in the properly executed codicil. See McGovern et al., supra, at 295. The doctrine effectively treats the portions of the original valid will that are not inconsistent with the terms of the codicil as recited in the codicil and witnessed by the witnesses to the codicil. Curing an interested witness problem by codicil is a classic example of the republication-by-codicil doctrine. See, e.g., King v. Smith, 302 A.2d 144 (N.J. Super. 1973). Thus, in states that require disinterested witnesses, the bequest to Bob would nonetheless be valid because the will which he witnessed was later republished by a codicil, which itself was witnessed by two disinterested witnesses.

Some states follow the Uniform Probate Code approach and simply permit interested witnesses to take their bequests. See UPC § 2-505(b). In those states, Bob's bequest was valid even though he was a witness to the will and republication was not necessary to save that.

Point Three (30%)

In some states, the aunt is not entitled to the furniture because a will may not incorporate an unattested document written after the execution of the will. In many states, however, a testator may dispose of tangible personal property in an unattested memorandum signed after his will was executed if the will includes language evidencing an intent to give effect to the writing.

At common law, the aunt would not take the furniture under the unattested memorandum because it was executed after both the will and the codicil were signed, and thus it was not incorporated by reference into either of those documents. Under the incorporation-by-reference doctrine, only documents in existence when the will was signed can be incorporated by reference. See generally McGovern et al., supra, 294–295.

Many states, however, have enacted statutes allowing a testator to dispose of tangible personal property by a memorandum signed after the execution of the will if the will evidences an intent to dispose of the tangibles in that manner. See, e.g., Unif. Prob. Code § 2-513 (which is fairly typical). The writing here meets the requirements of such a statute in that (1) it was signed, and it described the gifted items with sufficient particularity so that the gifted items are readily identifiable. In such states, the aunt is entitled to the furniture.

Point Four (10%)

Testator's bequest to Sam's children who attain age 25 is valid and does not violate the common law Rule Against Perpetuities (RAP) or the statute because the gift vests or fails to vest within their own lifetimes.

Under the common law RAP, “no interest is good unless it must vest, if at all, within 21 years of some life in being at its creation.” Gray's Rule Against Perpetuities (1891). With respect to wills, the beneficiary's interests are created at the testator's death—not at the time the will is executed—because wills are “ambulatory” and can be revoked or changed at any time up to the testator's death. See generally McGovern et al., supra, 495.

In his will (as amended by the codicil), Testator bequeathed the balance of his estate to Sam for life, with a remainder to Sam's children who attain age 25. Because Sam predeceased Testator, the intended life estate never became effective, leaving the class gift to Sam's children who attain age 25. Because neither child has reached 25 at Testator's death, the children's interest will remain in trust until they reach the applicable age.

A class gift will vest for purposes of the RAP when the class is closed and all members of the class have met any conditions precedent. Here, the class of “Sam's children” closed when Sam died, leaving his two surviving children as the only potential beneficiaries of the gift. As a result, the two children are “lives in being” for purposes of the RAP, and the only question left is whether they will satisfy the age contingency. Id., at 498. This event is certain to be resolved within their lifetimes because either they will satisfy the contingency and take the gift or they will die before reaching age 25 and the gift will fail. Accordingly, the children are able to serve as their own validating lives, making their residuary gift valid under the common law rule. Because the gift is valid under the common law rule, the jurisdiction's wait-and-see statute is inapplicable.

Thus, the balance of Testator's estate should be distributed to the trustee to hold in trust and to distribute the assets to Sam's two children, when and if they attain age 25. See generally id., at 496–97. However, their shares will be lost if they fail to attain age 25. If both Amy and Dan meet the age contingency, each takes one half. If only one does, that one takes the whole. And if neither does, the residue passes to Testator's heirs.

[NOTE: An examinee who wrongly concludes that the gift to Sam's children violates the rule should conclude that the balance of Testator's estate passes to his daughter and to Sam's two children as partial intestate property.]

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is a victim's out-of-court statement admissible when offered not to prove the truth of the matter asserted in the statement, but solely because it is relevant to prove the criminal defendant's reasonable fear of the victim?
- (2)(a) Does admission of a criminal defendant's out-of-court statement to a police officer, taken during custodial interrogation and without Miranda warnings or a waiver of Miranda rights by the defendant, fit the well-established Miranda public safety exception when the police officer asked a single question to secure weapons immediately after a shooting?
- (2)(b) Is a criminal defendant's out-of-court statement offered by the prosecution admissible as an opposing party's statement because it is not hearsay?
- (3) Under what circumstances is a witness's out-of-court statement admissible under the present-sense-impression or excited-utterance exceptions to the hearsay rule?

Summary

DISCUSSION

The court should admit testimony from the woman repeating the man's out-of-court statement to the woman ("I promise you'll be happy if you take me back, but very unhappy if you do not.") The statement is relevant to her self-defense claim because it helps prove that the woman had a reasonable fear of the man on the night of the shooting. The statement is not hearsay because it would not be offered by the defense to prove the truth of the matter asserted in the statement, and the woman's beliefs are relevant to assessing the reasonableness of her fear of the man.

The court should also admit testimony from the police officer repeating the woman's statement to the police officer ("I have a can of pepper spray in my purse. Is that a weapon?"). Her statement to the police officer is relevant because it could help the prosecution prove that, when the woman shot the man rather than using her pepper spray, she used greater force than was necessary under the circumstances. Admission of the statement does not violate Miranda because the statement fits the well-established public safety exception. Here, the single question was limited to weapons and the police officer's objective was to secure the scene and ensure public safety. Finally, the woman's statement is not hearsay when offered by the prosecution because it is an opposing party's statement.

The court might admit testimony from the police officer repeating the custodian's out-of-court statement to the police officer ("I didn't see the shooting, but I heard some noises in the hall around 10 and then a loud bang and screaming."). The statement is relevant because it helps to establish the time and place of the alleged crime. It is hearsay, but it may fit the hearsay exception for present sense impressions. The statement may also fit the hearsay exception for excited utterances if the court finds that the custodian was startled by what he heard and that he remained “under the stress of excitement” when he made the statement.

Point One (25%)

The court should admit testimony from the woman repeating the man’s out-of-court statement to the woman (“I promise you’ll be happy if you take me back, but very unhappy if you do not.”) because it is relevant to prove the woman’s reasonable fear of the man and is not hearsay.

Here the man’s statement to the woman is relevant because it has a tendency to make a fact (i.e., the woman’s reasonable fear of the man) “more . . . probable than it would be without the evidence.” Fed. R. Evid. 401. The woman’s fear of the man is essential to her self-defense claim under the State A standard because she must prove that when she shot the man, she “reasonably believe[d]” that her use of force was “immediately necessary for the purpose of protecting [her]self against the use of unlawful force by [an]other person.” Like all criminal defendants, the woman has a due process right to present a defense, and the defense seeks to use the man’s statement to substantiate her self-defense claim. See Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973).

Although the man’s statement was made outside of court, it would not be hearsay if offered to prove the woman’s reasonable fear. The Federal Rules of Evidence define hearsay as “a statement that (1) the declarant does not make while testifying at the current trial or hearing; and (2) a party offers in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted in the statement.” Fed. R. Evid. 801(c). Under this definition, an out-of-court statement is hearsay only when it is offered to prove “the truth of the matter asserted in the statement.” See McCormick on Evidence 424 (6th ed. 2006) (“When conduct or statements . . . are not used to prove the truth of the matter asserted, the statement should generally not be treated as hearsay because it does not fit the literal definition and because under these circumstances the danger of insincerity is usually significantly reduced.”).

Here, the man’s out-of-court statement is relevant to assessing the reasonableness of the woman’s fear regardless of whether the jury believes that the man’s statement is true. Specifically, the jury does not need to decide whether the man actually would have made the woman “happy” or “unhappy” to conclude that her fear of the man was reasonable. Accordingly, when offered by the defense, this statement should be admitted.

Point Two(a) (30%)

The court should find that the police officer did not violate the woman’s Miranda rights by asking her “Do you have any other weapons?” before providing Miranda warnings and obtaining a waiver because this fits the well-established Miranda public safety exception.

Typically, a person who is in police custody must first receive Miranda warnings and waive Miranda rights before being subjected to interrogation. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 444 (1966). For Miranda purposes, custody is established if a reasonable person under similar circumstances would believe she was not free to leave. See Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 (1984). For Miranda purposes, interrogation is established by “either express questioning or its functional equivalent” by the police. See Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 292 (1980). If Miranda has been violated, a court should bar the prosecution from introducing the defendant’s statement during its case-in-chief. However, Miranda warnings are not required for all custodial interrogations. For over three decades, the Court has consistently upheld a public safety exception to the Miranda requirements. See New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649 (1984).

Here, the police officer engaged in custodial interrogation without first giving the woman Miranda warnings. The woman was in custody because a reasonable person would have not felt free to leave her office after she had shot someone, two police officers had arrived to investigate and had seized her gun, and one of the officers had blocked her doorway. The woman was under interrogation because the police officer asked her a direct question. However, limited interrogation without Miranda warnings, when intended to protect public safety, fits the Miranda public safety exception. Here, the police officer asked a single question about additional weapons intended to secure his own safety and the safety of the people gathered nearby. Thus, the court should find that the police officer did not violate the woman’s Miranda rights.

Point Two(b) (15%)

The court should admit testimony from the police officer repeating the woman’s out-of-court statement (“I have a can of pepper spray in my purse. Is that a weapon?”). The statement is relevant, and it is not hearsay because it is an opposing party’s statement.

The woman’s statement is relevant to the prosecution’s case because it could help the prosecution prove that, when the woman shot the man rather than using her pepper spray, she used greater force than was “immediately necessary for the purpose of protecting [her]self against the use of unlawful force” under State A self-defense law. Fed. R. Evid. 401.

The woman’s statement is not hearsay when offered by the prosecution. Out-of-court statements by a party are not hearsay if “offered against an opposing party and . . . made by the party in an individual . . . capacity.” Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2)(A).

Point Three (30%)

The court should find the testimony from the police officer repeating the custodian’s out-of-court statement (“I didn’t see the shooting, but I heard some noises in the hall around 10 and then a loud bang and screaming.”) relevant. The court might find that the statement meets either the present-sense-impression or excited-utterance exception to the rule against hearsay.

The custodian’s out-of-court statement to the police officer is relevant because it has a tendency to make a fact (i.e., the time and place of the alleged crime) more probable. Fed. R. Evid. 401. If this statement is offered for these purposes, it is hearsay; but it should be admitted because it fits within at least one hearsay exception.

The custodian's statement might fit the hearsay exception for "present sense impressions" because it is "[a] statement describing or explaining an event . . . made . . . immediately after the declarant perceived it." Fed. R. Evid. 803(1). Here, the custodian's statement was limited to a description of recent events, and the statement was made to the police officer 20 minutes after the events occurred. Whether 20 minutes is close enough in time to the event to qualify under this exception, however, is unclear.

The custodian's statement also may fit the hearsay exception for "excited utterances," if the court concludes that it is "a statement relating to a startling event . . . made while the declarant was under the stress of excitement that it caused." Fed. R. Evid. 803(2). Here, the facts support use of this exception if the court finds (1) that the custodian was startled by hearing the gunshot and scream and (2) that he remained "under the stress of excitement" 20 minutes later when he was interviewed by the police officer.

Under the Federal Rules of Evidence, the fact that the custodian is not available to testify has no impact on the application of either hearsay exception. Fed. R. Evid. 803 (all FRE 803 hearsay exceptions apply "regardless of whether the declarant is available as a witness"). In addition, the fact that the custodian heard but did not see the relevant events has no bearing on the admissibility of his statement.

[NOTE: An examinee's conclusion is less important than his or her reasoning on whether the statement comes in under either exception.]

CIVIL PROCEDURE/CONFLICT OF LAWS ANALYSIS

CIV I.C.; II.A.; V.A. / CNF III.B.2., C.2.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Can a motion to dismiss be amended, prior to a responsive filing being made, to add a ground for dismissal that would otherwise be waived because it was not raised in the initial motion to dismiss?
- (2) Is service of a summons and complaint sufficient when the documents are not served personally on the defendant, but instead are given to the defendant's parent at the defendant's parents' home where the defendant previously lived?
- (3) What choice-of-law approach should be followed by a federal court exercising its diversity jurisdiction?
- (4) Under the Restatement (Second) approach to choice of law, should a court honor a contractual choice-of-law clause when the parties have chosen the law of a state that is connected to their transaction but that law is different from the law of another state with an interest in the matter?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Although normally the motion to dismiss for insufficient service of process would be waived because it was not included in the original motion, the court should consider the woman's amended motion in this case. Where, as here, the opposing party has not briefed the motion and the case will not be unduly delayed by an amendment, courts generally allow an amendment of a motion to dismiss, even when the added grounds would be waived if not raised in a defendant's initial motion to dismiss.

The court should dismiss the action for insufficient service of process. Serving process at a defendant's parents' home is not sufficient service when the defendant no longer lives there.

Whether the court should dismiss Taxes's claim that the woman violated the noncompete covenant of her employment contract is a matter of law, which depends on whether State A or State B law applies to the claim. If State A law applies, the covenant is valid and the motion should be denied; if State B law applies, the covenant is invalid and the motion should be granted. Which law applies depends, in turn, on whether the court will honor the choice-of-law clause in the parties' contract.

Choice-of-law rules are substantive rules for diversity purposes. A federal court sitting in diversity must apply the choice-of-law rules of the state where it sits. Here, the federal court should apply the Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws approach, which State A follows, in determining whether to enforce the contractual choice-of-law clause.

Applying the Restatement (Second), the court should honor the parties' contractual choice-of-law clause, which said that their agreement would be governed by State A law. State A has a close connection to both the transaction and the parties, and its rules on noncompete covenants are not contrary to a fundamental public policy of State B. Thus, because the parties' noncompete covenant is valid under State A law, the court should deny the woman's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim.

Point One (20%)

The court should consider the woman's insufficiency-of-service motion. Although she did not raise her defense of insufficient service of process in her original motion to dismiss, she avoided waiving the defense by promptly amending her motion to dismiss.

Generally, when a party makes a pre-answer motion under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12, the party must raise any claim of insufficiency of service of process that the party has at the time of the motion; otherwise, the defense is waived. Wright, Miller, Kane, Marcus & Steinman, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1391 (3d ed. 2013). Rule 12 states that "a party that makes a motion under this rule must not make another motion under this rule raising a defense or objection that was available to the party but omitted from its earlier motion." Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(g)(2). Further, "[a] party waives any defense listed in rule 12(b)(2)–(5) by . . . omitting it from a motion in the circumstances described in Rule 12(g)(2)." Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(h). Taken together, these rules would normally mean that the woman waived her Rule 12(b)(5) defense of insufficiency of service of process when she failed to include it in her original motion to dismiss. See, e.g., Arkwright Mutual Ins. Co. v. Scottsdale Ins. Co., 874 F. Supp. 601 (S.D.N.Y. 1995).

Nonetheless, courts have allowed a motion to dismiss to be amended before the motion is heard, "so long as the adverse party is not prejudiced by the amendment and no delay results in the prosecution and determination of the case." See, e.g., MacNeil v. Whittemore, 254 F.2d 820 (2d Cir. 1958); Friedman v. World Transportation, Inc., 636 F. Supp. 685 (N.D. Ill. 1986). But see Heise v. Olympus Optical Co., Ltd., 111 F.R.D. 1 (N.D. Ind. 1986) (where plaintiff had already fully briefed issues raised by original motion to dismiss, motion could not be amended to add new grounds for dismissal, and omitted grounds were waived). Thus, "[a]lthough not expressly provided for in Federal Rule 12(g), a preliminary motion may be amended to include a defense or objection inadvertently omitted by the movant." Wright et al., supra, § 1389.

Here, the woman amended her motion to dismiss only two days after making the motion. Taxes had not yet responded to the motion and is not likely to have been prejudiced by the woman's failure to raise her insufficiency-of-service defense two days earlier. There is no indication that the proceedings will be delayed if her amended motion is treated as adequate to raise the defense. Accordingly, the woman's insufficiency-of-service defense was not waived by her failure to include it in the original motion.

Point Two (30%)

The court should grant the woman's motion and dismiss the action for insufficient service of process, because she did not live at her parents' house at the time the summons and complaint were delivered to her father.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 4(e) allows service by delivering a summons and complaint to an individual personally or by "leaving a copy of each at the individual's dwelling or usual place of abode with someone of suitable age and discretion who resides there." Here, Taxes sought to serve process on the woman by leaving a copy of the summons and complaint at her parents' home with her father. Although the woman had once lived with her parents, she had moved and was living in her own apartment in another state when process was served. Thus, service was not made at the woman's current dwelling or usual place of abode, and leaving the summons and complaint at her parental home was not sufficient. See United States v. Tobins, 483 F. Supp. 2d 68, 75–76 (D. Mass. 2007) (service is not proper where the defendant no longer resides at the address to which the summons and complaint are delivered); Coffin v. Ingersoll, 1993 WL 208806 (E.D. Penn. 1993) (leaving summons and complaint with parents is not sufficient service when defendant "has left home and established residence elsewhere"); Cox v. Quigley, 141 F.R.D. 222 (D. Maine 1992) (leaving summons and complaint with parents is not sufficient where defendant left home and moved out of state after graduating from college). Thus, the court should grant the woman's motion to dismiss for insufficient service of process.

Point Three (20%)

A federal court sitting in diversity must apply the choice-of-law rules of the state where the federal court sits. Thus, the court here should apply State A's choice-of-law rules.

A federal court sitting in diversity must apply the substantive law of the state in which it sits, including that state's choice-of-law rules. Klaxon Co. v. Stentor Elec. Mfg. Co., 313 U.S. 487, 496 (1941). In this case, the court's determination whether to apply State A or State B law to the parties' noncompete covenant must be made by applying the choice-of-law rules of State A, the state where the court is sitting. Thus, the court must apply the standards set out in the Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws because these are the standards that would be applied by a State A court.

Point Four (30%)

Under the Restatement (Second), the court should honor the parties' choice of State A law because (a) State A has a close connection to the parties and the transaction, and (b) State A's law upholding the noncompete covenant is not contrary to the fundamental policy of State B.

The parties' employment contract specified that it would be governed by State A law. The Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws generally favors the enforcement of such choice-of-law clauses. Even when, as here, the legal issue is one that the parties could not have resolved on their own (the validity of a clause of their contract), the Restatement provides that the law chosen by the parties will be applied unless

- (a) the chosen state has no substantial relationship to the parties or the transaction and there is no other reasonable basis for the parties' choice, or
- (b) application of the law of the chosen state would be contrary to a fundamental policy of a state which has a materially greater interest than the chosen state in the determination of the particular issue and which, under the rule of § 188 [a "most significant relationship" test], would be the state of the applicable law in the absence of an effective choice of law by the parties.

Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws § 187(2).

Here, the parties chose the law of State A, which has a substantial relationship to the parties and the transaction: both Taxes and the woman were located in State A when they signed their contract, and the contract concerned the terms of the woman's employment in State A. Accordingly, the issue is whether the parties' chosen law should be disregarded pursuant to Restatement (Second) § 187(2)(b).

Although State B's law would not enforce this particular noncompete covenant because its duration is more than 18 months, State B's policy does not appear to reflect a fundamental public policy against noncompete clauses in general. In fact, State B, like State A, generally enforces reasonable noncompete covenants, and this covenant would be considered unreasonable under State B law only because it is six months longer than State B courts allow. There are no facts to suggest that enforcing a noncompete clause longer than 18 months would violate a fundamental policy of State B. See, e.g., Medx Inc. of Florida v. Ranger, 780 F. Supp. 398, 401 (E.D. La. 1991) (noncompete covenant entered into in connection with sale of business is not contrary to strong public policy of Louisiana when Louisiana would allow such a covenant if its duration had been two years or less). Accordingly, the parties' choice of State A law should be honored, and the noncompete covenant should be enforced. Thus, if the court rules on the woman's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, the court should deny the motion.

[NOTE: If an examinee erroneously concludes that a federal court should follow State B's choice-of-law rules, then the examinee should conclude that the choice-of-law clause in the contract is unenforceable because expressly forbidden by a State B statute. As to the validity of the noncompete clause, State A law would apply under State B's lex loci contractus rule because State A was the place where the employment contract was made and was to be performed. If the court concluded that the noncompete covenant violated a fundamental public policy of State B, it might conclude that State B would refuse to enforce the covenant despite the fact that it was made in State A.]

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2018 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Civil Procedure question on the February 2018 MEE tested the following area from the Civil Procedure outline: III.C. Pretrial procedures—Rule 11.

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by user jurisdictions as part of the bar examination on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Areas of law that may be covered on the MEE include the following: Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Civil Procedure, Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts (including Article 2 [Sales] of the Uniform Commercial Code), Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Article 9 (Secured Transactions) of the Uniform Commercial Code. Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles. Examinees in non-UBE jurisdictions should answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

FAMILY LAW QUESTION

In 2012, David and Meg had a baby girl, Anna. At the time of Anna's birth, David and Meg were both 21 years old. For the next four years, they lived separately. David and Anna lived with David's mother (Anna's grandmother). The grandmother cared for Anna while David worked. David cared for Anna most evenings and weekends. During this period, Meg attended college in a distant city; she called weekly but visited Anna only during school breaks and for one month each summer.

In 2013, David bought an auto repair business with money he had saved. The grandmother continued to care for Anna while David was working in his auto repair business.

In 2016, David and Meg were married in a small wedding held at the grandmother's house. One week before their wedding, David surprised Meg by asking her to sign a premarital agreement prepared by his attorney. The agreement provided that, in the event of a divorce,

1. all assets owned by each spouse at the time of the marriage would remain the sole property of that spouse;
2. neither spouse would be entitled to alimony; and
3. the spouses would have joint physical custody of Anna.

Attached to the proposed agreement was an accurate list of David's net assets (his personal possessions, the auto repair business, a used car, and a small bank account), a list of his liabilities, and his tax returns for the past three years.

David told Meg that he would not proceed with the marriage unless she signed the agreement. Meg believed that the marriage would be successful, and she did not want to cancel or postpone the wedding. She therefore signed the agreement and appended a list of her own debts (student loans); she correctly indicated that she had no assets other than her personal possessions.

Since the wedding, David, Meg, and Anna have lived together and the grandmother has continued to provide child care while David and Meg are at work. Meg has worked full-time as a computer engineer, and David has continued to work full-time in his auto repair business. Their incomes are relatively equal.

They have the following assets: (a) the auto repair business (owned by David); (b) stocks (owned by Meg, which she inherited last year); and (c) the marital home (purchased by David in his name alone shortly after the wedding). The down payment and all mortgage payments for the marital home have come from the couple's employment income.

Last month, David discovered that Meg had been having an affair with a coworker for the past year.

David wants a divorce. He also wants to obtain sole physical custody of Anna; he believes that Meg's adultery should disqualify her as a custodial parent. His plan is to live with the grandmother, who would provide child care when he is unavailable.

Family Law Question

This jurisdiction has adopted a statute modeled after the Uniform Premarital Agreement Act.

1. May either spouse successfully enforce the premarital agreement in whole or in part? Explain.
2. Assuming that the premarital agreement is not enforceable, what assets are divisible at divorce? Explain.
3. Assuming that the premarital agreement is not enforceable, may David obtain sole physical custody of Anna based on (a) Meg's adultery or (b) other factors? Explain.

CRIMINAL LAW QUESTION

A defendant, age 25, is charged in State A with armed robbery. According to the indictment, on June 1, the defendant went into a store, pulled out a gun, and said to a cashier, "Give me all your money or I'll shoot you!" The cashier gave the defendant $5,000. The police arrived as the defendant was driving away. The police car followed the defendant, who was driving over 80 mph. The defendant crashed his car into a tree and suffered a serious head injury, losing consciousness. He was taken by ambulance to a hospital, where he regained consciousness on June 8. On June 15, he was discharged from the hospital. On July 1, he was arraigned on the armed robbery charge and released on bail. Over the next few months, the defendant recovered full physical mobility, but he continued to show symptoms of cognitive impairment resulting from brain trauma suffered during the car crash.

Police interviews with the defendant's family and friends have revealed that, in the months preceding the robbery, the defendant had experienced financial and emotional difficulties. According to the defendant's best friend, the defendant had recently started a new business, which was struggling. A month before the robbery, the defendant told his best friend, "I cannot attract customers because the United Nations has organized a secret boycott of my new business." On the day before the robbery, the defendant texted his best friend: "I've been a victim for too long. I've decided to start making up for my losses. If you read about me in the papers tomorrow, I'll already be far away, so delete this text and tell the police you never knew me."

In December, as the state began preparing for trial, two court-appointed psychiatrists evaluated the defendant and prepared the following joint report to the court:

Before the robbery, the defendant had a slightly above-average IQ. The defendant had completed a community college program in business administration and had recently opened his own business, which he owned and managed at the time of the robbery. A few months before the robbery, the defendant's business was struggling, and he began experiencing some mental health difficulties. His mental health difficulties apparently did not impair his relationships with his family and friends or his ability to manage his everyday life and operate his business. The defendant never sought mental health treatment.

On the day of the robbery, during the crash, the defendant sustained brain trauma that has impaired his cognitive functioning. The defendant has not returned to work, and there has been no cognitive improvement to date. When questioned about the pending criminal charge, the defendant typically responds, "My mother told me I did something bad, but I can't remember what." He is unable to remember anything about the robbery. When asked about his appointed counsel, the defendant usually says, "She's nice" or "She comes to see me and helps me." He describes the judge as "the guy in charge," but when asked to explain what happens in court he responds, "I don't know what they are talking about." During repeated interviews, we have seen no evidence that the defendant currently understands abstract language and concepts. We have also seen no evidence that he is feigning or exaggerating his cognitive impairment.

Criminal Law Question

State A uses the M’Naghten not guilty by reason of insanity (NGRI) test and requires that the affirmative defense of NGRI be proved by a preponderance of the evidence.

Defense counsel has requested a hearing to determine whether the defendant is competent to stand trial (in some jurisdictions, this is called “fitness to stand trial”) and has informed the court that, if the trial proceeds, the defendant will argue that he is NGRI.

Based on all the information presented above, including the information in the psychiatrists’ report:

1. Should the prosecution be suspended because the defendant is currently incompetent to stand trial? Explain.
2. If the defendant is found competent to stand trial and the prosecution proceeds, will the jury likely find that, with respect to each element of the M’Naghten test, the defendant has met his burden of proof? Explain.

CONTRACTS QUESTION

A woman whose hobby was making pottery wanted to improve her pottery skills both for her own enjoyment and to enable her to create some pottery items that she could sell. Accordingly, she entered into negotiations with an experienced professional potter about the possibility of an apprenticeship at his pottery studio.

The negotiations went well, and after some discussion, the woman and the professional potter orally agreed to the following on May 1:

- The woman would be the potter's apprentice for three months beginning May 15. During the apprenticeship, the potter would provide education and guidance about the artistry and business of pottery. The woman would pay the potter $4,000 for the right to serve as the potter's apprentice, payable on the first day of the apprenticeship.
- The potter would supply the woman with equipment and tools that she would use during the apprenticeship and would be entitled to take with her at the conclusion of the apprenticeship. On or before May 8, the woman would pay the potter $5,000 for the equipment and tools.
- The woman would be provided with a private room in the potter's studio in which to stay during the apprenticeship.

On May 2, the woman and the potter signed a document titled "Memorandum of Agreement." It contained the terms orally agreed to the day before, except that it did not refer to the woman's living in a private room in the potter's studio. The last sentence of the document stated, "This is our complete agreement."

On May 8, the woman went to the potter's studio and paid him the $5,000 called for in the agreement for the equipment and tools. While she was there, the potter said that he had decided that the $4,000 price was too high for the right to serve as his apprentice and proposed lowering it to $3,500. The woman happily agreed, and they shook hands on this new arrangement.

On May 15, the woman arrived at the potter's studio to begin the apprenticeship and move into the room she would occupy during that time. The potter refused to let her move in, however, and said that their deal did not require him to provide lodging for the woman. When the woman protested that they had agreed to the lodging arrangement, the potter took the signed Memorandum of Agreement out of his pocket and pointed out to her that it contained no reference to the woman's living in his studio. He then said, "If it's not in here, it's not part of the deal."

The woman then said, "At least you were reasonable in agreeing to change the price for the apprenticeship to $3,500. Saving that extra five hundred dollars means a lot to me." In response, the potter pointed to the Memorandum of Agreement again and said to the woman, "That's not what this says. This says that you'll pay me $4,000 today. Even if I agreed to lower the price, I didn't get anything for that, so why should I be bound by it?"

The woman is quite angry about this turn of events and is considering suing the potter.

Contracts Question

1. If the woman sues the potter about the disputes relating to the apprenticeship, will those disputes be governed by the common law of contracts or by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code? Explain.
2. Assuming that the common law of contracts governs, is the oral agreement concerning the woman's lodging binding on the parties? Explain.
3. Assuming that the common law of contracts governs, is the oral agreement lowering the price for the apprenticeship binding on the parties? Explain.

REAL PROPERTY QUESTION

A developer acquired a 30-acre tract of land zoned for residential use. The developer thereafter marked out 60 building lots. The developer granted various utility providers appropriate easements to install underground sewer and utility lines. These utility easements were promptly and properly recorded.

Subsequently, the developer contracted with a man to build a home for the man on one of the 60 lots. The contract provided that, at closing, the developer would convey the home and lot to the man by a warranty deed excepting all easements and covenants of record. The home was completed nine months later.

At the closing, the developer conveyed the home and lot to the man by a valid warranty deed containing the six title covenants. Notwithstanding the language in the contract, the deed contained no exceptions to these six covenants. The deed was promptly and properly recorded.

Two months later, following a heavy storm, the man discovered rainwater in the basement level of his home. Three bedrooms were located on this level, and the influx of rainwater made all of them unusable. An expert determined that the cause of the rainwater influx was a defect in the construction of the home's foundation.

The man contacted the developer, who denied any responsibility for the influx. Rather than argue with the developer, the man contacted a plumber, who concluded that the problem could be solved by installing a sump pump in the basement. The plumber accurately told the man that the usual cost of installing a sump pump was $750, but that the location of the sewer lines coming into the home created more work, raising the installation cost to $1,500. The man told the plumber to install the pump.

Thereafter, the man sued the developer for $5,000 in damages for the cost of the sump pump, its installation, and damage to the floors and carpeting in the basement. He also sought additional damages for breach of one or more title covenants.

1. Which present title covenants, if any, did the developer breach with respect to the utility easements? Explain.
2. Assuming that there was a breach of one or more of the present title covenants, can the man recover damages from the developer for the breach? Explain.
3. May the man force the utility company that installed the underground sewer lines to remove them from the land? Explain.
4. May the man recover the $5,000 in damages from the developer? Explain.

CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

While speeding down a rural highway in State A, the driver of a moving van lost control of the van and struck a car. A passenger in the car was seriously injured.

The passenger filed suit in the federal district court for the district in State A where the accident had taken place. She sought damages for her injuries from the driver of the van and the moving company that employed him. Among other allegations, the complaint alleged that

- the driver and the moving company are citizens of State A;
- the driver resides in the federal judicial district where the suit was brought;
- the accident occurred in the federal judicial district where the suit was brought;
- the passenger is a citizen of State B;
- the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000;
- venue is proper in the federal judicial district where the suit was brought;
- the driver was employed by the moving company and was acting in the course of his employment at the time of the accident;
- the driver of the moving van was negligent; and
- the passenger suffered serious injuries as a result of that negligence.

The defendant driver and the defendant moving company were both represented by an attorney who was a partner in a 30-lawyer law firm. The attorney was retained and received a copy of the complaint only four days before an answer was due. The attorney was conducting another trial at the time. Rather than ask another lawyer in the firm to answer the complaint, the attorney personally prepared and filed a timely answer to the complaint on behalf of the defendants.

The answer to the complaint, which was signed by the attorney, read simply: “General Denial: Defendants Hereby Deny Each and Every Allegation in the Complaint.”

Two months later, the plaintiff (the passenger) properly served Requests for Admission on the defendants, requesting admission of each allegation in the complaint. Responding to the Requests for Admission, the defendants (still represented by the attorney) denied the allegations concerning the driver’s negligence and the plaintiff’s injuries, but admitted all other alleged facts.

The plaintiff then served on the defendants’ attorney a motion for sanctions on the ground that the general denial in the answer was inappropriate. The plaintiff requested that the defendants withdraw their original answer and file an amended answer admitting the allegations that the defendants had admitted in their response to the Requests for Admission.

One month later, after the defendants had failed to withdraw or amend their answer, the plaintiff filed the motion for sanctions in court. The plaintiff's lawyer submitted evidence that his customary billing rate is $300 per hour and that he had spent seven hours preparing the motion and corresponding with the defendants' attorney about the answer, for a total of $2,100.

1. May the court properly grant the plaintiff's motion for sanctions? Explain.
2. If the court grants the plaintiff's motion for sanctions, (a) what sanctions are appropriate and (b) against whom should the sanctions be ordered? Explain.

AGENCY QUESTION

A man and a woman were equal partners in a neighborhood natural-foods store. The store had been at the same location for many years and had developed a loyal following. Under their informal arrangement, the man had managed the business and the woman had supplied capital to the business as needed.

They leased the building in which the store was located and had regularly sought to purchase the building for the partnership, but the landlord had always refused. Six months ago, however, the landlord called the man and said, "I thought you would want to know that I'm planning to sell the building." The next day, the man sent the woman an email: "I am leaving our partnership. I will wind up the business and send you a check for your half share." Without informing the woman, the man then contacted the landlord and offered to buy the building. The landlord accepted, and the two entered into a binding purchase agreement. One month later, the man took title to the building.

Three months ago, the man sent the woman a check for half of the store's inventory and other business assets. Instead of cashing the check, the woman sent the man an email stating that she regarded the partnership as still in existence and demanded that the man convey title to the building to the partnership. The man replied that their partnership was dissolved and that he had moved on. He then began to operate the store as a natural-foods store with a name different from that of the original store, but with the same product offerings and the same employees.

The woman has sued the man for withdrawing from the partnership and for breaching his duties by buying the building from the landlord.

1. Did the man properly withdraw from the partnership? Explain.
2. Assuming that the man's withdrawal was not wrongful, what was the legal effect of the man's withdrawal from the partnership? Explain.
3. What duties, if any, did the man breach by purchasing the building? Explain.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Under the state statute, when is a premarital agreement regarding property division and alimony enforceable?
- (1)(b) Under the state statute, when is a premarital agreement regarding child custody enforceable?
- (2) What assets are divisible at divorce?
- (3)(a) May a court deny a parent physical custody of a child based on adultery?
- (3)(b) What factors may be taken into account in determining child custody?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under this state statute (modeled on the Uniform Premarital Agreement Act (UPAA)), a premarital agreement regarding property division and alimony is binding if entered into voluntarily and with reasonable disclosure of assets and obligations. Here, David accurately disclosed his assets, and it is unlikely that a court will find that Meg entered into the agreement involuntarily because David presented the agreement to her a week before the wedding. The wedding was small and thus would not likely have been difficult or expensive to cancel. Meg also had time to confer with independent counsel. However, whether or not the property-division and alimony provisions of the agreement are upheld, the provisions regarding child custody are unenforceable.

In most states, assets acquired before marriage or by inheritance are “separate” property; neither a separate asset nor appreciation in its value is subject to division at divorce. However, substantial postmarital effort by the owner of a separate asset that enhances the value of that asset creates marital property; so does the use of marital funds to add value or obtain equity in separate property. Thus, Meg’s inheritance is a separate asset. David’s auto repair business is partly separate because it was acquired before the marriage, but may be partly marital if its value increased because he worked full-time in the business after the marriage. The home is marital, despite the fact that David took title in his name only, because marital funds were used to pay for it.

Custody decisions are based on the “best interests of the child.” David cannot obtain sole physical custody based on Meg’s adultery; this behavior is irrelevant unless he can show that it has caused or will cause significant harm to Anna. In evaluating a child’s best interests, courts look at a range of factors, including the child’s wishes, the parents’ physical and mental health, and the interaction and interrelationship of the child with both parents and any other person who may significantly affect the child's best interests. Here, it is possible that David might obtain sole physical custody based on one or more of these factors, but case outcome cannot be predicted with the information at hand.

Point One(a) (30%)

Under the state statute, an agreement regarding property division and alimony that is made voluntarily and with fair and reasonable disclosure of assets and obligations is binding. Here, it is highly unlikely that Meg can avoid enforcement of the premarital agreement; David fully disclosed his assets, and the evidence does not support a claim of involuntariness.

Although courts were once hostile to premarital agreements, today all states permit spouses to contract premaritally with respect to rights and obligations in property. In all states, the enforceability of such an agreement turns on three factors: voluntariness, fairness, and disclosure. How courts apply these factors varies significantly from one state to the next. In many states, an agreement is unenforceable if the party against whom enforcement is sought succeeds in showing involuntariness, unfairness, or lack of adequate disclosure. However, under the UPAA, which has been adopted in 26 states and this jurisdiction, the party against whom enforcement is sought must prove (1) involuntariness or (2) that “the agreement was unconscionable when it was executed” and that he or she did not receive or waive “fair and reasonable” disclosure and “did not have, or reasonably could not have had, an adequate knowledge” of the other's assets and obligations. UPAA § 6(a). Thus, under the state statute, a court may not refuse to enforce a premarital agreement based on unconscionability unless it also finds lack of adequate disclosure or knowledge.

Here, Meg cannot establish inadequate disclosure and knowledge. David gave her copies of his tax returns for three years and an accurate list of his assets. Under the UPAA, Meg would thus be required to show that the execution of the agreement was involuntary in order to avoid its enforcement.

In considering whether a premarital agreement was voluntarily executed, courts look to whether there was fraud, duress, or coercion. They agree that one party's insistence on signing the agreement as a condition of the marriage does not, of itself, render the agreement involuntary, but there is no consensus on what additional facts are sufficient to establish involuntariness. See Principles of the Law of Family Dissolution § 7.04 cmt. c (2002).

Many of the reported cases, like this one, involve a claim of involuntariness based on presentation of an agreement very close to the wedding. In analyzing whether an agreement signed under these circumstances is voluntary, courts have looked at a wide range of factors, including the difficulty of conferring with independent counsel, other reasons for proceeding with the marriage (for example, a preexisting pregnancy), and financial losses and embarrassment arising from cancellation of the wedding. A number of courts have held that an agreement signed without the opportunity to consult with independent counsel will be scrutinized more closely. See, e.g., Sogg v. Nevada State Bank, 832 P.2d 781 (Nev. 1992). See also Ruzic v.

Ruzic, 549 So. 2d 72, 75 (Ala. 1989) (premarital agreements to be upheld only when each party had independent counsel).

Here, David presented the proposed agreement one week before the wedding. There is no evidence that Meg did not have time to confer with counsel. Nor is there evidence that canceling the wedding would have entailed any significant expense; the wedding was small and took place at the grandmother's house. Cancellation of the wedding at this late date might have been embarrassing, but it probably would not have been costly. Thus, it is unlikely that Meg can establish involuntariness and void the premarital agreement.

[NOTE: Although only about half the states have adopted the UPAA, voluntariness, fairness, and asset disclosure are relevant to enforceability in all jurisdictions. In non-UPAA jurisdictions, however, a court may refuse to enforce a premarital agreement on any of these grounds. Thus, in a non-UPAA state, a court's analysis of voluntariness will likely track the analysis here. But in a non-UPAA jurisdiction, a court could also refuse to enforce on fairness grounds even though disclosure was adequate.]

Point One(b) (10%)

A premarital agreement regarding child custody is unenforceable.

Because of the strong public policy in favor of protecting the best interests of children, courts have invariably found that provisions in a premarital contract relating to children, including provisions relating to child custody and visitation, are unenforceable. See Harry D. Krause et al., Family Law: Cases, Comments and Questions 216 (7th ed. 2012). Although the UPAA does not explicitly bar an agreement respecting child custody, “[l]ong tradition . . . would seem to ensure . . . that courts would not consider themselves bound by custody provisions they believe injurious to the child's interest. The law of separation agreements in every state is explicit on that point, and there is no reason why premarital agreements would be treated differently.” Ira Ellman et al., Family Law: Cases, Text, Problems 856 (5th ed. 2010).

Thus, the provisions of the premarital agreement requiring joint custody will not be enforced even if the alimony and support provisions of the agreement are upheld.

Point Two (35%)

In most states, assets acquired before marriage or by inheritance are “separate” property; neither a separate asset nor appreciation in its value is subject to division at divorce. However, substantial postmarital effort of an owner spouse or the use of marital funds to add value or obtain equity in separate property creates marital property. Thus, Meg's inheritance is separate property. David's auto repair business may be partly marital property. The home is marital property.

In all states, a divorce court may divide assets without regard to title. However, in most states, only marital property—assets acquired during the marriage except by gift, devise, or inheritance—is subject to division at divorce. In a minority of “hotchpot” jurisdictions, the court may divide all assets, whenever or however acquired. A few states permit the division of separate property in special circumstances, such as hardship. See Harry D. Krause et al., Family Law: Cases, Questions, and Comments 752–53 (6th ed. 2007).

Although the mere fact that a separate asset appreciates in value during the marriage does not create marital property, an asset that is initially separate property may be partially transformed into marital property if marital funds or significant postmarital effort by the owner spouse enhance its value or build equity. See id. at 764–65. Thus, if a spouse spends a substantial amount of time working in a separate business, that effort typically creates marital property. And if marital funds are used to reduce mortgage indebtedness, such equity-building payments typically create marital property. See J. Thomas Oldham, Divorce, Separation and the Distribution of Property § 7.05 (2002) (describing apportionment principles and noting that, in a few states, installment payments create only a marital lien against the value of the separate asset).

Here, Meg’s stocks are separate property because she inherited them, and there is no indication that she has expended substantial effort that has contributed to their current value. David’s auto repair business was initially separate property; he acquired the asset before the marriage. But he has worked full-time in the business during the marriage; this would represent substantial effort, and any postmarital increase in the value of the business is thus likely to be characterized as at least partly marital. The home is marital property despite the fact that it is titled solely in David’s name, as marital funds (employment income) were used for the down payment and all mortgage payments.

In a hotchpot state, all assets owned by David and Meg would be subject to division at divorce.

[NOTE: The above analysis applies in both common law and community-property states. Although the rules governing asset management and division at death vary depending on whether the jurisdiction is a common law or community-property state, today, all states disregard title in defining the pool of assets available for division at divorce. Indeed, the marital property rules applicable in common law states are sometimes referred to as “deferred community property.”]

Point Three(a) (10%)

Child custody decisions are based on the best interests of the child, and a parent’s misconduct may not be taken into account unless it causes significant harm to the child. Thus, David cannot obtain sole physical custody of Anna based on Meg’s adultery.

Child custody decision making is invariably governed by the “best interests of the child” standard. Today, courts agree that a court may not deprive a parent of custody based on a parent’s values or lifestyle unless the evidence shows that the parental conduct adversely affects the child. “[T]o deprive a parent of custody, the evidence must support a logical inference that some specific, identifiable behavior or conduct of the parent will probably cause significant physical or emotional harm to the child. This link between parent's conduct and harm to the child, moreover, may not be based on evidence which raises a mere surmise or speculation of possible harm." May v. May, 829 S.W.2d 373, 377 (Tex. Ct. App. 1992). See also Fulk v. Fulk, 827 So. 2d 736 (Miss. 2002). Based on this child-centered approach, most courts have ruled that a parent's sexual behavior is not by itself sufficient to deny a parent custody. See, e.g., T.C.H. v. K.M.H., 784 S.W.2d 281, 284 (Mo. App. 1989).

Thus, a court may not award David sole physical custody of Anna based on Meg's adultery because there is no evidence that Meg's adultery has caused Anna harm.

Point Three(b) (15%)

It is possible that a court would award David sole physical custody based, at least in part, on his greater role in providing child care and the grandmother's role as a primary caregiver during Anna's formative years, which an award of sole physical custody to David would preserve. But evidence on other relevant factors is lacking, making it impossible to predict what a court would do.

A custody decision is based on the best interests of the child. That determination is based on a range of factors, including "(1) the wishes of the child's parent or parents as to his custody; (2) the wishes of the child as to his custodian; (3) the interaction and interrelationship of the child with his parent or parents, his siblings, and any other person who may significantly affect the child's best interest; (4) the child's adjustment to his home, school, and community; and (5) the mental and physical health of all individuals involved." Uniform Marriage and Divorce Act (UMDA) § 402.

Here, there are some facts that support an award of sole physical (i.e., residential) custody to David. Meg lived with Anna only for brief periods during the child's first four, formative years; David lived with Anna throughout this period and provided care for her when he was not working. During these four years, the grandmother acted as a primary caregiver to Anna, and she has continued to provide care; an award of sole physical custody to David would thus enable Anna to maintain an active relationship with a caregiver, her grandmother, who may have played an important parental role.

However, evidence is lacking on other relevant factors, including Anna's preference, each parent's mental and physical health, Anna's current relationships with both parents and with the grandmother, and Anna's current adjustment to her home, school, and community.

It is thus possible, but far from certain, that David could obtain sole physical custody of Anna, but without information on the other relevant factors, it is impossible to predict the outcome here.

CRIMINAL LAW ANALYSIS

CRIMINAL LAW IV.B.1., C.1.; V.E.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Should the prosecution be suspended due to the defendant's incompetence to stand trial (in some jurisdictions this is called "lack of fitness to stand trial") if, due to a cognitive impairment, he currently cannot consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding and he lacks a rational and factual understanding of the proceedings against him?
- (2) If the defendant is found competent to stand trial and the prosecution proceeds, in a jurisdiction that uses the M'Naghten test, should the defendant be found not guilty by reason of insanity (NGRI)?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A defendant may not be prosecuted if he is incompetent to stand trial. Here, the defendant should be found incompetent because the evidence gathered by the police and the court-appointed psychiatrists demonstrates that he currently (1) lacks a rational and factual understanding of the proceedings against him and (2) cannot consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding. The defendant does not understand the charge against him, the role of appointed counsel or the judge, what happens in court, or abstract language and concepts.

If the defendant is found competent to stand trial and the prosecution proceeds, a jury should not find that the defendant is NGRI because the defendant cannot prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the M'Naghten test is satisfied. Under that test, the defense must prove that, at the time of the offense, (1) the defendant suffered from a defect of reason, from disease of the mind; and (2) as a result of this mental disease or defect, the defendant at the time of the act did not know the nature and quality of the act, or that the act was wrong.

Under the first prong of the M'Naghten test, the defendant will probably be unable to prove that he was suffering from a defect of reason from a disease of the mind. Although at the time of the armed robbery the defendant was experiencing "mental health difficulties" and some cognitive impairment (which included blaming the United Nations for a secret boycott of his business), when balanced against the evidence of cognitive functioning gathered by the police and the court-appointed psychiatrists, the defendant's evidence is probably insufficient to meet his burden of proof on this point.

Under the bifurcated second prong of the M'Naghten test, the defense must also prove that, at the time of the robbery, (1) the defendant did not know the nature and quality of the act or (2) did not know that the act was wrong. Although states' laws differ on the definition of "wrongfulness" for NGRI purposes, here the facts suggest that the defendant knew the nature and quality of his act of armed robbery and that it was legally and morally wrong.

Point One (40%)

The defendant should be found incompetent to stand trial because he currently (1) cannot consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding and (2) lacks a rational and factual understanding of the proceedings against him.

Competence to stand trial is a legal requirement that refers to a defendant's ability to participate in criminal proceedings. In some jurisdictions, competence is called "fitness to stand trial." To be competent, it is not enough that the defendant be "oriented to time and place and [have] some recollection of events." Dusky v. U.S., 362 U.S. 402 (1960). The Dusky test has two prongs: the defendant must have (1) "sufficient present ability to consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding" and (2) "a rational as well as factual understanding of the proceedings against him." Id. In Drope v. Missouri, 420 U.S. 162 (1975), the Supreme Court elaborated on the Dusky standard, clarifying that the defendant must be able "to assist in preparing his defense." 420 U.S. at 171. Assisting counsel also requires that a defendant be able to make decisions, including whether to go to trial or plead guilty. Model Rules of Professional Responsibility R. 1.2(a). Whenever the defense can establish a "bona fide doubt" regarding the defendant's decision-making abilities, the court must hold a hearing to determine competence to stand trial. See Pate v. Robinson, 383 U.S. 375, 385 (1966). Once the defendant has made this preliminary showing, the burden of evaluating competency is placed on the courts and court-appointed experts. See Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389 (1993).

Here, the defense has raised bona fide doubt regarding the defendant's decision-making abilities, and the court has gathered evidence to determine his competence to stand trial. The evidence obtained by the police and the findings of the two psychiatrists demonstrate that the defendant cannot currently meet either of the two prongs of the Dusky competence test.

The defendant does not meet the first prong of Dusky because he lacks the "present ability to consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding." Dusky, 362 U.S. at 402. The defendant currently cannot (1) provide any information about the armed robbery; (2) understand the charge against him ("My mother told me I did something bad, but I can't remember what."); (3) understand the role of his appointed counsel ("She's nice" and "She comes to see me and helps me"); or (4) comprehend abstract language and concepts. There is also no evidence that the defendant is feigning or exaggerating this impairment for the purpose of avoiding trial. Together, these facts show that the defendant currently lacks the ability to assist counsel in any fashion. See United States v. Andrews, 469 F.3d 1113, 1118–19 (7th Cir. 2006). Here, the defendant cannot currently assist counsel because he lacks knowledge of his case and the myriad consequences of his decisions. Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238, 242 (1969); see also Lafler v. Cooper, 132 S. Ct. 1376, 1383–84 (2012).

The defendant also does not meet the second prong of Dusky because he does not possess “a rational as well as factual understanding of the proceedings against him.” As to what is happening in the courtroom, the defendant admits, “I don’t know what they are talking about,” and he understands only that the judge is “the guy in charge.” If the defendant cannot understand the crime, charges, role of his appointed counsel, courtroom proceedings, and the role of the judge, the court should find that he is not currently competent to stand trial and the case should not proceed.

If the defendant’s mental abilities improve, his competence can be reassessed in the future.

Point Two (60% total)

If the defendant is ever found competent to stand trial and the prosecution proceeds, a jury should not find that he is NGRI under the M’Naghten test because the defense cannot prove by a preponderance of the evidence that, at the time of the armed robbery, (1) the defendant was suffering from a defect of reason from a disease of the mind; and (2) as a result of this mental disease or defect, he did not know the nature and quality of the act, or that the act was wrong.

I. The M’Naghten test (15%)

Under the M’Naghten test for NGRI used by State A (and a majority of states), the defense must prove that, at the time of the offense, (1) the defendant suffered from a defect of reason, from disease of the mind; and (2) as a result of this mental disease or defect, the defendant at the time of the act did not know the nature and quality of the act, or that the act was wrong. See generally Wayne R. Lafave, Criminal Law, Chapter 7: Insanity § 7.2 (5th ed. 2010). The nearly two-century-old M’Naghten test is derived from the opinion in M’Naghten, 8 Eng. Rep. 718 (1843). In State A, as in most states, the defense must prove the affirmative defense of NGRI by a preponderance of the evidence.

II. M’Naghten prong one (15%)

Under the first prong of the M’Naghten test, the defense probably cannot prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant suffered from a defect of reason caused by a disease of the mind. There has never been a comprehensive statutory or jurisprudential definition of “defect of reason” or “disease of the mind.” However, for a court to find a defendant NGRI, the defendant’s mental defect or disease must be sufficiently severe to cause the consequences described in the second prong of the M’Naghten test.

Here, the evidence indicating that the defendant was suffering from a mental disease or defect is the psychiatrists’ opinion that the defendant was having “mental health difficulties” and the defendant’s statement to his best friend: “I cannot attract customers because the United Nations has organized a secret boycott of my new business.” The court must balance this evidence against the evidence that, at the time of the armed robbery, the defendant (1) had not been diagnosed with a mental disease or defect, (2) had not sought mental health treatment, (3) had not displayed any other signs of cognitive impairment to his family or friends, (4) maintained relationships with family and friends, and (5) managed to run his everyday life and operate his business. Thus, even if the defendant was suffering from some cognitive impairment at the time of the armed robbery, there appears to be insufficient evidence of a mental disease or defect that would satisfy the first prong of the M’Naghten test. See generally Paul H. Robinson, “Criminal Law Defenses: A Systematic Analysis,” 82 Col. L. Rev. 199 (1982).

III. M’Naghten prong two (30%)

Under the M’Naghten test, a finding that the defendant was suffering from a “defect of reason” caused by a “disease of the mind” is necessary—but insufficient—to support a verdict of NGRI. See, e.g., People v. Stoffel, 794 N.Y.S.2d 230 (2005) (affirming the defendant’s conviction, because his schizophrenic delusions did not prevent him from knowing right from wrong). The bifurcated second prong of the test requires that the defense also prove that, as a result of this mental disease or defect, the defendant either did not know the nature and quality of the act or did not know that the act was wrong.

Here, the evidence gathered by the police and the court-appointed psychiatrists establishes that the defendant knew the nature and quality of his armed robbery of the store. The day before the robbery, the defendant texted his best friend: “I’ve been a victim for too long. I’ve decided to start making up for my losses,” which indicates that the defendant understood the robbery as a solution to his financial woes. The defendant also described his plan to flee: “If you read about me in the papers tomorrow, I’ll already be far away.” Finally, the defendant instructed his friend to destroy evidence (“delete this text”) and to lie to the police (“tell the police you never knew me”). Taken together, these facts establish that the defendant knew the nature and quality of the act of robbing the store.

On these facts, there is also sufficient evidence that the defendant knew that the act of armed robbery was wrong. Various state laws (and judicial interpretations of the NGRI defense) differ on the definition of “wrongfulness.” See State v. Crenshaw, 659 P.2d 488, 491 (Wash. 1983) (“The definition of the term ‘wrong’ in the M’Naghten test has been considered and disputed by many legal scholars.”). Some states define “wrongfulness” as legally wrong and provide the NGRI defense if the defendant’s mental disease or defect prevented him from knowing that his acts were legally wrong (i.e., criminal violations). See State v. Hamann, 285 N.W.2d 180, 184 (Iowa 1979) (“We hold the words ‘right’ or ‘wrong’ under the M’Naghten rule refer to legal right or wrong.”) Other states define “wrongfulness” as morally wrong and provide the NGRI defense only if the defendant did not know that his acts were morally wrong (i.e., the type of acts that society would condemn). See People v. Schmidt, 110 N.E. 945 (Ct. App. N.Y. 1915); People v. Wood, 187 N.E.2d 116 (Ct. App. N.Y. 1962); State v. Roberts, 876 N.W.2d 863 (Minn. 2016) (“The word ‘wrong’ in this [M’Naghten] statute is “used in the moral sense.”); State v. Bott, 246 N.W.2d 48, 52 (Minn. 1976). This means that a “defendant must know that his act was wrong in a moral sense and not merely know that he has violated a statute.” The remaining states do not define “wrongfulness.” See LaFave, supra, at 406–07.

Regardless of whether the state defines wrongfulness as a legal or moral wrong, none of the evidence indicates that the defendant believed that his acts were legally or morally justified or acceptable. The defendant entered a store, demanded “Give me all your money or I’ll shoot you,” stole $5,000, and sped away from the scene driving over 80 mph. The day before the armed robbery, the defendant texted his best friend: “I’ve been a victim for too long. I’ve decided to start making up for my losses. If you read about me in the papers tomorrow, I’ll already be far away, so delete this text and tell the police you never knew me.” As noted above, taken together these facts establish both that the defendant knew the nature and quality of his acts and that his armed robbery of the store was legally and morally wrong.

In sum, even if the defense satisfied the first prong of the M’Naghten test by proving that the defendant suffered from a “defect of reason” caused by a “disease of the mind,” the defense could not satisfy the second prong because on this record there is insufficient proof to demonstrate, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the defendant did not know the nature and quality of his armed robbery of the store or that his act was legally or morally wrong.

[NOTE: The fact that the defendant now suffers from brain damage is obviously not relevant to the question of the defendant’s mental state at the time of the crime. See, e.g., Drope v. Missouri, 420 U.S. 162, 176–177 (nonresponsibility and incompetency to stand trial are separate inquiries).]

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code or the common law of contracts apply to a dispute under a mixed contract for a transaction in both goods and services?
- (2)(a) When parties have entered into a written agreement which states that it is their complete agreement, under what circumstances are terms that were orally agreed to before the written agreement part of the resulting contract?
- (2)(b) When parties have entered into a written agreement which states that it is their complete agreement, is a subsequent oral agreement part of the resulting contract?
- (3) Is an agreement to modify a contract in which one party gives up rights and gets nothing in return enforceable?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Contracts for the sale of goods are governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code; most other contracts are governed by the common law of contracts. In a mixed (or hybrid) contract, involving both goods and nongoods (such as services), courts typically use a “predominant purpose” test to determine which body of law—the common law of contracts or Article 2—applies to the whole contract. In this case, it is not clear whether the goods aspect or the nongoods aspect predominates. Good arguments can be made either way.

Whether an oral agreement that predates a written agreement is part of the resulting contract is governed by the parol evidence rule. Under the common law parol evidence rule, the test is whether the written agreement is completely integrated (in which case a prior oral agreement that is within the scope of the written agreement is discharged by it) or only partially integrated (in which case the prior oral agreement is discharged only if it is inconsistent with the written agreement). Here, a strong argument can be made that the written agreement is completely integrated in light of the statement in the agreement that it is the parties’ “complete agreement.” Yet such a statement is not definitive. If the written agreement is completely integrated, the prior oral agreement about the lodging (which appears to be within the scope of the written agreement) would be discharged by the written agreement. If the written agreement is partially integrated, the prior oral agreement about lodging does not appear to be inconsistent with the written agreement and thus would probably not be discharged.

The parol evidence rule does not apply to the oral agreement lowering the price of the apprenticeship because the rule does not apply to oral agreements entered into subsequent to a written agreement. There was no consideration supporting the potter's agreement to lower the price, so, under the common law, the modification would not be binding on the potter because of the lack of consideration.

Point One (25%)

In this transaction involving both goods and services, the “predominant purpose” of the contract determines whether Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code or the common law of contracts governs. Here, persuasive arguments can be made that either the goods aspect or the nongoods aspect predominates.

Contracts for the sale of goods are governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. See UCC § 2-102. Most other contracts are governed by the common law of contracts. The contract here is mixed (or “hybrid”) in the sense that it contains both sale-of-goods aspects (the sale of equipment and tools used in the pottery-making process) and nongoods aspects (the apprenticeship training). In such a hybrid contract, involving both goods and nongoods, courts typically use a “predominant purpose” test to determine which body of law applies to the whole contract, rather than dividing the contract into goods and nongoods aspects. See James J. White & Robert S. Summers, Uniform Commercial Code 28 (6th ed. 2010).

Which aspect predominates here—the sale of the tools and equipment or the apprenticeship training? Comparing the prices assigned to each aspect of the transaction by the parties, the $5,000 goods portion is larger than the amount attributed to the services portion (whether the initial $4,000 or the potter's agreement to lower it to $3,500), suggesting that the goods aspect predominates and, thus, that Article 2 applies. But it can be argued that, notwithstanding the dollar amounts, the apprenticeship aspect predominates. After all, the woman's main interest was to improve her pottery skills through the apprenticeship, and the purchase of the tools and equipment could seem to be secondary to her main purpose. If the apprenticeship aspect predominates, the contract is governed by the common law of contracts.

[NOTE: Good arguments can be made for either conclusion. Credit should be given for understanding of the criterion (predominant purpose) and thoughtful application of that criterion to the facts, regardless of which conclusion the examinee reaches. In addition, answers may note that there are some decisions in which courts have found a contract to be divisible and applied Article 2 to the goods portion and the common law of contracts to the nongoods portion. See, e.g., Foster v. Colorado Radio Corp., 381 F.2d 222 (10th Cir. 1967).]

Point Two (40%)

Under the parol evidence rule, whether the oral agreement relating to lodging is part of the contract will depend on whether the parties intended the subsequent written agreement to be a complete and exclusive statement of the terms of the transaction.

Whether the terms of an oral agreement that predates a written agreement are part of the resulting contract is determined by application of the “parol evidence rule.” The common law parol evidence rule applies if a contract has been reduced to a writing that is “integrated”; that is, constituting a final expression of one or more terms of an agreement. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 209(2); 3 Corbin on Contracts § 588. This is the case here. Notwithstanding the subsequent modification of the agreement, it appears that the parties intended the terms stated in the written agreement to be final with respect to the matters they addressed; thus, the contract was integrated with respect to those terms.

The effect of the integrated writing under the common law parol evidence rule depends on whether the writing is “completely integrated” or only “partially integrated.” A completely integrated agreement, one that is adopted by the parties as a complete and exclusive statement of the terms of the agreement (see Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 210(1)), discharges prior agreements to the extent that they are within its scope. Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 213(2). If the writing is only partially integrated (i.e., integrated but not completely integrated), it discharges prior agreements only to the extent that the written agreement is inconsistent with the prior agreement. Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 213(1).

Thus, the fate of the oral agreement about lodging depends on whether the writing in this case is a completely integrated agreement or only partially integrated. If the writing is completely integrated, it will discharge the oral agreement about lodging so long as that oral agreement is within the scope of the writing. It is likely that the statement “This is our complete agreement” would lead a court to conclude that the written agreement is completely integrated “in the absence of credible contrary evidence.” Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 210 cmt b. But “a writing cannot of itself prove its own completeness.” Id. In this regard, the Restatement provides that “wide latitude must be allowed for inquiry into circumstances bearing on the intention of the parties” (see Id.), and approaches to this inquiry vary from state to state.

A court would likely hold that the oral lodging agreement is within the scope of the writing inasmuch as it deals with arrangements for the apprenticeship. If a court also held that the written agreement is completely integrated, the written agreement would therefore discharge the oral lodging agreement. If, on the other hand, the writing is only partially integrated, it discharges prior agreements only to the extent that it is inconsistent with them. Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 213(1). The oral lodging agreement does not appear to be inconsistent with the written agreement; thus, if the written agreement is held to be only partially integrated, the oral lodging agreement would not be discharged.

[NOTE: The later oral agreement lowering the price of the apprenticeship is not subject to the parol evidence rule. Only prior or contemporaneous terms are subject to the parol evidence rule. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 213; Arthur L. Corbin, “The Parol Evidence Rule,” 53 Yale L. J. 603, 607 (1944). Thus, the parol evidence rule does not prevent the later oral agreement from being part of the parties’ contract.]

Point Three (35%)

Under the common law of contracts, the agreement modifying the parties' contract would not be binding because it was not supported by consideration.

Under the common law, an agreement modifying an existing contract, like other promises, generally must be supported by consideration. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 71. There was no consideration for the potter's agreement to lower the price of the apprenticeship. Rather, under the modified arrangement the woman had the same duties to the potter as before (while getting the benefit of the lower price). Performance of those existing duties (or, as they are often denominated, "pre-existing duties") is not consideration supporting the potter's agreement to accept a lower price for the apprenticeship than under the original agreement. Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 73. Nor was anything else exchanged in return for the potter's agreement to lower the amount of money to which he was entitled. While there are exceptions to the consideration requirement for modifications, such as the rule in Restatement (Second) Section 89(a) that consideration is not required if the modification is fair and equitable in view of circumstances not anticipated by the parties when the contract was made, no exception is relevant here. Thus, under the common law, the modification would likely not be binding on the potter.

Legal Problems:

- (1) Which present title covenants, if any, did the developer breach?
- (2) Is the man entitled to damages for breach of the covenant against encumbrances because of the existence of the utility easement, which was plain and obvious?
- (3) Can the man force the utility company to remove the sewer lines from the land?
- (4) Is the man entitled to recover $5,000 from the developer for water damage to his home?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Of the three present title covenants, the developer breached the covenant against encumbrances by giving the man a warranty deed that contained no exceptions. However, because the utility easements were plain, obvious, or well known to the man, the man should not be able to obtain damages for breach of that covenant.

Even if the man is not charged with actual notice of the utility easements, because the utility easements were promptly and properly recorded prior to the man's purchase of the home, the man had constructive (record) notice of them; thus, he cannot compel the removal of the sewer lines from the land.

Finally, the man can recover damages from the developer for breach of the implied warranty of habitability.

Point One (35%)

The developer breached the covenant against encumbrances.

A warranty deed contains six title covenants, three present covenants and three future covenants. The three present covenants are

1. covenant of seisin, a covenant that the grantor owns the land that the deed purports to convey to the grantee;
2. covenant of right to convey, a covenant that the grantor has a right to convey the land; and
3. covenant against encumbrances, a covenant that there is no outstanding right or interest in a third party which does not totally negate the title the grantor purports to convey.

[NOTE: A warranty deed also contains three future covenants. These are (1) the covenant of warranty, (2) the covenant of quiet enjoyment, and (3) the covenant of further assurances. The calls of the question, however, only relate to the present covenants, and examinees should receive no credit for addressing the future covenants.]

See generally Herbert Hovenkamp, Sheldon F. Kurtz & Thomas P. Gallanis, The Law of Property: An Introductory Survey § 17.1 (6th ed. 2014).

These warranties of title apply to all easements on the land except to the extent that they have been excepted by the terms of the deed. The fact that the contract between the developer and the man provided for a warranty deed with easements excepted is irrelevant to whether a breach has occurred because, as a result of the so-called merger doctrine, contractual promises relating to title do not survive the closing and the delivery of the deed. In other words, the only promises relating to title that survive the closing are those in the deed. See Stoeckel & Whitman, The Law of Property 906 (3d ed. 2000).

Here the deed warranted that there were no encumbrances on the land. An encumbrance is “some outstanding right or interest in a third party which does not totally negate the title which the deed purports to convey.” Id. at 908. An easement is such an encumbrance. Id. Thus, the covenant against encumbrances was breached by the existence of the utility easements on the land.

The developer may claim that the omission from the deed of the exception in the contract for easements and covenants of record was a mutual mistake, perhaps due to a scrivener’s error. Modern courts often apply merger only when use of the doctrine carries out the parties’ probable intent. If a court accepts this argument, there would be no breach of any title covenant, in effect resulting in a reformation of the deed to conform to the parties’ intent.

[NOTE: There is plainly no breach of the other two present covenants. The man received title to the land along with possession, so there is no breach of the covenant of seisin. Nor is there a breach of the covenant of the right to convey. Nothing indicates that the developer lacked the right to convey title to the man.]

Point Two (25%)

The law is unclear whether the man can recover damages for breach of the covenant against encumbrances where, as here, the easement was plain, obvious, or known to the man.

If a court determines that the covenant against encumbrances was breached, it is unclear if the man can recover damages. Courts are divided on the propriety of damages where the easement is plain or obvious or is known to the plaintiff. Id. at 909.

The man might argue that, because the developer contracted to exclude the easement from the covenant but then granted the covenant without exclusion in the deed, the developer had knowledge of a change in circumstances that no longer made it necessary to preserve in the deed the exception stated in the contract and therefore willingly gave the warranty.

The developer would likely argue that the man had notice of the easements. Although the underground utilities were not visible, the man had constructive notice of the easements given that they had been recorded, and furthermore, their presence would also have been established through a home inspection prior to the closing, and this would constitute actual notice of their existence. The developer might also argue that, because utilities are essential to use of any house as a typical home, the man must have wanted the benefit of the easements.

Here, the developer has the stronger arguments; the man did have constructive notice of the easements (and possibly actual notice). It would also be unreasonable for a home buyer to recover damages for breach of a warranty for an easement the buyer would have wanted the benefit of for the home. By denying damages to the man, a court would, effectively, recognize that the failure to exclude the easements from the warranty in the deed was a mistake and that damages would provide the man with a windfall.

Even if the court were to find that the man is entitled to damages, he could recover them only to the extent that he could prove the easements reduced the value of the land. This measure is the value of the land not subject to the easements, minus the value of the land as restricted by the easements. Because utility easements are so commonly used in residential building subdivisions, it is possible that the man will not be able to prove any significant decline in value. This may depend on whether the easements are standard and are located along the perimeter of the lot, so as not to interfere with reasonable present or future residential uses of the land.

Point Three (15%)

The man cannot compel the utility company to remove the sewer lines from the land.

Resolution of a dispute between the man and the holder of the sewer line easement is not dependent on or controlled by the fact that the man received a warranty deed from the developer. Rather, the question is whether the man had knowledge of the easements when he purchased the land. The facts state that the utility easements had been promptly and properly recorded prior to the delivery of the deed to the man. Therefore, regardless of the type of notice statute the jurisdiction has (notice, race-notice, or race), the man, even if he had no actual notice of the easements, was on record (or constructive) notice of the easements. Hovenkamp et al., supra, at 536. Thus, he takes subject to the easements, and he cannot force the utility company to remove the sewer lines from the land.

Point Four (25%)

The man can recover damages from the developer for breach of the implied warranty that applies to new home construction.

At common law, the rule of caveat emptor applied, and as a result the seller did not make any implied promises to the buyer relating to the condition of the premises. Today, it is generally true that a builder of a new home impliedly warrants to the buyer that the home is habitable and fit for its intended purposes. Joseph William Singer, Property 518 (4th ed. 2014). This implied warranty allows a buyer to recover damages for losses resulting from defective construction or construction that was not done in a workmanlike manner. See Barlow Burke and Joseph Snoe, Property: Examples and Explanations 420 (3d ed. 2008).

The warranty applies to defects that are discovered within a reasonable period of time, are due to the builder's negligence or failure to do the work in a workmanlike manner, and cannot be attributable to later changes in the structure or to normal deterioration. Id. at 377–378. Courts vary in characterizing the warranty as based in contract or in tort law.

Here, the defect in the foundation clearly breaches the warranty. Thus, the man should be able to recover all damages for losses resulting from the developer's breach of the warranty.

- (2)(b) When an attorney files an answer on behalf of a client that contains a general denial that violates Rule 11, on whom should the sanctions be imposed?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The filing of a general denial by the defendants' attorney violated Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11. Rule 11 requires an attorney to conduct a reasonable inquiry before filing an answer that denies all of the complaint's allegations. Here it appears that the attorney conducted no inquiry into the facts and that many of the factual allegations that were denied concerned facts that could easily have been checked by the attorney before the answer was filed. In addition, the attorney violated Rule 11 by denying that venue was proper because that denial was a "legal contention" that was not warranted by existing law. Finally, the attorney failed to withdraw or correct the answer, even though the plaintiff properly gave the attorney a 21-day "safe harbor" in which to correct the pleading. Thus, the court should find that the defendants' answer violated Rule 11.

The court has discretion not to impose any sanctions even if it finds a violation of Rule 11. If the court does impose sanctions, it has discretion to choose among a range of monetary and nonmonetary sanctions. If warranted for effective deterrence, the court could order payment to the plaintiff of the reasonable attorney's fees directly resulting from the Rule 11 violation.

The sanctions could be imposed on the defendants' attorney, the law firm of which he is a partner, and the defendants themselves. However, if the court finds that the defendants' attorney violated Rule 11(b)(2) by asserting a legal contention unwarranted by existing law, any monetary sanctions attributable to that violation could be imposed only on the attorney and not on the defendants. The facts do not indicate that the driver and the moving company are responsible for, or even knew of, the attorney's decision to file a general denial. Thus, the sanctions, if any, likely would be imposed on the defendants' attorney and his law firm, and not on the defendants.

Point One(a) (35%)

The court should grant the motion for sanctions because the defendants' attorney violated Rule 11 by filing an answer that contained improper denials of factual and legal contentions.

Every pleading, written motion, or other paper (except for discovery requests and responses) must be signed by an attorney, or by a party if the party is unrepresented. Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(a). An attorney's signature on a pleading "certifies that to the best of the person's knowledge, information, and belief, formed after an inquiry reasonable under the circumstances[.]"

- (1) [the pleading] is not being presented for an improper purpose . . .;
- (2) the . . . legal contentions are warranted by existing law or by a nonfrivolous argument for [changing existing law];
- (3) the factual contentions have evidentiary support or, if specifically so identified, will likely have evidentiary support after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation or discovery; and
- (4) the denials of factual contentions are warranted on the evidence or, if specifically so identified, are reasonably based on belief or a lack of information.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(b).

Here, the driver and the moving company filed an answer, which is a "pleading" subject to Rule 11. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 7(a) (defining "pleading" to include answer). The facts state that the defendants' attorney signed the answer, as required. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(a).

The defendants' answer was a general denial, which is technically allowed under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, but only if the party "intends in good faith to deny all the allegations of a [complaint]—including the jurisdictional grounds . . ." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(b)(3). A defendant's answer must respond to legal conclusions stated in the complaint (e.g., an assertion that venue is proper) as well as to factual allegations. See Farrell v. Pike, 342 F. Supp. 2d 433, 440–441 (M.D. NC. 2004) (party must respond to both the factual and legal allegations); Northern Indiana Metals v. Iowa Express, Inc., 2008 WL 2756330 (N.D. Ind. 2008) (same). Because "there is almost always something in the complaint that, in good faith, should be admitted," a general denial is likely to be improper in most cases. William W. Schwarzer, A. Wallace Tashima & James M. Wagstaffe, Practice Guide: Federal Civil Procedure Before Trial (National ed.) § 8:937 (2014). See, e.g., Nat'l Rest. Ass'n Educ. Found. v. Shain, 287 F.R.D. 83, 87 (D.D.C. 2012) (general denial improper when defendant does not contest federal court's jurisdiction, even if other facts are contested).

In this problem, the effect of the general denial was to deny all of the complaint's allegations, including accurate factual contentions that the driver and the moving company would be unable to deny in good faith, such as their state of citizenship and the driver's employment by the moving company at the time of the accident. Because these denials were not "specifically identified" as being “reasonably based on belief or a lack of information,” they were proper only if they were “warranted on the evidence.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(b)(4). However, these denials weren’t warranted on the evidence, as the defendants’ later admissions made clear. In addition, the denial of the propriety of venue was not warranted by the facts or by existing law. Venue is appropriate in the federal district court in which a “substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred.” 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b)(2). The accident occurred in the district in which the plaintiff filed suit. Even if the defendants’ attorney did not know the venue rule, Rule 11(b)(2) required him to investigate the statutory provision before filing his answer. If he had done so, he would have seen that denying the propriety of venue was unwarranted under the law.

A lawyer who files an inaccurate pleading is not subject to sanctions if the lawyer acted in good faith after making a pre-filing “inquiry” that was “reasonable under the circumstances.” Reasonableness is judged as of the time the pleading was submitted, and depends on “such factors as how much time for investigation was available to the signer; whether he had to rely on a client for information as to the facts underlying the pleading, motion, or other paper; whether the pleading, motion, or other paper was based on a plausible view of the law; or whether he depended on forwarding counsel or another member of the bar.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 11 advisory committee’s note to 1983 amendment. See, e.g., C.Q. Int’l Co., Inc. v. Rochem Int’l, Inc., 659 F.3d 53, 62–63 (1st Cir. 2011) (reasonableness of investigation depends on totality of circumstances, including complexity of subject matter, time available for inquiry, and the ease or difficulty of gaining access to relevant information).

Here, the defendants’ attorney had only a few days to investigate, and the attorney was in the midst of a trial at the time. Nonetheless, the attorney or another member of the firm should have known, or could have easily discovered, simple facts such as the state of citizenship of his clients, that the driver was acting in the course of employment at the time of the accident, and that the driver resided in the district where the action was filed. Even a brief conversation with the clients would have permitted verification of those facts. The inference that the earlier denial of these factual contentions was not “warranted on the evidence” is further supported by the defendants’ response to Requests for Admission, in which the defendants admitted these same facts. On the basis of the facts given in this problem, it seems likely that several of the original factual denials were unwarranted.

Point One(b) (15%)

The plaintiff’s lawyer properly gave the defendants’ attorney an opportunity to correct the pleading before the plaintiff’s lawyer sought Rule 11 sanctions.

Before a party may seek sanctions under Rule 11, the party must serve on the opposing party a motion that describes the specific conduct that allegedly violated the rule. The opposing party must be given 21 days to withdraw or correct the challenged pleading. If the 21-day period passes, and the pleading is not corrected, the motion for sanctions may be filed with the court. Rule 11(c)(2).

Here, the plaintiff's lawyer followed the proper procedure for presenting a Rule 11 motion. First, the motion requesting that the answer be withdrawn and amended to reflect the admissions made in the response to the Requests for Admission was first served on the defendants' attorney. The plaintiff's lawyer then waited at least 21 days, the rule's "safe harbor" period, to allow the defendants' attorney to withdraw or appropriately correct the answer. Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(c)(2). When the attorney failed to do so, the Rule 11 motion was then filed in court. The motion set forth "the specific conduct that allegedly violat[ed] Rule 11(b)," insofar as the plaintiff requested the defendants' attorney to correct the answer by admitting the allegations that had been admitted in the responses to the Requests for Admission. Id.

Point Two(a) (30%)

The court has considerable discretion in imposing sanctions. The purpose of any sanctions award should be to deter similar future conduct by this lawyer or others. The sanctions may include an award of reasonable attorney's fees that were incurred because of the violation.

The court will probably determine that the answer violated Rule 11(b)(4) and Rule 11(b)(2). Nonetheless, the court is not obligated to impose any sanctions. Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(c)(1). "Whether a violation has occurred and what sanctions, if any, to impose for a violation are matters committed to the discretion of the trial court . . ." Fed. R. Civ. P. 11 advisory committee's note to 1993 amendment.

Sanctions should be "limited to what suffices to deter repetition of the conduct or comparable conduct by others similarly situated." Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(c)(4). Sanctions can be monetary or nonmonetary. If the sanctions are monetary, they can include "an order to pay a penalty into court; or, if imposed on motion and warranted for effective deterrence, an order directing payment to the movant of part or all of the reasonable attorney's fees and other expenses directly resulting from the violation." Id. Examples of nonmonetary sanctions would be "striking the offending paper; issuing an admonition, reprimand, or censure; requiring participation in seminars or other educational programs; . . . [or] referring the matter to disciplinary authorities . . ." Fed. R. Civ. P. 11 advisory committee note to 1993 amendment.

A non-exhaustive list of factors the court may consider in deciding what sanctions, if any, should be imposed for a violation includes [w]hether the improper conduct was willful, or negligent; whether it was part of a pattern of activity, or an isolated event; whether it infected the entire pleading, or only one particular count or defense; whether the person has engaged in similar conduct in other litigation; whether it was intended to injure; what effect it had on the litigation process in time or expense; whether the responsible person is trained in the law; what amount, given the financial resources of the responsible person, is needed to deter that person from repetition in the same case; what amount is needed to deter similar activity by other litigants . . .

Id.

Here, the defendants admitted, in their response to the Requests for Admission, the very facts they had earlier denied in their answer. This suggests that they were not willfully seeking to impose any unnecessary burden on the plaintiff or to deny uncontested facts. Moreover, because only a few months had gone by, the effect of the offending answer on “the litigation process in time or expense” was likely minimal. On the other hand, if this particular lawyer or law firm had a history of failing to follow the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or if improper general denials were a particular problem in this district, then the court here would be justified in ordering sanctions consisting of the plaintiff’s “reasonable” attorney’s fees “directly resulting from the violation.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(c)(4). The court would evaluate the time records submitted to ensure that the seven hours of work claimed “directly result[ed] from the violation,” but seven hours does not, on its face, seem unreasonable. Depending on the geographic region of the country and the plaintiff’s attorney’s seniority and level of skill, $300 per hour is also probably a “reasonable” amount. Id. A sanctions award that fully compensates the plaintiff for the costs of challenging the defendants’ attorney’s misconduct can promote deterrence by helping ensure that misconduct does not go unchallenged in the future. Rentz v. Dynasty Apparel Indus., 556 F.3d 389, 399–402 (6th Cir. 2009) (award of nominal sanctions vacated and remanded for reconsideration because sanctions failed to fully compensate moving party for costs of motion and thus were clearly insufficient to promote deterrent purposes of rule).

Point Two(b) (20%)

Sanctions may be imposed upon the defendants’ attorney, his law firm, and the defendants. However, monetary sanctions for asserting an unwarranted legal contention may not be imposed upon the defendants, but only upon the attorney or the law firm.

The court may impose sanctions on “any attorney, law firm, or party that violated the rule or is responsible for the violation.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(c)(1). Here, this would certainly include the driver’s and moving company’s attorney. In addition, the attorney’s law firm should probably also be held jointly responsible, because there do not seem to be any “exceptional circumstances” that would justify a departure from the general rule that “a law firm must be held jointly responsible for a violation committed by its partner . . .” Id.

There is authority for imposing sanctions on a party when the party authorizes its attorney to pursue a claim that “it knew, or should have known . . . was legally and factually baseless.” Worldwide Primates, Inc., v. McGreal, 26 F.3d 1090, 1093 (11th Cir. 1994). But there are no facts here that indicate that the driver and the moving company knew the content of the answer or were responsible for the attorney’s decision to make an unwarranted general denial.

If the plaintiff were to argue that the defendants should also be sanctioned because they contributed to the attorney’s decision to file a general denial by failing to give the attorney a copy of the complaint until very close to the date an answer was due, a court would almost certainly reject that argument.

Even if the defendants were negligent in failing to get the complaint to their attorney at an earlier time, instead of filing a general denial the attorney could have requested an extension of time in which to answer and used that time to conduct a reasonable inquiry into the facts and law. Furthermore, the attorney could have avoided sanctions by filing an amended answer when requested by the plaintiff. There are no facts indicating that the defendants were responsible for these failures by the attorney.

Finally, insofar as the general denial included an unwarranted “legal contention” (e.g., the denial of proper venue), any monetary sanctions resulting from that particular violation could not be imposed upon the driver and the moving company. Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(c)(5)(A).

Legal Problems:

- (1) May a partner properly withdraw from a partnership that has no definite term or specific undertaking?
- (2) What is the legal effect of a partner's withdrawal from an at-will partnership— both on the partnership and on the withdrawing partner's duties?
- (3) What are the duties of a withdrawing partner during the winding up of a dissolved partnership with respect to business opportunities that came to the partner's attention during the partnership?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The man had the right to withdraw from the partnership, and his email stating that he was “leaving” expressed his will to withdraw. His withdrawal was not wrongful, given that the partnership had no definite term or particular undertaking.

The man's withdrawal from the partnership caused the partnership to be dissolved, but this dissolution did not terminate the man's duties to the woman during the winding up of the partnership business. During the winding up of the partnership business, the man continued to owe fiduciary duties to the partnership and the woman, as well as duties of good faith and fair dealing.

The opportunity to purchase the building was a partnership opportunity because of the partnership's prior interest in owning the building and because the opportunity was presented to the man while the partnership was still in existence and prior to its dissolution. The man's purchase of the building violated his duty of loyalty not to appropriate partnership opportunities during the winding-up process, and the purchase was not in good faith because the man failed to inform the woman of the opportunity when he learned of it before he withdrew from the partnership.

[NOTE: An examinee may analyze this question under either the Uniform Partnership Act (1914) (UPA) or the Revised Uniform Partnership Act (1997, as amended in 2013) (RUPA). Although the terminology regarding partnership dissolution and winding up are somewhat different under the two Acts, the legal ramifications of the partner's withdrawal in this two- person, at-will partnership are essentially the same under both Acts. In addition, the revised Act codifies and clarifies the fiduciary duties of partners, and the analysis on this topic cites both the RUPA provisions and applicable case law.

Agency Analysis

All states, except Louisiana, have adopted a version of the Uniform Partnership Act. As of 2017, most states (37) have adopted the revised Act, though only a handful have adopted the 2013 amendments. The original Act, however, remains applicable in the following MEE jurisdictions: Missouri, New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island, and Wisconsin. See Uniform Law Commission, Partnership Act.]

Point One (25%)

The man's email to the woman constituted a withdrawal from the partnership and did not violate the partnership agreement.

A partner may withdraw from a partnership by giving notice at any time. UPA § 31; RUPA § 601(1) (partner is “disassociated” from partnership upon partnership having notice of partner’s “express will to withdraw”). A partner always has the power to withdraw by express will, even if such withdrawal is wrongful or in contravention of the partnership agreement, such as early withdrawal from a partnership with a definite term. UPA § 31(2); RUPA § 601; see also Comment 1 to RUPA § 601 (partnership cannot eliminate power of partner to dissociate, but can eliminate right to dissociate and make such dissociation wrongful).

Dissolution is caused without any violation of the partnership agreement when, among other circumstances, a partner withdraws from an at-will partnership. UPA § 31(1)(b); RUPA § 801(1). In the absence of a definite term or particular undertaking, a partnership is deemed to be at will. See Comment, RUPA § 102(13) (partnership at will is “default mode,” unless partners have agreed to definite term or particular undertaking). See also Girard Bank v. Haley, 332 A.2d 443, 447 (Pa. 1975) (explaining that “particular undertaking” must be capable of accomplishment at some time, although the exact time may be unknown).

Here, the man’s email to the woman constituted a withdrawal from the partnership and did not violate the partnership agreement, given that there is no indication that the partners (who had been carrying on the business for many years) had agreed on a definite term or particular undertaking for their natural-foods store partnership. Thus, the man’s withdrawal from their at-will partnership was proper.

Point Two (25%)

The man's withdrawal from the partnership caused the partnership to be dissolved, but did not terminate the man's duties to the woman during the winding-up process.

Dissolution of a partnership results in a change in the legal relation of the partners but does not immediately terminate the partnership or the rights and powers of the partners. See UPA § 29; RUPA § 801(1) (in at-will partnership, notice of partner’s withdrawal causes partnership to be dissolved, and business must be wound up). Upon dissolution, the partnership continues until the winding up of partnership affairs is completed. UPA § 30; RUPA § 802(a) (partnership continues only for purposes of winding up).

Thus, dissolution marks the point when the partners cease carrying on the partnership business together and begin a process of settling the partnership affairs. The partners' rights, powers, and duties continue during the winding-up process that follows dissolution, during which the partnership liabilities are paid, the business is settled and closed, and the partnership assets are distributed. See RUPA § 802(b)(1). The partners' legal relationship and the partnership terminate only when all of the partnership affairs are completely wound up. UPA § 30; RUPA § 802(a).

Under the Uniform Partnership Act (1914), a partnership at will is dissolved by the express will of any partner, and any partner of the dissolved partnership has the right to have the partnership business wound up. UPA §§ 31(1)(b), 38(1). A similar result follows under the Revised Uniform Partnership Act, which provides that a partner in a partnership at will can dissociate from the partnership by that partner's express will, and upon dissociation the partnership is dissolved and its business must be wound up. See RUPA §§ 601(1), 801(1); see also Fleming v. Hagen Estate, 702 N.W.2d 786, 789 (Minn. Ct. App. 2005) (under revised act, withdrawal from partnership results in dissolution only in at-will partnership).

Here, although the man's withdrawal (or dissociation) caused their at-will partnership to be dissolved, the man continued to have duties to the woman and the partnership during the winding-up process. Because the man's withdrawal (dissociation) from the partnership was not wrongful, he had the power and the right to participate in the winding up of the partnership business, and his actions during that period bound the partnership. See UPA § 37; RUPA § 804(a) (dissolved partnership bound by acts of partner "appropriate for winding up the partnership business").

Point Three (50%)

During the winding-up process, the man owed the woman a fiduciary duty to account to the partnership for any benefit derived from the appropriation of a partnership opportunity, as well as duties of good faith and fair dealing. The man's purchase of the building for himself, without telling the woman, breached these duties.

During the winding-up process, partners who participate in the winding up of partnership business continue to have a fiduciary relationship to the partnership and the other partners. See RUPA § 409 (except for duty not to compete with partnership, all of partner's fiduciary duties continue to apply during "winding up of the partnership business").

Among the partner's fiduciary duties is a duty to account to the partnership for any benefit derived by the partner from the appropriation of any partnership opportunities. See RUPA § 409(b)(1)(C) (duty arises "in the conduct or the winding up of the partnership's business"). The duty not to appropriate partnership opportunities continues during the winding-up process, although "the scope of the partnership opportunities inevitably narrows." See Comment to RUPA § 409(b)(1)(C); see also Bayer v. Bayer, 215 App. Div. 454, 214 N.Y.S. 322 (1926) (partner's fiduciary duties in a dissolved partnership no longer extend to looking to the future of the business).

Agency Analysis

A partnership opportunity includes one that is “closely related to the entity’s existing or prospective line of business, [that] would competitively advantage the partnership, and . . . that the partnership has the financial ability, knowledge and experience to pursue” Triple Five of Minn., Inc. v. Simon, 404 F.3d 1088, 1096 (8th Cir. 2005). A partner who learns of a business opportunity during the term of a partnership may not appropriate that opportunity (without sharing with his co-partners) during the winding-up process or after the partnership term ends. See Meinhard v. Salmon, 164 N.E. 545, 546 (N.Y. 1928) (lease extension and expansion beyond term of original joint venture); Fouchek v. Janicek, 225 P.2d 783 (Ore. Sup. Ct. 1950).

In addition, the partner must perform his duties during the winding up of the partnership business “consistently with the contractual obligation of good faith and fair dealing.” RUPA § 409(d). The obligations of good faith and fair dealing encompass a disclosure duty. See Comment 4 to RUPA (1997) § 404; see also Hamilton Co. v. Hamilton Tile Corp., 23 Misc.2d 589, 197 N.Y.S.2d 384 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1960) (partner’s dealings during the winding-up process include continuing duties of “good faith and full disclosure”); 59A Am. Jur. 2d Partnership § 291, Termination of Partnership (2015) (dissociated partner may not use confidential partnership information after dissociation).

Here, the opportunity to purchase the building in which the store was located constituted a partnership opportunity. The partners’ prior interest in purchasing the building indicates that ownership of the building was an expectancy of the partnership, and there is no indication that the partnership lacked the financial resources to buy the building. Further, given the goodwill that the store had gained at its location, ownership of the building would likely be a partnership opportunity because owning and not having to lease the building would enhance the value of the partnership’s ongoing business. See Comment to RUPA (1997) § 803 (recognizing value of preserving partnership business as a going concern during winding-up process); see also Paciaroni v. Crane, 408 A.2d 946 (Del. Ch. 1979). In fact, the man’s eagerness to purchase the building provides evidence that ownership of the building created value for the ongoing business of operating the natural-foods store at that location.

The man breached his fiduciary duty to the partnership and the woman by not informing the woman of the opportunity to purchase the building so that their partnership could have acquired the goodwill (customer loyalty) that attached to the building’s location. In addition, the man breached his duty of good faith and fair dealing by not informing the woman of this business opportunity.

The man breached his duties to the partnership and the woman even though he did not begin negotiations for the building’s purchase and did not purchase the building until after withdrawing from the partnership. Courts have found a breach of fiduciary duties even when final negotiations and purchase of the partnership opportunity occur after withdrawal. See Dzen v. Dzen, 1999 WL 130545 (Conn. Super. Ct. 1999) (breach of fiduciary duty when partner, after withdrawal and during winding up of partnership, purchased property that had been leased to partnership); Lavin v. Ehrlich, 363 N.Y.S.2d 50 (Sup. Ct. 1974) (same).

Agency Analysis

[NOTE: An examinee might conclude that the man's continuation of the natural-foods store with the same customers, suppliers, and employees of the partnership also constituted a breach of duties to the partnership and the woman. These continuing dealings, however, are not raised in the question.]

An examinee might also point out that the proper remedy in this case would be for the man to hold the building in trust as a partnership asset, thus allowing the woman to participate in the building's special value to the partnership. But the proper remedy for the man's breach of his duties is not raised in the question.]

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the July 2018 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Contracts question on the July 2018 MEE tested the following areas from the Contracts outline: I.A. Formation of contracts—Mutual assent (including offer and acceptance, and unilateral, bilateral, and implied-in-fact contracts); and D. Obligations enforceable without a bargained-for exchange (including reliance and restitution).

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by user jurisdictions as part of the bar examination on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Areas of law that may be covered on the MEE include the following: Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Civil Procedure, Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts (including Article 2 [Sales] of the Uniform Commercial Code), Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Article 9 (Secured Transactions) of the Uniform Commercial Code. Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles. Examinees in non-UBE jurisdictions should answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW QUESTION

In Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U.S. 1 (2005), the Supreme Court held that Congress has the power under the Commerce Clause of Article I, Section 8, of the Constitution “to prohibit the local cultivation and use of marijuana,” even when applicable state law permits such cultivation and even when the cultivation and use are entirely within state borders. At the time of that decision, at least nine states authorized the use of marijuana for medicinal reasons. Since the decision, medicinal use of marijuana has been approved in numerous other states, and some states have also begun to allow the recreational use of marijuana.

Concerned with the widespread disregard of federal law in states that have “legalized” marijuana use, Congress recently passed the Federal Drug Abuse Prevention Act. Sections 11 and 15 of that Act provide as follows:

Section 11. Any state law enforcement officer or agency that takes any individual person into custody for violation of any state law must make a reasonable investigation within five business days to ascertain whether the individual in custody was under the influence of marijuana at the time of the alleged offense. Such officers or agencies must file monthly reports with the federal Drug Enforcement Agency on the outcome of these required investigations, including the name of any individual determined to have been under the influence of marijuana at the time of his or her alleged offense.

Section 15. No state government, state agency, or unit of local government within a state shall be eligible to receive any funding through the federal Justice Assistance Grant program unless use of marijuana is a criminal act in that state.

The Justice Assistance Grant program has been in existence for many years. It is the primary program through which the federal government provides financial assistance for state law enforcement agencies. Last year, the federal government made approximately $300 million in grants to state and local law enforcement agencies through this program. Congress has appropriated another $300 million for such grants in the upcoming fiscal year.

State A has a population of about 4 million people. Its crime rate is below average. Last year, total spending by law enforcement agencies in State A was $600 million, of which $10 million came from federal grants under the Justice Assistance Grant program.

State A recently adopted legislation decriminalizing the use of marijuana for all purposes by persons over the age of 21.

As applied to State A,

1. Is Section 11 of the Federal Drug Abuse Prevention Act a constitutional exercise of federal power? Explain.
2. Is Section 15 of the Federal Drug Abuse Prevention Act a constitutional exercise of federal power? Explain.

CONTRACTS QUESTION

A homeowner, who knew that his neighbor wanted to buy a lawn mower, called the neighbor and offered to sell his lawn mower to her for $350. The neighbor replied, “No way! That price is too high.” The homeowner responded, “The price is a good one. See if you can find another lawn mower as good as mine for as little as $350. I’m confident that you’ll come to your senses. In fact, I’m so confident that not only am I still willing to sell you the lawn mower for $350, but I promise to keep this offer open for a week so that you have time to do some comparison shopping. If you don’t get back to me within a week, I’ll sell the lawn mower to someone who knows what a good value it is.”

Four days later, the neighbor concluded that $350 was, indeed, a very good price for the homeowner’s lawn mower. Accordingly, she decided that she would go see the homeowner the next morning and accept the offer to buy the lawn mower from him for $350. That evening, the neighbor got a telephone call from an acquaintance who lived on the same block as the homeowner and the neighbor. The acquaintance said, “Congratulate me! I just got a great deal on a used lawn mower. [The homeowner] agreed to sell me his lawn mower for $375. At that price, it’s a steal. I’m picking it up tomorrow afternoon.” The neighbor replied, “This must be a mistake; he offered to sell that lawn mower to me.” The acquaintance said, “There’s no mistake; we wrote up the deal and everything. I’ll come by your place right now and show you the signed contract.” A few minutes later, the acquaintance went to the neighbor’s house and showed her a signed document pursuant to which the homeowner had agreed to sell his used lawn mower to the acquaintance for $375.

The neighbor went to the homeowner’s house the first thing the next morning, rang his doorbell, and as soon as the homeowner came to the door, said, “I accept your offer.” The homeowner replied, “Too late. I’ve agreed to sell the mower to someone else for $375. Next time, act quickly when you are presented with such a great bargain.”

The neighbor is furious about the homeowner’s refusal to sell her the lawn mower for $350. In her view, the homeowner was bound to keep his offer open for a week and, in any event, her statement “I accept your offer” created a contract that bound the homeowner to the deal.

1. Was the homeowner bound by his promise to keep his offer open for a week? Explain.
2. Assuming that the homeowner was not bound by his promise to keep the offer open, did the neighbor’s statement “I accept your offer” create a contract with the homeowner for the sale of the lawn mower? Explain.

REAL PROPERTY QUESTION

In 2015, a man purchased a convenience store that sells gasoline and snack-type grocery items. The man's store is located within two miles of three other convenience stores that are larger and contain small dining areas. When he bought the store, the man planned to expand it as soon as he could in order to offer the same services and products as the other three stores in the area.

In 2017, the local zoning board passed an ordinance that rezoned the district in which all four stores are located from "light commercial" to "residential." Convenience stores are not "residential" uses. The zoning ordinance contained typical language protecting existing nonconforming uses.

In early 2018, the man decided to expand his store by 1,100 square feet to add a small dining area. To finance this expansion, he obtained a $200,000 loan commitment from a local bank, with the funds to be disbursed at such times and in such amounts as the bank determined to be appropriate if, in the bank's good-faith judgment, there was "satisfactory progress" being made on the project. Documents reflecting this commitment were signed by the man and the bank, and a mortgage to secure the repayment of the loan was promptly and properly filed in the local land records office.

Two weeks after obtaining the loan commitment, the man signed a contract with a general contractor for construction of the store expansion. In compliance with its loan commitment, the bank disbursed $50,000 to the man, who, in turn, paid that sum to the general contractor. Construction began immediately thereafter.

Four weeks into the project, a plumbing subcontractor installed all the plumbing fixtures. After the general contractor failed to pay the $20,000 agreed price to the subcontractor, the subcontractor immediately filed a mechanic's lien against the man's property in the local land records office to secure its claim for $20,000.

Eight weeks into the project, the bank disbursed an additional $40,000 to the man, who, in turn, paid $40,000 to the general contractor. The general contractor used these funds to pay various creditors, but not the plumbing subcontractor.

Two weeks ago, a bank loan officer learned for the first time about the mechanic's lien. The next day, when the man approached the bank about making another disbursement, the loan officer refused. The man asserts that, under the loan agreement, the bank is obligated to disburse further funds.

1. Is the expansion project a nonconforming use? Explain.
2. Assuming that the expansion project does not violate the zoning classification, is the bank obligated to disburse further funds? Explain.
3. Does the mechanic's lien have priority, in whole or in part, over the bank's mortgage? Explain.

TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS QUESTION

By his will, a testator created a trust of a small house and an apartment building containing six three-bedroom apartments. The will directed the trustee to sell the house within six months of the testator's death. The will also provided, in relevant part, that "all trust income will be paid to my cousin, Albert, during his lifetime" and that "upon Albert's death, all trust principal will be distributed to my granddaughter, Betty." Neither the will nor the trust made any provision for the testator's son, who was living at the time the will was executed. Shortly after making this will in 2006, the testator died.

After the trust was created, the trustee sold the house for $100,000 and properly invested the sale proceeds. All six apartments in the apartment building were rented at market rates ranging from $1,200 to $1,400 per month.

In 2010, one apartment, which had been rented for $1,300 per month, was vacated. The trustee thereafter rented this apartment to himself for $1,300 per month. The other five apartments continued to be rented throughout the term of the trust at market rates of between $1,200 and $1,400 per month.

In 2012, a portion of the apartment building's roof was destroyed by fire. Because the trustee had not purchased a fire insurance policy, he spent $50,000 to repair the roof. The trustee charged this expense to trust income even though the trust had liquid assets of more than $120,000 that could have been used to pay for the repair. Because the roof repair was charged to trust income, Albert received $50,000 less income from the trust in 2012 than he had received in prior years.

In 2013, Betty died. Betty was survived by her husband and a daughter. Under Betty's duly probated will, she left her entire estate to her husband. If Betty had died intestate, her estate would have been distributed equally between her husband and her daughter.

There is no applicable statute relevant to the disposition of Betty's interest in the trust.

In 2018, Albert died. Albert was survived by Betty's husband and Betty's daughter. Albert was also survived by the testator's son.

1. What fiduciary duties, if any, did the trustee violate in administering the trust? Explain.
2. Upon Albert's death, how should the trust principal be distributed? Explain.

EVIDENCE QUESTION

A woman has sued a man for injuries she received in an automobile collision at a suburban traffic circle in State A on January 1. Both drivers were driving alone, there were no other witnesses, and a forensic accident investigation failed to determine which of the two drivers was at fault.

Among other things, the woman's complaint alleges the following:

1. The woman was driving her pickup truck in the traffic circle at or below the speed limit when the man suddenly pulled his car into the traffic circle immediately in front of her.
2. The man's action left the woman no opportunity to slow down, stop, or avoid colliding with his car.
3. The woman observed that the man was texting on his phone when he entered the traffic circle and did not see him look up to check for traffic before entering the circle.
4. The accident caused the onset of significant neck pain for the woman requiring extensive medical treatment and resulting in lost wages.

The man has denied that he was texting at the time of the accident and alleges that the accident was the woman's fault. According to the man, the woman was driving her truck substantially over the speed limit, her brakes were defective, and despite the fact that the man's car was far ahead of the woman's truck when he entered the traffic circle, the woman failed to slow down to avoid a collision.

A jury trial has been scheduled.

The man's attorney plans to offer the following evidence:

- (a) Testimony by a mechanic to the effect that "I inspected [the woman's] truck a week before the accident. The brakes on the truck were worn and in need of repair. I ordered new parts."
- (b) A written invoice signed by the mechanic stating: "New parts for [the woman's] truck brakes ordered on December 23 and received on January 2," found in the mechanic's file cabinet among similar invoices for other customers.
- (c) Testimony by the woman's doctor, who treated the woman for neck pain after the accident, that the woman told the doctor, "I have suffered from painful arthritis in my neck for the past five years."

The woman's attorney plans to call the man's roommate to testify that "[the man] is addicted to texting and never puts his phone down. He even texts while driving."

Evidence Question

State A has adopted evidence rules identical to the Federal Rules of Evidence.

1. Is the mechanic's testimony admissible? Explain.
2. Is the invoice for the new parts for the woman's truck brakes admissible? Explain.
3. Is the doctor's testimony admissible? Explain.
4. Is the roommate's testimony admissible? Explain.

CORPORATIONS & LLCs QUESTION

A woman and a man decided to start a solar-panel installation business in State X. They agreed to incorporate the business and to be equal shareholders. They also agreed that the woman would be solely responsible for managing the business.

On November 10, the woman mailed to the Secretary of State of State X a document titled “Articles of Incorporation.” The document included the name of the corporation (Solar Inc.), the name and address of the corporation’s registered agent, and the woman’s name and address (as incorporator). The woman, however, inadvertently failed to include in the document the number of authorized shares, as required by the business corporation act of State X, which in all respects comports with the Model Business Corporation Act (1984, as revised). The woman signed the document and included a check to cover the filing fee.

On November 20, the woman, assuming that the articles of incorporation had been filed and purporting to act on behalf of the corporation, entered into a one-year employment contract with a solar-panel installer. The woman signed the employment contract as “President, Solar Inc.” and the installer signed immediately below.

On November 30, the woman received a letter from the Secretary of State’s office returning the articles of incorporation and her check. The letter stated that the articles, although received on November 15, had not been filed because they failed to include the number of authorized shares, as required by state law.

On receiving this letter, the woman immediately revised the articles by adding the number of authorized shares. On December 5, the woman mailed back the revised articles to the Secretary of State’s office, along with another check to cover the filing fee. The revised articles of incorporation were received and filed by the Secretary of State’s office on December 10.

Six months later, Solar Inc. went out of business and the installer’s employment was terminated.

1. When did Solar Inc. come into existence? Explain.
2. Is the woman personally liable to the installer on the employment contract that she signed? Explain.
3. Is the man personally liable to the installer on the employment contract? Explain.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ANALYSIS

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW II.A.1.; III.A.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) May the federal government force a state law enforcement officer or agency to assist in the enforcement of federal drug laws by requiring the officer or agency to conduct investigations of possible drug use by persons they take into custody and to make reports to the federal government?
- (2) May the federal government condition the grant of federal money for state and local law enforcement activities on a state's adoption of laws that criminalize use of federally controlled drugs?

DISCUSSION

Summary

In the Federal Drug Abuse Prevention Act, Congress has sought to induce the states to adhere to the federal policy of criminalizing the use of marijuana. The issue in this problem is whether Congress's efforts in this regard unconstitutionally intrude upon the sovereignty that the Constitution reserves to the states.

Section 11 of the Federal Drug Abuse Prevention Act is unconstitutional because it seeks to commandeer state officers or agencies to provide assistance in the enforcement of federal drug laws. Federal directives requiring the states to carry out federal regulatory programs are inconsistent with the system of dual sovereignty created by the federal structure of the Constitution.

Section 15 of the Federal Drug Abuse Prevention Act, on the other hand, is a constitutional exercise of Congress's spending power. When Congress provides funds to the states, it may condition those funds on a state's compliance with federal directives, provided that the law meets certain requirements. Those requirements are met here: Congress's decision to spend money on state and local law enforcement activities is in pursuit of the general welfare. The condition it is imposing on a state's receipt of that funding is unambiguous. The requirement that federally unlawful drug use must be criminalized at the state level bears a close relationship to the law enforcement objectives of the spending program, and the condition imposed by the federal government is not barred by any constitutional provision. Finally, Congress's threat to withhold a relatively small amount of federal money is not so coercive as to improperly intrude upon state sovereignty.

Point One (50%)

The federal government may not command a law enforcement officer or agency of State A to investigate and report on potential violations of federal law.

The central issue raised by the statute described in this question (the “Federal Drug Abuse Prevention Act”) is whether its provisions violate fundamental principles of federalism. Under the system of dual sovereignty established by the Constitution, the States “retai[n] a significant measure of sovereign authority,” Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528, 549 (1985). The Tenth Amendment confirms that the powers of the federal government are subject, in some cases, to limits necessary to protect “state sovereignty” from federal intrusion. One of those limits is that Congress may not “require the States to govern according to Congress’[s] instructions.” New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 162 (1992). See also Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass’n, Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 288 (1981) (federal law that “commandeers the legislative processes of the States by directly compelling them to enact and enforce a federal regulatory program” is unconstitutional); Murphy v. NCAA, ____ U.S. ____, 138 S. Ct. 1461 (2018).

In Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898, 935 (1997), the Supreme Court held that “commandeering” of State officials was also unconstitutional under the federalism principle emanating from the Tenth Amendment. In Printz, Congress ordered state law enforcement officials to conduct background checks of persons purchasing firearms. By legislating to force the law enforcement officers to take certain actions “in their official capacities as state officers,” the Court said, Congress was acting to control their actions “as agents of the State.” Id. at 930. Such an effort by the federal government “to direct the functioning of the state executive, and hence to compromise the structural framework of dual sovereignty” is unconstitutional. Id. at 932. The Court held definitively that “the Federal Government may neither issue directives requiring the States to address particular problems, nor command the States’ officers, or those of their political subdivisions, to administer or enforce a federal regulatory program.” Id. at 935. Section 11 of the Federal Drug Abuse Prevention Act violates federalism principles. The law requires a State A law enforcement officer or agency to undertake investigations aimed at detecting violations of federal drug laws and to report to federal authorities on suspected violations. It seeks to compel state officers to participate in the enforcement of the federal laws against the use of marijuana and thus unconstitutionally intrudes upon state sovereign authority.

Point Two (50%)

The federal government probably can deny federal law enforcement funds to State A if it does not criminalize the use of marijuana.

Section 15 of the Federal Drug Abuse Prevention Act seeks to implement the federal anti-marijuana policy by denying funding from the Justice Assistance Grant program to states that do not criminalize use of marijuana. Congress may use a threat to withhold federal money to induce a state to exercise its sovereign authority (e.g., by passing certain laws) to achieve congressional goals. The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that such threats are constitutional exercises of Congress’s power to spend money for the “general welfare of the United States” unless they are unduly coercive.

In South Dakota v. Dole, 483 U.S. 203 (1987), the Court held that Congress may condition the states' receipt or use of federal funds on state compliance with "federal statutory and administrative directives." 483 U.S. at 206. When using its spending power in this way, Congress must satisfy certain requirements. First, the spending must be for the general welfare, although a "court should defer substantially to the judgment of Congress" in this regard. Id. at 207. Second, the condition imposed by Congress must be imposed unambiguously. Third, the condition imposed must be related "to the federal interest in particular national projects or programs." Id. Fourth, the condition imposed must not "be used to induce the States to engage in activities that would themselves be unconstitutional." Id. at 210. Finally, a condition will be deemed improper if it is "so coercive as to pass the point at which 'pressure turns into compulsion.'" Id. at 211. See National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius, 567 U.S. 519 (2012) (conditioning continued receipt of Medicaid funds on compliance with new requirements was unconstitutional "economic dragooning that leaves the States with no real option but to acquiesce . . ." because threatened funding constituted over 10% of State budgets. Id. at 582).

In this case, Section 15 of the Act is probably constitutional. First, both the federal spending program and the imposed condition are in pursuit of the general welfare. The Supreme Court has said that Congress's view of "the general welfare" deserves substantial deference, and there is no reason to believe that a court would second-guess Congress's judgment that the general welfare is served by assisting with the funding of state law enforcement agencies in states that criminalize the use of drugs that Congress considers dangerous.

The other three basic requirements are also satisfied. The condition being imposed on states that receive funding from this particular program is unambiguous. The condition also relates generally to the purpose of the federal funding, which is evidently to support and improve state and local law enforcement. Finally, a requirement that the states criminalize the use of certain drugs does not induce any state to engage in unconstitutional activity.

The threat of a loss of Justice Assistance Grant funds is probably not so coercive as to amount to an unconstitutional intrusion on State A's sovereignty. The amount of money involved in this case ($10 million) is only a small fraction (less than 2%) of State A's law enforcement budget and thus likely a far smaller part of its total state budget. This is utterly unlike the substantial economic loss (typically 10% of the entire state budget) that faced the states in Sebelius, where the Court concluded that the states had "no real option" other than to follow federal wishes. Rather, this is much closer to the "relatively mild encouragement" that was upheld in South Dakota v. Dole (requiring South Dakota to raise drinking age to 21 years or lose highway funding amounting to less than half of one percent of the state's total budget). In short, although the funding condition acts as an incentive for State A to adhere to federal policy, it does not "indirectly coerce[]" the State "to adopt a federal regulatory system as its own." Sebelius, 567 U.S. at 578. It therefore is a proper exercise of Congress's spending power and does not run afoul of constitutional principles of federalism.

Legal Problems:

- (1) What body of contract law governs this dispute?
- (2) Is a promise to keep an offer to sell goods open for a week binding when the offer is made by a nonmerchant and is not supported by consideration?
- (3) Does an expression of acceptance of an offer create a contract when the offeree is aware that the offeror has taken actions inconsistent with an intention to enter into the contract?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Because the lawn mower constitutes “goods,” the transaction is within the scope of Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code, although common law principles remain applicable to the extent that they are not displaced by the UCC.

The homeowner made an offer to sell the lawn mower to the neighbor and promised to hold that offer open for a week. That promise was not supported by consideration, and no exception in UCC Article 2 overrides the requirement of consideration to make that promise binding. Accordingly, the promise to hold the offer open was not binding.

The neighbor’s expression of acceptance of the homeowner’s offer would have created a contract for the sale of the lawn mower if the offer had not been revoked. But the offer was probably revoked when the neighbor learned from the acquaintance that the homeowner had contracted to sell the lawn mower to the acquaintance. Thus, the neighbor’s attempt to accept the offer was probably too late, and no contract was formed.

Point One (20%)

The lawn mower constitutes goods. Therefore, the transaction between the homeowner and the neighbor is a “transaction in goods” and thus governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code.

UCC Article 2 governs “transactions in goods.” UCC § 2-102. Lawn mowers are goods. See UCC § 2-105(1). Thus, the transaction in question is a transaction in goods that is governed by Article 2 of the UCC. Common law principles remain applicable, though, to the extent not displaced by the UCC. UCC § 1-103(b).

Point Two (40%)

The homeowner's promise to hold his offer open for one week was not supported by consideration and thus, under common law contract principles, was not binding. The promise was not otherwise made enforceable by Article 2 of the UCC.

The homeowner's statement at the beginning of the conversation with the neighbor was an offer to sell her the lawn mower, and her reply was a rejection of that offer. The homeowner followed up, however, by renewing the offer and promising to hold it open for a week. Under the common law of contracts, an offer may be revoked by the offeror at any time before acceptance unless an option contract is created limiting the power of revocation. Restatement (Second), Contracts §§ 25, 87. Here, however, no option contract was created.

First, there was no consideration for the homeowner's promise to keep the offer open, and there was no writing reciting a purported consideration. Restatement (Second), Contracts § 25, cmt. c, and § 87(1)(a). As a result, the promise to hold the offer open was not enforceable under the general rule requiring consideration for such a promise.

Second, as the Restatement notes, a promise to hold an offer open may be made binding by statute. Id. § 87(1)(b). Because the lawn mower constitutes goods, Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code is the relevant statute. In some circumstances, UCC § 2-205 makes a promise to hold open an offer to buy or sell goods binding, even in the absence of consideration. UCC § 2-205 does not apply in these facts, however. First of all, it applies only to an offer by a "merchant." The term "merchant" is defined in UCC § 2-104(1) as "a person who deals in goods of the kind or otherwise by his occupation holds himself out as having knowledge or skill peculiar to the practices or goods involved in the transaction . . ." Under these facts, the homeowner is not a merchant. Second, UCC § 2-205 applies only to an offer made in a signed writing. In this case, however, the offer by the homeowner was oral. Therefore, the homeowner's promise to hold the offer open was not made binding by statute.

In some cases, "an offer which the offeror should reasonably expect to induce action or forbearance of a substantial character on the part of the offeree before acceptance and which does induce such action or forbearance is binding as an option contract." Restatement (Second), Contracts § 87(2). There is nothing in these facts, however, that would justify application of this rule.

In sum, the homeowner was not bound by his promise to hold the offer open for a week and could revoke it at any time.

Point Three (40%)

A contract would have been formed if the neighbor had accepted the homeowner's offer before it was revoked. Here, the offer was probably revoked when the neighbor learned from the acquaintance that the homeowner had contracted to sell the lawn mower to the acquaintance.

An offeree may accept an offer and thereby create a contract unless the offeree's power of acceptance has been terminated. Restatement (Second), Contracts §§ 35(2), 36. The power of acceptance may be terminated by a rejection or counteroffer by the offeree, the lapse of time, revocation by the offeror, or death or incapacity of either party. Id. § 36(1). Here, none of those events is relevant except for revocation by the offeror. (In these circumstances, it does not appear that four days would constitute a sufficient lapse of time, especially in light of the expressed willingness of the homeowner to keep the offer open for a week. See id. § 41.) Therefore, the neighbor's power of acceptance was terminated only if the homeowner revoked the offer before the neighbor accepted it.

In most cases, revocation of an offer occurs when the offeree receives from the offeror a manifestation of intention not to enter into the proposed contract. Here, the neighbor did not receive such a manifestation of intention directly from the homeowner before she tried to accept his offer. Yet some cases have held that revocation may also be communicated to the offeree indirectly, when the offeror takes definite action inconsistent with an intention to enter into the proposed contract and the offeree acquires reliable information to that effect. Id. § 43. See also Dickinson v. Dodds, 2 Ch.D. 463 (U.K., 1876); Berryman v. Kmoch, 559 P.2d 790, 795–96 (1977).

In this case, the homeowner took definite action inconsistent with an intention to sell the lawn mower to the neighbor—namely, he entered into a contract to sell it to the acquaintance. Moreover, the neighbor acquired reliable information that the homeowner did not intend to enter into the proposed contract with the neighbor. Not only did the acquaintance tell the neighbor about the homeowner's contract with the acquaintance, but he also showed her their written agreement. Thus, under this principle of indirect revocation, the homeowner revoked the offer, terminating the neighbor's power of acceptance, before her purported acceptance. As a result, there was no contract.

[NOTE: While the Restatement indicates that indirect revocation is a generally applicable principle (and provides illustrations to that effect), the Reporter's Note to Section 43 notes that existing cases all involved real estate transactions. Accordingly, it could be argued that the homeowner had not revoked his offer before it was accepted by the neighbor and a contract was therefore created by the acceptance.]

REAL PROPERTY ANALYSIS

REAL PROPERTY II.D.; IV.A.1.c.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is the expansion project a nonconforming use?
- (2) Under the provisions of the loan commitment, is the bank obligated to disburse further funds?
- (3) Does the mechanic's lien have priority, in whole or in part, over the bank's mortgage?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The expansion is most likely not a nonconforming use because it results in a substantial change in use that may increase the volume of users at the store's location.

The bank is not obligated to disburse additional funds because the bank and the man entered into a future-advances loan/mortgage arrangement under which future advances depend on the bank's judgment that satisfactory progress is being made on the project.

The bank's mortgage has priority over the mechanic's lien as to the original payment ($50,000) because the mortgage was recorded and the payment was made before the filing of the mechanic's lien. Under the majority rule, the bank has priority with respect to the first future advance ($40,000) because, when it was made, the bank did not have actual notice that the subcontractor had not been paid; advances made after the bank acquired such knowledge do not have priority over the mechanic's lien. Under the minority rule, the mechanic's lien is senior to all the future advances but not to the original $50,000 payment because by recording the lien, the subcontractor provided the bank with constructive notice of its interest.

[NOTE: An examinee who wrongly concludes that future advances are obligatory should conclude that the bank has priority with respect to all disbursements made under the loan commitment regardless of when made.]

Point One (35%)

While there are good arguments either way, the expansion to the convenience store is most likely not exempt from the zoning ordinance as a nonconforming use because it would increase the intensity of use.

This zoning ordinance allows uses that existed prior to the enactment of the ordinance. Prior-enactment uses are known as “nonconforming uses” and are justified on both fairness and practical monetary grounds. Here, the convenience store without any expansion is protected by the nonconforming use provision in the ordinance.

While a nonconforming use cannot be extended or intensified in ways that constitute a substantial change, insubstantial changes are permitted, and “owners are entitled to make reasonable alterations to repair their facilities and render them practicable for their purposes.” See Joseph W. Singer, Property 658 (5th ed. 2017). Thus, the issue here is whether the proposed changes are substantial or insubstantial. Because a change would be inconsistent with the zoning law, “any doubts are resolved against the change.” Id.

Likely, the expansion is not a nonconforming use. The expansion of the convenience store clearly will increase the intensity of the use in the newly zoned residential neighborhood. In fact, that is precisely what the man hopes to achieve with the expansion. Increased use will result in more traffic and possibly impose other externalities on the now residential community. While the goal of the nonconforming-use doctrine is to protect prior investment, it is not to change an existing use into a different investment. Furthermore, applying the nonconforming-use doctrine here would only serve to protect a future investment, not a prior investment. When the man bought the store, he had only a mere expectation of future investment (i.e., that he would expand the store to offer products and services similar to those offered by the other convenience stores). A mere expectation is not an investment.

On the other hand, the proposed alteration should arguably be treated as a permissible nonconforming use because it is necessary for the man’s store to compete effectively with the three other stores in the area. Furthermore, other local convenience stores that sell gas have small dining areas within them, and thus the expansion could be viewed as merely a normal expansion of a prior nonconforming use. Additionally, the point of the nonconforming-use doctrine, in part, is to protect the investment-backed expectations of persons, such as the man here, who purchased and operated the store in reliance on the law in place when the property was acquired. This expectation exists here, given that when the man purchased the store there were three more expansive convenience stores in the area, and he had expected that in the future he would expand the store to offer the same products and services as his competitors.

However, notwithstanding the argument in favor of applying the nonconforming-use doctrine to the store’s expansion, given that “any doubts are resolved against the change,” it is more likely that the expansion is not a nonconforming use. Id.

Point Two (35%)

The bank’s obligation to make advances to the man is optional because future advances are conditioned on the bank’s determination that the borrower is making satisfactory progress on the construction project.

The type of loan/mortgage here is a so-called “future-advances” agreement, and it is very common in the construction industry. A future-advances loan is one in which the lender provides funds to the borrower over a period of time, rather than in a lump sum at the signing of the mortgage, in order to finance ongoing construction when the funds are needed. Future-advances loans are either obligatory or optional. A future-advances loan is obligatory if the lender has a duty to advance the funds; the loan is optional if the lender does not have a duty to advance funds but has discretion whether to make future advances. See Grant S. Nelson, Dale A. Whitman, Ann M. Burkhart & R. Wilson Freyermuth, Real Estate Finance Law 1095 (6th ed. 2015).

In this case, the bank’s commitment to make future advances is optional. A commitment is obligatory only when the lender commits to making future advances without discretionary conditions. With a satisfactory-progress condition, the bank has no “definite obligation to advance any funds,” making the future advances optional. Id. at 1099. The satisfactory-progress condition is designed, among other things, to permit the bank to withhold funds if any difficulties associated with the project’s completion threaten the bank’s security by reducing the growth in value anticipated from the project.

Here, the bank has a right to withhold funds if it concludes in good faith that there is not “satisfactory progress” on the project. The existence of a mechanic’s lien against the project could undermine the bank’s security with respect to future amounts it might disburse if the mechanic’s lien has priority. See Point Three. Thus, the bank officer’s concerns could justify withholding funding.

Point Three (30%)

With respect to the $50,000 payment, the bank’s mortgage has priority as it preceded the filing of the mechanic’s lien. With respect to the $40,000 payment, under the majority rule, the bank’s mortgage has priority over the mechanic’s lien because the bank did not have actual knowledge that the subcontractor had not been paid when the bank made the payment. Under the minority rule, the bank’s mortgage would not have priority because the lien was properly filed before the bank made this payment.

The general rule is that, if a future advance is obligatory, the mortgage securing that advance takes priority over creditors who file liens after the mortgage is recorded, even if all advances on the loan have not actually been made. Nelson et al., supra, at 1095. Because the bank must make the future payments, regardless of circumstances, those payments are deemed to have been made when the mortgage was created. It is as though the loan had been paid in one lump sum at that time.

[NOTE: If an examinee concludes that future advances are obligatory, that examinee should also conclude that the mechanic’s lien is junior to all disbursements made by the bank.]

If the future advances are optional, and if the mortgagee has notice when it makes the advance that a subsequent lienor has acquired an interest in the land, then the advance loses its priority to that creditor. Id. at 1095. Here, the bank has priority only to the original $50,000 advance but not to the $40,000 advanced after the mechanic's lien was filed, assuming that the bank had notice of it. And, of course, if the bank were to continue to make advances up to the $200,000 commitment, those additional payments would not have priority. However, this rule applies only if the bank made the advances with "notice" of the lien.

Most states hold that the mortgagee has notice only when it has actual notice of the lien at the time of the future advance. Id. at 1102. This rule is based on the view that the mortgagee should not have the burden of a title search each time it makes an advance when it is easier for the subcontractor to inform the mortgagee that its bill has not been paid.

Here, application of this approach would lead to the conclusion that the bank had no notice of the mechanic's lien until it learned that the subcontractor had not been paid when the third advance was sought. Thus, the bank would have priority over the subcontractor with respect to the first two payments ($50,000 and $40,000). Of course, should the bank make additional future advances, as to those it would not have priority.

Under the minority view, the bank will be charged with constructive notice of the mechanic's lien if the lien, as here, has been properly recorded. Id. Under this view, the assessment of the relative burdens of the mortgagee and the subcontractor are reversed. If the minority view applies, the bank has priority with respect to the original advance of $50,000 but not to any later advances because it had constructive notice of the mechanic's lien as of the time it was filed.

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Did the trustee breach the duty of loyalty by renting a trust-owned apartment to himself at a market rate?
- (1)(b) Did the trustee breach the duty of prudent administration (a/k/a duty of care) by failing to purchase fire/casualty insurance on trust property, resulting in a $50,000 uninsured loss?
- (1)(c) Did the trustee breach the duty to administer in accordance with applicable law by allocating the entire $50,000 expense occasioned by the unexpected roof repair to trust income?
- (2) Upon Albert's death, should the trust principal be distributed to Betty's husband, Betty's daughter, equally to both of them, or to the testator's heirs?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The trustee breached the fiduciary duty of loyalty when the trustee rented one of the apartments to himself even though it appears that he paid a market rate for the apartment. The trustee breached the duty of prudent administration (a/k/a duty of care) by failing to purchase fire insurance on the trust's real property. The trustee breached the duty to administer in accordance with applicable law by charging the entire uninsured loss to income rather than principal.

Under the common law, upon Albert's death the trust principal would pass to Betty's husband because she had a vested remainder in the trust that passed to him under her will. The testator's son would not share in trust principal because there is no reversion to pass to the testator's heirs.

Point One(a) (25%)

The trustee breached his duty of loyalty when he rented a trust-owned apartment to himself even though he paid a market rate.

A trustee owes trust beneficiaries a duty of loyalty. This duty arises under the common law and by statute. Under the common law, a trustee is prohibited from making transactions that place the interest of the trustee or another above the interest of trust beneficiaries. See William M. McGovern, Sheldon F. Kurtz, David M. English & Thomas P. Gallanis, Wills, Trusts, and Estates 530 (5th ed. 2017). The duty of loyalty prohibits two types of transactions: self-dealing, where the trustee deals with trust property for the trustee's personal benefit, and conflict of interest, where the trustee acts on "behalf of others to whom the trustee also owes obligations." Id. at 531. Here, the trustee's lease of a trust-owned apartment to himself was self-dealing. The lease thus breached the trustee's duty of loyalty.

Because of the so-called “no-further-inquiry” rule, the fact that the trustee paid a market rate is irrelevant to the conclusion that the trustee engaged in self-dealing. Id. at 531–532. See also Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 78(2) (“the trustee is strictly prohibited from engaging in transactions that involve self-dealing or that otherwise involve or create a conflict between the trustee’s fiduciary duties and personal interests.”). As noted in the Restatement (Third), under the no-further-inquiry rule, “it is immaterial that the trustee may be able to show that the action in question was taken in good faith, that the terms of the transaction were fair, and that no profit resulted to the trustee.” Id. cmt. b. This strict approach is justified on the grounds that “it may be difficult for a trustee to resist temptation when personal interests conflict with fiduciary duty. In such situations, for reasons peculiar to typical trust relationships, the policy of the trust law is to prefer (as a matter of default law) to remove altogether the occasions of temptation rather than to monitor fiduciary behavior and attempt to uncover and punish abuses when a trustee has actually succumbed to temptation. This policy of strict prohibition also provides a reasonable circumstantial assurance (except as waived by the settlor or an affected beneficiary) that beneficiaries will not be deprived of a trustee’s disinterested and objective judgment.” Id.

The Uniform Trust Code takes a similar approach. It adopts the no-further-inquiry rule and provides that a self-dealing transaction is voidable by trust beneficiaries. See UTC § 802(b). As noted in the comments, “transactions involving trust property entered into by a trustee for the trustee’s own personal account [are] voidable without further proof. . . . It is immaterial whether the trustee acts in good faith or pays a fair consideration.” Id. at comment.

The trustee breached his duty of prudent administration (a/k/a duty of care) when he failed to purchase fire/casualty insurance on the real property.

Both the Restatement of Trusts and the Uniform Trust Code impose on trustees a “duty of prudent administration.” See Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 77 (“The trustee has a duty to administer the trust as a prudent person would, in light of the purposes, terms, and other circumstances of the trust”); UTC § 804 (“A trustee shall administer the trust as a prudent person would, by considering the purposes, terms, distributional requirements and other circumstances of the trust.”). Both authorities agree that, to satisfy the duty of prudent administration, a trustee must “exercise reasonable care, skill, and caution.” See Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 77(2); UTC § 804.

The Uniform Trust Code further provides that a “trustee shall take reasonable steps to take control of and protect the trust property.” UTC § 809. This section is based upon Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 176. A comment to § 176 of the Restatement specifies that a trustee’s failure to purchase fire/casualty insurance for trust property when such “insurance is customarily taken by a prudent” person is a breach of the duty to protect (a subset of the duty of care/prudent administration). Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 176 at cmt. b, illus. 3. Accord, Hamilton v. Mercantile Bank of Cedar Rapids, 621 N.W.2d 401 (Iowa 2001).

Here, the trustee failed to purchase a fire/casualty policy on the trust's rental property, resulting in a loss to the trust. This is a breach of trust because a prudent person would have purchased such a policy on the property.

[NOTE: An accurate analysis of the legal standards is more important than the examinee's conclusion regarding whether the purchase of insurance would have been prudent.]

Point One(c) (30%)

The trustee breached his duty to administer the trust in accordance with applicable law by allocating the $50,000 repair expense exclusively to income.

A trustee has a duty to administer the trust "diligently and in good faith, in accordance with the terms of the trust and applicable law." Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 76. Accord, UTC § 801. Because of the trustee's obligation to comply with applicable law, the trustee must comply with the Uniform Principal and Income Act, or other state statutes of like effect, in allocating receipts and disbursements between trust income and principal.

Under the Uniform Principal and Income Act, "all . . . ordinary expenses incurred in connection with the . . . preservation of trust property . . . including ordinary repairs" are allocated to income. Extraordinary repairs are allocated to principal. Unif. Principal and Income Act § 501 (1997). Ordinary repairs are repairs required by day-to-day wear and tear. Extraordinary repairs are repairs required by "an unusual or unforeseen occurrence that does not destroy the [asset] but merely renders it less suited to its intended use, a repair that is beyond the usual, customary, or regular kind." See generally Black's Law Dictionary 267 (2d pocket ed. 2001).

Here, the $50,000 roof repair was extraordinary because it was required by an unforeseen occurrence, a fire. It should therefore have been allocated to principal, not income, and paid from the trust principal's $120,000 in liquid assets. This conclusion is bolstered by the fact that, had the trustee obtained insurance on the property, the insurance proceeds, representing the value of needed repairs, would have been allocated to principal. Unif. Principal and Income Act § 404.

[NOTE: The duties discussed in this section are sometimes referred to as an aspect of the duty of impartiality.]

Point Two (20%)

Under the common law, upon Albert's death, the trust principal should be distributed to Betty's husband because she devised her vested remainder in the trust to him.

Under the terms of the trust, the testator created a life estate in Albert and a remainder interest in Betty. Under the common law, Betty's interest was vested because it was subject to no contingencies (such as "to Betty if she survives Albert") that would cause her to lose her interest should she predecease Albert. See generally Herbert Hovenkamp, Sheldon F. Kurtz & Thomas P. Gallanis, The Law of Property, An Introductory Survey 128 (6th ed. 2014). Vested remainders are devisable. Thus, if the remainderman is not living when the remainder becomes possessory, it passes to the devisee of the interest under the deceased remainderman's will. Id. at 127.

Trusts & Future Interests Analysis

Here, trust principal became possessory at Albert's death, and Betty was not living at that time. The trust principal thus should go to the devisee named in Betty's will, her husband. Under the common law, the testator's son would not take a share of trust principal as there is no reversionary interest to pass to the testator's heirs.

[NOTE: If Betty's trust interest were subject to a survivorship contingency, that would have caused Betty's interest to fail because she predeceased Albert. In that case, her interest would have reverted to the testator's estate. In such case, it would have passed to his heirs if he died intestate or to his beneficiaries if he died with a will.]

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is a mechanic's testimony describing his opinion of the condition of truck brakes that he has inspected admissible evidence?
- (2) Is an invoice for truck brake parts an admissible business record when it was apparently made by a person with knowledge of its contents and retained in the ordinary course of business?

- (3)(b) Is a patient's out-of-court statement regarding pre-existing pain admissible as a statement by an opposing party when the patient is the plaintiff in a personal injury lawsuit or admissible under the hearsay exception for statements made for the purpose of medical diagnosis or treatment?
- (4) Is the roommate's testimony admissible habit evidence?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The mechanic's proposed testimony that he inspected the woman's truck brakes and that they needed repair is relevant because it has some tendency to make it more probable that a malfunction of the truck's brakes caused the accident. Although the proposed testimony is an opinion, it should be admitted because it would be rationally based on the mechanic's personal perception of the condition of the brakes, and the opinion would be useful to the trier of fact. In the alternative, the mechanic's opinion could be admitted as expert testimony based on his technical skill or expert knowledge, if the opinion is the product of reliable principles and methods and the mechanic reliably applied the principles and methods to the facts of the case.

The invoice from the mechanic's shop stating, "New parts for [the woman's] truck brakes ordered on December 23 and received on January 2," is relevant because it has some tendency to make it more probable that the accident was caused by brake malfunction in the woman's truck. The mechanic's out-of-court statement is hearsay, but it fits the hearsay exception for "business records" because the mechanic, who signed the invoice, was a person with knowledge of the information in the invoice and the facts suggest strongly that the invoice was made and kept in the ordinary course of the mechanic's business.

The doctor's proposed trial testimony that the woman told him "I have suffered from painful arthritis in my neck for the past five years" is also admissible. The statement is relevant because it has some tendency to make it less probable that the woman's neck pain was caused by the accident, but instead by arthritis that predated the accident. By filing this civil lawsuit alleging that the accident caused the onset of neck pain, which placed her medical condition "in issue," the woman thereby waived the physician-patient privilege.

The doctor's testimony repeats an out-of-court statement by the woman. However, because the declarant (the woman) is the plaintiff, it is not hearsay because it is an opposing party's statement when offered by the defendant (the man). In the alternative, it fits the hearsay exception for statements made for the purpose of medical diagnosis or treatment.

Finally, the roommate's testimony ("[The man] is addicted to texting and never puts his phone down. He even texts while driving.") may be admissible as evidence of the man's "habit" of constant texting. This is a close call. The testimony is relevant because it has some tendency to make it more probable that the man was texting at the time of the accident. However, the court must first decide whether constant texting is a habit. Texting is a volitional act and requires conscious effort. Most courts limit the scope of habit evidence to relevant behaviors that are consistent and semi-automatic. Texting may be too volitional to be considered semi-automatic by some courts, but courts that consider the similarity and repetition of behaviors might view evidence of constant texting as habit evidence.

Point One (20%)

The mechanic's testimony about the condition of the brakes is relevant and should be admitted either as lay opinion rationally based on the mechanic's personal perception or as expert opinion because the mechanic possesses the necessary technical knowledge to be qualified as an expert witness.

Evidence is relevant if it has "any tendency to make a fact more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence." Fed. R. Evid. 401(a). The mechanic's testimony ("I inspected [the woman's] truck a week before the accident. The brakes on the truck were worn and in need of repair. I ordered new parts.") is relevant because it tends to make it more probable that a brake malfunction may have caused the accident.

The mechanic's testimony is admissible opinion evidence. Under Federal Rule of Evidence 701, lay opinion testimony is admissible if it is "(a) rationally based on the witness's perception; (b) helpful to clearly understanding the witness's testimony or to determining a fact in issue; and (c) not based on scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702." Fed. R. Evid. 701. Courts typically hold that witnesses with "firsthand knowledge" may "offer lay opinion testimony where they have a reasonable basis—grounded either in experience or specialized knowledge—for arriving at the opinion expressed." Asplundh Mfg. Div. v. Benton Harbor Engineering, 57 F.3d 1190 (3d Cir. 1995). Here, the mechanic's opinion is rationally based on his personal perception and would be helpful to the jury's determination of whether the woman or the man caused the accident. A court could also find that because the mechanic's opinion is based on his personal perception, it is not an expert opinion within the scope of Rule 702.

In the alternative, the mechanic may be qualified as an expert based on his technical skill or specialized knowledge. Under Federal Rule of Evidence 702, the mechanic's expert opinion can be admitted if "(a) the expert's scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will help the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue; (b) the testimony is based upon sufficient facts or data; (c) the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods; and (d) the expert has reliably applied the principles and methods to the facts of the case." Fed. R. Evid. 702. Here, a court could find that the mechanic used his technical skills to reliably form the opinion that the woman's truck brakes required repair, making the opinion testimony admissible under Rule 702, but not Rule 701.

Regardless of whether the mechanic's testimony is viewed by the court as lay or expert opinion, it should be admitted.

Point Two (20%)

The receipt from the mechanic's shop is a relevant out-of-court statement that should be admitted because it fits the hearsay exception for business records.

The receipt from the mechanic's shop stating "New parts for [the woman's] truck brakes ordered on December 23 and received on January 2" is relevant because it has some tendency to make it more probable that the woman's truck brakes were, in fact, in need of repair and may have malfunctioned, causing the accident. Fed. R. Evid. 401.

The receipt is hearsay under Federal Rule of Evidence 801 because (1) it is a statement (the mechanic's "written assertion" that new brake parts were ordered); (2) the mechanic made the statement out of court; and (3) the statement will be "offer[ed] in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted in the statement." Fed. R. Evid. 801. However, the receipt fits the hearsay exception for "business records." Under Rule 803(6), a business record may be "a record of an act, event [or condition]" made "by someone with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted activity of a business, and if making the record was a regular practice of that activity." Fed. R. Evid. 803(6). These facts must be shown by the testimony of the custodian of the record or another qualified witness.

Here, the mechanic was a person with knowledge because he ordered the truck brake parts, as he will testify. The fact that the receipt was written and signed by the mechanic and kept in the mechanic's file cabinet among similar receipts for other customers should establish that the mechanic was the custodian of the receipt and that it was made and kept by the mechanic in the ordinary course of his repair business. But the receipt will be admissible only if these facts are established during examination of the mechanic.

Point Three(a) (15%)

The doctor's proposed testimony is relevant to the cause of the woman's neck pain and would not be protected by the physician-patient privilege because the woman effectively waived the privilege by filing this civil lawsuit, which placed her medical condition "in issue."

The doctor's proposed testimony that the woman said, "I have suffered from painful arthritis in my neck for the past five years," is relevant because it has some tendency to make it less probable that the accident caused the onset of the woman's neck pain. Fed. R. Evid. 401.

Under Rule 501 of the Federal Rules of Evidence, "state law governs privilege regarding a claim or defense for which state law supplies the rule of decision." Fed. R. Evid. 501. The physician-patient privilege, which was not recognized at common law, has been adopted by statute in most jurisdictions. See 25 Wright and Graham, Federal Practice and Procedure § 5521 (2015). In determining whether to honor the assertion of a privilege, "courts must balance the public interest in nondisclosure against the need of the particular litigant for access to the privileged information, keeping in mind that the burden of persuasion rests on the party seeking to prevent disclosure." See Stinson v. City of New York, 304 F.R.D. 432, 435–36 (S.D.N.Y. 2015).

In most jurisdictions, patient communications or disclosures made for the purpose of medical diagnosis or treatment are privileged. See State v. Ortiz, 698 P.2d 1301 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1985). However, most jurisdictions currently recognize a range of exceptions intended to prevent the privilege from being used as a shield for fraud. These exceptions apply in any proceeding where the patient relies on a physical condition as an element of his claim or defense. Thus, in many states a patient waives the physician-patient privilege by placing her medical condition "in issue" in a personal injury lawsuit. See Roosevelt Hotel Ltd. Partnership v. Sweeney, 394 N.W.2d 353 (Iowa 1986).

The woman should not be able to invoke the physician-patient privilege to bar admission of the doctor's statement. She will be deemed to have waived the privilege by seeking damages for her neck pain, which put the question of the cause of that pain into issue in the lawsuit.

Point Three(b) (20%)

The doctor's proposed testimony would repeat an out-of-court statement by the woman, but the woman's statement is admissible because (1) it is a statement by an opposing party and is therefore not hearsay, or (2) it fits the hearsay exception for statements made for medical diagnosis or treatment.

The doctor's statement, which repeats an out-of-court statement by the woman (that she had suffered from painful arthritis in her neck for the past five years), is admissible for the truth of the matter asserted and is not hearsay. When offered by the defendant (the man), it is an opposing party's statement because the declarant is the plaintiff (the woman). Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2).

In the alternative, the woman’s statement, which describes the onset and nature of her neck pain, describes her “medical history” and provides information about her “past or present symptoms or sensations; their inception; or their general cause.” Fed. R. Evid. 803(4). Under these circumstances, the woman’s statement is also admissible under the hearsay exception for statements made for medical diagnosis or treatment. See id.

Point Four (25%)

The court may admit testimony by the roommate if it decides that the man’s constant texting is a habit. A court might rule either way.

The roommate’s testimony (“[The man] is addicted to texting and never puts his phone down. He even texts while driving.”) is relevant because it has some tendency to make it more probable that the man was texting at the time of the accident. Fed. R. Evid. 401.

Under Federal Rule of Evidence 406, “evidence of a person’s habit . . . may be admitted to prove that on a particular occasion the person . . . acted in accordance with the habit.” Fed. R. Evid. 406. Typically, under Rule 406, a person’s “habit” is defined as his or her consistent response to a specific situation. The court may admit habit evidence “regardless of whether it is corroborated or whether there was an eyewitness.” Id. Testimony involving habit evidence may be given by the person with the habit or by another person, but the person testifying must have personal knowledge.

It is sometimes difficult for courts to distinguish habit evidence from character evidence. The problem is that, depending on the habit described, habit evidence can be similar to evidence of a person’s character or prior acts. The Federal Rules of Evidence generally prohibit the use of evidence of a person’s character “to prove that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with the character or trait.” Fed. R. Evid. 404(a). The Rules likewise prohibit evidence of other acts when offered to prove a character trait and action in conformity with that trait. Fed. R. Evid. 404(b). Because “habit” evidence can run afoul of the bans on character evidence and prior bad acts evidence, courts generally limit habit evidence to proof of relevant behaviors that are not just consistent but semi-automatic. See Weil v. Seltzer, 873 F.2d 1453, 1460–61 (D.C. Cir. 1989).

Here, it is a close question whether the roommate’s testimony is admissible habit evidence or prohibited character evidence. According to the advisory committee notes to Rule 406, a habit “is the person’s regular practice of meeting a particular kind of situation with a specific type of conduct.” The roommate would testify that texting is the man’s constant and consistent practice. But as noted above, many courts also require that the behavior be semi-automatic in order to be admissible as habit evidence, and texting may be too volitional to be considered a semi- automatic habit.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) When did Solar Inc. come into existence?
- (2)(a) Under the state's business corporation statute, could the woman be personally liable on the contract with the installer that she signed as "President, Solar Inc."?
- (2)(b) Under general partnership law, could the woman be personally liable on the contract with the installer?
- (3) Is the man personally liable to the installer on the employment contract?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Normally, a corporation comes into existence with the filing of articles of incorporation. See Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA) § 2.03(a). Here, the corporation came into existence on December 10 when the corrected, resubmitted articles were filed by the Secretary of State's office.

The liability of participants in a business that has not been properly incorporated can arise under statute or as a matter of partnership law. Under MBCA § 2.04, persons who purport to act on behalf of a corporation prior to incorporation, knowing that there is no incorporation, become personally liable. Here, the woman would not be liable under MBCA § 2.04 because she did not have actual knowledge, at the time of the dealings with the installer, that the corporation had not been incorporated.

Under partnership law, persons who carry on as co-owners a business for profit become liable as partners. Although the woman would appear to be a partner in an unincorporated business, a court applying common law doctrines in cases of defective incorporation is likely to infer corporate limited liability with respect to the contract claim by the installer against the woman.

However, under the "de facto corporation" doctrine, a court is likely to find that the woman is not personally liable to the installer because the woman made a good-faith attempt to incorporate and then entered into the contract in the corporate name. A court could also apply the "corporation by estoppel" doctrine to find that the woman is not personally liable to the installer because the installer dealt solely with the corporation, without relying on the personal assets of the woman.

As for the installer's claim against the man, the man (as an inactive investor in the business) is even less likely to be personally liable. The man did not purport to act on behalf of the corporation and thus cannot be liable under MBCA § 2.04. In addition, even though the man may have been a partner in the unincorporated business, a court would likely apply the two defective-incorporation doctrines to infer limited liability for the man.

Point One (10%)

The corporation was formed on December 10, when its articles of incorporation were filed by the Secretary of State's office.

Normally, the existence of a corporation begins with the filing of the articles of incorporation. MBCA § 2.03(a) (“Unless a delayed effective date is specified, the corporate existence begins when the articles of incorporation are filed”). The articles were not filed on November 15 when they were received by the Secretary of State because they failed to include the number of authorized shares as required by the statute. Here, the corporation came into existence on December 10 when the corrected, resubmitted articles were filed by the Secretary of State's office.

[NOTE: An examinee might point out that sometimes filings can be corrected, with the corrections effective as of the date of the original filing. See MBCA § 1.24(a) (permitting a corporation to file “articles of correction,” which become effective as of the date of the document they correct, provided that the corrections are limited to inaccuracies, defective signatures, and defects in electronic transmission). Here, however, the Secretary of State's office did not accept the original articles for filing, and there was no “filed document” to correct.]

Point Two(a) (25%)

The woman would not be personally liable under MBCA § 2.04 because when she entered into the contract on behalf of the corporation, she did not know that the business had not been properly incorporated.

Under the MBCA, “persons purporting to act as or on behalf of a corporation, knowing there was no incorporation . . . , are jointly and severally liable for all liabilities created while so acting.” MBCA § 2.04. The Official Comment clarifies that an “erroneous but in good faith” belief that incorporation has happened does not constitute knowledge under the section. Official Comment, MBCA § 2.04 (adopting approach of Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act).

Here, the woman is likely not liable for “purporting to act . . . on behalf” of a non-existent corporation under MBCA § 2.04. There is no indication that she actually knew that the original articles had not been filed by the Secretary of State when she entered into the employment contract with the installer in the corporate name. Although the woman could have checked with the Secretary of State's office to ascertain whether the business had been incorporated or possibly should have known that the articles were incomplete, her lack of actual knowledge of the incorporation defect precludes her liability under MBCA § 2.04.

Point Two(b) (40%)

The woman is unlikely to be held personally liable as a partner in an unincorporated business because a court is likely to infer corporate limited liability under the “de facto corporation” or the “corporation by estoppel” doctrine.

Generally, co-owners of a for-profit business that has not been properly incorporated are treated as partners in a partnership and are jointly and severally responsible for all business obligations. See Revised Uniform Partnership Act § 101(6) (defining “partnership” as “an association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit”); § 306(a) (specifying that “all partners are liable jointly and severally for all obligations of the partnership”); cf. Uniform Partnership Act § 15 (joint and several liability for torts, and joint liability for other obligations). Here, however, although the woman was a co-owner in a business for profit and thus a partner, a court would likely limit her liability because of the “de facto corporation” and “corporation by estoppel” doctrines.

Under the common law, courts have inferred corporate limited liability in cases of defective incorporation in two situations. First, under the “de facto corporation” doctrine, courts recognize corporate limited liability when there was (1) a colorable, good-faith attempt to incorporate and (2) actual use of the corporate form, such as by carrying on the business as a corporation or contracting in the corporate name. See Business Organizations with Tax Planning § 63.01; 1A Fletcher Cyc. Corp. § 215.

Second, under the “incorporation by estoppel” doctrine, most jurisdictions recognize corporate limited liability when a third party deals solely with the “corporation” and has not relied on the personal assets of the promoter. See Official Comment, MBCA § 2.04 (Example 4) (identifying situations where promoter represents that a corporation exists and enters into a contract in the corporate name, even though the promoter might know that no corporation has been formed). In these cases, courts have rejected the imposition of personal liability on equity grounds because the third party would otherwise receive more than originally bargained for.

Here, a court is likely to apply one or both of the common law doctrines to infer corporate limited liability in the installer’s contract claim against the woman. Under the “de facto corporation” doctrine, the woman’s mailing of the articles of incorporation to the Secretary of State constituted a colorable, good-faith attempt to incorporate. If the submitted articles had included the number of authorized shares, this would have led to a validly formed corporation. See MBCA § 2.03(a). In addition, the woman used the corporate form by entering into the employment contract in the corporation’s name. She did this in good faith, apparently believing that the incorporation steps had been completed. There is no indication that the woman was aware that the articles of incorporation had been rejected.

In addition, under the “corporation by estoppel” doctrine, the installer’s entry into the employment contract, which the woman signed as president of Solar Inc., is evidence that the installer understood that he was dealing solely with the “corporation” and was not relying on the personal assets of the woman. To allow the installer to hold the woman personally liable would create a liability that had not been bargained for. That is, the installer assumed the risk that the corporation (as happened) would not be able to fulfill the contract.

[NOTE: Some examinees might seek to analyze the woman’s liability under the “promoter liability” rules that apply to contracts with a corporation that has not yet come into existence. See Restatement (Second) of Agency § 326 (1958) (“Unless otherwise agreed, a person who, in dealing with another, purports to act as agent for a principal whom both know to be nonexistent or wholly incompetent, becomes a party to such contract.”) These rules, however, arise when both the promoter and the third party are aware that no incorporation has happened, though it may happen later. Thus, the “promoter liability” rules are inapplicable to the situation presented in this question given that there is nothing to suggest that the woman and the installer understood that the corporation had not yet been formed.]

Point Three (25%)

The man, as an inactive investor in the business, is not personally liable on the employment contract with the installer either under MBCA § 2.04 or as a partner in the unincorporated business.

Applying the defective-incorporation principles to the contract claim against the man, the man would not be liable under MBCA § 2.04 as he did not sign the contract with the installer and thus did not purport to act on behalf of the non-existent corporation. See Point Two(a).

In addition, even though the man as a co-owner in a business for profit may have been a partner in the unincorporated business, a court would likely infer corporate limited liability for the man under the “de facto corporation” and “corporation by estoppel” doctrines for the same reasons that limited liability is available to the woman. See Point Two(b). Generally, the “de facto corporation” and “corporation by estoppel” doctrines are available to all participants of the business, including those who are inactive. See 18A Am. Jur. 2d, Corporations § 196 (both active and inactive participants of a “de facto corporation” have the same rights and are entitled to the same protections). Similarly, the Official Comment to MBCA § 2.04, in reviewing the approach by courts in defective-incorporation cases, points out that inactive participants are generally not liable on pre-incorporation contracts. See Official Comment, MBCA § 2.04 (Example 5) (noting distinction between active and inactive participants in the case law, and stating that statutory liability extends only to active participants who purport to act on behalf of the corporation and “therefore relieves the latter of personal liability”). Therefore, the man here would not be personally liable on the installer’s contract claim.

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2019 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Civil Procedure question on the February 2019 MEE tested the following areas from the Civil Procedure outline: I.A. Jurisdiction and venue—Federal subject matter jurisdiction (federal question, diversity, supplemental, and removal); and B. Personal jurisdiction.

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by user jurisdictions as part of the bar examination on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Areas of law that may be covered on the MEE include the following: Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Civil Procedure, Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts (including Article 2 [Sales] of the Uniform Commercial Code), Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Article 9 (Secured Transactions) of the Uniform Commercial Code. Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles. Examinees in non-UBE jurisdictions should answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

TORTS QUESTION

One year ago, a man was injured when the car in which he and a woman were traveling slid off an icy highway during a winter storm and overturned. At the time of the accident, the woman was driving the car. The man was sitting in the front passenger seat, wearing his seat belt. The woman was driving 40 mph at the time of the accident, although the posted speed limit was 50 mph.

The man and the woman were rushed to a local hospital in its ambulance. There, hospital surgeons performed emergency surgery on the man. The man remained in the hospital for 10 days following his admission. Numerous medical instruments were used during his surgery and subsequent hospitalization, including needles, clamps, and surgical tools. However, he did not receive a blood transfusion or any blood products.

Three days after the man was released from the hospital, he developed a fever and visited his personal physician, who is not affiliated with the hospital. The physician ordered routine blood tests. The tests revealed that the man had a serious infection that is transmitted in nearly all cases through exposure to either contaminated blood products or improperly sterilized medical instruments (needles, clamps, surgical tools, etc.) that come into contact with a patient's blood. There are, however, other possible sources of the infection in a hospital environment, such as a failure of staff to follow proper handwashing techniques to avoid transmitting infection from one patient to another and staff failure to properly identify and discard certain used medical instruments that cannot safely be sterilized.

Infections occurring in individuals who have not received a blood product and have not been hospitalized during the period of likely exposure are possible but rare. The physician told the man that he "must have contracted this infection at the hospital" because the period between infection and symptom development is 10 to 13 days and the man was a patient at the hospital during the entire relevant period. The physician also stated that "at hospitals that have adopted medical-instrument sterilization procedures recommended by experts, cases of this infection have been almost completely eliminated." The man has no history of intravenous drug use, and he did not receive any medical treatment for several months before his hospital stay. All sterilization procedures at the hospital are performed by hospital employees. However, the particular sterilization procedure used while the man was hospitalized cannot be determined because, while the hospital now uses the sterilization procedure recommended by experts, there is no record of when it started using that procedure.

The man has sued the woman and the hospital, alleging negligence. Neither defendant is judgment-proof, and this jurisdiction has no automobile-guest statute. The parties have stipulated that the man's damages for the injuries he suffered in the accident are $100,000 and his damages from the infection he contracted are $250,000.

1. Could a court properly find that the woman was negligent even though she was driving below the posted speed limit? Explain.
2. Could a court properly find that the woman is liable for the man's damages resulting from the infection? Explain.

Torts Question

3. Could a court properly find that the hospital is liable for the man's damages resulting from the infection? Explain.
4. If a court found that both the woman's negligence and the hospital's negligence caused the man's infection, could the woman's liability be limited to $100,000 for injuries the man suffered in the accident? Explain.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS QUESTION

A company is in the business of manufacturing and selling stereo equipment. Several months ago, the company borrowed money from a bank, to be repaid by the company in monthly installments. The loan agreement, which was signed by the company's owner, provided that, to secure the company's obligation to repay the loan, the company granted the bank a security interest in "all personal property" owned by the company. Also that day, under an oral agreement with the company's owner (who had full authority to speak on behalf of the company), the bank took possession of one of the most valuable items of the company's property—an original Edison gramophone that the company had acquired because it was the earliest precursor of the company's digital music players—as part of the collateral for the loan. The bank properly filed a financing statement in the appropriate filing office, listing the company as debtor and, in the space for the indication of collateral, listing only "all personal property."

Since borrowing the money, the company has run into various financial troubles. It has missed some loan payments to the bank and recently lost a lawsuit, resulting in a large judgment against the company. Last month, the judgment creditor obtained a judicial lien on the gramophone.

Last week, the bank notified the company that it was in default under the loan agreement. Without giving advance notice to the company, the bank sold the gramophone to an antiques collector in a commercially reasonable manner. The judgment creditor has learned about the sale of the gramophone and asserts that he had a superior claim to it.

The sale of the gramophone did not generate enough money to satisfy the company's obligation to the bank. The bank would like to seize some of the company's other property in which the bank has an enforceable security interest.

1. Does the company have any claim against the bank with respect to the sale of the gramophone? Explain.
2. As between the bank and the judgment creditor, who had a superior claim to the gramophone? Explain.
3. Does the bank have an enforceable security interest in any personal property of the company other than the gramophone? Explain.

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP QUESTION

Five years ago, three radiologists—Carol, Jean, and Pat—opened a radiology practice together. They agreed to call their business “Radiology Services,” to split the profits equally, and to run the practice together in a manner that would be competitive. Toward that end, they purchased state-of-the-art radiology imaging equipment comparable to that of other radiology practices in the community.

Shortly after opening the practice, Carol, Jean, and Pat retained an attorney to organize the practice as a limited liability company. The attorney prepared all the necessary documents and forwarded the documents to Carol, Jean, and Pat for signature. However, they were so involved in their radiology practice that they forgot to sign the documents, and they have never done so.

Four months ago, Carol suggested to Jean and Pat that the practice replace some of the imaging equipment. Jean was worried about overspending on imaging equipment, but she did not express her concern to Carol and Pat.

Three months ago, Carol, without discussing the matter further with either Jean or Pat or obtaining their consent, purchased for the practice a $400,000 state-of-the-art imaging machine like those recently acquired by other radiology practices in the community.

After the purchase but prior to delivery, Jean learned what Carol had done and was furious. Jean did not believe the practice could afford such an expensive machine. When Jean confronted Carol, Carol said, “Too bad, it’s a done deal—get over it.” At that, Jean responded, “That’s it. I’ve had enough. This machine was purchased without my consent. It’s a terrible idea. I’m out of here and never coming back. Just give me my share of the value of the practice.” Carol responded, “Fine with me.” Carol and Pat subsequently agreed to continue their participation in Radiology Services without Jean.

Radiology Services is in a jurisdiction that has adopted both the Revised Uniform Partnership Act (1997, as amended) and the Uniform Limited Liability Company Act (2006, as amended).

1. What type of business entity is Radiology Services? Explain.
2. Did Carol have the authority to purchase the imaging machine without the consent of Jean and Pat? Explain.
3. Did Jean’s statements to Carol constitute a withdrawal from Radiology Services? Explain.
4. Were Jean’s statements sufficient to entitle her to receive a buyout payment from Radiology Services for her interest in the practice? Explain.

CIVIL PROCEDURE QUESTION

An airline is incorporated in State A, where its corporate headquarters are located. The facility where it receives and processes online and telephone reservation requests is located in State B. It employs 150 people at that facility. The airline's base of physical operations, including its transport hub and major maintenance facility, is in State C, where more than 12,000 of its 15,000 employees are located. The airline serves States A and C but not State B.

In August, a woman who lived in State C called the reservation center in State B to obtain a round-trip ticket for the woman to fly between State C and State A in early September.

In early September, the woman used the ticket to fly to State A. The purpose of her trip was to hunt for an apartment in State A, where she was planning to start working at a new job that was set to begin in December. The woman found an apartment and signed an agreement to rent the apartment for one year, starting on December 1.

On the woman's return flight from State A to State C, a mechanical failure forced the plane to make an emergency landing in State A. The woman suffered serious and permanent injuries during the emergency landing and was hospitalized for three weeks in State A. Upon leaving the hospital, she returned to her home in State C. Because of the injuries she suffered, the woman has been unable to work, and she has received an indefinite deferral of the starting date for her job in State A. She continues to live in State C, where she has lived her entire life, although she hopes one day soon to move to the apartment in State A and begin working at her new job.

The woman has retained an attorney, who recommended filing a personal injury claim against the airline in State B because of the larger awards that State B juries tend to give in such cases. Accordingly, the woman sued the airline in federal court in State B, making a state-law tort claim for damages in excess of $1 million for the injuries she suffered during the plane's emergency landing.

The airline promptly filed a motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter and personal jurisdiction.

State B's long-arm statute allows its courts to exercise personal jurisdiction to "the maximum extent allowed by the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution."

How should the federal district court rule on the motion to dismiss? Explain.

TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS QUESTION

Eight years ago, a settlor created a $300,000 irrevocable trust. The settlor's brother is the sole trustee of the trust. The trust's primary beneficiaries are the settlor's son and daughter. The trust instrument provides, in relevant part:

During the term of this trust, the trustee shall pay to and between my two children so much, if any, of trust income and principal as he deems advisable, in his sole discretion, for each child's support. Upon the death of the survivor of my children, the trustee shall distribute any remaining undistributed trust principal and income equally among my surviving grandchildren.

The trust contains a spendthrift clause that prohibits the voluntary assignment of a beneficiary's interest and does not allow a beneficiary's creditors to reach that interest.

Two months after creating the trust, the settlor died. Both the settlor's son, now age 35, and the settlor's daughter, now age 32, survived the settlor and are still alive. The settlor's son has three living children, now 9, 11, and 14 years of age. These children currently live with their mother, from whom the settlor's son was divorced seven years ago. The settlor's daughter is unmarried and has no children. Both the son (employed as a waiter) and the daughter (employed as a bookkeeper) have earned, on average, less than $35,000 per year during the past seven years.

Over the past eight years, the son has incurred and has not paid the following debts:

- (a) $10,000 to a hospital for the son's emergency-room care
- (b) $35,000 to his former wife in unpaid, judicially ordered child support
- (c) $5,000 to a friend for repayment of a loan, five years ago, to purchase a high-end computer-gaming system for recreational use

Repayment of the debt to the friend was due last year, but the son defaulted on the loan.

During the first year of the trust, the trustee distributed $9,000 of trust income to each of the settlor's two children for their support. Thereafter, relations between the settlor's son and the trustee deteriorated. After the son and his wife divorced, the trustee frequently told others, behind the son's back and without any direct basis, that the son was an "adulterer" and a "terrible father." The trustee often referred to the son as a "bum," and he told the settlor's daughter, without any explanation, "Your brother is rude to me."

Over the last seven years, although the son's and daughter's financial needs were similar, the trustee has distributed $80,000 from trust income and principal to the settlor's daughter and nothing to the settlor's son, despite the son's repeated requests for trust distributions to help him pay his hospital bill, child support, and loan.

1. Given the terms of the trust the settlor created, could the trustee have properly distributed trust assets to the son to enable him to pay (a) his hospital bill, (b) child support, and (c) the loan to purchase the computer-gaming system? Explain.

2. Did the trustee abuse his discretion in refusing to make any distributions to the son during the past seven years? Explain.
3. In light of both the discretion granted the trustee and the spendthrift clause in the trust, may the son's three creditors obtain orders requiring the trustee to pay their claims against the son from trust assets? Explain.

CRIMINAL LAW & PROCEDURE QUESTION

One evening, Ben received a visit from his neighbor. Hanging on Ben's living room wall was a painting by a famous artist. "I love that artist," the neighbor said. "I've collected several of her paintings." Ben remarked that the famous artist was his ex-wife's mother and that whenever his new girlfriend visited, the fact that the painting still hung in his house made her jealous. The neighbor said, "I have a solution. Why don't you give the painting to me for safekeeping? I have an unsigned print by the same artist that you can hang in its place. The print is not in the artist's usual style, so your girlfriend will not get jealous and your living room will still have great art."

Ben thought this was a good idea. He and his neighbor carried the painting to the neighbor's house and hung it in the neighbor's dining room. Ben then took the neighbor's unsigned print home and hung it in his living room.

The next day, Ben decided that he really didn't like the print, and he took it off the wall. Then, around 10:00 p.m., he decided to retrieve the painting from his neighbor.

Ben went to his neighbor's house and knocked on the door, but there was no answer. Just as he was about to leave, he noticed that a ground-floor window was ajar. Ben pushed the window fully open and began to climb into the house to retrieve the painting. The neighbor, who had been asleep upstairs, was awakened by the noise and ran downstairs to find Ben halfway through the window. The neighbor became enraged. Ben tried to explain, but the neighbor would not stop yelling. Ben decided that it would be better to return to his home and retrieve the painting later, after the neighbor had a chance to cool off. But the neighbor followed him outside and across the lawn, yelling, "How dare you sneak into my house!" The yelling attracted the attention of a police officer who was passing in her patrol car. The officer stopped to investigate, and Ben was arrested, questioned, and released.

Two days later, the neighbor returned the painting to Ben, saying "Here's your painting. Give me back the print that I loaned you and we'll forget the whole thing." However, the previous day Ben had been so angry with the neighbor about his arrest that he had contacted an art dealer and had sold her the print. Ben did not tell the art dealer that the unsigned print was by the famous artist. Ben simply offered to sell the print at a very low price and told the art dealer, "I can sell this print to you at such a good price only because I shouldn't have it at all." Although the art dealer often investigated the ownership history of her purchases, she bought the print without further discussion. An hour after the sale, the art dealer contacted a foreign art collector famously uninterested in exploring the ownership history of his acquisitions, and sold him the print for 10 times what she had paid for it.

The prosecutor is considering bringing the following charges: (i) a charge of burglary against Ben in connection with the incident at the neighbor's house, (ii) a charge of larceny or embezzlement against Ben for his actions involving the unsigned print, and (iii) a charge of receiving stolen property against the art dealer for her actions involving the print.

The jurisdiction where these events occurred has a criminal code that defines burglary, larceny, embezzlement, and receiving stolen property in a manner consistent with traditional definitions of these crimes.

With what crimes listed above, if any, should Ben and the art dealer be charged? Explain.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Could a court properly find that the woman was negligent even though she was driving below the speed limit?
- (2) Could a court properly find that the woman is liable for the man's damages resulting from the infection?
- (3) Could a court properly find that the hospital is liable for the man's damages resulting from the infection?
- (4) If a court found that both the woman's negligence and the hospital's negligence caused the man's infection, could the woman's liability be limited to $100,000 for injuries the man suffered in the accident?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A court could properly find that the woman was negligent despite the fact that she was driving at a speed lower than the posted limit if it concludes that her conduct was unreasonable under the circumstances. Given the icy road conditions, a court could find that her conduct was unreasonable.

Because exposure to either negligent or non-negligent medical treatment is a foreseeable risk of negligent driving, the woman could be found liable for the damages arising from the infection if the court concludes that the man contracted the infection through the hospital's conduct.

Although the man cannot show when or how he contracted the infection, under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur the man could recover damages from the hospital if he can show that the harm he suffered (the infection) does not normally occur without negligence and that other responsible causes, including his own conduct and that of third persons, are sufficiently eliminated by the evidence. Here, the evidence shows that the man was in the hospital during the entire period in which he contracted the infection, that he had no other known means of exposure, and that the risk of infection can be almost eliminated through the hospital's use of recommended infection-control procedures. A court thus could properly rely on the res ipsa loquitur doctrine to find the hospital liable.

If the court found that the negligence of both the woman and the hospital caused the infection, the woman's liability must be greater than $100,000. Because the woman's negligence alone caused the car accident, she alone would be liable for the $100,000 damages for the injuries the man suffered in the accident. In addition, in joint and several liability jurisdictions, she and the hospital together would be liable for the full amount of damages from the man's infection. Thus, her total damages for both the accident and the infection would not be limited to $100,000.

Point One (20%)

Because compliance with a statutory standard does not insulate an actor against liability for negligence, the woman could properly be found liable to the man despite the fact that she was driving below the posted speed limit.

Statutory standards typically establish the level of care necessary to avoid a finding of negligence. Thus, "an actor is negligent if, without excuse, the actor violates a statute that is designed to protect against the type of accident the actor's conduct causes, and if the accident victim is within the class of persons the statute is designed to protect." Restatement (Third) of Torts: Liability for Physical and Emotional Harm § 14. However, an actor is negligent when he or she "does not exercise reasonable care under all the circumstances." Id. at § 3 (emphasis added). Speed limits are established for normal driving conditions, not hazardous conditions caused by poor weather. Given that the accident in which the man was injured occurred on an icy road during a winter storm, a court could find that the woman was negligent even though she was driving at a speed lower than the posted speed limit. Compliance with a statute does not establish freedom from fault. See id. § 16.

Point Two (20%)

Because contracting the serious infection was within the scope of the risk of negligent driving, the court could find that the woman's negligence was the proximate cause of the man's injuries sustained as a result of contracting the infection.

An actor is liable for those harms that are a foreseeable consequence of his negligence.

Courts have routinely found that subsequent medical malpractice is within the scope of the risk created by a tort defendant. "If the negligent actor is liable for another's bodily injury, he is also subject to liability for any additional bodily harm resulting from normal efforts of third persons in rendering aid which the other's injury reasonably requires, irrespective of whether such acts are done in a proper or a negligent manner." Restatement (Second) of Torts § 457. Liability typically attaches even when the medical services rendered "cause harm which is entirely different from that which the other had previously sustained . . . so long as the mistake or negligence is of the sort which is recognized as one of the risks which is inherent in the human fallibility of those who render such services." Id. at cmt. a.

Thus, because it is foreseeable that an injured person will require hospitalization and that hospitalization will expose the injured person to other infections, the woman could be found liable for the man's damages associated with contracting the infection so long as the trier of fact concludes that the hospital is responsible, whether negligent or not, for the man's contracting the infection.

Point Three (40%)

Although the man cannot directly prove that he contracted the infection in the hospital or from a specific action by the hospital or its employees that was negligent, the hospital could be found liable under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur because the man can show that (1) contracting the infection does not normally happen without negligence, and (2) other responsible causes are sufficiently eliminated by the evidence.

Typically, the tort plaintiff bears the burden of proof to establish the specific actions of the defendant or its employees (acting within the scope of their employment) that were negligent and caused his harm. Here, the plaintiff has no direct proof of the actions of the hospital or its employees that were negligent and that caused the infection from which he is suffering.

However, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur permits the trier of fact to infer that the harm suffered by the plaintiff was caused by negligence of the defendant when

- (a) the event is of a kind which ordinarily does not occur in the absence of negligence;
- (b) other responsible causes, including the conduct of the plaintiff and third persons, are sufficiently eliminated by the evidence; and
- (c) the indicated negligence is within the scope of the defendant's duty to the plaintiff.

Restatement (Second) of Torts § 328D.

Res ipsa loquitur is commonly used in actions against medical providers when the patient suffers an unexplained injury and the evidence establishes that the risk of such an injury can be largely eliminated when reasonable care is used. If, for example, the “evidence shows that a particular adverse result of surgery is totally preventable when surgeons exercise reasonable and customary care, then res ipsa is appropriate in the patient’s suit against the surgeon.” Restatement (Third) of Torts: Liability for Physical and Emotional Harm § 17 cmt. e; Kambat v. St. Francis Hospital, 678 N.E.2d 456 (N.Y. 1997).

The man should be able to show that contracting the infection is an event that normally does not occur in the absence of negligence. A plaintiff need not show that reasonable care would completely eliminate the risk, only that it “ordinarily does not occur in the absence of negligence.” Restatement (Second) of Torts § 328D.

The man should also be able to show that the very likely cause of the infection is one of three possibilities: (1) improperly sterilized instruments, (2) failure of employees to follow proper handwashing techniques, or (3) reuse of medical instruments that cannot be properly sterilized. Any of these possibilities would constitute hospital negligence. Another cause that could suggest either hospital negligence or negligence by a third-party supplier is the use of contaminated blood, but that cause is eliminated by the facts. The possible causes that do not suggest hospital negligence are “rare possibilities” that occur outside the hospital setting. These possible causes are eliminated because the man was hospitalized during the entire period of potential exposure. Thus, even though the specific cause of the infection cannot be proven, it appears that there is a very strong inference that the hospital's negligence caused the infection.

Lastly, here the hospital clearly had a duty to the man to protect him against contracting infections while hospitalized. Thus, the indicated negligence—failing to protect the man from contracting the infection—was within the scope of the hospital's duty to the man.

Based on this evidence, the court could use the res ipsa loquitur doctrine to find that the hospital is liable for the man's infection.

[NOTE: This answer sets out the res ipsa loquitur requirements from the Restatement (Second) of Torts. Jurisdictions differ as to exactly how they express the requirements of the res ipsa loquitur doctrine. One traditional variation requires that the plaintiff show three things: "(1) the accident which produced a person's injury was one which ordinarily does not happen unless someone was negligent, (2) the instrumentality or agent which caused the accident was under the exclusive control of the defendant, and (3) the circumstances indicated that the untoward event was not caused or contributed to by any act or neglect on the part of the injured person." See, e.g., Eaton v. Eaton, 575 A.2d 858, 863 (N.J. 1990). The Third Restatement offers another formulation: that negligence can be inferred when the accident causing harm is of a type that "ordinarily happens as a result of the negligence of a class of actors of which the defendant is the relevant member." Restatement (Third) of Torts: Liability for Physical and Emotional Harm § 17.

Answers relying on any of these variations should be given full credit as long as the examinee recognizes that courts interpret that variation, regardless of the specific way it sets out its requirements, "to limit the application of the res ipsa loquitur doctrine to those situations in which the defendant's negligence was more probably than not the cause of the plaintiff's injuries." Giles v. City of New Haven, 636 A.2d 1335 (Conn. 1994); see also Dan B. Dobbs et al., Torts and Compensation 190 (7th ed. 2013) ("We should expect variation in local verbalization of the rules, but always remember that a different verbalization may be intended to express substantially the same ideas.")]

[NOTE: An examinee might note that statutes in some jurisdictions restrict the use of res ipsa loquitur in medical malpractice cases. No such statute appears here, and an examinee should not receive credit for assuming such and answering accordingly. See Prosser, Wade, and Schwartz's Torts Cases and Materials 259 (13th ed. 2015).]

Point Four (20%)

A finding that the woman's negligence caused the car accident would mean that the woman is solely responsible for the $100,000 damages from the accident and is liable for that amount. She and the hospital together will be jointly and severally liable for the $250,000 in damages from the man's infection. Thus, the man can collect any portion, or all, of the $250,000 damages from the woman. Therefore, the woman's liability for both injuries cannot be limited to $100,000.

If the woman negligently caused the auto accident, she would be the sole proximate cause of the accident and would be liable for the $100,000 stipulated damages. She alone bears responsibility for those damages.

If the negligence of the woman and the hospital both caused the man's infection, the woman and the hospital would be jointly and severally liable for the $250,000 stipulated infection damages. Joint and several liability would be imposed for the infection damages because both the woman and the hospital have caused an indivisible injury, one of the bases of joint and several liability. Each of them is liable for the full amount of the man's damages from the infection.

Thus, because the woman is solely liable for the $100,000 of damages just from the accident and is jointly and severally liable for the foreseeable infection damages, her liability cannot be limited to $100,000.

[NOTE: The man has no obligation or need to ask the court to apportion the infection damages. He can approach either tortfeasor, or both tortfeasors, and seek total infection damages of $250,000 or a lesser amount. The man has the choice of how to apportion collection efforts between the two. The fourth call asks only whether the woman's liability could be limited to $100,000. Clearly the answer is "no" because she is liable for $250,000 as a joint tortfeasor in addition to liability for $100,000 damages from the accident. The examinee is not asked to specify how the plaintiff would apportion collection efforts between the two joint tortfeasors.

The MEE Subject Matter Outline notes that all torts questions occur in a jurisdiction that has joint and several liability with pure comparative negligence.]

SEC (II.D., E., F.; III.B.; IV.A., B.; V.A.2., B.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) May a secured party dispose of collateral after the debtor's default without first notifying the debtor?
- (2) Whose rights are superior as between the rights of a secured party having possession of an item of collateral and a person who has a judicial lien on the same item?
- (3) Does a security agreement describing collateral as "all personal property" create an enforceable security interest in a debtor's property?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The company has a claim against the bank with respect to the sale of the gramophone because the bank did not provide the company with advance notification of the bank's intent to dispose of the gramophone. The bank's security interest in the gramophone is superior to the judicial lien of the judgment creditor because the bank's security interest was perfected before the lien was created. The bank does not have an enforceable security interest in other property of the company because the language in the security agreement is insufficient and thus the bank's security interest is not enforceable or attached.

Point One (20%)

The company has a claim against the bank with respect to the sale of the gramophone because the bank did not send the company a notification of disposition before the sale.

After default by the debtor, a secured party may dispose of the collateral. UCC § 9-610(a). If it does so, the proceeds of that disposition will be applied first to the expenses of that process and then to the satisfaction of the debtor's obligation to the secured party. UCC § 9-615(a). Before disposing of the collateral, however, the secured party must send the debtor a "reasonable authenticated notification of disposition." UCC § 9-611(b). The only exception to this notification requirement is if the collateral is perishable or threatens to decline speedily in value or is of a type customarily sold on a recognized market. UCC § 9-611(d). There is no indication that the gramophone in this problem fits into any of those categories. Therefore, because the bank sent no notification to the company before the disposition, the disposition was improper. This breach of the bank's obligation may expose the bank to liability to the company for damages (see UCC § 9-625(b)) or lessen the amount of any deficiency recoverable by the bank after application of the proceeds of sale to the company's obligation. See UCC § 9-626.

[NOTE: An examinee might mention that a private sale of collateral, such as occurred here, is permissible if commercially reasonable. This is true. UCC § 9-610(b). But this does not obviate the requirements with respect to pre-disposition notification.]

Point Two (40%)

The bank's security interest in the gramophone is superior to the judgment creditor's lien because the bank's security interest was perfected before the judgment creditor obtained his lien.

Except as otherwise provided in the UCC, a security agreement is effective against creditors. UCC § 9-201(a). UCC § 9-317 provides such an exception, however. That section indicates that a security interest is subordinate to the rights of a person who became a lien creditor before the security interest was perfected. UCC § 9-317(a)(2)(A). Here, the judgment creditor is a lien creditor under § 9-102(a)(52)(A) because of his judicial lien. Thus, the bank's security interest in the gramophone will be subordinate to the rights of the judgment creditor only if the bank's security interest was not perfected when the judgment creditor became a lien creditor.

A security interest is not perfected unless it has "attached." UCC § 9-308(a). A security interest attaches when it becomes enforceable unless the time of attachment has been postponed by agreement. UCC § 9-203(a). Thus, the bank's security interest in the gramophone cannot be perfected unless it is enforceable. A security interest is enforceable if the three criteria in UCC § 9-203(b) have been satisfied. The first two criteria are clearly satisfied: "value" has been given (because the loan was made) and the debtor (the company) had rights in the gramophone (the company owned it). See UCC §§ 9-203(b)(1)–(2) and 1-204. The third criterion can be satisfied in several ways. Here, it is satisfied because the requirements of UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(B) ("the collateral . . . is in the possession of the secured party . . . pursuant to the debtor's security agreement") are met. The gramophone was in the possession of the bank, and this was pursuant to the company's "security agreement." A "security agreement" is an agreement that creates or provides for a security interest. UCC § 9-102(a)(74). Thus, the oral agreement between the company's owner (speaking for the company) and the bank is a security agreement pursuant to which the bank took possession of the gramophone. Accordingly, when the bank took possession of the gramophone, its security interest was enforceable and attached.

An attached security interest can be perfected in many ways. See generally UCC § 9-308. In the case of security interests in goods, one method of perfection is for the secured party to take possession of the goods. UCC §§ 9-310(b)(6), 9-313(a). Thus, the bank's possession of the gramophone not only was an element of enforceability and attachment but also resulted in perfection of the security interest.

Because the bank's security interest in the gramophone was perfected before the judgment creditor became a lien creditor, the bank's security interest is superior to the judgment creditor's judicial lien.

[NOTE: An examinee may mention that the language in the loan agreement, standing alone, would be insufficient to create an enforceable and attached security interest in the gramophone. This is accurate, but the bank's possession of the gramophone pursuant to the oral agreement is sufficient. Thus, the security interest is enforceable and attached whether or not the language in the written loan agreement would suffice in the absence of the bank's possession. Some examinees may discuss the elements of enforceability of a possessory security interest in the answer to question 1 and refer back to that discussion in their answer to this question. Such examinees should get credit for that analysis as part of their answer to question 2. Examinees may organize their answers either way and receive full credit.]

Point Three (40%)

The bank does not have an enforceable security interest in the company's other assets because the description of the collateral in the loan agreement is insufficient to create an enforceable security interest in those assets.

A security interest attaches when it becomes enforceable unless the time of attachment has been postponed by agreement. UCC § 9-203(a). The three criteria in UCC § 9-203(b) have not been satisfied. The first two criteria are clearly satisfied: "value" has been given (because the loan was made) and the debtor (the company) has rights in its personal property (because it owns it). See UCC §§ 9-203(b)(1)–(2) and 1-204. The third criterion has not been satisfied.

Here, because the bank does not have possession of the remaining personal property of the company (and other specialized criteria are inapplicable), the bank's security interest in that personal property is enforceable only if the requirements of UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(A) are met. Under that provision, the debtor must have authenticated (i.e., signed or its electronic equivalent) a security agreement that contains a description of the collateral. The loan agreement is a security agreement inasmuch as it creates or provides for a security interest. UCC § 9-102(a)(74). Moreover, it is authenticated inasmuch as we are told in the question that the loan agreement was signed by the company's owner. See UCC § 9-102(a)(7) (definition of "authenticate") and UCC § 1-201(b)(37) (definition of "signed"). The description of the collateral in the security agreement is insufficient, however. UCC § 9-108(a) states that, except as provided in, inter alia, UCC § 9-108(c), a description of personal property is sufficient if it reasonably identifies what is described. UCC § 9-108(c), though, provides that descriptions of a debtor's property such as "all of the debtor's personal property" or words of a similar import do not reasonably identify the collateral. Here, the description of the collateral in the loan agreement is "all personal property" owned by the company. Therefore, the description is insufficient under UCC § 9-108, and accordingly the security agreement does not satisfy the requirements of UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(A).

Thus, the bank's security interest in the company's assets (other than the gramophone in the possession of the bank discussed in Point One) is not enforceable. Since the security interest is not enforceable, it did not attach; since the security interest did not attach, the security interest is not perfected.

[NOTE: An examinee may mention that “all personal property” is a sufficient indication of collateral in a financing statement. That is true. UCC § 9-504(2). But the filing of a financing statement cannot perfect a security interest that does not attach. Therefore, the security interest is not perfected here even if the financing statement would be sufficient to perfect a security interest that, unlike here, attached.]

AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP ANALYSIS

AGC (V.A.; VI.; VII.; VIII.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) What type of business entity is Radiology Services?
- (2) Did Carol have the authority to purchase the imaging machine without the consent of Jean and Pat?
- (3) Did Jean's statements to Carol constitute a withdrawal from Radiology Services?
- (4) Were Jean's statements sufficient to entitle her to receive a buyout payment from Radiology Services for her interest in the practice?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Radiology Services is an "at-will" general partnership because Carol, Jean, and Pat agreed to share profits and operate the business together without specifying a specific term. They did not form a limited liability company (LLC), as they intended, because no documentation to create an LLC was signed or filed.

As a partner of the general partnership, Carol had the authority to purchase the imaging machine on behalf of the partnership without the consent of either Jean or Pat because each partner has the authority to conduct partnership business. And while a partner may be liable to the other partners for a purchase that exceeds her authority, here Jean likely has no claim against Carol for purchasing the machine without the consent of Jean and Pat because the purchase of the imaging machine was most likely in the ordinary course of the business of the partnership.

Jean's oral statements to Carol stating her will to withdraw from Radiology Services resulted in her dissociation from the partnership, and because the partnership was "at will," her dissociation was not wrongful.

Because Carol and Pat agreed to continue the partnership, Jean's dissociation did not result in the dissolution and winding up of the partnership. Instead, Jean is entitled to receive a buyout payment from Radiology Services for her one-third partnership interest 120 days after making a written demand for payment. Because Jean did not make a written demand, the partnership has no specified time in which to pay her the buyout price.

[NOTE: General partnerships are governed by either the Revised Uniform Partnership Act (RUPA) (1997, as amended), the Revised Uniform Partnership Act (1997), or the Uniform Partnership Act (1914) (UPA). The 1997 act, which the Uniform Law Commission amended in both 2011 and 2013 as part of its harmonization project, applies in all states (sometimes with the amendments) except for Georgia, Indiana, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, New Hampshire, New York, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, and Wisconsin, which continue to use versions of the UPA (1914). Because the facts state that Radiology Services is in a jurisdiction that has adopted the RUPA (1997, as amended), citations to the other acts are omitted, although the results under those acts are similar.

The Uniform Limited Liability Company Act (2006, as amended) contains principles that are widely adopted in LLC law. In all states, articles of organization must be signed and filed to create an LLC.]

Point One (20%)

Radiology Services is a general partnership. Despite their intentions, Carol, Pat, and Jean never formed a limited liability company.

A general partnership is formed whenever two or more persons associate (whether or not in writing) for the purpose of carrying on a business for profit. See Revised Uniform Partnership Act (RUPA) § 202(a) (1997, as amended) (“the association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit forms a partnership, whether or not the persons intend to form a partnership”). Here, by agreeing to share profits and operate their radiology practice together, Carol, Jean, and Pat formed a general partnership, despite their intention to operate their business as a limited liability company. Furthermore, because the partnership was for neither a fixed term nor a specific undertaking, it was an “at-will” partnership.

A limited liability company is formed by the filing of a signed certificate of organization with the Secretary of State. Rev. Unif. Limited Liability Company Act § 201 (2006, as amended). Here, no certificate was signed or filed; thus, Carol, Jean, and Pat did not form a limited liability company.

[NOTE: Although some jurisdictions have recognized the “de facto” LLC doctrine where there has been a good-faith but failed attempt to form the LLC, this doctrine insulates members only from liability to third parties; it does not create an LLC as between the members themselves. See Emeka Duruigbo, The De Facto and Estoppel Concepts in the LLC Context: Still Birth or Stunted Growth?, ExpressO (2009), available at https://works.bepress.com/emeka_duruigbo/1/.]

Point Two (30%)

Carol had the authority to purchase the imaging machine without the consent of Jean and Pat because it appears that Carol purchased the machine in the ordinary course of business and was unaware of Jean’s concerns about purchasing expensive imaging equipment.

Section 401(h) of the Revised Uniform Partnership Act, as amended, provides that “each partner has equal rights in the management and conduct of the partnership’s business.” This grant of authority to each partner is tempered by subsection 401(k), which provides: “A difference arising as to a matter in the ordinary course of business of a partnership may be decided by a majority of the partners. An act outside the ordinary course of business of a partnership and an amendment to the partnership agreement may be undertaken only with the affirmative vote or consent of all the partners.”

As the comments to Section 401(h) note, the scope of a partner's authority is governed by agency law principles. If the partnership agreement is silent on the scope of the agent-partner's authority, a partner has actual authority to commit the partnership "to usual and customary matters, unless the partner has reason to know that (i) other partners might disagree, or (ii) for some other reason consultation with fellow partners is appropriate." See comments to RUPA § 401 (1997, as amended). In light of this principle, a partner has authority to bind the partnership as to "usual and customary" dealings with third parties and need not seek the prior approval of the other partners unless the partner has reason to believe that the other partners might not approve or might expect to be consulted. Furthermore, under general agency law principles, a partner does not have actual authority to take "unusual or non-customary actions that will have a substantial effect on the partnership." Id., comment to subsection h.

Here, it appears that purchase of the equipment was in the ordinary course of business. The partners had purchased state-of-the-art imaging equipment when they started the practice, they had agreed to run the practice in a manner consistent with other area practices, and other practices had bought equipment like that which Carol purchased.

Further, although Jean had concerns about the practice purchasing expensive imaging machines, there is no indication that Carol was aware of Jean's concerns when she made the purchase. The facts clearly state that Jean did not express her concerns to either Carol or Pat. Furthermore, the facts indicate that the three partners (including Jean) had agreed that the partnership would have imaging equipment that would allow it to be competitive with other similar practices in the community.

Point Three (20%)

Jean's oral statement to Carol, "I'm out of here," resulted in Jean's dissociation from the partnership.

A partner is dissociated from a partnership when the partnership has notice of the partner's will to withdraw as a partner. RUPA § 601(1) (1997, as amended). A partner can dissociate from the partnership at any time. The notice of the partner's will to withdraw need not be in writing. See RUPA §103(b)(6) (partnership agreement may provide that notice of withdrawal be in writing). The dissociation is rightful—that is, the dissociating partner has no obligations to the other partners—when the partnership is at will and the dissociation breaches no express provision in the partnership agreement. See also RUPA § 102(13) (1997, as amended) ("'partnership at will' means a partnership in which the partners have not agreed to remain partners until the expiration of a definite term or the completion of a particular undertaking"); § 602(b) (1997, as amended) (specifying that a partner's dissociation is wrongful in an at-will partnership "only if . . . it is in breach of an express provision of the partnership agreement").

Here, Jean's statement to Carol that "I'm out of here and never coming back" constituted a dissociation, and it was not wrongful because there is no indication in this at-will partnership that her withdrawal breached any express provision in the partnership agreement.

Point Four (30%)

Because Carol and Pat agreed to continue the partnership, Jean's dissociation did not result in the dissolution and winding up of the partnership. Instead, Jean is entitled to receive a buyout price for her partnership interest 120 days after she makes written demand for payment. Because her demand was not in writing, the partnership has no specified time in which to make payment.

Normally, a partner's dissociation in an at-will partnership results in its dissolution, and the business must be wound up. See RUPA § 801(1) (1997, as amended). But such dissolution can be rescinded by the affirmative vote or consent of all remaining partners. Id. § 803; accord, RUPA § 802(b) (1997, as amended) (permitting the partners to "waive the right to have the partnership's business wound up and the partnership terminated"). Under RUPA, as amended, the dissociating partner is no longer considered a partner and does not participate in this decision to continue the partnership. See RUPA § 102(10) (1997, as amended) (the term "partner" does not include a partner who dissociated under Section 601).

When a partnership is continued and not dissolved, the dissociating partner is entitled to have her interest purchased for a buyout price equal to that partner's interest in the value of the partnership, based on the greater of its liquidation or going-concern value (plus interest from the date of dissociation). RUPA § 701 (1997, as amended). Further, if the withdrawing partner makes a written demand for payment and no agreement is reached within 120 days after the demand, the partnership must pay in cash the amount it estimates to be the buyout price, including accrued interest. Id. § 701(e).

Here, although Jean made clear her will to withdraw, the partnership was not dissolved because Carol and Pat agreed to continue the partnership. Thus, Jean would be entitled to receive payment of a buyout price. Although Jean made an oral statement demanding payment for her interest, her demand was not in writing. Thus, the partnership does not have a specific time in which to pay the buyout price. But if Jean makes her demand in writing, the partnership would have to reach an agreement with her on the buyout price within 120 days or, failing this, pay her in cash its estimate of the buyout price plus accrued interest.

- (2)(b) Are there sufficient contacts between the airline and State B for a State B court to exercise general personal jurisdiction over the airline in a personal injury action brought by a State C resident, arising out of an accident in State A, and involving travel between States A and C?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The court should grant the motion to dismiss. Although the court would have diversity jurisdiction, the court lacks personal jurisdiction over the airline.

The woman's claim against the airline is based on state law, so diversity is the only basis upon which a federal district court could exercise subject-matter jurisdiction over this case. Here, the amount in controversy is more than $1 million and clearly sufficient for diversity jurisdiction. Further, the parties are diverse.

The woman's citizenship, determined by her domicile, is State C, where she has lived her entire life.

The airline is a citizen of State A, where it is incorporated and where its corporate headquarters are located.

The federal court in this case can exercise personal jurisdiction over the airline only if the airline would be subject to the jurisdiction of the State B state courts. Because the State B courts exercise jurisdiction to the limits of the Constitution, the question is whether the airline has sufficient "minimum contacts" with State B "such that the maintenance of the suit [in State B] does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.” International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 316 (1945).

Here, there are insufficient contacts with State B for either general or specific jurisdiction. The only contact between the airline and State B that is mentioned in the facts is that State B is the location of the airline’s online and telephone reservation center. The woman’s personal injury action arises out of an accident that occurred in State A and had no connection at all to State B. Although the woman booked her ticket through the reservation center in State B, the woman’s claim for bodily injury has no relation to the manner in which she purchased her ticket or to the fact that the reservation center is in State B. On these facts, it does not seem that the airline could reasonably anticipate being haled into a State B court for this particular claim. Moreover, if this claim is allowed, then any personal injury claim against the airline could be litigated in State B, regardless of where and how the injury occurred, if the related ticket was booked online or by telephone. This seems unreasonable, without some additional evidence concerning the nature and extent of the airline’s State B contacts.

Point One(a) (10%)

The court has diversity jurisdiction only if the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000 and the parties are citizens of different states.

The diversity jurisdiction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(1), grants original federal jurisdiction to the United States District Courts in cases “where the amount in controversy exceeds . . . $75,000 . . . and is between (1) citizens of different States.” Diversity of citizenship is determined as of the time the suit is filed.

Here the woman’s claim for relief seeks in excess of $1 million, a potentially credible amount since the facts note that the woman sustained serious and permanent physical injuries that interfered with her ability to act upon a job offer. In deciding a motion to dismiss on jurisdictional grounds, the court will take the woman’s claim for relief at face value with respect to the amount in controversy unless it “appear[s] to a legal certainty that the claim is really for less than the jurisdictional amount.” St. Paul Mercury Indemnity Co. v. Red Cab Co., 303 U.S. 283, 289 (1938).

Point One(b) (20%)

Here, the woman is a citizen of State C because, despite her desire to move to State A, she has never established a residence in State A.

The citizenship of individuals for diversity purposes is determined by domicile at the time of the lawsuit. Domicile continues until changed, and in this case, the facts demonstrate that when the events began, the woman, a lifelong resident of State C, was a State C domiciliary and a State C citizen for diversity purposes. A person can change her domicile by (1) taking up residence in a new jurisdiction with (2) the intent to remain there indefinitely. Gilbert v. David, 235 U.S. 561

(1915). Here, the woman appears to have had an intention to move to State A and make it her home indefinitely. She accepted a job in State A, and she signed a lease on an apartment there.

However, the woman never took up residence in State A and therefore did not change her domicile. The mere “expression of an intention to move one’s residence, without actually moving” is not sufficient to establish a domicile. Jack H. Friedenthal, Mary Kay Kane & Arthur R. Miller, Civil Procedure 31–32 (4th ed. 2005). The woman was temporarily present in State A and signed a one-year lease for an apartment. She was also briefly hospitalized in State A. But her physical presence in State A never coincided with a present intent to remain in State A indefinitely. At the time of her trip to State A, she always intended to return to State C and to make her permanent move to State A at a later date. Thus, that trip alone would be insufficient to change the woman’s diversity citizenship from State C to State A.

[NOTE: An examinee who erroneously concludes that the September events did change the woman’s domicile to State A should consider whether subsequent events changed her domicile back to State C. Thus, after her hospitalization, she returned to State C to live, with a desire to move to State A in the future, but with no clear time at which that would happen. Thus, it would be reasonable to conclude that the woman re-acquired her State C domicile because she is now present there with no immediate plans to leave (i.e., she intends to remain there for an indefinite period of time).]

Point One(c) (20%)

The airline is a citizen of State A, where it is incorporated and where, under the “nerve center” test of Hertz Corp. v. Friend, the airline has its principal place of business.

The airline’s citizenship for diversity purposes is determined by both the place of its incorporation and the place where it has its principal place of business. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1). Here, its place of incorporation is State A. Its principal place of business is “the place where the corporation’s high-level officers direct, control, and coordinate the corporation’s activities.” See Hertz Corp. v. Friend, 559 U.S. 77, 80 (2010). The facts state that the airline’s corporate headquarters are in State A, and there is no suggestion that the officers run the corporation from any other location. The airline is, therefore, a citizen of State A under the principal-place-of-business rule as well as the place-of-incorporation rule.

Because the airline is a citizen of State A and the woman is a citizen of State C, the parties are diverse. As noted earlier, the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000. Thus, the court has diversity jurisdiction.

Point Two(a) (25%)

The fact that the airline maintains an online reservation facility in State B is not a sufficient basis for State B to exercise specific personal jurisdiction over a personal injury action that arose out of an incident in another state, involved airline transportation between two different states, and was brought by a plaintiff who is a resident of another state.

A federal court can exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant who is subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of the state in which the federal court sits. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(k)(1)(A). In this case, State B's courts exercise jurisdiction to the limits of the Constitution. The federal district court can therefore take personal jurisdiction over the airline if the airline has sufficient "minimum contacts" with State B "such that the maintenance of the suit [in State B] does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice." International Shoe Co.

v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 316 (1945). In this inquiry, two critical questions are whether the quality and nature of the airline's contacts with the jurisdiction are such that it can reasonably anticipate being haled into court there and whether those contacts are such that it is reasonable to expect the airline to defend the action in State B. In Helicopteros Nacionales de Colombia, S.A. v. Hall, 466 U.S. 408 (1984), the Supreme Court recognized a distinction between "general jurisdiction" (also called "all-purpose" jurisdiction), which permits a court to exercise jurisdiction over any claim against a defendant if the defendant has extensive connections with the forum, and "specific jurisdiction" (also called "case-linked" jurisdiction), which permits a forum to hear a case only if the suit arises out of or relates to the defendant's forum contacts.

In this case, there does not seem to be a basis for State B to exercise specific jurisdiction. For specific jurisdiction to be proper, there must be "'an affiliation between the forum and the underlying controversy,' principally, activity or an occurrence that takes place in the forum State and is therefore subject to the State's regulation." Goodyear Dunlop Tires Operations, S.A. v. Brown, 564 U.S. 915, 919 (2011).

Here, the only connection between the airline and State B is that State B is the location of the airline's reservation center. The woman's suit, however, is not directly related to the presence of the airline reservation center in State B. Rather, the woman's claim against the airline arises from the accident in State A and her use of the airline to fly between States A and C. The airline's affiliation with State B is not sufficiently related to the woman's claim to require the airline to defend the action in State B on the basis of specific jurisdiction.

Point Two(b) (25%)

The airline's operation of a reservation center in State B is not a sufficient basis for a State B court to exercise general jurisdiction over the airline when the airline is incorporated elsewhere, its principal place of business is elsewhere, and its operations in other states are far more extensive than in State B.

General (all-purpose) jurisdiction is proper over a corporation only when "the continuous corporate operations within a state [are] so substantial and of such a nature as to justify suit . . . on causes of action arising from dealings entirely distinct from those activities." International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 318 (1945). Although courts and commentators often have described the standard for general jurisdiction as whether a corporation has engaged in a "substantial, continuous and systematic course of business" in a state, the Supreme Court has recently described that standard as "unacceptably grasping." Daimler A.G. v. Bauman, 571 U.S.

117, 138 (2014). The proper test is not whether the activities are “continuous and systematic,” it is whether the business’s “affiliations with the State are so ‘continuous and systematic’ as to render [it] essentially at home in the forum state.” Daimler A.G. at 138–39 (quoting Goodyear Dunlop Tires Operations, S.A. v. Brown, 564 U.S. 915 (2011)). There are “only a limited set of affiliations with a forum” that will justify concluding that the corporation is “essentially at home” there. The paradigmatic affiliations are place of incorporation and principal place of business, each of which has “the virtue of being unique . . . as well as easily ascertainable.” Daimler A.G., 571 U.S. at 137.

In this case, the maintenance of a reservation center in State B that employs 150 people is unlikely to be enough to justify a conclusion that the airline is “essentially at home” there. The airline is incorporated elsewhere, its headquarters are elsewhere, and the bulk of its physical operations (employing thousands of people) occur elsewhere. The fact that it engages in substantial business activities in State B (as well as in other states where it conducts part of its operations) is, by itself, not sufficient to satisfy the court’s requirement that it be “essentially at home” there, especially given the Court’s admonition that only a “limited set of affiliations” will suffice for a forum to assert all-purpose jurisdiction over a defendant. See, e.g., Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. v. Superior Court, 377 P.3d 874, 883 (Cal. 2016) (drug company is not “at home” in California—even though it sells “large volumes of its products” in California, maintains several research facilities in California, and employs hundreds of people in California—when company’s forum operations “are much less extensive than its activities elsewhere in the United States,” and company is incorporated and has its principal place of business elsewhere), reversed on other grounds, 137 S.Ct. 1773 (2017).

Because there is no personal jurisdiction, the court should grant the motion to dismiss.

[NOTE: Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1631, the court has the authority to transfer the case to another court in order to avoid the jurisdictional problem. Some examinees may mention this as an alternative to dismissal.]

TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS ANALYSIS

TRU (I.C.2., E., F., I.2., I.4., I.5.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Could the trustee have properly distributed trust assets to the son to enable him to pay his hospital bill, child support obligations, or loan to purchase the computer-gaming system?
- (2) Did the trustee abuse his discretion in refusing to make any distributions to the son?
- (3) In light of both the discretion granted the trustee and the spendthrift clause in the trust, may the son's three creditors obtain orders requiring the trustee to pay their claims against the son from trust assets?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The settlor created a discretionary support trust with spendthrift protection. A discretionary support trust permits distributions only for the support of trust beneficiaries, and it provides a trustee with discretion (which the trustee may not abuse) to withhold a distribution even when a beneficiary needs support.

A hospital bill and court-ordered child support are debts incurred for support, which the trustee could pay in his discretion, but a loan to purchase a recreational computer-gaming system would not likely be characterized as a debt incurred for support.

Given the trustee's personal animosity toward the son, the trustee's comparatively liberal distributions to the daughter, and the absence of any reasonable justification for withholding distributions to the son, the son should be able to show that the trustee breached his duty by refusing to make distributions to the son. Thus, the son should be able to bring a successful action against the trustee for the trustee's failure to make distributions that would have enabled him (in whole or in part) to pay the hospital and child-support debts or receive other distributions for support.

Under the Restatement (Third) of Trusts, a creditor of a support trust beneficiary with spendthrift protection may reach trust assets if the creditor provided a necessary to the trust beneficiary or seeks to enforce a child-support claim. The son's former wife and the hospital thus should be able to obtain orders against the trustee for their respective claims. However, because the purchase of a computer-gaming system is not a "necessary" for a person of modest means, the friend cannot obtain an order against the trustee seeking payment for that debt. Under the provisions of the Uniform Trust Code, only the child support would be recoverable.

Point One (40%)

The settlor created a discretionary support trust subject to a spendthrift clause. The hospital bill and child support debt are support expenses for which the trustee could distribute trust assets to the son. The loan to purchase a computer-gaming system is not likely to be characterized as support.

The settlor created a discretionary support trust subject to a spendthrift clause. A support trust permits distributions from the trust to enable the beneficiary to maintain his or her accustomed standard of living. Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 50, cmt. d(2). When a trust instrument grants the trustee of a support trust discretion whether or not to pay a beneficiary's support-related expenses, the trustee's judgment controls unless the trustee abuses his discretion. Id. § 50 cmt. d(1).

This trust is also subject to a spendthrift clause. This clause may prevent a beneficiary's creditors from reaching trust assets, see Point Three, but it does not prevent the beneficiary himself from reaching trust assets if the trustee has abused his discretion in failing to make payments to the beneficiary.

The meaning of the term "support" is fact-dependent. Support includes more than necessities or bare essentials. Most courts measure support in terms of the lifestyle to which the beneficiary has become accustomed even if the trust instrument does not expressly refer to that lifestyle. A beneficiary's accustomed lifestyle is determined at the time the beneficiary's trust interest is created, but is subject to adjustment to accommodate the beneficiary's changing needs. Id. § 50 cmt. d(2).

Necessary medical care is invariably treated as support. Id. Support also invariably includes "reasonable amounts for the support of . . . minor children who reside elsewhere but for whom the beneficiary either chooses or is required to provide support." Id.

Here, the trustee could properly have distributed trust assets to the son to pay the son's hospital bill and child support obligation.

On the other hand, without more facts, a distribution to allow repayment of the son's debt incurred for the purchase of a computer-gaming system would not appear to be a distribution for the son's support. Of course, if the son could establish that such a system is necessary to allow him to live in accordance with his accustomed lifestyle, then it might be considered a support expense. However, the facts state that the son's income is about $35,000, a modest sum in light of the son's child support obligation and expenses for basic needs such as health care, food, clothing, shelter, and transportation. Given this income, it is unlikely that the son could establish a lifestyle that would warrant the trustee's conclusion that the recreational computer-gaming system is a support expense.

Point Two (35%)

The trustee likely abused his discretion in failing to make any distributions to the son, including distributions for the payment of the hospital bill and child support.

The fact that the son's hospital bill and child support obligations should be characterized as support is not the end of the matter. When the trust instrument grants a trustee discretion to pay a beneficiary's support-related expenses, the trustee's judgment controls unless the trustee abuses his discretion. Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 50, cmt. d(1). A trustee's discretionary power is subject to judicial control "only to prevent . . . abuse of the discretion by the trustee." Id. § 50. Trustees may have a number of legitimate reasons to withhold payments from a beneficiary, including discharging the trustee's duty to act impartially with respect to all trust beneficiaries and the beneficiary's ability to pay the expenses from other resources. However, if a court finds that a trustee acted in bad faith or with an improper motive, it may overrule his decisions. Id.

What constitutes an abuse of discretion, according to the Restatement (Third), depends upon the terms of the trust instrument and the other duties of the trustee, such as the duty to administer the trust in accordance with its terms, the duty to act impartially, and the duty of care. See id. § 50, cmt. b. These duties, read together, entitle the beneficiary to "general information concerning the bases upon which the trustee's discretionary judgments have been or will be made." Id. Furthermore, a trustee abuses discretion by acting in bad faith or with an improper motive. Id.; see also § 50, cmt. e(1).

As section 50 of the Restatement (Third) suggests, where, as here, there are multiple trust beneficiaries, the trustee's duty of impartiality requires that, in making distributions, the trustee act "with due regard for the diverse beneficial interests created by the terms of the trust." Id. § 79. "The duty of impartiality is an extension of the duty of loyalty to beneficiaries but involves, in typical trust situations, unavoidably and thus permissibly conflicting duties to various beneficiaries with their competing economic interests.

It would be overly simplistic, and therefore misleading, to equate impartiality with some concept of 'equality' of treatment or concern—that is, to assume that the interests of all beneficiaries have the same priority and are entitled to the same weight in the trustee's balancing of those interests. Impartiality does mean that a trustee's treatment of beneficiaries or conduct in administering a trust is not to be influenced by the trustee's personal favoritism or animosity toward individual beneficiaries, even if the latter results from antagonism that sometimes arises in the course of administration." Id. at § 79, cmt. b.

Here, there is a strong argument that the trustee abused his discretion by withholding support distributions from the son. He ignored the son's repeated requests for distributions, without offering any reason for his refusals. He made substantial distributions to the daughter, whose income was not, on average, different from the son's. The trustee made disparaging comments about the son (that the son was a "bum," a "terrible father," and an "adulterer," and was "rude" to the trustee). Together, these facts support an inference that the trustee withheld distributions from the son because of personal animus rather than a valid reason. All of this supports the conclusion that the trustee abused his discretion in withholding distributions from the son.

[NOTE: Although the question does not ask whether the son could successfully sue based on the trustee's abuse of discretion or what he could recover if his suit were successful, in cases like this one, if the court finds an abuse of discretion, it will typically make an independent judgment of what the trustee would have distributed when carrying out his fiduciary duties and then direct that such payment be made from the trust, if trust assets are available, or otherwise surcharge the trustee. See generally Unif. Trust Code § 504(d).]

Point Three (25%)

Despite the trust's spendthrift clause, the son's former wife and, assuming that the necessities doctrine applies, the hospital may reach the son's interest in the trust to satisfy their claims if the trustee abused his discretion. However, the friend cannot reach the son's interest to satisfy his claim against the son.

The trust created by the settlor was discretionary. “[I]f the terms of a trust provide for a beneficiary to receive distributions in the trustee’s discretion . . . a creditor of the beneficiary is entitled to receive . . . any distributions the trustee . . . is required to make in the exercise of that discretion ” See Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 60.

This general principle does not apply, however, when a trust includes a spendthrift clause. See id. § 59. A spendthrift clause puts trust assets out of the reach of most creditors of a trust beneficiary until such time as trust assets are distributed to that beneficiary. Id. § 58. Accord, Unif. Trust Code § 502.

However, even when a trust provides spendthrift protection, claims against a beneficiary for unpaid child support may still be enforced against the trust. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 59 cmt. b; Unif. Trust Code § 504(c)(2) (a court may order the trustee to pay the child “such amount as is equitable under the circumstances but not more than the amount the trustee would have been required to distribute for the benefit of the beneficiary had the trustee complied with the [support] standard or not abused the discretion.”). Here there is a strong argument that the trustee breached his discretion (see Point Two), such that the former wife will be able to obtain payment from the trustee.

In some jurisdictions, creditors who provided the beneficiary with “necessaries” such as health care may reach the beneficiary’s interest in satisfaction of any unpaid debt despite a spendthrift clause. Restatement (Third) of Trusts §§ 59, 60 cmt. c. (Comments to the Restatement suggest that the creditor may reach the beneficiary’s interest but may not force a sale of the interest. In such a case, the court could direct the trustee to distribute trust income to the creditor until the claim is paid. Id. § 56 cmt. e.). Medical care is invariably treated as a necessary. But if in addition to a spendthrift clause, distributions are discretionary with the trustee, the creditor who provided the beneficiary with a necessary cannot compel a distribution if the beneficiary could not do so. In other words, the creditor cannot compel a distribution in the absence of an abuse of discretion. Id. § 60 cmt. e.

The necessities exception is not recognized in the Uniform Trust Code. See Unif. Trust Code §§ 503 and 504, cmt. to subsection b. Comments to the Restatement also suggest that the necessities rule, while consistent with prior trust Restatements, is not followed in some U.S. jurisdictions. In these jurisdictions, the hospital cannot reach the son's interest in the trust in satisfaction of its claim.

In jurisdictions that follow the necessities doctrine as applied to a spendthrift clause, the hospital's claim is not barred by the spendthrift clause. But because distributions from the trust are discretionary, the hospital will not be able to reach the son's interest unless the trustee abused his discretion. Here, there is a strong argument that the trustee abused his discretion, thus allowing the hospital to reach the son's interest and obtain some payment from the trustee. See Point Two.

The friend should not succeed in his suit against the trustee. The friend's claim is not a claim for support, and here, the facts cannot support an assertion that a $5,000 computer-gaming system is a "necessary" for the son.

CRIMINAL LAW & PROCEDURE ANALYSIS

CRM (II.A., B., D.; IV.B.1.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does someone who unlawfully enters the dwelling of another commit burglary when the purpose of the entry was to retrieve property that the person owns?
- (2)(a) Does someone who sells property that has been temporarily entrusted to him by its owner commit the crime of larceny when he acts without authorization and with the intention of depriving the owner of his property?
- (2)(b) Does someone who sells property that has been temporarily entrusted to him by its owner commit the crime of embezzlement when he acts without authorization and with the intention of depriving the owner of his property?
- (3) Does a purchaser of property commit the crime of receiving stolen property when the surrounding circumstances suggest that a reasonable person should have been alerted to the fact that the property she received was stolen?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Ben, who intended only to retrieve his own painting from the neighbor's house, did not have an intent to commit a felony therein. Therefore, he should not be charged with burglary.

The facts do not support a charge of larceny against Ben for his acts in connection with the print. Larceny is typically defined under the common law as the misappropriation of another's property by means of taking it from his possession without his consent. With respect to the print, Ben did not take it from its owner without his consent. To the contrary, the neighbor voluntarily loaned the print to Ben. Ben's subsequent sale of the print, while wrongful, was not larceny.

On the other hand, Ben may be charged with the theft crime of embezzlement for his acts in connection with the print. A person in lawful possession of another's property commits embezzlement when he wrongfully converts the property with the intent to deprive the owner of it. Ben's sale of the print to the art dealer constituted an embezzlement because Ben's intent was to permanently deprive the neighbor of the print.

Whether the art dealer should be charged with receiving stolen property for her acts in connection with the print depends on whether there is sufficient evidence that she knew the print was stolen. The crime of receiving stolen property typically has two elements: (1) the actus reus of the receipt of stolen property and (2) the simultaneous mens rea of the defendant's knowledge that the property was stolen. Here, the art dealer “received” the print when she took physical possession of it following the sale by Ben. The central question is whether the art dealer satisfies the mens rea requirement of knowledge that the print was stolen. Proof of the requisite knowledge can be inferred from the surrounding circumstances, including (1) the low price; (2) Ben’s statement to the art dealer, “I can sell this print to you at such a good price only because I shouldn’t have it at all”; (3) the art dealer’s failure to investigate the provenance of the print; (4) the fact that the art dealer contacted, on the same day she acquired the print, a foreign art collector famously uninterested in exploring the ownership history of his acquisitions; and (5) the sale of the print by the art dealer to the collector for 10 times what she had paid for it. Given these circumstances, the art dealer likely had knowledge that the print was stolen.

Point One (20%)

Ben should not be charged with burglary based on his attempt to recover the painting because he did not act with the necessary mens rea.

At common law, burglary was defined as the “breaking and entering of the dwelling house of another in the night with the intent to commit a felony” therein. See Wayne R. LaFare, Criminal Law, Chapter 21: Real Property Crimes § 21.1 (5th ed. 2010).

Ben’s acts clearly satisfy three of the elements of burglary as defined by the common law and in statutes based on the common law: (1) Ben illegally entered the neighbor’s home by using force to push open the neighbor’s ground-floor window and starting to climb inside; (2) the neighbor’s house is a “dwelling,” a “structure,” or an “occupied structure” (it would even satisfy the common law requirement of a “dwelling”); and (3) Ben’s acts occurred at night.

Here, the only question is whether Ben satisfies the mens rea requirement. The evidence suggests that Ben did not intend to commit a felony in the neighbor’s home because he intended only to retrieve his own painting. On these facts, Ben should not be charged with burglary.

Point Two(a) (20%)

Ben should not be charged with the theft crime of larceny of the print because he did not take possession of the print without the neighbor’s consent with the intent to steal it from the neighbor.

The crime of “theft” was traditionally three separate crimes: larceny, embezzlement, and false pretenses. See LaFare, supra, Chapter 19: Theft § 19.1. Here, Ben should not be charged with larceny, although he should be charged with embezzlement (see Point Three).

At common law, larceny was defined as the misappropriation of another’s personal property by means of taking it from his possession without his consent. See id. Larceny requires an intent to steal. See Binnie v. State, 583 A.2d 1037, 1041–42 (Md. Ct. App. 1991) (noting that intent to steal not established by the defendant’s honest belief, even if such belief was mistaken, that the property belonged to him). Moreover, under the common law, the intent to retain property temporarily and then return it to its rightful owner has long provided a defense to larceny. See, e.g., Impson v. State, 58 P.2d 523, 524 (Ariz. 1936).

Here, Ben should not be charged with larceny because (a) he did not take the print from the neighbor without the neighbor's consent, and (b) there are no facts showing that he had the requisite intent to steal when he took the print from the neighbor. It was the neighbor who had proposed swapping the artworks. Thus, when Ben took possession of the neighbor's print he had the neighbor's permission to take it, and there are no facts supporting an inference that Ben intended to steal it from the neighbor at that time.

Point Two(b) (30%)

Ben should be charged with the theft crime of embezzlement because his sale of the neighbor's print to the art dealer was a wrongful conversion of that property done with the intent to permanently deprive the neighbor of his property.

To cover the case where someone in lawful possession of another person's property wrongfully misappropriates such property, the English parliament and U.S. legislatures developed the theft crime of embezzlement. Although precise statutory definitions vary, embezzlement generally occurs when a person unlawfully converts property owned by another to his own use with the intent to permanently deprive the lawful owner of the property. LaFave, supra, § 19.6.

Here, Ben should be charged with embezzlement. The neighbor loaned the print to Ben so that Ben could hang it in his living room temporarily. See id. § 19.6(e). When Ben, in a fit of anger following his arrest, sold the print to the art dealer, he wrongfully converted the neighbor's property. Ben's actions suggest strongly that he acted with the requisite intent to permanently deprive the neighbor of the print.

Point Three (30%)

The art dealer probably should be charged with receiving stolen property because the surrounding circumstances suggest that she had the requisite knowledge that the print was stolen.

Receiving stolen property typically has two elements: (1) the actus reus of the receipt of stolen property and (2) the simultaneous mens rea of knowledge that the property was stolen. Most jurisdictions include the further requirement that the defendant intend to deprive the owner of her property. LaFave, supra, § 20.2. "Stolen property" typically includes property unlawfully obtained using larceny, embezzlement, or false pretenses, because "it is inappropriate to make the liability of the receiver turn on the method by which the original thief acquired the property." See id. at n. 57 (quoting Model Penal Code § 223.6, comment at 241).

Here, the facts support charging the art dealer with receiving stolen property. The art dealer "received" the print. Assuming that Ben embezzled the print, see Point Two(b), it would constitute stolen property.

The central question is therefore whether the facts establish that the art dealer had the requisite mens rea of knowledge that the print was stolen. Normally, a person is not guilty of receiving stolen property unless the person knew it was stolen “at the moment of receiving it.” State v. Caveness, 78 N.C. 484, 491 (1878); subsequent discovery that property is stolen is not sufficient. But see State v. Post, 286 N.W.2d 195, 202–03 (Iowa 1979) (subsequent knowledge is enough when crime is defined not as “receiving” stolen property but as “exercising control over” stolen property).

Some jurisdictions require proof of a defendant’s actual subjective knowledge that the property was stolen. See Sonnier v. State, 849 S.W.2d 828 (Tex. App. 1992). In those jurisdictions, evidence that a reasonable person would have known that the property was stolen will not suffice. See Gibson v. State, 643 N.E.2d 885 (Ind. 1994).

Other jurisdictions follow the modern view in which mens rea can be inferred from all surrounding circumstances. See LaFave, supra, § 20.2, n. 71 (citing United States v. Prazak, 623 F.2d 152 (10th Cir. 1980) (noting that a low price can support the inference that the purchaser knew the property was stolen); United States v. Werner, 160 F.2d 438 (2d Cir. 1947) (same); State v. Butler, 450 P.2d 128 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1969) (same); State v. Chester, 707 So. 2d 973 (La. 1997) (same); Russell v. State, 583 P.2d 690, 699 (Wyo. 1978) (thieves “must rid themselves of stolen property as quickly as possible, and willingness to sell at a grossly reduced price betrays or should betray such a predicament”).)

The art dealer probably should be charged with receiving stolen property. Under the modern view, or even in a jurisdiction that requires proof of subjective knowledge, the art dealer’s mens rea of knowledge can be inferred from (1) the low price; (2) Ben’s statement to the art dealer: “I can sell this print to you at such a good price only because I shouldn’t have it at all”; (3) the art dealer’s failure to investigate the provenance of the print; (4) the fact that the art dealer contacted, on the same day she acquired the print, a foreign art collector famously uninterested in exploring the ownership history of his acquisitions; and (5) the sale of the print by the art dealer to the collector for 10 times what she had paid for it. Given these circumstances, the art dealer likely had knowledge that the print was stolen.

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2019 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Civil Procedure question on the February 2019 MEE tested the following areas from the Civil Procedure outline: I.A. Jurisdiction and venue—Federal subject matter jurisdiction (federal question, diversity, supplemental, and removal); and B. Personal jurisdiction.

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by user jurisdictions as part of the bar examination on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Areas of law that may be covered on the MEE include the following: Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Civil Procedure, Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts (including Article 2 [Sales] of the Uniform Commercial Code), Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Article 9 (Secured Transactions) of the Uniform Commercial Code. Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles. Examinees in non-UBE jurisdictions should answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

QUESTION 1—DECEDENTS' ESTATES / CONFLICT OF LAWS

Testator's handwritten and signed will provided, in its entirety,

I am extremely afraid of flying, but I have to fly to City for an urgent engagement. Given that I might die on the trip to City, I write to convey my wish that my entire estate be distributed, in equal shares, to my son John and his delightful wife of many years if anything should happen to me.

January 4, 2010

Testator

When Testator wrote the will, he was domiciled in State A, and his son John was married to Martha, whom he had married in 2003. Testator had known Martha and her parents for many years, and Testator had introduced Martha to John. At the time John and Martha married, Martha was a widow with two children, ages five and six. Following their wedding, John and Martha raised Martha's children together, although John never adopted them.

Two years ago, Martha was killed in an automobile accident.

Six months ago, John married Nancy.

Four months ago, Testator died while domiciled in State B. All of his assets were in State B. The handwritten will of January 4, 2010, was found in Testator's bedside table. Testator was survived by his sons, John and Robert, and John's wife Nancy. Testator was also survived by Martha's two children, who have continued to live in John's home since Martha's death.

State A does not recognize holographic wills. State B, on the other hand, recognizes "wills in a testator's handwriting so long as the will is dated and subscribed by the testator."

Statutes in both State A and State B provide that "if a beneficiary under a will predeceases the testator, the deceased beneficiary's surviving issue take the share the deceased beneficiary would have taken unless the will expressly provides otherwise."

How should Testator's estate be distributed? Explain.

QUESTION 2—CRIMINAL LAW & PROCEDURE

On February 1, a woman began serving a 60-day sentence in the county jail for operating a motor vehicle under the influence of alcohol. On February 4, a detective from the county sheriff's department took the woman from her cell to an interrogation room in the jail building. He informed her that she was a suspect in a homicide investigation and that he wanted to ask her some questions. The detective then read the woman the state's standard Miranda warnings:

You have the right to remain silent. Anything you say can be used against you in court.
You have the right to an attorney. If you cannot afford an attorney, one will be appointed for you. If you decide that you wish to speak with us, you may change your mind and stop the questioning at any time. You may also ask for a lawyer at any time.

The detective asked the woman if she understood these rights. When she replied, "Yes, and I want a lawyer," questioning ceased immediately, and she was returned to her cell.

On March 15, the detective removed the woman from her cell and took her back to the same interrogation room. The detective told her that he wanted to ask her questions about the homicide because he had new information about her involvement. The detective read her the same Miranda warnings he had read on February 4 and asked her whether she understood her rights. She said, "Yes."

The woman then asked the detective, "If I ask you to get me a lawyer, how long until one gets here?" The detective replied as follows:

We have no way of getting you a lawyer immediately, but one will be appointed for you, if you wish, if and when you go to court. We don't know when that will happen. If you wish to answer questions now without a lawyer present, you have the right to stop answering questions at any time. You also have the right to stop answering questions until a lawyer is present.

The detective's statement accurately characterized the procedure for appointment of counsel. The woman then said, "I might need a lawyer." The detective responded, "That's your call, ma'am."

After a few minutes of silence, the woman took a Miranda waiver form from the detective and checked the boxes indicating that the rights had been read to her, that she understood them, and that she wished to waive her rights and answer questions. She then signed the form. After the detective began to question her, she confessed to the homicide.

The woman was charged with murder in state court. Her lawyer filed a motion to suppress the woman's March 15 statements to the detective, alleging three violations of her Miranda rights by the detective:

- (1) Interrogating the woman on March 15 after she had invoked her Miranda right to counsel on February 4.

(2) Incorrectly conveying to the woman her Miranda right to counsel by the statements he made on March 15.

(3) Interrogating the woman on March 15 after she had invoked her Miranda right to counsel on March 15.

This state affords a criminal defendant no greater rights than those mandated by the U.S. Constitution.

After an evidentiary hearing, the trial court denied the motion to suppress on all three grounds raised by defense counsel.

Did the court err? Explain.

QUESTION 3—CORPORATIONS & LLCs

Parent Inc., a company in the renewable energy business, has several subsidiaries. In all cases, Parent maintains control of its subsidiaries by selecting the members of each subsidiary's board of directors, most of whom also serve as officers and employees of Parent.

One of the subsidiaries, HomeSolar Inc. (incorporated in a jurisdiction that has adopted a version of the Model Business Corporation Act), was acquired three years ago by Parent. Parent owns 80% of HomeSolar's voting shares, with the remaining shares publicly traded on a national stock exchange. HomeSolar manufactures and sells products exclusively for the residential solar power market.

Another subsidiary, IndustrialSolar Inc., is wholly owned by Parent and manufactures products exclusively for the industrial solar power market.

A shareholder of HomeSolar, after making a proper demand on the board to which the board failed to timely respond, brought a derivative suit against Parent, as the controlling shareholder of HomeSolar, making the following allegations:

(1) HomeSolar has not paid dividends since being acquired by Parent three years ago. In SEC filings, HomeSolar has explained that its no-dividend policy provides funds for its research and development budget as it seeks to develop new products for the residential solar power market in which it operates. Nonetheless, HomeSolar has more than adequate earnings and was obligated to pay dividends to its shareholders.

(2) Since acquiring HomeSolar, Parent has caused HomeSolar to purchase the "rare earth" minerals necessary for the manufacture of its residential solar panels from SolarMaterials Corp., a wholly owned subsidiary of Parent. SolarMaterials was created for the purpose of acquiring such minerals and reselling them to the various renewable energy subsidiaries of the Parent group. The long-term contract under which HomeSolar purchases rare earth minerals from SolarMaterials, however, sets prices significantly higher than the current market prices under similar long-term contracts for such minerals.

(3) After Parent learned about a large government grant to develop industrial-scale solar projects, Parent caused IndustrialSolar to apply for and secure this grant, denying HomeSolar the opportunity to obtain this grant.

1. Did Parent breach any duties to HomeSolar with respect to HomeSolar's no-dividend policy? Explain.
2. Did Parent breach any duties to HomeSolar with respect to HomeSolar's contract with SolarMaterials for the purchase of rare earth minerals? Explain.
3. Did Parent breach any duties to HomeSolar by denying HomeSolar the opportunity to apply for the government grant? Explain.

QUESTION 4—CONTRACTS

On March 1, a contractor and an owner of movie theaters signed an agreement providing that, no later than August 15, the contractor would install seats in the owner's new movie theater. The agreed-upon price was $100,000, which was less than the $150,000 that other similar contractors would charge for the same work. The agreement required that the owner pay the contractor half the price at the time the work commenced and the other half at completion. The contractor was willing to do the work for less money than its competitors because the contractor was new to the area and hoped to build up a positive reputation.

The agreement further provided that the contractor would start work no later than July 1. On July 1, before beginning the agreed-upon work, the contractor informed the owner that it would not perform its obligations under the agreement because it had obtained a more lucrative installation contract elsewhere. At that point, no payments had been made to the contractor.

The installation of the seats was the last step necessary for the theater to open to the public. The owner, which had anticipated that the contractor would install the seats by the August 15 deadline, had planned and widely promoted a film festival for September 1–10 to celebrate the opening of the new movie theater.

Immediately after learning that the contractor would not install the seats, the owner began to look for a substitute contractor. Despite diligent efforts, the owner could not find a contractor that would agree to install the seats by August 15. Eventually, after an extensive search, the owner found a substitute contractor that agreed to install the seats for $150,000 by September 15. No other contractor could be found who would agree to install the seats at a lower price or before September 15.

Installation of the seats was completed on September 15, the substitute contractor was paid $150,000, and the theater opened a few days later. Because the theater had no seats at the time of the film festival scheduled for September 1–10, the owner canceled the festival.

The owner sued the original contractor for breach of contract, and the parties agreed to a non-jury trial. The judge has concluded that the contractor's actions with respect to the seat-installation agreement constituted a breach of contract by the contractor. In addition, the judge has made the following findings of fact:

- The contractor was unaware that the owner was planning to hold a film festival when it entered into the contract.
- The owner would have made a profit of $35,000 if the seats had been installed in the new movie theater and the film festival had been presented there as scheduled on September 1–10.
- The owner could have relocated the film festival to a nearby college auditorium that was available September 1–10 and, if this had occurred, the owner would have made a profit of $25,000.

1. Do the damages recoverable by the owner include $50,000 for the amount paid to the substitute contractor above the $100,000 price to be paid to the original contractor under the contract? Explain.
2. May the owner recover for lost profits resulting from the cancellation of the film festival? Explain.
3. Assuming that the owner is entitled to recover for lost profits resulting from the cancellation of the film festival, how much should the owner recover? Explain.

QUESTION 5—FAMILY LAW

Twelve years ago, Wendy and Frank were married in State A. One year later, their daughter, Danielle, was born in State A. The couple and their daughter have continued to live in State A.

One year ago, Frank lost his job as a steelworker after suffering a serious back injury. Frank's doctor has said that he will not be able to return to work.

One month ago, Frank filed an action against Wendy seeking spousal support. Frank filed the action after Wendy, a commercial airline pilot whose work frequently necessitates her absence from home, stopped depositing her wages into the couple's joint bank account and refused to pay household bills. Frank's unemployment insurance is inadequate to pay all the household bills.

Danielle's school recently sent her parents a note indicating that Danielle will not be allowed to enroll in school next year unless the parents provide proof of her vaccination. Frank, based on his personal, nonreligious beliefs, has consistently refused to allow Danielle to receive any vaccinations. Danielle does not satisfy the requirements for a medical exemption. State A has amended its mandatory vaccination law by eliminating all nonmedical exemptions based on "personal beliefs." As amended, the law requires, as a precondition to a child's enrollment in any public school, that "the child's parent or guardian must provide proof that the child has received all vaccinations mandated by the State Department of Health." Frank has brought an action challenging the State A vaccination law under the U.S. Constitution as a violation of his parental rights.

Two weeks ago, Danielle, age 11, with her parents' permission, went to visit her aunt in State B. One week into the visit, the aunt called Frank and Wendy and told them that Danielle did not want to return to her parents' home because "Mom is always traveling, Dad is really depressed since his back injury, and I just can't stand living there anymore." The aunt told Frank and Wendy that "I can't in good conscience send her home, so I'm immediately going to court to seek legal custody."

1. May Frank obtain spousal support from Wendy? Explain.
2. Will Frank's constitutional challenge prevail? Explain.
3. In what state must the aunt file a custody petition? Explain.
4. Is the court likely to grant legal custody of Danielle to her aunt? Explain.

QUESTION 6—CIVIL PROCEDURE / CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

Trident Healthcare Inc., incorporated in State X, owns and operates hospitals and clinics in States X, Y, and Z. Medical information for all of Trident’s current and former patients is stored on computer equipment housed at Trident’s corporate headquarters in State X.

Last December, unknown persons hacked into Trident’s computer system and obtained the personal medical information of at least 30,000 Trident patients, including 5,000 patients living in State X, 10,000 patients living in State Y, and 15,000 patients living in State Z. However, there is no evidence that the thieves have used any of this medical information.

The State X Privacy Protection Act imposes an absolute duty on health-care providers, including companies like Trident, to keep patient medical information private. The legislature concluded that the “invasion of privacy” resulting from data breaches causes significant harm to the individuals involved. Thus, the law allows any person whose private medical information is obtained by an unauthorized third party in any manner to recover actual damages from the health-care provider. Further, because such damages are sometimes difficult to quantify, the state law provides that an individual is entitled to a minimum statutory (nominal) damages award of $500 to compensate for this “invasion of privacy.” This state law is not preempted by any federal law.

A man, who is a citizen of State X and whose medical records were stored in the Trident computers, has brought a class action in the federal district court of State X against Trident on behalf of himself and all the persons whose health-care information was taken during the hacking of Trident’s computer system. The man is represented by counsel with extensive experience in class actions of this type. The complaint is limited to claims arising out of the hacking of medical information. It seeks no actual damages but does seek statutory damages on behalf of all members of the class pursuant to the State X statute. The complaint alleges the facts detailed above and alleges that the court has jurisdiction based on diversity, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1332. The complaint also alleges that most if not all of Trident’s patients are U.S. citizens who are domiciled in the states where they receive their health care.

State X’s legislatively adopted Civil Practice Rules provide that “if any statute or law of this state allows for an award of statutory or nominal damages, recovery of such damages may be sought in an individual action but not in a class action.”

Trident has moved to dismiss the man’s class action brought in federal district court, arguing that (i) the court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction over the state-law claim raised by the class action, (ii) the action fails to allege a claim upon which relief can be granted because of the state law barring class actions to recover statutory damages, and (iii) the man does not have standing to bring a statutory damages claim in federal court.

With respect to each of these arguments, how should the court rule? Explain.

ANALYSIS 1—DECEDENTS' ESTATES / CONFLICT OF LAWS

This July 2019 analysis for the MEE was provided to bar examiners to assist in grading the examination. It addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses were expected to be. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does the law of State A or State B determine whether Testator's holographic will is valid?
- (2) Is Testator's holographic will valid under the law of State B?
- (3) Was Testator's will contingent on his dying during his trip to City?
- (4) Was Martha or Nancy the intended beneficiary of Testator's bequest to John's "delightful wife of many years"?
- (5) Assuming that Martha is the intended beneficiary of the bequest to John's wife, are her children entitled to take Martha's share under the State B anti-lapse statute?
- (6) Assuming the will is valid, is Robert entitled to any share of the Testator's estate?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The law of Testator's domicile at death (here, State B) determines the validity of his will. Thus, Testator's will is valid because it is in Testator's handwriting, it is dated, and it is "subscribed" (i.e., signed by Testator at the end). Testator's will was not contingent on his dying while flying to City because the evidence shows that the text of the will reflects Testator's motive for writing a will rather than stating a condition precedent to its operation. A will is typically construed as of a testator's death; here, Nancy was John's wife at Testator's death. But Testator's use of the phrase "delightful wife of many years," plus the other facts, strongly suggests that his intention was to benefit a specific individual, namely Martha. Thus, a court is likely to find that Martha was the intended beneficiary of Testator's bequest to "[John's] delightful wife of many years." Under State B's broad anti-lapse statute, Martha's children would take Martha's share.

Thus, Testator's estate will be distributed according to the will as follows: one half to his son John and the other half in equal shares to Martha's two children. Neither Testator's son Robert nor John's wife Nancy will take anything.

Nevertheless, if the will is valid, Robert could be entitled to a share of the estate if he was born after the will was signed in 2010. No facts tell us when he was born, but from the surrounding facts it appears most likely he was living in 2010.

Point One (10%)

The law of a testator's domicile at the time of the testator's death determines the validity of the testator's will. Thus, State B's law controls the validity of Testator's will.

At common law, the validity of a testator's will was determined under the law of the state where the testator was domiciled at the time of his death. See Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws § 314; In re Barrie's Estate, 35 N.W.2d 658 (Iowa 1949). Thus, under the common law, State B law controls the validity of Testator's will.

Under the Uniform Probate Code (UPC), a will is valid if it complies either with the law of the state in which it was executed or with the law of the place where the testator was domiciled when he signed his will or when he died. Unif. Probate Code § 2-506. Many non-UPC states have similar statutes. See, e.g., Iowa Code § 633.283. Testator's will is valid under this statutory approach because it was valid under the law of State B, the state of Testator's domicile at death.

[NOTE: The following MEE jurisdictions have enacted the Uniform Probate Code: Arizona, Colorado, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Nebraska, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah, and Wisconsin.]

Point Two (10%)

Testator's will was validly executed because it was in Testator's handwriting, it was dated, and it was subscribed by Testator.

State B law provides that a will is valid if it is "in a testator's handwriting so long as the will is dated and subscribed by the testator." Courts have held that when a statute requires a will to be subscribed, the testator's signature must appear at the end of the will. See Matter of Estate of Rowell, 585 So. 2d 731 (Miss. 1991); Matter of Estate of Reed, 625 P.2d 447 (Kan. 1981). See also Matter of Estate of Wedeberg, 589 N.E.2d 1000 (Ill. App. 1992) (will not "signed" when testator's name appeared at the top of the will).

Here, Testator's will met the statutory requirements of State B: the will was in Testator's handwriting, it was dated, and it was signed by Testator at the end.

Point Three (15%)

Most likely, Testator's will was not contingent on his death during travel to City because the facts support the conclusion that Testator's statement described his motive for writing the will rather than a condition to its operation.

In determining whether a will is conditional or contingent, "[a] court must first determine 'whether the happening of the possibility referred to is a condition . . . to the operation of the will, or whether the possibility of the happening was only a statement of the motive or inducement which led to the preparation and execution of the instrument.”” In re Estate of Franklin, 2001 WL 896635 (Tenn. Ct. App., Aug. 9, 2001). A number of factors can be considered in resolving this issue, including where the will was kept after the purported condition lapsed, whether there were any other testamentary documents, whether setting aside the will would result in intestacy, and whether effectuating the terms of the document would result in an inequitable distribution. Id. See also Estate of Martin, 635 N.W.2d 473 (S.D. 2001).

Here, two facts support the conclusion that Testator’s words—“I am extremely afraid of flying, but I have to fly to City for an urgent engagement. Given that I might die on the trip to City, I write to convey my wish that my entire estate be distributed, in equal shares, to my son John and his delightful wife of many years if anything should happen to me.”—merely stated Testator’s motive for executing a will and not a condition precedent that had to occur for the will to be given effect.

First, Testator did not destroy the will after returning from City but kept it in his bedside table until the time of his death many years later.

Second, there are no other known testamentary documents, and if the holographic will were construed as conditional, Testator would die intestate; intestacy would result in a portion of Testator’s estate being distributed to his other son, Robert, a person not mentioned in Testator’s will. This seems inconsistent with Testator’s intentions.

Additionally, it does not seem inequitable to permit Martha’s children to inherit her share of Testator’s estate given that they were being raised by Testator’s son John up to the time of Testator’s death. Testator, who introduced Martha to John and had a long-standing relationship with Martha and her parents, presumably knew the children and knew that his son John was raising them. See Points Four and Five.

Thus, a court will likely find that Testator’s holographic will was not contingent on his dying during his trip to City.

[NOTE: If an examinee were to conclude that the will was conditional, then because the condition did not occur, the will would no longer be valid and Testator would have died intestate. In this case, the estate would pass to Testator’s heirs, John and Robert.]

Point Four (35%)

Because the phrase “delightful wife of many years” is ambiguous, a court will admit extrinsic evidence to determine its meaning, and all relevant evidence suggests that Martha, not Nancy, was the intended beneficiary under Testator’s will.

Testator left his estate in equal shares to his son John and John’s “delightful wife of many years.” Testator did not mention John’s wife by name in the will. Because Martha died and John later married Nancy, it is ambiguous as to which wife Testator referred to in his will.

Wills are generally construed as of the time of the testator’s death. Under this approach, the phrase “delightful wife of many years,” if it were not ambiguous, could be construed in favor of John’s wife at the time of Testator’s death, i.e., Nancy. See William M. McGovern, Jr. &

Sheldon F. Kurtz, Wills, Trusts and Estates § 6.1 (3d ed. 2004). However, in light of the phrase “of many years,” there is clearly an ambiguity in the will in that John and Nancy, in fact, have not been married “for many years,” whereas John and Martha had been.

When a will is ambiguous, courts allow extrinsic evidence to resolve the ambiguity. To resolve ambiguities, the facts and circumstances surrounding the execution of the will may be taken into account. See id. As noted above, a court would likely find that the phrase “delightful wife of many years” is ambiguous because Nancy and John had been married for only a few months when Testator died, whereas John and Martha had been married for seven years when the will was executed in 2010. Furthermore, the fact that Testator introduced Martha to John and had a long-standing prior connection to her and her parents suggests that Testator was referring to Martha when he used the phrase “delightful wife of many years” and was not using the word “wife” in a generic sense. Because the evidence suggests that Testator meant Martha specifically when he left a portion of his estate to John’s “delightful wife of many years,” a court is likely to rule that Martha, not Nancy, is the intended beneficiary.

Point Five (20%)

Martha’s children will take Martha’s share of Testator’s estate under the State B anti-lapse statute.

Under the common law, a bequest to a beneficiary who predeceased the testator failed. See McGovern & Kurtz, supra, § 8.3. All states have abandoned the common law rule by enacting so-called anti-lapse statutes. Anti-lapse statutes, when applicable, typically substitute a deceased beneficiary’s issue as the beneficiaries of the bequest to the deceased beneficiary. The typical anti-lapse statute extends anti-lapse protection only to blood relatives of the testator. See, e.g., Unif. Probate Code § 2-603. State B, however, has a very broad anti-lapse statute, which provides that “if a beneficiary under a will predeceases the testator, the deceased beneficiary’s surviving issue take the share the deceased beneficiary would have taken unless the will expressly provides otherwise.” Under this statute, Martha’s children take the share to which Martha would have been entitled had she survived Testator, assuming that the court finds that Martha is the intended beneficiary. (See Point Four.)

[NOTE: One of the most important skills a minimally competent lawyer should have is the ability to read and apply a statute. A purpose of Point Five is to test examinees’ ability to read a statute, and for this purpose, we have given them an uncommon anti-lapse statute.]

Point Six (10%)

Robert could be entitled to an omitted child’s share only if he had been born after Testator’s will was signed in 2010. There are no facts that state when Robert was born.

All states have a statute providing a forced share of an estate for a child who was born after the will was signed but was not provided for in the will. These statutes vary, however, on the size of that omitted child’s share. See generally UPC § 2-302.

Robert would qualify for this share if he was born after Testator’s will was signed in 2010. The facts do not provide us with information as to when he was born, so whether he is entitled to that share is unclear. However, it is more likely than not that Robert was living when Testator signed his will given the other facts in the problem.

[NOTE: An important lawyering skill is knowing when the lawyer needs more facts to answer a legal problem. Here the question asks how Testator's estate should be distributed, and an important fact to know in order to properly answer that question is when Robert was born.]

ANALYSIS 2—CRIMINAL LAW & PROCEDURE

This July 2019 analysis for the MEE was provided to bar examiners to assist in grading the examination. It addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses were expected to be. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

Did the detective violate the woman's rights by

- (1) interrogating the woman on March 15 after she had invoked her right to counsel under Miranda on February 4;
- (2) incorrectly conveying to the woman her Miranda right to counsel by the statements he made on March 15; or
- (3) interrogating the woman on March 15 after she had invoked her right to counsel under Miranda on March 15?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The woman invoked her Miranda right to counsel on February 4 when she said, "I want a lawyer." At that point, the detective was required to cease interrogation or provide an opportunity for the woman to obtain counsel. This restriction on interrogation, however, does not continue in perpetuity.

Here, following the woman's invocation, the detective properly ended the custodial interrogation on February 4. There is no indication that the detective and the woman had any further contacts until March 15. This was sufficient time to terminate the detective's obligation to honor the woman's February 4 invocation of the right to counsel. Therefore, it was not a violation of the woman's Miranda rights for the detective to wait more than a month, repeat the Miranda warnings, obtain a waiver, and engage in custodial interrogation on March 15. The fact that the woman remained in jail from February 4 through March 15 does not mean that she was in "custody" during this time for Miranda purposes.

On March 15, the detective properly read the woman the state's standard Miranda warnings. The detective's subsequent statement describing the procedures for obtaining counsel did not undermine the reasonable conveyance to the woman of her Miranda rights.

On March 15, the woman did not invoke her right to counsel when she said, "I might need a lawyer." This was not a "clear and unequivocal request" for counsel. Faced with an ambiguous or equivocal statement, the detective was not required to (1) cease questioning the woman or (2) take any further action to determine whether the woman wanted counsel present.

Thus, the court did not err in denying the woman's motion to suppress on any of the grounds raised by the woman's lawyer.

Point One (40%)

The woman's invocation of her Miranda right to counsel on February 4 did not prevent the detective from interrogating her on March 15.

If a suspect clearly and unequivocally invokes her right to counsel after being informed of her Miranda rights, the police must cease the custodial interrogation. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 474 (1966). After invocation, counsel must be provided before a suspect can be questioned unless the suspect (1) initiates contact with law enforcement, (2) is given a fresh set of Miranda warnings, and (3) executes a knowing and intelligent waiver. Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477, 484–85 (1981). However, in Maryland v. Shatzer, 559 U.S. 98 (2010), the Court held that cessation of custodial interrogation for 14 days terminated the Edwards requirements. Thus, after 14 days, law enforcement may approach a suspect who has previously invoked the right to counsel and (assuming new Miranda warnings and a valid waiver) reinstate custodial interrogation even without a lawyer present.

Here, assuming that the woman was undergoing custodial interrogation, she invoked her right to counsel and was returned to her cell on February 4, more than five weeks before the detective's March 15 interrogation. Assuming that Miranda was fully complied with on March 15 (see Point Two), the woman's February 4 invocation of the right to counsel had terminated by March 15.

Finally, this analysis is not affected by the fact that the woman remained in jail from February 4 through March 15. In Maryland v. Shatzer, supra, the Court held that there are "vast differences between Miranda custody and incarceration pursuant to conviction." The release of a person from interrogation and back into his "normal life" in the general prison population ends the "'inherently compelling pressures' of custodial interrogation. Thus, the lengthy break between the woman's initial invocation of her Miranda right to counsel and her interrogation on March 15 terminated the Edwards requirement, notwithstanding that she was in jail during that time."

The court properly rejected the defense argument.

[NOTE: Custody is an objective, totality-of-the-circumstances test: whether "a reasonable person would have felt he or she was not at liberty to terminate the interrogation and leave." Howes v. Fields, 565 U.S. 499, 509 (2012). The Supreme Court has held that "[n]ot all restraints on freedom of movement amount to custody for purposes of Miranda." Id. More specifically, the Court has found that "when a person who is already serving a term of imprisonment is questioned, . . . the ordinary restrictions of prison life, while no doubt unpleasant, are expected and familiar and thus do not involve the same 'inherently compelling pressures' that are often present when a suspect is yanked from familiar surroundings in the outside world and subjected to interrogation in a police station." Id. at 511. Thus, the woman's ongoing incarceration from February 4 to March 15 should be treated as a break in her custodial interrogation.]

Point Two (30%)

On March 15, the detective properly informed the woman of her right to counsel.

Miranda v. Arizona requires that law enforcement inform a suspect that she has the “right to the presence of an attorney and that if [she] cannot afford an attorney one will be appointed for [her] prior to any questioning if [she] so desires.” 384 U.S. at 479. Miranda does not require perfect adherence to the suggested language in the decision itself. See 384 U.S. at 476. See also California v. Prysock, 453 U.S. 355, 359 (1981) (per curiam); Duckworth v. Eagan, 492 U.S. 195, 202–03 (1989). For example, in Florida v. Powell, 559 U.S. 50 (2010), the Court rejected the defense argument that informing a suspect of “the right to talk to a lawyer before answering any of [their] questions” and “the right to use any of [his] rights at any time [he] want[ed] during th[e] interview,” but failing to inform the suspect of the right to counsel during interrogation violated Miranda. 559 U.S. at 62. Miranda warnings need not be “the clearest possible formulation,” id. at 63; instead they must “reasonably convey to a suspect his rights as required by Miranda.” Id. at 62; Duckworth, 492 U.S. at 203.

Here, the state’s standard Miranda warnings read to the woman on both February 4 and March 15 “reasonably conveyed” her Miranda rights.

However, the question remains: did the detective undermine or alter the Miranda warnings on March 15 when he told the woman:

We have no way of getting you a lawyer immediately, but one will be appointed for you, if you wish, if and when you go to court. We don’t know when that will happen. If you wish to answer questions now without a lawyer present, you have the right to stop answering questions at any time. You also have the right to stop answering questions until a lawyer is present.

Under the relevant constitutional standard, it is clear that the detective did nothing more than inform the woman of the procedure for appointment of counsel in the state. Taken in conjunction with the detective’s March 15 reading of the state’s standard Miranda warnings, this statement did not undermine the reasonable conveyance of Miranda rights. Thus, the court did not err in rejecting the argument that the woman’s statements should be excluded on this basis.

[NOTE: Some examinees might argue that the woman was not in custody when she was questioned on March 15 (or on February 4) and therefore was not entitled to any Miranda warnings at all. In Howes v. Fields, supra, the Supreme Court held that an incarcerated person who was questioned about a crime unrelated to his incarceration was not “in custody” for Miranda purposes when the circumstances of the questioning were not coercive. In that case, the prisoner was told twice that he could return to his cell whenever he wanted; he was not restrained or threatened during interrogation; and the other circumstances were such that, according to the Court, he would have felt free to leave the interrogation. Hence, the Court concluded, Miranda warnings were unnecessary.

There are no facts in this problem from which one could determine whether the March 15 interrogation was custodial and whether Miranda warnings were necessary. Nonetheless, the warnings were given and the problem asks whether they were correctly conveyed. An examinee who notes the possibility that it was not a custodial interrogation and that Miranda warnings were not required should nonetheless consider whether they were given adequately.”]

Point Three (30%)

On March 15, the woman did not invoke her right to counsel when she said, “I might need a lawyer” because this was not a “clear and unequivocal request” for counsel.

The mere mention of the word “lawyer” does not constitute an invocation of the Miranda right to counsel requiring cessation of questioning under Edwards. Invocation of the right to counsel “requires, at a minimum, some statement that can reasonably be construed to be an expression of a desire for the assistance of an attorney.” Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452, 459 (1994), citing McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171, 178 (1991). To “unambiguously request counsel,” a suspect must “articulate [her] desire to have counsel present sufficiently clearly that a reasonable police officer in the circumstances would understand the statement to be a request for an attorney.” Davis, 512 U.S. at 459. In contrast, where a suspect’s request is ambiguous or equivocal, questioning need not cease. An ambiguous request is one that “a reasonable officer in light of the circumstances would have understood only that the suspect might be invoking the right to counsel.” Id. (emphasis in original). When a suspect makes an ambiguous or equivocal request for counsel, officers are not required to attempt to assess “the likelihood that a suspect would wish counsel to be present.” Id.

The woman’s statement, “I might need a lawyer,” on its face, is not an unambiguous invocation of the right to counsel. In addition, the detective’s response—“That’s your call, ma’am”—and the fact that the woman remained silent before signing the waiver form suggests that, at the time of the woman’s statement, she was not asking for a lawyer to be present but was still weighing her options. Under these circumstances, the woman did not invoke her right to counsel, and the court properly rejected the defense argument that the woman’s statements to the detective should be excluded.

[NOTE: Discussion of the woman’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel is not relevant to the problem. The right to counsel under Miranda is a branch of the Fifth Amendment’s “privilege against compelled self-incrimination” law. By contrast, “the Sixth Amendment right does not attach until adversary judicial criminal proceedings commence, such as when a suspect is arraigned or indicted.” Joshua Dressler, Alan C. Michaels, Criminal Procedure Vol. 1: Investigation § 21.03 (6th ed. 2013).]

ANALYSIS 3—CORPORATIONS & LLCs

This July 2019 analysis for the MEE was provided to bar examiners to assist in grading the examination. It addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses were expected to be. ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did Parent breach any duties to HomeSolar with respect to HomeSolar's no-dividend policy?
- (2) Did Parent breach any duties to HomeSolar with respect to HomeSolar's contract with SolarMaterials for the purchase of rare earth minerals?
- (3) Did Parent breach any duties to HomeSolar by denying HomeSolar the opportunity to apply for the government grant?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Controlling shareholders (including parent corporations) generally owe fiduciary duties to their partially owned subsidiaries and may not use their power to benefit themselves at the expense of the subsidiary and its minority shareholders. Here, Parent likely did not violate its fiduciary duties of loyalty and care by causing its subsidiary, HomeSolar, to adopt a no-dividend policy, given that the policy applied equally to all shareholders of HomeSolar and had the purpose of ensuring funding for HomeSolar's research and development budget.

Business dealings by parent corporations with partially owned subsidiaries can be set aside as self-dealing transactions unless approved by a majority of disinterested directors or shareholders or unless, in the absence of such approval, they are judicially determined to be fair. Here, Parent breached its fiduciary duty of loyalty by causing HomeSolar to enter into a long-term contract with SolarMaterials, a wholly owned subsidiary of Parent, at prices significantly higher than current market prices under similar long-term contracts for the minerals. Because Parent selected the entire board of HomeSolar, there are no disinterested directors to approve the transaction. Furthermore, there are no facts to suggest that the minority shareholders of HomeSolar approved the transaction. And, because HomeSolar paid higher than market prices, the transaction cannot satisfy the fairness test. The presumption of the business judgment rule does not apply to this conflict-of-interest transaction. There are no facts indicating that Parent or the directors of HomeSolar breached a duty of care.

Parent did not violate its fiduciary duties by allocating the opportunity to apply for the government grant to its wholly owned subsidiary IndustrialSolar and not to its partially owned subsidiary HomeSolar, given that the grant was for development of industrial solar projects and thus beyond the existing residential business of HomeSolar.

[NOTE: The question involves a corporation incorporated in an MBCA jurisdiction, thus requiring examinees to consider the relevant provisions of the MBCA. The MBCA, however, does not specify the fiduciary duties of controlling shareholders in a publicly traded corporation. Thus, in determining whether Parent breached its duties to HomeSolar and its minority shareholders, the law of the state of incorporation would likely look to general principles of corporate law in a matter of first impression. Given the lack of indication of case law on the point in the jurisdiction of incorporation, an examinee should look to general principles of corporate law, specifically those related to the fiduciary duties of controlling shareholders. General principles of corporate law, including the case law of Delaware, are thus relevant to the analysis of the question.]

Point One (35%)

Parent likely did not violate its fiduciary duties of loyalty and care by causing HomeSolar to institute a no-dividend policy, given that the policy applied equally to all shareholders of HomeSolar and had the purpose of ensuring funding for the company's research and development budget.

The MBCA does not specify the duties of controlling shareholders to a controlled corporation or its minority shareholders. Instead, the duties of controlling shareholders generally arise as a matter of the court's "inherent equity power" to fashion fiduciary duties owed by majority shareholders to minority shareholders. See Official Comment, MBCA § 10.01 (stating that actions by majority shareholders "may be reviewable by a court under its inherent equity power to review transactions for good faith and fair dealing to minority shareholders"), citing McNulty v. W. & J. Sloane, 54 N.Y.S.2d 253 (Sup. Ct. 1945).

Generally, courts have examined business dealings between a controlling shareholder (such as a parent corporation) and the controlled corporation using a fairness test. See Sterling v. Mayflower Hotel Corp., 93 A.2d 107, 109–110 (Del. 1952). But when the transaction does not involve self-dealing (as is the case with respect to dividends payable to all shareholders of the controlled corporation), then the "business judgment" standard applies. See Sinclair Oil Corp. v. Levien, 280 A.2d 717 (Del. 1971); see also Wolfensohn v. Madison Fund, Inc., 253 A.2d 72, 76 (Del. 1969) (holding that overreaching must be shown in a suit against a parent of a subsidiary). That is, the fairness test applies to parent-subsidiary dealings only where the "parent . . . causes the subsidiary to act in such a way that the parent receives something from the subsidiary to the exclusion of, and detriment to, the minority stockholders . . ." Sinclair, 280 A.2d at 720; see generally Lewis H. Lazarus & Brett M. McCartney, Standards of Review in Conflict Transactions on Motions to Dismiss: Lessons Learned in the Past Decade, 36 Del. J. Corp. L. 967, 998–1003 (2011) (concluding that the business judgment rule is standard under Delaware law unless rebutted).

Here, the shareholder challenges the no-dividend policy of HomeSolar instituted by Parent. The no-dividend policy affects the shareholder and all other HomeSolar shareholders (including Parent) equally and thus is not a self-dealing transaction in which Parent receives something to the exclusion of other shareholders.

Parent did not breach any duty of care. Under a “business judgment” standard, it is sufficient if Parent can offer a rational business justification for the no-dividend policy, which it has by explaining that the no-dividend policy is meant to provide funds for HomeSolar’s research and development budget as the subsidiary seeks to develop new products for the residential solar power market. See Note on Business Judgment Rule, MBCA § 8.31 (decisions subject to the business judgment standard “will not be disturbed (by a court substituting its own notions of what is or is not sound business judgment) if they can be attributed to any rational business purpose”), citing Sinclair, 280 A.2d at 720; see also Auerbach v. Bennett, 393 N.E.2d 994, 1000 (N.Y. 1979) (business judgment rule “bars judicial inquiry into actions of corporate directors taken in good faith and in the exercise of honest judgment in the lawful and legitimate furtherance of corporate purposes”).

[NOTE: An examinee who seeks to analyze the question of Parent’s duties to the complaining shareholder under the “oppression” standard created by the involuntary dissolution provisions of the MBCA should not receive credit. See MBCA § 14.30 (a) (calling for the court to order involuntary dissolution for significant abuse of power by controlling shareholders). For one thing, the question asks whether Parent breached any duties to HomeSolar, not whether the court should order involuntary dissolution. For another, an “oppression” claim is “appropriate only for shareholders of corporations that are not widely held.” See Official Comment, MBCA § 14.30 (pointing out that shareholders in a publicly traded corporation, such as one whose shares are listed on the New York Stock Exchange, “will normally have the ability to sell their shares if they are dissatisfied with current management”).]

Point Two (40%)

Given that Parent caused HomeSolar to enter into a contract for the purchase of minerals with Parent’s wholly owned subsidiary SolarMaterials at significantly higher prices than current market prices under similar long-term contracts for the same minerals, Parent engaged in unfair self-dealing and thus breached its duty of loyalty to HomeSolar. The business judgment rule does not apply to this conflict-of interest transaction.

As described above, business dealings between a parent corporation (or its wholly owned subsidiary) and a partially owned subsidiary can involve self-dealing and a breach of the duty of loyalty when the parent causes the partially owned subsidiary to enter into a transaction that prefers the parent (or its wholly owned subsidiary) at the expense of the partially owned subsidiary and its minority shareholders. This breach cannot be cured here because there are no disinterested directors to approve the transaction, as Parent appointed all the directors of HomeSolar, and there is no evidence that the minority shareholders of the partially owned subsidiary approved the transaction. This means that liability can be avoided only if the transaction is judicially determined to be fair.

Generally, the person seeking to justify a self-dealing transaction has the burden of proving its fairness to the corporation. The MBCA has described “fairness,” in connection with directors’ conflicting-interest transactions, to include not only “the market fairness of the terms of the deal—whether it is comparable to what might have been obtainable in an arm’s-length transaction—but also . . . whether the transaction was one that was reasonably likely to yield favorable results (or reduce detrimental results)” for the corporation. Official Comment to MBCA § 8.61 (Comment 6, Fair to the Corporation). Thus, contractual dealings by a partially owned subsidiary (here HomeSolar) with a wholly owned subsidiary (here SolarMaterials) in a corporate group must not only be shown to reflect the terms obtainable in comparable market transactions but must also be shown to be beneficial to the partially owned subsidiary. Here, given that the prices set in the contract between HomeSolar and SolarMaterials were significantly higher than current market prices under similar long-term contracts for the same minerals, Parent cannot establish the fairness of the contract. Thus, Parent breached its fiduciary duty of loyalty to HomeSolar.

[NOTE: The business judgment rule does not apply to conflict-of-interest transactions and thus is no defense to a claim that the defendant breached its duty of loyalty, and no credit should be given to an examinee who seeks to apply the business judgment rule in the context of a discussion of the duty of loyalty.]
