[NOTE: Some examinees may conclude that the self-dealing transaction in this case is subject to “entire fairness” review, which requires a showing of both “fair price” and “fair dealing.” See Kahn v. Lynch Commc’n Sys., Inc., 638 A.2d 1110, 1117 (Del. 1994) (applying “entire fairness” review to parent-subsidiary merger transaction, in which minority shareholders of the subsidiary are forced out of the corporation). However, it is unclear whether the MBCA would apply this heightened standard to typical intra-group corporate dealings not involving a change in control. See MBCA § 13.40(b)(3) & Official Comment (rejecting the “entire fairness” test of Kahn when an interested transaction is approved by both a majority of informed, independent, disinterested directors (or a special board committee) and an informed majority of disinterested shareholders). Thus, an examinee should not receive additional credit for discussing the absence of “fair dealing” in this case where the challenged contract was approved by neither disinterested directors nor disinterested shareholders. Here, the absence of “fair price” is critical to the analysis of this intra-group self-dealing transaction.]

Lastly, there are no facts to indicate that Parent or the directors of HomeSolar breached a duty of care. First, there are no facts indicating that Parent caused the HomeSolar directors to act with a faulty decision-making process. Second, there are no facts indicating that the above-market transaction was “wasteful,” meaning that no reasonable person would have paid those higher prices. There could be any number of reasons why HomeSolar agreed to pay higher prices, and there are no facts indicating that the deliberation processes were faulty.

Point Three (25%)

Parent likely did not violate its fiduciary duties by allocating the opportunity to apply for the government grant to its wholly owned subsidiary IndustrialSolar rather than its partially owned subsidiary HomeSolar, given that the grant was for development of industrial solar projects and thus beyond the residential business of HomeSolar.

The MBCA does not address the duties of controlling shareholders to not usurp corporate opportunities of partially owned corporations. Nonetheless, an official comment to the MBCA explains the corporate opportunity doctrine in connection with the duties of directors:

The corporate opportunity doctrine [applicable to directors] is anchored in a significant body of case law clustering around the core question whether the corporation has a legitimate interest in a business opportunity, either because of the nature of the opportunity or the way in which the opportunity came to the director, of such a nature that the corporation should be afforded prior access to the opportunity before it is pursued (or, to use the case law’s phrase, “usurped”) by a director.

MBCA, Introductory Comment to Subchapter F (Comment 4, Non-Transactional Situations Involving Interest Conflicts – Corporate Opportunity). In a similar vein, the American Law Institute (ALI) Principles of Corporate Governance define a corporate opportunity, for purposes of directors and senior executives, generally as a business opportunity where either “the person offering the opportunity expects it to be offered to the corporation,” the opportunity “would be of interest to the corporation,” or the opportunity is “closely related to a business in which the corporation is engaged or expects to engage.” ALI Principles of Corporate Governance § 505(b); see also Northeast Harbor Golf Club, Inc. v. Harris, 661 A.2d 1146 (Me. 1995) (adopting the ALI Principles approach to corporate opportunities as consistent with the MBCA).

For business opportunities allocated within a corporate group, courts have accepted that the parent should have some leeway in allocating business opportunities within the group. See Sinclair, supra; see also In re Synthes, Inc. S’holder Litig., 50 A.3d 1022, 1040–41 (Del. Ch. 2012) (“the duty to put the best interest of [a partially owned subsidiary] above any interest . . . does not mean that the controller has to subrogate his own interests so that the minority stockholders can get the deal that they want”) (internal quotations omitted).

Here, although HomeSolar might have wanted to receive the government grant, there is no indication that HomeSolar was capable of using the grant to pursue industrial solar projects; instead, the facts indicate that HomeSolar’s line of business is developing residential solar projects. Finally, it is unclear that the government would have given the grant to HomeSolar, as opposed to the wholly owned subsidiary IndustrialSolar.

JULY 2019 MEE
ANALYSIS 4—CONTRACTS

This July 2019 analysis for the MEE was provided to bar examiners to assist in grading the examination. It addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses were expected to be. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Do the damages recoverable by the owner from the original contractor include $50,000 for the additional amount paid to the substitute contractor beyond the $100,000 price to be paid to the original contractor under the contract?
- (2)(a) Can the owner recover from the original contractor as consequential damages lost profits from the canceled film festival even though the contractor was unaware of the owner's plan to hold the film festival?
- (2)(b) Assuming that the owner can recover consequential damages resulting from the canceled film festival, does the owner's failure to reduce those damages by relocating the film festival rather than canceling it result in lower consequential damages?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Damages for breach of contract are typically based on the aggrieved party's expectation interest—how much worse off the aggrieved party is than if the breaching party had fulfilled its obligation under the contract. In this case, the owner would have had to pay the contractor $100,000 to install the seats but, because the contractor breached its contract, had to pay the substitute contractor $150,000 for that task. Thus, the owner is $50,000 worse off than it would have been if the contractor had satisfied its obligation. As a result, the owner's "direct damages" are $50,000.

Whether the owner is also entitled to consequential damages arising from the cancellation of the film festival depends on whether the original contractor had reason to foresee the cancellation as a probable result of its breach. Here, the original contractor did not know about the scheduled film festival, and there is no indication in the facts that the original contractor had reason to know of it. Thus, it is unlikely that the owner will be able to recover damages arising from the cancellation of the film festival.

Even if the original contractor had reason to know of the owner's plans for the film festival, the owner might not be entitled to recover its $35,000 in lost profits as consequential damages. If the college auditorium was a reasonable substitute location for the film festival, the owner could have avoided $25,000 of the $35,000 in lost profits and thus would be entitled to recover only the $10,000 that would have been lost had the film festival been held at the college auditorium. But the college auditorium may not have been a reasonable substitute. An apparent reason for the film festival was to showcase the new theater, and moving the film festival to the college auditorium would not then have been a reasonable substitute, so the fact that the owner did not move the film festival there would not reduce the recovery for lost profits.

Point One (20%)

The owner is entitled to recover expectation damages equal to the difference between the price that the owner paid to the substitute contractor ($150,000) and the price that the owner would have paid the original contractor ($100,000). That is, the owner is entitled to recover $50,000 from the original contractor.

Generally, the party injured by a breach of contract has a right to damages based on the party's expectation interest. Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 347. Such damages are "intended to give him the benefit of his bargain by awarding him a sum of money that will, to the extent possible, put him in as good a position as he would have been in had the contract been performed." Id. cmt. a. Here, the contractor promised to install the seats by August 15 for $100,000 and did not do so. No other contractor could be found who would agree to install the seats by August 15; the substitute contractor, though, agreed to do the installation later for $150,000. Thus, to put the owner, to the extent possible, in as good a position as it would have been in had the contract been performed (the owner would have paid $100,000 and the seats would have been installed) requires an award to the owner of $50,000. This is because use of the substitute contractor resulted in the owner spending $150,000 for seat installation instead of $100,000. Thus, the owner is $50,000 worse off than if the original contractor had performed under the contract, so it will take a payment of $50,000 to the owner to put it in "as good a position as [it] would have been in had the contract been performed."

Point Two(a) (40%)

It is unlikely that the owner is entitled to recover the loss it suffered as a consequence of the cancellation of the film festival (consequential damages). That loss would be recoverable if the original contractor had reason, at the time the contract was made, to foresee it as a probable result of the breach. Inasmuch as the court has found that the contractor was unaware that the owner was planning to hold a film festival when it entered into the contract, the loss would be recoverable only if the original contractor nonetheless had reason to know of the film festival.

In addition to the expectation damages described in Point One, the owner may seek to recover consequential damages arising from the breach. Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 347(b). However, under the rule announced in the landmark case of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, 156 Eng. Rep. 145 (1854), as currently applied in almost every state, such damages are not recoverable for loss that the party in breach did not have reason to foresee as a probable result of the breach when the contract was made. Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 351(1). Loss may be foreseeable as a probable result of a breach if it follows from the breach either in the ordinary course of events or as a result of special circumstances beyond the ordinary course of events that the party in breach had reason to know of. Id. § 351(2).

Here, it is unlikely that a court would conclude that cancellation of a film festival would follow in the ordinary course of events from breach of a contract to install seats in a movie theater by a stated date. Although the contractor likely would have known that general ticket sales would be lost because of the delayed opening, there is nothing in the facts to indicate that film festivals or similar events are usually scheduled immediately following the construction of a movie theater. It might be argued, however, that the original contractor would have reason to know that the owner of a new theater would promote its opening with some sort of special event that could generate significant revenue. Thus, while it might be argued that the loss from the cancellation of the film festival was foreseeable as following from the breach in the ordinary course of events, these facts offer little to support that argument.

[NOTE: New York does not follow the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale. Rather, recovery of consequential damages in New York is limited to liability the defendant fairly may be supposed to have assumed consciously, or to have warranted the plaintiff reasonably to suppose that it assumed, when the contract was made. See Kenford Co. v. County of Erie (Kenford II), 537 N.E.2d 176 (N.Y. 1989). This test, derived from the opinion of Justice Holmes in Globe Ref. Co. v. Landa Cotton Oil Co., 190 U.S. 540 (1903), is often referred to as the “tacit agreement” test. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 351, Reporter’s Note to comment a.]

Point Two(b) (40%)

Even if the cancellation of the film festival was reasonably foreseeable, it is unclear whether the owner would be entitled to recover the $35,000 in lost profits resulting from the cancellation. If holding the film festival at the college auditorium was a reasonable substitute for holding it at the new movie theater, the owner will not be able to recover that portion of the loss that could have been averted by holding the film festival at the college auditorium. If, on the other hand, holding the film festival at the college auditorium was not a reasonable substitute because a primary purpose of the film festival was to showcase the new movie theater, the failure of the owner to relocate the film festival will not reduce the owner’s recovery for lost profits.

In addition to foreseeability, consequential damages can be limited for reasons related to “mitigation” or “avoidability.” As a general rule, a party cannot recover damages for loss that the party could have avoided by reasonable efforts. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 350, comment b. Once a party has reason to know that performance by the other party will not be forthcoming, the party is expected to take such affirmative steps as are appropriate in the circumstances to avoid loss by making substitute arrangements or otherwise. Id. Thus, the amount of loss that the aggrieved party could reasonably have avoided by stopping performance, making substitute arrangements, or otherwise is simply subtracted from the amount that would otherwise have been recoverable as damages. Id. Affirmative steps to avoid loss are not required, however, if they would involve undue risk, burden, or humiliation. Id. § 350(1).

Here, the facts indicate that the owner could have reduced its loss by putting on the film festival at a nearby college auditorium. Because the owner could have avoided some of the loss by moving the festival, it can be argued that the owner cannot recover for the portion of the loss that could have been avoided that way. In that case, the owner would be entitled to recover only the $10,000 lost profits that it would have suffered if it had moved the film festival to the college auditorium. But it might also be argued that a purpose of the film festival was to showcase the new movie theater, in which case moving the festival to another location would not serve this purpose. “Whether an available alternative transaction is a suitable substitute depends on all the circumstances, including the similarity of the performance.” Id. § 350 cmt. e. In that case, holding the film festival at the college auditorium would not have been a reasonable substitute for a film festival at the new theater, and the consequential damages recoverable by the owner would not be reduced by the amount that could have been saved by moving the film festival to the college auditorium.

[NOTE: Sometimes the reduction in consequential damages because the aggrieved party did not take affirmative steps to avoid contractual losses is described as a breach of the party’s “duty to mitigate damages.” This terminology is misleading because that party has no duty to avoid loss; rather, contract law simply provides that the aggrieved party cannot recover losses that could reasonably have been avoided.]

JULY 2019 MEE
ANALYSIS 5—FAMILY LAW

This July 2019 analysis for the MEE was provided to bar examiners to assist in grading the examination. It addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses were expected to be. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) May Frank obtain spousal support from Wendy?
- (2) Will Frank’s constitutional challenge prevail?
- (3) In what state must the aunt file a custody petition?
- (4) Is the court likely to grant legal custody of the daughter, Danielle, to her aunt?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Frank may not obtain a spousal support order against his wife, Wendy. In the absence of a contrary statute, courts typically do not order support in the context of an intact, co-residential marriage.

Although parents have a constitutional right to the care, custody, and control of their children, including the right to make most health-care decisions, the state may, pursuant to its police-power authority, mandate vaccination in order to protect public health. Thus, Frank will not succeed in his action to overturn the state vaccination requirement.

Under the UCCJEA and PKPA, applicable in all states, an initial child-custody action must be brought in a child’s “home state,” i.e., the state where she has lived for the preceding six months. Thus, the aunt’s custody petition must be brought in State A.

It is highly unlikely that a court will grant the aunt’s custody petition. In determining child custody, all states today grant a fit legal parent preference over a nonparent, an approach that is almost certainly mandated under Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000). Although a child’s preference is relevant in a custody contest, Danielle’s desire to live with her aunt should not provide a sufficient basis for an award of custody to the aunt.

Point One (20%)

Because Frank and Wendy are not separated, Frank may not obtain a support order against Wendy.

In all states, marriage establishes a mutual support obligation between spouses. See 41 C.J.S. Husband and Wife § 66. However, the spousal support obligation is limited by the common law doctrine of nonintervention, which disallows judicial intervention in an intact family. Although the case law is sparse, courts have relied on the nonintervention principle to deny a support petition when the couple is living together. See, e.g., McGuire v. McGuire, 59 N.W.2d 336 (Neb. 1953). Thus, until and unless Frank and Wendy separate, a court will not intervene in their private affairs. The fact that Wendy is frequently absent for work-related reasons does not constitute a separation. There is nothing in the facts to suggest that Wendy has moved or even that she has a second residence.

[NOTE: Were Frank to purchase necessary household items on credit, the merchant who extended credit to him might be able to recover from Wendy the value of the goods furnished under the common law necessities doctrine. The necessities doctrine is generally applicable to food, clothing, shelter, and health care. Here, however, there appears to be no merchant who has furnished goods to Frank on credit. Therefore, any discussion of the doctrine of necessities is inapplicable.]

Point Two (30%)

Although a parent's right to the care, custody, and control of his or her child is constitutionally protected, that right does not provide a basis for overturning a state vaccination mandate.

The Supreme Court of the United States has held that the parental right to the care, custody, and control of a child is constitutionally protected under the 14th Amendment. See Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972); Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 65 (2000) (“[W]e have recognized the fundamental right of parents to make decisions concerning the care, custody, and control of their children.”).

However, parental rights are not absolute. “[T]he power of the parent, even when linked to a free exercise claim, may be subject to limitation . . . if it appears that parental decisions will jeopardize the health or safety of the child, or have a potential for significant social burdens.” Yoder, supra, at 233–34. The spread of preventable, contagious illnesses is a “significant social burden.”

Moreover, the Supreme Court has specifically held both that a vaccination mandate is within the state's police power to protect the public health (Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11 (1905)) and that a state may refuse school admission to a student who fails to receive a vaccination as mandated. Zucht v. King, 260 U.S. 174, 176 (1922). Recent challenges to state rules that disallow school attendance by unvaccinated students have thus been summarily dismissed. See Phillips v. City of New York, 775 F.3d 538, 542–44 (2d Cir. 2015) (granting summary judgment to City defendants).

Point Three (20%)

Under both the UCCJEA and PKPA, only a child's “home state” may exercise jurisdiction over an initial child-custody petition. Here, because State A is Danielle's home state, only a State A court may hear the aunt's custody petition.

Under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), which has been adopted in all but one state (Massachusetts), a court may exercise jurisdiction over a petition for child custody only if “this State is the home State of the child on the date of the commencement of the proceeding, or was the home State of the child within six months before the commencement of the proceeding and the child is absent from this State but a parent or person acting as a parent continues to live in this State” and no other state’s courts would have jurisdiction under the above standard or other courts having jurisdiction have declined to exercise it. UCCJEA § 201(a)(1). A “home state” is the state in which the child “lived with a parent or a person acting as a parent for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of a child-custody proceeding.” Id. § 102(7). The “physical presence of, or personal jurisdiction over, a party or a child is not necessary . . . to make a child-custody determination.” Id. at § 201(c).

The federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (PKPA) similarly grants exclusive jurisdiction over a child-custody petition to a child’s “home state.” 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(d). Under the supremacy clause, PKPA takes precedence over any conflicting state law. See, e.g., Murphy v. Woerner, 748 P.2d 749 (Alaska 1988).

Here, Danielle has lived in State A continuously since her birth. She has been present at her aunt’s home in State B for only two weeks. The child’s parents both continue to live in State A. Thus, only a State A court may exercise jurisdiction over the aunt’s custody petition.

[NOTE: The UCCJEA “temporary emergency jurisdiction” provision is not relevant here, as it is applicable only when the child has been “abandoned . . . or is threatened with mistreatment or abuse.” UCCJEA § 204. The mother’s traveling does not constitute abandonment, as she has invariably left the child with the child’s father. There is nothing in the facts to support a claim that the father has not continued to act as his child’s guardian.]

Point Four (30%)

It is highly unlikely that the court will grant the aunt’s petition for custody, given the constitutionally based parental preference.

In all states, when a nonparent seeks to obtain a child’s custody from a fit legal parent, the parent is accorded a preference. See, e.g., People ex rel. Anonymous v. Anonymous, 530 N.Y.S.2d 613, 615 (App. Div. 1988). Although the strength of the preference varies from one state to the next, in Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000), the Supreme Court of the United States implied that such a preference is constitutionally mandated. Troxel involved a state statute under which “[a]ny person” could petition for visitation rights “at any time” and authorized a court to grant such visitation whenever it concluded that “visitation may serve the best interest of the child.” Because the statute was “breathhtakingly broad” and required the court to give “no special weight at all to [a parent’s] . . . determination of her daughter’s best interests,” a plurality of the Court found that it “contravened the traditional presumption that a fit parent will act in the best interest of his or her child.” 530 U.S. at 67–69.

Here, the aunt might argue that Danielle’s desire to live with her is sufficient to overcome the preference in favor of continued parental custody. And in all states, the views of a child who is mature enough to form and express a preference are certainly relevant to a custody determination. Indeed, the wishes of an older child are typically given substantial weight. See Annotation, Child's Wishes as Factor in Awarding Custody, 4 A.L.R.3d 1396 (1965).

However, the child's wishes "are not treated equally in every case":

Sometimes the child's wishes are given controlling effect, while at other times the wishes are disregarded altogether. The circumstances determining what effect, between these two extremes, should be given to a child's wishes in a particular case are, in addition to the comparative effect of objective factors affecting its welfare generally, . . . and in addition to the natural right of the child's parent to have its custody (frequently invoked successfully, at least in the absence of the parent's long-term abandonment of the child to another's custody): the child's age and judgment capacity; the basis for and strength of its preference, generally; the treatment extended to the child by the contestants for its custody; and the wrongful inducement of the child's wishes.

Id. at § 2(a). See also Wanda Ellen Wakefield, Annotation, Desire of Child as to Geographic Location of Residence or Domicile as Factor in Awarding Custody or Terminating Parental Rights, 10 A.L.R.4th 827 (1981).

Although there are a handful of states in which, by statute, the court must defer to the wishes of an older child when choosing between fit parents (see 4 A.L.R.3d, supra), even if State A has such a statute it would not be applicable in this case because the custody contest is between a fit parent and a nonparent.

Here, Wendy's frequent absences from home are work-related, and Frank has been at home and able to provide care at all times. And even if the aunt were to substantiate Danielle's claim that her father is "depressed," the father's mental state does not represent a showing that his care is inadequate or that he is unfit. In sum, because of the preference accorded parents in a custody contest with a nonparent, it is highly unlikely that a court will grant the aunt's custody petition despite Danielle's stated preference.

ANALYSIS 6—CIVIL PROCEDURE / CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

This July 2019 analysis for the MEE was provided to bar examiners to assist in grading the examination. It addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses were expected to be. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does a federal district court have diversity jurisdiction over a class action when (a) the amount in controversy is $15,000,000 and (b) there is no diversity between the defendant and the class representative, though there is diversity between the defendant and other class members?
- (2) Does a state-law rule prohibiting class actions for recovery of statutory damages apply to bar a class action brought in federal court when the state rule is contained in a state statute governing court procedure and is not tied to any particular state-law substantive right?
- (3) Do the members of a plaintiff class have standing to bring a claim in federal court when they cannot prove tangible damage to themselves but do have a claim for statutory damages for violations of privacy rights protected by state law?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Trident’s motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction should be denied. A federal district court can exercise diversity jurisdiction over a class action if the amount in controversy exceeds $5,000,000 and any member of the class is diverse from any defendant (i.e., there is minimal diversity). Here, those requirements are met. Each member of the class is alleged to be entitled to statutory damages of $500 and there are at least 30,000 class members. If the class claims are upheld, total damages will be at least $15,000,000, far in excess of the $5,000,000 required to be in controversy for this kind of action. There is minimal diversity because the defendant is a citizen of State X, while some members of the class live in States Y and Z.

When a claim based on state-law rights is brought in federal court, it is governed by federal procedure law. So federal procedural rules for class actions govern, not State X procedural rules. The federal court is not bound by State X’s law barring class actions to recover statutory damages. Thus, the action should not be dismissed on this basis.

The plaintiff probably has standing to bring the statutory (nominal) damages claim in federal court. The issue is whether the alleged “invasion of privacy” suffered by the plaintiff is an “injury in fact” even though the plaintiff cannot prove any actual damages. Given the state’s determination that data breaches involving private medical information cause harm to individual privacy even when actual damages cannot be shown, it is likely that a federal court would conclude that the invasion of privacy resulting from disclosure of private medical information is sufficiently concrete to warrant a finding of standing.

Point One (35%)

Because the amount in controversy in this class action exceeds $5,000,000 and there is minimal diversity, the federal district court has subject-matter jurisdiction to hear the case under its diversity jurisdiction.

In 2005, Congress amended the federal diversity-jurisdiction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1332, to allow large class actions to be brought in federal court, even if there is not complete diversity between the defendants and the plaintiffs. Under § 1332(d)(2)(A), a federal district court can exercise diversity jurisdiction over a class action if (i) “the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $5,000,000” and (ii) “any member of a class of plaintiffs is a citizen of a State different from any defendant” (i.e., “minimal diversity”).

Here, those requirements are met. First, the amount in controversy exceeds $5,000,000. The plaintiff is suing on behalf of a class of at least 30,000 plaintiffs, each of whom has a statutory damages claim of $500. These claims can be aggregated in determining jurisdiction. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(6). Thus, if the plaintiff’s class claim is upheld, the amount in controversy exceeds $15,000,000.

Second, there is minimal diversity between some members of the plaintiff class and the defendant. Trident is a citizen of State X, where it is incorporated and where its corporate headquarters are located. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1) (a corporation is a citizen of its state of incorporation and the state where it has its principal place of business); Hertz Corp. v. Friend, 559 U.S. 77 (2010) (corporation’s principal place of business is state “where the corporation’s high level officers direct, control, and coordinate the corporation’s activities”). All that is required, therefore, is that at least one member of the plaintiff class be a citizen of a state other than State X.

Here, 10,000 members of the plaintiff class live in State Y, and 15,000 members live in State Z. The complaint further alleges that most, if not all, of these class members are U.S. citizens. Assuming that Trident does not contest these factual claims, there is almost certainly at least one member of the class who is a citizen of either State Y or State Z and therefore diverse from Trident, a citizen of State X. A U.S. citizen is a citizen of the state in which she has her domicile. Domicile is defined as “residence in fact, combined with the intention of making the place of residence one’s home for an indefinite period.” Friedenthal, Kane & Miller, Civil Procedure § 2.6 at 31 (4th ed. 2005). Among the 25,000 members of the class actually living in States Y or Z, there will doubtless be thousands who meet the requirements of U.S. citizenship and domicile in those states, so that the minimal diversity requirements are met. It does not matter that there are also members of the plaintiff class (i.e., those living in State X) who are not diverse from the defendant.

[NOTE: According to the class-action provisions of the diversity-jurisdiction statute, a court may decline (and sometimes must decline) to exercise jurisdiction when a class involves a significant proportion of nondiverse class members. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(3), (d)(4) (court “may” decline when nondiverse members constitute greater than one-third and less than two-thirds of total class; and court “shall” decline when nondiverse members constitute greater than two-thirds of total class). Here, the number of State X class members (5,000) is less than one-third of the total class (at least 30,000), and thus these special provisions do not apply. In addition, the further exceptions to the class-action diversity rules (for class actions against state officials, class actions with fewer than 100 members, and class actions involving securities or corporate fiduciary claims) are not raised by the facts of this question. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(5), (d)(9).]

Point Two (35%)

When a claim based on state-law rights is brought in federal court, it is governed by federal procedure. So federal procedural rules for class actions govern, and the federal court is not bound by State X’s procedural law barring class actions to recover statutory damages. Thus, the action should not be dismissed because of State X’s law.

This action is appropriate if it is authorized by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23 regardless of what the state procedural law says. In Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938), the Supreme Court held that federal courts sitting in diversity must look to state law for the substantive rules of decision governing such cases. However, in a series of subsequent cases, the Court made clear that federal law would continue to govern procedural matters in federal court, even if the federal procedure affected the outcome of the litigation. See Byrd v. Blue Ridge Rural Electric Coop., Inc., 356 U.S. 525 (1958) (federal rule providing for jury determination of particular issue controls in federal court despite contrary state rule requiring the issue to be decided by a judge). If there is a federal procedural rule that governs an issue, it applies “unless it exceeds statutory authorization or Congress’s rulemaking power.” See Shady Grove Orthopedic Associates v. Allstate Ins. Co., 559 U.S. 393, 398 (2010) (citing Burlington Northern R. Co. v. Woods, 480 U.S. 1, 5 (1987)).

In Shady Grove, the Court considered a New York law barring class actions to enforce statutory damages claims. The Court concluded that such actions can be maintained in federal court, despite the state law, if the action is authorized by Rule 23. According to the Court, Rule 23 is both a procedural rule within the scope of the Rules Enabling Act and a rule that entitles “a plaintiff whose suit meets the specified criteria to pursue his claim as a class action.” 559 U.S. at 398. Thus, a class action may be maintained in federal court even though there is a contrary state-law provision forbidding class actions.

[NOTE: To bring a class action under Rule 23, a plaintiff must first satisfy the requirements of Rule 23(a). Here, the requirements of Rule 23(a) (numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequate representation) are satisfied.]

[NOTE: The facts of this problem fall squarely within the holding of Shady Grove, so there should be no question that Rule 23 should be applied, not the contrary law of State X. However, the Court was fractured as to the rationale for its decision in Shady Grove, and Justice Stevens (a critical fifth vote) suggested that Rule 23 would not apply if a state law limiting class actions is “so intertwined with a state right or remedy that it functions to define the scope of the state-created right.” 559 U.S. at 423. Thus, some examinees might emphasize that the state law in this problem is a general law that does not directly modify rights granted by any particular substantive law, including the State X Privacy Protection Act at issue in this question.]

Point Three (30%)

The court is likely to conclude that there is a “concrete” injury arising from the hacking of the medical information, as required for there to be standing under Article III. Thus the court should probably not grant the motion to dismiss for lack of the plaintiff’s standing.

Federal court jurisdiction is limited by Article III of the Constitution to “Cases” and “Controversies.” Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555 (1992). To establish standing, a plaintiff must show (1) an injury in fact, (2) fairly traceable to the challenged conduct of the defendant, and (3) likely to be redressed by a favorable judicial decision. Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 578 U.S. ___, 136 S.Ct. 1540, 1547 (2016), citing Lujan at 560–561.

Here, the plaintiff’s claimed injury is the invasion of his privacy resulting from unauthorized access by third-party hackers to his personal medical information. The facts indicate that his injury was a result of the defendant’s failure to protect that information (as it was required to do by the State X Privacy Protection Act). A favorable decision would redress the injury through an award of damages, but that award would be based on the statute’s provision for statutory damages, not on proof of the actual extent of harm to the plaintiff. Thus, the issue is whether the asserted “invasion of privacy” counts as an “injury in fact” when the plaintiff does not claim that he, or any member of the class, suffered any actual damage and seeks to recover only statutory damages.

In Spokeo, 136 S.Ct. at 1549, the Supreme Court concluded that “Article III standing requires a concrete injury even in the context of a statutory violation.” In Spokeo, inaccurate information about a plaintiff was included in a credit-reporting database, but there was no evidence that the plaintiff had been harmed by that fact. The Supreme Court held that there was no “injury” for standing purposes, despite the fact that a state law would have awarded the plaintiff statutory damages based on the presence of the inaccurate information alone. The Court emphasized that the “injury in fact” element of the Court’s standing test required a showing that the plaintiff suffered “an invasion of a legally protected interest” that is “concrete” as well as “particularized.” The mere fact that a defendant has acted improperly toward a particular plaintiff (e.g., by including inaccurate information about the plaintiff in a credit-reporting database) is not enough; nor is it enough that the defendant’s conduct violated a state statute. For the plaintiff to have standing to bring a claim in federal court, the defendant’s statutory violation must have “concretely” injured that plaintiff.

The Court in Spokeo also said that actual monetary harm to a plaintiff isn’t required for standing: an “intangible” injury can nonetheless be a “concrete injury.” Moreover, the Court indicated that a legislative judgment that certain intangible harms constitute injury in fact would be “instructive.” But the Court made clear that a plaintiff does not satisfy the injury-in-fact requirement merely because a statute has granted the plaintiff a statutory right and the defendant has allegedly violated that statute. Id. at 1549.

After Spokeo, the question is whether an invasion of a plaintiff’s privacy, without more, is a sufficiently “concrete” injury to satisfy standing requirements. Although it can be argued that no harm is present on our facts here because there is no evidence that the plaintiff's improperly disclosed medical information has been improperly used to the plaintiff's detriment, the invasion of privacy alone may constitute concrete harm, albeit 'intangible' harm, sufficient for standing. Knowledge that one's private medical information is in the hands of a third party may cause emotional distress or worry, even if the information is never used. Support for a conclusion that such harms are concrete harms is also found in State X's legislative judgment that the loss of privacy that occurs when medical records are disclosed constitutes injury warranting a recovery of damages even when no actual damages can be established.

In cases decided since Spokeo, several federal courts have held that an invasion of privacy is, in and of itself, a concrete injury, even when extensive damages cannot be proved. See Perry v. Cable News Network, Inc., 854 F.3d 1336 (11th Cir. 2017) (disclosure to third party of user's viewing history on CNN mobile software app is violation of personal privacy sufficient to constitute "concrete injury"); Blumenfeld v. Regions Bank, 374 F.Supp. 3d 1165 (N.D. Ala. 2019) (invasion of privacy from disclosure of person's private financial information to a third party is a concrete injury); Soukhaphonh v. Hot Topic, Inc., 2017 WL 2909403 (C.D. Cal. 2017) ("an invasion of privacy, even one based on a solitary text message, is a sufficient injury to establish standing"); Toldi v. Hyundai Capital America, 2017 WL 736882 (D. Nev. 2017) ("intrusive invasion of privacy" from autodialed and prerecorded calls is a concrete injury); Krakauer v. Dish Network L.L.C., 168 F.Supp. 3d 843, 845 (M.D. N.C. 2016) ("disruptive and annoying invasion of privacy" from telemarketing calls is concrete injury).

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2019 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Civil Procedure question on the February 2019 MEE tested the following areas from the Civil Procedure outline: I.A. Jurisdiction and venue—Federal subject matter jurisdiction (federal question, diversity, supplemental, and removal); and B. Personal jurisdiction.

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by user jurisdictions as part of the bar examination on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Areas of law that may be covered on the MEE include the following: Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Civil Procedure, Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts (including Article 2 [Sales] of the Uniform Commercial Code), Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Article 9 (Secured Transactions) of the Uniform Commercial Code. Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles. Examinees in non-UBE jurisdictions should answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

QUESTION 1–CONTRACTS

A homeowner entered into two separate contracts with a contractor for the renovation of her kitchen and the remodeling of her bathroom. The homeowner has refused to pay the contractor on both contracts because of dissatisfaction with his work.

Under the kitchen contract, the contractor had agreed to renovate the homeowner's kitchen for $50,000, payable in installments. The final installment of $8,000 was due 10 days after completion of the project. The kitchen contract called for repainting the cabinets, installing new appliances bought by the homeowner from a third party, and replacing the flooring in the kitchen with linoleum, which is a floor covering made from natural materials. When the contract was negotiated, the contractor had asked the homeowner why she wanted "such old-fashioned flooring instead of more modern resilient flooring like vinyl." The homeowner had responded, "We are a green household, and it is very important to us to use linoleum, which is a green product, unlike vinyl. Moreover, I grew up in a house with a linoleum floor in the kitchen, and I really want to be reminded of my youth when I walk into the kitchen."

Despite the clear contract language, the contractor installed vinyl flooring in the kitchen. The vinyl flooring looks similar to the contractually required linoleum but is not as durable. Before the final payment was due, the homeowner discovered that the flooring was vinyl rather than linoleum and confronted the contractor. The contractor stated, "I knew that you wanted linoleum, but that's a crazy idea. Vinyl was a lot easier for my workers to install, and it looks as good as linoleum. So I made an executive decision to go with vinyl." The homeowner announced that she would not make the last installment payment unless the contractor removed the vinyl flooring and replaced it with linoleum. Removing the vinyl flooring and replacing it with linoleum would be labor-intensive and would cost the contractor approximately $10,000. The market value of the house, however, would be the same whether the kitchen had vinyl flooring such as that installed by the contractor or linoleum flooring as called for in the contract.

Under the bathroom contract, the contractor had agreed to remodel the homeowner's bathroom for $25,000. The contract called for the existing bathtub to remain along one wall and a new vanity (cabinet and sink) to be installed along the opposite wall. The contract called for a 30-inch space between the vanity and the bathtub (so that a person could easily walk between them).

After the contractor said he was finished, the homeowner measured the space between the vanity and the bathtub and discovered that it was only 29 inches. The homeowner then announced that she would not pay the last installment of the contract price ($10,000), which was due upon completion of the remodeling, unless the contractor "did something" to make the space at least 30 inches wide. The only way to make the space at least 30 inches wide would be to remove either the vanity or the bathtub and to obtain and install a smaller custom-made model. This would cost the contractor about $7,500. The market value of the house with only a 29-inch space between the vanity and the bathtub, however, would be $500 less than with a 30-inch space.

The homeowner had selected the contractor because of the contractor's reputation for high-quality installation. In both contracts, the price was based mostly on labor costs because the cost of materials and fixtures was relatively small.

Assuming that the contractor will do nothing to address the homeowner's concerns:

1. How much more, if anything, is the homeowner required to pay the contractor under the kitchen contract? Explain.
2. How much more, if anything, is the homeowner required to pay the contractor under the bathroom contract? Explain.

QUESTION 2—REAL PROPERTY

Ten years ago, a woman and her husband purchased a one-story commercial building in a city in State A “as joint tenants with right of survivorship and not as tenants in common.” They had a “commuter marriage.” The husband lived in an apartment in State A. The woman, who worked for an international corporation, lived in a rented apartment overseas. They met one weekend each month.

Three years ago, the husband borrowed $150,000 from a friend and granted the friend a mortgage on the commercial building to secure repayment of the loan. The husband used the $150,000 to purchase a yacht. The certificate of title for the yacht was issued in his name alone.

Two years ago, the husband leased the building to a commercial tenant for a 10-year period at an annual rent of $9,000, “payable in equal monthly installments solely to” the husband.

The woman did not know about either of these transactions, and she did not join in the mortgage or the lease.

Last year, following the husband’s unexpected death, the woman first learned of the mortgage and the lease.

State A applies the title theory of mortgages, and its courts strictly apply the common law four-unities test. State A does not recognize tenancies by the entirety.

1. Did the husband’s execution of the mortgage sever the joint tenancy? Explain.
2. Assuming that the execution of the mortgage did not sever the joint tenancy:
 - (a) Did the husband’s execution of the lease sever the joint tenancy? Explain.
 - (b) Assuming further that the lease severed the joint tenancy, then upon the husband’s death, what rights, if any, does the tenant have in the building? Explain.
3. Assuming that neither the mortgage nor the lease severed the joint tenancy:
 - (a) During the spouses’ lifetimes, was the woman entitled to half of the rental income payable to her husband under the lease? Explain.
 - (b) At the husband’s death, what rights, if any, do the woman and the tenant have in the building? Explain.

QUESTION 3—CIVIL PROCEDURE

During a snowstorm, a woman and a man were driving in opposite directions on a state highway when their cars collided head-on in the middle of the road. At the moment of impact, the locking mechanism on the woman's seat belt malfunctioned, and the woman was thrown from her car and seriously injured.

The woman was transported from the scene of the accident in an ambulance owned and operated by AmCo, a private ambulance company. On the way to the hospital, the ambulance driver lost control of the ambulance, which skidded off the highway, causing further injury to the woman and exacerbating the injuries she had suffered in the original accident.

Six months later, the woman filed a tort action in federal district court against the man, AmCo, and CarCo, the manufacturer of the woman's car. The complaint alleges that each defendant is liable for all or part of the woman's injuries. In particular, the complaint alleges that the man caused the original accident by swerving across the median of the highway, that AmCo's driver was driving too fast for the weather and road conditions, and that CarCo is liable because the seat belt in the woman's car was defectively manufactured. The woman's complaint properly invoked the court's diversity jurisdiction, and each defendant was properly served with process. Each defendant filed an answer to the complaint and denied liability.

Seven days after it served its answer, CarCo served a summons and complaint on LockCo, the company that manufactured and supplied the seat belt locking mechanism that CarCo installed in the woman's car. CarCo seeks to join LockCo as a party to the woman's action, alleging that LockCo must indemnify CarCo if the seat belt locking mechanism is found to have been defective and CarCo is held liable to the woman.

1. Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, did the woman properly join the man, AmCo, and CarCo as defendants in a single action? Explain.
2. Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, did CarCo properly join LockCo as a party to the woman's action against CarCo? Explain.

QUESTION 4—SECURED TRANSACTIONS

On February 1, Construction Company borrowed $500,000 from Bank. Construction Company's president, on behalf of the company, contemporaneously signed and delivered to Bank a security agreement that included the following language:

To secure the repayment obligation of Construction Company to Bank, Construction Company hereby grants Bank a security interest in all rights of Construction Company to be paid with respect to any contract for the construction or repair of bridges or roads, whether such right exists now or arises in the future.

On March 1, Construction Company entered into a contract with a developer to build roads for a housing development. The contract required the developer to pay $450,000 to Construction Company upon completion of the road-building project.

On September 1, Construction Company defaulted on its obligations to Bank under the loan and the security agreement. Bank immediately sent a letter to the developer. The letter, which was signed on behalf of Bank by its president, read as follows: "In accordance with a security interest granted to us by Construction Company, all payments under your contract with Construction Company should be made to us at [address of Bank]."

This letter was received by the developer on September 3.

On October 1, Construction Company completed its project for the developer and sent an invoice to the developer demanding payment. The developer's treasurer decided to pay Construction Company, and not Bank, because the developer had a contract with Construction Company but not with Bank. The developer's treasurer promptly sent a check for $450,000 to Construction Company, which deposited the check and used the proceeds to pay its employees and subcontractors.

A few days later, when Bank learned that Construction Company had completed the road-building project, Bank sent an email to the developer demanding that the developer pay Bank the $450,000 contract price. Attached to the email was a copy of the security agreement signed by Construction Company and a copy of Bank's September 1 letter to the developer directing it to make all contract payments to Bank. The developer responded that it had already paid Construction Company and was therefore discharged from its payment obligation under the road-building contract. The developer also stated that the security agreement executed on February 1 could not have encumbered Construction Company's right to be paid under the road-building contract because that contract did not exist until March 1.

1. Did Bank have a security interest in Construction Company's right to be paid $450,000 by the developer for the road-building project? Explain.
2. Was the developer discharged from its payment obligation under the road-building contract by virtue of its having paid Construction Company? Explain.

QUESTION 5—AGENCY

Linda owned and operated a clothing store as a sole proprietorship. To increase sales, she decided to offer a same-day delivery service to local customers. Rather than hiring an employee to make deliveries, she decided to use a driver who was an independent contractor to make deliveries on an as-needed basis. Because she did not know anyone who could do this work, she searched a website that listed local delivery drivers.

The website included the drivers' names, their hourly rates, and customer reviews of their work. A driver on the list with the lowest hourly rate by a wide margin used his own delivery van for making deliveries. But 40 recent customer reviews of this driver on a scale of 1 (low) to 5 (high) rated him as 1.5, citing specific instances of misbehavior, untrustworthiness, and bad driving. The website also reported that in the last couple of years, the driver had been sued three times for negligent driving and had been found liable in each case. Nonetheless, Linda decided to use this driver to make deliveries because of his inexpensive hourly rate and because he had his own delivery van.

When she hired the driver, Linda told him that, when making deliveries for the store, he would have to place self-sticking, removable signs advertising the store on both sides of his delivery van. He agreed, but because such signs ranged in price from $100 to $500 per pair, he told Linda that she would have to purchase them for him to use. Because she was too busy to do that, Linda asked him to purchase the signs but not to spend more than $300 for the pair when doing so. Linda gave the driver one of the store's cards, and as a means of identifying the driver as acting for the store, she wrote on the back, "This is my agent to purchase signs for my store."

The driver then went to a local sign shop, showed the shop owner the business card that Linda had given him (including her handwritten note on the back), and purchased a pair of custom-made signs for $450 on credit. Because the signs were custom-made, they were not returnable or refundable. When the completed signs were delivered to Linda, she refused to take possession of them or pay the sign shop for them because their cost exceeded the amount she had told the driver to spend by $150. The driver then made two smaller signs with the store name on them and, with Linda's approval, put them on his van when making deliveries.

Three weeks ago, Linda called a customer and told her, "My driver is on his way to make a delivery to you in a van with the store's name on its side." The customer kept watch at her window, and when she saw the van with the store's signs on it, she went out to the driveway through her garage. As she started to walk toward the van, the driver negligently hit the accelerator pedal, causing the van to hit the customer, who sustained substantial injuries.

Assume that there was an enforceable contract to buy the signs from the sign shop, that the driver's negligence proximately caused the customer's injuries, and that the driver was acting as Linda's independent-contractor agent.

1. Is Linda liable to the sign shop for the purchase price of the signs? Explain.
2. Is the driver liable to the sign shop for the purchase price of the signs? Explain.

3. Even though the driver was an independent contractor, is Linda vicariously liable to the customer for the injuries resulting from the driver's negligence? Explain.
4. Is Linda directly liable to the customer for the injuries the customer sustained? Explain.

QUESTION 6—EVIDENCE/CRIMINAL LAW

A man and a woman were waiting in line at a public park for tickets to attend an outdoor performance of a play. They soon began arguing about sports, and as their conversation became more animated, the man began shouting at the woman and poking her shoulder with his finger. As the man poked harder and harder, the woman responded by punching the man in the nose.

The woman was arrested at the scene and charged with battery.

At trial, the prosecutor intends to elicit the following testimony from an eyewitness who was standing in the line:

Before the man arrived, I saw the woman talking to a friend. The friend said to the woman, “You and I have waited so long for these tickets, if anyone annoys us today they will not be seeing this play—they’ll be going to the hospital!” The woman nodded her head and gave the friend a thumbs-up signal.

I recognized the woman. I live in her neighborhood, and I probably see her at least twice a week. Every time I see her, she is arguing with people, acting out, and generally causing problems.

Assuming that the eyewitness is permitted to testify for the prosecution, defense counsel plans to

- (1) cross-examine the eyewitness about her five-year-old conviction for shoplifting, a crime punishable by a maximum sentence of six months in jail; and
- (2) cross-examine the eyewitness about a letter recently written by the eyewitness to the man saying, “Thanks for 10 years of a great friendship.”

The jurisdiction’s rules governing crimes and affirmative defenses follow common law principles. The evidence rules of the jurisdiction are identical to the Federal Rules of Evidence.

The woman’s friend is unavailable and will not testify at trial.

1. Assuming that the prosecution proves the elements of battery, can the woman establish a common law affirmative defense based on these facts? Explain.
2. What portions of the eyewitness’s testimony, if any, would be admissible? Explain.
3. What portions, if any, of the defense counsel’s cross-examination should the court permit? Explain.

Do not discuss any constitutional issues.

ANALYSIS 1–CONTRACTS

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) How much more, if anything, is the homeowner required to pay the contractor under the kitchen contract?
- (2) How much more, if anything, is the homeowner required to pay the contractor under the bathroom contract?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The common law of contracts, rather than Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code, applies to these contracts because the services aspects of each contract predominate. Generally, under the common law of contracts, one party's failure to perform excuses the other party from making payment if the breaching party "materially breached" the contract or failed to "substantially perform" his obligations.

In the case of the kitchen contract, a court is likely to conclude that the contractor did not substantially perform the contract by installing vinyl flooring and not the linoleum flooring that the homeowner wanted for various reasons and that was specified in the contract, thus excusing the homeowner's final payment ($8,000) under this contract. The homeowner is therefore not required to pay more under the kitchen contract.

In the case of the bathroom contract, however, a court is likely to conclude that the contractor did substantially perform the contract even though there was a 29-inch space between the vanity and the bathtub rather than the 30-inch space specified in the contract. Thus, the homeowner owes $10,000 under this contract, subject to an offset ($500) for the diminution in value of her house.

The kitchen contract was predominantly one for services and thus governed by the common law of contracts. It is likely that a court would conclude that the contractor did not substantially perform, thus the homeowner would not be required to make the final payment ($8,000) under this contract.

(15%) Dispute governed by the common law of contracts. In contracts such as those at issue here, where both goods and non-goods (such as services) are involved, most courts consider the thrust or predominant purpose of the transaction in determining whether Article 2 of the UCC or the common law of contracts governs the contract. Milau Associates v. North Ave. Dev. Corp., 42 N.Y.2d 482, 368 N.E.2d 1247 (N.Y. 1977). While the homeowner did acquire some goods (flooring and bathroom fixtures) under these contracts, the facts make it clear that the homeowner sought high-quality installation services and that the contract price was determined mostly by labor costs. Thus, the construction/service aspects of the contract dominate. Accordingly, the common law of contracts rather than Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code applies to the kitchen contract.

[NOTE: It is important for the examinee to determine whether the disputes here are governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code (which governs transactions in goods; see UCC § 2-102) or the common law of contracts. This is because UCC Article 2 would resolve these disputes by applying the “perfect tender rule” under UCC § 2-601, which allows the buyer to reject goods if they do not meet the contractual specifications in any respect, while the common law of contracts applies the doctrine of “substantial performance” (see below).]

(30%) Kitchen contract not substantially performed. Under the common law doctrine of substantial performance, a party that breaches a contract is nonetheless entitled to the other party’s performance if the breaching party has not “materially breached” the contract, but instead has “substantially performed.” See, e.g., E. Allan Farnsworth, Contracts § 8.12 (4th ed. 2004) (“If one party’s performance is a constructive condition of the other party’s duty, only ‘substantial’ performance is required of the first party before that party can recover under the contract”).

Courts consider several factors in determining whether there has been a “material breach” by one party that excuses the injured party’s performance: (1) the extent to which the injured party will be deprived of a benefit he or she reasonably expected, (2) the extent to which the injured party can be adequately compensated for the part of the benefit of which he or she will be deprived, (3) the extent to which the party failing to perform will suffer forfeiture, (4) the likelihood that the party failing to perform will cure that failure, and (5) the extent to which the behavior of the party failing to perform comports with standards of good faith and fair dealing. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 241; see also Jacob & Youngs, Inc. v. Kent, 230 N.Y. 239, 129 N.E. 889 (N.Y. 1921).

Some courts have held that when a party’s breach is “willful,” that party’s performance cannot be substantial, regardless of the impact of denying that party the right to enforce the obligations of the other. Farnsworth, supra, § 8.12. See also Jacob & Youngs, Inc. v. Kent, 230 N.Y. at 244 (“The willful transgressor must accept the penalty of his transgression.”). Other cases, however, have held that “even a conscious and intentional departure from the contract specifications will not necessarily defeat recovery, but may be considered as one of the several factors involved in deciding whether there has been full performance.” Vincenzi v. Cerro, 442 A.2d 1352, 1354 (Conn. 1982).

Here, the homeowner reasonably expected linoleum flooring, not vinyl flooring, for particularized non-economic reasons (having a “green” household and nostalgia for youth).

Thus, the homeowner probably cannot adequately be compensated for the part of the benefit of which she will be deprived. Moreover, the contractor willfully breached the kitchen contract by installing vinyl flooring, strongly suggesting that the contractor did not act in good faith. Thus, it is likely that a court would conclude that the contractor's installation of vinyl flooring, not linoleum flooring, was a material breach and thus that the contractor did not substantially perform the kitchen contract. The homeowner is therefore excused from making the final payment ($8,000) under the contract, unless the contractor removes the vinyl flooring and properly installs the contracted-for linoleum flooring.

[NOTE: The "substantial performance" determination is fact-sensitive, and it is possible (though unlikely) that a court would reach the opposite conclusion. See Farnsworth, supra, § 8.12 ("test as flexible as substantial performance sacrifices predictability to achieve justice"). If an examinee concludes that the contractor substantially performed the kitchen contract with the homeowner and thus that the homeowner must pay the remaining contract price, the examinee should also analyze whether the homeowner would be entitled to any adjustment because of the breach. Because the facts state that the homeowner's house has the same market value with vinyl flooring as it has with linoleum, such an adjustment would likely be nonexistent or only nominal.]

[NOTE: If an examinee erroneously concluded that this contract was governed by UCC Article 2 and, accordingly, analyzed this portion of the problem by applying Article 2's perfect tender rule, some credit should be given for that analysis.]

Point Two (55% total weight)

The dispute concerning the bathroom contract, which was also predominantly one for services, is governed by the common law of contracts. It is likely that a court would conclude that the contractor substantially performed. Thus, the homeowner would be required to pay the remainder of the contract price ($10,000) minus the diminished value of the house because of the breach ($500).

(5%) Dispute governed by the common law of contracts. As with the kitchen contract, even though the contract price included the cost of the bathroom fixtures, the facts make clear that the price turned mostly on labor costs, thus the construction/service aspects of the bathroom contract dominate. See Point One. Accordingly, the common law of contracts rather than Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code applies to the bathroom contract.

(20%) Bathroom contract substantially performed. The bathroom dispute is likely to be resolved differently from the kitchen contract dispute. See Point One. Here, the contractor's breach appears to be inadvertent and unintentional. Further, the benefit of the 30-inch space to the homeowner (compared to the 29-inch space created by the contractor) seems rather minimal, and there is no indication that the additional one-inch space was especially important to the homeowner. So long as the 29-inch space is usable, the breach here can probably be compensated for by damages. Moreover, the contractor would suffer a significant forfeiture if, in order to get paid, he had to remove the bathroom fixtures and obtain and install custom fixtures, all to gain a single inch of space. Accordingly, a court would likely hold that the contractor substantially performed the bathroom contract (that is, there was not a material breach). Therefore, the homeowner would be required to pay the contractor under the contract.

(30%) Homeowner entitled to an offset. The general rule of damages for a breach of a construction contract is that the injured party may recover the reasonable cost of replacement or completion. When, however, there has been substantial performance of the contract and the cost of replacement or completion would be disproportionately high compared to the economic benefit it confers, courts have instead measured damages by the difference between the value of the property if construction had been properly completed and the value as constructed. American Standard, Inc. v. Schectman, 80 A.D.2d 318, 439 N.Y.S.2d 529 (N.Y. App. Div. 1981). See also Jacob & Youngs v. Kent, supra (in such a case, “the measure of damages is not the cost of replacement, which would be great, but the difference in value, which would be either nominal or nothing”); Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 348, comment c.

Here, the contractor substantially performed the bathroom contract, thus entitling him to payment under the contract. But because the contractor’s breach (leaving only a 29-inch space between the vanity and the bathtub) resulted in a diminution in the value of the house, the homeowner would likely be entitled to an adjustment based on this diminution in value. The homeowner, however, would not be entitled to recover the cost of rebuilding the bathroom ($7,500), which is much higher than the diminution in value of the house ($500) resulting from the breach. The $500 diminution in value should be deducted from the $10,000 final payment the homeowner would be required to pay the contractor, netting the contractor $9,500 on the bathroom contract.

ANALYSIS 2–REAL PROPERTY

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did the husband's execution of the mortgage sever the joint tenancy?
- (2) Assuming that the execution of the mortgage did not sever the joint tenancy:
 - (a) Did the husband's later execution of the lease sever the joint tenancy?
 - (b) Assuming further that the lease severed the joint tenancy, then upon the husband's death, what rights, if any, does the tenant have in the building?
- (3) Assuming that neither the mortgage nor the lease severed the joint tenancy:
 - (a) During the spouses' lifetimes, was the woman entitled to half of the rental income payable to her husband under the lease?
 - (b) At the husband's death, what rights, if any, do the woman and the tenant have in the building?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Because the building is in a "title theory" state, the grant of the mortgage is a title transaction. Thus, the husband's grant of the mortgage severed the joint tenancy.

Similarly, under the common law, a lease is a conveyance and thus a title transaction. Thus, at common law the lease by the husband to the tenant would sever the joint tenancy, although not all states adopt this view today. If the lease severed the joint tenancy, the former joint tenants would own the property as tenants in common after the severance, and then after the husband's death, the tenant's rights in the husband's undivided half interest would continue in that interest for the balance of the lease term.

If neither the mortgage nor the lease severed the joint tenancy, then even though the lease agreement between the husband and the tenant provided that the rents were to be paid solely to the husband, the woman would be entitled to half of the rental income payable under the lease before the death of the husband. Furthermore, upon the husband's death, the woman alone would own the building because she would be the surviving joint tenant. And, under the principle that a person cannot convey more than he has, the lease would terminate upon the husband's death. Thus, the woman would own the building free and clear of the tenant's interest.

[NOTE: This question tests the examinee's understanding of the consequences of a unilateral execution of a mortgage or a lease by one of two persons holding title as joint tenants with right of survivorship.]

Point One (20%)

The husband's unilateral grant of a mortgage to his friend severed the joint tenancy because State A is a title-theory state.

States differ as to whether the grant of a mortgage is a "title" transaction. In so-called "title theory" states, the grant of a mortgage by one joint tenant severs a joint tenancy because the mortgage severs the "unity of title" requirement as between the mortgagee and the joint tenant who did not enter into the mortgage agreement. Dale A. Whitman, Ann M. Burkhart, R. Wilson Freyermuth & Troy A. Rule, The Law of Property 153 (4th ed. 2019). Here the facts state that the property is in a title-theory state. Thus, the grant of the mortgage severed the joint tenancy, and the woman and her husband, upon severance, held title as tenants in common.

[NOTE: Under the common law four-unities test, a joint tenancy is severed and converted into a tenancy in common if, subsequent to the creation of the joint tenancy, there is a severance of the joint tenants' unity of time, title, interest, or possession. The execution of a mortgage in a title jurisdiction after the creation of the joint tenancy, which is a title transaction, severs the unity of both title and time because the mortgagee and the other joint tenant no longer have interests in the property that were created at the same time or under the same instrument. In many jurisdictions, the execution of a lease has the same consequence. See Point Two(a).]

Point Two(a) (15%)

If the mortgage did not sever the joint tenancy, then under the common law, the husband's unilateral execution of the lease would sever the joint tenancy. However, in some states today, a lease does not sever a joint tenancy.

At common law, a lease was treated as a conveyance of real property. Because of this, the grant of a lease by one joint tenant severed the unity of both title and interest, thereby destroying the right of survivorship. Joseph W. Singer, Property 352 (5th ed. 2017). Most states continue to follow the common law approach. Id.; see, e.g., Alexander v. Boyer, 253 A.2d 359 (Md. 1969). Other common law jurisdictions, however, hold that a lease does not sever a joint tenancy.

In at least one state, a middle ground has been adopted. In Tenhet v. Boswell, 554 P.2d 330 (Cal. 1976), the court adopted the view that the leasing of a joint tenant's interest severs the joint tenancy only if the leasing joint tenant dies before the end of the lease term. On the other hand, if the leasing joint tenant survives the lease term and later is the first of the co-tenants to die, the survivor owns the entire property by right of survivorship.

Here, the facts do not indicate which approach State A follows.

[NOTE: Examinees should receive full credit for adopting any one of these positions. The critical score comes in Point Two(b) (severance) and Point Three(b) (no severance), where the consequences to the tenant of each of these positions is discussed.]

Point Two(b) (20%)

If the lease severed the joint tenancy, then the woman and her husband had a tenancy in common and upon the husband's death the tenant's lease would be valid with respect to the husband's undivided half interest in the building.

If the execution of the lease severed the joint tenancy, then immediately after the execution of the lease, the woman and her husband owned the building as tenants in common and the husband's undivided half interest was subject to the lease. In such a case, the lease survives the husband's death and is valid as against his half interest. Of course, because the tenant can have no greater rights than the husband had, while the tenant would be entitled to possession of the whole, the tenant cannot exclude the woman from also possessing the property should she so choose, just as the husband could not exclude her during his lifetime. Singer, supra, at 356–357.

Point Three(a) (20%)

Assuming that neither the mortgage nor the lease severed the joint tenancy, the woman would be entitled to half of the rental income payable under the lease during the husband's lifetime.

Joint tenants have equal rights of possession. Although possession by one tenant is not wrongful if the other tenant is not excluded, the exclusion of one joint tenant by the other is wrongful. Because possession by one joint tenant alone is not wrongful in the absence of exclusion, a joint tenant in possession is not liable to the joint tenant out of possession for the rental value of the property. See generally William B. Stoebuck & Dale A. Whitman, The Law of Property § 5.8 (3d ed. 2002).

However, when one joint tenant, acting alone, leases the property to a third party, each joint tenant is entitled to half of the rental income. Id. See also Singer, supra, at 367. If the leasing joint tenant to whom rent is paid does not share that rent with the other joint tenant, the other joint tenant may bring an accounting proceeding to compel a sharing of the rent.

Thus, the woman would be entitled to half of the rental income from the lease granted by her husband during his lifetime.

Point Three(b) (25%)

Assuming that neither the mortgage nor the lease severed the joint tenancy, then upon the husband's death the woman, as the surviving joint tenant, would own the building free and clear of the lease.

If the lease did not sever the joint tenancy, then upon the husband's death the woman alone would own the building by right of survivorship. Under the theory that the leasing joint tenant who died first effectively had only a life estate and could not convey more than he had, the lease would necessarily terminate at his death. Thus, the woman also would take the building free and clear of the rights of the tenant. See Singer, supra, at 356–358.

FEBRUARY 2020 MEE ANALYSIS 3 – CIVIL PROCEDURE

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, did the woman properly join the man, AmCo, and CarCo as defendants in a single action?
- (2) Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, did CarCo properly join LockCo as a party to the woman's action against CarCo?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 20(a)(2), the woman may join all three defendants in a single action. Joinder is permitted because the woman's claims against the three defendants arise out of the same series of occurrences (the two related accidents) and because there are questions of fact common to all defendants (the nature, extent, and cause of the woman's injuries). Joinder is not barred by the fact that there are differences in the legal and factual bases for the liability of the three defendants.

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 14(a)(1), CarCo may file a third-party complaint (impleader) against LockCo, thereby joining LockCo to the action as a third-party defendant. Here, based on CarCo's claim for indemnification, CarCo would be asserting that LockCo, as the manufacturer and supplier of the allegedly defective seat belt locking mechanism, is liable to CarCo for CarCo's liability to the woman.

Point One (50% total weight)

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 20(a)(2), the woman may join all three defendants in a single action because her claims for relief against all three defendants arise out of a single series of related occurrences and there are questions of fact common to all defendants.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 20(a)(2) governs permissive joinder of parties. It provides as follows:

Persons . . . may be joined in one action as defendants if:

- (A) any right to relief is asserted against them jointly, severally, or in the alternative with respect to or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences; and
- (B) any question of law or fact common to all defendants will arise in the action.

Here, all the requirements for permissive joinder are present.

(30%) Same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences. The woman is asserting a right to relief against each defendant for injuries she suffered, either in the automobile accident or in the ambulance accident (which allegedly exacerbated her original injuries and caused new injuries). The basis for liability as to each defendant differs—the man’s liability arises from the man’s alleged negligent driving at the original accident scene, AmCo’s liability arises from the alleged negligent driving of its driver triggering the second accident, and CarCo’s liability is based on products liability and arises from its sale to the woman of a car with an allegedly defective seat belt. Each defendant, if found liable for his or its respective acts, would be liable for some part of the injuries suffered by the woman.

The woman’s claims against the three defendants meet the “same transaction or occurrence” requirement. In determining whether claims against multiple defendants arise out of the same transaction or occurrence or series of transactions/occurrences, courts often ask whether the plaintiff’s claims against the defendants are logically related. If there is a logical relationship between the claims and if it would serve judicial economy to hear the (related) claims together, the test is met. A typical situation is when an injured plaintiff joins “both the original tortfeasor and a second tortfeasor whose subsequent negligence aggravated plaintiff’s original injuries.”⁷ Charles Alan Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 1653 (3d ed.).

Here, even though the action involves two accidents, the two accidents are clearly related. The ambulance accident would not have occurred but for the first accident and the need to rush the woman to the hospital. Moreover, the ambulance accident exacerbated injuries suffered in the first accident. Because of this close relationship, the court should conclude that the two accidents are part of a single occurrence or that they are part of a related “series of . . . occurrences,” and that judicial economy would be served by allowing the court to resolve the question of the cause or causes of the woman’s injuries in a single action.

(20%) Commonality. Finally, joinder of defendants requires that there be at least one “question of law or fact common to all defendants.” Here, there are several common questions. The woman’s claim against each defendant raises questions of the nature and extent of the woman’s injuries, the precise cause of those injuries, and whether the woman was herself responsible for causing the original accident (and thus responsible for some part of her injuries).

[NOTE: Fed. R. Civ. P. 19 (“Required Joinder of Parties”) is not applicable, as the Supreme Court has held that joint tortfeasors, as here, are not required parties under Rule 19 and are only permissive parties under Rule 20. Temple v. Synthes Corp., Ltd., 498 U.S. 5 (1990).]

Point Two (50%)

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 14(a)(1), CarCo may file a third-party complaint (impleader) against LockCo, thereby joining LockCo to the action as a third-party defendant.

A defendant in an action may bring a third person into the action under limited circumstances. Fed. R. Civ. P. 14(a)(1) provides in relevant part: “A defending party may, as third-party plaintiff, serve a summons and complaint on a nonparty who is or may be liable to it for all or part of the claim against it.”

This rule establishes two requirements for a defendant to implead a nonparty. First, the defendant must allege that the nonparty “is or may be liable” to the defendant. Second, the nonparty’s liability to the defendant must be “for all or part of the claim against” the defendant.

The facts of this problem are a good example of a case in which a defendant may properly implead a third party. The woman has sued CarCo for damages based on a claim that the seat belt in the car manufactured by CarCo was defective. CarCo, in turn, alleges that LockCo is primarily responsible for any defect in the seat belt because LockCo provided CarCo with a defective locking mechanism for that seat belt. Thus, CarCo claims that LockCo must indemnify CarCo for any damages CarCo may owe to the woman. In short, CarCo has alleged (in the language of Rule 14) that LockCo “is or may be liable to [CarCo] for all or part of the claim against [CarCo].” Under such circumstances, CarCo is allowed to implead LockCo. See 6 Charles Alan Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 1446 (3d ed.) (indemnity claim may be brought by impleader under Rule 14).

[NOTE: It was appropriate for CarCo to serve and file its third-party complaint without first seeking court permission. Under Rule 14, a defendant can serve a summons and complaint on a nonparty without leave of court if the defendant acts within 14 days of serving its answer, as CarCo did here. Fed. R. Civ. P. 14(a)(1).

Examinees should be expected to understand that impleading a third-party defendant under Rule 14, as CarCo seeks to do here, is NOT a form of joinder governed by either Rule 19 or Rule 20 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Examinees who offer a joinder analysis should receive no credit unless they demonstrate an understanding of the test for impleader: “a nonparty who is or may be liable” to another defendant “for all or part of the claim against it.”

Some examinees may discuss whether a federal district court would have subject-matter jurisdiction (most likely supplemental jurisdiction) over an indemnification claim against LockCo. Such a discussion is outside the scope of the question and should be disregarded. The call of the question asks only whether the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure allow CarCo to implead LockCo.]

ANALYSIS 4–SECURED TRANSACTIONS

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) What is required to create an enforceable security interest?
- (1)(b) Can a security agreement encumber a debtor’s assets that are created or acquired after the security agreement is entered into?
- (2)(a) May a secured party that has a security interest in a payment obligation notify the obligor on the payment obligation that payments should be made to the secured party?
- (2)(b) If an obligor on a payment obligation pays the original obligee after having received a notice from a secured party directing payments to be made to the secured party, is the obligor discharged from its obligation?

DISCUSSION

An enforceable security interest in collateral exists when the secured party has given value to the debtor, the debtor has rights in the collateral, and the debtor has authenticated an agreement (a “security agreement”) that describes the collateral and grants the secured party a security interest in it. Here, those requirements are satisfied. Further, a security agreement may create a security interest in “after-acquired collateral” such as Construction Company’s right to be paid by the developer.

After default by its debtor, a secured party with a security interest in a payment right may notify the “account debtor” (the person who owes payment) that payment must be made to the secured party. After receipt of such notification, the account debtor must pay the secured party, and the obligation is not discharged if the account debtor pays the assignor. Thus, the developer’s payment to Construction Company did not discharge its obligation, and the developer must pay $450,000 to Bank.

Bank and Construction Company entered into a security agreement that created an enforceable security interest in Construction Company’s right to be paid with respect to any contract for the construction or repair of bridges or roads.

A creditor (“secured party”) has an enforceable security interest in collateral when (1) the creditor has given value to the debtor, (2) the debtor has rights in the collateral, and (3) the debtor has authenticated (signed or its electronic equivalent) a security agreement describing the collateral. See UCC § 9-203. Here, Bank has given value by loaning money to Construction Company, Construction Company has rights in the collateral (its right to payment under its construction contract), and the company’s president signed an agreement describing the collateral and granting Bank a security interest in it. The description of the collateral is sufficient because it “reasonably identifies what is described.” UCC § 9-108. Thus, Bank has an enforceable security interest in that payment right. (The payment right is an “account” because it is a right to payment of a monetary sum for services rendered or to be rendered. UCC § 9-102(a)(2).)

[NOTE: In this problem, it does not matter whether the security interest is perfected or not. Examinees should not be penalized for discussing perfection in general terms or for noting the absence of any evidence of perfection. However, an answer that concludes that the bank’s interest is unenforceable because it is unperfected is incorrect.]

Point One(b) (25%)

The security agreement was sufficient to create a security interest in Construction Company’s right to payment under the contract with the developer even though that contract, and the payment right under it, did not exist until after the security agreement was entered into.

A security agreement “may create or provide for a security interest in after-acquired collateral” (i.e., collateral that is created or that the debtor acquires after the agreement is executed). UCC § 9-204(a). Thus, the fact that Construction Company’s right to payment from the developer did not exist at the time the security agreement was entered into does not prevent the creation of a security interest in that right on behalf of Bank. Once Construction Company entered into the contract with the developer, all three elements of an enforceable security interest existed—value (the loan) had been given, the debtor now had rights in the collateral (the payment right), and the debtor had authenticated a security agreement containing a description of the collateral. Thus, Bank had an enforceable security interest in Construction Company’s right to be paid under the later contract with the developer.

Point Two(a) (20%)

Because Construction Company had defaulted under the loan and security agreement, Bank had the right to direct the developer to make payment to Bank.

Bank had a security interest in all rights of Construction Company to be paid with respect to any contract for the construction or repair of bridges or roads. That collateral constitutes “accounts” (UCC § 9-102(a)(2)), and the developer is the “account debtor” with respect to amounts owed by the developer under its contract with Construction Company. UCC § 9-102(a)(3).

Because the debtor (Construction Company) had defaulted under the loan and security agreement, the secured party (Bank) had the right to notify the account debtor (the developer) to make payment of the account directly to Bank. UCC § 9-607(a)(1).

Point Two(b) (30%)

Once the developer received the September 1 letter from Bank, it could discharge its payment obligation under its contract with Construction Company only by paying Bank.

The developer was an “account debtor” on an “account.” See Point Two(a). An account debtor may discharge its obligation on an account by paying its original obligee only until the account debtor has received a notification that is authenticated by that obligee or its assignee (including a secured party) that an assignment has occurred and that payment should be made to the assignee; thereafter, the account debtor may discharge its obligation only by paying the assignee and is not discharged by paying the original obligee. UCC § 9-406(a). (The term “assignment” includes the grant of a security interest. See UCC § 9-102, cmt.) On September 3, the developer received a letter, signed on behalf of Bank, informing the developer about the security interest and directing it to make payment of its obligation to Bank. From that point forward, the developer could not discharge its obligation by paying Construction Company. Thus, the obligation is still owed and Bank is entitled to payment.

[NOTE: Examinees may note that the developer has a right to request reasonable proof that the assignment of the claim was made to Bank. UCC § 9-406(c). This is an accurate statement of law, but the issue is not raised by the facts.]

[NOTE: Because the effect of Bank’s security interest on the developer’s payment obligation is governed by UCC Article 9 as described in Points Two(a) and Two(b), analysis of that effect under the common law of contracts is displaced by UCC Article 9 and should not be given credit. However, an examinee who incorrectly concludes in response to call #1 that Bank does not have a security interest in Construction Company’s right to be paid by the developer for the road-building project might then analyze call #2 under general contract law principles; in that case, the examinee should be given some credit for a thoughtful analysis.]

FEBRUARY 2020 MEE ANALYSIS 5–AGENCY

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is Linda liable to the sign shop for the purchase price of the signs?
- (2) Is the driver liable to the sign shop for the purchase price of the signs?
- (3) Even though the driver was an independent contractor, is Linda vicariously liable to the customer for the injuries resulting from the driver's negligence?
- (4) Is Linda directly liable to the customer for the injuries the customer sustained?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Linda (the principal) is liable to the sign shop even though the driver (her agent) acted without actual authority. The driver had apparent authority to enter into the contract because the business card given to the sign shop owner at Linda's direction manifested Linda's consent to having the driver purchase signs as agent for her store. Further, given that the card had no stated limitation on price or mode of purchase, the driver had apparent authority to enter into a contract at a reasonable price on credit.

Even though the driver (the agent) exceeded his actual authority, he is not liable to the sign shop because Linda (the principal) was disclosed and is solely liable to the sign shop.

Linda probably is vicariously liable to the customer for injuries resulting from the driver's negligence because the driver was acting for Linda with apparent authority; the customer, based on conversations with Linda, believed that the driver was Linda's agent; and the driver's negligent actions occurred while he was making a delivery to the customer. Linda's vicarious liability arises even though the driver was acting as an independent contractor, not as Linda's employee.

Linda is also directly liable to the customer because of her negligent selection of the driver as an agent for her store, given that she was aware of his record of negligent driving.

Linda is liable to the sign shop on the contract to buy the signs because the driver, although he did not have actual authority to purchase the signs for $450, acted with apparent authority when purchasing the signs on credit at a reasonable price.

Generally, an agent has actual authority when he reasonably believes, based upon the principal's manifestations to him, that the principal wants him to act. Restatement (Third) of Agency § 2.01; Restatement (Second) of Agency § 7. Here, although Linda (the principal) clearly manifested to the driver (the agent) that he was to purchase signs for the delivery van, she made clear that he was not to purchase signs for more than $300. Thus, the driver had no actual authority to bind Linda to a contract for the purchase of signs for $450.

Nonetheless, an agent has apparent authority to bind a principal to a third party when the third party reasonably believes that the agent has authority to bind the principal and that belief is based upon the principal's manifestations to the third party. See Restatement (Third) of Agency § 2.03 ("belief is traceable to the principal's manifestations"); Restatement (Second) of Agency § 8 ("in accordance with . . . manifestations to such third persons"). In particular, "apparent authority . . . is created as to a third person by written or spoken words or any other conduct of the principal which, reasonably interpreted, causes the third person to believe that the principal consents to have the act done on his behalf by the person purporting to act for him." Restatement (Second) of Agency § 27; accord, Restatement (Third) of Agency § 2.03. If the principal manifests to the third person that the agent is authorized to conduct a transaction, "there is apparent authority in the agent to conduct it in accordance with the ordinary usages of business . . . unless the third person has notice that the agent's authority is limited." Restatement (Second) of Agency § 49 cmt. b; see also Restatement (Second) of Agency § 61 cmt. a (ordinary usage includes the purchase of goods at any reasonable price).

Here, although the driver did not have actual authority to spend $450 to purchase the signs, he had apparent authority to do so. The business card given to the sign shop owner was a manifestation traceable to Linda that the driver had authority to purchase signs for her store. Thus, the sign shop owner could reasonably rely on this card and assume that the driver had authority to purchase goods on credit at a reasonable price. The $450 price was reasonable because such signs range in price from $100 to $500 per pair.

[NOTE: An examinee who attempts to distinguish the liability of Linda and that of the store should receive no credit. Linda operates her store as a sole proprietorship. Thus, for purposes of liability, Linda and the store are the same.

An examinee who discusses ratification by Linda of the sign-shop contract should receive no credit. Here, there was apparent authority for the sign-shop contract, and furthermore, there are no facts to support that there were any subsequent actions by the woman that represented an affirmance of an unauthorized transaction. See Restatement (Third) of Agency § 4.01(1), (2); Restatement (Second) of Agency §§ 82, 83.

An examinee might note that the sign contract is governed by UCC Article 2. This is accurate but does not change the analysis. Even in contracts governed by Article 2, common law agency principles apply. UCC § 1-103(b).]

Point Two (25%)

The driver (the agent) is not liable to the sign shop on the contract because Linda (the principal) was a disclosed principal and is liable on the contract, even though the driver breached an implied warranty of authority when he entered into the contract on Linda's behalf.

When an agent with actual or apparent authority contracts on behalf of a disclosed principal, a contract arises between the principal and the third party, but not between the agent and the third party unless they otherwise agree. Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.01 (agent not a party if he had actual or apparent authority); Restatement (Second) of Agency § 328 (agent not liable if he has power to bind principal). Here, although the driver exceeded his actual authority when he contracted to purchase a pair of signs for $450, he nonetheless had apparent authority to enter into the contract with the sign shop on behalf of Linda's store, which was a disclosed principal (see Point One). Thus, the driver is not liable on the sign-shop contract.

This conclusion is not affected by the driver's lack of actual authority. Generally, if a person who purports to contract with a third party on behalf of another has no power to act for the other, the person is liable to the third party for breach of implied warranty of authority. Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.10; Restatement (Second) of Agency § 329. But the comments to section 6.10 note: "If a principal is bound to a third party on the basis of an agent's apparent authority, the agent is not subject to liability to the third party on the agent's implied warranty of authority, although the agent acted without actual authority." Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.10, cmt. b. Accord, Restatement (Second) of Agency § 329. Thus, even though the driver acted without actual authority, he is not liable for breaching an implied warranty of authority because Linda is bound based on the driver's apparent authority.

Linda probably is vicariously liable to the customer because the driver was acting with apparent authority at the time he negligently injured the customer, given that the customer reasonably believed that the driver was acting as agent for Linda, and the driver's negligence occurred while he was making a delivery to the customer.

Under the doctrine of respondeat superior, an employer (master) is vicariously liable—that is, strictly liable regardless of the employer's fault—for the physical torts of an employee (servant) where the tort is committed within the scope of employment. See Restatement (Third) of Agency § 7.03(2)(a); Restatement (Second) of Agency § 219(1). Although a principal generally is not vicariously liable for the physical torts of non-employee agents (see Restatement (Third) of Agency § 7.07 cmt. f ("Definition of employee"); Restatement (Second) of Agency § 250), a principal can be vicariously liable under some circumstances to a third person for torts committed by a non-employee agent where the agent acts with apparent authority. Restatement (Third) of Agency § 7.08; Restatement (Second) of Agency § 265.

Under the Restatement (Third), a principal "is subject to vicarious liability for a tort committed by an agent in dealing . . . with a third party on . . . behalf of the principal when actions taken by the agent with apparent authority constitute the tort" Restatement (Third) of Agency § 7.08. Under the Restatement (Second), the non-employer principal is liable only where the third party relies upon the appearance of agency. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 265 (Illustration 4) (emphasis added). While the blackletter of the Third Restatement omits the reliance language found in the Second Restatement, comment b indicates that reliance is built into the liability rule because of the apparent authority requirement. It states: "An agent acts with apparent authority with regard to a third party when the third party reasonably believes that the agent or other actor has authority to act on behalf of the principal and that belief is traceable to manifestations made by the principal."

Here, although Linda is not vicariously liable for the driver's negligence under the doctrine of respondeat superior because the driver is an independent-contractor agent and not an employee, Linda is likely to be held vicariously liable to the customer because the driver's actions in making the delivery to the customer with apparent authority constituted the tort, and the customer clearly relied upon the appearance of apparent authority.

Here, the customer was negligently struck by the van after the customer went into the driveway to wait for the van that Linda had said would be arriving. Given that the customer went to the driveway when she saw the signs on the sides of the van, the customer reasonably believed that the van that struck her was the van sent by Linda. Both facts are more than sufficient to create apparent authority and the necessary reliance to support a finding of vicarious liability on the part of Linda.

Linda is directly liable to the customer for the driver's negligent act because Linda was negligent in the selection of the driver as her agent, and her negligence was the cause of the harm to the customer.

Whether or not a principal is vicariously liable for actions of an agent, "[a] principal who conducts an activity through an agent is subject to liability for harm to a third party caused by the agent's conduct if the harm was caused by the principal's negligence in selecting, training, retaining, supervising, or otherwise controlling the agent." Restatement (Third) of Agency § 7.05(1); see also Restatement (Second) of Agency § 213(b) ("person conducting an activity through servants or other agents is subject to liability . . . if he is negligent or reckless . . . in the employment of improper persons . . . in work involving risk of harm to others.")

The comments to the Restatement (Third) of Agency explain this "negligent selection" rule:

A foreseeable risk of harm may be created when one person conducts an activity through another person. For example, the actor chosen for a task may lack competence to perform it without endangering others. A task may require using an instrumentality that is dangerous to others unless the user has appropriate skill or supervision. Some tasks require performance in settings that pose a foreseeable risk of criminal or other intentional misconduct against third parties or their property unless the actor is chosen with due care in reference to that risk.

Restatement (Third) of Agency § 7.05(1) comment b.

Here Linda had reasons to suspect that the driver she hired was prone to driving negligently. The website that Linda searched showed recent customer complaints about the driver's poor driving and reported that he had been sued three times for negligent driving and held liable in each case. Linda ignored these warning signals because the driver's hourly rate was low, enabling her to reduce her delivery costs, and because the driver had his own van. Further, the driver's negligent driving of the van was the cause of the customer's injuries. Thus, there is a sufficient basis for finding that Linda's negligent selection of the driver was the cause of the customer's injuries. Under the "negligent selection" rule, Linda is directly liable to the customer.

ANALYSIS 6–EVIDENCE/CRIMINAL LAW

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Under the common law, what affirmative defenses to battery are available to the woman?
- (2)(a) If the eyewitness testifies, should the judge permit the eyewitness to repeat out-of-court statements made by an unavailable witness (the friend) and to describe the woman's nonverbal responses (nodding her head and giving a thumbs-up signal)?
- (2)(b) If the eyewitness testifies, should the judge permit the eyewitness to testify that she has seen the woman frequently and that the woman is always "arguing with people, acting out, and generally causing problems"?
- (3)(a) If the eyewitness testifies, should the judge permit cross-examination about the eyewitness's five-year-old shoplifting conviction?
- (3)(b) If the eyewitness testifies, should the judge permit cross-examination about a letter from the eyewitness to the man?

DISCUSSION

On these facts, under the common law, the woman may be able to establish that she acted in self-defense. This affirmative defense will succeed if the woman can prove that (1) the man's shouting and poking her in the shoulder with his finger caused her to have a reasonable belief that she was in imminent danger of unlawful bodily harm from the man and (2) her punching him in the nose was the amount of force reasonably necessary to prevent such harm.

Testimony from the eyewitness recounting the friend's out-of-court statement to the woman and the woman's nonverbal responses is relevant because it makes the woman's self-defense claim less probable. The friend's statement is nonhearsay because it is offered for the purpose of providing context for the woman's assertive conduct. Testimony describing the woman's assertive conduct, if it is offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, should be admitted either (1) as a nonhearsay opposing party's adopted statement, see Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2)(B), or (2) under the hearsay exception for statements of intent, see Fed. R. Evid. 803(3).

The eyewitness's testimony that the woman frequently argues with people, acts out, and generally causes problems is inadmissible character evidence. See Fed. R. Evid. 404(a) and 405. This testimony is not admissible as a prior crime, wrong, or act. See Fed. R. Evid. 404(b).

Cross-examination about the eyewitness's five-year-old shoplifting conviction to impeach her character for truthfulness probably should not be permitted. See Fed. R. Evid. 609(a)(2). Here, the conviction was for a crime punishable by imprisonment for less than one year, and the elements of the crime of shoplifting, as proved or admitted, usually do not require an act of dishonesty or false statement.

Defense counsel should be permitted to cross-examine the eyewitness about her letter to the man to show the eyewitness's bias.

Point One (20%)

Under the common law, the woman may be able to establish that she acted in self-defense.

At common law, a person charged with a crime involving the use of force (e.g., battery) can raise the affirmative defense of self-defense. See generally Wayne LaFare, Criminal Law § 10.4 (6th ed. 2017). Self-defense provides a defense when “a person reasonably believes that force is necessary to protect himself . . . from what he reasonably believes to be unlawful physical harm about to be inflicted by another . . .” United States v. Milk, 447 F.3d 593, 598 (8th Cir. 2006). To establish a claim of self-defense based upon the use of non-lethal force, a defendant must prove that she (1) reasonably believed that the force was necessary to protect her from another person's imminent use or attempted use of unlawful force and (2) used an amount of force proportionate to the force encountered. See, e.g., Stralow v. State, 2016 WL 625239 (Tex. Ct. App. 2016); see also Model Penal Code § 3.04 (noting that the use of force is “justifiable when the actor believes that such force is immediately necessary for the purpose of protecting himself against the use of unlawful force by such other person on the present occasion”). In some jurisdictions, a defendant also must prove either (1) that she was not the initial aggressor or (2) if she were the initial aggressor, that she withdrew from or abandoned the conflict before acting in self-defense.

First, the woman should be able to establish that she had a reasonable belief that force was necessary to protect her from the man's unlawful use of force against her. At the time she punched the man in the nose (the act constituting the charged crime of battery), the man was using unlawful force against her by repeatedly poking her shoulder with increasing force. See, e.g., State v. Glassman, 772 A.2d 863, 867 (Me. 2001) (evidence that victim pushed defendant was sufficient for jury instruction on self-defense). The repeated shoulder poking was an actual, rather than threatened, use of unlawful force. Because the poking involved increasing force, the man's actions were already causing or were reasonably likely to cause the woman imminent physical harm. In general, self-defense is warranted when a defendant reasonably fears imminent physical harm. However, defendants have also successfully argued self-defense in cases where they confronted unlawful force of a type not likely to cause physical harm (e.g., a non-injurious but offensive touching). See, e.g., Whisman v. State, 2012 WL 4513773 (Nev. 2012) (a person may use reasonable force to resist any offense against their person, including an “unlawful touching that does not result in a physical injury”); State v. Bruder, 676 N.W.2d 112, 115 (S.D.

2004) (same). Accordingly, on these facts, the woman can establish that she reasonably believed that she needed to use physical force to protect herself from the man's unlawful use of force.

Second, the woman must prove that her response (punching the man in the nose) involved force proportionate to the unlawful force encountered. See generally Wayne LaFave, Criminal Law, Self-Defense: Amount of Force, Chapter 10.4(b) (6th ed. 2017) ("In determining how much force one may use in self-defense, the law recognizes that the amount of force which he may justifiably use must be reasonably related to the threatened harm which he seeks to avoid.") The man used his hand (rather than a weapon) to poke the woman, and the woman used her hand (rather than a weapon) to punch him in the nose. Ultimately, the question of whether a punch is a proportionate response to increasingly forceful poking is a factual question, see, e.g., In re Savannah B., 2004 WL 119922 (Cal. App. 2014) ("[T]he question of whether a closed-fist punch in the face constitutes an excessive reaction to a push or shove is a factual question.").

Finally, in some jurisdictions self-defense requires a defendant to also prove either (1) that she was not the initial aggressor or (2) if she were the initial aggressor, that she withdrew from or abandoned the conflict before acting in self-defense. Here, the facts do not support a finding that the woman was the initial aggressor.

[NOTE: An examinee should not discuss self-defense in the context of a "stand your ground" statute because the call of the question requires a common law analysis. However, the analysis under many "stand your ground" statutes would be substantially similar.]

Point Two(a) (30%)

The eyewitness's testimony recounting the friend's out-of-court statement and the woman's responsive nodding of her head and giving a thumbs-up signal is relevant and not inadmissible hearsay.

The eyewitness's testimony recounting the friend's out-of-court statement to the woman ("If anyone annoys us today they will not be seeing this play—they'll be going to the hospital!") and describing her observation that the woman responded by nodding her head and giving a thumbs-up signal is relevant. Assuming that the woman argues that she acted in self-defense, as noted in Point One, the jury must decide whether her punch was justified under the circumstances. The eyewitness's testimony and the woman's response are relevant because they have some tendency to make "a fact of . . . consequence" (her reasonable belief that she needed to punch the man to protect herself) "less probable than it would be without the evidence" because together the evidence suggests that the woman might have punched the man simply because he annoyed her and with the intention of hurting him rather than stopping him from poking her. See Fed. R. Evid. 401.

The woman's nodding her head and giving a thumbs-up signal is assertive conduct. The friend's out-of-court statement is nonhearsay because it is offered for the purpose of providing context for the woman's assertive conduct. See, e.g., United States v. Woods, 301 F.3d 556, 561 (7th Cir. 2002) (noting that statements that prompt an adoptive admission are admissible either because they were adopted or to provide context). The friend's statement, if it is offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, is a hearsay statement. See Fed. R. Evid. 801(c)(2).

However, the woman's statement (her assertive conduct) is admissible for two reasons. First, a statement is not hearsay if "[t]he statement is offered against an opposing party and . . . is one the party manifested that it adopted or believed to be true." See Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2). Here, the prosecution is offering a statement by the opposing party—the woman—against the opposing party to show that she adopted the friend's statement and/or believed it to be true. See, e.g., United States v. Tocco, 135 F.3d 116, 129 (2d Cir. 1998) (finding that a head nod in response to a statement constituted an adoptive admission).

Second, because the statement that the woman adopted was a statement of intent or plan, it would also be admissible under the hearsay exception for statements related to a declarant's "then-existing state of mind." See Fed. R. Evid. 803(3). For more than a century, courts have applied the Hillmon doctrine, which permits the use of such statements of intent by a declarant to prove the declarant's future conduct. See Mut. Life Ins. Co. of New York v. Hillmon, 145 U.S. 285 (1892); Coy v. Renico, 414 F. Supp. 2d 744, 766–771 (E.D. Mich. 2006). Here, the friend's statement, which the woman adopted, can be used to prove that the woman intended to physically injure anyone who annoyed her and her friend, which makes her self-defense claim less probable. See Fed. R. Evid. 803(3).

[NOTE: If the woman's assertive conduct is not offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, it would still be relevant and can be admitted as circumstantial evidence of the woman's state of mind (i.e., frustration, anger, hostility). Such evidence of the woman's state of mind would be relevant to show that the woman acted out of pique and not because she reasonably believed it was necessary to defend herself against a threat from the man. Examinees should not discuss the confrontation clause because they are instructed not to discuss constitutional issues. Therefore, examinees should not receive credit for discussing confrontation clause precedent, including Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004).]

The eyewitness's testimony about the woman's public behavior should not be permitted because it is inadmissible character evidence.

Although the eyewitness's testimony that the eyewitness recognized the woman would be relevant, under Rule 404(a)(1) evidence of a person's wrongs or other acts is "not admissible to prove that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with the character or trait." Here, Rule 404(a)(1) bars admission of the eyewitness's testimony that the woman is always "arguing with people, acting out, and generally causing problems" because this character evidence would be relevant only to support the impermissible propensity inference. See, e.g., Delozier v. Evans, 763 P.2d 986, 991 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1988) ("The trial court excluded testimony offered to show that Delozier was combative and aggressive when intoxicated.").

Although character evidence may be admissible against a criminal defendant, this occurs only after a defendant presents evidence of her own good character (e.g., evidence that she has a "peaceable" disposition) or evidence of the victim's bad character (e.g., evidence that the victim has a "violent" disposition). See Fed. R. Evid. 404(a)(2)(A) & (B). Here, the woman has not offered any evidence that would "open the door" to the eyewitness's testimony. The woman's affirmative defense of self-defense does not depend on showing good character.

Finally, evidence of prior bad acts of any party or witness can be admitted for non-propensity purposes (i.e., to prove motive, opportunity, intent, plan, etc.). See Fed. R. Evid. 404(b)(2). However, the circumstances here afford no reasonable argument that the eyewitness's testimony could be used for any relevant non-propensity purpose.

Point Three(a) (15%)

Cross-examination about the eyewitness's five-year-old shoplifting conviction should probably not be permitted to impeach her character for truthfulness.

Rule 609 governs the impeachment of witnesses using prior convictions. Under Rule 609(a)(1), criminal convictions may be used to attack a witness's character for truthfulness if the crime was punishable by death or by imprisonment for more than one year. Fed. R. Evid. 609(a)(1). Here, the shoplifting conviction does not satisfy Rule 609(a)(1) because it was punishable by a maximum possible sentence of just six months in jail.

Under Rule 609(a)(2), "for any crime regardless of the punishment, the [conviction] evidence must be admitted if the court can readily determine that establishing the elements of the crime required proving—or the witness's admitting—a dishonest act or false statement." Most courts have found that shoplifting normally does not satisfy Rule 609(a)(2) because it is a crime that can be completed without an act of dishonesty or false statement. See, e.g., United States v. Dunson, 142 F.3d 1213, 1215 (10th Cir. 1998) (perceiving no error in district court's conclusion that a shoplifting conviction fell outside the scope of Rule 609(a)(2)). In fact, some have held that most theft crimes do not satisfy Rule 609(a)(2) because they involve acts of stealth and not dishonesty. See, e.g., United States v. Washington, 702 F.3d 886, 893 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Theft is a prime example of a crime of stealth, and it has been distinguished from crimes of dishonesty in most federal circuits"); United States v. Sellers, 906 F.2d 597, 603 (11th Cir. 1990) ("crimes such as theft, robbery, or shoplifting do not involve 'dishonest or false statement' within the meaning of Rule 609(a)(2)"); United States v. Yeo, 739 F.2d 385, 387 (8th Cir. 1984) ("Theft, which involves stealth, . . . is not characterized by an element of deceit . . ."); United States v. Entrekin, 624 F.2d 597, 598–99 (5th Cir. 1980) (shoplifting does not involve dishonesty or false statement within the meaning of Rule 609(a)(2)). A court taking this view would normally not allow the eyewitness's five-year-old shoplifting conviction to be used for impeachment.

However, Rule 609(a)(2) is not an absolute bar to the use of a shoplifting conviction to impeach a person's character for truthfulness. If the woman's counsel can establish that the eyewitness's shoplifting conviction required proof of, or admission to, a dishonest act or false statement by the eyewitness, the court may admit that conviction for impeachment purposes. United States v. Veater, 2012 WL 4882300 (D. Utah 2012) (citing Dunson, 142 F.3d at 1215–16) (noting that "shoplifting convictions are not automatically a crime involving dishonesty or false statement within the meaning of Rule 609(a)(2)," but that "shoplifting convictions are also not automatically excluded if it can be shown that it involved fraudulent or deceitful conduct" and that "the court need not ferret it out; that responsibility [to prove that a prior conviction required proof of, or admission to, a dishonest act or false statement by the defendant] falls squarely on the proponent's shoulders").

[NOTE: Although the majority view is that a shoplifting conviction could not be used for impeachment absent proof that it was accomplished by “fraudulent or deceitful conduct,” there are some jurisdictions whose courts take the view that theft is inherently a crime involving dishonesty or false statement. See, e.g., State v. Page, 449 So. 2d 813, 815 (Fla. 1984); People v. Spates, 395 N.E.2d 563, 568 (Ill. 1979); State v. Johnson, 460 N.E.2d 625, 629 (Ohio Ct. App. 1983) (stealing is a dishonest act); Cline v. State, 782 P.2d 399, 400 (Okla. Crim. App. 1989) (stealing is “universally regarded as conduct which reflects adversely on a man’s honesty and integrity”). In such jurisdictions, the eyewitness’s shoplifting conviction could be used to impeach the eyewitness’s character for truthfulness.]

Point Three(b) (10%)

Defense counsel should be permitted to cross-examine the eyewitness about her letter to the man to show the eyewitness’s bias in favor of the man.

Although impeachment by showing bias is not addressed by the Federal Rules of Evidence, it predates the creation of the Rules and has traditionally been widely permitted. In United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984), the Supreme Court held that bias has always been a legitimate and permissible form of impeachment.

Here, the eyewitness’s letter thanking the man “for 10 years of a great friendship” suggests that the eyewitness is biased in favor of the man, meaning that defense counsel could use it to impeach her. See, e.g., Varnado v. Yates, 2009 WL 2045981 (C.D. Cal. 2009) (“Of course, Nunley could have been impeached for possible bias because he was a longtime friend of [petitioner’s] and he knew Bryan.”). Use of the letter for these purposes does not raise hearsay concerns. Here, the letter would be offered to prove the eyewitness’s bias based on her belief that she and the man had shared “10 years of a great friendship,” a belief that has relevance to the eyewitness’s bias independent of the truth of the matter asserted. See, e.g., United States v. Hudson, 970 F.2d 948, 957 (1st Cir. 1992) (“As [the statements] were not being offered for the truth of the matter asserted, they were not hearsay in any respect.”).

[NOTE: Defense counsel would not be using the letter to establish the eyewitness’s general propensity for lying, so Rule 608(b)’s prohibition on the admission of extrinsic propensity impeachment evidence would not apply. See, e.g., United States v. Thorn, 917 F.2d 170, 176 (5th Cir. 1990) (“An exception to the prohibition against the use of extrinsic evidence to attack the credibility of a witness exists in cases in which the evidence tends to show bias or motive for the witness to testify untruthfully.”)]

Finally, it is not necessary for an examinee to discuss the Best Evidence Rule (Rule 1002) because the question does not ask about the admissibility of the letter. However, an examinee who properly addresses the issues discussed above and also considers the possibility that, if the letter is offered in evidence the Best Evidence Rule applies if the contents of the letter must be proved, demonstrates an accurate understanding of the law.]

QUESTION 1 – EVIDENCE

A woman brought a tort action against a trucking company in a federal district court in State A one month after a traffic accident in State A. The woman had been driving a car that collided with a truck owned by the trucking company and driven by one of its employees. As a result of injuries sustained during the accident, the woman is permanently disabled and unable to work.

The diversity action, which is properly before the federal court, requires a determination of fault. The woman alleges that, at the time of the accident, the truck driver was driving under the influence of prescription narcotics and lost control of his truck on the highway, which caused the collision. The trucking company argues that the woman caused the accident by driving her car at an excessive speed.

The woman will seek to introduce the following three items of evidence:

1. In-court testimony from a trucking company representative that, less than one hour after the accident, the trucking company began an internal investigation into the accident, which resulted in the truck driver's being fired the next day.
2. A handwritten letter the woman received while she was recuperating in the hospital. The letter, dated one week after the accident, read: "I am terribly sorry about the accident that I caused. It was all my fault. I was taking pain pills prescribed by my doctor and shouldn't have been driving." The letter was signed with the name of the truck driver. The woman no longer has the original (hard copy) letter, but she has a photograph of the letter that she took with her cell phone.
3. In-court testimony from the truck driver's doctor that the truck driver has suffered from chronic pain for years and that she had prescribed a powerful narcotic to treat that pain one month before the accident. The doctor is licensed in State A, where she has treated the truck driver for many years.

The truck driver will be unavailable to testify at trial because neither party has been able to procure his attendance and his whereabouts are unknown. The woman's cell phone has been examined by a neutral computer expert, who reports that the photograph of the letter is clearly legible and that the image has not been altered in any manner. The doctor has informed the parties that she does not want to testify about her communications with her patient, the truck driver, and that she has had no contact with her patient since the week before the accident.

The defense team will seek pretrial to exclude all three items of evidence proffered by the woman. Assume that the judge will find all three items relevant under Rule 401 of the Federal Rules of Evidence and will refuse to exclude any item of evidence under Rule 403 of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

With respect to each item of evidence that will be proffered by the woman, identify and explain the most plausible objections that the trucking company's defense team could make, any plausible responses the woman's attorney should make to those objections, and how the court should rule.

QUESTION 2 – CORPORATIONS & LLCS / CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

A shareholder of Retailer Inc., a publicly traded corporation in the retail business, is concerned about reports in a respected national business magazine that Retailer has been making large donations to a secretive political group, Americans Fighting Against Wrongdoing (AFAW). AFAW places television election advertisements supporting state and federal political candidates who AFAW believes are committed to fighting wrongdoing. The shareholder believes that Retailer's donations to AFAW do not promote Retailer's business in any way.

The shareholder, who owns 100 shares of Retailer stock, has decided to take action. The shares, which the shareholder has held for the past 10 years, have a current market value of $5,000.

The shareholder has sent a letter to Retailer requesting that she be allowed to inspect all minutes of the meetings of Retailer's board of directors relating to donations made by Retailer to AFAW. The shareholder explains that her purpose is to confirm these donations and seek to have the board desist from further waste of corporate assets.

The shareholder has also sent a second letter to Retailer requesting that a proposed shareholder resolution be presented for a vote of the shareholders at the upcoming annual shareholders' meeting. The resolution reads: "We the shareholders of Retailer Inc. hereby resolve that Retailer's board of directors shall not approve any political expenditures by Retailer unless such expenditures are specifically authorized by a majority vote of all outstanding shares of Retailer." The shareholder explains, "This resolution is to stop the board from wasting corporate assets, including by making further donations to AFAW."

Retailer is incorporated in State X, which has adopted the Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA).

1. Under State X law, is the shareholder entitled to inspect the requested board minutes? Explain.
2. Under State X law, is the shareholder's proposed resolution a proper subject for submission to Retailer's shareholders for their vote? Explain.
3. Assuming that the resolution is proper for submission for shareholder action under State X law, would the resolution (if approved) infringe Retailer's First Amendment rights? Explain.

QUESTION 3 – DECEDENTS' ESTATES / TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS

Ann, a successful entrepreneur, grew up in a small town in State A. Ann's family could not afford to send her to college, but a group of local store owners, sensing Ann's potential, paid Ann's tuition for college and graduate business school. Twenty years later, in honor of the store owners, Ann created a trust and funded it with $1,000,000.

Under the terms of the trust, the trustee (a local bank) must annually use trust income to purchase and install seasonal plantings on all principal streets in the town where Ann grew up. The trustee is authorized to invade trust principal to purchase and install such plantings if the trust income is insufficient. The trust instrument further provides that the trust will last in perpetuity or until such time as the principal of the trust has been exhausted; no individuals are named as trust beneficiaries. Currently the trust's annual income is $40,000 and the annual cost of seasonal plantings is anticipated to be about $35,000.

Last week, Ann died unexpectedly and without a will. At the time of her death she had $100,000 in a bank account in her name alone. Ann's uncle and niece survive her.

The personal representative of Ann's estate properly filed an action to set aside the $1,000,000 trust on the ground that it is invalid under the common-law rule against perpetuities, which applies in State A. The personal representative also requested judicial approval of a proposal to distribute the assets of the allegedly invalid trust, with the other assets of Ann's estate, to Ann's niece but not to her uncle. Ann's uncle contends that he is entitled to half of Ann's estate.

State A has adopted the Uniform Trust Code.

1. May the trust endure for its stated duration (in perpetuity or until its assets are exhausted)? Explain.
2. Assuming that the trust cannot endure for its stated duration, could a court preserve the trust for any period of time to carry out Ann's intentions? Explain.
3. To whom should Ann's estate be distributed and in what shares? Explain.

QUESTION 4 – FAMILY LAW

Ten years ago, a husband and wife were married during a one-day stopover in State A while they were traveling by train on a cross-country vacation. After this trip, the husband and wife returned to their home in State B.

Five years ago, the couple had a child, Sarah, in State B. The wife then quit her job and stayed at home to serve as Sarah's primary caregiver.

Two years ago, the husband was seriously injured when he was struck by a car while walking across a street. After the accident, the husband began drinking to excess. He also became physically and emotionally abusive toward his wife and was convicted of assault after a physical attack led to her hospitalization. The husband has not worked since his injury.

Nine months ago, the wife took Sarah and moved to State A, where the wife's sister lives. The wife did not tell her husband that she was leaving, but she called him a week after arriving in State A, gave him her address, and told him that she intended to remain in State A with Sarah. The wife found a job in State A and moved out of her sister's home and into a nearby apartment. The husband made no effort to contact the wife or Sarah.

One week ago, the wife commenced a divorce action against the husband in State A. In this action, the wife seeks custody of Sarah and a share of the couple's marital property. The husband was personally served with a summons and divorce complaint at his home in State B.

The husband has never been to State A except for the one-day stopover when he and the wife were married there. He owns no assets in State A.

State A law allows for both fault-based and no-fault divorce and requires that either the divorce plaintiff or the defendant have been residing in State A for six months before the plaintiff may file a divorce petition. State A has adopted the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA).

1. Does a State A court have jurisdiction to grant the wife
 - (a) a divorce? Explain.
 - (b) sole physical custody of the couple's daughter, Sarah? Explain.
 - (c) a share of the couple's marital property? Explain.
2. Assuming that the State A court has jurisdiction, could the court grant the wife
 - (a) a divorce based on the husband's fault? Explain.
 - (b) sole physical custody of Sarah? Explain.

QUESTION 5 – SECURED TRANSACTIONS

On February 1, a company borrowed $100,000 from a bank. Pursuant to an agreement signed by both parties, the company granted the bank a security interest in “all of [the company’s] present and future inventory, accounts, and equipment” to secure its obligation to repay the loan. Later that day, the bank filed, in the appropriate filing office, a properly completed financing statement listing the company as the debtor and the bank as the secured party and indicating “inventory, accounts, and equipment” as collateral.

On March 1, the company bought a power generator, for use in the company’s business, from a manufacturer. The purchase price of the power generator was $24,000. The manufacturer agreed that the company could pay the purchase price in 12 monthly installments of $2,000 each. Pursuant to an agreement signed by both parties, the company granted the manufacturer a security interest in the power generator to secure the company’s obligation to make all the installment payments. Later that day, the manufacturer filed, in the appropriate filing office, a properly completed financing statement listing the company as the debtor and the manufacturer as the secured party and indicating the power generator as collateral. The manufacturer delivered the power generator to the company on March 3.

On April 1, the company entered into an agreement entitled “Lease Agreement” with a supplier. The Lease Agreement, signed by both parties, stated that the supplier was leasing to the company a retinal scanner for use in the company’s security system for a fixed term of three years with no right of cancellation by either party. The Lease Agreement also provided that, if the company made each of the 36 required monthly lease payments of $3,000, it would have the option to become the owner of the retinal scanner for no additional consideration. The supplier delivered the retinal scanner to the company on April 2. The supplier did not file a financing statement with respect to this transaction.

The company has defaulted on its obligations to the bank, the manufacturer, and the supplier. The bank and the manufacturer are each asserting an interest in the power generator, and the bank and the supplier are each asserting an interest in the retinal scanner.

 - (a) Does the bank have an enforceable interest in the power generator? Explain.
 - (b) Does the manufacturer have an enforceable interest in the power generator? Explain.
 - (c) Assuming that both the bank and the manufacturer have enforceable interests in the power generator, whose interest has priority? Explain.
 - (a) Does the bank have an enforceable interest in the retinal scanner? Explain.
 - (b) Does the supplier have an enforceable interest in the retinal scanner? Explain.
 - (c) Assuming that both the bank and the supplier have enforceable interests in the retinal scanner, whose interest has priority? Explain.

QUESTION 6 – REAL PROPERTY

The owner of a two-story building converted it into three two-bedroom apartments. The owner occupied the ground-floor apartment; the other two apartments were rental units. All the apartment interiors had a similar modern look and design. In the apartments, the owner installed standard modern light fixtures in all rooms except the master bedroom of her own apartment, where she installed a gold-plated chandelier. The chandelier was of an ornate, old-fashioned style and did not match the modern light fixtures in her apartment or the other apartments. But because the owner had inherited the chandelier from her mother, she had a strong sentimental attachment to it. In her living room the owner also placed a 65-inch television on a wall mount affixed to the wall over the fireplace. The conversion was completed last year, and immediately upon completion, the owner moved into her apartment.

The owner then wrote the following advertisement and paid to have it published in the local newspaper:

Two 2-bedroom apartments for rent. Only professional women (but not lawyers) need apply.

Eight individuals applied to rent the apartments. Three were male accountants. Five were women, three of whom were lawyers. The owner told the men that she “[does] not rent to men.” She then rented one of the apartments to a female architect and the other to a female physician. Both leases ended last month and were not renewed. The owner then decided to sell the building.

Last week, the owner showed the apartment building to a prospective buyer. While showing her own apartment, the owner commented to the buyer that the chandelier had come from her mother and meant a lot to her. After seeing all three apartments, the buyer agreed to buy the building. The sales contract, signed by both parties, does not mention fixtures, and the owner and the buyer now disagree on whether the chandelier and the wall-mounted television are fixtures included in the sale of the building.

The state has adopted a fixtures code, of which Sections 1 and 2 provide as follows:

- (1) Unless the terms of a residential real estate contract otherwise provide, upon the closing of the contract the seller shall deliver to the buyer the real property described in the contract, including all fixtures that were affixed or attached to the real property at the time the contract was signed.
 - (2) For purposes of Section 1, a fixture is an item of personal property affixed or attached to the real property by the seller unless a reasonable person would conclude, based upon all the facts and circumstances relating to the specific personal property, that the item of personal property at the time it was affixed or attached was not affixed or attached to the real property with the intent to make it a permanent part of the real property.
1. Did the owner violate the Fair Housing Act of 1968 by refusing to rent to men and lawyers? Explain.
 2. Did the owner or the newspaper publisher violate the Fair Housing Act of 1968 by publishing the owner’s rental advertisement? Explain.

ANALYSIS 1 – EVIDENCE

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) In a tort action alleging negligence by a company employee, should a court exclude evidence that a defendant company fired the allegedly negligent employee one day after conducting an internal accident investigation?
- (2)(a) What evidence should a court require to authenticate a handwritten letter purportedly written by an unavailable person?
- (2)(b) If a writing (i.e., the letter) has been authenticated, but the original hard copy has been lost, should a court find an unaltered cell-phone photograph of the writing admissible under the "best evidence" rule?
- (2)(c) If a writing (i.e., the letter) is authenticated and satisfies the "best evidence" rule, should hearsay statements contained therein be admitted as statements against interest by an unavailable declarant?
- (3) Does the physician-patient privilege prevent a doctor from testifying about the condition and treatment of a patient now unavailable for trial if the patient voluntarily disclosed his own relevant medical information to a person injured in an accident, prior to the onset of litigation?

DISCUSSION

Summary

As to the evidence of the trucking company's investigation of the accident and firing of the truck driver, the trucking company could plausibly object to the admission of this evidence because the investigation and firing were subsequent remedial measures taken by the defendant and are inadmissible under FRE 407. The court should rule in favor of excluding this evidence.

The defense could plausibly object to admission of the truck driver's letter based on the following arguments: (1) it cannot be authenticated, (2) the photograph of the letter does not satisfy the best evidence rule, and (3) the letter itself is hearsay. The woman's attorney should respond as follows: (1) the cell-phone photograph of the handwritten letter can likely be authenticated through testimony from any lay or expert witness who can identify the truck driver's handwriting; (2) although the original (hard copy) letter has been lost, the unaltered cell-phone photograph satisfies the best evidence rule; and (3) although the letter is hearsay, it should be admitted under FRE

804(b)(3) as a statement against interest by an unavailable declarant. The court should reject all three defense objections and admit the image of the letter.

Finally, the defense could plausibly object that admission of the doctor's testimony would violate the physician-patient privilege. The court's decision will depend on applicable state law, but all jurisdictions recognize some form of physician-patient privilege. The court should apply the privilege and rule that the doctor need not testify. However, the court could admit the doctor's testimony based on a specific finding that the truck driver's voluntary disclosure of his use of pain pills in the letter to the woman effected an implied waiver of the physician-patient privilege limited to this relevant medical information.

In a case alleging negligence by a company employee, a court should exclude evidence that a defendant company fired the allegedly negligent employee one day after conducting an internal accident investigation because the investigation and firing are "subsequent remedial measures" under FRE 407.

Federal Rule of Evidence 407 excludes evidence of "measures" a defendant has taken "that would have made an earlier injury or harm less likely to occur." Such evidence is inadmissible if offered to prove "negligence" or "culpable conduct." See Fed. R. Evid. 407 (2015). The justification for Rule 407 is twofold. First, the probative value of any subsequent remedial measure as an admission of fault is limited. Second, exclusion fosters "a social policy of encouraging people to take . . . steps in furtherance of added safety." See id. (advisory committee's note).

Here, proof that the defendant company immediately investigated the accident and one day later fired the truck driver is relevant only insofar as it suggests that, at the time of the accident, the truck driver acted in a culpable or negligent fashion. The company should object to the admission of this evidence for that purpose, and this defense objection should be sustained by the court. The general rule in both state and federal courts is that post-incident discipline constitutes a subsequent remedial measure. See Alfieri v. Carmelite Nursing Home, Inc., 29 Misc.3d 509, 514–16, 907 N.Y.S.2d 577 (2010) (surveying cases). More specifically, the termination of employees under similar circumstances is typically viewed as a subsequent remedial measure. For example, in Mahnke v. Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority, 821 F. Supp. 2d 125, 152 (D.D.C. 2011), the court found evidence regarding a bus driver's termination following an accident with a pedestrian inadmissible as a subsequent remedial measure. See also Dukett v. Mausness, 546 N.E.2d 1292 (Ind. Ct. App. 1989) (excluding evidence that cab company fired driver the day after an accident); Hull v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., 812 F.2d 584, 587 (10th Cir. 1987) (evidence of termination of negligent employee and change in safety policies not admissible because it would "trespass inferentially into the Rule 407 prohibited terrain of proof of culpable conduct").

Under Rule 407, evidence of subsequent remedial measures is admissible only if offered "for another purpose, such as impeachment or—if disputed—proving ownership, control, or the feasibility of precautionary measures." Nothing in the facts indicates that these issues will arise.

Point Two(a) (15%)

The cell-phone photograph of the handwritten letter may be admitted if the letter can be authenticated.

The photograph of the letter is relevant only if the letter was actually written by the truck driver. Under Federal Rule of Evidence 901(a), “[t]o satisfy the requirement of authenticating or identifying an item of evidence, the proponent must produce evidence sufficient to support a finding that the item is what the proponent claims it is.” Generally, a handwritten letter can be authenticated by testimony of either a witness with knowledge (e.g., the truck driver’s testimony that he wrote the letter) or testimony from a lay or expert witness identifying the handwriting. Specifically, under Rule 901(b)(2), handwriting can be authenticated by “[a] nonexpert’s opinion that handwriting is genuine, based on familiarity with it that was not acquired for the current litigation.” See, e.g., Smith v. State, 902 A.2d 1119, 1124 (Del. 2006) (noting that there is generally no minimum number of observations of someone’s handwriting required to constitute familiarity but that there must be a minimum factual basis, which some courts have held to be observation of handwriting on one occasion).

Here, although the woman is unable to authenticate the letter, there are likely lay or expert witnesses who could authenticate the truck driver’s handwriting.

Of course, in the unlikely event that the letter cannot be authenticated, the photograph of the letter should not be admitted for any purpose.

Point Two(b) (25%)

If the court finds that the truck driver’s letter has been authenticated, it should admit the photograph of the letter because the photograph satisfies the “best evidence” rule.

If the court finds that the letter has been authenticated, it must then address the fact that the woman has lost the original (hard copy) letter. All she has is a photograph of the letter taken with a cell phone. Under the “best evidence” rule, when a party seeks to prove the content of a writing, she must do so by producing the writing itself. See McCormick on Evidence § 229.

The federal version of the “best evidence” rule is contained in Rule 1002, which provides that “[a]n original writing . . . is required in order to prove its content unless these rules . . . provide[] otherwise.” Fed. R. Evid. 1002. However, original writings are not always available or extant, so Rules 1003 and 1004 provide widely used exceptions to the “best evidence” rule.

First, under Rule 1003, “a duplicate” of a document “is admissible to the same extent as the original unless a genuine question is raised about the original’s authenticity . . .” Fed. R. Evid. 1003. The woman should be able to admit the photograph as a duplicate. The photograph has been found by a neutral computer expert to be clearly legible and not altered in any manner. Under these circumstances, the photograph is a duplicate of the letter, no different from photocopies, which are routinely admitted under Rule 1003. See, e.g., U.S. v. Stockton, 968 F.2d 715, 719 (8th Cir. 1992) (photographs of notes taken by DEA agents are admissible as duplicates to prove content of the notes); cf. Cobb v. Commonwealth, 2013 WL 5744363 (Va. Ct. App. 2013) (a cell-phone service provider’s printout of text messages sent to cell phone is an admissible duplicate of the original writing).

Second, Rule 1004 allows the contents of writings to be proved by “other evidence” under certain circumstances. One circumstance where “other evidence” is allowed is when “all the originals are lost or destroyed, and not by the proponent acting in bad faith.” Fed. R. Evid. 1004(a). Although the facts do not specify how the original (hard copy) handwritten letter was lost, there is no evidence that the woman acted in bad faith.

Thus, the court should conclude that the photograph of the letter satisfies the “best evidence” rule.

Point Two(c) (25%)

If the letter is authenticated and the cell-phone photograph satisfies the “best evidence” rule, the hearsay statements in the letter should be admitted as statements against interest by an unavailable declarant.

If the letter is authenticated and the cell-phone photograph satisfies the “best evidence” rule, the contents of the letter are relevant to this tort action because they support the woman's argument that the truck driver caused the accident by driving under the influence of narcotic pain pills. However, if offered by the woman for this purpose, the letter is hearsay because it is an out-of-court statement offered to “prove the truth of matter asserted in the statement.” Fed. R. Evid. 801(c).

Although the letter is hearsay, the woman should argue and the court should find that the letter is admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) as a statement against interest by an unavailable declarant.

First, the truck driver is an unavailable declarant because neither party has been able to procure his attendance at trial and his whereabouts are unknown. A witness is unavailable when he is “absent from the trial . . . and the statement’s proponent has not been able . . . to procure the declarant’s attendance or testimony.” Fed. R. Evid. 804(a)(5).

Second, Rule 804(b)(3) defines the “statement against interest” exception to the hearsay rule as a statement that “a reasonable person in the declarant’s position would have made only if the person believed it to be true because, when made, it . . . had so great a tendency . . . to expose the declarant to civil or criminal liability”

The truck driver's letter was a statement against interest because he wrote, “I am terribly sorry about the accident that I caused. It was all my fault. I was taking pain pills . . . and shouldn't have been driving.” Taken in context, the letter was an unequivocal admission of fault potentially subjecting the truck driver to both civil and criminal liability and was the type of statement that a reasonable person would make only if the person believed it to be true.

[NOTE: Some examinees might argue incorrectly that the woman should also argue that the letter should be admitted as a statement made by a party opponent or by the defendant’s “agent or employee on a matter within the scope of that relationship and while it existed.” Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2)(A) and (D). This is incorrect. The truck driver is not a party. The truck driver was also fired a day after the accident and the letter is dated a week after the accident, i.e., at a time when the employment relationship no longer existed. Similarly, an argument that the letter should be excluded as an offer of settlement from the truck driver to the woman under Fed. R. Evid. 408 is incorrect because the statement was not made during compromise (i.e., settlement) negotiations.]

Because of the physician-patient privilege, the court probably should not compel the doctor to testify, but this will depend on applicable state law.

The woman will seek to have the truck driver's doctor testify that the truck driver suffered from chronic pain and, one month before the accident, had been prescribed a powerful narcotic to treat that pain. The doctor has stated that she does not want to testify, and the trucking company should object to this testimony on the ground of physician-patient privilege.

This is a diversity action filed in federal district court, so "state law governs privilege regarding a claim or defense for which state law supplies the rule of decision." Fed. R. Evid. 501.

Although the problem does not specify the physician-patient privilege law of the relevant state (likely State A), all states recognize this privilege, see Laurie L. Levenson, Evidence, in The Journalist's Guide to American Law 330 (J.L. Nockleby ed. 2013), and the privilege invariably belongs to the patient. When a patient, like the truck driver, is unavailable at the time of trial and cannot effectuate a waiver, the physician typically has an ongoing duty to assert the privilege and thus refuse to disclose confidential information. See, e.g., State ex rel. Maloney v. Allen, 26 S.W.3d 244 (Mo. Ct. App. 2000). The privilege generally covers communications made by the patient to the physician for the purpose of securing treatment, which would include any statements by the truck driver to his doctor describing his pain and medical records describing medications. See generally Liew v. New York University Medical Center, 55 A.D.3d 566 (N.Y. Sup. Ct., App. Div.); Sun Health Corp. v. Myers, 205 Ariz. 315 (Ariz. Ct. App. 2003). Given these general principles, the court should find that the State A physician-patient privilege precludes the doctor from testifying about the truck driver's chronic pain or the prescribed narcotics.

The woman may respond that the truck driver partially and impliedly waived the physician-patient privilege when he disclosed his use of "pain pills" in the letter to the woman. However, the disclosure of medical information to third parties is usually not considered an implied waiver. See, e.g., Lezell v. New York, 538 N.Y.S.2d 902 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1989) (disclosure of bare facts of medical history does not waive privilege in medical records and physician-patient communications).

However, some cases suggest that certain voluntary disclosures of otherwise privileged information by the patient could be viewed as an implied waiver of physician-patient privilege for communications relevant to the information disclosed. See, e.g., Liverano v. Devinsky, 717 N.Y.S.2d 629 (N.Y. App. Div. 2000) (defendant's voluntary disclosure to media that he suffered from glaucoma was deemed to waive the physician-patient privilege in his ophthalmological medical records); Farrow v. Allen, 608 N.Y.S.2d 1 (N.Y. App. Div. 1993) (physician-patient privilege applies only to protect communications made in confidence and in context of physician-patient relationship, but if patient reveals information to third party wholly unconnected to treatment and not subject to any privilege, communication no longer deemed a confidence and privilege deemed waived as to that information). However, a court adopting this view would limit the scope of the doctor's testimony to the relevant medical information (the pain pills).

ANALYSIS 2 – CORPORATIONS & LLCs / CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does State X law permit inspection by a corporate shareholder of board minutes dealing with the corporation's political expenditures when the shareholder's stated purpose is to prevent an alleged waste of corporate assets?
- (2) Under State X law, is a shareholder's resolution prohibiting a corporation's board from approving any political expenditures unless previously authorized by the corporation's shareholders a proper subject for shareholder action?
- (3) Would such a shareholder resolution, if approved by a majority vote of the corporation's outstanding shares, infringe the corporation's First Amendment right to free speech?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The requested board minutes that relate to Retailer's donations to AFAW are subject to inspection under the MBCA inspection statute. The shareholder's inspection demand was based on credible news reports and identified categories of documents related to the shareholder's proper purpose to expose the impropriety of these donations.

The shareholder's resolution requiring the board to obtain shareholder authorization before approving political expenditures by Retailer is not a proper subject for shareholder action. The resolution ("board of directors shall not approve . . .") is phrased as a binding limitation on the board's discretion. Although the MBCA recognizes the fundamental right of shareholders to propose resolutions for shareholder action, such a proposal must generally be phrased as a precatory recommendation (not a mandate) for board action.

The First Amendment, as interpreted by the Supreme Court in Citizens United, treats independent political expenditures by for-profit corporations as protected speech. Nonetheless, the corporation's First Amendment rights are not infringed by a shareholder resolution to restrict its political activity because the restriction would be imposed by private actors, not by state action. Indeed, in Citizens United, the Court made clear that shareholders can place limits on corporate speech by exercising their rights to participate in "corporate democracy," thus making "corporations . . . accountable for their positions."

[NOTE: Governance of the internal affairs of Retailer, because it is incorporated in a Model Business Corporation Act jurisdiction, is subject to the MBCA rules related to shareholder rights to information and to initiate corporate action. See MBCA § 15.01(a)(1) (preserving the judicially developed doctrine that internal corporate affairs are governed by the law of the state of incorporation). Here, the question specifically calls for an analysis of State X law and does not raise any issues under other laws, including the federal shareholder proposal rule (Securities and Exchange Act Rule 14a-8). Thus, the examinee's answer should focus on the applicable rules supplied by the MBCA.

The question is based on the 2016 Revision of the MBCA. The result and analysis for the question, however, would be the same under earlier versions of the MBCA.]

Point One (35%)

The shareholder has a right to inspect the requested board minutes. Her request is specific and based on credible press reports of large, questionable donations by Retailer. Further, her stated desire to expose the wastefulness of these donations is a proper purpose.

Generally, a corporation is required to keep minutes of meetings of its board of directors. See MBCA § 16.01(a)(5), (b). Thus, the documents requested here by the shareholder should be in existence and available from Retailer.

Under the MBCA, any shareholder has a right to inspect and copy board minutes by making a demand for inspection. MBCA § 16.02(b)(3). To inspect such records, the shareholder's demand must be made in "good faith" and for a "proper purpose"; the shareholder's purpose and the requested records must be described with "reasonable particularity"; and the requested records must be "directly connected" with the shareholder's purpose. Id. § 16.02(c).

Although the MBCA does not define "proper purpose," case law has defined it as a purpose that is "reasonably relevant" to the demanding shareholder's interest as a shareholder. See Official Comment, MBCA § 16.02(c). Courts have generally accepted as proper a shareholder's purpose to protect his financial interest in the corporation, his interest in voting or selling shares, or his bringing of a lawsuit to protect these interests. Thus, an investigation by a shareholder into possible corporate wrongdoing, whether to bring a shareholder lawsuit or initiate other remedial action, constitutes a "proper purpose." See Security First Corp. v. U.S. Die Casting and Dev. Co., 687 A.2d 563, 567 (Del. 1997).

To show "good faith," courts have required shareholders seeking to investigate corporate wrongdoing to present evidence establishing a "credible basis" for belief in possible wrongdoing; mere suspicion of wrongdoing is not enough. See Seinfeld v. Verizon Communications, Inc., 909 A.2d 117 (Del. 2006) (disallowing inspection of documents based only on allegations of unauthorized and excessive compensation). Further, when a shareholder who demands inspection has interests that relate both to the shareholder's financial investment and to other interests (such as a social or political interest), courts have generally permitted inspection if the shareholder is able to identify "shareholder" interests. See Conservative Caucus v. Chevron Corp., 525 A.2d 569 (Del. Ch. 1987) (permitting inspection of shareholders' list by shareholder seeking voting support from other shareholders for a proposal that corporation stop doing business in communist Angola given alleged economic risks such business created for corporation).

Finally, the shareholder seeking inspection must identify documents “with reasonable particularity” and show how they are “directly connected” to the articulated purpose of the inspection. See Saito v. McKesson HBOC, Inc., 806 A.2d 113 (Del. 2002) (allowing inspection of documents, based on demand for “categories of documents” relating to challenged merger). According to the Official Comment accompanying the MBCA inspection statute, if the corporation disputes the “connection” of the demanded records to the shareholder’s purpose, the court may examine the records privately to make this determination. See Official Comment, MBCA § 16.02(c).

Here, the shareholder’s demand for board minutes that relate to Retailer’s donations to AFAW appears to satisfy the inspection statute. The demand, stated in terms of categories of documents, permits the corporation to identify the documents sought by the shareholder. Moreover, the shareholder’s stated purposes—to expose the impropriety of these donations (because they are said not to promote any corporate interest) and to have the board desist from further donations—are related to the shareholder’s financial interest in the corporation. Even if the shareholder has other non-corporate reasons for demanding inspection, such as political views about the corporation’s participation in politics, her stated purpose to expose corporate waste is sufficient.

Moreover, to obtain inspection, the shareholder need not demonstrate that Retailer’s donations to AFAW actually constituted “waste.” That is, the donations may or may not have constituted “an exchange that is so one-sided that no business person of ordinary, sound judgment could conclude the corporation has received adequate consideration.” In re Citigroup Shareholder Derivative Litigation, 964 A.2d 106, 136 (Del. Ch. 2009). To obtain inspection, the shareholder need only have a “good faith” interest in exposing and preventing further corporate wrongdoing. Here, given the press reports about these donations, the shareholder appears to have a “credible basis” for her belief that the donations to AFAW promote no corporate interest. The records, once produced for inspection, will allow the shareholder to decide whether or not to pursue further action to have the board discontinue these donations.

[NOTE: Under the MBCA, the number of shares owned by the shareholder and the time that she has held them are not relevant to her inspection rights. See MBCA § 16.02(a), (f). Thus, an answer that discusses the ownership and holding-period requirements of SEC Rule 14a-8 (ownership of $2,000 or 1% of outstanding shares during 12-month holding period) should receive no credit for this discussion.]

Point Two (35%)

The shareholder’s proposed resolution, as phrased, is not a proper subject for shareholder action. The resolution improperly mandates that Retailer’s board of directors not approve corporate political expenditures unless authorized by the shareholders.

The MBCA does not specifically permit the submission of shareholder resolutions for shareholder action at shareholders’ meetings. Nonetheless, the practice is widespread and generally accepted under common law principles as a fundamental right of shareholders. See Official Comment, MBCA § 7.08 (recognizing that corporate bylaws may specify that “to propose a resolution for adoption” a shareholder may be required to give advance notice of the proposal).

The case law on proper subjects for shareholder resolutions is scant. The leading case, decided by the New York Court of Appeals, permitted a shareholder proposal stating support for the corporation's former president and recommending his re-hiring by the corporation's board of directors. As the court explained,

The stockholders, by expressing their approval of Mr. Auer's conduct as president and their demand that he be put back in that office, will not be able, directly, to effect that change in officers, but there is nothing invalid in their so expressing themselves and thus putting on notice the directors who will stand for election at the annual meeting.

Auer v. Dressel, 118 N.E.2d 590, 593 (N.Y. 1954). Thus, shareholders may express their views on corporate matters in non-binding, precatory resolutions.

The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission's rules on the inclusion of shareholder resolutions in proxy materials state that a company may exclude from proxy materials a shareholder proposal that is "improper under state law." SEC Rule 14a-8(i)(1); see also SEC v. Transamerica Corp., 163 F.2d 511, 514 (3d Cir. 1947), cert. denied, 332 U.S. 847 (1948) (whether shareholder proposal is proper is answered not by federal but by state corporate law). A note accompanying the SEC rule takes a similar view of state law requirements as the view expressed by the New York court in Auer:

Depending on the subject matter, some proposals are not considered proper under state law if they would be binding on the company if approved by shareholders. In our experience, most proposals that are cast as recommendations or requests that the board of directors take specified action are proper under state law. Accordingly, we will assume that a proposal drafted as a recommendation or suggestion is proper unless the company demonstrates otherwise.

Consistent with this note, SEC staff has taken the view that shareholder proposals cast as recommendations or requests that the board of directors take specified action are generally proper under state law. See Bank of America Corp., SEC No-Action Letter (Feb. 15, 2013) (shareholder proposal requesting that corporation's board prepare a report on the corporation's political activities and expenditures). However, a shareholder proposal that would bind the corporation or the corporation's board is generally not considered proper under state law.

An exception to this principle, however, arises when the shareholder resolution seeks to require corporate action by means of an amendment to the corporation's bylaws. Amending the bylaws is a power that shareholders generally share with the corporation's board of directors. See MBCA § 10.20. Thus, the Delaware Supreme Court has stated that a shareholder proposal to amend the corporation's bylaws to require the corporation to reimburse reasonable expenses of a shareholder nominating a "short slate" of directors is a proper subject for shareholder action. See CA, Inc. v. AFSCME Employees Pension Plan, 953 A.2d 227 (Del. 2008).

Here, the shareholder's resolution is phrased as a binding limitation on Retailer's board not to approve any political expenditures unless authorized by the shareholders. Thus, this resolution (as phrased) is not a proper subject for shareholder action. Because it does not seek to amend Retailer's bylaws, its mandatory nature makes it an improper subject for shareholder action under State X law.

Point Three (30%)

A shareholder resolution restricting Retailer's political activities is private action, not state action, and thus would not infringe Retailer's First Amendment rights.

The Supreme Court has held that independent political expenditures by a for-profit corporation constitute speech protected by the First Amendment. Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission, 558 U.S. 310 (2010) (invalidating federal statutory ban on corporate expenditures in federal elections); see also Am. Tradition P'ship v. Bullock, 567 U.S. 516 (2012) (invalidating Montana statute banning corporate expenditures to influence state elections).

Although the shareholder resolution in this case seeks to restrict Retailer's political expenditures, the shareholder-voted restriction would not violate the Constitution because the restriction is not "state action." The Supreme Court has long held that only government action can violate the protections of individual liberty in the Constitution. Private actors are not obliged to comply with the Constitution, and private conduct that infringes on individual rights (e.g., First Amendment rights) is not unconstitutional. See, e.g., Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883) (Fourteenth Amendment, which prohibits action by States, does not reach "individual invasion of individual rights"); Sharp Corp. v. Hisense USA Corp., 292 F. Supp. 3d 157, 175 (D.D.C. 2017) ("it is axiomatic" that infringements of First Amendment require state action). Thus, under the "state action" doctrine, a shareholder resolution that restricted Retailer's political contributions would not violate Retailer's First Amendment rights. In fact, the Court in Citizens United made clear that shareholder activism aimed at restricting corporate political speech would be lawful.

Although Citizens United applied strict scrutiny to the federal ban on corporate political expenditures and rejected the argument that protecting the speech rights of individual shareholders from having management speak on their behalf was a compelling governmental interest, the Court pointed out that "[t]here is . . . little evidence of abuse that cannot be corrected by shareholders 'through the procedures of corporate democracy.'" 558 U.S. at 361–62 (quoting First Nat'l Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 794 (1978)). The Court explained:

Shareholder objections raised through the procedures of corporate democracy can be more effective today With the advent of the Internet, prompt disclosure of expenditures can provide shareholders . . . with the information needed to hold corporations . . . accountable for their positions Shareholders can determine whether their corporation's political speech advances the corporation's interest in making profits.

Id. at 370 (internal citations omitted). Thus, while Citizens United held that the government may not prohibit corporate political expenditures, the Court made clear that such expenditures can be regulated under corporate law through the assertion of shareholder rights—specifically "procedures of corporate democracy" and other methods that make "corporations . . . accountable for their positions."

[NOTE: A knowledgeable examinee might argue that under the "entanglement exception" to the state action doctrine, private action can violate the Constitution when the government "affirmatively authorize[d], encourage[d], or facilitate[d]" that private conduct. Erwin Chemerinsky, Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies 539 (4th ed. 2011). See, e.g., Shelley v. Kraemer, 334

US. 1, 19 (1948) (state court enforcement of a racially restrictive property covenant constituted state action sufficient to bring the 14th Amendment into play).

It is highly improbable, however, that the entanglement exception would apply here. First, the courts have been unwilling to expand the holding in Shelley v. Kraemer beyond the racial discrimination context. See Edwards v. Habib, 397 F.2d 687, 691 (D.C. Cir. 1968) (“if . . . every private right were transformed into governmental action by the mere fact of court enforcement of it, the distinction between private and governmental action would be obliterated”). Second, the mere fact that the government authorizes a corporation’s existence and permits shareholder governance is unlikely to be treated as sufficient entanglement to make the government responsible for shareholder choices. See, e.g., Moose Lodge Number 107 v. Irvis, 407 U.S. 163 (1972) (government grant of a liquor license to a private club does not entangle government in discrimination by the club); Am. Mfrs. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sullivan, 526 U.S. 40, 54 (1999) (in arbitration context, government authorization of “a private choice cannot support a finding of state action”).]

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Did Ann create a valid charitable trust?
- (1)(b) Assuming that Ann created a valid charitable trust, may the trust endure in perpetuity or until its assets are exhausted?
- (2) Assuming that the trust cannot endure for its stated duration, could a court preserve the trust for any period of time to carry out Ann's intentions?
- (3) To whom should Ann's estate be distributed and in what shares?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Ann's trust is a valid charitable trust because civic improvement is a permissible charitable purpose. Charitable trusts are not subject to the common law rule against perpetuities and therefore, Ann's trust can last in perpetuity.

A trust may be created for a noncharitable purpose without any definite beneficiaries but having an otherwise valid purpose. However, such a trust cannot be enforced for more than 21 years after its creation. Here, it is unclear whether the trust can be continued under that rule because the facts do not indicate when Ann created the trust.

Ann's estate is distributable to her heirs. Under the civil law consanguinity method, Ann's heirs are her uncle and her niece, who would take in equal shares; under the parentelic distributional method, Ann's only heir is her niece.

Point One(a) (45%)

A trust is charitable if it serves a governmental purpose or is otherwise beneficial to the community. Ann's trust for the beautification of the community serves these charitable purposes.

A charitable trust can only be created for a charitable purpose. Charitable purposes include (1) the relief of poverty, (2) the advancement of education, (3) the advancement of religion, (4) the promotion of health, (5) governmental or municipal purposes, and (5) "other purposes the accomplishment of which is beneficial to the community.” Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 368. Accord, Unif. Trust Code § 405.

The plantings are for a governmental or municipal purpose, as it is customary for municipalities to engage in beautification programs for their downtown areas. See generally Bogert on Trusts § 54 (6th ed.). When a trust discharges a governmental function, thus relieving taxpayers of the duty to provide the function, the trust is charitable. See, e.g., Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 28 cmt. k (trust providing facilities ordinarily supplied by community at taxpayer expense is charitable).

The trust is also one that is “beneficial to the community.” See Bogert, supra, § 54. See also Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 28 cmt. a. A trust to aid a profit-making business enterprise is not charitable. Id. The facts state that Ann was motivated to create the trust to honor the store owners who financed her education. If the court construed Ann’s motivation as limiting trust benefits to a few stores in the town, the trust would not be charitable. But a trust settlor’s motivation does not determine the nature of the benefit provided by the trust; only the trust instrument can do so.

Here, the trust instrument provided that plantings should be made on all principal streets, not just in front of stores owned by the individuals who helped Ann. All residents, visitors to the community, and the business owners along the principal streets obtain an aesthetic benefit from the plantings. No trust assets are used to benefit a few individuals or a small group. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 28 cmt. l (“a trust to beautify a city . . . or otherwise add to the aesthetic enjoyment of the community is charitable”). Thus, Ann’s trust is a charitable trust.

Point One(b) (10%)

A charitable trust can last in perpetuity; it is not invalid under the rule against perpetuities.

A charitable trust can last in perpetuity. It is not subject to the rule against perpetuities. See generally Gray, Rule Against Perpetuities §§ 589–628 (4th ed.).

Point Two (5%)

Assuming that the trust cannot last for its stated duration, under the Uniform Trust Code the court could authorize the trust’s continuation for up to 21 years after its creation to carry out its noncharitable purposes so long as those purposes are not capricious.

A noncharitable trust ordinarily must have ascertainable beneficiaries. Section 402 of the Uniform Trust Code provides that “a trust is created only if: . . . the trust has a definite beneficiary.” (The Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§ 112–122 and Restatement (Third) of Trusts §§ 44–46 have consistent provisions.) However, the Trust Code creates an exception to the definite-beneficiary rule for both charitable trusts and noncharitable trusts that meet the requirements of Section 409.

Under Section 409, a trust “may be created for a noncharitable purpose without a definite or definitely ascertainable beneficiary . . .” As the comments note, this could include a trust for a “general noncharitable purpose” which is benevolent. While a trust providing mere beneficence to a group of indefinite beneficiaries would not be charitable, it could be sustained under Section 409 of the Trust Code and the principles set forth in both the Second and Third Restatements.

According to the Section 409 comment, a trust for the care of a cemetery plot is illustrative of a permissible noncharitable purpose (although the comment notes that states may have other statutes specifically dealing with such trusts to deal with the matter of perpetual care). Section 409 finds historical support in Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 124, which provides:

Where the owner of property transfers it in trust for a specific non-charitable purpose, and there is no definite or definitely ascertainable beneficiary designated, no enforceable trust is created; but the transferee has power to apply the property to the designated purpose, unless such application is authorized or directed to be made at a time beyond the period of the rule against perpetuities, or the purpose is capricious.

It also gives the cemetery trust as an example. See comment d. The Third Restatement is consistent. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 47. Both Restatement sections characterize the transfer as creating a power instead of a trust, whereas Section 409 deems the transfer to create a trust.

Under the Uniform Trust Code, a trust without ascertainable beneficiaries but otherwise having a valid purpose can be created but “may not be enforced for more than [21] years.” Accord Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 47 (generally duration of trust without ascertainable beneficiaries is 21 years). Neither the Uniform Trust Code nor the Restatement (Third) of Trusts §47, cmt. d (on which Section 409 is based) indicate when the 21-year period begins to run. However, the Restatement comments indicate that 21 years was recommended because that is the time frame used in the common law rule against perpetuities and, following that analogy, presumably the 21-year period under Section 409 runs from the date the trust was created.

Assuming that the trust is not a valid charitable trust, the court could order its continuation for 21 years under UTC § 409. However, whether it can do so here is unclear because the facts do not indicate when the trust was created, an important fact if the 21-year period runs from that date.

[NOTE #1: An important lawyering skill is knowing if essential facts are missing. Here, an essential fact—knowing when the trust was created—was omitted from the facts to test the examinees’ ability to demonstrate this important skill.

An examinee might argue that the trust is enforceable for 21 years after the court issues an order, rather from the date of the trust’s creation. That argument is not likely to be successful, and an examinee should not receive credit for making it.]

[NOTE #2: The Uniform Trust Code has been adopted in the following jurisdictions: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Connecticut, Colorado, the District of Columbia, Florida, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. An earlier version applies in Iowa.

If the UTC is inapplicable, then under the common law, if the trust is not a valid charitable trust, it would violate the common law rule against perpetuities and therefore be void. See Restatement (Third) of Property § 47, Rept. Note. See also Restatement (Second) of Property § 123. In such case, the trust assets would be distributable to Ann's heirs. (See Point Three).

It is also possible that a court would recharacterize the trust as a “power” and allow the trustee to exercise that power in accordance with the terms of the trust for 21 years.]

Point Three (40%)

The answer depends on how State A determines heirship. If State A uses the consanguinity method of determining heirship, Ann’s heirs are her uncle and niece, who would take equal shares. If State A uses the parentelic method, Ann’s only heir is her niece.

The identity of Ann’s heirs is dependent on the method of determining heirship used in State A. There are two methods, the civil-law consanguinity method and the parentelic method adopted by the Uniform Probate Code and like statutes. See Unif. Probate Code § 2-103.

Under the civil-law consanguinity method, heirship is determined by degree of relationship; all persons of the same degree of relationship to the deceased individual take equal shares. Both Ann’s uncle and her niece are in the third degree of consanguinity and thus, using this method, both would be her heirs and entitled to equal shares of her estate.

Under the parentelic method, descendants of the decedent’s parents take to the exclusion of descendants of the decedent’s grandparents. Here, Ann’s niece is a descendant of her parents, whereas her uncle is a descendant of her grandparents. Thus, under the parentelic method, the niece would be Ann’s only heir.

- (2)(b) Assuming that the State A court has jurisdiction, should the court grant the wife sole physical custody of the parties' daughter, Sarah?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The State A court has jurisdiction to grant the wife's petition for divorce because the wife is domiciled in State A and has met State A's residency requirement for filing a divorce action. A state court may grant a divorce to a person domiciled in the state even if it has no basis for asserting personal jurisdiction over the other spouse.

The State A court also has jurisdiction to grant sole physical custody of Sarah to the wife. Personal jurisdiction over a respondent parent is not a precondition to entry of a custody decree.

The State A court does not, however, have jurisdiction over the wife's claim for property distribution. The adjudication of a claim for property division in a divorce action requires personal jurisdiction over the respondent. The husband does not have the minimum contacts with State A required for the exercise of personal jurisdiction in this matter.

Assuming that jurisdiction exists, the State A court could grant the wife's divorce petition because she can establish a fault basis for her divorce petition (i.e., her husband's abusive behavior).

Assuming that jurisdiction exists, the State A court should also grant the wife's request for sole physical custody of the couple's child because she has been Sarah's primary caregiver, Sarah has been living exclusively with the wife for several months, there is no evidence that it is in Sarah's best interest to reside with the husband, and the husband has been physically abusive to the wife, a factor that would weigh heavily against the husband in almost all states.

Point One(a) (15%)

Personal jurisdiction over a divorce defendant is not required for issuance of a divorce decree, and thus State A has jurisdiction over the wife's divorce action.

In Williams v. North Carolina, 317 U.S. 287 (1942) (Williams I), the Supreme Court found that a state could enter a valid divorce decree as long as one spouse was domiciled in that state.

Domicile is based on residence with the intent to remain permanently or indefinitely. Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws §§ 70–72. Here, the wife has established a domicile in State A. She has lived in State A for nine months, found a job, and moved into her own apartment. Moreover, she has told the husband that she intends to remain in State A with their daughter. In short, she has abandoned her State B domicile and established a new domicile in State A.

Because the wife is a State A domiciliary and has lived in State A for nine months, thereby meeting State A's six-month residence requirement for filing a divorce petition, the State A court has jurisdiction to issue a divorce decree to the wife without the necessity of establishing personal jurisdiction over the husband.

Point One(b) (20%)

Personal jurisdiction over a divorce defendant is not required for entry of a custody decree, and thus the State A court has jurisdiction over the wife's petition for a custody decree.

Under both the federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (PKPA) (adopted in all states) and the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA) § 2(a) (adopted in all states but Massachusetts), a state that is a child's "home state" has exclusive jurisdiction over a custody action involving the child. Under both the UCCJEA and PKPA, a home state is the state "in which a child lived with a parent or a person acting as a parent for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of a child-custody proceeding." UCCJEA § 102(7); 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(b)(4).

Here, Sarah has resided in State A with the wife, her parent, for nine consecutive months. This qualifies State A as the child's "home state" for purposes of issuing a custody decree. Although some courts have held that a parent who wrongfully takes a child from a state without notice to another custodial parent lacks the capacity to unilaterally establish a new home state for the child, the circumstances here are quite different. One week after arriving in State A, the wife called the husband and told him that she had moved to State A with Sarah and that she intended to stay there. Over the following nine months, the husband had ample opportunity to file a custody action in State B and did not do so. In effect, the husband acquiesced in Sarah's move to State A. Thus, State A is now Sarah's home state, and a State A court has jurisdiction to issue a custody order.

[NOTE: In May v. Anderson, 345 U.S. 528 (1953), the Supreme Court held that the state where a parent was domiciled was not bound to give full faith and credit to the child-custody determination of a court of the state where the children were domiciled when that state lacked sufficient minimum contacts with the parent to give its courts personal jurisdiction over the parent. However, in 1980 Congress passed the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (PKPA). Pursuant to that act, all states must give full faith and credit to the custody decree of a state with jurisdiction under PKPA rules. See 28 U.S.C. § 1738A. As noted above, State A is Sarah’s “home state,” and a State A court would therefore have jurisdiction under the PKPA. Accordingly, its decree would be entitled to full faith and credit in State B and elsewhere, despite the husband’s lack of personal connection with State A.]

Point One(c) (20%)

Personal jurisdiction over a divorce defendant is required for the distribution of marital property. Thus, because the husband does not have the requisite minimum contacts with State A to establish a basis for personal jurisdiction, the State A court does not have jurisdiction to grant the wife a share of the couple’s marital property.

In an ex parte divorce where the court issues a divorce decree based on the domicile of the plaintiff and without personal jurisdiction over the defendant, the court lacks the power to adjudicate property and support rights. The divorce decree is thus “divisible”; jurisdiction to terminate a marriage does not establish jurisdiction over other divorce claims. See Estin v. Estin, 334 U.S. 541 (1948).

A state may not exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant who does not have “minimum contacts” with the forum state. See International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310 (1945). The Supreme Court has held that “temporary visits,” like a brief stopover en route to somewhere else, do not satisfy the minimum contacts requirement, even when the defendant marries during the stopover period. See Kulko v. Superior Court, 436 U.S. 84 (1978).

Here, the husband has never visited State A except for a brief, one-day stopover to get married while traveling by train. Therefore, State A does not have the requisite minimum contacts with the husband to establish personal jurisdiction over him, and it cannot adjudicate the distribution of marital property in the husband-wife divorce action.

[NOTE: An examinee should get no credit for arguing that the marriage is sufficient to establish jurisdiction.]

Point Two(a) (20%)

The State A court could grant the wife’s divorce petition on the husband’s fault.

In those states that have retained fault divorce grounds, such as State A, a divorce may typically be granted on grounds of cruelty or a like concept. “Cruelty typically has been defined as bodily harm, or reasonable apprehension of bodily harm, that endangers life, limb, or health, and renders marital cohabitation unsafe or improper.” John Gregory, et al., Understanding Family Law § 8.03B[3] (4th ed. 2013). Traditionally, the abuse must be physical, successive, and continuing for an extended period of time, or a single severe physical act causing serious bodily harm or reasonable apprehension of serious future danger. Id. In recent decades, however, jurisdictions recognize a single, less serious physical incident as sufficient and recognize emotional or mental cruelty. Id.

Here, the husband's physical and emotional abuse of the wife would qualify as cruelty. After his accident, the husband became physically and emotionally abusive toward the wife. Although it is unclear when the behavior began, the facts suggest that the husband could have been abusive to the wife for more than a year. Additionally, the facts indicate that one incident of the husband's physical abuse was serious enough to result in the wife's hospitalization and the husband's criminal conviction. Either the ongoing physical and emotional abuse or the single instance of serious physical abuse is sufficient to support a divorce on grounds of cruelty.

The facts do not suggest that the husband could successfully assert any defenses to a fault-based divorce. Thus, on fault grounds, the State A court should grant the wife's divorce petition.

[NOTE: An examinee may argue that the State A court will not grant the wife a divorce because the husband has a recrimination defense (i.e., both parties are guilty of marital misconduct) on the grounds that the wife abandoned or deserted him by moving out of state. Gregory, supra, § 8.03C[4]. A court is highly unlikely to credit this defense because the wife has a strong defense that the husband's cruelty gives rise to a constructive desertion claim by the wife (i.e., his cruelty made the marriage intolerable, forcing her to abandon the marriage). Id. § 8.03B[4].]

Point Two(b) (25%)

The State A court could grant the wife's petition for sole physical custody. The facts suggest that the best interests of the couple's child would be served by the wife's continued custody; there is no evidence that it would be in Sarah's best interests to reside with the husband; and the husband's conviction for assaulting the wife strongly militates against granting him custody of Sarah.

In all states, a custody decision is based on a determination of a child's best interests. Gregory, supra, § 11.03[A]. The best-interests inquiry is typically far-ranging, including the following factors inter alia: the wishes of the child's parents, the child's primary caretaker, the mental and physical health of all individuals, the interrelationship of the child and parents, and stability. Id. Additionally, nearly every state currently mandates consideration of domestic violence between the parents when awarding custody, and many states have standards under which it is presumed that a parent guilty of serious domestic violence should not be awarded custody of a child. Harry D. Krause, et al., Family Law: Cases, Questions, Comments 671, 689 (6th ed. 2007).

Here, the wife has been Sarah's primary caregiver throughout her life, and Sarah has resided exclusively with the wife for the past nine months. The husband has not visited Sarah during the past nine months or made any apparent effort to do so, while the wife has requested sole physical custody of Sarah, indicating her strong desire to parent Sarah. Furthermore, the husband has a drinking problem, presumably alcohol addiction brought about by the serious injuries resulting from the accident. It seems likely that his addiction has already interfered and will continue to interfere with his ability to care for Sarah, unless he enters treatment, which, apparently, he has not.

Finally and maybe most importantly, because of the husband's chronic physical and emotional abuse of the wife and his assault conviction, the court is likely to rebuttably presume that the husband should not be awarded any physical custody of Sarah. The husband cannot point to any facts that successfully overcome the presumption. Although he apparently has not been abusive to Sarah and it is unclear whether she witnessed or has been affected by the abuse, a court may nonetheless rely upon the presumption to deny custody. Thus, all facts and factors support the court's granting the wife's request for sole physical custody of Sarah.

- (2)(a) Does the bank have an enforceable interest in the retinal scanner?
- (2)(b) Does the supplier have an enforceable interest in the retinal scanner?
- (2)(c) Which of the two competing security interests in the retinal scanner has priority?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The power generator is equipment in which both the bank and the manufacturer have enforceable security interests. Both security interests were perfected by the filing of financing statements. Under the general priority rule of “first to file or perfect,” the bank’s security interest would have priority over that of the manufacturer because the bank filed and perfected before the manufacturer. But the manufacturer’s security interest is a purchase-money security interest and, because the manufacturer’s interest was perfected at the time the company received possession of the power generator, the purchase-money security interest of the manufacturer has priority over the security interest of the bank.

The retinal scanner is also equipment in which the bank has an enforceable security interest. While the agreement between the company and the supplier with respect to the scanner is denominated as a “Lease Agreement,” the interest in the retinal scanner retained by the supplier under that agreement is actually a security interest. The bank’s security interest in the retinal scanner was perfected by the filing of the bank’s financing statement. The supplier’s security interest, however, is unperfected. Accordingly, the bank’s security interest has priority over that of the supplier.

The bank has an enforceable, attached, and perfected security interest in the power generator.

The agreement between the bank and the company provides that the bank has a security interest in the company's "present and future inventory, accounts, and equipment." The power generator constitutes "equipment" as that term is defined in UCC § 9-102(a)(33) because it is goods that are not inventory, farm products, or consumer goods. See UCC §§ 9-102(a)(44), (48), (34), and (23). Section 9-204 allows parties to agree that the collateral includes property acquired subsequently. The bank's security interest in the power generator is enforceable because all three elements of enforceability were satisfied—value was given (the loan), the company had rights in the power generator (certainly by the time the power generator was delivered to the company and perhaps even earlier), and the company authenticated (signed or its electronic equivalent) a security agreement containing a description of the collateral. See UCC §§ 9-102(a)(7), 9-203(b), 9-108.

Point One(b) (10%)

The manufacturer has an enforceable, attached, and perfected security interest in the power generator.

The manufacturer also has an enforceable, attached, and perfected security interest in the power generator for similar reasons: it gave value to the company (selling the goods on credit), the company had rights in the power generator, and the company authenticated an agreement granting the manufacturer a security interest. The manufacturer's interest was likewise perfected by filing.

The manufacturer's security interest in the power generator is a purchase money security interest. It has priority over the security interest of the bank because the manufacturer's security interest was perfected when the company obtained possession of the power generator.

In order to determine priority as between two enforceable security interests, it is first necessary to determine whether the security interests are perfected. Under UCC § 9-308, a security interest is perfected when it has attached and one of the additional steps described in UCC §§ 9-310–9-316 (usually the filing of a financing statement pursuant to UCC § 9-310(a) or the secured party taking possession of the collateral pursuant to UCC § 9-313) has been satisfied. Here, both security interests have attached because they are enforceable and there was no agreement to postpone attachment (see UCC § 9-203(a)), and the filing of a properly completed financing statements satisfies UCC § 9-310(a). Thus, both security interests are perfected.

Priority between competing perfected security interests is generally determined by the "first to file or perfect" rule of UCC § 9-322(a)(1), under which the bank would have priority because its financing statement was filed before that of the manufacturer. But there are special priority rules for purchase-money security interests. In particular, a purchase-money security interest in collateral other than inventory has priority over a competing non-purchase-money security interest (even if it was perfected before the purchase-money security interest) if the purchase-money interest was perfected when the purchaser received possession of the collateral or within 20 days thereafter. UCC § 9-324(a).

The security interest of the manufacturer is a “purchase-money security interest” because the obligation that the interest secures is the company's obligation to pay the purchase price of the collateral. See UCC § 9-103. The collateral (the power generator) is not inventory because it is not held for sale or lease and does not otherwise fall within the definition of inventory in § 9-102(a)(48). Thus, the security interest is a purchase-money security interest in collateral other than inventory and is within the rule of UCC § 9-324(a).

Here, the manufacturer’s purchase-money security interest was perfected no later than the time that the company received possession of the power generator. This is because, at the time the company received the power generator, the security interest was enforceable and attached (see Point One(b)) and a financing statement had been filed with respect to the security interest. See UCC §§ 9-308, 9-310. Therefore, the manufacturer’s purchase-money security interest in the power generator has priority over the bank’s security interest.

Point Two(a) (10%)

The bank has an enforceable, attached, and perfected security interest in the retinal scanner.

The bank has a security interest in the retinal scanner inasmuch as the company granted it a security interest in all of the company’s present and future equipment and the retinal scanner constitutes equipment. UCC § 9-102(a)(33). The bank’s security interest in the retinal scanner is enforceable because all three elements of enforceability were satisfied: value was given (the loan), the company had rights in the retinal scanner (certainly by the time the retinal scanner was delivered to the company and perhaps even earlier), and the company authenticated a security agreement containing a description of the collateral. See UCC §§ 9-203(b), 9-108.

Point Two(b) (25%)

Although the transaction between the supplier and the company is denominated as a “lease,” the supplier’s interest in the retinal scanner is, in fact, a security interest. Although the supplier has satisfied the requirements to have an enforceable security interest in the scanner, its security interest is unperfected because the supplier did not file a financing statement.

The transaction between the supplier and the company is described by them as a lease. But under the UCC, “[a] transaction denominated as a ‘lease’ of goods is sometimes really a lease and sometimes a sale with a retained security interest.” Steven O. Weise, U.C.C. Article 9: Personal Property Secured Transactions, 63 Bus. Law. 1353, 1354 (2008). Section 1-203 determines whether a transaction that is in the form of a lease nonetheless is a sale of the leased goods, with the “lessor” retaining a security interest in the goods to secure the obligation of the “lessee” to make the required payments for it. Under § 1-203, a transaction in the form of a lease creates a security interest if the lessee’s obligation to pay is not subject to termination by the lessee and the lessee has the option to become the owner of the goods for no additional consideration upon compliance with the lease agreement. UCC § 1-203(b)(4). As described in the facts, the transaction between the company and the supplier fits that description precisely. Therefore, the interest of the supplier in the retinal scanner is a security interest.

The supplier's security interest in the retinal scanner is enforceable because value had been given, the company has rights in the retinal scanner, and the lease agreement signed by the company is a security agreement inasmuch as it creates a security interest. UCC § 9-102(a)(74).

Point Two(c) (20%)

The bank's security interest in the retinal scanner has priority over the security interest of the supplier because a perfected security interest has priority over an unperfected security interest.

The bank's security interest attached and was perfected by the filing of the financing statement. UCC §§ 9-203, 9-308, 9-310. See Point One(c).

The supplier's security interest attached because it was enforceable and there was no agreement to postpone attachment. UCC § 9-203(a). But the supplier's security interest is not perfected. The supplier did not file a financing statement relating to its transaction or take possession of the retinal scanner, and there is no other basis on which to conclude that the security interest is perfected. See UCC §§ 9-308, 9-310.

Because the bank has a perfected security interest in the retinal scanner and the supplier has an unperfected security interest in it, priority between those security interests is governed by § 9-322(a)(2). Under that section, a perfected security interest has priority over an unperfected security interest. Therefore, the bank's security interest in the retinal scanner has priority over the security interest of the supplier.

[NOTE: An examinee might note that the security interest of the supplier is a purchase-money security interest. This is accurate but plays no part in the analysis inasmuch as the "superpriority" given by UCC Article 9 to purchase-money security interests applies only to perfected security interests and the security interest of the supplier is unperfected.]

ANALYSIS 6 – REAL PROPERTY

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Was the owner's refusal to rent to men or to lawyers the type of act that is prohibited by the Fair Housing Act of 1968?
- (1)(b) Did the owner's refusal to rent to men cause her to be liable under the Fair Housing Act of 1968?
- (2) Did either the owner or the newspaper publisher violate the Fair Housing Act of 1968 by publishing the owner's rental advertisement?
- (3) Assuming that both the television and the chandelier are affixed or attached to the real estate:
 - (a) Is the television a fixture?
 - (b) Is the chandelier a fixture?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The Fair Housing Act (the Act) disallows discrimination in housing sales or rentals on the basis of sex, among other things, but not occupation.

However, the owner's refusal to rent her apartments to men did not violate the Act because the Act expressly exempts discriminatory rentals in buildings with no more than four residential units, one of which is occupied by the owner.

The Act also prohibits the expression of a preference relating to sex in all advertisements for rental property; this prohibition does not contain an exemption for buildings with no more than four units. The publication of the owner's advertisement limiting acceptable tenants to women was thus a violation of the Act by both the owner and the newspaper publisher.

Assuming that the wall-mounted television and the chandelier in the owner's apartment are both affixed or attached to the real property, they nonetheless are not fixtures because, under the state's fixtures code, a reasonable person would conclude that the television and the chandelier were not attached with the intent to make them permanent parts of the real property.

The Fair Housing Act of 1968 forbids discrimination in housing rentals based on sex but not occupation.

Under the Fair Housing Act, it is unlawful to refuse to rent a dwelling to a person based on the person's "race, color, religion, sex, familial status, or national origin." 42 U.S.C. § 3604(a). Of these, only discrimination on the basis of sex is relevant here. The owner's refusal to rent to men and her statements to the two men that she did not rent to men were discriminatory under the Act. Nonetheless, there is no liability for this behavior. See Point One(b).

The Act does not prohibit discrimination based on occupation. 42 U.S.C. § 3604(a). Thus, the owner's refusal to rent to lawyers did not violate the Act.

Point One(b) (10%)

Despite the Act's prohibition of discrimination based on sex, the owner did not violate the Act because it exempts from its anti-discrimination rule the rental of units in a building with no more than four units, one of which is occupied by the owner.

Section 3603(b)(2) of the Act provides that the anti-discrimination rule does not apply if the owner occupies one of the units in a multiple-unit dwelling containing no more than four units occupied by persons "living independently of each other." Here, because the owner's building contained only three units, the owner occupied one of the units, and all units were occupied by persons living independently of each other, the exception to the Act's nondiscrimination rule applies. Thus, the owner's refusal to rent to men did not violate the Act.

The owner and the newspaper publisher violated the Fair Housing Act of 1968 by publishing a for-rent advertisement that expressed a limitation based on sex.

Section 3604(c) of the Act makes it unlawful to make, print, or publish, or cause to be made, printed, or published any notice, statement, or advertisement with respect to the sale or rental of a dwelling that indicates any preference, limitation, or discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex, handicap, familial status, or national origin, or an intention to make any such preference, limitation, or discrimination.

42 U.S.C. § 3604(c).

This provision applies not only to a landlord who places an advertisement but also to the publisher of the newspaper in which the advertisement is placed. See generally Singer, Property 587 (3d ed. 2010). See also Ragin v. New York Times Co., 923 F.2d 995 (2d Cir. 1991). And unlike § 3603(b)(2), § 3604(c) includes no exception for smaller buildings that are owner-occupied. Thus, both the owner and the newspaper publisher violated the Act when the owner advertised her apartments and specified that only professional women who were not lawyers should apply.

Point Three (50% total weight)

Under the state law, neither the television nor the chandelier is a fixture because a reasonable person would conclude, based upon all the facts and circumstances relating to the specific personal property, that at the time each was affixed or attached, it was not affixed or attached with the intent to make it a permanent part of the real property.

(a) The television (25%)

Under the state law, a fixture is defined as “an item of personal property affixed or attached to the real property by the seller unless a reasonable person would conclude, based upon all the facts and circumstances relating to the specific personal property, that the item of personal property at the time it was affixed or attached was not affixed or attached to the real property with the intent to make it a permanent part of the real property.”

Traditionally, televisions were not fixtures, as they were not attached to the realty. Rather, they sat on the floor or on a piece of furniture. By contrast, televisions today are often wall-mounted, almost never sit on the floor, and infrequently sit on furniture. However, even though the wall-mounted television here is affixed or attached to the real property, a number of factors could cause a reasonable person to conclude that the television was not affixed or attached “with the intent to make it a permanent part of the real property.” These factors include the following: (1) televisions are relatively inexpensive and replaced from time to time as new televisions with newer features and better electronics become available, (2) wall-mounted televisions can be easily removed from the wall mount and relocated, (3) wall-mounted televisions are often connected through a WIFI system to other items of personalty such as speakers and soundbars, and (4) televisions are often tied to the specific needs and desires of the person installing them. Based on these factors and given the facts-and-circumstances test in the state statute, a reasonable person would conclude that the television was not affixed with the intent to make it a permanent part of the real property. To the contrary, it can be easily replaced by another television.

(b) The chandelier (25%)

Even though the chandelier is affixed or attached to the real property, a reasonable person should conclude that the chandelier was not affixed or attached “with the intent to make it a permanent part of the real property.” The argument in favor of this conclusion is that the chandelier is unlike other light fixtures in all the apartments in the building. It is ornate and old-fashioned, and it does not match the other modern light fixtures in the owner's apartment or the other two apartments. Furthermore, when showing the apartment, the owner told the buyer that the chandelier was from her mother and meant a lot to her. Given the facts and circumstances test under the statute, a reasonable person would conclude that the chandelier was not affixed with the intent to make it a permanent part of the real property. Additionally, although it is out of place in the owner's apartment, the chandelier was nonetheless hung there for sentimental reasons. These facts support a conclusion that a reasonable owner would want to take the chandelier with her should she ever move from the apartment.

[NOTE #1: Under the common law, for example, a fixture is “personal property that is attached to land or a building and . . . regarded as an irremovable part of the real property.” Black’s Law Dictionary 713 (9th ed. 2009). In determining whether specific property is a fixture for purposes of property law, the installer’s intention is relevant; if the installer intended the item to be a permanent attachment, the item is a fixture. Teaff v. Hewitt, 1 Ohio St. 511 (Ohio 1853); see also Green Tree Servicing LLC v. Random Antics LLC, 869 N.E.2d 464, 469 (Ind. Ct. App. 2007). The manner in which the personalty is affixed or annexed and its peculiar adaptability to the realty serves as objective evidence of the intention to make the personalty a fixture. See Trenolone v. Cook Exploration Co., 166 S.W.3d 495, 499 (Tex. App. 2005). Brown on Personal Property 517 (3d ed. 1975). Furthermore, a court is more likely to treat an item of personalty as a fixture if its removal would cause substantial damage to the real estate. Id. Typical fixtures include stoves, cabinets, dishwashers, and wall-to-wall carpeting. An examinee, however, should receive no credit for discussing the manner of affixation or attachment, as the facts assume that criterion has been met here.

An examinee’s conclusion is less important than his or her understanding of the legal principles and use of the facts to support a conclusion. If an examinee makes a cogent argument that a reasonable person would conclude that the chandelier was affixed with the intent to make it a permanent part of the real property, the examinee should receive credit.

[NOTE #2: A proposed new Restatement of Property would eliminate the common law affixation requirement and focus, as this question does, on intent.]

Preface

The Multistate Essay Examination (MEE) is developed by the National Conference of Bar Examiners (NCBE). This publication includes the questions and analyses from the February 2019 MEE. (In the actual test, the questions are simply numbered rather than being identified by area of law.) The instructions for the test appear on page iii.

The model analyses for the MEE are illustrative of the discussions that might appear in excellent answers to the questions. They are provided to the user jurisdictions to assist graders in grading the examination. They address all the legal and factual issues the drafters intended to raise in the questions.

The subjects covered by each question are listed on the first page of its accompanying analysis, identified by roman numerals that refer to the MEE subject matter outline for that subject. For example, the Civil Procedure question on the February 2019 MEE tested the following areas from the Civil Procedure outline: I.A. Jurisdiction and venue—Federal subject matter jurisdiction (federal question, diversity, supplemental, and removal); and B. Personal jurisdiction.

For more information about the MEE, including subject matter outlines, visit the NCBE website at www.ncbex.org.

Description of the MEE

The MEE consists of six 30-minute questions and is a component of the Uniform Bar Examination (UBE). It is administered by user jurisdictions as part of the bar examination on the Tuesday before the last Wednesday in February and July of each year. Areas of law that may be covered on the MEE include the following: Business Associations (Agency and Partnership; Corporations and Limited Liability Companies), Civil Procedure, Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law, Contracts (including Article 2 [Sales] of the Uniform Commercial Code), Criminal Law and Procedure, Evidence, Family Law, Real Property, Torts, Trusts and Estates (Decedents' Estates; Trusts and Future Interests), and Article 9 (Secured Transactions) of the Uniform Commercial Code. Some questions may include issues in more than one area of law. The particular areas covered vary from exam to exam.

The purpose of the MEE is to test the examinee's ability to (1) identify legal issues raised by a hypothetical factual situation; (2) separate material which is relevant from that which is not; (3) present a reasoned analysis of the relevant issues in a clear, concise, and well-organized composition; and (4) demonstrate an understanding of the fundamental legal principles relevant to the probable solution of the issues raised by the factual situation. The primary distinction between the MEE and the Multistate Bar Examination (MBE) is that the MEE requires the examinee to demonstrate an ability to communicate effectively in writing.

Instructions

The back cover of each test booklet contains the following instructions:

You will be instructed when to begin and when to stop this test. Do not break the seal on this booklet until you are told to begin.

You may answer the questions in any order you wish. Do not answer more than one question in each answer booklet. If you make a mistake or wish to revise your answer, simply draw a line through the material you wish to delete.

If you are using a laptop computer to answer the questions, your jurisdiction will provide you with specific instructions.

Read each fact situation very carefully and do not assume facts that are not given in the question. Do not assume that each question covers only a single area of the law; some of the questions may cover more than one of the areas you are responsible for knowing.

Demonstrate your ability to reason and analyze. Each of your answers should show an understanding of the facts, a recognition of the issues included, a knowledge of the applicable principles of law, and the reasoning by which you arrive at your conclusions. The value of your answer depends not as much upon your conclusions as upon the presence and quality of the elements mentioned above.

Clarity and conciseness are important, but make your answer complete. Do not volunteer irrelevant or immaterial information.

Examinees testing in UBE jurisdictions must answer questions according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles. Examinees in non-UBE jurisdictions should answer according to generally accepted fundamental legal principles unless your testing jurisdiction has instructed you to answer according to local case or statutory law.

QUESTION 1 – AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP

A woman owns and operates a food-truck business. Business has been good. The woman asked a man she knew to work with her. “It would be great if you’d help with my food-truck business. There is just not enough time in the day. I need someone to do the early morning produce shopping for me at the farmers’ market. Are you interested?”

The man has a job as a night watchman and had been looking for a way to make extra money. He answered, “Sure, I’m interested. Text me at night what type of produce you want me to buy in the morning when I get off work. The market opens just as I get off my night shift. I could stop by the market with my car and then drop off the purchases at your truck.” He then asked, “And how much would I be paid?”

The woman responded, “Texting works for me. I’ll go to the market with you the first few times to give you a general idea of what I’m looking for. But then you’d be on your own, making the choices of which vendors to use and which produce to buy. Please use your own credit card to make the purchases, and I’ll reimburse you.”

Then the woman paused and continued, “As for pay, I can afford to pay you only $20 per daily delivery. I know that’s a bit low, but the business doesn’t have the cash flow yet. So, my offer to you is that, in addition to $20 per day, I will give you 10% of the food truck’s profits.”

The man thought for a bit and said, “Okay. It’s a deal.” They shook hands.

For the first few months, the arrangement worked well. The woman sent texts to the man each night indicating the type of produce to buy, and the man selected and purchased the requested produce in the morning from vendors he selected. He then dropped the produce off at the woman’s food truck. The man paid the vendors with his own credit card and later was reimbursed by the woman. Except for the man’s purchase and delivery of the produce, the woman did all the work related to the food-truck business.

One morning, while parking at the market, the man negligently ran his car into a farmer’s stall, causing extensive damage. The man truthfully told the farmer that, although the accident was the man’s fault, he had no money to pay for the farmer’s damage and his automobile insurance had lapsed.

The farmer wrote the woman a letter demanding that she pay him for the losses caused by the man’s negligence. The woman has asked her attorney what legal relationship she has with the man and what the liability implications would be in each case.

1. (a) Are the woman and the man partners in the food-truck business? Explain.

 (b) Assuming that the woman and the man are partners in the food-truck business, would the woman be liable to the farmer for the damage proximately caused by the man’s negligence? Explain.
2. (a) Is the man an employee of the woman? Explain.

- (b) Assuming that the man is an employee of the woman, would the woman be vicariously liable to the farmer for the damage proximately caused by the man's negligence? Explain.
- 3.
 - (a) Is the man an independent contractor for the woman? Explain.
 - (b) Assuming that the man is an independent contractor for the woman, would the woman be vicariously liable to the farmer for the damage proximately caused by the man's negligence? Explain.

QUESTION 2 – DECEDENTS’ ESTATES

On July 1, 2015, Testator duly executed a typewritten will that had only the following three dispositive provisions:

1. I give the portrait of my grandparents to my brother, Adam.
2. I give my antique bookcase to my sister, Beth.
3. I give all of my tangible personal property not otherwise effectively disposed of to the person I have named in a letter I signed and dated June 15, 2015. I have put that letter in the night table drawer in my bedroom in my home along with this will.

Testator died on February 10, 2019, a domiciliary of State A. Both the typewritten will and the letter of June 15 were found in the night table drawer. In clause 2 of the will, the phrase “antique bookcase” had been scratched out by Testator and immediately above it he had typed in the word “motorcycle.” And, on the back of the will, the following language appeared wholly in Testator’s handwriting: “I don’t want Adam to have the portrait of my grandparents. I want it to go to my first cousin, Charles.” No signatures appeared on the back of the will beneath this writing.

In the letter referred to in clause 3 of the will, Testator named his niece, Donna, who is Beth’s daughter, as the beneficiary.

Testator’s only surviving blood relatives are Adam, Beth, Charles, and Donna. In addition to the portrait of his grandparents, the antique bookcase, and the motorcycle, Testator’s only other asset was a bank account with a balance of $10,000.

State A permits wills to be completely or partially revoked by the execution of a subsequent will or codicil, or by physical act or by cancellation when accompanied with an intent to revoke the will or codicil. State A law also provides that “unsigned holographic wills or codicils are valid.” There are no other relevant statutes.

To whom should the property in Testator’s estate be distributed? Explain.

QUESTION 3 – CIVIL PROCEDURE

A man was driving his truck on a divided highway in State B when the truck collided with a car driven by a woman. As a result of the collision, the man lost control of his truck, which skidded off the road into a deep ravine. The woman's car was knocked into the highway median and rolled over several times before coming to a stop. The truck and its cargo were damaged beyond repair, but the man was not injured. The woman, on the other hand, suffered serious injuries. A passenger in the woman's car was also seriously injured.

Two lawsuits resulted from the collision.

In the first lawsuit, the man, a citizen of State B, sued the woman, a citizen of State A, in the United States District Court for the District of State A. The man alleged that the woman had caused the accident by negligently changing lanes while he was attempting to pass her and that he, the truck driver, had exercised due care and caution at all times. The man's complaint sought damages of $98,000—the value of the truck, trailer, and cargo. The woman answered the complaint, denying that she had driven negligently and asserting that the man had caused the accident by driving well above the speed limit and failing to look out for other vehicles on the road. The woman raised no other claims or defenses in her answer.

Following a bench trial in which both sides offered evidence as to the cause of the accident and the actions of each party, the judge entered judgment for the woman. The judge issued a short opinion finding, as a matter of fact, that “both the woman and the man operated their vehicles negligently” and that “both were at fault in causing the accident.” The judge further correctly concluded, as a matter of law, that the contributory negligence law of State B applied. In addition, the judge concluded that the man could not recover because his negligence had contributed to the accident. The judgment was promptly entered denying all relief to the man and awarding costs to the woman. The man did not appeal, and the judgment became final three months ago.

One month ago, the woman and the passenger joined together in a second lawsuit. In this lawsuit they sued the man to recover damages for the personal injuries they had suffered in the accident as a result of his negligence. Like the woman, the passenger is a citizen of State A. This lawsuit was filed in the United States District Court for the District of State B. The woman and the passenger are each seeking damages well in excess of the $75,000 diversity-jurisdiction threshold, and their claimed injuries warrant such damages. The man has filed an answer denying liability and raising several defenses including that the claims by the woman and the passenger are precluded by the earlier suit.

1. Do the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit the woman and the passenger to join their individual claims in a single lawsuit against the man? Explain.
2. Is the woman precluded from bringing her claim as a result of the judgment in her favor in the lawsuit brought by the man in federal court in State A? Explain.

3. Is the man precluded from denying that he was negligent with respect to the passenger as a result of the judgment against him in the lawsuit he brought against the woman in federal court in State A? Explain.

QUESTION 4 – SECURED TRANSACTIONS

KeyCo, a company that manufactures keys, has had significant cash flow problems as a result of market trends away from keys and toward electronic locks. Accordingly, last year KeyCo borrowed money on three occasions.

On February 1, KeyCo borrowed $200,000 from Firstbank. Pursuant to an agreement signed by both parties, KeyCo promised to repay the loan within two years and granted Firstbank a security interest in “all of KeyCo’s assets” to secure its repayment obligation. On the same day, Firstbank filed a properly completed financing statement in the appropriate filing office, listing KeyCo as the debtor and indicating the collateral as “all of KeyCo’s assets.”

On April 1, KeyCo borrowed $400,000 from Secondbank. Pursuant to an agreement signed by both parties, KeyCo promised to repay the loan within four years and granted Secondbank a security interest in “all of KeyCo’s equipment” to secure its repayment obligation.

On June 1, KeyCo borrowed $600,000 from Thirdbank. Pursuant to an agreement signed by both parties, KeyCo promised to repay the loan within six years and granted Thirdbank a security interest in “all of KeyCo’s equipment” to secure its repayment obligation. At the time of this transaction, Thirdbank knew about KeyCo’s transactions with Firstbank and Secondbank as described above.

On August 1, Thirdbank filed a properly completed financing statement in the appropriate filing office, listing KeyCo as the debtor and indicating the collateral as “all of KeyCo’s equipment.”

On October 1, Supplier obtained a judgment against KeyCo for an unpaid debt and, in connection with that judgment, obtained a lien on KeyCo’s key-manufacturing machine.

Except as described above, no financing statements have been filed that list KeyCo as the debtor.

KeyCo has defaulted on its obligations to Firstbank, Secondbank, and Thirdbank. Each of those banks, as well as Supplier, is asserting an interest in the key-manufacturing machine.

1. Which banks, if any, have enforceable security interests in the key-manufacturing machine? Explain.
2. Which banks, if any, have perfected security interests in the key-manufacturing machine? Explain.
3. What is the order of priority of the enforceable security interests and Supplier’s lien on the key-manufacturing machine? Explain.

QUESTION 5 – REAL PROPERTY

Thirty years ago, a man purchased a 170-acre tract of farmland. The farmland was bordered on the east by a county road that connected to the main street of a small town where the man worked in the local feed store. On the west, the farmland was bordered by a state highway.

Immediately after acquiring the farmland, the man built and moved into a house on its easterly portion. He constructed a vehicle shed on the westerly portion of the farmland in which he stored farm tractors and some of his cars. He then built a 10-foot-wide east-west gravel road that stretched across the entire farmland connecting the county road to the state highway. This gravel road allowed the man to travel between his house and the vehicle shed and also to drive tractors and cars out of the shed and onto the county road. It additionally gave him two routes from his house to the small town. It took the man 15 minutes to drive to town using the county road; using the state highway, which resulted in a more circuitous trip, took 45 minutes.

After building the gravel road across the farmland, the man usually used the county road to drive to work, although occasionally he used the state highway. On weekends, however, when he wasn't working, he frequently used the state highway because it allowed him to easily reach other towns where he visited friends.

Two years ago, the man conveyed the westernmost 90 acres of the farmland, including the vehicle shed, to a woman who worked in the same feed store as the man. This 90-acre portion included the western portion of the gravel road that the man had constructed across the property. The deed conveying the westernmost 90 acres to the woman did not mention the gravel road, and the deed was not recorded. The woman built a house on the 90 acres and moved in. She used the gravel road across the man's land to access the county road when driving to work.

One year ago, the woman conveyed her 90 acres to a friend, who moved into the house the woman had built. The friend worked in the same small town as the man and the woman, and the friend also used the gravel road across the man's land to access the county road. The deed conveying the property to the friend stated that the woman was conveying to the friend the 90 acres, together with "the right to use the gravel road" crossing the adjacent 80 acres owned by the man to reach the county road. This woman-to-friend deed was promptly recorded.

Five months ago, the man conveyed his 80 acres to a builder by a deed that made no mention of the gravel road. The builder paid the man fair value for the land and promptly recorded this man-to-builder deed.

Four months ago, the builder erected a barrier across the gravel road. The barrier prevented the friend from using the gravel road across the builder's land to reach the county road.

Three months ago, the friend recorded the man-to-woman deed.

The land is in a state that has a notice-type recording act and uses a grantor-grantee index. In this jurisdiction, the time to acquire an easement by prescription is 20 years.

1. Before the man's conveyance to the builder, did the friend have an implied easement from prior use over the man's 80 acres? Explain.
2. Assuming that the friend had an implied easement from prior use, did the builder take ownership of the 80 acres free and clear of that easement? Explain.

QUESTION 6 – CONTRACTS

A grocer planned to open a supermarket and needed shopping carts for her store. On March 1, she went to the showroom of a shopping-cart supplier to look at a variety of samples of modern shopping carts. After looking around the showroom, the grocer pointed to a shopping cart that bore a price tag of $125 and said to the supplier, “These are the carts I want for my store. When can you get me 100 of them?” The supplier said that he could deliver 100 of those shopping carts to the grocer’s supermarket within 30 days. The grocer responded, “That’s great. Please ship me 100 of these shopping carts by March 31, and I will wire you payment of $12,500 as soon as they arrive.” The supplier said, “You’ve got a deal!”

On March 2, the grocer sent the supplier an unsigned note, handwritten on plain paper, stating in its entirety: “It’s a pleasure doing business with you. This will confirm the deal we made yesterday for 100 shopping carts at $125 each.” The supplier received the note on March 4 and read it immediately but never responded to it in any way.

On March 31, the grocer received an envelope delivered by an express delivery service. Inside the envelope was a document printed on the supplier’s letterhead. The document stated, in its entirety: “Thanks so much for your business. The 60 shopping carts you ordered from us are on the way. Be on the lookout for our delivery truck—it may even arrive today! Please send us payment of $7,500 (60 carts x $125/cart) as soon as you receive the carts.”

Later that day, the supplier’s truck arrived at the grocer’s supermarket, and the truck driver said to the grocer, “I’ve got 60 shopping carts for you in the truck.” The grocer replied, “I didn’t order 60 shopping carts; I ordered 100. You go back to your boss and tell him to send me the right order.” The grocer refused to allow the truck driver to unload the 60 shopping carts from the truck and did not pay for them.

The grocer would like to sue the supplier for breach of contract for failing to deliver 100 shopping carts.

Is there an enforceable contract requiring the supplier to sell 100 shopping carts to the grocer for $125 each? Explain.

ANALYSIS 1 – AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

The objective of this question is to test whether the examinee can differentiate between a partner, an employee, and a non-employee agent and determine what the woman's liability would be depending on the characterization of the man's relationship to the woman.

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Are the woman and the man partners in the food-truck business?
- (1)(b) Assuming that the woman and the man are partners in the food-truck business, would the woman be liable to the farmer for damages proximately caused by the man's negligence?
- (2)(a) Is the man an employee of the woman?
- (2)(b) Assuming that the man is an employee of the woman, would the woman be vicariously liable to the farmer for damages proximately caused by the man's negligence?
- (3)(a) Is the man the woman's non-employee agent?
- (3)(b) Assuming that the man is the woman's non-employee agent, would the woman be vicariously liable to the farmer for damages proximately caused by the man's negligence?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The liability of the woman to the farmer for the man's negligence depends on the nature of the legal relationship between the woman and the man. There are three possible relationships that could result in liability, each carrying different liability implications for the woman. These relationships are partnership, employment, and agency.

It is unlikely that the woman and the man are partners. Beyond buying and delivering produce as requested, the man does not participate in the control and management of the food-truck business. Thus, it is unlikely that he is a co-owner of the business. Furthermore, the woman's agreement to share some of her business profits with the man would likely be seen merely as partial compensation for his services. However, if they are partners, then the woman would be jointly and severally liable with the man for the obligations of the partnership. The man's negligence, if it occurred while the man was carrying on ordinary partnership business as appears to be the case here, would create a partnership obligation and expose the woman to potential liability to the farmer.

It is unlikely that the man is an employee of the woman because she does not have control over the “manner and means” by which he makes purchases on her behalf at the farmers’ market. Merely following the woman’s text instructions to buy specific types of produce does not make him an employee. However, if the woman is the man’s employer, then the woman would be vicariously liable for negligent actions by the man if, as appears to be the case here, he was acting within the scope of his employment.

It is likely that the legal relationship between the woman and the man is that of principal-agent, with the man acting as a non-employee agent (independent contractor) of the woman. Thus, the woman would not be liable for the man’s negligence because principals generally are not liable for the negligence of their non-employee agents in the absence of an authorization by the principal for the agent to act negligently.

It is unlikely that the woman and the man are partners because the man does not participate in the control and management of the food-truck business, even though they have an agreement to share profits.

A partnership is defined as “an association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit . . . whether or not the persons intend to form a partnership.” Revised Uniform Partnership Act (RUPA, as amended 2013) § 202(a); see also Uniform Partnership Act (UPA, 1914) § 6(1). In addition, “[a] person who receives a share of the profits of a business is presumed to be a partner in the business, unless the profits were received in payment . . . for services as an independent contractor or of wages or other compensation of an employee.” RUPA § 202(c)(3); see also UPA § 7(4) (receipt of share of profits is “prima facie evidence” of partnership, unless profits were received in payment of employee wages). Thus, the sharing of profits in a business creates a rebuttable presumption of a partnership that switches the burden of persuasion to the person who denies partnership status. See Comment, RUPA § 202(c).

Here, the woman should be able to rebut the presumption that her sharing of 10% of the food truck’s profits with the man created a partnership. There is no indication that the man is a “co-owner” of the business, given that there is no indication that he has any control over running the food-truck business. See Comment, RUPA § 202(a) (stating that “co-ownership is a key concept” that requires both the “power of ultimate control” of the business and the “right to share in the [business] profits”). The man’s only role in the business is to purchase produce in the morning and drop it off at the food truck. According to the facts, the woman has continued to run the business as a sole proprietor, doing all the work related to the business except for the purchase of the produce.

Furthermore, although the man is entitled to 10% of the food truck’s profits and $20 per delivery, the facts strongly suggest that this is compensation for his services as the woman’s independent-contractor agent, not as a partner. See Point Three(a) below. That amount was proposed to him in response to the question, “And how much would I be paid?” not “How will we share profits?”

Thus, even though the man’s negligence occurred in the ordinary course of the woman’s business, it is unlikely she would be liable as his partner.

Point One(b) (13%)

Assuming that the woman is the man’s partner, she would be liable to the farmer for damages caused by the man’s negligence while acting in the ordinary course of the partnership business.

Generally, a partnership is liable for loss or injury caused to a third party because of the wrongful act of a partner acting in the ordinary course of partnership business. RUPA § 305(a); UPA § 15. Further, all partners are personally liable for all liabilities of the partnership. RUPA § 306(a) (joint and several liability for all partnership debts, obligations, and liabilities, unless the partnership liability arose before the person became a partner or the partnership is a limited liability partnership); see also UPA § 15(a) (joint and several liability for partnership liability arising from partner’s wrongful acts). Thus, if the woman and the man are partners in a partnership, the woman would be liable for the negligence of the man in running into the farmer’s stall, as it appears that the man, assuming he is the woman’s partner, was acting in the ordinary course of partnership business.

Point Two(a) (20%)

The man is not an employee of the woman because she does not have the right to control the “manner and means” of how he performs his work.

An employee is a type of agent. Generally, an “agent” is a person who consents to act on behalf of and subject to the control of another person (the “principal”). Restatement (Third) of Agency § 1.01. “[A]n employee is an agent whose principal controls or has the right to control the manner and means of the agent’s performance of work.” Id. § 7.07(3)(a) (emphasis added).

Here, the man is acting as an agent of the woman, purchasing produce for her at the farmers’ market. Whether the woman is his employer depends on whether she has the right to control the “manner and means” of the man’s purchasing and delivery of produce for her food-truck business. Each night, the woman directs what type of produce the man is to purchase the next morning, and she briefly accompanied the man to the farmers’ market during the first days he worked for her. But the more significant purchasing tasks are lodged in the man. He alone chooses the vendors from whom he purchases the produce, and he alone chooses the produce before dropping it off at the woman’s food truck in the morning. In fact, the woman does not have the right to control which farmers the man purchases from or the specific produce that he purchases. See also Restatement (Second) Of Agency § 220(1) (servant is subject to control of master with respect to “physical conduct in the performance of the services”).

In addition, many of the factors that might suggest the existence of an employer-employee relationship are absent from the relationship between the woman and the man. The woman and the man did not agree that she would exercise control over “the details” of his work; the man’s purchasing of produce is done without the woman’s supervision; the man (not the woman) supplies the car for driving to, picking up, and delivering the produce; the man is not paid for time worked, but instead by the job (daily purchase of produce); and the man pays for the produce with his own credit card rather than with the woman's credit card. See Official Comment to Restatement (Third) Of Agency § 7.07(2) (listing factors used by courts to identify existence of employer-employee relationship); see also Kleinberger, Agency, Partnerships and LLCs: Examples & Explanations § 3.2.4 (5th ed. 2017).

Point Two(b) (14%)

Assuming that the man is the woman's employee, she would be vicariously liable for the damage to the farmer's stall proximately caused by the man's negligence because he was acting within the scope of his employment.

Generally, an employer is subject to vicarious liability for torts committed by an employee "acting within the scope of employment." Restatement (Third) of Agency §§ 2.04, 7.07(1). Thus, if the man is an employee of the woman, the woman would likely be liable for the man's negligence in driving into the farmer's stall, as it appears here that driving to and from the farmers' market is within the scope of the man's employment.

[NOTE: An examinee might point out that participants in a business can become directly liable for the negligent hiring or supervision of an employee or agent. See id. § 7.05. The answer, however, should not receive credit for making this point. The question asks only for an analysis of the woman's vicarious liability to the farmer given her relationship with the man. Further, there is nothing to indicate that the woman was negligent in hiring or supervising the man.]

The man is a non-employee agent (independent contractor) of the woman because he agreed to act on her behalf but not subject to her control regarding the manner and means by which he performs his work.

As described above, an "agent" is a person who consents to act on behalf of and subject to the control of another person (the "principal"). Restatement (Third) of Agency § 1.01. An independent contractor is an agent who is not subject to the principal's control of the "manner and means" by which the agent conducts his work for the principal. Here, the man agreed to perform acts on behalf of the woman, but his acts are not subject to her control. Thus, he is a non-employee agent for the woman.

Point Three(b) (13%)

Even assuming that the man is acting as a non-employee agent (independent contractor) on the woman's behalf, the woman is not vicariously liable to the farmer for the man's negligence on This basis.

The general rule is that a principal is not liable for the negligence of a non-employee agent acting on behalf of the principal unless the principal actually authorized the agent to act in a negligent manner. Restatement (Third) of Agency § 7.04. Here, the man is a non-employee agent (independent contractor) of the woman for purchasing produce at the farmers' market. The woman did not authorize him to act negligently. Thus, she is not vicariously liable to the farmer.

[NOTE: Vicarious liability of a principal for the torts of an independent-contractor agent may also arise in certain special circumstances: when the independent contractor injures an invitee to the principal's property (Restatement (Second) of Torts § 415); when the independent contractor is involved in an ultra-hazardous activity, such as blasting with explosives (id. §§ 423, 427A); or when the principal has held out the independent contractor to the injured party as an employee (Wabash Indep. Oil Co. v. King & Wills Ins. Agency, 618 N.E.2d 1214, 1218 (Ill. App. 1993)). An examinee should not receive credit for discussing these exceptions because there is nothing in the facts to suggest that any of them apply here.

Similarly, credit should not be given for the observation that a principal can become directly liable for the negligent hiring or supervision of an employee or agent because the question asked only for an analysis of the woman's vicarious liability to the farmer given her relationship with the man.]

FEBRUARY 2021 MEE ANALYSIS 2 – DECEDENTS' ESTATES

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This question tests basic principles of the law relating to the revocation of wills, the incorporation-by-reference doctrine, and an intestate-succession law.

Legal Problems:

- (1) Was the bequest of the portrait of Testator's grandparents to Adam properly revoked, such that the portrait passes to Charles?
- (2) Is Beth entitled to receive the antique bookcase, the motorcycle, or neither?
- (3) Is Donna entitled to the balance of Testator's tangible personal property under the doctrine of incorporation by reference?
- (4) To whom should the undisposed-of property (the bank account) be distributed?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The bequest to Adam was revoked by the holographic codicil on the back of the typewritten will, and thus the portrait passes to Charles, who is specifically named in the codicil as the beneficiary of the portrait.

The bequest of the antique bookcase was revoked physically by Testator's drawing of scratch marks through it, and the gift of the motorcycle is not effective because it was not made by a valid will. And because the doctrine of dependent relative revocation is not applicable here, Beth is not entitled to either.

Both the bookcase and the motorcycle pass to Donna under the express terms of the June 15 letter that was incorporated by reference into the July 1 will.

The balance of the estate passes to Adam and Beth, Testator's siblings, his only heirs.

Point One (30%)

The portrait of Testator's grandparents passes to Charles, the named beneficiary under the writing on the back of the will, which is a valid holographic codicil.

State A law permits wills to be completely or partially revoked by the execution of a subsequent will or codicil or by physical act or cancellation with the intent to revoke. Neither the scratching out of the phrase “antique bookcase” nor the typing in of the word “motorcycle” on the face of the will suggests that Testator intended to revoke the entire will or the bequest to Adam of the portrait. On the other hand, on the back of the will, Testator wrote: “I don’t want Adam to have the portrait of my grandparents. I want it to go to my first cousin, Charles.” Because this writing does not come into physical contact with the words of the will, they are not words of cancellation that revoke the will. Thompson v. Royall, 175 S.E. 748 (Va. 1934). But see Unif. Prob. Code § 2-507 (permitting revocation by cancellation even though words of cancellation do not touch words of the will). Under the laws of State A, however, these words can be effective as a holographic codicil.

A holographic codicil can revoke an earlier will. See generally Mangum v. Estate of Fuller, 797 S.W.2d 452 (Ark. 1990). If the subsequently executed holographic codicil disposes of only a part of the estate disposed of by a prior will, then the will is revoked only to the extent that it is inconsistent with the provisions of the holographic codicil. See, e.g., Gilbert v. Gilbert, 652 S.W.2d 663 (Ky. Ct. App. 1983). See also Unif. Prob. Code § 2-507(a)(1) (partial revocation by inconsistency). Here, the holographic codicil is inconsistent with the typewritten will only to the extent that it leaves the portrait of Testator’s grandparents to Charles rather than Adam. Thus, no other disposition in the typewritten will is revoked.

[NOTE: In some states, the handwriting on the back of the will would not be a valid holographic will because of underlying state statutes requiring holographic wills to be signed. See, e.g., Unif. Prob. Code § 2-502(b) (requiring holographic wills to be signed). State A, however, has no signature requirement for holographic wills.]

Point Two (30%)

The bequest of the antique bookcase to Beth was revoked by physical act. Testator revoked the original bequest with the apparent intent to substitute for it a bequest of the motorcycle. However, the substituted bequest does not constitute a holographic will because it was typewritten rather than handwritten. Furthermore, the doctrine of dependent relative revocation is unlikely to apply to prevent the bequest of the bookcase from being revoked.

Under State A law, a bequest may be revoked by cancellation if the cancellation is accompanied by an intent to revoke. When a will is found with marks of cancellation upon it (here, the scratches through the phrase “antique bookcase”), a presumption arises that such marks were made by the testator with the intent to revoke. See generally William M. McGovern, Sheldon F. Kurtz, David M. English, And Thomas P. Gallanis, Wills, Trusts and Estates § 4.2 at pp. 192–93 (5th ed. 2017). Here, the facts clearly state that the marks were made by Testator and, in light of the presumption, made by Testator with the intent to revoke. However, typing the word “motorcycle” above “antique bookcase” suggests that Testator revoked the bequest of the bookcase to substitute for it a bequest of the motorcycle. Because that typed bequest was neither signed nor witnessed nor in Testator’s handwriting, it is not a valid will. Thus, Beth takes nothing unless the revocation of the bequest of the bookcase can be avoided under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation.

Under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation, a revocation can be deemed conditional on the validity of a subsequently executed will or codicil if that would accomplish the testator’s intent. Id., § 4.3 at 198. Under this doctrine, if the subsequently executed will is invalid, then the revocation that was dependent upon it is ignored. Id. Typically, however, courts apply that doctrine only when there is a sufficiently close identity between the bequest that was revoked and the bequest that was expressed in the invalid subsequent will. Here, there is no close identity between a bookcase and a motorcycle, and accordingly a court is unlikely to apply the doctrine of dependent relative revocation to prevent the bequest of the bookcase from being revoked. If, on the other hand, Beth could find evidence that Testator's revocation of the antique bookcase bequest was conditional, then she would be entitled to the bookcase. See Point Three for disposition of the bookcase and the motorcycle.

Point Three (30%)

Under the doctrine of incorporation by reference, Donna is entitled to the balance of Testator's tangible personal property.

Under the doctrine of incorporation by reference, a will may refer to an unattested written document and incorporate its terms into the will so long as that written document was in existence at the time the will was signed and the evidence is clear that the testator intended to incorporate its terms into the will. See, e.g., Smith v. Weitzel, 338 S.W.2d 628 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1960); McGovern et al., supra, § 7.2 at 281 (2017). See also Unif. Prob. Code § 2-510. If such a document is incorporated, the dispositive provisions in it are given the same effect as if they had been set forth in the duly attested will. Here, the letter referred to in Testator's will was dated June 15, 2015. Thus, it was in existence on the date Testator signed the will, July 1, 2015. Testator's will specifically refers to the letter by date and reflects a clear intent that the disposition in the letter be given effect. Donna should be entitled to all of Testator's tangible personal property not otherwise effectively disposed of—namely, the bookcase and the motorcycle. See Point Two.

[NOTE: Some states have statutes that specifically authorize the bequest of tangibles in the manner used here and validate such bequests even if the memo was executed after the will. See, e.g., Unif. Prob. Code § 2-513. State A has no such statute.]

Point Four (10%)

The bank account should be distributed to Adam and Beth as the sole heirs of Testator.

The bank account is not tangible personal property; thus, it was not disposed of by Testator's will. Where a testator's will fails to dispose of all of the testator's property, the undisposed-of property passes to the testator's heirs as partial intestate property. See, e.g., Estate of Levy v. Hebrew Tech. Inst., 196 So. 2d 225 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1967). Typically, the intestacy laws of the states provide that, absent descendants or a spouse, an intestate's property is distributed to (1) parents, (2) the descendants of the parents (that is, the intestate's siblings and their descendants), (3) more remote ancestors, and (4) the descendants of the more remote ancestors, in that order. Here, Testator's closest living relatives are his siblings, Adam and Beth, and as such they are equally entitled to all of Testator's property not disposed of by Testator's will. Here, that is the bank account.

ANALYSIS 3 – CIVIL PROCEDURE

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This question is designed to test an examinee's understanding of three important rules/principles of federal civil procedure. First, it tests knowledge of the right of individuals to bring their separate claims in the same federal action when those claims arise out of the same occurrence and raise a common question of fact. Second, it tests an examinee's knowledge of the compulsory counterclaim rule and its effects on subsequent litigation. Finally, it tests on the doctrine of collateral estoppel and when application of that doctrine will bar a litigant from re-litigating an issue.

Legal Problems:

- (1) May two individuals who are injured in the same highway accident join their separate claims against the alleged wrongdoer in a single lawsuit in federal court?
- (2) Is a person who is sued as a defendant in a lawsuit arising out of a highway accident, and who wins the case, precluded from bringing a subsequent lawsuit against the original plaintiff when that subsequent suit raises a claim that arises from the same highway accident and that could have been raised as a counterclaim in the prior lawsuit?
- (3)(a) Is a party to an action precluded from litigating in a subsequent suit a factual issue that arose in a previous action?
- (3)(b) May a nonparty to a prior lawsuit preclude a party to that suit from subsequently re-litigating an issue that was litigated and decided in the prior lawsuit?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the woman and the passenger may bring their individual claims against the man in a single lawsuit because those separate claims each arise out of the same occurrence (the highway accident) and resolution of each claim will involve the determination of at least one common issue (the man's negligence).

The woman's claim should be dismissed from the second lawsuit. Her claim arises out of the highway accident that was the subject of the man's original lawsuit against her in State A. Under the federal compulsory counterclaim rule, she should have raised this claim in that first lawsuit. Her failure to do so bars her from bringing a new, independent action on the claim.

Under general principles of issue preclusion (collateral estoppel), the passenger is likely to be able to assert that the man is precluded from re-litigating the issue of his negligence in the highway accident. That exact issue was litigated by the man in the prior action, the prior court made an explicit determination that the man was negligent, and that determination was necessary to the court's final judgment on the merits. Finally, there is nothing to suggest that the man was inadequately represented in the prior action or that he did not have a full and fair opportunity to litigate the negligence issue. Thus, he should be precluded from re-litigating that issue in the State B action.

Whether the passenger can assert issue preclusion against the man depends, however, on whether the issue-preclusion rules of State A (where the federal court in the first suit was sitting in diversity) include the doctrine of "mutuality of estoppel." If State A applies the mutuality doctrine, the nonparty passenger would not be able to rely on the judgment from a federal diversity court sitting in State A to preclude the man from litigating the question of his negligence in a second suit brought against him by the passenger in a federal court in State B.

The woman and the passenger may bring their separate claims in the same federal action because those claims arise out of the same occurrence and raise a common question of fact—i.e., whether the man was negligent in the highway accident.

Two persons may bring their separate claims in a single lawsuit in federal court if (1) those claims "aris[e] out of the same . . . occurrence," and (2) "any question of law or fact common to all plaintiffs will arise in the action." Fed. R. Civ. P. 20(a)(1). On the facts of this problem, the woman and the passenger easily meet these requirements. First, a single occurrence (the highway accident) gave rise to each of their claims. Second, the factual question whether the man was negligent will arise in the action and is common to both claims. Thus, the woman and the passenger may join together as plaintiffs in this federal action in State B.

Point Two (35%)

The woman's claim for damages arising from the accident is barred because she should have pleaded it as a compulsory counterclaim in the earlier federal action in State A brought against her by the man.

Under the "compulsory counterclaim" rule applicable in federal courts, a defendant must include in her answer to a complaint "any claim" that the defendant has against the plaintiff that "arises out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the [plaintiff's] claim." Fed. R. Civ. P. 13(a). Thus, when the man filed suit against the woman in federal district court in State A for damages related to the highway accident, the woman was obligated to assert in her answer "any claim" that she had against the man that arose out of that same accident. The facts state, however, that she did not assert any claim in the man's suit.

It is well established that "[a] failure to plead a compulsory counterclaim bars a party from bringing a later independent action on that claim." Arthur R. Miller, Mary Kay Kane & A. Benjamin Spencer, 6 Fed. Prac. & Proc. Civ. 1417 (3d ed. 2016). Although this result is not required by the language of the rule itself, some courts treat the subsequent action as barred by res judicata or claim preclusion, on the theory that Rule 13(a) effectively makes a compulsory counterclaim part of the “claim” that was decided in the first suit. See, e.g., Publicis Commc’n v. True North Commc’ns, Inc., 132 F.3d 363 (7th Cir. 1997). Other courts have concluded that a “failure to assert a compulsory counterclaim constitutes a waiver of that claim.” Polymer Indus. Prods. Co. v. Bridgestone/Firestone, Inc., 347 F.3d 935, 938 (Fed. Cir. 2003). Whatever the theory, a party that “does not assert its compulsory counterclaim in the first proceeding . . . is forever barred from asserting that claim in future litigation.” Id.

The woman’s claim for damages arises from the injuries she suffered in the highway accident and raises the factual question of who was responsible for the accident. Under the compulsory counterclaim rule, she should have asserted her claim as a counterclaim in the action the man filed against her based on that same accident. Because she failed to do so, she is barred from bringing her claim in the current action.

Point Three(a) (30%)

The issue of the man’s negligence was necessary to the judgment in the first lawsuit (in State A), was fully and fairly litigated in that action, and was finally decided in that action. Therefore, the man is precluded from re-litigating that issue in the second lawsuit (in State B).

The doctrine of collateral estoppel, or issue preclusion, provides generally that factual matters that are “put in issue and directly determined by a court of competent jurisdiction” must “be taken as conclusively established” if the same factual issue arises in a subsequent suit. Southern Pacific R. Co. v. United States, 168 U.S. 1, 48–49 (1897). See also Allen v. McCurry, 449 U.S. 90, 94 (1980). A party who asserts that collateral estoppel precludes re-litigation of a factual issue must establish that

- (1) the previous determination was necessary to the decision; (2) the identical issue was previously litigated; (3) the issue was actually decided in a decision that was final, valid, and on the merits; and (4) the party being precluded from re-litigating the issue was adequately represented in the previous action.

United Access Technologies LLC v. CenturyTel Broadband Services LLC, 778 F.3d 1327, 1331 (Fed. Cir. 2015). See generally Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 27 (1982).

Here, the passenger should be able to establish all the elements required to bar the man from re-litigating the issue of his negligence in the highway accident. First, the factual question of whether the man drove negligently was clearly an essential question in the man’s original action against the woman in State A. He explicitly pleaded that he was not negligent, and under the applicable contributory negligence rule, he was required to prove his lack of negligence in order to recover from the woman. Given that the judge in that action concluded that the woman was negligent, it was necessary for the judge also to determine whether the man was negligent. Second, the issue of the man’s negligence was actually litigated by the parties. Third, the court made a final decision on the merits in the first lawsuit, concluding that the man was negligent, and there are no facts that raise any question about the validity of that decision. Finally, the man had every incentive to litigate vigorously—he brought the action himself and was seeking a substantial recovery—and nothing in the facts of the problem suggests that he was not adequately represented.

[NOTE: The man's "contributory negligence" found in the first suit and the man's "negligence" asserted in the second suit appear to constitute the same factual issue. There is nothing to suggest that the tort law of State B, which the judge applied, defines negligence differently depending on whether it is asserted as the basis of a claim or as a defense.]

Point Three(b) (10%)

In most jurisdictions, the passenger's nonparty status in the original action would not prevent her from asserting issue preclusion. Some jurisdictions, however, continue to adhere to the doctrine of mutuality, which prevents a nonparty to a prior action from asserting issue preclusion against a party to that action. Here, because the prior action was decided by a federal court sitting in diversity in State A, the issue-preclusion rules of State A will determine whether the mutuality doctrine applies or not.

Traditionally, collateral estoppel could only be asserted by a party to a prior action or by someone who was otherwise bound by the result in that action. However, most jurisdictions have moved away from this "mutuality" requirement. See Jack H. Friedenthal, Mary Kay Kane & Arthur R. Miller, Civil Procedure § 14.14 (4th ed. 2005). The Supreme Court long ago abandoned mutuality in the federal courts involving federal claims. As a result, "a litigant who was not a party to a [prior] federal case [may] use collateral estoppel 'offensively' in a new federal suit against the party who lost on the decided issue in the first case," unless allowing estoppel would be unfair. Allen v. McCurry, 449 U.S. 90, 94–95 (1980). However, some state courts continue to apply the doctrine of mutuality. In these states, a nonparty who would not be bound by a finding in the first suit contrary to the nonparty's interest cannot use a finding from the first suit that is favorable to the nonparty. Friedenthal Et Al., supra, at 724.

In this diversity case, even though the first judgment is from a federal court, the applicable preclusion rules will be state rules. In Semtek International, Inc. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 531 U.S. 497 (2001), the Supreme Court held that the claim-preclusive effect of a judgment of a federal diversity court should ordinarily be determined by the claim-preclusion rules "that would be applied by the state courts in the State in which the federal diversity court sits." Although Semtek only addressed claim preclusion, lower courts have assumed that it applies as well to issue preclusion. See, e.g., Algonquin Power Income Fund v. Christine Falls of New York, Inc., 362 Fed. Appx. 151 (2nd Cir. 2010) (stating that the claim- and issue-preclusive effects of the judgment of a federal diversity court sitting in New York are determined by New York law). Although state rules of preclusion generally apply in these circumstances, the question of the effect of a federal judgment remains a question of federal law, and state rules can be ignored "in situations in which the state law is incompatible with federal interests." Semtek, 531 U.S. at 509.

Here, because the first judgment is from a federal court sitting in diversity in State A, Semtek requires application of the issue-preclusion rules of State A. The problem, however, does not indicate whether State A has abandoned the mutuality doctrine (as have most states) or continues to apply the doctrine. If State A continues to adhere to the doctrine, the passenger, who would not have been bound had the first court (in State A) found that the man was not negligent, will not be able to offensively assert that the man is bound by the finding that he was negligent. That is, the mutuality doctrine will prevent the passenger from using issue preclusion against the man. If State A does not apply the mutuality doctrine, then the passenger can use the finding that the man was negligent offensively in the suit in State B.

[NOTE: Although there is nothing to suggest that following State A's rules of issue preclusion would be incompatible with federal interests, applying State A law to decide the separate issue of whether the woman can sue the man (see Point Two) would be incompatible with federal interests. If State A law allowed the woman to bring her claim despite her failure to raise it in the original federal action, that result would undermine the federal compulsory counterclaim rule.]

[NOTE: Examinees who apply the federal issue-preclusion rule may discuss the issue of whether it is fair to allow a nonparty to assert preclusion in a particular case. The factors that have generally been considered relevant in assessing fairness in this context include (i) whether the nonparty could easily have joined the prior action; (ii) whether the subsequent litigation was foreseeable so that the party against whom preclusion is sought had an incentive to litigate vigorously in the first action; (iii) whether there are inconsistent judgments arising from the same incident; and (iv) whether more favorable procedures in the second action raise the possibility that re-litigation of the issue may lead to a different outcome. See Friedenthal Et Al, supra, § 14.14, at 728.

Here, there is no obvious unfairness. First, the passenger could not have joined or intervened in the man's original action. Even if the man had wanted her as a co-plaintiff, the passenger shares the same state citizenship as the woman and her joinder would have destroyed diversity and resulted in dismissal of the original action for lack of diversity jurisdiction. Second, it was certainly foreseeable to the man that there might be a suit for personal injuries by the other persons involved in the accident, so he had a strong incentive to litigate the negligence issue vigorously. Third, there is no risk here of inconsistent judgments; to the contrary, collateral estoppel will promote consistency in the results of the suits arising from this accident. Finally, both this suit and the original suit are in federal court. The current action does not provide the man with any different procedures that make it likely that re-litigation will lead to an improved or different decision of the issue of his negligence.]

ANALYSIS 4 – SECURED TRANSACTIONS

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This secured transactions question is intended to test knowledge of the basic elements of enforceability and perfection of security interests as well as priorities between competing security interests and against judgment-lien creditors.

Legal Problems:

- (1) What are the requirements for an enforceable security interest, and which banks have satisfied those requirements?
- (2) What are the requirements for a perfected security interest, and which banks have satisfied those requirements?
- (3)(a) What is the priority of a perfected security interest against an earlier unperfected security interest, when the holder of the perfected security interest knew about the unperfected security interest?
- (3)(b) What is the priority of a security interest against a judicial lien on the same item of property?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Firstbank does not have an enforceable security interest in the key-manufacturing machine because its security agreement does not sufficiently describe the collateral. Secondbank and Thirdbank both have enforceable security interests in the key-manufacturing machine. Secondbank's security interest is not perfected because it neither filed a financing statement with respect to the key-manufacturing machine nor took possession of it. Thirdbank's security interest is perfected because of the filing of the financing statement.

Thirdbank's security interest has priority over that of Secondbank because a perfected security interest has priority over an unperfected security interest even if the perfected secured party was aware of the unperfected security interest. Thirdbank's security interest also has priority over the interest of Supplier, a judgment-lien creditor, because Thirdbank's security interest was perfected before Supplier obtained its judgment lien. Secondbank's security interest is subordinate to the interest of Supplier because the security interest was not perfected at the time that Supplier obtained its judgment lien. Thus, the order of priority of the claims to the key-manufacturing machine is Thirdbank, Supplier, and Secondbank. Firstbank has no claim because its security interest is not enforceable.

Point One (35%)

The security interests of Secondbank and Thirdbank satisfy all three criteria for enforceability. The security interest of Firstbank, however, is not enforceable because its security agreement does not sufficiently describe the collateral.

Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code determines whether a security interest in personal property, such as the key-manufacturing machine, is enforceable. Under UCC § 9-203(b), three criteria must be satisfied. First, “value” must be given. UCC § 9-203(b)(1). Second, the debtor must have rights in the collateral or the power to transfer rights in it to the secured party. UCC § 9-203(b)(2). Third, either the debtor must have authenticated (signed or its electronic equivalent, see UCC § 9-102(a)(7)) a security agreement that provides a description of the collateral or the secured party must have taken possession of the collateral pursuant to the debtor’s security agreement. UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(A)–(B).

The first two criteria are clearly satisfied for the security interests of all three banks. In each case, the secured party gave “value” (defined in UCC § 1-204 to include situations in which credit has been extended or the secured party provided consideration)—each bank made a loan to KeyCo. Also, the property in question is KeyCo’s key-manufacturing machine, so KeyCo clearly has rights in that machine. However, inasmuch as none of the banks has taken possession of the key-manufacturing machine, their security interests will be enforceable under UCC § 9-203(b)(3) only if, in each case, KeyCo has authenticated a security agreement providing a description of the collateral.

The agreements signed by KeyCo constitute security agreements inasmuch as they are agreements that create or provide for a security interest (UCC § 9-102(a)(74)), and KeyCo’s signature satisfies the requirement that the debtor authenticate the security agreement. But, for enforceability, the security agreement must provide a description of the collateral. UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(A). The standards for a sufficient description of collateral are found in UCC § 9-108. That section does not require a precise or detailed description. Rather, UCC § 9-108(a) states that a description of personal property is sufficient “whether or not it is specific, if it reasonably identifies what is described.” Moreover, UCC § 9-108(b) provides that a description that identifies the collateral by category or by a type of collateral defined in the UCC reasonably identifies the collateral. “Equipment” is a type of collateral defined in the UCC. See UCC § 9-102(a)(33). As a result, the statements in the security agreements of Secondbank and Thirdbank indicating that KeyCo granted a security interest in all of its equipment are sufficient to satisfy the requirement that the security agreement contain a description of the collateral. Thus, Secondbank and Thirdbank have enforceable security interests in KeyCo’s equipment. The key-manufacturing machine constitutes equipment. UCC § 9-102(a)(33). Therefore, Secondbank and Thirdbank have enforceable security interests in the key-manufacturing machine.

As for Firstbank, the description of the collateral in its security agreement as “all of KeyCo’s assets” might seem sufficient, but it is not. This is because UCC § 9-108(c) provides that a description of the collateral as “all the debtor’s assets” or “all the debtor’s personal property” or words to that effect does not reasonably identify the collateral. Thus, the so-called “supergeneric” description of the collateral in Firstbank’s security agreement does not sufficiently describe the collateral; as a result, Firstbank does not have an enforceable security interest in KeyCo’s key-manufacturing machine.

[NOTE: With respect to Firstbank’s security agreement, an examinee might point out that “supergeneric” indications of collateral are sufficient in a financing statement under UCC § 9-504(2). This is true but irrelevant. While such indications do suffice in a financing statement, they are insufficient as a description of collateral in a security agreement under § 9-108. An effective financing statement does not cure an ineffective security agreement.]

Point Two (25%)

The security interest of Firstbank is not perfected because it is not enforceable and therefore has not attached. The security interest of Secondbank, albeit enforceable, is not perfected because Secondbank did not file a financing statement and does not have possession of the key-manufacturing machine. The enforceable security interest of Thirdbank is perfected because it has attached and a financing statement has been filed.

A security interest in goods, such as the key-manufacturing machine, is perfected if it has “attached” and either a financing statement has been filed or the secured party has possession of the collateral. UCC §§ 9-308, 9-310. A security interest attaches when it becomes enforceable (unless the parties have agreed to postpone the time of attachment). UCC § 9-203(a). Firstbank does not have an attached security interest in the key-manufacturing machine because it does not have an enforceable security interest in it. Thus, Firstbank’s security interest is unperfected.

Secondbank has an enforceable security interest in the key-manufacturing machine, and there is nothing to indicate that Secondbank agreed to postpone the time of attachment, so its interest has attached. But Secondbank has not filed a financing statement with respect to its security interest and has not taken possession of the key-manufacturing machine. As a result, its enforceable and attached security interest is not perfected.

Thirdbank, like Secondbank, has an enforceable security interest in the machine. Nothing indicates that Thirdbank agreed to postpone attachment, so the interest has attached. Thirdbank filed a properly completed financing statement in the appropriate filing office, listing KeyCo as the debtor and indicating the collateral as “all of KeyCo’s equipment.” Under UCC § 9-504(1), that indication of collateral is sufficient because it is a sufficient description of collateral under UCC § 9-108. As a result, Thirdbank’s security interest is perfected.

[NOTE: An examinee might note that the indication of collateral in Firstbank’s financing statement—“all of KeyCo’s assets”—is a sufficient indication of collateral for a financing statement even though that language is not a sufficient description of collateral for a security agreement. This is accurate but, because a security interest that is not enforceable and attached cannot be perfected, it is not necessary for the analysis.]

Point Three(a) (20%)

Thirdbank’s perfected security interest has priority over the prior unperfected security interest of Secondbank.

Secondbank and Thirdbank have enforceable security interests in the key-manufacturing machine. Priority between competing enforceable security interests is determined by Part 3 of UCC Article 9. Under UCC § 9-322(a)(2), a perfected security interest has priority over an unperfected security interest in the same item of collateral. Whether the perfected secured party has notice or knowledge of the prior unperfected interest plays no role in the priority determination. Therefore, because Thirdbank's security interest is perfected and Secondbank's security interest is unperfected, Thirdbank's security interest in the key-manufacturing machine has priority over the security interest of Secondbank.

Point Three(b) (20%)

Secondbank's security interest is subordinate to Supplier's judgment lien because the security interest was not perfected at the time that Supplier's lien was created. Thirdbank's security interest is superior to Supplier's judgment lien because the security interest was perfected at the time that the lien was created.

UCC § 9-201 states that, except as provided in the Uniform Commercial Code, a security agreement is effective against creditors. Thus, the security interests of Secondbank and Thirdbank will be effective against the claim of Supplier (a judgment-lien creditor) unless a UCC provision provides to the contrary.

One such provision is UCC § 9-317. Under § 9-317, an unperfected security interest is subordinate to a judicial lien in the same asset. In this case, Secondbank's interest was never perfected. Accordingly, Secondbank's unperfected security interest in the key-manufacturing machine is subordinate to Supplier's lien.

On the other hand, Thirdbank's security interest was perfected before the lien was created. Therefore, Thirdbank's security interest is not subordinate to Supplier's lien; rather, under the general rule of UCC § 9-201, Thirdbank's interest is superior to that of Supplier. Accordingly, the claims to the key-manufacturing machine rank in the following order: Thirdbank, followed by Supplier (the judgment-lien creditor), followed by Secondbank.

[NOTE: The precise language of UCC § 9-317(a)(2) also gives a secured party priority over a judgment-lien creditor if, before the lien was created, the secured party filed a financing statement and the debtor authenticated a security agreement (or the requirements of UCC § 9-203(b)(3) were otherwise satisfied), even if the security interest was not yet perfected because value had not yet been given or the debtor did not yet have rights in the collateral. An examinee who notes this nuance is correct, although the point is not relevant to this question.]

FEBRUARY 2021 MEE ANALYSIS 5 – REAL PROPERTY

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This question tests the basic elements of an implied easement from prior use and the concept of inquiry notice under the recording acts.

Legal Problems:

- (1) Before the man's conveyance to the builder, did the friend have an implied easement from prior use over the man's 80 acres because
 - (a) at one time the 90 acres and the 80 acres were in common ownership;
 - (b) prior to its sale to the woman, the 90-acre parcel derived a benefit from the 80 acres retained by the man;
 - (c) the use of the gravel road over the 80 acres was apparent;
 - (d) the use of the gravel road over the 80 acres was continuous; and
 - (e) the continuation of the use of the gravel road over the 80 acres was reasonably necessary to the enjoyment of the 90 acres?
- (2) Assuming that the friend had an implied easement from prior use over the man's 80 acres, did the builder take ownership of the 80 acres free and clear of that easement?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The friend had and continues to have an implied easement from prior use over the 80-acre parcel now owned by the builder and previously owned by the man. To acquire an implied easement from prior use, the friend was required to establish that there had been a conveyance from the man to the woman of land once held in common ownership, that the gravel road over the 80 acres benefited the 90 acres, that the man's use of the road had been continuous and apparent, and that continuous use of the road was reasonably necessary for the enjoyment of the 90 acres. The test is easily met here. At one time the man owned both the 90 acres and the 80 acres, his use of the gravel road benefited both the 90 and 80 acres, the use over the 80 acres was apparent and continuous, and the continuation of the use of the gravel road over the 80 acres was reasonably necessary to the enjoyment of the 90 acres.

While the authorities are split on the question of whether easements arising by implication are subject to recording acts, the better view is that they are not. Here, however, it makes no difference to the outcome because, even if the implied easement from prior use over the gravel road on the 80 acres were subject to the recording act, the builder who purchased the 80 acres would not have been a bona fide purchaser, as the builder would have been on inquiry notice of the easement because the gravel road over both the 80 and 90 acres was clearly visible to the builder. Thus, the builder did not take ownership of the 80 acres free and clear of that easement.

[NOTE: Neither the woman nor the friend has acquired a prescriptive easement over the builder's 80 acres, as the 20-year statute of limitations has not run.]

Point One (introduction) (5%)

The woman acquired an implied easement from prior use over the man's land. This easement passed to the friend.

For the friend to have acquired an implied easement from prior use, it would have to be the case that the woman acquired the implied easement from the man. The woman would have to show that the following requirements had been met:

- a. Both parcels (the dominant tenement and the servient tenement) must have been owned by the same person at the time the prior use arose.
- b. The prior use that was said to create an implied easement over the gravel road across the eastern 80 acres of the property must have benefited the other portion of the land (the western 90 acres).
- c. The prior use must have been apparent.
- d. The prior use must have been continuous.
- e. The prior use must have been reasonably necessary for the use and enjoyment of the benefited property.

See generally Restatement (Third) of Property: Servitudes § 2.12.

Point One(a) (10%)

The 80 and 90 acres were held in common ownership by the man when he constructed the gravel road across his farmland of 170 acres. Thus, the common ownership test for the two separate parcels is met.

For an implied easement from prior use to arise, the two parcels must at one time have been in common ownership. Joseph W. Singer, Property 190 (3d ed. 2010). Thirty years ago, the man acquired the farmland as a 170-acre tract. Two years ago, he carved off the 90 acres in his conveyance to the woman, retaining 80 acres for himself. Thus, the common ownership test is met.

[NOTE: Of course, when the gravel road was built on the farmland it could not then be said that the man had an easement with respect to any portion of that road. This is because a property owner cannot have an easement over his own land. The possibility for anyone to have an implied easement over the gravel road therefore arises here only because a portion of the farmland was conveyed away, in which case the man's use of the land can be called a "quasi easement" in retrospect.]

Point One(b) (10%)

Prior to the sale to the woman, the 90 acres derived a benefit from the portion of the gravel road running on the 80 acres.

For there to be an implied easement from prior use, the prior use of the man's 80 acres must be of a nature that it benefited the 90 acres conveyed to the woman. This requirement is easily met here. The focus is on the period of the prior use, not on the post-conveyance period, so the fact that the woman could later use the road to cross the man's land and reach the county road is not relevant. The question is whether, at the time the man owned the entire tract, he used the gravel road to benefit the westernmost 90 acres that he later sold to the woman. The answer is yes, because the man used the road to move tractors and cars out of the vehicle shed onto the gravel road and across the easternmost 80 acres that the man retained.

The use of the gravel road across the entire 170 acres was apparent because the gravel road was clearly visible.

Given that the finding of an implied easement by prior use is intended to give effect to the parties' likely intent, "an important factor in determining . . . [that intent] is their knowledge of the existence of the prior use If the use was apparent, it may reasonably be inferred that the parties knew of it." Restatement (Third) of Property: Servitudes § 2.12, cmt. f. The apparent requirement is clearly met where the gravel road and its use were visible at the time of the conveyance. Courts routinely find that this requirement is easily satisfied, as here, with an established roadway. Stoebuck & Whitman, Property 446 (3d ed. 2001).

Point One(d) (15%)

The man's use of the gravel road over the 170 acres was continuous.

Historically, an implied easement from prior use had to be continuous. With respect to roads, this requirement could be a bar to a finding of an implied easement in cases where the use was merely intermittent. Today, however, courts tend to reject a stringent requirement of continuousness either by not requiring continuity at all or by finding that intermittent use is sufficient. Stoebuck & Whitman, supra, at 446–447. Some courts merely treat the continuity requirement as an element of visibility. Id. It has also been opined that if the quasi easement is "permanently adapted to serve the quasi-dominant estate, then it is continuous as required for an implied easement." See Herbert Hovenkamp, Sheldon F. Kurtz & Thomas P. Gallanis, The Law of Property: An Introductory Survey at 319 (2016). Here, the facts support the conclusion that the continuity requirement is met, whichever test is used. The man used the road to get to work and visit other communities distant from his land. While the Third Restatement does not expressly state that the use must be continuous, it adopts a similar requirement by stating that "the prior use was not merely temporary or casual." Restatement (Third) of Property § 2.12(1); see also Hovenkamp et al., supra, at 319, cmt. [2].

Point One(e) (20%)

The continuation of the use of the gravel road over the 80 acres was reasonably necessary to the enjoyment of the 90 acres.

Although some courts adhere to the notion that an implied easement from prior use can arise only if strictly necessary, today most courts require no more than reasonable necessity. Dale A. Whitman, Ann M. Burkhart, R. Wilson Freyermuth, and Troy A. Rule, The Law of Property 359 (4th ed. 2019); accord, Restatement (Third) of Property: Servitudes § 2.12, cmt. e. Today, “most courts [applying a reasonable necessity standard] will find the requirement satisfied if the owner of the dominant estate [the owner of the 90 acres] would be put to appreciable expense to provide a substitute for the claimed easement.” Whitman et al., supra, at 363. See also Restatement (Third) of Property: Servitudes § 2.12, cmt. g.

Here the “reasonably necessary” requirement is easily satisfied. The gravel road provides easy access to the county road abutting the 80 acres the man retained after conveying the 90 acres to the woman. There appears to be no other direct means to access that road. By reaching the county road, persons who travel to town from the property substantially shorten their travel time. To get there in this shorter time without the implied easement, they would have to acquire an easement by grant from the man or by prescription, both of which would require a significant expenditure of time or money.

Regardless of whether the implied easement is subject to the recording act, the builder took the 80 acres subject to the implied easement because the builder was on inquiry notice of the prior use.

The builder took ownership of the 80 acres subject to the implied easement from prior use. The builder will argue that with respect to the 80 acres acquired from the man, the land records reflect no interest in either the woman or her friend, as neither of their deeds (regardless of when they were filed) were in the builder’s chain of title. Thus, the builder should take free and clear of the easement. There are two reasons, however, why this argument fails.

First, there is a strong argument that the recording act does not apply to implied easements. That argument is that the holder of an implied easement (like the holder of a prescriptive easement) has no document that can be recorded, and that to subject him to the recording act would effectively require that he bring a quiet title action (or the equivalent) to establish his interest in the land. The courts are divided on this question, however. See Bruce & Ely, The Law of Easements and Licenses ¶¶ 9-61–9-65 (1988).

In a jurisdiction that does not subject implied easements to the recording act, the builder took subject to the existing implied easement because the implied easement is an encumbrance on the property conveyed to the builder at the time of the conveyance notwithstanding the fact that it is unrecorded.

Alternatively, if implied easements are subject to the recording act, then while the analysis differs, the result is the same. The builder still took subject to the implied easement, even though no deed reflecting the easement in the woman or the friend was properly recorded in the builder's chain of title, because the builder was on "inquiry" notice of the easement and thus is not a bona fide purchaser. Where, as here, the easement is clearly visible to any observer, a subsequent purchaser for value (here, the builder) is on inquiry notice of the easement and thus is not a bona fide purchaser protected by the recording acts. See Restatement (Third) of Property: Servitudes § 7.14(3), cmt. e, illustration 7 (stating that "[a] subsequent purchaser takes subject to unrecorded interests of which the purchaser has actual or inquiry notice. Inquiry notice is notice of interests in the property that would be revealed by a reasonable inspection of the premises or by making an inquiry suggested by facts known to the purchaser.")

FEBRUARY 2021 MEE ANALYSIS 6 – CONTRACTS

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This question tests an examinee's knowledge of basic concepts of contract law regarding the formation of contracts, application of the statute of frauds, and enforceability.

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is there a contract between the supplier and the grocer for the sale of 100 shopping carts?
- (2)(a) Does the ability of the grocer to enforce the contract against the supplier depend on satisfying a statute of frauds?
- (2)(b) Does the document sent by the supplier to the grocer satisfy the applicable statute of frauds, enabling the grocer to enforce the contract for the sale of 100 shopping carts against the supplier?
- (2)(c) Does the grocer's handwritten note to the supplier, and the supplier's failure to object to it, satisfy the applicable statute of frauds, enabling the grocer to enforce the contract for the sale of 100 shopping carts against the supplier?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The grocer and the supplier entered into a contract pursuant to which the supplier agreed to sell 100 shopping carts to the grocer for a total price of $12,500. Whether the contract is enforceable by the grocer requires further analysis.

Because it is a contract for the sale of goods, the contract is governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. Even though a contract exists, under Article 2's statute of frauds a contract for the sale of goods for a price of $500 or more is not enforceable against a party unless there is a writing sufficient to indicate that a contract has been made that is signed by that party or an exception applies. Here, the contract price is more than $500, so a writing signed by the supplier is required in order to enable the grocer to enforce the contract against him unless an exception applies.

The document sent by the supplier to the grocer is a writing sufficient to indicate that a contract has been made, but it is not clear whether that writing has been "signed" by the supplier. If the document constitutes a writing signed by the supplier, it is sufficient to enable the contract to be enforced by the grocer against the supplier only for 60 shopping carts—the quantity mentioned in that writing—and not for the orally agreed 100 shopping carts.

The note sent by the grocer to the supplier is not sufficient to enable the grocer to enforce the contract for 100 shopping carts against the supplier because the note was not signed by the grocer.

Point One (20%)

The grocer and the supplier entered into an oral contract at the supplier’s showroom when they agreed that the supplier would sell, and the grocer would buy, 100 shopping carts for $125 each.

Because the shopping carts are goods (see UCC § 2-105(1)), the situation presented by these facts is governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. UCC § 2-204(1) provides that “[a] contract for sale of goods may be made in any manner sufficient to show agreement, including conduct by both parties which recognizes the existence of such a contract.” The conversation between the grocer and the supplier clearly shows an agreement pursuant to which the supplier would sell, and the grocer would buy, 100 shopping carts at $125 each. Thus, UCC § 2-204(1) is satisfied and there is a contract for the supplier to sell, and the grocer to buy, 100 shopping carts.

Point Two(a) (20%)

The oral contract between the supplier and the grocer is a contract for the sale of goods for a price of $500 or more and therefore is subject to the statute of frauds in Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code.

UCC § 2-201(1) provides that “[e]xcept as otherwise provided in this section a contract for the sale of goods for the price of $500 or more is not enforceable by way of action or defense unless there is some writing sufficient to indicate that a contract for sale has been made between the parties and signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought . . .” (emphasis added). Here, the contract between the supplier and the grocer is for the sale of goods (the shopping carts) for a total price of $12,500. Therefore, it is subject to the writing requirement of UCC § 2-201(1) unless an exception applies.

Here, the grocer is seeking to enforce the contract against the supplier. As a result, unless an exception applies, the grocer will not be able to enforce the contract unless there is a writing sufficient to indicate that a contract has been made that is signed by the supplier.

Point Two(b) (40%)

The document sent by the supplier to the grocer is sufficient to indicate that a contract has been made, but it is not clear that it has been “signed” by the supplier—the party against whom enforcement is sought. If it has been signed, the writing will be sufficient to enable the grocer to enforce the contract against the supplier, but only up to the quantity of goods stated in the document—60 shopping carts.

As discussed in Point Two(a), UCC § 2-201(1) states that, for a contract within its scope to be enforceable, there must be a writing sufficient to indicate that a contract for sale has been made that is signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought. The facts indicate that the document sent by the supplier to the grocer stated: “Thanks so much for your business. The 60 shopping carts you ordered from us are on the way. Be on the lookout for our delivery truck—it may even arrive today! Please send us payment of $7,500 (60 carts x $125/cart) as soon as you receive the carts.” This document is a writing. See UCC § 1-201(b)(43). Further, its contents clearly indicate that a contract for sale has been made; it refers to the “shopping carts you ordered from us,” indicates that they “are on the way,” and thanks the grocer “for [her] business.”

In order for the document to be sufficient to make the contract enforceable against the supplier under UCC § 2-201(1), however, the document must be “signed” by the supplier. The facts do not state that the document bore a signature (in the conventional sense of that term) of the supplier, but they do state that the document was printed on the supplier’s letterhead. As the term “signed” is used in § 2-201(1), its meaning is broader than simply bearing a conventional signature. “‘Signed’ includes using any symbol executed or adopted with present intention to adopt or accept a writing.” UCC § 1-201(b)(37). Comment 37 to UCC § 1-201 states that “in appropriate cases [the symbol] may be found in a billhead or letterhead.” Accordingly, some cases have held that a document on company letterhead can constitute a signed writing as long as the requisite intent is present. See, e.g., Automotive Spares Corp. v. Archer Bearings Co., 382 F. Supp. 513 (N.D. Ill. 1974). Thus it is possible, but not certain, that the requirement of a signed writing is satisfied by the document, depending on whether the supplier used the letterhead “with a present intention to adopt or accept” the document.

Although the writing referred to in UCC § 2-201(1) need not contain detailed information about the contract, “the contract is not enforceable . . . beyond the quantity of goods shown in such writing.” Here, the document showed a quantity of only 60 shopping carts. Accordingly, even if the document qualifies as a writing signed by the supplier, the document is not sufficient to make the contract enforceable against the supplier beyond 60 shopping carts. Thus, this writing alone does not provide a basis for the grocer to enforce a contract requiring the supplier to sell 100 shopping carts to the grocer.

Point Two(c) (20%)

The note sent by the grocer on March 2 is a writing in confirmation of the contract for the sale of 100 shopping carts. If the writing were sufficient to enable the supplier to enforce the contract for 100 shopping carts against the grocer, it would also have the result of enabling the grocer to enforce the contract for 100 shopping carts against the supplier because the supplier failed to object to the note within 10 days after receiving it. However, because the note was unsigned, it would not enable the supplier to enforce the contract against the grocer, and therefore it would not have the result of enabling the grocer to enforce the contract against the supplier.

One of the exceptions to the rule in UCC § 2-201(1) discussed above is found in UCC § 2-201(2). Under that provision, which applies only “between merchants,” “if within a reasonable time a writing in confirmation of the contract and sufficient against the sender is received and the party receiving it has reason to know its contents, it satisfies the requirements of subsection (1) against such party unless written notice of objection to its contents is given within 10 days after it is received.”

Here, both the supplier and the grocer are “merchants” as that term is defined in UCC § 2-104(1). The supplier deals in goods of the kind at issue, and the grocer’s occupation is such that she would have “knowledge or skills peculiar to the . . . goods involved in the transaction” (shopping carts used in supermarkets). Because both the supplier and the grocer are merchants, the transaction is “between merchants.” UCC § 2-104(3).

Accordingly, if the note sent by the grocer to the supplier would be sufficient to enable the supplier to enforce the contract for 100 shopping carts against the grocer, then it would also make the contract enforceable against the supplier because the supplier did not give written objection to the note within 10 days of receiving it. However, here the note would not be sufficient to enable the supplier to enforce the contract against the grocer because the note was not signed by the grocer. While the note was handwritten, it was not “signed” by the grocer as that term is defined in UCC § 1-201(b)(37). It did not contain any “symbol executed or adopted with present intention to authenticate” the writing. It might be argued that the grocer’s decision to handwrite the note indicates an intent to authenticate by using handwriting alone, but the UCC definition of “signed” seems clearly to contemplate some authenticating symbol in addition to the content of the writing itself. Therefore, the unsigned note sent by the grocer does not enable the grocer to enforce the contract for 100 shopping carts against the supplier even though the supplier did not object to the contents of the note.

[NOTE: There are other exceptions to the UCC § 2-201 statute of frauds that are not at issue on these facts, but that might be discussed by some examinees. One of those exceptions applies if the goods are specially manufactured for the buyer and are not suitable for sale to others. See UCC § 2-201(3)(a). Here, there is no indication that the shopping carts were specially manufactured. Another exception applies if the party against whom enforcement is sought admits in pleading, testimony, or otherwise in court that a contract was made. See UCC § 2-201(3)(b). Here, there is no indication of such admission by the supplier. Finally, there is an exception that applies with respect to goods for which payment has been made or accepted or that have been received and accepted, but here no payment has been made and no shopping carts were accepted.

Some examinees may also note that the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA) and/or the federal Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act (E-SIGN) allow the writing requirement of UCC § 2-201 to be satisfied by an electronic communication. This is true, but it does not change the answer or the analysis, as there is no electronic communication that would satisfy the requirements of UCC § 2-201.]

QUESTION 1 – TORTS

A mother was shopping with her six-year-old son at Big Box store. The son was visually impaired, so his mother, concerned about crowding and jostling by other patrons, restrained him by placing her hand on his shoulder and instructed him to remain in her grasp. Despite his mother's efforts, the son broke free of her grasp and ran toward a nearby candy display. Because he was running and visually impaired, the son did not notice some cheesecake on the floor in the store's self-serve dining area; the cheesecake was flattened and dirty. The son slipped on the cheesecake and fell to the floor, suffering physical injury. Another customer unsuccessfully attempted to help the son to stand, worsening the son's injury by negligently twisting his arm.

Big Box had in place a policy instructing employees to take steps to promptly clean known hazards on the floor, but it did not assign an employee to monitor floor conditions. Big Box employees do not know when any employee had most recently inspected the floor or when the floor had last been cleaned. The self-serve dining area includes displays that contain takeout food, including cheesecake. These displays had last been stocked several days before the son slipped on the cheesecake. On the day the son slipped and fell, a store employee had walked by the self-serve dining area before the son slipped but had not noticed the cheesecake on the floor.

The mother has filed a negligence claim on her son's behalf against Big Box and the customer who attempted to help the son. Both Big Box and the customer claim that the son was negligent.

1. Under the applicable standard of care, are the facts sufficient for a jury to find that the son acted negligently? Explain.
2. Under the applicable standard of care, are the facts sufficient for a jury to find that Big Box acted negligently? Explain.
3. Can the customer be held liable for enhancing the son's injury? Explain.
4. Assuming that only Big Box and the customer were negligent and can be held liable, can the son recover the full amount of damages from Big Box only? Explain.

Do not address the effect of any "Good Samaritan" statute.

QUESTION 2 – CORPORATIONS & LLCs / CONFLICT OF LAWS

Carlos, Diana, and Ethan own all the shares of Winery Inc., which is incorporated in State A. They are equal shareholders of the corporation and the only members of its board of directors. They share responsibilities in the corporation's vineyard and winery. They have no shareholders' agreement.

Recently, Carlos and Diana decided that it would be a good idea to change the corporation's business model. In addition to producing wines from the corporation's own small vineyard using sustainable, organic farming methods, they believe that the business should expand to buy grapes from local vineyards that produce grapes using such methods. They believe this new focus will allow them to attract new customers interested in organic wines. They also see this change and expansion to their business as a way to promote environmentally sustainable organic grape cultivation in their region.

To make this shift in the corporation's business, Carlos and Diana have decided that the corporation should become a "benefit corporation." A benefit corporation, authorized by many states, is a type of for-profit corporation that defines in its articles of incorporation a social or environmental purpose. Benefit-corporation law insulates directors from liability for making business decisions that serve this defined social or environmental purpose, even when their decisions may negatively impact shareholder profits.

State A has adopted the Model Business Corporation Act, which does not explicitly provide for benefit corporations. State A courts have held that domestic corporations must seek to maximize shareholder profits.

State B, which is adjacent to State A, also has adopted the Model Business Corporation Act but has modified its corporate statute to provide for the formation of benefit corporations. To form a benefit corporation, the articles of incorporation must indicate that the corporation has opted to be a benefit corporation and must state a social or environmental purpose for the corporation. The State B statute insulates directors from liability for claims that they did not seek to maximize shareholder profits if their decisions are consistent with the corporation's stated social or environmental purpose.

Carlos and Diana have decided that they can best carry out the new business plan by creating a benefit corporation in State B to operate in State A with the stated social and environmental purpose of "promoting sustainable and organic vineyard, winery, and production practices." They will incorporate the new benefit corporation as Organic Wines Corp. and be its only initial shareholders. Once this corporation is created, they will cause Winery Inc. to merge into it with all the Winery Inc. shares converted into shares of Organic Wines Corp.

Ethan is opposed to the plan, but Carlos and Diana support it.

1. Can Ethan block the merger of Winery Inc. into Organic Wines Corp. by voting against it? Explain.

2. If Winery Inc. merges into Organic Wines Corp., does Ethan have a right to demand that he receive payment in cash (instead of receiving shares in Organic Wines Corp.) equal to the fair value of his shares in Winery Inc.? Explain.
3. Assume that Ethan becomes a shareholder of Organic Wines Corp. Could Ethan successfully sue the Organic Wines Corp. directors in State A for promoting sustainable and organic practices at the expense of maximizing shareholder profits? Explain. Do not discuss whether that suit would have to be direct or derivative.

QUESTION 3 – FAMILY LAW

Fifteen years ago, a woman moved to State A for a temporary job. Shortly after moving to State A, the woman met and briefly dated a man who lived in State A.

Eight months after her relationship with the man ended, the woman, still living in State A, gave birth to a daughter. She then moved to State B with her daughter. The woman was certain that the man was the daughter's father because he was the only person she had had sexual intercourse with while she was living in State A, but she did not contact him to tell him of her pregnancy or the daughter's birth. The woman had no other children. She and the daughter lived together as a two-person household exclusively in State B. The woman told her family and her daughter that the daughter's father had been killed in a car accident.

Two months ago, the daughter, age 14, overheard a conversation between the woman and her oldest friend. The friend said, "Your daughter's father is now an important scientist. His most recent research is in today's newspaper. Don't you think your daughter should meet him?"

The daughter, shocked, found the newspaper and emailed the scientist whose research was described in the paper. In the email, she identified her mother, recounted the conversation she had overheard, and suggested DNA testing. The man agreed to cooperate, and the test confirmed that he was the daughter's biological father. The daughter told the man that she wanted to live with him at his home in State A. The man, wanting to get to know his daughter better, agreed and sent her a bus ticket, which she used without her mother's permission.

Three weeks after the daughter's arrival in State A, the man sued in a State A court to establish his paternity, to gain sole custody of the daughter, and to obtain child support from the woman. The man had the woman served personally in State B.

Under State A's long-arm statute, the State may exercise personal jurisdiction over a nonresident for purposes of determining paternity, child custody, and child support if "the individual engaged in sexual intercourse in this State and the child may have been conceived by that act of intercourse." State A's paternity statute permits the "mother or alleged father to establish paternity at any time during the mother's pregnancy or within 21 years after the child's birth."

The woman moved to dismiss the man's suit, arguing that State A's exercise of personal jurisdiction over her would violate her rights under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The trial court denied her motion, and the woman made a special appearance, preserving her right to appeal on the jurisdictional issue. At a hearing on the merits, the woman argued, based on a series of United States Supreme Court opinions, that a putative father may not establish his paternity years after his child's birth unless he registered with a putative father registry or actively participated in his child's care. She also argued that the court lacked authority to issue either a child custody or a child support order.

1. Did the State A court's exercise of personal jurisdiction over the woman violate her rights under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment? Explain.

2. Assuming that the State A court properly exercised personal jurisdiction over the woman, and that the man's paternity is undisputed, does the court have subject-matter jurisdiction to
 - (a) award the man sole custody of the daughter? Explain.
 - (b) require the woman to pay the man child support? Explain.

QUESTION 4 – CRIMINAL LAW & PROCEDURE

A police officer patrolling in his squad car after dark saw a woman lying on the sidewalk near an intersection. A teenage girl standing near her yelled, “Help! That guy just knocked this woman down and took her purse!” The girl pointed toward a man carrying a white purse and sprinting away from the scene.

The officer jumped out of his squad car and shouted, “Stop! Police!” He ran after the man down an alley and between houses. The man leapt a series of backyard fences and ran onto a back porch. The officer, following behind, jumped over a low fence, heard the man fumbling with keys, and saw him unlock the back door of a house. The man rushed inside and slammed the door. The officer tried to open the door, but it was locked. From inside the house, the man yelled, “Get off my porch!” The officer kicked the door open. The man was standing just inside the door, out of breath, and a white purse was on the floor near his feet.

The officer handcuffed the man, grabbed the purse, and walked the man back to the intersection where the woman was sitting on a nearby bench. The teenage girl was gone.

The woman immediately said, “That’s my purse.” Then she asked the officer, “Is that the guy who took it? I never saw anything. Someone pushed me hard from behind, knocked me down, grabbed my purse, and took off. I was dazed and just lay there until some girl helped me up.”

The officer told the man that he was under arrest and placed him in the backseat of the squad car.

Another officer arrived, and a few minutes later the teenage girl returned. The girl began speaking with the second officer, saying, “I was right there. It happened really fast. One second I was waiting for my bus and reading text messages. The next second I heard a woman scream and saw some big guy running past me with a purse.”

The girl then noticed the man handcuffed in the backseat of the squad car. She shouted, “Oh my gosh! Hey, I think that’s the guy! It was dark, and it happened fast, but, wow. He’s right there in the car. I’m pretty sure that’s the guy.”

The state charged the man with one count of robbery under a state statute that defines the crime as it was defined under the common law.

Relying only on his rights under the United States Constitution, the man has moved the trial court to suppress evidence of the purse and the officer’s testimony about where the officer recovered it. The man argues specifically that the officer’s entry into his home without a warrant violated his constitutional rights. The man has also moved the court to prohibit any witness from discussing the girl’s on-the-scene identification of him and to prohibit her from identifying him in court during trial. He argues specifically that allowing evidence of the teenage girl’s identification would violate his constitutional rights.

1. Did the officer’s warrantless seizure of the man and warrantless seizure of the purse in the man’s home violate the man’s Fourth Amendment rights? Explain.

2. Would the trial court violate the man's constitutional due process rights by admitting testimony that reveals the girl's on-the-scene identification of the man or by allowing her to identify him in court? Explain.

Do not discuss any confrontation clause issues.

QUESTION 5 – DECEDENTS’ ESTATES

Eight years ago, a testator validly executed a will. The will, in pertinent part, provided:

1. I give my house to my friend Doris.
2. I give my residuary estate, in equal shares, to my friend Alice, if she survives me, and to my friend Bill, if he survives me.
3. If any beneficiary under either of the foregoing two provisions of this will predeceases me and my will does not expressly provide otherwise, the heirs of the deceased beneficiary shall take the beneficiary’s bequest.

Three years ago, Bill and Doris died.

Doris died testate, bequeathing her entire estate to a charity. If Doris had died intestate, all of her probate assets would have passed to her nephew, her sole heir.

Bill died intestate, and his entire probate estate passed to his daughter, his sole heir.

Last week, the testator died a domiciliary of State A, leaving a probate estate consisting of her house and a bank account with a balance of $250,000. The testator died with no debts.

State A’s anti-lapse statute provides in its entirety:

Unless the decedent’s will provides otherwise, if a bequest is made to a beneficiary who predeceases the decedent leaving issue surviving the decedent, the deceased beneficiary’s share passes to the issue of the deceased beneficiary.

The testator is survived by Doris’s nephew, Bill’s daughter, and Alice. The only relative of the testator who survived the testator is her sister. The charity to which Doris bequeathed her estate still exists.

1. Does the state anti-lapse statute or Clause 3 of the testator’s will determine who takes the share of a beneficiary who predeceased the testator? Explain.
2. Assuming that Clause 3 of the testator’s will applies, who is entitled to the testator’s house? Explain.
3. Does the residuary bequest to Bill lapse because of the express survivorship requirement in Clause 2 of the testator’s will? Explain.
4. Who is entitled to Bill’s one-half share if the bequest to Bill lapses? Explain.
5. Who is entitled to Bill’s one-half share if the bequest to Bill does not lapse? Explain.

QUESTION 6 – CIVIL PROCEDURE

A 55-year-old woman had been employed for 30 years as a paralegal at a law firm in State A. One year ago, a 28-year-old male attorney became the firm’s paralegal manager.

The attorney began criticizing the woman’s work and berating her on nearly a daily basis. He made derogatory comments about her and her work to the other paralegals and attorneys in the firm. He nicknamed her “grandma” and told people that “it’s time for a new generation to take its place here.”

Three months after he took over as paralegal manager, the attorney fired the woman. To replace her, he hired a 22-year-old paralegal. He explained the firing to his coworkers by stating that the woman had stolen valuable supplies from the firm and was neither honest nor trustworthy.

After exhausting all prerequisite administrative remedies, the woman filed an action in the US District Court for the District of State A. Her lawsuit was against the attorney who had fired her. The woman’s complaint states two causes of action. First, the complaint asserts that the attorney fired her because of her age, in violation of the federal Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 (ADEA) (under which the attorney is considered an “employer”). Second, the complaint alleges that the attorney made defamatory comments about the woman to other employees of the law firm, thereby committing a tort under State A law. In particular, the woman’s complaint alleges that the attorney made comments to others “to the effect that [the woman] was dishonest and a thief,” and that “such comments were false and defamatory.” The woman’s allegations include the approximate dates of the comments and the identity of persons to whom they were made, but the complaint does not recite the exact allegedly defamatory language used by the attorney.

The attorney and the woman are both citizens and domiciliaries of State A, where the law firm’s offices are located and where all the events in this matter took place. State A pleading rules require a plaintiff’s defamation claim to “allege the time and place where the allegedly false statement was made, the persons to whom it was made, and the particular words constituting defamation.” State A courts apply these rules strictly and dismiss complaints seeking damages for defamation if the specific words that are alleged to be defamatory are not stated in the complaint.

The attorney concedes that the court has federal-question jurisdiction over the woman’s ADEA claim but has moved to dismiss her defamation claim. The motion to dismiss argues (i) that the federal court lacks jurisdiction over the defamation claim because it is based entirely on state law, and (ii) that the woman did not allege the “particular words constituting defamation” as required by State A.

1. Should the federal court grant the attorney’s motion to dismiss the woman’s defamation claim on the ground that the federal court lacks jurisdiction over that claim because it is based entirely on state law? Explain.
2. Should the federal court grant the attorney’s motion to dismiss the woman’s defamation claim on the ground that the woman did not allege the “particular words constituting defamation” as required by State A? Explain.

ANALYSIS 1 – TORTS

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This question requires the examinee to demonstrate knowledge of basic negligence concepts, including the applicable standard of care for assessing a child's actions, the duties owed by businesses to invitees with regard to hazards on the premises, and the liability of a party who undertakes to assist an injured party. Finally, the question tests an examinee's knowledge of the recovery of damages when an initial injury is enhanced by another actor's attempt to offer assistance.

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) What is the standard of care for the son?
- (1)(b) Under that standard, are the facts sufficient for a jury to find that the son acted negligently?
- (2) Under the applicable standard of care, are the facts sufficient for a jury to find that Big Box acted negligently?
- (3) Can the customer be held liable for enhancing the son's injury?
- (4) Assuming that only Big Box and the customer were negligent and can be held liable, can the son recover the full amount of damages from Big Box only?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Most jurisdictions assess a child's conduct in comparison to that of a reasonably careful child of the same age, intelligence, and experience. If the child has a disability, that disability is taken into account in determining the standard of care. Thus, the son's conduct will be measured against that of a six-year-old with comparable attributes, including his visual impairment. Under that standard, a jury could find that the son acted negligently. In some jurisdictions, however, because the son is under seven, he may be presumed incapable of being negligent; thus the son could not be found to have acted negligently in those jurisdictions.

While Big Box was not actually aware of the cheesecake on the floor when the son slipped and fell, a store has a duty to discover and remove hazards from its floor within a reasonable time. The condition of the cheesecake on the floor (i.e., flattened and dirty), the deficient floor-inspection practices, and the fact that an employee walked by the self-serve area before the son fell support an inference that the store had adequate time to find the cheesecake and remove it from the floor. Thus, a jury could properly find that Big Box acted negligently.

Ordinarily, in the absence of a special relationship, an individual has no duty to aid another person in need. However, when an individual undertakes to provide assistance to another, that individual is subject to a duty of reasonable care. Thus, a jury could properly find the customer liable for negligent enhancement of the son's injury when he attempted to help the son up from the floor.

If the customer and Big Box are found negligent and liable to the son, both of them are liable for any enhancement of the son's injury caused by the customer's negligently twisting the son's arm. Both Big Box and the customer are proximate causes of the son's enhancement injury. In a joint liability jurisdiction, Big Box and the customer would be jointly and severally liable for enhancement damages; each would be liable for the full value of the enhancement damages award. Thus the son can recover from Big Box all initial injury damages and enhancement damages.

Point One(a) (10%)

The son, age six, will be held to a six-year-old child's standard of care, taking into account the son's visual impairment. However, in some jurisdictions, because the son is under the age of seven, he is deemed legally incapable of being negligent.

Unless a child is engaged in an adult activity, a child's conduct is not measured against that of the reasonably prudent person. Instead, most jurisdictions measure a child's conduct against that of a child of like age, intelligence, and experience. Restatement (Third) of Torts: Liability for Physical and Emotional Harm § 10(a); Restatement (Second) of Torts § 283A. For physically disabled children, conduct must conform to that of a reasonably careful child with the same physical disability. Restatement (Third) of Torts § 11(a).

However, a substantial minority of jurisdictions use a different standard of care for young children, often known as the "rule of seven." See Restatement (Third) of Torts § 10 comment b. In the Restatement, a child's conduct is assessed based on the child's age, intelligence, and experience. Under the rule of seven, a child's conduct is assessed based on the child's age, and children of certain young ages are deemed incapable of negligence, the exact age varying among the jurisdictions. The Third Restatement provides that only a child younger than five years of age is incapable of negligence. Id. § 10(b).

Point One(b) (15%)

Under the Restatement's standard of care for children, a jury could find that the son acted negligently. Under the rule of seven, adopted in some states, however, the son would be deemed legally incapable of negligence.

Based on these facts, a jury could find that the son acted negligently. The Third Restatement, in § 10 comment c, indicates that when a child has received instructions from a parent about necessary precautions (such as not running into the street), the child can "easily" be found negligent for failing to follow instructions. Although six-year-old children can be quite physically active, in this case the mother physically restrained the son and told him to remain under her control. Further, because his visual impairment will be considered in determining whether the son behaved unreasonably, it could be inferred that in a crowded environment, a reasonably careful child with the son's visual impairment would obey a parent and exercise substantial caution.

If the rule-of-seven standard used in a minority of jurisdictions (see Point One(a)) is applied in the jurisdiction, the court would rule as a matter of law that the son, age six, was not negligent.

[NOTE: Based on these facts, a jury could also find that the son did not act negligently. The son is only six and is still developing self-control and judgment. Despite the mother's admonition and the son's visual impairment, the nearby candy display may have been very enticing, causing him to run toward it without considering the risks. A jury may find that the son's lack of control and bad judgment are reasonable for a six-year-old and conclude that the son was not negligent. However, the call asks only whether there is sufficient evidence for a jury to find the son negligent, and under the Third Restatement standard of care, there is.

An examinee might also address causation. Cause in fact exists because but for the son's negligence, the accident would not have occurred. He also was a substantial factor in causing his injury. See Restatement (Third) of Torts § 26 comment j (discussion of substantial factor as an alternative to the traditional "but for" principle). Proximate cause may require proof that the son appreciated the risk or that the slip and fall was a natural and continuous sequence. Palsgraf v. Long Island R.R. Co., 248 N.Y. 339, 351–55 (1928) (Andrews, J., dissenting). The facts do not allow for a detailed analysis of proximate cause, but it appears that the slip and fall was a natural and continuous outcome of the son's behavior.]

Point Two (30%)

As a proprietor of a commercial facility, Big Box owes a duty of care to its customers, who are considered invitees. Therefore, a jury could find that Big Box acted negligently in failing to discover the cheesecake and remove it from the floor.

The proprietor of a commercial facility owes a duty of due care to customers, who are considered business invitees. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 332. The proprietor is required to exercise reasonable care to protect customers from hazards, including being aware of dangerous conditions on the premises and reducing or eliminating any dangers. Id. § 343. Thus Big Box was required to take reasonable steps to ensure that its floor was free from hazards, such as the cheesecake, that could cause an accident.

This case is similar to the classic "banana peel" cases involving a business's liability for debris on the floor that injures patrons. See Goddard v. Boston & Maine R.R. Co., 60 N.E. 486 (Mass. 1901); Anjou v. Boston Elevated Ry. Co., 94 N.E. 386 (Mass. 1911). These cases are often referred to as examples of constructive notice; the law presumes notice of dangerous conditions even though actual notice is absent. However, a defendant is allowed a reasonable time period to discover a dangerous condition and correct it. Constructive notice cases thus turn on a determination of how long the dangerous condition existed before the plaintiff encountered it.

When food is the cause of the fall, the condition of the food sometimes allows an inference of how long it was on the floor. See Goddard and Anjou. Because the burden of proof is on the plaintiff, if the evidence does not allow for a determination of how long the dangerous condition existed, the proprietor cannot be found negligent. Joye v. Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Co., 405 F.2d 464 (4th Cir. 1968).

Here there is no indication that Big Box had actual notice of the cheesecake on the floor. The facts do not state how the cheesecake came to be on the floor. The most likely possibility, given the crowding in the store and the option to self-serve food, is that a customer was responsible for dropping the cheesecake on the floor. It is unlikely that a Big Box employee dropped the cheesecake, did not notice it on the floor, and did not clean it up, as the display was last stocked several days earlier. Nonetheless, Big Box was responsible for discovering the cheesecake and removing it from the floor within a reasonable period. Where food is sold through self-service, a store must take greater precautions and make more frequent inspections than otherwise might be necessary. Bridgman v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 348 P.2d 696, 698 (Cal. 1960). The flattened and dirty condition of the cheesecake suggests that it was on the floor more than a few minutes. Again, the self-serve display was last stocked several days before the son's fall, and it is unlikely that a Big Box employee dropped the cheesecake and did not clean it up. As well, it is likely that a Big Box employee did not notice the cheesecake because of the crowd in the store.

However, when an employee is in the area of a spill, some courts consider the employee's presence as some evidence that the spill could have been discovered, though such evidence may be given little weight. See, e.g., Domanque v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 665 So. 2d 779 (La. Ct. App. 1995). Other courts give this evidence no weight. See, e.g., Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Reece, 81 S.W.3d 812 (Tex. 2002). Here, a Big Box employee walked by the self-serve display before the son's fall, and a jury could reasonably find that the employee could have seen the cheesecake on the floor before the son slipped. However, because Big Box assigned no employees to conduct inspections, and there is no proof of a flooring inspection in any particular period of time, an inference that the condition did exist long enough to be discovered is reasonable. See Frazier v. Yor-Way Market, Inc., 185 Cal. App. 2d. 390 (1960).

In its defense, Big Box will likely assert that the cheesecake was an open and obvious condition of the premises and thus not subject to Big Box's duty of due care. RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TORTS § 51. However, when the defendant is a commercial enterprise, courts often find that it is foreseeable that a distracted shopper might fail to notice such a condition, though it is open and obvious, and suffer injury as a result. See Dobbs, Hayden and Bublik, Hornbook on Torts 472 (2d ed. 2016).

On balance, the self-service option for customers, the condition of the cheesecake on the floor, the lack of floor inspections, and perhaps the presence of the employee in the area where the son fell would support a reasonable inference that Big Box acted negligently.

[NOTE: Little credit should be given for discussion of causation, as it is readily established. Although the son likely was a cause of his injury, Big Box's negligence also was a substantial cause and/or "but for" cause. The son would not have slipped had the cheesecake been removed, clearly proving cause in fact. Further, if a hazardous condition in the store exists, it is readily foreseeable that customers may be injured; thus, Big Box is a proximate cause of the son's initial injury and its enhancement by the customer. See Point Four (discussion of Big Box’s liability for the customer’s rescue effort).]

Point Three (20%)

A person who offers assistance to help another assumes a duty of care when providing that assistance. Therefore, the customer could be held liable for damages for his negligent enhancement of the son’s injury.

Generally, an actor whose conduct has not created a risk of harm to another owes no duty of care to the other. Restatement (Third) of Torts § 37. Thus, the customer here had no duty to assist the son after the initial fall.

However, when the customer undertook to assist the son, the customer was required to exercise due care when providing assistance. In rescue conduct, the rescuer is liable if the rescuer negligently worsens the victim’s condition. See, e.g., D. Weisman, Negligence, Responsibility, and the Clumsy Samaritan: Is There a Fairness Rationale for the Good Samaritan Immunity?, 29 GA. ST. U. L. REV. 609 (2013); DOBBS ET AL., supra, 624 n.77. Because the facts state that the customer negligently twisted the son’s arm when trying to help him stand, it could be reasonably inferred that the customer acted without due care and foreseeably caused injury to the son. Thus, the customer could be held liable for damages for the enhancement of the son’s injury.

[NOTE: The question instructs examinees not to discuss the potential effect of any “Good Samaritan” statute. Accordingly, no credit should be given for such a discussion.]

Point Four (25%)

Assuming that only Big Box and the customer were negligent and can be held liable, the son can recover the full amount of damages from Big Box only.

Assuming that Big Box negligently caused the son’s initial injury, the court will consider whether Big Box is also liable for the enhanced injury caused by the customer’s attempt to aid the son. The generally accepted rule is that a tortfeasor who negligently causes the initial injury is liable for any enhanced harm from efforts of others to aid the injured person. Restatement (Third) of Torts: Phys. & Emot. Harm § 35. Comment c in § 35 explains that negligence of one rendering aid is not a superseding cause of any enhanced harm, thereby including such harm within the initial tortfeasor’s scope of liability. The risks and injury caused by the rescuer, however, must be a normal part of a rescue attempt; otherwise the initial tortfeasor is not a proximate cause of the enhanced harm. Id.; see also Restatement (Second) of Torts § 457. The initial tortfeasor may be responsible for both negligent and non-negligent rescue efforts. While the courts initially developed this principle of causation for medical malpractice claims, many jurisdictions have applied it beyond medical negligence to other conduct.

Assuming that Big Box negligently caused the son’s slip and fall resulting in injury, Big Box is fully responsible for the son’s initial injury damages (assuming that the son is not negligent). The customer’s attempt to help the son stand was a foreseeable effort to aid; thus, Big Box is also liable for enhanced injury caused by the customer whether the rescue effort was or was not negligent. Because both Big Box and the customer are liable for the enhanced injury, they are jointly and severally liable because they have jointly caused an indivisible harm. See Restatement (Third) of Torts § 27; Restatement (Second) of Torts § 433A. As joint tortfeasors, both parties are individually liable for the full amount of enhancement damages. Thus, the son can recover from Big Box the full amount of his damages for both the initial fall and the customer's enhancement.

[NOTE: Examinees are told in the MEE Subject Matter Outline to assume that joint and several liability is the relevant rule unless otherwise indicated. In a several-liability jurisdiction, Big Box, although the proximate cause of the enhanced injury, would be liable severally for its comparative share of enhanced injury damages. ANALYSIS 2 –CORPORATIONS & LLCs / CONFLICT OF LAWS

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

This question is intended to test examinees' knowledge of some basic principles of corporate law—namely, the rules for merging corporations. Specifically, it tests knowledge of the votes required for approval of a merger, the rights of a dissenting shareholder, and application of the internal affairs doctrine with respect to which state's law governs the surviving corporation.

Legal Problems:

- (1) What votes are required for the board of directors and shareholders of Winery Inc. to approve the merger of Winery Inc. into Organic Wines Corp.?
- (2) If Winery Inc. merges into Organic Wines Corp., does Ethan have a right to demand that he receive payment in cash from Organic Wines Corp. equal to the fair value of his shares in Winery Inc.?
- (3) If Organic Wines Corp. operates as a benefit corporation with a social and environmental purpose to produce organic wines in State A, could a shareholder of Organic Wines Corp. successfully sue the Organic Wines Corp. directors in State A for promoting this purpose at the expense of maximizing shareholder profits?

DISCUSSION

Summary

In a merger of two corporations incorporated in different states, each corporation is generally subject to the merger requirements of the state in which it is incorporated. Thus, the merger voting rules of State A (which has adopted the Model Business Corporation Act, "MBCA") would apply to the approval by Winery Inc. of its merger into Organic Wines Corp. Because the MBCA, as adopted in State A, specifies that approval of a merger requires adoption by a majority of the board of directors and approval by a majority of the outstanding shares, the votes of Carlos and Diana for the merger would be sufficient to approve the merger. Ethan cannot block the merger.

Following the merger, Ethan has a right to dissent from the merger and seek appraisal of his Winery Inc. shares. Given that the merger was subject to a shareholder vote, Ethan was entitled to vote, and Winery Inc. is a closely held corporation, he can demand that he receive from Organic Wines Corp. a cash payment equal to the fair value of his shares in Winery Inc.

Under the internal affairs doctrine, which is recognized by the MBCA, the duties of directors to their corporation and its shareholders are determined by the state of incorporation, not by the state where the suit is brought or where the corporation operates or is headquartered. Thus, the corporate law of State B, which permits directors of benefit corporations to pursue the corporation's social/environmental purposes, applies to Ethan's lawsuit. Even though the corporate law of State A may call on corporate directors to maximize shareholder profits, Ethan could not successfully sue the directors of the corporation for promoting the corporation's stated social/environmental purpose at the expense of shareholder profits.

Point One (30%)

The merger voting rules of State A, where Winery Inc. is incorporated, apply to the approval of the merger of Winery Inc. into Organic Wines Corp. Because State A corporate law follows the MBCA, only a majority vote of the directors and shareholders is needed to approve the merger. Thus, the votes of Carlos and Diana approving the merger will be sufficient. Ethan cannot block the merger.

A corporate merger is a business combination in which two corporations are combined into one surviving corporation, with the effect that any corporation merged into the survivor ceases, the shares of that corporation are converted into shares of the surviving corporation, and the articles of incorporation of the surviving corporation become effective for the resulting entity. MBCA §§ 11.01, 11.07. Under the MBCA, a domestic business corporation (incorporated in the jurisdiction) may merge with a foreign business corporation (incorporated in another jurisdiction) pursuant to a plan of merger. MBCA § 11.02(a). The foreign corporation may be a party to the merger only if the merger is permitted by the law of the foreign corporation. MBCA § 11.02(b). Under the MBCA, the plan of merger must first be adopted by a majority of the corporation's board of directors and then submitted to the corporations' shareholders for their approval. MBCA § 11.04(a) & (b). The plan must then receive the vote "of at least a majority of the votes entitled to be cast on the plan." MBCA § 11.04(e).

Here, Carlos and Diana, who constitute a majority of the board of Winery Inc. and who hold two-thirds of the corporation's outstanding shares, can approve the merger under the majority-voting provisions of State A, which has adopted the MBCA. Thus, given that there is no shareholders' agreement here that specifies different voting rules, Ethan cannot block the merger by voting against it.

[NOTE: Given that only Carlos and Diana will form Organic Wines Corp. in State B as a benefit corporation, they will be able to control that corporation's board of directors and will own all the shares before the merger. Thus, the approval of the merger by the relevant constituents of Organic Wines Corp. is a foregone conclusion.]

Point Two (30%)

Ethan has a right to demand that he receive payment in cash for the fair value of his shares in Winery Inc. rather than receive Organic Wines Corp. shares in the merger.

Under the MBCA, a shareholder who dissents from certain fundamental corporate transactions, including a merger, is entitled to demand payment in cash for her shares from the corporation, through either a negotiation process or a judicial appraisal in which she receives payment in cash for the fair value of her shares. MBCA § 13.02(a)(1) (appraisal available to dissenting shareholder in a merger, where shareholder approval of the merger is required, the dissenting shareholder is entitled to vote on the merger, and such shareholder's shares do not remain outstanding after the merger); see also MBCA § 13.02(b)(1) (making appraisal unavailable for shares of certain publicly traded corporations, the so-called "market out" exception).

Here, because Ethan has a right to appraisal of his shares, he would be entitled to payment in cash by Organic Wines Corp. (the surviving corporation in the merger) of the "fair value" of his Winery Inc. shares.

[NOTE: The following matters are beyond minimal competence, and an examinee should not be expected to discuss the matters in this note. They are included for the benefit of graders.

To preserve his right to receive the fair value of his shares, Ethan must give pre-merger written notice of his intent to demand payment, not vote for the merger, and, following the merger, make an actual demand for payment. A shareholder who dissents from a merger must preserve his right to appraisal by giving written notice before the vote on the merger of his intent to demand payment if the merger is effectuated and then not vote in favor of the merger. MBCA § 13.21(a).

After the merger is approved, the shareholder must then demand payment from the corporation, and within 30 days the corporation must pay the shareholder the corporation's estimate of fair value. MBCA § 13.24. Then, if the shareholder is dissatisfied with this payment, the corporation must attempt to settle any shortfall between the amount the shareholder seeks and the amount paid. MBCA §§ 13.26, 13.30(a). If these negotiations fail, the shareholder is entitled to a judicial appraisal of the fair value of his shares.]

Point Three (40%)

Under the internal affairs doctrine, the duties of directors to their corporation and its shareholders are determined by the state of incorporation, not by a state where the corporation operates or the state where the suit is brought. Thus, even if the corporate law of State A calls on corporate directors to maximize shareholder profits, Ethan's lawsuit could not successfully claim that the directors of the corporation promoted the corporation's stated social/environmental purpose at the expense of shareholder profits.

Under the MBCA, a "foreign corporation" is defined as a business corporation incorporated under the laws of another jurisdiction. MBCA § 1.40. Under the MBCA, a foreign corporation is permitted to operate and transact business within the state by obtaining a foreign registration statement. MBCA § 15.03 (describing basic information that must be set forth in application for foreign registration statement).

The internal affairs of the foreign corporation—that is, the legal relationships between and among its shareholders, directors, and officers—are governed by the state of incorporation even when the corporation's business and assets are located primarily in other states or the corporation operates in another state. See MBCA § 15.01(a)(1) (stating that the "law of the jurisdiction of formation of a foreign corporation governs . . . the internal affairs of the foreign corporation"). Further, a foreign corporation is not precluded from registering to do business in a state because of any difference between the law of the foreign corporation's jurisdiction of formation and the law of the state in which it seeks to do business. MBCA § 15.01(b).

Here, the duties of the directors of Organic Wines Corp. to further the corporation's social/environmental purpose are governed by the law of the corporation's state of incorporation, here, State B. Under the benefit-corporation statute of State B, the directors of Organic Wines Corp. are required to promote the social/environmental purpose of the corporation, even if at the expense of the corporation's shareholders. The benefit-corporation statute of State B, like those of other states, thus seeks to countermand the judicial view that the purpose of the business corporation is to maximize shareholder profits. See Dodge v. Ford Motor Co., 170 N.W. 668 (Mich. 1919) (requiring the payment of special dividends, on the theory the business corporation is "organized and carried on primarily for the profit of the stockholders"); eBay Domestic Holdings, Inc. v. Newmark, 16 A.3d 1, 32–35 (Del. Ch. 2010) (holding that poison pill meant to preserve "public-service mission" of Craigslist was unreasonable because it failed to "promote shareholder value"). One significant attribute of benefit corporations is that corporate directors are required to advance the corporation's social/environmental purpose even if at shareholder expense. See Dana Brakman Reiser, Benefit Corporation—A Sustainable Form of Corporation? 46 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 591 (Fall 2011) (describing how benefit corporation statutes create liability shields for directors who perform their duties consistent with the social and environmental purposes specified in the corporation's articles).

Thus, a shareholder who sued the directors of Organic Wines Corp. in State A for failing to maximize shareholder profits would fail under the benefit-corporation statute of State B, assuming the directors could justify their actions as somehow consistent with the social/environmental purpose of the corporation to promote sustainable, organic winemaking. This is so even though State A's law on the duties of directors may be different from the law of State B, the state in which Organic Wines is incorporated.

[NOTE: An answer that discusses the business judgment rule (a presumption that directors make decisions on an informed basis, in good faith, and in the best interests of the corporation) should not receive credit. The question asks whether the directors could act to promote the corporation's stated social/environmental purpose at the expense of shareholder profits. The business judgment rule, though suggesting that directors in a benefit corporation should have broad discretion in furthering the corporation's purpose, does not resolve a conflict between shareholder profits and the stated social/environmental purpose of the corporation.]

ANALYSIS 3 – FAMILY LAW

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This question tests an examinee’s ability to

- (1) identify and apply statutory and constitutional rules governing jurisdiction in family-law cases;
- (2) distinguish Supreme Court doctrine when applied to new factual scenarios; and
- (3) identify and apply statutory and constitutional parental rights and obligations.

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did the State A court’s exercise of personal jurisdiction over the woman to determine paternity, custody, and child support based on her sexual activity in State A more than 15 years earlier meet the requirements of the due process clause?
- (2) Assuming that the State A court properly exercised jurisdiction over the woman and that it may constitutionally establish the man’s legal paternity, may the court
 - (a) award the man sole custody of the daughter?
 - (b) require the woman to pay the man child support?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, a state may not exercise personal jurisdiction over a nonresident who lacks “minimum contacts” with the forum jurisdiction. Here, the State A court’s exercise of personal jurisdiction over the woman meets the minimum-contacts requirement because the activity on which personal jurisdiction is based (sexual intercourse) was purposeful and closely related to the man’s paternity, custody, and support claims.

Interstate custody disputes are governed by the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act and the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act. Except in limited circumstances not applicable here, both statutes grant exclusive jurisdiction to issue an initial custody decree to a child’s home state. Because State A is not the daughter’s home state, it lacks jurisdiction to issue a child-custody decree.

Interstate child support disputes are governed by the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA), effective in all states. UIFSA does not limit jurisdiction to issue an initial child support order to a child's home state. But only a parent with custody may obtain a support award. Thus, because the State A court may not grant the man's custody petition, it may not order the woman to pay child support either.

Point One (40%)

The State A court's exercise of personal jurisdiction over the woman meets the requirements of the due process clause of the United States Constitution because the activity on which jurisdiction is based (sexual intercourse) was purposeful and closely related to the man's paternity, custody, and support claims. Moreover, the woman continued to live in State A for eight months and chose to give birth there.

The portion of State A's long-arm statute discussed in the facts is similar to the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA) § 201(6), which has been adopted in all states. The Supreme Court of the United States has not ruled on the constitutionality of this provision.

The Court has ruled that a custody determination may only be made through the exercise of personal jurisdiction. May v. Anderson, 345 U.S. 528 (1953). In May, the Court concluded that "a mother's right to custody of her children is a personal right entitled to at least as much protection as her right to alimony" (id. at 533) and found that a custody award based solely on the domicile of the child was not entitled to full faith and credit.

The leading decision on the due process requirements governing the establishment of personal jurisdiction over a nonresident parent is Kulko v. Superior Court, 436 U.S. 84 (1978), involving a claim for child support. In Kulko, the Court employed the "minimum contacts" test laid out in International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310 (1945), and reversed a state-court ruling extending long-arm jurisdiction over a nonresident parent based on his "consent[] to the permanent residence of the . . . child" in the forum state. The Kulko Court noted that due process demands "some act by which the defendant purposefully avails [him]self of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum state" (quoting Hanson v. Denckla, 357 U.S. at 253) before that state may exercise long-arm jurisdiction.

The long-arm statute at issue in this case relies on purposeful activity, specifically sexual intercourse. Although the Supreme Court has not ruled on the constitutionality of such a provision, state courts have exercised long-arm jurisdiction over a nonresident parent on similar facts. See Dambakly v. Patire, 754 N.Y.S.2d 308 (App. Div. 2003). State courts have also found that statutes like this one meet due process requirements. See, e.g., Poindexter v. Poindexter, 594 N.W.2d 76 (1999); County of Humboldt v. Harris, 254 Cal. Rptr. 49 (Cal. Ct. App. 1988); Lake v. Butcher, 679 P.2d 409 (Wash. Ct. App. 1984). In finding such statutes constitutional, courts have relied on the voluntary nature of sexual intercourse, the fact that pregnancy is a known risk of sexual intercourse, and the state's strong interest in ensuring that a child has two legal parents with care and support obligations. Although the cases typically have been brought against a putative father, their reasoning applies equally to a suit brought, as here, by a putative father.

Here, there is also more than the fact of sexual intercourse to justify long-arm jurisdiction under the due process clause. The woman lived in State A for several months, went through her pregnancy there, and gave birth to her daughter there, all of which are additional connections with State A that might support a finding of minimum contacts.

In sum, a State A court could exercise long-arm jurisdiction over the woman.

Point Two(a) (30%)

Because State A is not the daughter's home state, it lacks subject-matter jurisdiction to issue a child-custody decree.

Child-custody contests are governed by the federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (PKPA), 28 U.S.C. § 1738A, and the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), in force in 49 states. Under both the PKPA and UCCJEA, when a child has a "home state," a state court may make an initial child-custody determination only if: (1) this State is the home State of the child on the date of the commencement of the proceeding, or was the home State of the child within six months before the commencement of the proceeding and the child is absent from this State but a parent or person acting as a parent continues to live in this State.

UCCJEA § 201(a). See also 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(c)(2)(A). Except when a child is less than six months of age, a child's "home state" is "the State in which a child lived with a parent or a person acting as a parent for at least six consecutive months immediately before the commencement of a child-custody proceeding." UCCJEA § 102. A temporary absence of the child, parent, or person acting as a parent "is part of the period" used for determining home-state status. Id.

Here, the daughter had lived in State B for most of her life and had been in State A for only three weeks when the action was begun. Although the daughter is now absent from State B, her mother (the woman) continues to live there. Thus, State B is the daughter's home state and a State A court may not issue a child-custody decree.

Point Two(b) (30%)

Under UIFSA, the State A court would have subject-matter jurisdiction to award child support to the man if he were the daughter's custodial parent. However, because the State A court is precluded from issuing a custody decree in his favor, it may not award him child support.

UIFSA, adopted by all 50 states, governs subject-matter jurisdiction over interstate child support disputes. Like the PKPA and UCCJEA, UIFSA utilizes a "home state" jurisdictional rule. But the UIFSA home-state rule establishes priority among competing child support orders. Under UIFSA § 204, a state court may exercise jurisdiction to establish a support order "after a pleading is filed in another state" only if "this state is the home state of the child" or jurisdiction in the other state has been timely challenged. As long as the requirements for personal jurisdiction are met (requirements identical to those contained in State A's long-arm statute), UIFSA's home-state rule does not preclude a state from issuing a support order when another state is the child's home state. See UIFSA § 204 comment. Because no competing child support pleading has been filed in State B, UIFSA does not bar a State A court from entering a child support order.

However, child support is typically paid to a custodial parent, and a custody transfer from one parent to the other will typically affect which parent receives child support and which parent pays. See UIFSA § 102 comment. When, as here, a parent (the woman, the daughter's mother) continues to be a child's sole custodian, a court may not order her to pay support to the noncustodial parent.

Thus, the State A court may not enter a support order against the woman because she retains sole custody of her daughter.

ANALYSIS 4 – CRIMINAL LAW & PROCEDURE

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

One objective of this question is to test the examinee’s ability to analyze the appropriateness of police behavior in a “hot pursuit” situation by applying basic constitutional standards concerning seizures of persons and things, including knowledge of the circumstances in which a warrant is not required. A second objective is to test the examinee’s ability to apply due process rules to a situation where an out-of-court identification was made under highly suggestive circumstances but without deliberate police involvement in arranging the identification process.

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did the police officer violate the man’s Fourth Amendment rights when he entered the home and seized the man and the purse without a warrant?
- (2) Would the man’s right to due process be violated by the admission at trial of evidence of the girl’s on-the-scene identification of the man or by the girl’s in-court identification of the man?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The man’s Fourth Amendment rights were not violated. First, the police officer had probable cause to arrest the man on suspicion of robbery before the man entered his own home. Second, the officer immediately and continuously pursued the man from the crime scene into his home, bringing the officer’s entry into the man’s home within the “hot pursuit” exception to the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement. Finally, the officer’s seizure of the purse was justified because the purse was in plain view of the officer when he entered the home and he had probable cause to believe that the purse was evidence of a crime.

Allowing the teenage girl to make an in-court identification of the man and allowing testimony that the girl identified the man at the scene would not violate the man’s constitutional due process rights. Although the on-the-scene identification was highly suggestive and of questionable reliability, the police did not arrange the identification procedure and were only incidentally involved in it. If the on-the-scene identification did not violate the man’s due process rights, it should not taint subsequent in-court identification by the same witness. Thus, both the on-the-scene and in-court identifications should be admitted.

Point One(a) (10%)

The Fourth Amendment generally prohibits both the warrantless seizure of a person inside the person's home and the warrantless seizure of property inside the home, but exceptions to the warrant requirement exist and may apply to validate the officer's conduct.

Regarding both the officer's warrantless seizure of the man and warrantless seizure of the purse in the man's home, the Fourth Amendment guarantees the "right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures." U.S. Const. amend. IV. This "security of one's privacy against arbitrary intrusion by the police . . . is basic to a free society" and is enforceable against the states through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25, 27 (1949).

Warrantless home intrusions by police are generally unreasonable and violate the Fourth Amendment. Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 587 (1980). But several exceptions to the warrant requirement allow the police to proceed without a warrant in many typical law-enforcement situations. For the following reasons, the officer's entry into the man's home and the seizures of the man and the purse all fall within exceptions to the warrant requirement.

Point One(b) (40%)

Neither the officer's warrantless entry into the man's home nor the seizure of the man inside his home violated the man's Fourth Amendment rights because the officer had probable cause to arrest the man for a felony and the circumstances also satisfy the other elements of the "hot pursuit" exception to the warrant requirement.

Whether the officer could constitutionally enter the man's home and seize him depends on related issues: the authority to arrest generally and authority to effectuate the arrest inside a suspect's home.

Police may generally arrest a person without a warrant if they have probable cause to believe that the person has committed a felony. United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411 (1976). An officer has probable cause to make an arrest if, under the totality of the circumstances at the time of the arrest, an objectively reasonable police officer would find "a probability or substantial chance" that the person has committed a crime. Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 232 (1983). The officer here had probable cause to arrest the man for robbery, which is a felony in all jurisdictions. The question states that robbery is defined in this jurisdiction consistently with the common law. Under the common law, robbery is the taking with the intent to steal of the personal property of another from her person or in her presence, against her will, by violence or intimidation. The officer had sufficient reason to believe that the man had taken the woman's personal property because an apparent eyewitness had told him that the man had knocked the woman down and taken her purse. Those facts, plus the fact that the man was running away while carrying a purse, would give a reasonable officer sufficient grounds to believe that the taking involved the man's intent to steal.

The officer also had sufficient reason to believe that the taking was against the woman's will because of the girl's statement that the man had "knocked" the woman to the ground before taking her purse. That same description and circumstance also gave the officer reason to believe that the taking was from the woman's person and involved the use of force. The totality of the circumstances would inform an objectively reasonable police officer that there was "a probability or substantial chance" that the man had just committed a robbery. The officer therefore had probable cause to arrest the man, even before the officer entered the home and saw the purse.

The authority to arrest without a warrant does not extend to all locations. In Payton v. New York, the Supreme Court held that the rule allowing police to make warrantless arrests of suspected felons did not apply when the suspect was found in his own home. It is a "basic principle of Fourth Amendment law" that searches and seizures inside a home without a warrant are presumptively unreasonable. 445 U.S. at 586. Despite the general authority to arrest for probable cause, "the Fourth Amendment . . . prohibits the police from making a warrantless and nonconsensual entry into a suspect's home in order to make a routine felony arrest." Id. at 576. The lawfulness of the seizure of the man inside his home after the warrantless entry therefore depends on whether another valid exception to the warrant requirement applies here.

"Hot pursuit" is a recognized exception to the warrant requirement for home entry. Under this exception, police officers do not violate the Fourth Amendment by entering a home without a warrant if they enter while hotly pursuing a fleeing suspect whom they have probable cause to arrest. United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38, 42–43 (1976); Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967). The "hot pursuit" exception is a version of the broader exception that excuses the police from obtaining a warrant "when the exigencies of the situation make the needs of law enforcement so compelling that a warrantless search is objectively reasonable." Missouri v. McNeely, 569 U.S. 141, 148–49 (2013).

The exception applies here. As stated, the officer had probable cause to make the arrest. Also, the officer's chase clearly constituted "hot pursuit." Although the Supreme Court has never precisely defined the term, it has indicated that "hot pursuit" occurs when an officer engages in "immediate or continuous pursuit of the [suspect] from the scene of a crime." Welsh v. Wisconsin, 466 U.S. 740, 753 (1984). Here, the officer happened upon the apparent scene of a crime, immediately and continuously pursued the man from that scene to the home, and entered the home without any delay in the progression of the chase. Neither the man's locking of the door nor his ordering the officer off his back porch rendered the entry unconstitutional. Once exigent circumstances are established, police may kick open a door. See generally Kentucky v. King, 563 U.S. 452, 456 and 472 (2011).

In addition, the precipitating offense here was sufficiently serious to justify the application of the hot-pursuit warrant exception. In applying any exigency-based warrant exception, "an important factor to be considered when determining whether any exigency exists is the gravity of the underlying offense for which the arrest is being made." Welsh, 466 U.S. at 753. This is a particular concern in the context of police entries into private homes: the "application of the exigent-circumstances exception in the context of a home entry should rarely be sanctioned when there is probable cause to believe that only a minor offense . . . has been committed." Id. See also Lange v. California, 141 S. Ct. 2011 (2021). Here the suspect's flight and refusal to stop occurred in the context of his attempt to avoid capture for a robbery, a serious offense classified in all jurisdictions as a felony.

Once the police officer was lawfully inside the home, he could seize the purse from the man without a warrant because the purse was in plain view and was evidence of a crime.

Although the police officer was lawfully in the man's home and had probable cause to arrest the man, those facts did not necessarily give the officer the right to seize the purse that was near where the man was standing. A seizure of property, without a warrant, is presumptively unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment and is constitutional only if it falls within an exception to the warrant requirement. Here the seizure fell within the "plain view" doctrine.

Under the "plain view" doctrine, a police officer may make a warrantless seizure of an item when three requirements are satisfied. First, the "officer must be lawfully located in a place from which the object can be plainly seen." Second, the officer must have "a lawful right of access to the object itself." Finally, the incriminating character of the object must be "immediately apparent." Horton v. California, 496 U.S. 128, 136–37 (1990).

All three requirements are satisfied. The first two requirements are satisfied because, as stated above, the officer lawfully entered the man's home under the "hot pursuit" exception to the warrant requirement. Once the officer was in the home, the purse was in plain view of the officer. He had lawful access to it for the same reason: he was lawfully in the presence of the item because he entered the home pursuant to the "hot pursuit" exception. See Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 465 (1971) (stating that seizure of items in plain view is justified when police are lawfully present under one of the recognized exceptions to the warrant requirement, including the "hot pursuit" exception).

The incriminating nature of the item was also "immediately apparent" under the circumstances. The officer had chased the man to the home after being told that the man had stolen a woman's purse. After he kicked open the door, the officer saw the man breathing heavily, and he saw a purse, suspecting that it was the woman's. The officer had good reason to believe that the man was the person he had been chasing and that the purse was the purse allegedly taken from the woman. On these facts, the incriminating nature of the purse was "immediately apparent" and its seizure was justified under the plain-view doctrine.

Point Two (30%)

The on-the-scene identification procedure, though highly suggestive, did not violate the man's due process rights because the police did not arrange the procedure. Therefore neither the on-the-scene nor the in-court identification is inadmissible on constitutional grounds.

The Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause bears on whether the on-scene and in-court identifications are admissible. Three issues ordinarily determine whether the state can properly introduce identification evidence: (1) whether the police were involved in arranging the procedure, (2) whether the identification process was highly suggestive and therefore unreliable, and if so, (3) whether the suggestive procedure was necessary under the circumstances. See Perry v. New Hampshire, 565 U.S. 228, 238–39 (2012) (synthesizing the analyses of Neil v. Biggers, 409 U.S. 188 (1972), and Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. 98 (1977)). Generally speaking, the state may not introduce evidence of an out-of-court identification, or elicit a subsequent in-court identification from the same witness, if the out-of-court identification process was “so unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparable mistaken identification that [the suspect] was denied due process of law.” Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293, 302 (1967). But in Perry v. New Hampshire, the Court sharply narrowed a defendant’s ability to successfully object to any identification as a violation of due process to cases where the defendant can also prove that the “unnecessarily suggestive circumstances [were] arranged by law enforcement.” 565 U.S. at 248.

Here the man could not successfully object to evidence that the teenage girl identified him at the scene or prohibit the state from having the girl identify him in court. This is because, under Perry, neither her out-of-court identification nor the suggestive circumstances under which it occurred were “arranged by law enforcement.”

The Perry Court reasoned that on-the-scene identification evidence of dubious reliability could be admitted without violating a defendant’s due process rights when a witness, asked by police for a specific description of the burglary suspect, simply “pointed to her kitchen window and said the person she saw breaking into Clavijo’s car was standing in the parking lot, next to the police officer” who was detaining him. Id. at 234. Despite police involvement with the defendant and with the witness at the crime scene, the Perry Court found that the police did not arrange the identification procedure:

When no improper law enforcement activity is involved, we hold, it suffices to test reliability through the rights and opportunities generally designed for that purpose, notably, the presence of counsel at postindictment lineups, vigorous cross-examination, protective rules of evidence, and jury instructions on both the fallibility of eyewitness identification and the requirement that guilt be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

Id. at 233. Absent “improper police influence,” there is no due process restriction on the use of unreliable out-of-court identification or subsequent in-court identification by the same witness. Id.

Here, under Perry, the on-the-scene identification evidence as well as the in-court identification by the girl will likely be allowed. Although police officers were involved in detaining the suspect (the man) and discussing the crime with a witness (the girl), the identification occurred incidental to any police-suspect and police-witness interaction. And it happened on the witness’s own initiative, unanticipated by police. There was no improper police effort to influence the witness or her identification of the suspect and no due process violation.

ANALYSIS 5 – DECEDENTS’ ESTATES

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This question seeks to test an examinee’s understanding of anti-lapse statutes as well as the ability to interpret and accurately apply a statute. In addition, the examinee must demonstrate knowledge of common terms used in trusts and estates law and the operation of survivorship contingencies.

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does the state anti-lapse statute or the anti-lapse provision of the testator’s will (Clause 3) determine who takes the share of a beneficiary who predeceased the testator?
- (2) Assuming that Clause 3 of the testator’s will applies, who is entitled to the testator’s house, which was bequeathed to Doris, who predeceased the testator?
- (3) Does the residuary bequest to Bill lapse because of the express survivorship requirement in the testator’s will?
- (4) Who is entitled to Bill’s one-half share if the bequest to him lapses?
- (5) Who is entitled to Bill’s one-half share if the bequest to him does not lapse?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The State A anti-lapse statute provides that it does not apply where the decedent’s will provides otherwise. Here, the statute does not apply to the disposition of the testator’s assets because Clause 3 of the testator’s will expressly addresses the possibility of lapse resulting from a named beneficiary predeceasing the testator.

Under Clause 3 of the testator’s will, a deceased beneficiary’s share passes to the beneficiary’s “heirs” unless the will provides otherwise. “Heirs” is a technical legal term. It means those individuals who take (or who would take) a share of a decedent’s probate estate if that decedent dies intestate. Thus, under the terms of the testator’s will, the bequest of the testator’s house to Doris, who predeceased the testator, passes to her nephew who is her heir, not to the charity, the beneficiary under Doris’s will.

Unlike the bequest to Doris, the residuary bequest to Bill is subject to an express survivorship requirement, as evidenced by the phrase “if he survives me.” When survivorship is expressly required, as here, a will would likely be construed to provide that any protection against lapse does not apply. This would be analogous to how an anti-lapse statute would work in most states. If Clause 3 is so construed, the bequest to Bill of one-half of the residue likely lapses.

If the bequest to Bill lapses, then whether the lapsed bequest passes to Alice, as the sole surviving residuary beneficiary, or to the testator's only heir, her sister, depends on whether State A utilizes the "no residue of a residue" rule or the "residue of a residue" rule. Under the former approach, the testator's sister and Alice take equal shares of the $250,000 residue; under the latter approach, Alice takes the entire $250,000.

If the bequest to Bill does not lapse, then according to Clause 3 of the will, that bequest passes to Bill's heir, his daughter.

Point One (15%)

Clause 3 of the testator's will, not the State A anti-lapse statute, determines who takes the share of a beneficiary who predeceases the testator.

In common with all anti-lapse statutes in the United States, the State A anti-lapse statute creates only a default rule, as it expressly states that it applies "[u]nless the decedent's will provides otherwise." Furthermore, because the State A statute is a default rule giving way to a contrary intent, a testator need not conform to the state's statutory lapse scheme in any respect. Here, the State A anti-lapse statute does not apply because the testator's will contains Clause 3, which expressly deals with what is to happen to the share of a beneficiary who predeceases the testator.

[NOTE: The primary difference between the State A anti-lapse statute and Clause 3 of the testator's will is that under the statute a share saved from lapse passes to the deceased beneficiary's issue whereas under Clause 3 it passes to the deceased beneficiary's heirs.]

Point Two (25%)

The testator's house passes to Doris's nephew, who is her heir.

The testator bequeathed her house to Doris, who predeceased the testator. Unlike the bequests to Bill and Alice, the bequest to Doris is not subject to a survivorship contingency. In other words, the testator did not condition the bequest to Doris upon Doris's surviving the testator. Therefore, the bequest does not fail because Doris predeceased the testator. Because of Clause 3 of the testator's will, as Doris predeceased the testator and the will did not require Doris to survive the testator, the house passes to Doris's heir(s).

Heirs are those individuals who take a share of a decedent's probate estate when that decedent dies intestate. Here, Doris's heir is her nephew. The fact that Doris bequeathed her estate to a charity, and not to her nephew, does not alter this result. The charity is the testamentary beneficiary of Doris's estate, but it is not Doris's heir.

Thus, the testator's house passes to Doris's nephew.

Point Three (30%)

Because Bill predeceased the testator and the gift to him was subject to an express survivorship contingency, most likely the bequest to him lapses and does not pass to Bill's daughter.

Clause 3 of the testator's will provides: "If any beneficiary under either of the foregoing two provisions of this will predeceases me and my will does not expressly provide otherwise, the heirs of the deceased beneficiary shall take the beneficiary's bequest." (emphasis added)

The residuary clause of the testator's will expressly provides that the bequests to Alice and Bill are subject to a survivorship contingency. When construing a state anti-lapse statute, an express survivorship requirement like this is typically construed to mean that there is no protection from lapse. In other words, the phrase evidences a testator's intent that only if the named beneficiary survives the testator will the bequest be given effect. See generally William M. McGovern, Jr., Sheldon F. Kurtz & David M. English, Principles of Wills, Trusts, and Estates 259–260 (5th ed. 2017).

In construing Clause 3, courts will look to the testator's intent. Id. at 269. Because Clause 3 is analogous to an anti-lapse statute, the phrase "if he [Bill] survives me" is likely to have the same impact as it would if the state anti-lapse statute applied. The testator's use of the phrase "if X survives me" with respect to some but not all bequests in her will demonstrates that the testator deliberately distinguished a gift subject to survivorship from one that was not. When coupled with Clause 3, the use of the phrase further suggests an intent to allow lapse in some circumstances but not in others.

Here, because the testator expressly conditioned each residuary beneficiary's bequest on survivorship by use of the phrase "if he [or she] survives me," compared with the bequest to Doris, which did not contain that phrase, the bequest to Bill most likely lapses. Thus Bill's daughter, who would have taken as his heir absent the survivorship contingency, does not take his share of the residuary estate.

The Uniform Probate Code (UPC), however, takes a contrary approach with respect to the effect of the phrase "if he [or she] survives me." It provides in Section 2-603(b) that an express survivorship contingency does not evidence intent for the anti-lapse statute to be inapplicable. If the UPC interpretive rule respecting survivorship contingencies is applied by analogy to Clause 3, then Bill's residuary share passes to Bill's heir—his daughter.

[NOTE: Because this question could be answered either way, it is important to grade this question based upon the quality of the explanation, not merely on the conclusion.]

Point Four (20%)

If the bequest to Bill lapses, then depending on whether or not State A applies the "no residue of a residue" rule, the lapsed residuary bequest to Bill passes either to Alice, the surviving residuary beneficiary, or to the testator's sister as the testator's heir.

If a general or specific bequest lapses, it falls into the residuary and passes to the residuary beneficiaries. If, on the other hand, a residuary bequest lapses, its disposition depends on whether the jurisdiction (1) follows the traditional common law "no residue of a residue" rule (see McGovern Et Al. at 399–400) or (2) has adopted, by case law or statute, a "residue of a residue" approach. See, e.g., Unif. Probate Code § 2-604(b). The latter (residue of a residue rule) has become increasingly accepted on the theory that a testator, by writing a will, expresses a preference for those beneficiaries named in the will and not for his or her heirs.

If the bequest to Bill lapses, it does not pass to Bill's heir. Thus, what happens to Bill's one-half share of the bank account depends on whether State A applies the common law no-residue-of-a-residue rule. Under the no-residue-of-a-residue rule, Bill's share passes to the testator's heir, the testator's sister. In this case, Alice would take half ($125,000) of the bank account and the testator's sister the other half. If, on the other hand, State A applies the "residue of a residue" approach, Bill's share goes to Alice, the sole surviving residuary beneficiary. Alice would then take the entire $250,000 in the bank account.

Point Five (10%)

If the bequest to Bill does not lapse, it passes to his heir, his daughter.

If the bequest to Bill is saved from lapse by Clause 3 (see Point Three), it passes to Bill's heir, which is his daughter. In such case, one-half of the residuary estate (the bank account) passes to Alice and the other half to Bill's daughter.

ANALYSIS 6 – CIVIL PROCEDURE

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

The objective of this question is to test an examinee’s knowledge of whether state claims not based on diversity jurisdiction can be brought in federal court and the pleading requirements that apply to such claims. Specifically, it asks whether a state defamation claim can be brought with a federal age-discrimination claim under the court’s supplemental jurisdiction and whether a state pleading requirement that defamation claims be pleaded with specificity applies in a federal action.

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Does a federal court have original jurisdiction over a claim based on state defamation law when the parties are both citizens of the same state?
- (1)(b) May a federal court exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a state-law defamation claim when that claim is raised in a civil action that also raises a federal claim (here, a violation of the ADEA) and both claims arise out of the same workplace conflict between the plaintiff and the defendant?
- (1)(c) Under what circumstances may a federal court decline to exercise its supplemental jurisdiction?
- (2) Should a federal court dismiss a defamation action based on state law when the plaintiff has not alleged “the particular words constituting defamation” as required under state law?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The federal court would not have either federal-question or diversity jurisdiction over the woman’s defamation claim. Nonetheless, the court can hear the claim pursuant to its supplemental jurisdiction. The defamation claim arises out of the same nucleus of operative fact as the woman’s federal age-discrimination claim, and the facts do not present any special reason that the court should decline to exercise its supplemental jurisdiction. Thus, the court should not grant the attorney’s motion to dismiss the woman’s defamation claim for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

Although State A requires special pleading for defamation claims and the woman’s complaint does not satisfy those requirements, the pleading of state-law claims in federal court is governed by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a), which does not require specificity with respect to defamation claims. Thus, the court should not grant the attorney's motion to dismiss the woman's defamation claim for failure to plead with specificity, given that the motion is based on an inapplicable state-law pleading requirement.

Point One(a) (10%)

The federal district court does not have original jurisdiction over the woman's defamation claim because it does not raise a federal question and there is no diversity between the parties.

The federal district courts have original jurisdiction over civil actions "arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States" and over civil actions where the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000 and the action "is between citizens of different States." See 28 U.S.C. § 1331 (federal-question jurisdiction) and 28 U.S.C. § 1332 (diversity jurisdiction). Here, neither type of original jurisdiction applies to the woman's defamation claim against the attorney.

To bring a claim in federal court pursuant to the court's federal-question jurisdiction, the claim must be based on federal law. That is, the issue of federal law must appear on the face of a properly pleaded complaint. See Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149 (1908). Here, the woman's defamation claim is based on state law, not federal law.

Similarly, the defamation claim cannot be brought under the court's diversity jurisdiction. The facts clearly state that the woman and the attorney are both citizens and domiciliaries of State A. Thus, there is no diversity.

For these reasons, there is no independent basis for the federal district court to assert original jurisdiction over the woman's defamation claim. However, the claim can be brought in federal district court if it falls within the court's supplemental jurisdiction. See Point One(b).

[NOTE: An examinee might raise the possibility that the woman could claim original subject-matter jurisdiction based on a potential affirmative defense by the attorney that his alleged defamation was protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The facts, however, do not suggest the possibility of this defense. Moreover, Mottley makes clear that just because a defendant might be able to raise a defense under federal law does not suffice to bring the case within the court's federal-question jurisdiction. Id. The plaintiff's claim must itself rest on federal law. An answer that indicates the contrary should receive no credit.]

Point One(b) (40%)

The federal district court can exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the woman's defamation claim because it is "so related to" her age-discrimination claim, over which the court has federal-question jurisdiction, that it "form[s] part of the same case or controversy."

When a federal court has original federal-question jurisdiction over one claim raised in a civil action, it may exercise "supplemental jurisdiction" over "all other claims that are so related" to that claim "that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution." 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a). The test most frequently used for determining whether claims are sufficiently related is whether the claims derive from a "common nucleus of operative fact" such that a plaintiff "would ordinarily be expected to try them all in one judicial proceeding.” United Mine Workers of America v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 725 (1966) (establishing test for “pendent jurisdiction”).

Here, the woman has brought a claim under the federal Age Discrimination in Employment Act. Because the federal court has federal-question jurisdiction over that claim, the question is whether the woman’s state-law defamation claim arises out of a “common nucleus of operative fact” shared with her age-discrimination claim.

Both the woman’s age-discrimination claim and her defamation claim arise out of her treatment by the attorney who became her supervisor at the law firm where she worked. Both claims relate to how the woman was treated in the workplace, including what the attorney said to the woman and about her within the hearing of other employees of the firm. Both claims concern the alleged reasons for the woman’s being fired. The allegedly defamatory comments explicitly related to the woman’s characteristics as an employee and were made to justify the attorney’s decision to fire her. Under these circumstances, the claims arise out of a “common nucleus of operative fact,” and the woman would be reasonably expected to try both claims in a single proceeding.

Point One(c) (10%)

There is no basis for the federal district court to decline to exercise its supplemental jurisdiction. Thus, the court should not grant the attorney’s motion to dismiss the woman’s defamation claim for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

The fact that a federal court has the power to hear a supplemental claim “does not mean, of course, that it must do so. Instead, it may decline to exercise its power based on the factors laid out in 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c). The decision is left to the exercise of the district court’s discretion.” Briarpatch Ltd., LP v. Phoenix Pictures, Inc., 373 F.3d 296, 308 (2d Cir. 2004).

Section 1367(c) provides that a court may decline to exercise its supplemental jurisdiction over a state-law claim if

- (1) the claim raises a novel or complex issue of State law;
- (2) the state-law claim substantially predominates over the federal claim;
- (3) all claims within the court’s original jurisdiction have been dismissed; or
- (4) there are “other compelling reasons for declining jurisdiction.”

Here, none of these reasons for refusing to exercise supplemental jurisdiction are present. There is no indication that the defamation claim raises any “novel or complex issue of State law.” There is no reason to believe that the state-law claim substantially predominates over the federal age-discrimination claim. To the contrary, the woman’s claim that she was fired because of her age appears to be at the heart of her lawsuit. Her federal claim has not been dismissed. Finally, no facts suggest any other “compelling reason” why the court should not hear the defamation claim alongside the related age-discrimination claim.

Thus, the court should not grant the attorney's motion to dismiss the woman's defamation claim for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

Point Two (40%)

Whether the woman has adequately pleaded her defamation claim will be determined by federal law, and not by State A's special pleading requirements, which do not apply in federal court. Thus, the court should not grant the attorney's motion to dismiss the woman's defamation claim for failing to plead with the specificity required by State A's pleading rules.

The issue is whether the woman's claim of defamation should be dismissed because she failed to satisfy a special state-law pleading rule concerning the specificity with which a complaint must state allegations of defamation. State A law requires a plaintiff claiming defamation to allege "the particular words constituting defamation." The woman's complaint did not state the defendant's exact words, and if the case were in state court, that failure might warrant dismissal of the action. See Lemieux v. Fox, 135 A.D.3d 713 (N.Y. App. Div. 2d Dept. 2016).

However, under the Federal Rules Enabling Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2071 et seq., the Supreme Court is authorized to establish the rules of practice and procedure in federal courts, so long as those rules do not "abridge, enlarge or modify any substantive right." 28 U.S.C. § 2072. Pursuant to the authority granted by this act, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure have been promulgated by the Court. Those rules govern all "civil actions and proceedings" in federal court, including actions raising claims arising under state law. FED. R. CIV. P. 1.

Here, Rule 8(a) governs the pleading of claims in federal court, and it provides that a pleading is adequate if it contains a "short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." There are no special pleading rules for defamation under the Federal Rules. Thus, the Rule 8(a) notice pleading standard generally applies to any claim brought in federal court and prevails over any state-law pleading rules. See Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 471–74 (1965) (situations covered by a Federal Rule are governed by that Rule, and not by contrary state law unless the Federal Rule violates the Enabling Act or is contrary to the Constitution). Federal courts regularly conclude that special state rules regarding the pleading of defamation, like the rule in State A, are not applicable in federal court. See Geisler v. Petrocelli, 616 F.2d 636 (2d Cir. 1980) (special state-law pleading rules for defamation actions do not apply in federal court); Williams v. Lipscomb, 2018 WL 3672752 (W.D. Va. 2018) (refusing to apply a state rule requiring that defamation actions allege the "exact words" used by the defendant).

Thus, the court should not grant the attorney's motion to dismiss for lack of pleading specificity because the motion is based on State A pleading rules for defamation that are not applicable in federal court.

[NOTE: In Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678–80 (2009), the Supreme Court interpreted Rule 8(a) to mean that the plaintiff must allege, at a minimum, facts that state "a plausible claim for relief," not mere conclusory allegations. The woman's complaint appears to satisfy the federal notice pleading standard as interpreted by the Supreme Court. She alleges that the attorney made comments to the effect that she was dishonest and had committed theft. She alleges that such comments were false. Her complaint provides the approximate dates when the comments were made. Such comments, if made, would likely be defamatory under any state law and would state a “plausible claim for relief.”

That said, an answer that discusses this interpretation of the Rule 8(a) pleading standard should not receive additional credit. The call of the question asks only whether the court should grant the attorney’s motion to dismiss for failing to plead defamation with the specificity required by the state pleading rules.]

QUESTION 1 – SECURED TRANSACTIONS

A man decided to start a business repairing diesel-engine trucks. His mother's farm had a large metal barn that had been used in the past to repair farm machinery. As his mother no longer used the barn for that purpose, she agreed to let the man perform truck repairs in it. The barn contained a large portable welding machine (worth approximately $25,000) that would be useful for making repairs on large trucks. The mother made it clear to her son that he could use the barn but not her welding machine. Nonetheless, without his mother's knowledge, the man frequently used the welding machine for truck repairs.

On June 1, the man obtained a $50,000 business loan from a local bank. The man and the bank signed a loan agreement. It contained a provision pursuant to which the man granted the bank a security interest "in all my equipment, including equipment hereafter acquired" to secure his repayment obligation. On the same day, the bank properly filed a financing statement listing the man as the debtor and indicating that the collateral was "all equipment, including equipment hereafter acquired."

On June 10, the man bought some specialized tools used for diesel-engine repair. The man agreed to pay the tool seller $15,000 for the tools, paying $1,500 down and agreeing to pay the remaining $13,500 to the tool seller in monthly installments over a two-year period. The man signed a written agreement granting the seller a security interest in these tools to secure the man's obligation to pay the remaining $13,500. The next day, the tool seller properly filed a financing statement listing the man as the debtor and indicating that the collateral was "diesel-engine repair tools."

The man has defaulted on his obligations to the bank and the tool seller.

1. Does the bank have an enforceable security interest in the portable welding machine? Explain.
2. Both the bank and the tool seller are asserting interests in the diesel-engine repair tools that the tool seller sold to the man.
 - a) Does the bank have an enforceable security interest in these tools? Explain.
 - b) Does the tool seller have an enforceable security interest in the tools? Explain.
 - c) Assuming that both the bank and the tool seller have such security interests in these tools, whose interest has priority? Explain.

QUESTION 2 – CRIMINAL LAW & PROCEDURE

A woman runs a gardening and landscaping business in State A. She uses a manual push mower to cut the grass and pruning shears to cut unwanted small branches from trees and large bushes.

Five months ago, the woman was hired to provide common-area mowing and landscaping services to a townhome community in which homeowners own some land commonly and some land individually. She also agreed to accept online service requests from homeowners in the community for individual landscaping jobs.

Last week, the woman was at the community cutting thick brush and small branches using her pruning shears. She finished the work at noon and decided to try to collect an overdue payment from a homeowner who had ordered and received $100 worth of landscaping services from the woman's business but had never paid for the services. The woman, carrying her pruning shears, walked directly to the homeowner's townhome. When she reached the front door, she was still holding the pruning shears (but down at her side, pointed toward the ground). The woman rang the doorbell, and the homeowner, who was just leaving on an errand, opened the door.

The woman asked bluntly, "Where's the money?" The homeowner did not recognize the woman because the two had communicated only online. Neither the woman's clothing nor her truck bore the name of her landscaping business. Frightened by the woman's cold tone and the pruning shears in the woman's hand, the homeowner immediately pulled five $20 bills from her purse, held the cash out toward the woman, and said, "Take it. This is all I have!" The woman said, "Fine. That's what I was expecting." The woman put the $100 in her pocket and walked toward her truck. The homeowner slammed the door and called the police.

On the way to her truck, the woman was still annoyed that it had taken so long for payment. She muttered to herself, "More than three months overdue and not even a tip!" She decided that she was entitled to something extra. She glanced over her shoulder to make sure the homeowner wasn't looking and grabbed a bronze garden figurine from the homeowner's front lawn, put it in her truck, and drove away.

When the woman got back to her workshop, she offered the figurine to her assistant, saying, "I'll sell you this cheap. How about $10? Just don't ask where I got it." The figurine looked new, and the assistant noticed a $200 price tag attached to the bottom of the figurine. The assistant quickly handed the woman $10, saying, "Wow. That's a great deal. These things are in high demand, and I bet I can sell it for a hefty profit."

State A has the following criminal statutes:

Theft: Theft is the unlawful taking and carrying away of property from the person or custody of another, with intent to permanently deprive the owner of the property.

Armed Robbery: Armed robbery is theft of property, when in the course of the theft the offender is carrying a dangerous weapon and either (1) uses force, violence, or assault or (2) puts the victim in fear of serious injury.

Criminal Possession of Stolen Property: A person commits criminal possession of stolen property when the person possesses property that the person knows or reasonably should know is stolen property with intent either (1) to benefit that person or a person other than an owner thereof or (2) to impede the recovery by an owner.

Dangerous Weapon: A dangerous weapon is any (1) firearm, (2) device that was designed for use as a weapon and capable of producing death or great bodily harm, or (3) device that is being used in a manner likely to produce death or great bodily harm.

State A courts have determined that all State A criminal statutes should be interpreted to incorporate common law mens rea requirements.

1. Analyzing all elements of each crime, did the woman commit
 - a) armed robbery of the $100 cash? Explain.
 - b) theft of the figurine? Explain.
 - c) criminal possession of the figurine as stolen property? Explain.
2. Did the woman's assistant commit criminal possession of stolen property? Explain.

QUESTION 3 – CORPORATIONS & LLCs

Six years ago, Amy and Bill incorporated a craft beer business as Beer Corporation (BC) in State A, whose corporate statute is modeled on the Model Business Corporation Act. Amy and Bill were the corporation's sole shareholders and sole directors at the time it was incorporated, and both of them were employed by BC.

Every fall after incorporation, Amy and Bill traveled to an internationally famous craft breweries trade show held in Germany to learn about the latest in craft brewing. Employees of other craft beer businesses that competed with BC did so as well. BC treated all expenses associated with attending the trade show as "ordinary and necessary" business expenses for accounting and tax purposes, and every year Amy and Bill used the corporate credit card to pay these expenses.

BC was successful, and Amy and Bill wanted to expand the business if they could get a significant capital infusion. Last year, they met Sharon, who agreed to invest in BC. In exchange for her investment, BC issued her new shares in the corporation. Sharon then owned 40% of the outstanding shares of BC. Amy and Bill then each owned 30% of BC's outstanding shares, and they continued to run the day-to-day business. Sharon was elected as the third director of BC.

At the first board meeting after Sharon's election to the board, Sharon questioned the need for Amy and Bill to go to Germany every year at corporate expense. Amy explained, "The trips give us new ideas about ingredients and brewing techniques. And incidentally, while we are there, we can do some sightseeing." In fact, many of BC's competitors covered such travel to Europe for their key employees. Sharon was not convinced about the need for this travel and said, "As far as I'm concerned, the practice must stop!"

At last month's regularly scheduled board meeting, Amy and Bill announced to Sharon that they were planning to travel to Belgium and not to Germany. "We believe that Belgium, not Germany, is where innovations in craft brewing are now happening, and we want to bring back fresh ideas for our business. We expect that the trip will take a full week, and while visiting different breweries we can also take in nearby museums and historic sites. As in the past, we will have BC pay all the expenses for that week."

Sharon objected and said, "If you do this, I'm going to sue!" But Amy and Bill were undeterred, and as a majority of the board, they voted to approve their trip to Belgium at corporate expense. The following week, they traveled to Belgium using BC's credit card. Upon their return, they caused BC to pay the credit card bill.

1. Did Amy and Bill have the authority as members of the board to vote to approve their trip to Belgium at corporate expense? Explain.
2. Did Amy and Bill violate the duty of loyalty by having the corporation pay for their Belgium trip over Sharon's objection? Explain.

3. Assuming that Amy and Bill violated the duty of loyalty by having the corporation pay for their Belgium trip, can Sharon personally recover from Amy and Bill all the expenses for that trip paid by BC? Explain.
4. Assuming that Amy and Bill violated the duty of loyalty by having the corporation pay for their prior trips to Germany, can Sharon bring a derivative claim to recover from Amy and Bill the expenses paid by BC that related to their prior trips to Germany? Explain.

QUESTION 4 – AGENCY

Peter planned to open a 50-seat pizza parlor that would also make pizzas for home-delivery service. He asked his sister Angela to make some purchases for his pizza parlor. "First, to fit with the parlor's unique decor, I want you to buy 50 red chairs from the local furniture store, but don't spend more than $10,000 on the chairs. Second, I want you to buy a new electric bicycle for pizza deliveries, but don't spend more than $5,000. Finally, I'd like you to buy from the local restaurant supplier a pizza oven for the pizza parlor, but it shouldn't cost more than $12,000." Angela responded, "I fully understand. Agreed."

That day, Angela went to the local furniture store. She told the salesperson that she wanted to buy 50 red chairs and to spend no more than $10,000. The salesperson responded that red chairs were in high demand and that 50 of them would cost $20,000, but that for $10,000, Angela could buy 50 yellow chairs. Believing that Peter would prefer to stay within the $10,000 budget, even though the chairs were yellow, Angela signed a written contract in her name alone to buy the yellow chairs from the store at that price. Angela did not mention to the salesperson that she was buying the chairs for anyone other than herself or that she had authority to buy only red chairs.

The next day, Angela went to a local bike shop to buy a new electric bicycle, again without mentioning that she was buying the bicycle for anyone else. The bike salesperson truthfully told Angela that she could get a used cargo bike that was not electric, but that could carry more than an electric bike. Believing that Peter would prefer the greater carrying capacity of the cargo bike, Angela purchased it for $8,000, paying with her personal check made out to the bike shop. She immediately rode the bike to Peter, who at first was very annoyed with Angela for purchasing a used cargo bike rather than a new electric bike. But two days later, after trying out the cargo bike, he called Angela and said that he would keep the $8,000 cargo bike because he liked its carrying capacity.

The following day, Peter called the local restaurant supplier in the morning and told the owner, "I am going to open a pizza parlor next month. I have asked my sister Angela to come to your store to purchase a pizza oven on my behalf for the pizza parlor." That afternoon Angela went to the supplier and signed a contract to buy a pizza oven as "Angela, on behalf of Peter." The price for the oven was $15,000, which was a fair price for the pizza oven. The contract specified that the price was payable in full upon delivery. When the restaurant supplier delivered the oven to Peter, he refused to accept delivery or pay the $15,000 purchase price, telling the delivery driver, "Take it back; I don't want it. It's too expensive."

Assume that there is an enforceable contract in each case.

1. As to the yellow chairs:
 - a) Is Peter bound by the contract signed by Angela with the furniture store? Explain.
 - b) Is Angela bound by the contract she signed with the furniture store? Explain.

2. As to the used cargo bike, can Angela recoup from Peter the $8,000 that she paid to the bike shop for it? Explain.
3. As to the pizza oven, is Peter bound by the contract signed by Angela? Explain.

QUESTION 5 – TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS

Ten years ago, Settlor, a widower, established an irrevocable trust. At that time, Settlor had only one child, Daughter, who had two adult children, Ann and Bob.

The trust instrument named Settlor's friend as the sole trustee and stated, in pertinent part:

1. The trustee shall pay all trust income to Daughter, Ann, and Bob, in equal shares.
2. No income beneficiary may alienate or assign his or her trust interest, nor shall such interest be subject to the claims of his or her creditors.
3. Trust principal will be distributed following Daughter's death "as she may appoint by her will, among her heirs at law and in such shares as she, in her sole discretion, may deem appropriate."

Each year after the trust was established, the trustee distributed equal shares of trust income to Daughter, Ann, and Bob.

Two years ago, Settlor remarried. His wife recently gave birth to their twins. Settlor wants to ensure that his twins receive a share of trust principal after Daughter's death. Daughter has agreed to help effectuate this goal.

Last month, the trustee received letters from two of Bob's creditors seeking to have the claims they had against Bob paid from Bob's interest in the trust. One of these creditors, a bank, has a $20,000 judgment against Bob for a loan that Bob did not repay.

The other creditor is Bob's former wife, who seeks to enforce a $30,000 judgment against Bob for unpaid child support owed for their five-year-old child.

Since receiving the letters from the two creditors, the trustee has continued to pay trust income to Daughter, Ann, and Bob, but he has refused to pay anything to either of Bob's creditors.

Under the Uniform Trust Code:

1. May the bank reach Bob's interest in present and future distributions of trust income to satisfy its judgment against Bob? Explain.
2. May Bob's former wife reach Bob's interest in present and future distributions of trust income to satisfy her judgment against Bob? Explain.
3. With respect to the power of appointment:
 - a) What is the proper classification of Daughter's power of appointment? Explain.
 - b) Is it likely that an appointment of trust principal by Daughter to Settlor's twins would be effective? Explain.

- c) If Daughter fails to exercise her power of appointment, to whom would the trust principal pass upon her death? Explain.

QUESTION 6 – CONTRACTS

Buyer manufactures scarves from various fabrics, including silk. It buys silk from various fabric importers including Seller, from whom Buyer has made over 250 purchases of silk during the last six years. In each of these earlier transactions, Seller delivered the silk to Buyer at no extra charge, and Buyer paid Seller the purchase price at the time of delivery.

On January 9, Buyer and Seller agreed in a telephone call that Buyer would buy 10,000 yards of silk from Seller on February 1 at a price of $10 per yard. The next morning, Buyer sent a signed note to Seller, stating, "I'm glad that we were able to reach agreement so quickly yesterday on the deal for the 10,000 yards of silk I'm buying from you." Seller received the note two days later, read it, placed it in its files, and did not respond to it in any way. On February 1, Seller did not deliver silk to Buyer's place of business.

The next day, Buyer contacted Seller to complain. Seller replied, "This isn't a delivery order. You didn't say anything about delivery when you placed this order last month. Come pick it up—and hurry! Your order is taking up space in our warehouse." Buyer, who did not have a truck large enough to pick up the silk, responded by saying, "Deliver it by tomorrow or I'll see you in court."

Two days later, on February 4, when Seller had not delivered the silk to Buyer, Buyer made a good-faith and commercially reasonable purchase of 10,000 yards of silk of identical quality from Dealer at a price of $12 per yard, including delivery to Buyer.

Buyer then sued Seller for $20,000, alleging that Seller had breached its obligations under the January 9 agreement.

1. Is there a contract enforceable by Buyer against Seller arising from the January 9 agreement? Explain.
2. Assuming that there is a contract enforceable by Buyer against Seller arising from the January 9 agreement, does the contract require Seller to deliver the silk to Buyer's place of business? Explain.
3. Assume that there is a contract enforceable by Buyer against Seller arising from the January 9 agreement, that the contract requires Seller to deliver the silk to Buyer, and that Buyer suffered no incidental or consequential damages. Is Buyer entitled to damages of $20,000 based on Buyer's purchase of substitute silk? Explain.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does the bank have an enforceable security interest in the portable welding machine?
- (2)(a) Does the bank have an enforceable security interest in the diesel-engine repair tools?
- (2)(b) Does the tool seller have an enforceable security interest in these tools?
- (2)(c) Assuming that both the bank and the tool seller have such security interests in these tools, whose interest has priority?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Because the man's mother owns the portable welding machine, and there is no indication that the man has any ownership or other rights in it, the bank does not have an enforceable security interest in the machine.

The man granted the bank an enforceable security interest in all of the man's present and future equipment. This security interest, which covers the later-acquired tools, was perfected by the bank's filing of its financing statement. The tool seller also has a perfected security interest in the tools. Although the financing statement perfecting the tool seller's security interest was filed after that of the bank, the tool seller's security interest has priority because it is a purchase-money security interest that was perfected within 20 days of the debtor's possession of the collateral.

Point One (20%)

The bank does not have a security interest in the portable welding machine because the man had neither any rights in the machine nor the power to transfer any rights in it.

For a security interest to be enforceable, three requirements must be satisfied. UCC § 9-203(b). The first requirement is that "value" must be given. UCC § 9-203(b)(1). The second requirement is that the debtor must have "rights in the collateral or the power to transfer rights in the collateral to a secured party." UCC § 9-203(b)(2). The third requirement, in the context of a security interest in goods not in the secured party's possession, is that the debtor must have authenticated (signed or its electronic equivalent) a security agreement containing a description of the collateral. UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(a).

Two of the requirements for enforceability are met on the facts of this problem. First, value was given when the bank loaned the man $50,000. UCC § 1-204. Second, the man signed an agreement granting the bank a security interest in all of the man's equipment. Because this agreement creates or provides for a security interest, it is a security agreement. UCC § 9-102(a)(74). Moreover, because "equipment" means "goods other than inventory, farm products, or consumer goods," the portable welding machine is equipment and thus the security agreement contains a sufficient description of the collateral. See UCC §§ 9-102(a)(33), 9-108.

However, the third requirement (that the man have "rights in the collateral or the power to transfer rights . . . to a secured party") is not satisfied on these facts. The portable welding machine belongs to the man's mother, and he has no rights in it. There is no indication that the man's mother transferred any ownership interest or other rights in the machine to him. Indeed, the mother expressly stated that the man had no right to use the welding machine. Moreover, there is nothing in the facts that would indicate that the man ever had the power to transfer rights in the welding machine to anyone.

Because only two of the three criteria for the creation of an enforceable security interest were satisfied, the bank does not have an enforceable security interest in the welding machine.

[NOTE: Because all three criteria for the creation of an enforceable security interest must be satisfied, an examinee might focus only on the criterion that is not satisfied (that the debtor have rights in the collateral or the power to transfer rights in it to a secured party), since that is sufficient to reach the conclusion that the bank does not have an enforceable security interest. Such an answer should receive full credit.]

Point Two(a) (20%)

The bank has an enforceable security interest in the diesel-engine repair tools that the man bought after entering into the security agreement with the bank because all three statutory criteria are satisfied.

While the man did not own the diesel-engine repair tools at the time that he borrowed money from the bank, the security agreement that he signed stated that he granted the bank a security interest in "all my equipment, including equipment hereafter acquired." This is permitted by UCC § 9-204(a), which provides that "a security agreement may create or provide for a security interest in after-acquired collateral."

Once the man acquired the diesel-engine repair tools, all three elements of an enforceable security interest were satisfied. First, the bank gave value to the man by loaning him money. See UCC § 9-203(b)(1). Second, once the man acquired the tools, he had rights in them (notwithstanding that he had not paid the entire purchase price yet). See UCC § 9-203(b)(2).

Third, the man signed a security agreement granting the bank a security interest in his "equipment." Under UCC Article 9, equipment consists of goods that are not "inventory, farm products, or consumer goods." The tools do not fit into any of those categories, which are terms of art defined in UCC § 9-102. The tools are not farm products; they are not inventory because they are not held by the man for sale or lease and are not materials to be consumed in the business; and because the tools are used for business purposes, not "personal, family, or household purposes," they are not consumer goods. Thus, the tools are "equipment" as the term is defined in UCC Article 9. As a result, the third criterion of an enforceable nonpossessory security interest in goods (that the debtor authenticated a security agreement containing a description of the collateral) is satisfied. UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(A). Moreover, the description meets the standards for a sufficient description of the collateral because it reasonably identifies what is described. UCC § 9-108.

[NOTE: The bank's security interest in the diesel-engine repair tools is also perfected. This issue is addressed in Point Two(c) rather than here because it is not, strictly speaking, necessary for the determination of whether the bank has an enforceable security interest in those tools. Nonetheless, an examinee might address this point in conjunction with answering the first portion of the second call, rather than waiting until analyzing priority. Such an answer should receive full credit.]

Point Two(b) (15%)

The tool seller also has an enforceable security interest in the diesel-engine repair tools because all three statutory criteria are satisfied.

The tool seller also has an enforceable security interest in the diesel-engine repair tools because all three elements of UCC § 9-203(b) are met: value has been given, the debtor has rights in the collateral, and the debtor authenticated a security agreement containing a description of the collateral. (See Points One and Two(a) for more detailed descriptions of these criteria.)

Point Two(c) (45% total weight)

Both the security interest of the tool seller and the security interest of the bank are perfected by the filing of financing statements. Because the tool seller's security interest is a purchase-money security interest in non-inventory collateral, it has priority over the earlier-filed security interest of the bank.

(15% Perfection)

In determining the priority between two secured parties with enforceable security interests in the same assets of a debtor, it is important to determine first whether each of the security interests is perfected. A security interest is perfected if it has "attached" and the applicable additional requirements for perfection are met. UCC § 9-308(a). A security interest attaches when it becomes enforceable unless attachment is postponed to a later time by agreement. UCC § 9-203(a).

Here, both security interests are enforceable and there are no facts to indicate an agreement to postpone attachment, so both security interests attached when they became enforceable. The additional requirement for perfection of a nonpossessory security interest in goods is that a financing statement be filed with respect to the collateral. UCC § 9-310(a). As the facts indicate, both the bank and the tool seller filed properly completed financing statements listing the man as debtor and containing an indication of the collateral. (Under UCC § 9-504, an indication of collateral in a financing statement is sufficient if it satisfies the requirements set out in UCC § 9-108 for description of collateral in a security agreement.) Thus, both the security interest of the bank and the security interest of the tool seller were perfected.

(30% Priority)

Normally, between two secured parties, each of whom has a perfected security interest in the same collateral, priority is determined by the "first to file or perfect" rule of UCC § 9-322(a)(1) ("Priority dates from the earlier of the time a filing covering the collateral is first made or the security interest . . . is first perfected . . ."). Under that rule, the bank's security interest in the diesel-engine repair tools would have priority over the security interest of the tool seller because the bank's financing statement was filed before the tool seller's financing statement was filed.

The priority rule in UCC § 9-322(a)(1) is, however, subject to special rules with respect to purchase-money security interests in UCC § 9-324. The tool seller's security interest is a purchase-money security interest (PMSI), as that term is defined in UCC § 9-103(b)(1), because the collateral secures an obligation to pay the remaining purchase price of the diesel-engine repair tools (a "purchase-money obligation") and thus the collateral is "purchase-money collateral" with respect to the security interest. See UCC § 9-103(a).

Because the tool seller's perfected security interest is a purchase-money security interest and the collateral is not inventory, the special priority rule in UCC § 9-324(a) applies. Under that rule, a perfected purchase-money security interest in goods other than inventory "has priority over a conflicting security interest in the same goods" so long as the interest was perfected "when the debtor receive[d] possession of the collateral or within 20 days thereafter." UCC § 9-324(a). The tool seller delivered the tools to the man on June 10, and it perfected its security interest by filing a financing statement on June 11, one day later. Because the tool seller's security interest was perfected within 20 days of the man's receiving possession of the diesel-engine repair tools, the tool seller's perfected PMSI has priority over the bank's security interest, even though the bank's financing statement was filed earlier than that of the tool seller.

[NOTE: The bank's security interest is not a purchase-money security interest even if funds provided by the bank were used to make the down payment for the tools. That's because the man's obligation to the bank (to repay the loan) was not incurred as part of the purchase price for the tools and nothing indicates that the bank made the loan specifically "to enable the debtor to acquire rights in" the tools. UCC § 9-103(a).]

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did the woman commit armed robbery of the $100 cash?
- (2) Did the woman commit theft of the figurine?
- (3) Did the woman commit criminal possession of stolen property based on possession of the figurine?
- (4) Did the woman's assistant commit criminal possession of stolen property?

DISCUSSION

Summary

There are three reasons why the woman did not commit armed robbery when she took the cash from the homeowner. First, the woman did not commit theft when she received the money from the homeowner because she believed the homeowner was voluntarily paying her for the landscaping services previously provided. Because the woman lacked the mens rea required for theft, and theft is a necessary element of armed robbery, her conduct did not constitute armed robbery. Second, the woman was not carrying a dangerous weapon, as that term is defined in the statute. Third, the woman did not engage in either of the two alternative coercion-related elements of armed robbery: she did not engage in any actual "force, violence, or assault" and she did not intentionally put the homeowner in fear.

The woman did, however, commit theft when she took the figurine. All the elements of theft under State A's law are satisfied. First, the figurine had been in the homeowner's custody, sitting on her front lawn. Second, the homeowner never expressly or impliedly consented to the woman's taking of the figurine. And third, the woman intended to permanently deprive the homeowner of the figurine.

The woman also committed criminal possession of stolen property. After she took the figurine under the circumstances that constituted theft, she was necessarily in knowing possession of stolen property. And by selling the figurine, she demonstrated her intent both to benefit herself and to impede the homeowner's recovery of it.

The assistant committed criminal possession of stolen property. The assistant knew or reasonably should have known that the figurine was stolen because she purchased it under circumstances that would have informed an objectively reasonable person that the woman lacked the right to sell it: she offered to sell it at a cost much lower than the tagged price; the figurine was in new condition; and the woman had quipped, "Just don't ask where I got it."

Point One (35%)

The woman did not commit armed robbery of the $100 cash.

The woman's conduct in removing the cash from the homeowner's hand violated State A's armed-robbery statute only if she engaged in a theft and did so meeting the additional elements of armed robbery as defined by the statute. The woman neither committed theft of the cash nor removed the cash in a manner that meets the additional statutory elements.

State A's armed-robbery statute incorporates its theft statute as the first element of an armed-robbery offense. Theft either expressly or implicitly carries the mens rea element of intent. Here the woman did not intend any unlawful taking, since the facts strongly indicate her belief that the homeowner was voluntarily paying her for the $100 debt owed for landscaping services. The circumstances suggest that the woman accepted cash payment that, from her perspective, the homeowner was voluntarily providing to satisfy an obligation. Thus, the theft element of armed robbery is lacking. Although the homeowner may have thought the woman was stealing from her, the woman lacked the requisite mens rea of intent to steal. See generally, Wayne R. LaFave, Criminal Law § 19.5(d) (6th ed. 2017); and see People v. Butler, 421 P.2d 703, 706 (Cal. 1967) ("It has long been the rule . . . generally throughout the country that a bona fide belief, even though mistakenly held, that one has a right or claim to the property negates felonious intent" to steal). Therefore, under the statute, the woman did not commit armed robbery.

The second element of armed robbery also is lacking here. The facts do not indicate that the woman was "carrying a dangerous weapon" when the alleged taking occurred. Whether the woman's pruning shears are a "dangerous weapon" depends on the statutory definition. State A qualifies an object as a "dangerous weapon" in any of three categories, none of which covers the pruning shears here. The pruning shears do not fall within the first category, as they are not a type of "firearm." As to the second category, although it is true that pruning shears are "capable of producing death or great bodily harm," they are commonly known to be designed for cutting branches as a landscaping or gardening tool, not "for use as a weapon." The pruning shears therefore do not fall in the second category of dangerous weapons. And they do not fit the third and final catch-all statutory category because, although the pruning shears might be "used in a manner likely to produce death or great bodily harm," in this case the woman did not "use" them in that way, as she merely held the shears downward, at her side.

The third element, which can be established by either of two alternative coercive means, also is not met here. Specifically, the woman did not engage in an armed robbery unless, during her alleged theft while using a dangerous weapon, she also either used "force, violence, or assault" or she "put[] the victim in fear of serious injury." Neither of these occurred here. The facts suggest no physical conduct or violent threat that would constitute "force, violence, or assault." The first alternative coercion element is therefore lacking. Regarding the second alternative, although the facts do suggest that the homeowner was in fear, the woman's actions will satisfy the "putting in fear" element only if she actually meant to use force or intended to put the homeowner in fear. See, e.g., LaFave, supra § 20.3(d)(2) (indicating that committing robbery by threat or intimidation requires "purposeful" use of threats or putting in fear). And the facts suggest only that the woman willingly expressed annoyance, not that she engaged in intimidating conduct designed to put the homeowner in fear of any kind, let alone fear of force or violence designed to coerce handing over money. The second coercion element is therefore lacking.

[NOTE: A complete answer to this question should discuss all three elements of armed robbery to receive full credit.]

Point Two (20%)

The woman committed theft when she took the figurine from the homeowner's custody without permission and with intent to permanently deprive her of it.

Whether the woman committed theft when she took the figurine depends on the application of State A's theft statute. "Theft is the unlawful taking and carrying away of property from the person or custody of another, with intent to permanently deprive the owner of the property." The facts here establish that the woman committed theft of the figurine.

The woman took the homeowner's figurine after the homeowner provided cash sufficient to cover the unrelated debt. Understanding that the $100 entirely covered the amount owed for landscaping services and acting without the homeowner's consent, the woman evidenced her intent to steal by the taking. Her culpability is not excused by the suggestion that she felt "entitled" to more than the $100. Context indicates that her supposed entitlement was not in the nature of a legal obligation, as the facts suggest that it arose only from the woman's indignation and her unilateral moral belief that "a tip" or "something extra" was warranted. That the woman did not actually believe she had any legal right to the figurine is also evidenced by the fact that she looked back at the home to ensure that "the homeowner wasn't looking" before she took it. And it is clear that she intended to permanently deprive the homeowner of the figurine because, shortly after taking it, she sold it to her assistant for cash. The woman committed theft when she took the figurine.

Point Three (20%)

The woman committed criminal possession of stolen property of the lawn figurine because she knowingly possessed and then sold the property taken from the custody of another with intent to benefit herself or to impede the recovery of the property by its owner.

Under the State A statute, a person commits criminal possession of stolen property by knowingly possessing stolen property with intent to either benefit herself or a person other than the owner or to impede the owner's recovery of the property. The actus reus of the crime of possession of stolen property is the wrongful possession of that property, regardless of the situation under which such possession was obtained. The mens rea element is the defendant's knowledge that the property was stolen. See, e.g., People v. Hunt, 112 A.D. 781 (App. Div., 4th Dep't, N.Y. 1985) (knowledge that property is stolen is "a necessary element of criminal possession of stolen property"). The actus reus and mens rea elements of criminal possession of stolen property are certainly met here. The woman knew the figurine was stolen property because she had stolen it. And her conduct also meets the additional element of the statute because her selling of the figurine to her assistant establishes either (and in this case both) that she possessed it "to benefit [herself] or a person other than an owner" and that she intended "to impede the recovery by an owner."

[NOTE: In many jurisdictions, a defendant might not be convicted of both the crime of theft and the crime of possession of stolen property under these circumstances, since many states prohibit the conviction (or the punishment) of multiple offenses if they arise from the defendant's singular course of conduct. But those statutes, which raise statutory or constitutional concerns about double jeopardy, are not relevant to the question here, which asks simply whether the woman committed the crimes, not whether she might have some right to avoid being convicted of or punished for them.]

The woman's assistant committed criminal possession of stolen property when she purchased the lawn figurine from the woman under circumstances that would have led a reasonable person to believe that the figurine was stolen.

Again, a person commits criminal possession of stolen property in State A by possessing property knowing the property is stolen or having reason to believe the property is stolen with intent to benefit herself or a person other than the owner or to impede the owner's recovery of the property. The circumstances satisfy the actus reus element of the assistant's crime because she acquired possession of the stolen lawn figurine after she purchased it from the woman. The assistant also acted to benefit herself, as she purchased the figurine in "a great deal" that left her with property greater in value than the amount she paid for it, and she also indicated her intent to sell the figurine "for a hefty profit" to herself.

The circumstances also satisfy the mens rea element of the assistant's crime. This element is met by alternative means under the statute provided, that the defendant possesses property that she either "knows" is stolen property or that she "reasonably should know is stolen property." Although the facts at hand do not establish that the assistant knew the figurine was stolen property, they do establish that the assistant reasonably should have known it was stolen property.

The facts as presented here are silent as to whether the assistant actually knew the figurine was stolen. In most jurisdictions, actual knowledge can be established through circumstantial evidence, and the circumstances here might convince a fact-finder to infer that the assistant actually knew that the figurine was stolen. Under the modern and majority view, this mens rea requirement would be proved from inferences from the surrounding circumstances rather than by direct evidence. See LaFave, supra § 20.2(d) n. 73 (citing United States v. Prazak, 623 F.2d 152 (10th Cir. 1980) (noting that a low price can support the inference that the purchaser knew the property was stolen)); United States v. Werner, 160 F.2d 438 (2d Cir. 1947) (same); State v. Butler, 450 P.2d 128 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1969) (same); State v. Chester, 707 So. 2d 973 (La. 1997) (same). See also People v. Waterford, 124 A.D.3d 1246 (N.Y. App. Div. 2015) (circumstantial evidence sufficient to support conviction of criminal possession of stolen property).

Here, however, it is unnecessary to rely on such inferences, because the facts readily meet the alternative mens rea element. An objectively reasonable person would believe that the lawn figurine was stolen based on the facts that the figurine looked new, it had a $200 price tag (substantially in excess of the $10 asking price), and the assistant heard the woman quip, "Just don't ask where I got it."

ANALYSIS 3 – CORPORATIONS & LLCs

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) As directors of BC, did Amy and Bill have the authority to approve their trip to Belgium at corporate expense?
- (2) Did Amy and Bill violate the duty of loyalty by having the corporation pay for their Belgium trip over Sharon's objection?
- (3) Assuming that Amy and Bill violated the duty of loyalty by having the corporation pay for their Belgium trip, can Sharon personally recover from Amy and Bill all the expenses for that trip paid by BC?
- (4) Assuming that Amy and Bill violated the duty of loyalty by having the corporation pay for their prior trips to Germany, can Sharon bring a derivative claim to recover from Amy and Bill the expenses paid by BC that related to their prior trips to Germany?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Amy and Bill, as a majority of the corporation's board of directors, had the authority in their role as directors to approve the corporation's payment of their travel expenses to Belgium, even though the transaction was a director's conflicting interest transaction (DCIT).

Under the Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA, rev'd 2016), a DCIT is a corporate transaction in which a director has a personal financial interest, raising the question whether they violated their duty of loyalty. By voting to have the corporation pay for their entire trip to Belgium, which included personal sight-seeing, Amy and Bill voted for a DCIT because they had a personal financial interest in the transaction. However, even if the transaction was not approved by disinterested directors or shareholders, payments of the travel expenses would not breach their duty of loyalty because these payments were "fair to the corporation." There is a strong argument that these payments were fair to the corporation. They served a reasonable business purpose (enabling corporate employees to learn about ingredients and brewing techniques) and were comparable to expenses incurred by other competing craft breweries for similar purposes. Furthermore, the payment for Amy's and Bill's visits to museums and historic sites was merely incidental.

Assuming that BC's payment of Amy's and Bill's travel expenses to Belgium was a breach of their duty of loyalty, Sharon may not recover those expenses personally because her suit would vindicate a wrong to the corporation, not to herself.

Even assuming that Amy and Bill violated a duty with respect to the corporation's payments of their prior travel expenses to Germany, Sharon was not a shareholder when these payments occurred, and thus she does not have standing to bring a derivative claim against Amy and Bill related to these payments.

[NOTE: The following analysis is based on the Model Business Corporation Act, as revised in 2016. This revision continues a safe-harbor approach for director self-dealing transactions, one first introduced to the MBCA in 2005. The analysis, however, would be the same under the earlier 2005 version and even the original 1984 version of the MBCA. Thirty-one states have modeled their corporate statute on the MBCA.]

Point One (20%)

Amy and Bill, as members of the corporation's board of directors, had the authority to vote to have the corporation pay their travel expenses to Belgium.

Generally, the corporation's board of directors makes decisions for the corporation. According to § 8.01 of the Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA, rev'd 2016), "Except as provided in a [proper shareholders' agreement], and subject to any limitation in the articles of incorporation . . . , all corporate powers shall be exercised by . . . the board of directors" of the corporation. MBCA § 8.01(b). Among the powers of the corporation is the power to "make contracts [and] incur liabilities." MBCA § 3.02(g). Further, the corporation's board of directors acts by "the affirmative vote of a majority of directors" present at a meeting where there is a quorum present. MBCA § 8.24(c) (board quorum is generally majority of corporation's directors).

Here, all three directors of the corporation were present at a meeting, and a majority of the directors (Amy and Bill) voted to authorize the corporation's payment of their travel expenses to Belgium. Thus, Amy and Bill had the authority to vote to have the corporation pay these expenses. Although this payment constituted a director's conflicting interest transaction (see Point Two(a)), the nature of the payments does not affect Amy's and Bill's directorial authority to vote to have the corporation pay their travel expenses.

Point Two(a) (15%)

The corporation's payment of Amy's and Bill's travel expenses for the trip to Belgium was a "director's conflicting interest transaction" (DCIT).

The MBCA addresses a director's duty of loyalty in corporate transactions where directors have a conflicting financial interest ("director's conflicting interest transaction" or DCIT). See Alan R. Palmiter, Frank Partnoy & Elizabeth Pollman, Business Organizations: A Contemporary Approach 587 (3d ed. 2019) (the "duty of loyalty" is "the duty a director owes when he or she enters into a transaction with the corporation.") A DCIT is any corporate transaction "respecting which . . . the director had knowledge and a material financial interest." MBCA § 8.60. A "material financial interest" means "a financial interest in a transaction that would reasonably be expected to impair the objectivity of the director's judgment" when authorizing the transaction. Id.

Here, the corporation's payment of Amy's and Bill's travel expenses for the trip to Belgium, including any expense for touring museums and historic sites, constituted a DCIT. Amy's and Bill's financial interest in the corporation's payment of their travel expenses to Belgium—of which they were both aware—was a "material financial interest" under the statute given that there is a reasonable assumption that their objectivity about the payment was likely impaired when they approved it. Although they might argue that this travel was not personal, the corporation's payment of their travel expenses to a place that they wanted to visit ("to take in nearby museums and historic sites") would reasonably be expected to impair their objectivity. See MBCA § 8.60, Official Comment 4 (materiality of financial interest measured under objective standard).

[NOTE: Answers describing the payment by the corporation of Amy and Bill's travel expenses as directorial "self-dealing" should receive full credit. A similar analysis would apply in a jurisdiction with an "interested director" statute. See former MBCA § 8.31; Del. GCL § 144 (defining director self-dealing to include "transaction between a corporation and 1 or more of its directors"). Further, under the common law, a transaction with the corporation in which a director has a personal, material financial interest is treated as a self-dealing transaction and subject to heightened judicial scrutiny. See, e.g., Globe Woolen Co. v. Utica Gas & El. Co., 224 N.Y. 483 (N.Y. 1918) (Cardozo, J.) (holding that corporation may void a contract entered into between the corporation and a separate corporation owned by one of its directors, given the directorial conflict of interest).

An answer that analyzes the corporation's payment of Amy's and Bill's travel expenses as a form of "executive or director compensation" should also discuss fairness. Whether characterized as compensation or as a non-compensation transaction with the corporation, the corporation's payment is subject to analysis as a DCIT. See MBCA § 8.61, Official Comment [Note on Directors' Compensation] (explaining that directors' compensation practices "do involve a conflicting interest" and must be acted upon by disinterested shareholders or be shown to be fair to the corporation). That is, the fairness of this payment does not depend on whether it was a form of compensation or merely an "ordinary and necessary" business expense.]

Point Two(b) (25%)

Amy and Bill violated the fiduciary duty of loyalty to the corporation by having the corporation pay their travel expenses to Belgium, unless they can show that the corporation's payment of these expenses was fair to the corporation. Here a strong argument exists that payment of their expenses was fair to BC.

Under the safe-harbor approach of Subchapter F of the MBCA, a DCIT is not subject to a judicial remedy because of the director's conflicting interest if the transaction was approved by informed, qualified directors or informed, qualified shareholders, or, alternatively, is shown to have been fair to the corporation. MBCA § 8.61(b). The MBCA defines a "qualified director" for purposes of a DCIT as a director without a material conflicting financial interest in the transaction and not related to the conflicted director (MBCA § 1.43(a)(4)) and defines "qualified shares" as shares not held by a conflicted director or related person (MBCA § 8.63(c)(ii)). Further, the MBCA defines "fair to the corporation" to mean that the challenged transaction "as a whole was beneficial to the corporation, taking into appropriate account whether it was (i) fair in terms of the director's dealings with the corporation, and (ii) comparable to what might have been obtainable in an arm's length transaction, given the consideration paid or received by the corporation." MBCA § 8.60.

Here, the corporation's payment of Amy's and Bill's travel expenses to Belgium was not approved by Sharon, the only director and shareholder who did not have a conflicting financial interest in the transaction. Thus, the procedural safe harbors for a DCIT approved by informed, qualified directors (MBCA § 8.62) or by informed, qualified shareholders (MBCA § 8.63) do not apply in this case.

Nonetheless, Amy and Bill can show that the corporation's payment of their travel expenses was "fair to the corporation" even though at some level they personally benefited from the payment as well. They could argue that

1. The primary purpose of this travel was similar to the purpose of their earlier travel to Germany at corporate expense, which arguably was reasonable and contributed to the success of their craft brewing business.
2. At a board meeting, they presented their idea for a trip to Belgium at corporate expense and gave Sharon a chance to note any objections, though it is unclear whether Sharon knew of this practice when she became a shareholder.
3. Paying for personnel to travel to Europe to learn about the latest in craft brewing is entirely consistent with the practices of BC's competitors.
4. BC, if for no other reason than being competitive, would have paid these expenses for these purposes regardless of who was employed by BC.
5. While the travel also allowed Amy and Bill to visit museums and historic sites located near the breweries, this benefit was mostly incidental to the other benefits of the trip and most likely benefited BC as well.

These points strongly suggest that Amy and Bill could establish that their dealings with BC were fair and that the corporation's payment of their travel expenses would have happened in an arm's-length transaction.

[NOTE: Examinees who make a well-reasoned argument to the contrary should receive full credit.]

[NOTE: Generally, directors who engage in self-dealing with their corporation violate their duty of loyalty, unless they can prove that the self-dealing transaction was procedurally or substantively fair to the corporation. See Palmiter, et al., supra, at 594 (under modern corporate statutes, "an interested-director transaction will not automatically be void or voidable if either there has been informed, disinterested board approval or informed shareholder approval or the transaction is fair to the corporation"). Thus, absent a showing of procedural or substantive fairness, the presumption of the business judgment rule does not apply to a director self-dealing transaction, and the court "may take such remedial action as it considers appropriate." MBCA § 8.61, Official Comment [Introduction].]

Point Three (20%)

Although Sharon could bring a derivative suit on behalf of the corporation claiming that Amy and Bill violated their duty of loyalty, any recovery would be to the corporation and not to Sharon personally.

Generally, a shareholder may bring a derivative suit to vindicate corporate rights when directors have breached their fiduciary duties to the corporation. See Palmiter, et al., supra, at 503. "[A] derivative suit is an action on behalf of the corporation [that] has historically been the principal method of challenging allegedly illegal action by management." Introductory Comment, Subchapter D (Derivative Proceedings), MBCA §§ 7.40–7.47 (as amended in 1989); see 44 Bus. Law. 543, 548 (1989).

Because a derivative suit is brought on behalf of the corporation to enforce duties owed to the corporation, recovery in a derivative suit generally "inures to the corporation, with the proceeds becoming a part of the corporate assets." James D. Cox & Thomas Lee Hazen, 3 Treatise on the Law of Corporations § 15:4 (3d ed. 2018); see also Keenan v. Eshleman, 2 A.2d 904 (Del. 1938); Wolf v. Rand, 685 N.Y.S.2d 708, 710 (N.Y. App. Div. 1999); Outen v. Mical, 454 S.E.2d 883 (N.C. Ct. App. 1995).

Here, although Sharon could bring a derivative suit claiming that Amy and Bill breached the duty of loyalty that they owed to the corporation with respect to the corporation's payment of their travel expenses to Belgium, any recovery in such a suit would be paid to the corporation and not to Sharon personally.

[NOTE: There are, nonetheless, special circumstances when courts have allowed pro rata recovery by shareholders, thus directly distributing corporate funds to complaining shareholders. These circumstances include when the corporation is in liquidation, when corporate control has been sold, and when the wrongdoers retain control and returning funds to their control would be inequitable. See Cox & Hazen, supra, § 15:4 (summarizing cases). Thus, a complaining shareholder in a derivative suit may be entitled to receive a direct pro rata payment for the damage done to the corporation, rather than participate indirectly in any corporate recovery, when corporate recovery would be inequitable to the shareholder. And, even if there were justification for an exception to the corporate-recovery rule, Sharon's direct recovery would be pro rata based on her 40% ownership stake. That is, there is no basis for Sharon to personally recover all of the damages resulting from any breach of duty by Amy and Bill.]

[NOTE: Discussions of matters such as Sharon's contemporaneous and continuing ownership, the requirement of a demand on the board, or the possibility of the corporation's seeking dismissal of the suit should receive no credit. Although all these matters related to derivative litigation may be relevant under other facts, none were raised by the call in the question. The question asked only that the examinee address what recovery would be appropriate in a derivative suit brought by Sharon against Amy and Bill. Therefore, there is no need to address the issues raised in this Note.]

Point Four (20%)

Even if Amy and Bill violated the duty of loyalty, Sharon does not have standing to bring a derivative claim with respect to Amy's and Bill's travel expenses to Germany. She was not a contemporaneous owner when the corporation paid these expenses.

Under the MBCA, to maintain a derivative suit on behalf of the corporation, the plaintiff-shareholder must be a contemporaneous owner. MBCA § 7.41 (requiring plaintiff in derivative suit have been shareholder "at the time of the act or omission complained of"). The purpose of the rule is to "align the plaintiff's economic interests with the corporate interest to be advanced by the diligent prosecution of the suit." Cox & Hazen, supra § 15:9. Further, as the Official Comment to MBCA § 7.41 explained when the section was first added, "The Model Act and the statutes of many states have long imposed a "contemporaneous ownership" rule." See Changes to MBCA, 44 Bus. Law. 543, 548 (1989). Although a few state statutes have relaxed this rule for subsequent purchasers "in limited circumstances," the MBCA's retention of the contemporaneous-ownership rule "was based primarily on the view that it was simple, clear, and easy to apply" and exceptions to the rule might encourage the acquisition of shares to bring a lawsuit. Id.

Here, Sharon was not a shareholder in the corporation when Amy and Bill had the corporation pay their travel expenses to Germany. Thus, even if these payments violated the duty of loyalty to the corporation, Sharon cannot enforce that duty in her derivative suit.

[NOTE: An answer that asserts that Amy and Bill, as sole shareholders, cannot have violated any duties to the corporation at the time of the corporation's payment of their travel expenses to Germany should receive no credit for this point. The question asked the examinee to assume there was a violation, and such payments might have constituted unlawful distributions if they would have rendered the corporation insolvent. See MBCA § 6.40(c) (no distribution permitted if "the corporation would not be able to pay its debts as they become due in the usual course of business").]

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) As to the purchase of the yellow chairs:
 - (a) Is Peter bound by the contract signed by Angela with the furniture store?
 - (b) Is Angela bound by the contract she signed with the furniture store?
- (2) As to the used cargo bike, can Angela recoup from Peter the $8,000 that she paid to the bike shop for it?
- (3) As to the pizza oven, is Peter bound by the contract signed by Angela?

DISCUSSION

Summary

As to the 50 yellow chairs, Peter is not bound by the contract with the furniture store because Angela entered into that contract without actual or apparent authority. Angela, on the other hand, is bound by the contract with the furniture store because she was a party to the contract acting on behalf of an undisclosed principal.

As to the used cargo bike, Peter ratified the purchase of the bike. Therefore, Angela is entitled to be reimbursed for the cost of the bike because she is deemed to have acted with actual authority by virtue of Peter's ratification of the purchase.

As to the pizza oven, Peter is bound by the contract for the pizza oven because Angela acted with apparent authority when signing the contract on behalf of Peter and the price paid under the contract was a fair price.

Point One(a) (30%)

Peter is not bound by the contract that Angela signed with the furniture store because Angela had neither actual nor apparent authority to purchase the yellow chairs on Peter's behalf.

An agent binds a principal to a contract entered into between the agent and a third party if the agent acts with actual or apparent authority. Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.01 (2006), accord, Restatement (Second) of Agency § 140 (1958).

Actual authority "is created by a principal's manifestation to an agent that, as reasonably understood by the agent, expresses the principal's assent that the agent take action on the principal's behalf." Restatement (Third) of Agency § 3.01, accord, Restatement (Second) of Agency § 26. Here, Peter and Angela had no discussion about purchasing yellow chairs. To the contrary, Peter authorized Angela to purchase only red chairs for him, and Angela acknowledged this limitation when she said, "I fully understand. Agreed." Angela thus lacked actual authority to purchase the yellow chairs.

Furthermore, Angela did not act with apparent authority in purchasing the yellow chairs. "Apparent authority . . . is created by a person's manifestations that another has authority to act with legal consequences for the person who makes the manifestation, when a third party reasonably believes the actor to be authorized and the belief is traceable to the manifestation." Restatement (Third) of Agency § 3.03, accord, Restatement (Second) of Agency § 27. Here, there is nothing in the facts to indicate that Peter manifested any consent to the store owner for Angela to act as his agent or for her to purchase yellow chairs on his behalf.

Thus, because Angela lacked both actual and apparent authority to purchase yellow chairs on Peter's behalf, Peter is not bound by the contract that Angela signed with the furniture store for the purchase of yellow chairs.

Angela is bound by the contract she signed with the furniture store for the purchase price of the yellow chairs because she entered into the contract on behalf of an undisclosed principal, and thus she is a party to the contract.

As noted above, Angela acted without actual or apparent authority in purchasing the yellow chairs and thus her contract with the furniture store is not binding upon Peter. On the other hand, Angela is personally liable to the seller on that contract. An agent who enters into a contract on behalf of an undisclosed principal is a party to the contract. Restatement (Third) of Agency § 6.03(2), accord Restatement (Second) of Agency § 322. Here, given that the store owner had no notice that Angela was acting as an agent for any other person and, furthermore, that Angela signed the chair contract in her name alone, Peter is clearly an undisclosed principal. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 4(3), accord, Restatement (Third) of Agency § 1.04(2)(b).

Thus, Angela is bound by the contract for the yellow chairs.

Point Two (25%)

Under the Restatement (Third) of Agency, Peter ratified the contract for the purchase of the used cargo bike and thus is obligated to reimburse Angela for the $8,000 she paid for the bike. Under the Restatement (Second) of Agency, Peter, an undisclosed principal, cannot ratify the contract.

"Ratification is the affirmance of a prior act done by another, whereby the act is given effect as if done by an agent acting with actual authority." Restatement (Third) of Agency § 4.01(1). Under the Third Restatement, an undisclosed principal, as here, may ratify an unauthorized act of an agent where the agent acts for the principal even though the agent did not purport to act for the principal. Id. § 4.03 cmt. b. This rule is contrary to the Restatement (Second) of Agency, which requires an agent to "purport" to act on behalf of the ratifier in a transaction in order for the act to be ratifiable. See Restatement (Second) of Agency § 85(1).

Here Angela did not initially have actual authority to buy a used cargo bike because she and Peter discussed only the purchase of a new electric bike. However, when Peter decided to keep the used cargo bike because, after a two-day trial, he decided he liked its carrying capacity, he effectively ratified the contract under the Third Restatement. As noted in Restatement (Third) of Agency § 4.01, cmt. b, [t]he act of ratification consists of an externally observable manifestation of assent to be bound by the prior act of another person. . . . [W]hen a person ratifies another's act, the legal consequence is that the person's legal relations are affected as they would have been had the actor been an agent acting with actual authority at the time of the act.

Peter's ratification thus created retroactive actual authority for Angela's purchase of the used cargo bike on his behalf.

Because the effect of Peter's ratification was retroactively to create actual authority for Angela's purchase of the cargo bike, Peter has a duty to indemnify Angela for the purchase. A principal has a duty to indemnify an agent when the agent makes a payment "(i) within the scope of the agent's actual authority, or (ii) that is beneficial to the principal." Restatement (Third) of Agency § 8.14. Here, Angela's payment for the used cargo bike ($8,000) was thus within the scope of her actual authority as Peter's agent, and this purchase was beneficial to him (as principal). Thus, Peter must reimburse Angela the $8,000 she paid for the used cargo bike.

Under the Second Restatement, as noted above, because Peter was an undisclosed principal, he could not ratify the contract. The reason for this rule is as follows:

Where there is a transaction between the purported agent and a third person, one reason for allowing ratification to be effective as prior authorization is to give to the other party what the other expected to get in dealing with the agent. This reason does not exist if the other party does not intend to deal with the principal. It does exist, however, when an act is done which is purported to be the principal's act or done on his account, even though the other party to the transaction knows that it is not the principal's act or done with his authority.

Restatement (Second) of Agency § 85 cmt. a.

This rule is rejected by the Third Restatement, which provides the following rationale:

First, the limitation [restricting ratification to disclosed principal or partially disclosed principals] is not necessary to prevent a person who is a stranger to a transaction from attempting to claim its benefit by ratifying. An undisclosed principal is not a stranger to the agent. Second, whether to ratify is a choice an undisclosed principal should be free to make Finally, the fact that a third party does not expect the undisclosed principal's liability at the time the agent acts is no more persuasive an argument against ratification than it is against the general proposition that a third party may hold an undisclosed principal liable The third party is not disadvantaged by recognizing ratification by an undisclosed principal. When a principal is disclosed or unidentified, and the agent's act does not bind the principal, the principal's ratification may result in the loss of claims the third party could otherwise assert against the agent for breach of warranties of authority. . . . Offsetting the loss is the principal's assent to be bound by the agent's act. When a principal is undisclosed, the third party has no claims for breach of warranties of authority against the agent. An undisclosed principal's ratification does not eliminate the agent's liability to the third party on the transaction because an agent for an undisclosed principal has such liability when acting with actual authority. . . . The effect of ratification is to add the undisclosed principal as a party with rights and obligations stemming from the transaction.

Restatement (Third) of Agency § 4.03 cmt. b.

[NOTE: Examinees may receive full credit for using either of the two contrary approaches.]

Point Three (25%)

Peter is bound by the contract for the pizza oven because Angela acted with apparent authority when signing the contract on behalf of Peter.

An agent binds a principal to a contract entered into between the agent and a third party if the agent acts with actual or apparent authority. See Point One(a).

Here, Angela lacked actual authority to purchase the pizza oven for $15,000. In their conversation, Peter made clear that Angela was to purchase the pizza oven for no more than $12,000.

Nonetheless, a principal can be bound by the acts of another acting without actual authority when the other acts with apparent authority. "Apparent authority is the power held by an agent . . . to affect a principal's legal relations with third parties when a third party reasonably believes the actor has authority to act on behalf of the principal and that belief is traceable to the principal's manifestations." Restatement (Third) of Agency § 2.03, accord, Restatement (Second) of Agency § 8. "Apparent authority . . . is created by a person's manifestations that another has authority to act with legal consequences for the person who makes the manifestation, when a third party reasonably believes the actor to be authorized and the belief is traceable to the manifestation." Restatement (Third) of Agency § 3.03. Accord, Restatement (Second) of Agency § 27.

Here, Peter told the restaurant equipment supplier, "I am going to open a pizza parlor next month. I have asked my sister Angela to come to your store to purchase a pizza oven on my behalf for the pizza parlor." This statement is sufficient to support the conclusion that Angela had apparent authority to purchase the pizza oven on Peter's behalf. Furthermore, Angela's authority to purchase a pizza oven included the authority to spend $15,000 for the oven because that amount was a fair price for a pizza oven. Therefore, the restaurant equipment supplier could reasonably believe that Angela was authorized to agree on Peter's behalf to purchase a pizza oven at that price. See generally Restatement (Second) of Agency § 49. See also Restatement (Third) of Agency § 2.03, cmt. c.

Thus, Peter is bound by the contract to purchase the pizza oven.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) May the bank reach Bob's interest in present and future distributions of trust income to satisfy its judgment against Bob?
- (2) May Bob's former wife reach Bob's interest in present and future distributions of trust income to satisfy her judgment against Bob?
- (3)(a) What is the proper classification of Daughter's power of appointment created in clause 3 of the trust?
- (3)(b) Is it likely that an appointment of trust principal by Daughter to Settlor's twins would be effective?
- (3)(c) If Daughter fails to exercise her power of appointment, to whom would the trust principal pass upon her death?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Because the trust instrument provides Bob with "spendthrift protection," the bank, an ordinary creditor, cannot attach Bob's interest in present or future distributions of trust income in satisfaction of its $20,000 judgment against him. However, under the Uniform Trust Code, child support creditors are "exception creditors" against whom spendthrift protection is not available; thus, Bob's former wife could reach Bob's interest in present or future trust income in satisfaction of the child's right to unpaid child support.

Daughter was granted a special testamentary power of appointment (sometimes called a "nongeneral" power). That power permits her to appoint trust assets only in her will and only to "her heirs at law." It is unlikely that Settlor's twins would be Daughter's heirs at law because she has two living children and one living grandchild (Bob's five-year-old child). Because the trust instrument fails to specify takers in default of appointment, if Daughter fails to exercise that power, the trust assets subject to Daughter's special power should be distributed to the permissible objects of the power, who are Daughter's heirs at law.

Point One (20%)

The bank, as an ordinary creditor, cannot reach Bob's interest in present and future distributions of trust income in satisfaction of its $20,000 claim against Bob because that interest is subject to a spendthrift clause.

The trust provides "spendthrift protection" for its beneficiaries: under the spendthrift clause in the trust instrument, no beneficiary may assign his income interest, nor is such interest subject to the claims of creditors. Spendthrift protection is valid under the Uniform Trust Code and in virtually all United States jurisdictions. The validity of a spendthrift clause typically requires that the trust restrain both voluntary and involuntary transfer of a beneficiary's interest. See Unif. Trust Code § 502 cmt. When a trust provides spendthrift protection, an ordinary creditor may not reach the beneficiary-debtor's interest in present or future distributions from the trust. Unif. Trust Code § 502(c). See also Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 58(1); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§ 152–53.

Here, the trust's spendthrift clause prohibits both voluntary and involuntary transfers. It is thus valid and precludes the bank from reaching Bob's interest in present and future distributions from the trust.

Point Two (30%)

Bob's former wife, a creditor of unpaid child support (a so-called "exception creditor") may reach Bob's interest in present or future distributions to satisfy unpaid child support.

An ordinary creditor of a trust beneficiary with spendthrift protection is precluded from reaching a beneficiary-debtor's interest in present or future distributions to or for the benefit of that beneficiary. Unif. Trust Code § 501. See Point One. On the other hand, so-called "exception creditors" are those who may reach the beneficiary-debtor's interest in "present or future distributions to or for the benefit of the beneficiary." Unif. Trust Code § 503(c). Under the Uniform Trust Code, a parent who has obtained a judgment for unpaid child support is an exception creditor and thus can reach the beneficiary-debtor's interest in present or future distributions from the trust. Id. §§ 503(b)(1) & (b)(2). See also Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 157(a); Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 59(a) (interest of creditor of unpaid child support can "reach" the beneficiary-debtor's interest "in satisfaction of an enforceable claim" against that beneficiary).

Here, because Bob's ex-wife has obtained a judgment for child support against Bob, she is an exception creditor who could reach Bob's interest in present or future distributions of trust income.

Point Three(a) (10%)

Under the trust instrument, Daughter received a special testamentary power of appointment.

Powers of appointment may be general or special. A general power is one that permits the appointee to appoint to himself, his creditors, the creditors of his estate, or his estate. Unif. Powers of Appointment Act § 102(6). All other powers are special powers of appointment, also known as nongeneral powers. Melanie E. Leslie & Stewart Sterk, Trusts and Estates 145 (2006). The donor of a power (either general or special) may limit the time and manner in which the power may be exercised. For example, the donor of the power may specify that it may be exercised only during the donee's lifetime or only in his will. Id. at 146–47.

Here, the trust instrument does not permit Daughter, the donee of the power, to exercise it in favor of herself, her creditors, or her estate. The instrument also specifies that she must exercise the power by her will. Thus, Daughter received a special testamentary power of appointment.

Point Three(b) (25%)

An individual's heirs at law are determined by the laws of intestate succession and not by the individual's will. In all states, an intestate's half-siblings (like the twins) are not heirs of an intestate if the intestate dies with surviving descendants. Therefore, an appointment of trust assets to Settlor's twins will be ineffective unless Daughter dies without any living descendants, which seems unlikely here.

The donee of a special power may appoint only to those persons named by the donor as permissible objects. Other persons are "impermissible objects," and the donee may not appoint to them. See generally William M. McGovern, Sheldon F. Kurtz & David M. English, Wills, Trusts, and Estates 481–482 (4th ed. 2010).

The trust instrument expressly limits Daughter's power to appoint to her heirs at law; she may not appoint to anyone else. An "heir" or "heir at law" refers to a person who takes a share of an intestate's estate under a state's law of intestate distribution. Unif. Probate Code § 1-201(20); see also Bryan Garner, Garner's Dictionary of Legal Usage 274 (3d ed. 2011) (distinguishing "heir" from "devisee"). Heirs thus cannot be determined until an individual has died. Garner, supra, at 405; Estate of Woodworth, 22 Cal. Rptr. 2d 676 (Cal. Ct. App. 1993). And, because an heir is determined by an intestate distribution statute, the existence of a will is irrelevant to determining heirship. See Garner, supra. In all states, an intestate's half-siblings (such as the twins here) are not heirs if the intestate dies with surviving descendants. In the vast majority of states, the existence of a surviving spouse will also preclude the decedent's siblings from becoming heirs. Jesse Dukeminier, Robert H. Sitkoff & James Lindgren, Wills, Trusts, and Estates 74–77 (8th ed. 2006) (describing intestate distribution schemes).

Daughter has two children, Ann and Bob, and one grandchild. Because it is likely that one or more of Daughter's children and grandchildren will survive Daughter, it is unlikely that Settlor's twins, Daughter's half-siblings, will be her heirs.

Point Three(c) (15%)

When the donee of a special power of appointment fails to exercise that power and the trust instrument (as here) fails to specify takers in default of appointment, assets subject to the special power ordinarily are distributed to the permissible objects of the power. Here, the permissible objects of the power would be Daughter's heirs. Therefore, if Daughter died survived by one or more descendants, those descendants would be her heirs and the trust principal would be distributed to them.

When the donee of a special power fails to exercise the power, the assets pass to the takers in default of appointment, i.e., those individuals named in the instrument creating the power (here the trust instrument) as takers in the event the power is not exercised.

But when, as here, the trust instrument fails to specify takers in default of appointment, assets subject to a special power ordinarily pass under an implied default gift to the permissible appointees of the power living when the power lapses, if "(1) the permissible appointees are a defined and limited class and (2) the donor has not manifested an intent that the permissible appointees shall receive the appointive property only so far as the donee elects to appoint it to them." Restatement (Third) of Property: Wills and Other Donative Transfers § 19.23(b); Loring v. Marshall, 484 N.E.2d 1315 (Mass. 1985). Only when these requirements are not met will "the unappointed property pass[] under a reversionary interest to the donor or to the donor's transferees or successors in interest." Restatement (Third) of Property, supra.

Here, Settlor conferred on Daughter a special power of appointment over trust principal but did not specify takers in default of appointment. Daughter's power is testamentary; i.e., it may only be exercised by Daughter's will. It is also "special," i.e., Daughter may not appoint to herself, her creditors, her estate, or the creditors of her estate. Thus, the permissible appointees of Daughter's special power will take if they "are a defined and limited class" and if Settlor has not manifested an intent to grant them the property subject to the power only if Daughter elects to do so.

The permissible appointees of the power created by Settlor are "Daughter's heirs." Although Daughter's heirs cannot be identified with particularity now, her heirs will be clear at her death, when the power she possesses will lapse if she fails to exercise it. The permissible objects of the power thus meet the "defined and limited class" requirement. The trust instrument does not manifest any intent that permissible appointees only receive property if Daughter elects to appoint it to them; it says nothing at all on this topic. If Daughter fails to exercise her power, the trust assets thus would almost certainly pass to Daughter's heirs and would not revert to Settlor's estate.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) What body of law governs the transaction between Buyer and Seller?
- (2)(a) Is there a contract arising from the January 9 agreement?
- (2)(b) Is the contract enforceable by Buyer against Seller?
- (3) Does the contract require Seller to deliver the silk to Buyer?
- (4) Is Buyer entitled to damages of $20,000?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The transaction here is a transaction in goods, and is therefore governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code.

The January 9 telephone call was sufficient to create a contract, but, because the contract price was $500 or more, the contract is not enforceable against Seller unless the Article 2 statute of frauds is satisfied. Here, because both Buyer and Seller are merchants, that statute of frauds is satisfied. This is because Buyer's signed note to Seller was sufficient to enable Seller to enforce the contract against Buyer, and Seller's failure to object within 10 days after receiving the note makes the contract enforceable against Seller.

While the oral agreement was silent as to delivery obligations, which would normally mean that tender was to take place at Seller's place of business, the parties' prior course of dealing, in which Seller repeatedly delivered silk to Buyer at no extra charge, supplements the oral agreement and results in a requirement that Seller deliver the silk to Buyer. Thus, Seller's failure to deliver the silk to Buyer is a breach of contract, entitling Buyer to damages.

Buyer made a covering purchase in substitution for the 10,000 yards of silk that would have been acquired from Seller. The price Buyer paid is $2 more per yard than the contract price with Seller, for a total cost of $120,000. Therefore, Buyer is entitled to damages of $20,000 from Seller.

Point One (5%)

The transaction between Seller and Buyer is governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code.

Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code (2002) governs transactions in goods. UCC § 2-102. "Goods" are "all things . . . movable at the time of identification to the contract for sale" UCC § 2-105(1). Under this definition, the silk constitutes goods. Therefore, UCC Article 2 governs this transaction.

Point Two(a) (10%)

The telephone call of January 9 was sufficient to form a contract for the sale of 10,000 yards of silk by Seller to Buyer on February 1 at a price of $10 per yard.

"A contract for the sale of goods may be made in any manner sufficient to show agreement." UCC § 2-204(1). Moreover, "[e]ven though one or more terms are left open[,] a contract for sale does not fail for indefiniteness if the parties have intended to make a contract and there is a reasonably certain basis for giving an appropriate remedy." UCC § 2-204(3). Here, the facts make it clear that there was an agreement between Seller and Buyer for the sale of 10,000 yards of silk by Seller to Buyer. In addition, even though some terms typically found in a contract for the sale of goods (such as delivery obligations, risk of loss, etc.) were not present in this agreement, it is clear that the parties intended to make a contract and there is a reasonably certain basis for determining an appropriate remedy. See Point Four below. Therefore, there is a contract arising from the January 9 telephone call.

Point Two(b) (40%)

The contract arising from the January 9 telephone call is enforceable against Seller. While the contract is subject to the statute of frauds in Article 2 of the UCC, the statute is satisfied here even though there is no writing signed by Seller. This is because both parties are merchants and, accordingly, the signed note sent by Buyer to Seller one day after their agreement and not objected to by Seller within 10 days of receipt is sufficient to satisfy the statute against Seller.

Section 2-201, the UCC Article 2 statute of frauds, provides that a contract for the sale of goods for a price of $500 or more is not enforceable unless there is a writing signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought that is sufficient to indicate that a contract for sale has been made between the parties. UCC § 2-201(1). In addition, the contract is not enforceable beyond the quantity shown in the writing. Id. This is generally interpreted to mean that a writing without a quantity term does not suffice. See, e.g., id., Official Comment 1, paragraph 1. Here, the contract price is well above $500, so the Article 2 statute of frauds is applicable. The note signed by Buyer is sufficient to indicate that a contract has been made between Buyer and Seller. Even though the note is informal and does not state most of the terms of the contract, it clearly indicates that a contract has been entered into. In addition, the note states the quantity term of the contract: 10,000 yards of silk. Thus, because this note was signed by Buyer, it would be sufficient to enable Seller to enforce the contract against Buyer.

But Seller is not trying to enforce the contract against Buyer. Rather, Buyer is trying to enforce the contract against Seller. UCC § 2-201(1), standing alone, would result in Buyer's being unable to enforce the contract against Seller because there is no writing signed by Seller. But the rule in UCC § 2-201(1) is subject to the other provisions in § 2-201. In particular, UCC § 2-201(2) provides that, between merchants, a writing in confirmation of a contract, sent by one party within a reasonable time and received by the other, that is sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds as to the sender, is also sufficient against the recipient if the recipient had reason to know of its contents, unless the recipient objects in writing within 10 days of receipt. Here, both parties are "merchants" as that term is defined in UCC § 2-104(1) because they both "deal in goods of the kind"—Seller regularly manufactures and sells bulk silk and Buyer routinely buys this silk for use in its manufacturing business. Thus, the transaction is "between merchants." UCC §§ 2-104(3) and 2-201(2) apply.

Each of the elements of UCC § 2-201(2) is satisfied. First, Buyer's signed note was sent the day after the agreement, and there is nothing in the facts suggesting that one day was not a reasonable time. Second, Seller received Buyer's note. Third, as explained above, the note was sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds against the sender (Buyer). Fourth, the recipient (Seller) had reason to know of the contents of the note—Seller read the note. Fifth, the facts do not indicate that Seller objected to the contents of the note within 10 days of its receipt. Therefore, the note signed by Buyer is sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds against Seller as well.

While the parties' agreement was silent as to any requirement to deliver the silk, the parties' prior course of dealing establishes that Seller had an obligation to deliver the silk to Buyer.

Both the oral agreement between the parties and Buyer's note were silent as to delivery obligations. In the absence of agreement to the contrary, UCC § 2-308(a) provides that the place for delivery is the seller's place of business. If this "gap-filling" provision applied, Seller would have no obligation to deliver the silk to Buyer. But UCC §§ 2-202(a) and 1-303(d) provide that the agreement of the parties may be supplemented by the parties' "course of dealing." UCC § 1-303(b) defines "course of dealing" as "a sequence of conduct concerning previous transactions between the parties to a particular transaction that is fairly to be regarded as establishing a common basis of understanding for interpreting their expressions or other conduct." Here, there is such a sequence of conduct concerning prior transactions. The facts state that the parties had engaged in over 250 purchases of silk over the last six years, and in each of these transactions, Seller delivered the silk to Buyer at no extra charge. Thus, this course of dealing, making it clear that delivery of the silk was the parties' common expectation, supplements the oral agreement (which did not indicate whether there was a delivery obligation). Accordingly, Seller had an obligation to deliver the silk to Buyer.

Point Four (25%)

Buyer is entitled to damages of $20,000 because that is the difference between the cost of its covering purchase of silk from Dealer and the price it would have paid Seller under the contract.

Seller's failure to deliver the silk to Buyer was a breach of its obligations under the contract between them. UCC § 2-711(1) provides that, where the seller fails to make delivery, the buyer may, inter alia, "cover" and have its damages measured under UCC § 2-712. Under that section, an aggrieved buyer "may 'cover' by making in good faith and without unreasonable delay any reasonable purchase of . . . goods in substitution for those due from the seller." UCC § 2-712(1). If the buyer does so, it may recover from the seller the difference between the cost of cover and the contract price, together with incidental and consequential damages. UCC § 2-712(2).

Here, the facts state that Buyer made a good-faith and commercially reasonable purchase from Dealer two days after the breach, so each of the elements in UCC § 2-712(1) is satisfied. (Nothing in the facts suggests that two days was an unreasonable delay.) Accordingly, Buyer can recover the difference between the cost of cover (10,000 yards of silk at $12 per yard, for a total of $120,000) and the contract price (10,000 yards of silk at $10 per yard, for a total of $100,000). Thus, Buyer is entitled to $20,000 in damages. (Buyer would also be entitled to incidental and consequential damages, but the call directs examinees to assume that there are no incidental or consequential damages. Under UCC § 2-712(2), expenses saved in consequence of Seller's breach must be subtracted from the amount of damages, but the facts do not suggest that any such expenses were saved.)

QUESTION 1 – EVIDENCE

Four months ago, Victim was shot and seriously wounded in City. Defendant has been charged with attempted murder. The prosecution's theory is that Victim and Defendant were both members of a criminal street gang called "The Lions," which engages in drug dealing, robbery, and murder in City. The prosecutor alleges that the shooting was the result of a gang dispute.

Defendant has brought a pretrial motion objecting to the prosecutor's introducing the following anticipated evidence:

(A) Testimony by a City detective who will be offered as an expert in gang identification, gang organizational structure, and gang activities generally and as an expert on particular gangs in City. The detective is expected to testify as follows:

I have been a detective on the police force for six years. Throughout that time, my primary assignment has been to investigate gangs and criminal activity in City. I have also worked closely with federal drug and firearm task forces as they relate to gangs. Prior to becoming a detective, I was a corrections officer in charge of the gang unit for City's jail for three years, and my duties included interviewing, investigating, and identifying gang members.

Throughout my career, I have attended training sessions providing education and information on gang structure, membership, and activities. As I've gained experience and knowledge in this area, I've frequently been asked to lead such sessions. I would estimate that I've taught more than 75 such training sessions over the past three years.

Street gangs generally engage in a wide variety of criminal activities. They usually have a clear leadership structure and strict codes of behavior. Absolute loyalty is required and is enforced through violent acts. Members of particular gangs can be identified by clothing, tattoos, language, paperwork, or associations.

I am quite familiar with "The Lions." It is one of City's most violent and feared criminal gangs. Members of The Lions can be identified by tattoos depicting symbols unique to the gang.

(B) Testimony by a former leader of The Lions concerning a photograph of Defendant's tattooed arm. After the photograph is authenticated as a photograph of Defendant's arm, the witness is expected to testify in part as follows:

I am certain that this is a Lions tattoo. I had a similar one removed. You'll notice that it has a shield containing the numbers for the police code for homicide, and Lions' members frequently include police codes in their tattoos to indicate crimes the gang has committed. The tattoo also has a shotgun and sword crossed as an "X," and a lion. Those are symbols frequently used by The Lions. This tattoo indicates to me, based on my experience, that Defendant is a member of The Lions gang.

(C) Testimony by Victim, who is expected to testify for the prosecution in part as follows:

I got into an argument with a gang boss at a meeting of The Lions. I said I wouldn't participate in an attack that was planned on another gang because my cousin was in that gang. The boss looked at Defendant and nodded to him. Next thing I knew, after the meeting, Defendant pulled a gun on me and shot me. I'm sure he did it because of that argument.

The jurisdiction has adopted rules of evidence identical to the Federal Rules of Evidence. Defense counsel's motion raises the following objections to the evidence described above:

1. The detective's anticipated testimony about gang identification, organization, and activities is improper expert testimony.
2. The photograph of Defendant's tattoo and the former gang leader's anticipated testimony about it is inadmissible character evidence.
3. Victim's anticipated testimony that Defendant shot him because of a gang dispute is irrelevant.

How should the trial court rule on each objection? Explain. (Do not address constitutional issues.)

QUESTION 2 – CONTRACTS

Five years ago, Seller started a small winery that catered to a regional market. The winery became wildly successful. Two years ago, Seller decided to retire and sell the winery. Seller entered into negotiations with Buyer, who was interested in buying a winery. Seller was proud that the label for her red wines bore her picture so, during the negotiations, she told Buyer that she would not sell him the winery unless he agreed to continue using that label. Seller and Buyer orally agreed that if Seller sold the winery to Buyer, he would continue to use the label for as long as he sold red wines.

Buyer and Seller agreed that Buyer would buy the winery from Seller for a purchase price of $3 million plus a "fair share" of the profits generated by the winery during the first year after it was acquired by Buyer. While they did not agree on the precise share of the first-year profits that Buyer must pay to Seller, Buyer said that 20% would be fair, while Seller said that 25% would be fair.

Buyer and Seller entered into and signed a lengthy written agreement. It stated that, in exchange for the assets of the winery, Buyer would pay Seller $3 million at the closing and, 15 months later, a "fair share of the winery's profits" during Buyer's first year of ownership. It also stated that Seller was not permitted to own or operate a winery anywhere in the United States for 10 years after the closing, a term that Seller was happy to accede to because she intended to retire. The agreement did not include any provision about future use of the red wine label with Seller's picture and did not contain an "integration" or "merger" clause.

After Seller transferred ownership of the winery to Buyer, Buyer continued to sell red wines but discontinued using the label with Seller's picture. When Seller complained about this, reminding Buyer of his oral agreement to continue using the label, Buyer said, "The agreement we both signed doesn't say anything about the label."

Fifteen months after the closing, Buyer sent Seller $10,000, which was equal to 5% of the winery's profits during the first year of his ownership. Seller emailed Buyer, complaining about the low amount of the payment and reminding Buyer that they had both understood that a "fair share" of the first-year profits would be in the 20–25% range. In response, Buyer pointed out that the agreement that they had signed did not say that a "fair share" of the profits would be that high.

Fed up with Buyer, Seller came out of retirement and opened and began operating a winery in another state in the United States far from her original winery.

In litigation between the parties:

1. Is Seller's and Buyer's oral agreement that Buyer would use Seller's picture on red wine labels enforceable even though it was not included in the written agreement? Explain. (Do not discuss any potential statute of frauds issues.)
2. Could Seller introduce evidence of the negotiations about what would constitute a fair share of the winery's first-year profits to help explain the meaning of that term? Explain.

3. Assuming that Buyer is not in breach of any of his obligations under the purchase agreement, would Buyer prevail on a claim that Seller breached her obligations under the agreement by opening her new winery? Explain.

Assume for all questions that, in the jurisdiction whose law governs the dispute, the sale of an ongoing business is governed by the common law of contracts, not Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code.

QUESTION 3 – CORPORATIONS & AGENCY

Brian, a home builder, and Danielle, a land developer, properly formed a corporation. The articles of incorporation state that the corporation's purpose is to pursue property development opportunities and any other lawful business. Brian owns 20% of the corporation's shares, and Danielle owns 80%. Under their shareholders' agreement, Brian and Danielle serve as directors on the corporation's three-member board of directors, and Danielle selects the third director.

Shortly after the corporation's formation, the corporation (following unanimous board approval) purchased a parcel of land for $5 million for the purpose of dividing it into residential lots and constructing a single-family home on each lot. The board also decided that (1) Brian would be responsible for the construction of all homes on the parcel, (2) Danielle would be responsible for securing the financing necessary to build the homes, and (3) the proceeds from home sales would be paid to the corporation. After setting a reasonable salary for Brian during the home-construction period, the board agreed to periodically consider whether to issue dividends.

The board unanimously authorized Danielle to hire Carol, a consultant, to negotiate financing agreements on behalf of the corporation with several banks. Danielle asked Carol to act on behalf of the corporation to obtain the loans, and Carol agreed to do so.

The first bank that Carol contacted declined to provide financing to the corporation but offered instead to buy the parcel for $6 million. Without discussing any of this with any of the corporation's directors, Carol signed a written agreement with the bank on behalf of the corporation to sell the parcel to the bank for $6 million.

The next day, Carol informed Danielle about the terms of the sale agreement with the bank. Danielle agreed with Carol that the deal was in the corporation's best interest and properly called a special meeting of the board to approve it.

At the special meeting three days later, Carol described to the board the terms of the agreement. Danielle and the third director voted to approve the land sale under the terms of the written agreement signed by Carol. Brian voted against approving the sale. Danielle and the third director then voted to distribute all the sale proceeds to Danielle as a "bonus payment." Brian, who would receive no payment from the sale, properly made a request to see all accounting records related to the purchase and sale of the parcel. But the board refused Brian's request, with Danielle and the third director voting against it.

The corporation was incorporated in a jurisdiction whose corporation statute is modeled on the Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA).

1. Is the corporation bound by the land-sale agreement with the bank signed by Carol? Explain.
2. Was the bonus payment made to Danielle, which was approved by a majority of the board of directors, proper? Explain.
3. Does Brian have sufficient grounds to seek the judicial dissolution of the corporation? Explain.

QUESTION 4 – TRUSTS / DECEDENTS' ESTATES

Ten years ago, Arlene Doe, age 34, signed and dated a "Declaration of Trust," the pertinent part of which provided as follows:

I, Arlene Doe, do hereby create the Arlene Doe Trust (AD Trust). I name myself sole Trustee of the trust. I reserve the right to all trust income during my lifetime. Upon my death, all trust assets shall be paid in equal shares to my three nieces Carla, Donna, and Edna. I declare that this trust applies to all assets listed in Schedule A, attached hereto.

In Schedule A, Arlene wrote, "I have not transferred any assets to this trust yet, but I will before I die."

The trust instrument had no provision regarding whether it was revocable or irrevocable.

Four years ago, Arlene bought bonds with her personal funds and revised Schedule A to list them as assets of the trust.

Two years ago, Arlene wrote across the face of the Declaration of Trust for the AD Trust, "This AD Trust is revoked" and "I'm taking back the assets."

One year ago, Arlene gave her friend a package containing a valuable necklace and the bonds. As she handed her friend the package, Arlene said, "This package contains a valuable necklace and bonds. I revoked the AD Trust because I decided that I want my niece Donna to have everything I own except what I'm giving to a worthy cause in my will. Hold this package as trustee for Donna. When Donna reaches age 18, sell the necklace and bonds, use the proceeds to pay for Donna's college education, and then give her what's left over when she reaches age 22." The friend said, "Okay."

Later, Arlene properly executed a will naming a bank as executor of her estate and as trustee of a perpetual trust created under her will. This testamentary trust directed that "all of my worldly goods not otherwise validly disposed of during my life, I leave in trust for the Political Party. I direct the trustee to pay all income from this trust, annually, to the Political Party and not to any other person." The Political Party's exclusive mission is to support candidates for public office who accept its political views.

Last month, Arlene died. At Arlene's death, she owned a bank account with a balance of $300,000. The bonds in the package given to Arlene's friend were worth $200,000, and the necklace was worth $50,000. Arlene was survived by her younger brother Bob, her three nieces Carla, Donna, and Edna (the only children of Arlene's deceased sister), and her nephew Fred (the only child of Arlene's deceased older brother). Donna is 16 years old.

The jurisdiction in which Arlene died has adopted the Uniform Trust Code. It also applies the common law Rule Against Perpetuities. Another statute in this jurisdiction provides, "If a decedent died intestate without a surviving spouse, issue, or parent, the decedent's property is distributed to the issue of his or her parents per stirpes."

1. (a) Was the AD Trust validly created, and if so, when was it created? Explain.
(b) Assuming that the AD Trust was validly created, was it effectively revoked? Explain.
2. Was the trust for the benefit of Donna valid? Explain.
3. Was the testamentary trust for the benefit of the Political Party valid? Explain.
4. Assuming that the testamentary trust to Political Party is invalid, to whom should the bank account be distributed? Explain.

QUESTION 5 – CIVIL PROCEDURE

Developer LLC is a limited liability company organized in State A, with its principal place of business in State A. Its only two members are Amy, a domiciliary of State A, and Barbara, a domiciliary of State B. Amy is the managing member of Developer.

Developer entered into a written construction contract with Builder Co., a State B corporation with its principal place of business in State B. Builder agreed to build an office building for Developer on a vacant lot owned by Developer in State A. Lender Corp., a finance company, agreed to lend Developer up to $2 million to finance the construction project. Lender is incorporated in State A with its principal place of business in State A.

Lender disbursed $250,000 of the loan amount to Builder to cover the down payment on the construction contract. The loan agreement between Developer and Lender provided that any funds disbursed by Lender under the loan agreement would be added to Developer's loan balance and repaid, with interest, over a five-year period.

As construction of the office building proceeded, Lender made disbursements to Builder pursuant to the loan agreement between Lender and Developer. But when Builder finished construction of the office building, Lender refused to make the final $100,000 disbursement to Builder even though Developer had occupied the building and had begun leasing space to tenants. Lender told Developer that it was refusing to authorize the final disbursement because Builder's construction was "substandard." Developer also has not made final payment to Builder.

Builder has sued Lender in federal district court in State A, invoking the court's diversity jurisdiction. Builder's complaint alleges that Lender's withholding of the final payment of $100,000 violated the loan agreement with Developer. Builder claims to be a third-party beneficiary of Lender's promise to Developer, entitled to payment of $100,000 from Lender.

Lender has moved to dismiss the action on the ground that Developer is a required party to the action and has not been joined as a defendant.

1. Is Developer a person "required to be joined if feasible" to the Builder v. Lender action under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19(a)? Explain.
2. Would joinder of Developer deprive the court of subject-matter jurisdiction? Explain.
3. Assuming that Developer cannot be joined, how should the court rule on the motion to dismiss? Explain.

QUESTION 6 – REAL PROPERTY

In 2015, Oscar validly conveyed an apartment building that he owned to my grandson Frank and his heirs so long as at least four apartments in the apartment building are rented to families with incomes below the state median income for a family of their size. If at any time fewer than four apartments are being rented to below-median-income families, the apartment building automatically reverts to Oscar.

In 2017, Oscar died owning the family home. His valid will included the following provisions:

1. I give my family home to my new wife, Wanda, for life, and upon her death to my daughter, Adele, and her heirs.
2. I give the entire residue of my estate to my wife, Wanda.

In 2020, Adele died. Pursuant to her valid will, Adele left her entire estate to Frank.

Before her death, Adele had regularly paid the property taxes on the family home because she believed that Wanda could not afford them. After Adele died, Frank told Wanda that he would not pay the property taxes because "they are your responsibility, Wanda."

Wanda accurately asserts that she cannot afford to pay the $6,000 annual property tax out of her limited income. Frank accurately observes, however, that if Wanda moved out of the home and rented it to another, she could generate at least $1,500 per month in rental income, more than enough to pay the property tax.

Until February 1, 2021, Frank had leased four apartments in the building to below-median-income families. On that date he validly and lawfully terminated the leases of all tenants in the building to begin his plan to convert all the apartments in the building to luxury apartments. As a result, beginning February 1, 2021, no apartments in the building were being rented to below-median-income families.

On February 7, 2021, Wanda learned what had happened and immediately told Frank, "I now own the building."

The jurisdiction has adopted the Uniform Statutory Rule Against Perpetuities.

1. As between Wanda and Frank, who is obligated to pay the property taxes on the family home? Explain.
2. Upon conveying the apartment building to Frank, what if any interest did Oscar have in the apartment building, and was that interest valid? Explain.
3. Upon Oscar's death, what if any interest does Wanda have in the apartment building, and is that interest valid? Explain.
4. After February 1, 2021, who owns the apartment building? Explain.

ANALYSIS 1 – EVIDENCE

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

EVD (II.A.; II.C., D; V.A.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is the detective properly qualified as an expert, and if so, is his anticipated testimony properly admitted as expert testimony?
- (2) Is the photograph of Defendant's tattoo and the former gang leader's anticipated testimony about the tattoo inadmissible character evidence or admissible non-character, other act evidence?
- (3) Is Victim's anticipated testimony describing his dispute with a gang boss and the boss's head nod to Defendant relevant to Defendant's motive, intent, and/or identity?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The detective's expert testimony is admissible because (1) the detective is qualified as an expert witness, (2) the detective's testimony will be helpful to the jury, (3) the detective's testimony will be based on sufficient facts, and (4) the detective will reliably apply reliable principles to the facts.

Evidence of the tattoo and the former gang leader's anticipated testimony about the tattoo are inadmissible character evidence if used to demonstrate that Defendant, as a member of a criminal street gang, has a violent and criminal predisposition and thus is more likely to have committed attempted murder. However, if the government offers the evidence as non-character, other act evidence to prove that Defendant is a member of "The Lions" and thus more likely to be the shooter in this case, the court may overrule the objection and admit the photograph of the tattoo and the former gang leader's testimony about it.

Victim's anticipated testimony about Defendant's motive is relevant to establish that Defendant acted with intent. It is also circumstantially relevant to establish Defendant's identity as the perpetrator of the attempted murder.

Point One (35%)

Defense counsel's objection should be overruled and the detective's testimony should be admitted because (1) the detective is qualified as an expert witness, (2) the detective's testimony will be helpful to the trier of fact, (3) the detective's testimony will be based on sufficient facts, and (4) the detective will reliably apply reliable principles to the facts.

The first issue is whether the detective's expert testimony is admissible under Federal Rule of Evidence 702, the rule governing expert opinion testimony. Rule 702 states:

A witness who is qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training or education may testify in the form of an opinion or otherwise if:

- (a) the expert's scientific, technical or other specialized knowledge will help the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue;
- (b) the testimony is based on sufficient facts or data;
- (c) the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods; and
- (d) the expert has reliably applied the principles and methods to the facts of the case.

Fed. R. Evid. 702.

First, the detective has sufficient knowledge, experience, and training to testify as an expert witness on the subject of gangs generally and "The Lions" gang specifically. The detective (1) has been a detective for six years, (2) has the primary assignment of investigating gangs, (3) has previously been a corrections officer in charge of the gang unit for three years, (4) has attended training sessions on gangs, (5) has taught 75 training sessions on gangs, (6) has knowledge of how gangs operate, and (7) has specific knowledge of "The Lions" gang. In similar cases, courts have found that this level of knowledge, experience, and training is sufficient to render a law enforcement officer an expert on gangs. See, e.g., Smith v. Commonwealth, 454 S.W.3d 283, 285–86 (Ky. 2015).

Second, under Rule 702(a), the detective's testimony will help the trier of fact understand the dynamics of "The Lions" gang. Under Rule 702(a), the question is "whether the untrained layman would be qualified to determine intelligently and to the best possible degree the particular issue without enlightenment from those having a specialized understanding of the subject involved in the dispute." Fed. R. Evid. 702, Adv. Comm. Notes. Courts have found that laypersons are not qualified to understand the inner workings of organized crime and that expert testimony by someone with knowledge of how gangs operate, including the specific gang at issue, is thus helpful to the trier of fact. See United States v. Rios, 830 F.3d 403, 413–14 (6th Cir. 2016).

Third, under Rule 702(b), the detective's testimony will be based on sufficient facts or data. The detective (1) has interviewed, investigated, and identified gang members and (2) is quite familiar with "The Lions." Courts have found that this type of knowledge about gangs generally and a particular gang specifically is enough to satisfy Rule 702(b). See, e.g., Duncan v. City of San Diego, No. 3:17-cv-00052-BTM-MDD, 2019 WL 1772435, at *2 (S.D. Cal., April 22, 2019).

Fourth, under subsections (c) and (d), the detective will reliably apply reliable principles and methods to the facts of the case. "If the witness is relying solely or primarily on experience, then the witness must explain how that experience leads to the conclusion reached, why that experience is a sufficient basis for the opinion, and how that experience is reliably applied to the facts." Fed. R. Evid., 702 Advisory Comm. Notes to 2000 Amendment. Here, the detective will explain how his experience as a detective and corrections officer leads to the detective's conclusions about gang identification, organization, and activities. Courts have found that this type of explanation is sufficient to satisfy subsections (c) and (d). See, e.g., United States v. Augustin, 661 F.3d 1105, 1125–26 (11th Cir. 2011); United States v. Batts, 171 Fed. Appx. 977, 983 (4th Cir. 2006).

Point Two (35%)

The photograph of Defendant's tattoo and testimony about it is inadmissible if offered as propensity character evidence but may be admissible to prove Defendant's membership in the gang and motive to harm its enemies.

The second issue is whether the photograph of Defendant's tattoo and the former gang leader's testimony about it is admissible to establish that Defendant was a member of The Lions gang. Federal Rule of Evidence 404(a)(1) states that "[e]vidence of a person's character or character trait is not admissible to prove that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with the character or trait." Under this rule, evidence of a defendant's propensity to engage in criminal behavior is inadmissible to establish the defendant's likely conformity with that propensity at the time of the crime charged. Moreover, Rule 403 provides that "[t]he court may exclude relevant evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by a danger of one or more of the following: unfair prejudice, confusing the issues, misleading the jury, undue delay, wasting time, or needlessly presenting cumulative evidence."

Courts have held that evidence of a defendant's gang tattoos is inadmissible when used by the prosecution to establish the defendant's gang membership as a means toward establishing the defendant's propensity for committing crimes. When offered for such purposes, such evidence is propensity character evidence under Rule 404(a)(1) and its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Rule 403. See, e.g., United States v. Thomas, 321 F.3d 627, 631 (7th Cir. 2003) (quoting United States v. Irvin, 87 F.3d 860, 865 (7th Cir. 1996) ("[W]e have found tattoos inadmissible when they are only admitted to show membership in a gang, because [of] 'the possibility that a jury will attach a propensity for committing crimes to defendants who are affiliated with gangs or that a jury's negative feelings toward gangs will influence its verdict.'")).

Conversely, Rule 404(b)(2) states that evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts "may be admissible for another purpose, such as proving motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, absence of mistake, or lack of accident." Courts have held that evidence of a defendant's gang tattoos to establish the defendant's membership in a gang is admissible under Rule 404(b)(2) and Rule 403 to show that the defendant was the member of a joint venture or conspiracy (the gang). See United States v. Suggs, 374 F.3d 508, 517 (7th Cir. 2004) ("Tattoos that help to establish gang membership are admissible to support a showing of a joint venture or conspiracy."); United States v. Lewis, 910 F.2d 1367, 1372 (7th Cir. 1990) (finding evidence of the defendant's gang tattoos admissible "to establish a joint venture"). There is also case support for the prosecutor's argument that evidence of gang membership may be relevant and admissible to show motive. See United States ex rel. Hairston v. Warden, 597 F.2d 604, 607–08 (7th Cir. 1979) (finding evidence of the defendant's gang membership relevant and admissible to help establish motive for a murder).

If the prosecution offers the tattoo as "other act" evidence under Rule 404(b)(2) to prove Defendant's membership in a particular gang (The Lions), as explained through the former gang leader's trial testimony, such evidence would help to establish Defendant's potential motive as a result of his role in the gang (see Point Three), and his identity as the shooter. In such circumstances, if the Court finds, under Rule 403 that the probative value of the photograph of the tattoo is not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, the court may admit the evidence as other act, non-p propensity identity evidence under Rule 404(b)(2).

Point Three (30%)

Victim's anticipated testimony describing his dispute with a gang boss and the boss's head nod to Defendant is relevant to show that Defendant had the mens rea for attempted murder (intent to kill). It also circumstantially helps prove Defendant's identity as the perpetrator of the attempted murder.

The third issue is whether Victim's anticipated testimony about his dispute with the gang boss and the gang boss's subsequent head nod to Defendant is relevant. "Evidence is relevant if: (a) it has any tendency to make a fact more or less probable than it would be without the evidence; and (b) the fact is of consequence in determining the action." Fed. R. Evid. 401. "Relevant evidence is admissible" unless otherwise inadmissible pursuant to constitutional provisions or some other rule. Fed. R. Evid. 402.

The anticipated evidence helps establish a possible motive for Defendant's alleged violence against Victim: enforcement of gang loyalty or resolution of a gang dispute. Evidence of motive is generally admissible in murder and attempted murder cases because the question of whether the defendant intended to kill the victim is a fact of consequence in determining the action, and the defendant's motive to kill the victim makes this fact more probable. Cf. State v. Matthews, 471 N.E.2d 849, 852 (Ohio Ct. App. 1984) ("Motive is generally relevant in all criminal cases since it is assumed that human behavior is prompted by a desire to achieve specific results."). In addition, evidence of motive is circumstantially relevant to prove identity because it has some tendency to make it more probable that Defendant rather than another individual (i.e., someone not in the gang) shot Victim.

[NOTES: (1) Motive is not an element of the crime of attempted murder that must be proven to convict Defendant, so examinees should not receive credit for an answer claiming relevance on the basis that motive is an element of attempted murder. (2) The gang boss's head nod to Defendant is arguably hearsay (a nonverbal assertion made out of court). However, the question asks only whether the testimony about this event is relevant, and Defendant has made no hearsay objection. Thus, examinees should not receive credit for discussion of the hearsay issue.]

ANALYSIS 2 – CONTRACTS

CTR (I.B.; II.E.; III.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is Buyer bound by his oral agreement to use the label with Seller's picture, even though that agreement did not appear in the subsequent written agreement between the parties?
- (2) May Seller introduce evidence of the discussion and negotiations with Buyer about what would constitute a "fair share" of the winery's first-year profits to help explain the meaning of that term?
- (3) Is Seller's promise not to open another winery for 10 years anywhere in the United States an unreasonable restraint on trade that is unenforceable as a matter of public policy?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The signed agreement to sell the winery did not contain Buyer's oral agreement to continue the use of the label containing the picture of Seller. Under the parol evidence rule, if the signed agreement, which appears to be integrated, is inconsistent with the prior oral agreement, the prior agreement is discharged and, therefore, evidence about that prior agreement would not be admissible. But the signed agreement to sell the winery does not appear to be inconsistent with the oral agreement to continue to use the label. Accordingly, the oral agreement is not discharged (and evidence of it is admissible to supplement the written agreement) unless the writing is completely integrated (adopted as a complete and exclusive statement of the terms of the agreement). Here, while it is a close call, the writing does not appear to be completely integrated.

The signed agreement also included the vague phrase that Buyer would pay Seller a "fair share" of his first year's profits, a term susceptible to a spectrum of meanings. The parol evidence rule does not apply to issues of contract interpretation, and evidence as to the meaning of vague or ambiguous terms can be introduced even if the contract is integrated. Thus, the common understanding of Buyer and Seller that a "fair share" of the winery's first-year profits would be in the 20–25% range can be admitted to explain the intended meaning of that term.

Seller's covenant not to compete, which was national in scope and had a 10-year duration, is likely an unreasonable restraint of trade. The covenant is broader than was necessary to protect Buyer's legitimate business interest in establishing his winery in the regional market, and thus it does not appear to be narrowly tailored to protect this interest. Thus, it is likely that the covenant will be stricken as against public policy.

Point One (40%)

The parol evidence rule probably would not prevent enforcement of Buyer's oral agreement to use the label with Seller's picture. As an integrated agreement, the written agreement would discharge the prior oral agreement to use the label if the written agreement were inconsistent with that oral agreement, but it is not inconsistent with it. If the written agreement is completely integrated, it would discharge the prior oral agreement, but although it is a close call, the written agreement does not appear to be completely integrated.

Generally, under the common law parol evidence rule, a "binding integrated agreement discharges prior agreements to the extent that it is inconsistent with them." Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 213. An integrated agreement is a writing constituting a final expression of one or more of the agreed terms of a contract. See id. § 209(1). The parol evidence rule is a rule of substantive contract law (and not evidence law) to determine the impact of a written agreement on prior and contemporaneous related agreements. See id. § 213, cmt. a. The rule nonetheless has evidentiary effects. One such effect is that "evidence of prior or contemporaneous agreements or negotiations is not admissible in evidence to contradict a term of the writing" that is a binding integrated agreement. Id. § 215. If, however, the integrated agreement is consistent with the prior agreement, evidence of the prior agreement may be admitted unless the integrated agreement is also "completely integrated." Id. § 216(1). A written agreement is considered to be integrated if it constitutes a final expression of one or more terms of an agreement and is considered to be completely integrated if the parties adopted the writing as a complete and exclusive statement of their agreement. See id. §§ 209(1), 210(1).

Here, there is a prior oral agreement that Buyer would continue to use the label with Seller's picture. There is nothing in the facts, however, to suggest that any of the terms of the written agreement are inconsistent with a promise to use the label. Thus, even though the written agreement is clearly integrated, inasmuch as it constitutes the parties' final expression of many terms, the prior oral agreement remains effective unless the written agreement is completely integrated. This is because a binding, completely integrated agreement discharges prior agreements to the extent that they are within the scope of the completely integrated agreement. Id. § 213(2). The absence of a provision in the contract to the effect that it is intended as a complete and exclusive statement of the terms of the parties' agreement (usually referred to as an integration clause or merger clause) is consistent with a conclusion that the parties did not intend that the writing be such a complete and exclusive statement, but it is not determinative.

The document was lengthy and may have been intended by the parties to be complete and exclusive, even without an express integration or merger clause. But it will not be found to be completely integrated if the agreement to use the label with Seller's picture "might naturally have been omitted from [the writing]." Id. § 216(2)(b). If the written agreement contained terms about similar matters, such as product labeling and product marketing, it would be harder to conclude that the agreement to use the label with the picture might naturally be omitted from the writing. The question, however, states that the document did not contain any other provisions relevant to the use of the label. Thus, although the issue is close, a court could conclude in the circumstances that the agreement about the use of the label might naturally have been omitted from their writing, and thus, that the written agreement was not completely integrated.

Accordingly, although a close question, it appears that the written agreement was not completely integrated and therefore did not discharge the prior oral agreement about the use of the label with Seller's picture. Thus, Seller could enforce Buyer's agreement to continue use of the label.

[NOTE: The issue of whether the written agreement is completely integrated is a close one and could be argued either way. Accordingly, the strength of an examinee's analysis on this point is more important than the conclusion reached by the examinee. It should be noted that, although the parol evidence rule is a substantive rule of contract law, it is often phrased in terms of whether evidence of the prior agreement may be used to supplement or contradict the writing. See, e.g., UCC § 2-202. An examinee who frames the analysis in evidentiary terms and otherwise analyzes the question well should receive credit.

Some examinees may note that the parol evidence rule does not exclude evidence that the parties orally agreed that performance of their agreement is subject to the occurrence of a stated condition. This is correct (see Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 217) but not apposite. The doctrine primarily applies to situations in which performance of the written agreement is subject to an oral requirement of a condition not within the control of either party. See id. cmt. a. Thus, the doctrine applies to the existence of conditions to the parties' obligations under the agreement, not to their agreed obligations themselves. Moreover, the dispute here is not about the existence of the condition (Seller told Buyer that she would not sell him the winery unless he agreed to continue using the label with Seller's picture for red wines) but, rather, about the obligation to which Buyer agreed ("Seller and Buyer orally agreed that if Seller sold the winery to Buyer, he would continue to use the label for as long as he sold red wines.")]

Point Two (30%)

Seller may introduce evidence about the parties' negotiations that demonstrates a common understanding of Buyer and Seller that a "fair share" of the winery's first-year profits would be in the 20–25% range.

Generally, extrinsic evidence may be proffered for the purpose of clarifying a vague or ambiguous term in a written contract. "[A]greements and negotiations prior to or contemporaneous with the adoption of a writing are admissible in evidence to establish . . . the meaning of the writing, whether or not integrated." Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 214(c).

Here, the meaning of "fair share of the winery's profits" in the parties' written agreement is indefinite and vague, susceptible to a spectrum of meanings. Evidence about the parties' negotiations showing the parties had a common understanding that a "fair share" of the first-year profits would be more than 5% of those profits and instead would be in the 20–25% range will help resolve the vagueness of "fair share" and establish that a payment of only 5% of those profits is inconsistent with the meaning given to that term by the parties. The ambiguity in this case is obvious (patent), and there is no need for examinees to discuss the "plain meaning" or "four corners" rule, which is applied by courts in some states to exclude extrinsic evidence of the parties' intended meaning unless the agreement is ambiguous on its face. See Greenfield v. Philles Records, Inc., 780 N.E.2d 166 (N.Y. 2002).

[NOTE: Some examinees, like some commentators, may describe this point as being a branch of the parol evidence rule. While, strictly speaking, this rule of contract interpretation is distinct from the parol evidence rule, an examinee who labels the analysis of this question as such a branch and otherwise analyzes the question well should receive credit.]

Point Three (30%)

The covenant not to compete appears to be an unreasonable restraint on trade and thus would be unenforceable as a matter of public policy. The restraint's long duration and broad geographic scope appear to be greater than needed to protect Buyer's legitimate business interests.

A promise that unreasonably restrains trade may be unenforceable on grounds of public policy. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 186(1). Whether a restrictive covenant, including a covenant not to compete, is unreasonable requires a balancing of interests. If the restraint is greater than what is needed to protect a party's legitimate business interest, it violates public policy. Id. § 188(1)(a). In deciding whether to enforce a covenant not to compete, the courts generally consider the reasonableness of the covenant's duration and geographic scope. See, e.g., BDO Seidman v. Hirshberg, 712 N.E.2d 1220 (N.Y. 1999) (noncompete must be reasonable as to duration and geographic reach, and its restrictions may be no greater than necessary to protect legitimate interests). Generally, covenants not to compete are disfavored, though less so when enforced by the buyer against the seller of a business. See Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 16600, 16601 (invalidating all covenants not to compete, except against equity owners in the sale of a business).

Here, Buyer has a legitimate interest in not having the value of the winery and its good will diminished by Seller's competitive activities. Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 188(2)(a). Buyer has an interest in establishing himself in the business before being subjected to such competition. This interest, however, is limited to the regional market in which the winery has operated. The covenant's national prohibition appears to be unreasonably broad. See Novelty Bias Bindings Co. v. Shevrin, 175 N.E.2d 374 (Mass. 1961) (enforcing covenant limited to designated states where company operated and competed). Thus, the covenant would not be enforceable to prevent Seller from opening a winery in another state far away from the original winery.

Further, the covenant's 10-year duration would seem to be overly broad and give Buyer more time than needed to establish himself in the business. See, e.g., Property Tax Assocs., Inc. v. Staffeldt, 800 S.W.2d 349, 351 (Tex. App. 1990) (noting that "courts of this state have upheld restrictions ranging from two to five years as reasonable"). According to the facts, Seller had been able to establish her winery business in well under five years.

Although a more precisely tailored covenant not to compete might be viewed as reasonable, such as one limited to less than five years and to the regional market to which the winery catered, traditionally courts will not rewrite covenants that are unreasonably broad to make them reasonable. See generally Ferrofluidics Corp. v. Advanced Vacuum Components, Inc., 968 F.2d 1463 (1st Cir. 1992) (noting that while some courts take an "all or nothing" approach to noncompete covenants and void the entire covenant if any part is unenforceable, other courts are willing to (1) enforce the reasonable terms of such a clause if the covenant "remains grammatically coherent once its unreasonable provisions are excised" or (2) reform the clause and enforce the covenant to the extent it is reasonable unless the "circumstances indicate bad faith or deliberate overreaching on the part of the [party who would benefit from the covenant]"). And even if the noncompete covenant here were rewritten, it would not prevent Seller from starting another winery in a state far away from the original winery.

[NOTE: There are additional factors, beyond duration and geographic scope, for determining the enforceability of a covenant not to compete. Among these other factors are whether the party sought to be bound might gain a competitive advantage by exploiting confidential information about the other party's operations or trade secrets, or use of sensitive proprietary information such as customer/client lists, business practices, upcoming products, and marketing plans. See Ticor Title Ins. Co. v. Cohen, 173 F.3d 63, 70 (2d Cir. 1999). None of these additional interests, however, are mentioned in the facts.]

ANALYSIS 3 – CORPORATIONS & AGENCY

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

COR (VI.; VII.; VIII.F.) / AGC (I.; II.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is a corporation bound when its board of directors ratifies a transaction previously entered into by the corporation's agent acting without authority?
- (2) Is a bonus payment to a majority shareholder proper when it was neither approved by a majority of qualified directors nor fair to the corporation?
- (3) Does a minority shareholder in a close corporation have sufficient grounds to seek judicial dissolution of the corporation when the corporation's majority shareholder (a) takes actions that contravene the corporation's purpose, (b) engages in unfair self-dealing, and (c) refuses to allow the minority shareholder to inspect the corporation's accounting records?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The land-sale agreement signed by Carol is binding on the corporation. Although Carol (agent) originally lacked actual or apparent authority to bind the corporation (principal) to the land-sale agreement, the corporation became bound by the board's subsequent ratification of the agreement at a properly called meeting at which a majority of the directors approved the transaction after full disclosure.

The bonus payment to Danielle was not proper. The payment, a director's conflicting interest transaction, was not properly approved by a majority of qualified directors because Danielle was financially interested in the transaction and thus was not qualified to approve the transaction. Nor is there any indication Danielle would be able to show that the payment was fair to the corporation. Thus, the bonus payment constituted a breach of Danielle's fiduciary duty of loyalty.

It is likely that Brian has sufficient grounds to seek judicial dissolution of the corporation. In this close corporation, the actions by the majority shareholder in disposing of the corporation's primary asset in apparent contravention of the corporation's purpose, in approving the payment of a bonus only to herself, and in voting to deny Brian's access to the corporation's accounting records likely constitute "oppression" under the MBCA. Thus, Brian likely has sufficient grounds to seek judicial dissolution of the corporation.

[NOTE: The following analysis is based on the Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA), as revised in 2016. The analysis, however, would be the same under the earlier 2005 version and even the original 1984 version of the MBCA. Thirty-one states have modeled their corporate statutes on the MBCA.]

Point One (40%)

The corporation is bound on the land-sale agreement with the bank. Although Carol, as the corporation's agent, did not initially bind the corporation because she lacked actual or apparent authority, the corporation became bound by the subsequent ratification of the agreement by a majority of the directors at a properly called board meeting after full disclosure.

(15%) Agency

Agency is the fiduciary relationship that arises when one person (a "principal") manifests assent to another person (an "agent") that the agent shall act on the principal's behalf and subject to the principal's control, and the agent consents so to act. Restatement (Third) of Agency § 1.01; Restatement (Second) of Agency § 1.

If an agency relationship exists, an agent who makes a contract with a third party on behalf of a disclosed principal binds the principal to the contract if the agent acted with actual or apparent authority. Actual authority may be express or implied. Actual express authority arises where a principal expressly causes an agent to believe that she has been empowered to act on the principal's behalf. Actual implied authority is the authority that an agent has to take actions that are reasonably necessary to carry out the principal's express instructions. Both types of authority focus on communications between the principal and the agent. By contrast, apparent authority exists when a principal's communications to a third party cause the third party to reasonably believe that an agent is authorized to act, even if the principal and the purported agent never so agreed.

Here, a valid agency relationship was created between the corporation and Carol. The corporation (principal), through a unanimous vote of the corporation's board of directors, authorized Danielle to hire Carol as a consultant (agent) to act on its behalf to secure financing agreements. See MBCA § 8.01(b) (providing that "all corporate powers shall be exercised by or under the authority of the board of directors of the corporation").

Despite the existence of an agency relationship between the corporation and Carol, Carol did not bind the corporation to the land-sale agreement with the bank because she lacked authority. Carol lacked actual express authority to make the contract because she was hired to secure financing agreements on behalf of the corporation, not land-sale agreements. Actual implied authority is also absent because selling the land to the bank was not reasonably necessary to carry out Carol's express instructions to secure financing agreements.

Apparent authority was absent because there is no indication that the corporation communicated to the bank in any way that would cause the bank to reasonably believe that Carol was authorized to contract to sell the corporation's land on its behalf. Nor is there evidence of industry custom or a prior course of dealing between the corporation and the bank that would reasonably suggest that an agent in Carol's position had the power to bind the corporation to a land-sale agreement.

(25%) Ratification

Even when an agent lacks actual or apparent authority to bind the principal, ratification can cure this lack of authority. Ratification is the affirmance of a prior, nonbinding act done by another, whereby the act is given effect as if done by an agent acting with actual authority. § 4.01; Restatement (Second) of Agency § 82. A person ratifies an act by accepting the results of the act with an intent to ratify, and with full knowledge of all the material circumstances surrounding the act.

Here, because Carol lacked actual or apparent authority to enter into the land-sale agreement, the agreement was not binding on the corporation at the time it was entered into. However, after Carol fully disclosed all material terms of the agreement to the directors, a majority of the corporation's directors (Danielle and the third director) at a properly called special meeting expressly accepted the agreement and thus ratified it. See MBCA § 8.22 (special meetings of the board must be preceded by two days' notice). There is no indication that the corporation's articles, bylaws, or shareholders' agreement required unanimous agreement for such a sale. Thus, the action by the majority of the corporation's directors is binding on the corporation. See MBCA § 8.24(a) (board quorum generally consists of a majority of directors); § 8.24(c) (if quorum is present, "affirmative vote of a majority of directors present is the act of the board"). Accordingly, through this board action, the corporation became bound by the agreement to sell the land to the bank pursuant to the terms negotiated by Carol.

Point Two (40%)

The bonus payment to Danielle was not proper. The payment was a director's conflicting interest transaction, and it was not approved by a majority of qualified directors and cannot be shown to be fair to the corporation. Thus, the payment constitutes a breach of Danielle's fiduciary duty of loyalty.

The MBCA defines a "director's conflicting interest transaction" (DCIT) as a transaction effected by the corporation to which a director is a party. MBCA § 8.60(i). Although the common law treated such director self-dealing transactions as null and void, modern courts and statutes will uphold such a transaction if it is properly approved by informed, disinterested directors or shareholders. See MBCA § 8.62(a) (safe harbor for DCIT approved by qualified directors), § 8.63(a) (safe harbor for DCIT approved by qualified shareholders). Absent such approval, the transaction may nonetheless be upheld "if the [conflicted] director shoulders the burden of showing the transaction was fair" to the corporation. See Introductory Note, MBCA Subchapter F: Directors' Conflicting Interest Transactions. Fairness can be shown if the director's self-dealing transaction was "beneficial" to the corporation and "on terms comparable to what might have been obtained in an arm's length transaction." Official Comment, Fair to the Corporation, MBCA Subchapter F. The normal presumption under the "business judgment rule" that directors act in the best interests of the corporation does not apply to cases of director self-dealing. See Official Comment, Note on Directors' Liability, MBCA § 8.31.

Here, the bonus payment by the corporation only to Danielle constituted a "director's conflicting interest transaction" or a DCIT. See MBCA § 8.60(i) (defining DCIT to include any transaction "effected by the corporation . . . to which . . . the director is a party"). The transaction, which was approved only by Danielle and the third director, does not fit the safe harbor for approval by a majority vote (no less than two) of "qualified" directors. MBCA § 8.62(a). Even if the third director was qualified, Danielle was not qualified because of her financial interest in the bonus payment. See MBCA § 1.43 (defining "qualified" director as one having no conflicting interest in the transaction and no "material relationship" with a director having such an interest). Thus, the payment was not approved by a majority of qualified directors.

Furthermore, there is no indication that the corporation was benefited by making a bonus payment to only Danielle or that such payment was made on terms comparable to those that would have been obtained in a market transaction. There is no indication that Danielle provided any services that warranted a bonus payment. Nor is there any indication that such bonus payments normally occur in other corporations. In effect, the bonus payment here was undeserved, excessive compensation to the corporation's controlling shareholder. Therefore, Danielle cannot show that the bonus payment was fair to the corporation. MBCA § 8.61(b)(3).

As a result, Danielle violated her fiduciary duty of loyalty both by receiving from the corporation a financial benefit to which she was not entitled and by dealing unfairly with the corporation. See MBCA § 8.31(a)(2)(v) (director liable for "receipt of a financial benefit to which the director was not entitled or any other breach of the director's duties to deal fairly with the corporation"); see also Official Comment to MBCA § 8.31 (as amended in 2005) [Note on Business Judgment Rule] ("A director is expected to observe an obligation of undivided loyalty to the corporation [as to any] financial benefit to which a director is not properly entitled"). Further, Brian will likely be able to show that the bonus payment, for which the corporation apparently received nothing in return, caused harm to the corporation. See MBCA § 8.31(b).

[NOTE: The bonus payment could also be characterized as an illegal distribution, that is, the payment of a dividend not made on a pro rata basis to all shareholders of the same class. See MBCA § 1.40 (defining "distribution" as transfer of money or other property "to . . . the benefit of its shareholders" in respect of any of their shares). See also MBCA § 14.07(d)(2) (specifying that distributions in dissolution be pro rata); § 6.23 (specifying that share dividends be pro rata). An examinee who concludes that the payment was improper because it was an illegal, non-pro-rata distribution should receive full credit.]

[NOTE: The question asks only whether the bonus payment was proper and does not ask whether Danielle (or even the third director) is also liable to the corporation for this DCIT. Although it might be argued that the third director violated his fiduciary duties by approving the bonus payment to Danielle without reasonably believing it to be in the best interests of the corporation and for lacking objectivity and independence possibly because of the third director's relationship with Danielle, see MBCA § 8.31(a)(2)(ii)(A), (2)(iii), the question does not ask for examinees to consider director liability. Similarly, if an examinee identifies this as an improper, non-pro-rata distribution, there is a possibility of recovery from Danielle, although the question does not ask about that. See MBCA § 8.32(a) ("director who votes for . . . distribution in excess of what may be authorized . . . is personally liable to the corporation"); § 8.32(b) (director liable for unlawful distribution entitled to recoupment from shareholder of the amount of unlawful distribution the shareholder accepted).]

Point Three (20%)

It is likely that Brian could seek to have the corporation judicially dissolved. In this close corporation, Brian likely has sufficient grounds to seek the dissolution of the corporation given that the majority shareholder's conduct likely constitutes oppression.

The MBCA, consistent with the approach in most states, gives courts discretion to order the judicial dissolution of a corporation if a shareholder can demonstrate that the majority (or controlling) shareholder is acting in a manner that is "oppressive." MBCA § 14.30(a)(2)(ii). In applying the oppression test, many courts have looked to whether the conduct of the majority shareholders defeats the "reasonable expectations" that the majority knew, or reasonably should have known, were held by the minority shareholders. See O'Brien v. Pearson, 868 N.E.2d 118, 126 (Mass. 2007); Matter of Kemp & Beatley, Inc., 473 N.E.2d 1173, 1179 (N.Y. 1984); accord California Corp. Code § 1800(b)(5) (court may dissolve corporation when "reasonably necessary" to protect minority shareholders). Courts have justified judicial dissolution because of the reality that there is generally no available market for the sale of shares in a closely held corporation. Without the ability to petition for dissolution, a minority shareholder may be unable to protect his legitimate interests in the corporation.

Here, there were a number of "oppressive" actions by the majority shareholder. First, the ratification (by Danielle and the third director) of the sale of the corporation's only property to the bank frustrated Brian's reasonable expectation of participating in the corporation's development and sale of residential properties. This expectation was based on the board's unanimous decision that the corporation would purchase land for the purpose of residential development, assign Brian the task of building homes on the land, have Brian paid an annual salary for building homes for the corporation, and have Danielle secure financing to build these homes. In short, Brian expected to build homes and to be paid a salary for building the homes, on property acquired by the corporation. There is no indication that Brian expected the corporation to engage in real estate speculation, as happened when Danielle accepted the sale to the bank of the corporation's only property.

Second, Danielle's acceptance of a bonus payment—from which Brian was excluded—constituted unfair self-dealing. See Point Two. Courts have regularly cited "freeze outs" (where minority shareholders are excluded from the benefits of the business) as oppressive conduct that justifies judicial dissolution of the corporation. In addition, the MBCA permits judicial dissolution when corporate assets are being "misapplied or wasted," as happened here with the bonus payment to Danielle. See MBCA § 14.30(2)(iv).

Third, Danielle's vote (joined in by the third director) refusing to give Brian access to corporate records was in contravention of Brian's right to inspect the corporation's accounting records. See MBCA § 16.02(b) ("A shareholder . . . is entitled to inspect . . . accounting records of the corporation . . ."). Courts have also cited the refusal of majority shareholders to provide information to minority shareholders as grounds for granting a petition for judicial dissolution.

Thus, Brian likely has sufficient grounds to seek judicial dissolution of the corporation. Together, the actions by Danielle—that is, the sale of the property, the unfair bonus payment, and the refusal to allow inspection of corporate records—likely would be seen as "genuine abuse" by a controlling shareholder. See Official Comment, MBCA § 14.30 (as amended in 2005) (cautioning courts to exercise discretion to grant petition for judicial dissolution on grounds of oppression only in cases of "genuine abuse rather than instances of acceptable tactics in a power struggle for control of a corporation").

[NOTE: An examinee might point out that in a proceeding to dissolve the corporation, one or more of the corporation's shareholders may elect to purchase all the shares owned by the complaining shareholder for their fair value, and if that happens, the court will dismiss the petition to dissolve. MBCA § 14.34. This point should not receive any credit, as the question is not whether the court will dissolve the corporation but whether there are grounds for judicial dissolution.]

DISCUSSION

Summary

The AD Trust was created when Arlene bought the bonds and amended Schedule A to reflect that they were assets of the trust, not when she signed the "Declaration of Trust." Under the Uniform Trust Code, a trust is revocable unless the trust instrument expressly provides otherwise. Here the trust instrument was silent on the issue of revocability. Thus, it was revocable, and Arlene effectively revoked the AD Trust when she wrote across the trust, "This AD Trust is revoked." Upon revocation of the AD Trust, its assets belonged to Arlene in accordance with her stated intentions.

Arlene's later oral statement with respect to the necklace and bonds delivered to her friend created an enforceable trust. Under the Uniform Trust Code, a writing is not necessary to establish an inter vivos trust of personal property. Arlene expressed the intent to create a trust, specified a trust beneficiary, named a trustee, and transferred the necklace and bonds to her friend as trustee by delivering the package to the friend. At the time Arlene delivered the necklace and bonds to her friend, she owned the necklace and, because the AD trust was revoked, the bonds as well.

A perpetual noncharitable trust must vest within the perpetuities period (lives in being plus 21 years) in a jurisdiction that has the common law Rule Against Perpetuities. A trust for the benefit of a political party is not a charitable trust because it is not for a valid charitable purpose. Thus, this trust is void and unenforceable as it could possibly last longer than the perpetuity period.

Because the testamentary trust is invalid, Arlene's probate estate, consisting of the $300,000 bank account, passes by partial intestacy. Because this jurisdiction determines intestate shares of the issue of the decedent's parents using the "per stirpes" method of distribution, Arlene's brother Bob and her nephew Fred (sole child of a deceased sibling) will each take one-third of her probate estate and her nieces Carla, Donna, and Edna (children of a deceased sibling) will take equal shares of the other third of her probate estate.

The AD Trust was validly created when Arlene purchased the bonds and listed them as the trust assets in Schedule A.

A trust is created by, among other things, the "declaration by the owner of property that the owner holds identifiable property as trustee," Unif. Trust Code § 401(2), but only if "(1) the settlor [had] capacity to create a trust, (2) the settlor indicate[d] an intention to create a trust, (3) the trust has a definite beneficiary, (4) the trustee has duties to perform, and (5) the same person is not the sole trustee and sole beneficiary." Unif. Trust Code § 402(a).

Here, there are no facts to suggest that Arlene lacked capacity to create the trust. And, even though Arlene was the sole trustee, by naming herself and others as the beneficiaries, the Declaration met the requirements of § 402(a)(5). The Declaration further met the requirements of § 402(a)(2) by clearly declaring Arlene's intention to create the trust. It also satisfied § 402(a)(4) by expressly imposing the duties of payment and distribution on the trustee. However, no trust was created at the time Arlene signed the Declaration because no assets were then transferred to the trust. Rather, a trust is created when the trust receives the property. Id. at § 401(1) & 401 comment. See also State ex rel. Teague v. Home Indemnity Co., 442 S.W.2d 276 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1967). The expressed intention to transfer property to a trust in the future thus does not create a valid trust. But property need not be transferred to the trust contemporaneously with the creation of the trust; "[a] trust created by means of an instrument signed during the settlor's lifetime is not rendered invalid simply because the trust was not created until property was transferred to the trustee at a much later date, including by contract after the settlor's death." Unif. Trust Code § 401 comment. Thus, under the UTC, the AD Trust was created when Arlene bought the bonds and amended Schedule A to indicate that the bonds were an asset of the trust. See id.

Point One(b) (10%)

Because the trust instrument did not expressly state that it was irrevocable, Arlene effectively revoked the AD Trust by writing across the face of the Declaration of Trust, "This AD Trust is revoked."

Under the UTC, an inter vivos trust is revocable unless the trust instrument states that the trust is irrevocable. See Unif. Trust Code § 602. Here, the AD Trust did not provide that it was irrevocable. Thus, Arlene could revoke the trust at any time.

Section 602 of the Uniform Trust Code further provides that the settlor may revoke a trust by "any . . . method manifesting clear and convincing evidence of the settlor's intent." Here Arlene wrote across the trust: "This AD Trust is revoked." This is sufficient to revoke the trust. Upon revocation of the trust, the trust assets reverted to Arlene. See id. § 602(d) ("Upon revocation of a revocable trust, the trustee shall deliver the trust property as the settlor directs.").

Point Two (25%)

Under the UTC, a trust can be orally created by a transfer of property from the settlor to another person to act as trustee if the oral statement expresses the intention to create a trust and designates one or more beneficiaries of the trust. This occurred here when Arlene gave the package to her friend, designating Donna as the beneficiary. Therefore, the trust was valid.

A trust is established when (1) the settlor has capacity and indicates an intention to create a trust; (2) the same person is not the sole trustee and sole beneficiary; and (3) unless the trust is a charitable trust, the trust has a definite beneficiary. Unif. Trust Code § 402(a). Under § 407, a trust need not be evidenced by a writing but if created orally, "its terms may be established only by clear and convincing evidence."

Here, Arlene transferred the package with the necklace and bonds to her friend designating her as the trustee of the property. Arlene clearly stated her intention to create a trust and named a beneficiary of the trust. The trustee, Arlene's friend, accepted her role as trustee by accepting the package knowing it contained the necklace and bonds and knowing that Arlene gave them to her to act as a trustee for Donna. Unless the friend contradicts the facts as stated (and there is no indication in the problem that she would do so), there should be no evidentiary problem in establishing Arlene's intent under a clear and convincing evidentiary standard.

The trust assets include the necklace and the bonds. Although the bonds were once assets of the AD Trust, when Arlene revoked that trust (see Point One(b)), ownership of the bonds reverted to Arlene. She later transferred the bonds to the oral trust she created on Donna's behalf.

Point Three (25%)

The testamentary trust in favor of the Political Party is not a valid charitable trust because it was not created for a recognized charitable purpose and is therefore void under the common law Rule Against Perpetuities.

A charitable trust may be created for the relief of poverty, the advancement of education or religion, the promotion of health, . . . or other purpose the achievement of which is beneficial to the community. Unif. Trust Code § 405. A charitable trust may last in perpetuity; it is not subject to the Rule Against Perpetuities. Charity thus must be distinguished from acts of liberality or benevolence. "To constitute a charity, the use must be public in nature." Shenandoah Valley Nat'l Bank v. Taylor, 63 S.E.2d 786 (Va. 1951) quoting Zollman on Charities § 398. It is against public policy to perpetually benefit a political party. Courts have consistently held that a trust to benefit a particular political party is not for a valid charitable purpose. See Note, Charitable Trusts for Political Purposes, 37 Va. L. Rev. 988 (1951).

Trusts that are not charitable are subject to the Rule Against Perpetuities in jurisdictions that follow the common law rule. See Restatement (Second) of Property (Donative Transfers), Pt. 1, Introductory Note (1981). Here, the trust for the Political Party does not satisfy the requirements for a charitable trust; its sole purpose is to benefit a particular political party. It is thus subject to the Rule Against Perpetuities as a noncharitable trust. As a perpetual noncharitable trust, it clearly violates the Rule because it does not have any termination date, income is payable in perpetuity to the Political Party, and there is no vesting within the meaning of the Rule within the permissible period of lives in being plus 21 years. It is thus void.

[NOTE: The cy pres doctrine allows a court to modify a charitable trust when its particular charitable purpose becomes impracticable, unlawful, or impossible to fulfill. Uniform Trust Code § 413. But the cy pres doctrine applies only to charitable trusts, and the trust for the Political Party does not meet the criteria for a charitable trust. Thus, cy pres is inapplicable here.

Unlike a charitable trust, which can last in perpetuity, a noncharitable trust with an ascertainable beneficiary, as here, cannot be created to last in perpetuity in a jurisdiction with the common law Rule against Perpetuities. While § 409 of the Uniform Trust Code provides that “[a] trust may be created [and enforced] for a noncharitable purpose without a definite or definitely ascertainable beneficiary” for no more than 21 years, the statute is inapplicable here because the Political Party is an ascertainable beneficiary. [Emphasis added].]

Assuming that the testamentary trust to Political Party is invalid, the bank account should be distributed through the probate estate to the issue of Arlene's parents taking per stirpes. Thus, Arlene's brother Bob takes one-third of the bank account, her nephew Fred takes one-third, and Donna, Carla, and Edna would take equal shares of the remaining third (i.e., one-ninth each) of the bank account.

The testamentary trust under Arlene's will purportedly disposed of all of Arlene's worldly goods not otherwise validly disposed of during her life. Because this trust is assumed to be invalid, the asset that would have passed to the trust (the $300,000 bank account in Arlene's probate estate) under her will passes to her heirs as undisposed-of property. Arlene's heirs are the issue of her parents under a per stirpes distribution. See Jesse Dukeminier & Stanley Johansen, Wills, Trusts, and Estates 87 (6th ed. 2000). Thus, Arlene's brother Bob takes one-third of the $300,000 bank account, her nephew Fred takes one-third, and Donna, Carla, and Edna would take equal shares of the remaining third (one-ninth of the probate estate each).

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. CIV (I.A.; III.D.; V.A.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is a nonparty to a lawsuit a "required party" when adjudication of the issues in its absence may impair its interest and subject a party to the suit to the risk of inconsistent obligations?
- (2) May an LLC be joined as a party to a federal lawsuit brought under the court's diversity jurisdiction when members of the LLC have the same citizenship as both the plaintiff and the defendant in the original lawsuit?
- (3) When a required party cannot be joined to a federal lawsuit, should the suit be dismissed if the plaintiff can obtain an adequate remedy in state court through an action that includes the required party?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Developer is a required party to the Builder v. Lender lawsuit. Developer has an interest in the disbursement of the funds under its agreement with Lender, and that interest will be impaired if Lender is ordered to pay the funds to Builder. Moreover, Lender runs the risk of facing inconsistent obligations if it is ordered to pay the funds to Builder and Developer subsequently sues Lender to recover the money itself.

However, the joinder of Developer to the lawsuit is not feasible because its joinder would destroy the court's subject-matter jurisdiction. First, joinder would destroy complete diversity. An LLC takes the citizenship of each of its members, and so Developer is a citizen of both State A and State B. Thus, if Developer were joined as a defendant, it would not be diverse from the plaintiff Builder, a State B citizen. If Developer were joined as an involuntary plaintiff, it would not be diverse from Lender, a State A citizen. Second, the court would not have supplemental jurisdiction because the statute does not apply to parties joined under Rule 19.

The court should dismiss the action rather than allowing it to proceed in Developer's absence. A court should proceed in the absence of a required party if it can do so "in equity and good conscience." Here, the facts suggest that the court should dismiss the action. Not only will proceeding be prejudicial to both Developer and Lender, but there is an adequate available alternative for Builder: a suit in a State A state court.

Point One (30%)

If the court were to render a decision in the Builder v. Lender action in the absence of Developer, that decision would impair Developer's interests as a practical matter and expose Lender to the risk of inconsistent obligations. Developer is therefore a required party to the Builder v. Lender action if its joinder is feasible.

Pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19(a)(1), a person is a required party to a federal action and must be joined (if joinder is feasible) if any of the following is true:

- (A) in that person's absence, the court cannot accord complete relief among existing parties; or
- (B) that person claims an interest relating to the subject of the action and is so situated that disposing of the action in the person's absence may:
 - (i) as a practical matter impair or impede the person's ability to protect the interest; or
 - (ii) leave an existing party subject to a substantial risk of incurring double, multiple, or otherwise inconsistent obligations because of the interest.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 19(a)

Here, Developer is a required party under both prongs of Rule 19(a)(1)(B). In the first place, Developer claims an interest in the loan agreement, which is the subject of Builder's action. If Builder wins the lawsuit against Lender, the result will not bind Developer, but the funds in dispute will be paid to Builder, and Developer will be obligated to pay them back to Lender pursuant to the agreement. While Developer may be able to sue Builder to recover the funds, its ability to protect its interests under the loan agreement will be impaired "as a practical matter" if it is not a party to the suit.

Developer is also a required party because the failure to join Developer as a party leaves Lender "subject to a substantial risk of incurring double, multiple, or otherwise inconsistent obligations." The court could rule that Lender improperly withheld the funds under the loan agreement and order Lender to pay the money to Builder. But if that happened, Developer could then sue Lender in a separate lawsuit for improperly paying the funds to Builder. As Developer would not be a party in the Builder v. Lender suit, and thus would not be bound in that suit, Lender would be at risk of being found liable to Developer for the money it paid to Builder.

Pursuant to Rule 19(a), Developer must be joined as a party to the action if it is subject to service of process and if its joinder will not deprive the court of subject-matter jurisdiction. See Point Two.

[NOTE: Some examinees may note that Lender could seek to join Developer as a party pursuant to Federal Rule 22 (interpleader). While that is true, the question asks only about Rule 19. In addition, joining Developer through interpleader would not solve the fundamental problem here—that Developer's joinder will destroy diversity. See Point Two.]

Point Two (50%)

As an LLC, Developer has the same citizenship as its members: Amy, who is a citizen of State A, and Barbara, who is a citizen of State B. Thus, Developer is not diverse from either Builder or Lender, and so joinder of Developer would deprive the court of subject-matter jurisdiction.

Builder's lawsuit against Lender is based on state law and was filed in federal court based on the court's diversity jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C. § 1332. In an action based on section 1332, there must be complete diversity. That is, each plaintiff in the case must have citizenship different from that of each defendant. Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 7 U.S. (3 Cranch) 267 (1806). Further, the amount in controversy must be more than $75,000.

Here, there is plainly diversity jurisdiction over Builder's suit against Lender. A corporation is a citizen of the state in which it is incorporated and also of the state in which it has its principal place of business. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1). Here, Builder is both incorporated in State B and has its principal place of business there, so it is a citizen of State B. Lender, on the other hand, is incorporated and has its principal place of business in State A, so it is a citizen of State A. The parties are diverse, and Builder is seeking a recovery of at least $100,000, which satisfies the amount-in-controversy requirement.

However, adding Developer (an LLC) as a party would destroy diversity. For diversity purposes, an LLC's citizenship is the same as the citizenship of each of its members. Americold Realty Trust v. Conagra Foods, Inc., 577 U.S. 378 (2016). Here, Developer has two members, Amy and Barbara. Because Amy and Barbara are individuals, their citizenship is determined by their domicile. The facts state that Amy is a domiciliary (and thus citizen) of State A and Barbara is a domiciliary (and thus citizen) of State B. Hence, Developer is a citizen of both State A and State B.

If Developer were joined as a defendant to the Builder v. Lender lawsuit, its presence would destroy diversity because it, like the plaintiff Builder, is a citizen of State B. If it were joined as an involuntary plaintiff, its presence would still destroy diversity because it, like defendant Lender, is also a citizen of State A.

The diversity problem cannot be avoided by asserting supplemental jurisdiction over a claim by Builder against Developer claiming nonpayment of the $100,000. The supplemental jurisdiction statute provides that supplemental jurisdiction cannot be asserted with respect to claims against persons joined pursuant to Rule 19 if "exercising supplemental jurisdiction over such claims would be inconsistent with the jurisdictional requirements of section 1332." 28 U.S.C. § 1367(b).

In short, Developer cannot be joined without depriving the court of subject-matter jurisdiction. For that reason, its joinder is not feasible.

Point Three (20%)

Because the federal court cannot join Developer, a necessary party, it should probably dismiss the case. Builder could bring the case in a state court in State A against both Developer and Lender, and a State A court could fashion a remedy that would provide full relief in the matter.

When joinder of a required party is not feasible, the court "must determine whether, in equity and good conscience, the action should proceed among the existing parties or should be dismissed." Fed. R. Civ. P. 19(b). This is a fact-based inquiry, and much is left to the discretion of the district court. The court must consider the plaintiff's interest in having a forum, the defendant's interest in avoiding duplicative litigation and the risk of multiple liability, the interest of the nonjoined party, and the public interest in efficient and complete litigation of controversies. Provident Tradesmens Bank & Trust Co. v. Patterson, 390 U.S. 102, 109–111 (1968).

Rule 19 identifies several factors for the court to consider, including the extent of prejudice to the absent party or existing parties if the litigation proceeds, the extent to which the court could mitigate that prejudice by shaping relief, the adequacy of a judgment rendered in the absence of the missing party, and whether the plaintiff would have an adequate remedy if the action were dismissed.

Here, the facts strongly support dismissal of Builder v. Lender. The most important consideration is that Builder appears to have a more-than-adequate alternative remedy available: it could file suit against both Developer and Lender in a state court in State A. Both Developer and Lender are State A entities and would be subject to personal jurisdiction in State A. A state court in State A would likely be no less convenient for Builder than the State A federal court in which it has filed its action. There is nothing in the facts to suggest that there is anything preventing Builder from bringing such an action.

Moreover, as discussed in Point One, proceeding with this action in the absence of Developer creates substantial risks of prejudice to both Developer and Lender. While the federal court could provide an adequate remedy to Builder by ordering Lender to pay the money to Builder, there is no obvious way it could protect Developer or protect Lender against the risk of inconsistent liability if it granted such relief. See, e.g., Republic of the Philippines v. Pimentel, 553 U.S. 851 (2008) (dismissal is appropriate where a claimant to the money or property under dispute is absent and there is no good way to protect that claimant's interest or shield a party from risk of double liability). There is simply no good reason for the federal court to proceed under these circumstances when a state court action in which all required parties would be present could be pursued by Builder. Builder v. Lender should be dismissed.

ANALYSIS 6 – REAL PROPERTY

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

RLP (I.A., D.1)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) What are the interests of Wanda, Adele, and upon Adele's death, Frank, in the family home?
- (1)(b) As between Wanda and Frank, who is obligated to pay the property taxes on the family home?
- (2) Upon conveying the apartment building to Frank, what if any interest did Oscar have in the apartment building, and was that interest valid?
- (3) Upon Oscar's death, what if any interest does Wanda have in the apartment building, and is that interest valid?
- (4) After February 1, 2021, who owns the apartment building?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Wanda has a life estate in the family home. Adele initially had a vested remainder in the home. Adele devised that interest to Frank in her will. As between Wanda, the life tenant, and Frank, the remainderman, the obligation to pay current property taxes is on Wanda because she is the life tenant.

Oscar conveyed the apartment building to Frank. However, Oscar gave Frank an estate that would terminate upon the happening of a limitation, namely Frank's ceasing to rent at least four apartments to low-income tenants. As a result of this conveyance, Oscar retained a reversionary interest in the property.

Oscar's reversionary interest was devisable, and he subsequently devised it to Wanda by his will.

Wanda's reversionary interest is valid under the Uniform Statutory Rule Against Perpetuities because from the moment of its creation in Oscar it was vested, and it did not lose that characterization because it was later bequeathed to Wanda.

When, on February 1, 2021, Frank ceased renting any apartments in the building to below-median-income families, his estate automatically terminated and full title to the building (i.e., a title free of Frank's interest) automatically returned to Wanda as the devisee of Oscar's retained interest.

Point One (30% total weight)

(a) The interests (estates) of Wanda, Adele, and Frank (10%)

Wanda has a life estate in the family home, and Adele had a vested remainder. When Adele died and devised her interest to Frank, he succeeded to Adele's vested remainder.

Under the terms of Oscar's will, he bequeathed Wanda a life estate in the family home as evidenced by the express direction in his will that she receive the estate in the home "for life." Oscar also provided by his will that upon Wanda's death, the home should pass to Adele. This future interest in Adele (a future interest is not currently possessory) was vested because it was not subject to any conditions. In other words, it did not terminate when Adele predeceased Wanda. And, because Adele's interest was devisable, upon her death it passed to Frank, who currently has a vested remainder in the home. See Sheldon F. Kurtz, Moynihan's Introduction to the Law of Real Property 166 (7th ed. 2020).

(b) Payment of property taxes (20%)

Wanda, as life tenant, must pay the property taxes on the family home.

Under the terms of Oscar's will, Wanda was given a life estate in the family home. As life tenant, Wanda has the exclusive right to use the property during her lifetime, including the right to rent the property to others to generate income. And, as a life tenant, Wanda is also responsible for the payment of all ordinary expenses associated with property ownership, including the payment of current property taxes. Kurtz, supra, at 79. "The life tenant must pay the carrying charges on the property to the extent of the gross income, or the fair rental value [of the property] if the life tenant personally occupies the property." (Emphasis added.) Id.

Here, the reasonable value of Wanda's life estate in the family home that she occupies is at least $1,500 per month (the amount she could receive in rent for the house) or $18,000 annually. The annual amount of $18,000 is well above the $6,000 of annual property taxes. Thus, Wanda is subject to the usual rule that property taxes and other carrying charges are the responsibility of the life tenant. Id.

It is irrelevant that Adele gratuitously paid the property taxes on the family home during her lifetime. Nothing suggests that Adele's gratuitous behavior was intended to, or did, modify Wanda's obligation as life tenant or impose a legal obligation on Frank to continue Adele's practice.

Point Two (30%)

Under the terms of his conveyance of the apartment building to Frank, Oscar retained an interest in the building known at common law as a "possibility of reverter." A "possibility of reverter" vests at the moment it is created and is not invalidated by the common law or Statutory Rule against Perpetuities.

Oscar's will conveyed the apartment building to Frank "so long as at least four apartments in the apartment building are rented to families with incomes below the state median income for a family of their size. If, at any time, fewer than four apartments are being rented to below-median-income families, the apartment building automatically reverts to Oscar." Because this grant provides that Frank's estate terminates upon the happening of the stated event, Frank's estate is the type known at common law as a "fee simple determinable." The nature of this estate is that it will automatically terminate if the terminating event occurs. Sheldon F. Kurtz, Thomas P. Gallanis & Herbert Hovenkamp, The Law of Property: An Introductory Survey 121–22 (7th ed. 2018); see also Restatement (Third) of Property: Wills & Other Donative Transfers § 24.3 (characterizing this estate as a "fee simple defeasible" and ascribing to it the same effect as a common law fee simple determinable).

The grant provided that if Frank's interest terminated, the property would revert to Oscar. At common law, Oscar's interest was called a "possibility of reverter." Kurtz et al., at 154. The Third Restatement calls it a "reversion." Restatement (Third) of Property § 25.2. Regardless of terminology, the effect of Oscar's conveyance is that he would become the owner of the apartment building (in fee simple absolute) if the building ceased to be used for low-income rentals (as required by his conveyance to Frank). See generally Kurtz et al., supra, 44–51, 140–142.

At first blush, Oscar's reversionary interest in the apartment building might appear to violate the common law Rule Against Perpetuities. That is because the condition on the conveyance to Frank (that at least four apartments be rented to low-income tenants) might occur many decades after the conveyance and well beyond the perpetuity period of 21 years after some life in being.

However, the common law Rule was not concerned with the untimely taking of possession of the property; rather, it was concerned with the untimely "vesting of title" to property. And, because a "possibility of reverter" was considered to be immediately vested from the moment of its creation, it was not subject to the common law Rule Against Perpetuities even though it might become possessory beyond the perpetuity period. See Sheldon F. Kurtz, Herbert Hovenkamp & Thomas P. Gallanis, The Law of Property: An Introductory Survey 123–24 (6th ed. 2014)

Interests that do not violate the common law Rule Against Perpetuities are not subject to the Uniform Statutory Rule Against Perpetuities and may continue in effect for the length of their term. Thus, because Oscar's interest in the apartment building would be valid under the common law Rule, it remains valid under the Uniform Statutory Rule.

[NOTE: Point Two requires examinees to characterize Oscar's interest and to address its validity.

While Oscar's retained interest could properly be characterized as either a possibility of reverter or a reversion, it cannot be characterized as an executory interest (a common law estate) or as a remainder (under the Restatement (Third) of Property). This is because executory interests or remainders are created in grantees, and Oscar is a grantor.]

Point Three (20%)

Oscar's retained reversionary interest in the apartment building passed to Wanda under the residuary clause of Oscar's will. It is valid under both the common law and Statutory Rule against Perpetuities.

Oscar's reversionary interest in the apartment building was devisable. Thus, when Oscar died, his interest passed to Wanda under the residuary clause of his will. See Sheldon F. Kurtz, Herbert Hovenkamp & Thomas P. Gallanis, The Law of Property: An Introductory Survey 44–51, 139–141 (6th ed. 2014).

The interest passing to Wanda under the residuary clause of Oscar's will retains the same characterization as it had in Oscar's hands. In other words, it is a possibility of reverter or, under the Restatement (Third) of Property, a reversion. As such, it is valid under both the common law and Statutory Rule against Perpetuities. Thus, following Oscar's death, Wanda had a valid reversionary interest in the apartment building.

[NOTE: As noted in the analysis, the Restatement (Third) of Property uses different terminology from the common law but retains the same basic principles: Frank's interest in the apartment building would automatically terminate upon the happening of the event stated in the will, and Oscar's reversionary interest is immediately vested and devisable. No distinction should be made between answers based on whether they use the common law or Restatement (Third) terminology.]

Point Three requires examinees to characterize Wanda's interest and to conclude whether it is valid or invalid.]

Point Four (20%)

Frank's interest in the apartment building automatically terminated on February 1, 2021, when he ceased renting any of the apartments to below-median-income families. Title to the building free and clear of Frank's interest automatically reverted to Wanda on that date.

The essential character of a fee simple determinable (or fee simple defeasible, in Restatement (Third) terminology) is that the estate automatically terminates upon the happening of the limitation specified in the words granting the estate. Here, the grant specified that Frank's estate would continue only so long as at least four apartments in the building were rented to below-median-income families. On February 1, 2021, Frank ceased renting any of the apartments to below-median-income families. Thus, on that date Frank's interest in the building automatically terminated.

Upon termination of Frank's interest, title to the building free and clear of Frank's interest reverted to Wanda, who had inherited the possibility of reverter from Oscar. Thus, after February 1, 2021 (when Frank stopped renting to low-income tenants), Wanda owns the building in fee simple or fee simple absolute.

QUESTION 1 – DECEDENTS' ESTATES

One year ago, Joan executed a will in which she left her entire estate to her only daughter. At that time, Joan's daughter, Joan's granddaughter (the only child of Joan's daughter), Joan's only son, and Joan's three grandsons (children of her son) were living. Joan's son and her three grandsons had extensive criminal records for theft and burglary.

Joan was not close to her children and grandchildren. She rarely saw any of them, even on holidays, although she regularly sent them birthday cards and inexpensive presents.

Three years ago, Joan's doctor had prescribed her a drug that was known to produce hallucinations in some patients. Joan had difficulties with the drug and began to experience frequent hallucinations leading to her delusion that the male line of her family was "cursed" by Martians. Nonetheless, she continued taking the drug because it was the only medication available to control her medical condition.

When she went to her lawyer to draft her will, she told her lawyer that she wanted to leave all her property to her daughter and nothing to her male line. She explained, "Leaving the males in my family anything valuable would be a complete waste on burglars and thieves."

For the last five years, Joan had regularly had lunch with several friends. All of them were much wealthier than Joan. At these lunches, she often told her friends that she was a "multimillionaire" and owned both a "luxurious" home and a "very expensive" car. They had no reason to doubt Joan's claims because she had never invited them to her home and she took cabs to their lunches. In fact, Joan was never a millionaire, and she never owned either a luxurious home or an expensive automobile. She lived in a modest apartment, and her primary source of income was her Social Security benefits. She monitored her bank account regularly and reconciled her bank statement every month.

One month ago, Joan died, survived by her daughter, her granddaughter, her son, and her three grandsons. At her death, Joan owned no significant assets other than her bank account containing $100,000.

1. Under the insane-delusion rule, is Joan's will invalid? Explain.
2. Do these facts establish that Joan's will is invalid because she lacked the general mental capacity to execute a will? Explain.
3. Which, if any, of Joan's surviving relatives has standing to contest Joan's will? Explain.

QUESTION 2 – CRIMINAL LAW & PROCEDURE

Homeowner ordered a pizza to be delivered to his house for lunch. When the pizza delivery driver (Driver) arrived, Homeowner invited him to step inside while Homeowner retrieved his wallet.

A minute later, two police officers arrived at Homeowner's house to execute a valid warrant to search the house for counterfeit $100 bills. Although the warrant did not explicitly authorize a "no-knock" entry, the officers kicked open Homeowner's front door and entered the house without knocking and without announcing their identity and purpose.

One officer detained Homeowner and Driver in the hall near the front door while the second officer began to search the house. The first officer saw a lump in the back pocket of Driver's pants, which she thought could be a handgun. Concerned that Driver might harm her if he had access to a handgun, the officer decided to pat him down. While patting him down, the officer discovered that the lump was not a weapon but a soft object. She could not determine what the object was by patting the outside of Driver's pants, so she reached into his pants pocket and retrieved a plastic bag containing marijuana. Possession of marijuana is a crime in the state. The officer seized the bag of marijuana.

Meanwhile, the second officer, who was searching the house, noticed a desktop computer sitting on Homeowner's kitchen counter. The officer saw a serial number visible on the top of the computer, and she discovered, through a quick search using a law-enforcement app on her cell phone, that the serial number appeared on a list of serial numbers of recently stolen computer equipment. She seized the computer.

In Homeowner's bedroom, on a nightstand next to the bed, the second officer found a two-inch-tall, unlabeled, transparent medicine bottle that contained several pills with no markings on them. She seized the bottle and the pills. Later testing by the police crime lab showed that the pills were illegal narcotics. The second officer completed her search of the house without finding any counterfeit money.

The officers arrested Homeowner and Driver, and the state prosecuted them based upon the items seized in the search. Homeowner and Driver challenged the admission of evidence based only on rights protected by the United States Constitution. Neither Homeowner nor Driver has raised any constitutional objections to their brief detention during the search.

1. Should the officers' entry into the house result in the exclusion of evidence? Explain.
2. Assuming that the officers' entry into the house does not result in the exclusion of evidence, should the following conduct result in the exclusion of evidence?
 - (a) the officer's seizure of the marijuana from Driver
 - (b) the officer's seizure of the computer from Homeowner
 - (c) the officer's seizure of the narcotics from Homeowner

Explain.

QUESTION 3 – CIVIL PROCEDURE

Big City, in State A, and Small Town, in State B, are located 10 miles apart.

A woman and a man were driving in State B when their cars collided with each other. The collision seriously injured the man. Shortly after the collision, the man sued the woman in the federal district court for the District of State B, properly invoking the court's diversity jurisdiction. The woman is a citizen of State A; the man is a citizen of State B. The man's complaint sought damages of $250,000 and alleged that the woman's negligent driving had caused the accident and his injuries.

The woman immediately contacted her automobile insurance company to notify it about the lawsuit and to ask the company to provide an attorney to represent her in the action and to indemnify her against any liability, as required by the terms of the insurance policy. The insurance company, however, refused to provide an attorney. The insurance company also told the woman that because she had not paid her premiums for several months before the accident, her policy had lapsed and therefore did not cover the accident. The woman insisted that she was current on her payments and that the policy should still be in effect.

The woman then went to the clerk's office for the federal district court for the District of State B, which is located in Small Town. She timely filed an answer to the man's complaint. She simultaneously timely filed a complaint against the insurance company, naming it as a "third-party defendant" in the action pending against her in that court and alleging that the insurance company was obligated under the insurance policy to defend her in the man's suit and to indemnify her if she was found liable to the man. She also obtained from the clerk of court a summons to the insurance company requiring the company to file an answer to the woman's complaint or be subject to a default judgment. She then returned to State A, where she hired a process server. Ten days later, the process server personally delivered the summons and complaint to the president of the insurance company at its headquarters in Big City, State A.

The insurance company does no business in State B and has no facilities in State B.

The insurance company moved to dismiss the complaint against it. The district court granted the motion, ruling that (a) the insurance company "cannot be joined to the suit as a third-party defendant because its presence is unnecessary to resolve the dispute" between the man and the woman and (b) "the court lacks personal jurisdiction over the insurance company because the company lacks sufficient contacts with State B."

1. Do the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit the woman to bring the company into the action as a third-party defendant? Explain.
2. Assuming that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit the woman to bring the company into the action, does the court have personal jurisdiction over the company, despite the company's lack of contacts with State B? Explain.

3. Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, what actions, if any, could be taken by the district court to allow the woman to immediately appeal the court's dismissal of her complaint against the insurance company? Should the court take those actions? Explain.

QUESTION 4 – SECURED TRANSACTIONS

Shortly after passing the State X bar examination and being admitted to the bar, a lawyer decided to open her own practice as a sole proprietorship in State X, which is her principal residence. The lawyer wanted a couch for her new office's waiting room and went to a furniture store in State X where she found a couch that she liked. She asked if she could buy the couch on credit, saying, "This is for the waiting room of my new law office." The salesperson responded that the store would sell the couch to her on credit if her obligation to pay was secured by the couch. The lawyer agreed and bought the couch on those terms.

As part of the sale, both the lawyer and the salesperson (who had authority to sign on behalf of the store) signed a "Credit Sales Agreement" that stated that the lawyer granted the store a security interest in the couch (described in the agreement by manufacturer and model number) to secure the lawyer's obligation to pay the purchase price.

On her way out of the store, the lawyer saw a table that she thought would be ideal for her home. She asked the salesperson if she could buy the table on credit, saying, "This would look great in my dining room." This time, the salesperson said, "This is a popular model, so we have a special financing deal. You can get the table on credit and have it delivered tomorrow, but we retain title to the table until you finish paying for it. Does that work for you?" The lawyer said that it worked for her and bought the table on the terms outlined by the salesperson. She signed an agreement that described the table by manufacturer and model number and that stated that the store would retain title to the table until she finished paying for it.

The next day, the store delivered the couch to the lawyer's office and delivered the table to the lawyer's home.

The furniture store in State X did not file a financing statement with respect to either the couch transaction or the table transaction.

Six months later, the lawyer passed the bar examination in State Y, where her parents had a home at which she stayed for a few weeks each year. After being admitted to the State Y bar, the lawyer decided that she wanted to be able to represent clients in State Y while she was staying at her parents' home. The lawyer decided to furnish a room in her parents' home as an office and to buy a desk for the office.

She went to a furniture store in State Y and agreed to buy a desk on credit, with her payment obligation secured by a security interest in the desk. She signed an agreement granting the store a security interest in the desk (described in the agreement by manufacturer and model number). The store immediately filed a financing statement in the State Y central filing office for financing statements. The financing statement listed the lawyer as the debtor, named the furniture store as the secured party, and indicated the desk (described by manufacturer and model number) as the collateral. The store delivered the desk to the lawyer's State Y office the next day. The desk was used by the lawyer only in conjunction with her law practice.

At all relevant times, the lawyer's principal residence was in State X.

1. Does the State X furniture store have an enforceable and perfected security interest in the couch used by the lawyer in her office waiting room in State X? Explain.
2. Does the State X furniture store have an enforceable and perfected security interest in the table used by the lawyer in her dining room in State X? Explain.
3. Does the State Y furniture store have an enforceable and perfected security interest in the desk used by the lawyer in her office in State Y? Explain.

QUESTION 5 – REAL PROPERTY

In 1901, Smith owned a three-acre undeveloped parcel of land in State A. He validly subdivided the parcel into two lots. Both undeveloped lots remained in the Smith family until 2005, when John purchased the lot that comprised the western two acres and Beth purchased the lot that comprised the eastern one acre. Both John and Beth promptly recorded their valid deeds.

In 2009, one of Smith's descendants purported to convey to Wendy by quitclaim deed the entire three-acre parcel that had originally belonged to Smith. The quitclaim deed accurately described the three-acre parcel.

On January 1, 2010, Wendy began to occupy one acre of the three-acre parcel purportedly conveyed to her in 2009, specifically, one acre of John's two-acre lot.

In 2016, John died, survived by Mary, his 12-year-old daughter and sole heir.

On March 1, 2022, Wendy brought a quiet-title action against Mary and Beth, alleging ownership of all three acres by adverse possession.

For the purpose of the action, and to avoid confusion, the trial court labeled each acre of the original three-acre parcel as follows:

- the "Western Acre" (which is the western half of the land described in John's deed);
- the "Central Acre" (which is the other half of the land described in John's deed and which Wendy occupied); and
- the "Eastern Acre" (which is the land described in Beth's deed).

The facts at trial established that (1) the quitclaim deed from Smith's descendant gave Wendy colorable title to the three-acre parcel described in that deed; (2) from 2010 until the end of 2021, Wendy possessed the Central Acre in a manner that was actual, open and notorious, continuous, exclusive, and hostile and under claim of right; (3) Wendy ceased her actual possession of the Central Acre on January 1, 2022; and (4) neither the Western Acre nor the Eastern Acre had ever been possessed by any of its owners or by Wendy.

The state's adverse-possession law provides:

An action to recover title to or possession of real property shall be brought within 10 years after the cause of action accrues. However, if at the time the cause of action accrues, the person entitled to bring that action is under 18 years of age, such person, after the expiration of 10 years from the time the cause of action accrues, may bring the action to recover title or possession within five years after reaching the age of 18.

1. In 2020, did Wendy acquire title by adverse possession to the Central Acre? Explain.
2. Assuming that Wendy acquired title by adverse possession to the Central Acre in 2020,
 - (a) did she also acquire title to the Western Acre in that year? Explain.
 - (b) did she also acquire title to the Eastern Acre in that year? Explain.

QUESTION 6 – EVIDENCE

A woman (Plaintiff) has filed a civil action in the federal district court for State A against her former landlord (Defendant) seeking damages under State A law for invasion of privacy, which in State A requires a finding of intent. The federal court has diversity jurisdiction over the suit and personal jurisdiction over Defendant.

Plaintiff's complaint alleges the following facts:

- 1 While Plaintiff was a college student, she rented an apartment in a building owned and managed by Defendant.
- 2 One day, as Plaintiff dressed after showering, she saw a gleam of light through a small hole in a wall of her bathroom. Then she saw an eye looking through the small hole from the other side. She put on her bathrobe and ran from her apartment into the hall of her apartment building, where she saw Defendant leaving a utility closet that shared a wall with her bathroom. Plaintiff accused Defendant of peeking at her from inside the closet.
- 3 Defendant first told Plaintiff that he had been in the closet "just to put things away" and then said that he would evict her from her apartment if she told anyone "what happened."

Defendant's answer admits the allegations in paragraph 1 but denies the allegations in paragraphs 2 and 3. Defendant's answer alleges that he was inside the closet inspecting a water heater and that, at the time of the incident, he had not known that the hole in the wall existed or looked through it.

The parties have filed pretrial motions to exclude evidence.

Defendant seeks to exclude from evidence statements that he made in court when pleading guilty to a criminal voyeurism charge that was based on the same facts alleged in Plaintiff's complaint. Under questioning by the judge, Defendant admitted that he knew about the hole in the closet and that he had repeatedly used it to spy on Plaintiff while she was dressing. Although Defendant initially pled guilty to the criminal voyeurism charges, he later withdrew his guilty plea. The criminal case against Defendant is still pending.

Defendant also seeks to exclude from evidence deposition testimony of a man who previously rented the same apartment as Plaintiff. The man stated in a deposition taken by Plaintiff that he once confronted Defendant "about the utility closet and his perversion" when he caught Defendant watching him under circumstances nearly identical to those described in Plaintiff's complaint. Defendant and his attorney were present at the man's deposition and had an opportunity to examine him. The man currently lives and works in a jurisdiction hundreds of miles from State A, and he has refused to attend the trial and testify in person despite extensive efforts by Plaintiff to convince him to do so.

Plaintiff plans to testify at the trial. She is now in graduate school. She seeks to exclude any evidence, including testimony, that she plagiarized her college senior thesis and lied about the plagiarism on her recent graduate school application.

How should the court rule on the motion to exclude each of the following?

1. The admissions of Defendant made in connection with the guilty plea he later withdrew. Explain.
2. The deposition testimony of the man who stated that Defendant watched him under similar circumstances to those alleged by Plaintiff. Explain.
3. Evidence that Plaintiff plagiarized her senior thesis in college and lied about it on her graduate school application. Explain.

DEC (II.J.2 & 7)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This question is designed to test an examinee's knowledge of two of the grounds available to contest a will: insane delusion and lack of general mental capacity. Examinees should be able to articulate the factors supporting these separate grounds and then apply the facts to reach a conclusion as to whether the will can be set aside on either or both grounds. Lastly, the question assesses whether the examinee understands the "financial interest test" that determines who may contest a will.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Under the insane-delusion rule, is Joan's will invalid?
- (2) Do these facts establish that Joan's will is invalid because she lacked the general mental capacity to execute a will?
- (3) Which, if any, of Joan's surviving relatives has standing to contest Joan's will?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The facts do not establish that Joan's will is invalid as the product of an insane delusion. Instead, it appears that her decision to disinherit her male line was caused by her rational conclusion that leaving money to the males in her family would be a waste because of their criminal behavior.

Joan's will cannot be successfully contested on the ground that Joan lacked general mental capacity. Joan knew the identity of the persons who were the "natural objects" of her bounty and understood the distributional plan laid out in her will that benefited her daughter and disinherited her male line. Although Joan incorrectly described her assets and their value to her friends, the facts suggest that the misrepresentation was purposeful in order to ingratiate herself with them. Furthermore, Joan regularly monitored her bank account, suggesting that she understood the nature and extent of her property.

Joan's surviving son has standing to contest the will because, if the will were ineffective, he would be the only one of Joan's two heirs (her daughter and son) entitled to a share of Joan's estate larger than that which he would take if the will were valid. No other relative has standing.

Point One (40%)

These facts do not establish that Joan's will is invalid as the product of an insane delusion. Rather, her decision was caused by her rational conclusion that leaving money to the males in her family would be a waste because of their criminal behavior.

A testator's will can be challenged on grounds that at the time the testator executed her will she was under an insane delusion that impacted the disposition being made in the will or, as discussed in Point Two, on the basis that the testator lacked so-called general mental capacity.

"A delusion is a false conception of reality. . . . An insane delusion . . . is one to which the testator adheres against all evidence and reason to the contrary." Jesse Dukeminier, Robert H. Sitkoff and James Lindgren, Wills, Trusts & Estates 168 (8th ed. 2009). If the testator's alleged delusion has some rational basis, courts typically do not find the delusion to be insane. See id. And, in many states, the testator must have some symptoms of a mental disorder, such as delusions or hallucinations, before a court will find that he or she suffered from an insane delusion. In addition, a will can be set aside because of an insane delusion only if the will "is a product of the insane delusion." William M. McGovern, Sheldon F. Kurtz, David M. English & Thomas P. Gallanis, Wills, Trusts and Estates Including Taxation & Future Interests 216–17 (5th ed. 2017). Thus, if the testator had other grounds for writing the will as she did, it will not be set aside. Id.

Here, Joan experienced frequent hallucinations as a side effect of taking a prescribed drug. These hallucinations caused Joan to have a delusion that her male line was "cursed" by Martians. But the facts do not establish that Joan's decision to disinherit her male line at the time she executed her will was caused by her delusion. Rather, she communicated to her lawyer only that "leaving the males in my family anything valuable would be a complete waste on burglars and thieves." Thus, the challenge will not succeed. See Uniform Probate Code § 3-407 (contestants of will have burden of proving lack of testamentary intent or capacity).

Point Two (40%)

Joan's will cannot be successfully contested on the basis that she lacked general mental capacity at the time the will was executed.

To execute a valid will, a testator must have general mental capacity at the time the will is executed. A mental illness or cognitive impairment does not preclude a finding that a testator has capacity, and a will contestant bears the burden of proving incapacity. See generally Unif. Prob. Code § 3-407.

To have the requisite mental capacity to execute a will, a testator, at the time of signing the will, must understand

1. the nature and extent of his/her property,
2. the persons who are the "natural objects" of his/her bounty,
3. the disposition being made of his/her property in the will, and
4. the relationship of the preceding three elements to one another to form an orderly disposition of the property.

Dukeminier et al., supra, at 159.

There is some evidence that Joan did not know the nature and extent of her property. Joan did regularly misrepresent the value of her assets and her wealth and told her friends that she had assets (a "very expensive" car and a "luxurious" home) that she did not own. On the other hand, Joan regularly reviewed and reconciled her bank statement, suggesting that she did know the value of her financial assets. And several facts (the greater wealth of the friends to whom Joan made the misrepresentations, Joan's failure to invite these friends to her apartment, and her use of cabs to get to the group's meetings) support the argument that Joan's misrepresentations were intentional and designed to hide her comparative lack of wealth and to ingratiate herself with her friends.

Here, there is clear evidence that Joan knew the identity of the natural objects of her bounty and the disposition of her property in the will. The natural objects of a testator's bounty are those persons having the highest moral claims to a testator's property. Typically, these are family members such as spouses, siblings, and descendants. Joan regularly sent cards and inexpensive presents to her children and grandchildren. Moreover, she knew about her male descendants; in fact, knowledge of her sons' and grandsons' criminal misconduct appears to have been the basis of Joan's testamentary disposition solely in favor of her daughter.

Joan's statements to her lawyer that she was leaving nothing to her male descendants and everything to her daughter and that leaving her property to her male line would be a waste because of their criminal behavior also made it clear that Joan understood that leaving everything to her daughter would disinherit her son and grandsons.

Finally, Joan could consider each of the above factors in her head and understand how they related to one another.

Given these facts, when Joan signed her will she had general mental capacity.

Point Three (20%)

Joan's son has standing to contest Joan's will because he would be financially better off if the will were ineffective to dispose of Joan's estate.

Only persons with a financial interest in a successful will contest have standing to contest a will. McGovern et al., supra, at 546. A person with a financial interest is one who would take a greater portion of the decedent's estate if the contest succeeded than he or she would take if the contest failed.

Here, Joan's son has standing to contest Joan's will because, as one of Joan's two heirs (the son and the daughter), he would take one-half of Joan's estate through intestate succession if the will were struck down.

No one else has standing. Joan's daughter would not financially benefit from a will contest, as she would take only half of the estate through intestate succession and takes all under the will. Joan's grandsons and granddaughter would take nothing through intestate succession because their parents survive Joan.

ANALYSIS 2 – CRIMINAL LAW & PROCEDURE

CRM (V.A.)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This item tests an examinee's ability to apply basic rules of Fourth Amendment law to a fact pattern involving the execution of a search warrant at a suspect's home. The item covers the knock-and-announce rule, the plain-view doctrine, the Terry doctrine, and the scope of the exclusionary rule.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Do police officers who execute a search warrant for counterfeit money violate the Fourth Amendment when they kick in the front door of a suspect's house without knocking and announcing their purpose?
- (1)(b) Does the execution of a search warrant in violation of the "knock and announce" rule trigger the exclusionary rule?
- (2) Did the police officer's patdown of Driver and seizure of the marijuana found in Driver's pocket violate the Fourth Amendment and trigger application of the exclusionary rule?
- (3) Can stolen property that a police officer discovers in plain view during a search for other evidence be seized by the officer and used as evidence against the person whose home was being searched even though the officer had to verify that the property was stolen by checking its serial number against police records?
- (4) Should the illegal narcotics seized during the search be excluded from evidence when the government could not determine that the substances were narcotics without laboratory testing?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Although entering Homeowner's house to execute the search warrant was not itself unconstitutional, the police officers violated Homeowner's constitutional rights by entering without first knocking and announcing their identity and purpose. Knocking and announcing is required prior to entering a house to execute a search warrant absent exigent circumstances, which were not present here. Thus, despite having a valid warrant, the officers violated the Fourth Amendment requirement of reasonable searches by failing to knock and announce themselves. However, the exclusionary rule is typically not available as a remedy for knock-and-announce rule violations. Thus, none of the seized evidence (illegal marijuana, stolen computer, illegal narcotics) should be excluded on this basis.

The officer's patdown of Driver was constitutional, but the subsequent seizure of the plastic bag containing marijuana was unconstitutional. Under Terry v. Ohio, a police officer who has reasonable suspicion that a person is armed may perform a patdown of the person's outer clothing to search for weapons. Here, the initial patdown was constitutionally permissible because the officer initially believed that Driver had concealed a weapon in his back pocket. However, once the officer no longer had reason to suspect that Driver was armed, she had no constitutional authority to remove the soft item from Driver's pocket. The marijuana should therefore be excluded from evidence at Driver's trial.

A court should not exclude the computer from evidence. Its seizure did not violate Homeowner's Fourth Amendment rights because the computer was found in plain view and the officer could determine that it was stolen by checking its serial number (also in plain view) against stolen property lists and without touching or moving the computer.

The officer's seizure of the small pill bottle and its contents was unconstitutional. First, the warrant authorized a search for counterfeit bills, not for narcotics. Second, although the bottle was in plain view, the "plain view" doctrine did not justify its seizure. The bottle itself was not contraband, nor was it obvious that it contained evidence of criminal activity, given that the identity of the pills in the bottle as narcotics could not be ascertained without a seizure of the bottle and testing of its contents. The pills should therefore be excluded from evidence at Homeowner's trial.

The police officers violated Homeowner's Fourth Amendment rights by failing to "knock and announce" before entering the house.

Absent exigent circumstances, knocking and announcing is required prior to the execution of a search warrant for a home. See Wilson v. Arkansas, 514 U.S. 927 (1995) (holding that the Fourth Amendment incorporates the common law "knock and announce" rule). Here, the warrant authorized a search for counterfeit bills. There are no facts suggesting any exigent circumstances, such as a threat of physical resistance by Homeowner or the rapid destruction of evidence if the officers announced their presence. Thus, the officers' failure to knock and announce violated the Fourth Amendment.

[NOTE: Although it is not relevant to the facts of this case, when issuing a warrant, a judge might determine that there are exigent circumstances justifying entry without knocking or announcing. Such a warrant is known as a "no knock" warrant. See Richards v. Wisconsin, 520 U.S. 385 (1997).]

Point One(b) (15%)

The officers' failure to "knock and announce" before entry does not trigger the exclusionary rule.

The century-old exclusionary rule prevents the prosecution from introducing evidence obtained through a violation of the defendant's Fourth Amendment rights. Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914). The exclusionary rule applies to the states. Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961). Mapp stands for the proposition that the prosecutor, in a state or federal action, cannot use evidence obtained by police as a result of a violation of a suspect's Fourth Amendment protections. Until recently, a finding of a Fourth Amendment violation always triggered application of the exclusionary rule.

However, in Hudson v. Michigan, 547 U.S. 586 (2006), the Court clarified that a violation of the "knock and announce" rule is a violation of the Fourth Amendment that does not trigger the exclusion of evidence. In Hudson, the Court held that if police have a valid warrant to search a home, but they enter in a way that violates their constitutional duty to knock and announce, the evidence uncovered during the search can nonetheless be used in a criminal prosecution. Id.

Here, because the officers' entry violated Homeowner's Fourth Amendment rights only because they failed to knock and announce, the exclusionary rule does not apply. Thus, none of the seized evidence (illegal marijuana, computer, illegal narcotics) should be excluded on that basis.

[NOTE: States are divided as to whether, under the reasonable search provisions of their own constitutions, the exclusion of evidence results from the entering officers' failure to knock and announce their presence, with some states following Hudson's reasoning and others not. But because the call asks specifically whether police conduct violated rights under the United States Constitution, an answer that discusses state constitutional protections is beyond the scope of the question.]

Point Two (25%)

Although the patdown of Driver was constitutionally permissible, the subsequent seizure of the marijuana was not. Therefore, the marijuana should be excluded from evidence.

Under Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), a police officer who has reasonable suspicion that a person is armed may perform a patdown of the person's outer clothing for weapons. In justifying the intrusion, "the police officer must be able to point to specific and articulable facts which, taken together with rational inferences from those facts, reasonably warrant that intrusion." Id. at 21. The sole purpose of a Terry patdown is the protection of the officer and the public. An officer conducting a Terry patdown must limit his or her intrusion to discover only weapons, rather than other evidence of a crime. If the officer feels something that might be a weapon, he may remove it. Otherwise, the officer cannot proceed with any further search unless he feels something in the course of the patdown that he immediately knows is contraband. Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366 (1993) (noting that there could be a "plain feel" doctrine for items touched during a lawful patdown that can be tactilely identified as contraband).

Here, when the patdown began the officer was acting within constitutional limits. She had reasonable suspicion that Driver was armed because she had seen a lump in his back pants pocket that she thought could be a weapon. However, the patdown became unconstitutional after the officer ascertained through the patdown that what she thought was a weapon in Driver's pants pocket was instead a small soft item. At this point, having ascertained that the lump was not a weapon, and with no prior knowledge that the item was contraband, the officer was required to terminate her search. Her removal of the item from Driver's pocket was therefore unreasonable. Because the search was unreasonable, the marijuana should be excluded.

Point Three (20%)

A court should not exclude the computer from evidence. Its seizure did not violate Homeowner's Fourth Amendment rights because the computer and its serial number were in plain view and the fact that the computer was stolen could be ascertained without a search.

The "plain view" exception to the warrant requirement allows a police officer who is executing a search warrant to seize any incriminating evidence observed during the course of that lawful search. Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987). To seize an item under the "plain view" doctrine, the item must not only be in plain view, but its incriminating character must be readily apparent. Horton v. California, 496 U.S. 128, 136 (1990). Thus, evidence is found in plain view when the police officer (1) has lawful authority to be in the location where the item is found and (2) has probable cause to believe that the item is evidence related to criminal activity without performing any additional search of the item. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321. Here, the officer was lawfully in Homeowner's home at the time she observed the computer. The computer was found in plain view sitting on Homeowner's kitchen counter, and its serial number was clearly visible without moving the computer. The officer immediately and readily determined the incriminating nature of the computer by using an app on her cell phone, which indicated that the serial number appeared on a list of recently stolen computer equipment. An individual has no reasonable expectations of privacy in items left in the plain view of police officers with legal authority to be on the premises. Id. Accordingly, because the incriminating nature of the computer was observable to the officer without any additional search of the item, a court should reject Homeowner's argument and admit the computer into evidence.

Point Four (25%)

The court should exclude from evidence the illegal narcotics found in the clear medicine bottle because the officer's seizure of the bottle and its contents violated Homeowner's Fourth Amendment rights.

All warrants must comply with the Fourth Amendment's particularity clause, which requires that warrants "particularly describe" the "things to be seized." The particularity of a warrant is evaluated based on the time it was issued and the information that the police officers who secured the warrant provided (or should have provided) to the issuing judicial officer. Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79, 85 (1987). The requirement of particularity serves to limit police discretion, giving the warrant-executing police officer authority to search only for those things the magistrate has authorized.

Here, the seizure of the medicine bottle violated the Fourth Amendment because the search warrant was for counterfeit bills, and bills could not be concealed inside a two-inch-tall, clear medicine bottle.

The plain-view doctrine does not apply here to justify the seizure. Unlike the computer, the illegal nature of the pills could not be immediately determined at the time of the search but required subsequent lab testing. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321, 326–27; Horton, 496 U.S. 128, 136–37 (if police lack probable cause to believe object in plain view is contraband, the plain-view doctrine cannot justify its seizure). The incriminating nature of the pill bottle and pills was not "readily apparent," and the officer acted improperly by seizing them.

CIV (I.B.; III.D.; VII.B.)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This question is designed to test an examinee's understanding of three important rules/principles of federal civil procedure. First, it tests knowledge of the right of a defendant to bring a third party into a pending action when the third party may be required to indemnify the defendant. Second, it tests knowledge of how a federal district court may obtain personal jurisdiction over a defendant and, in particular, the rule that a federal court may sometimes exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant located within 100 miles of the court even if the defendant is in a different state. Finally, it tests knowledge of when the dismissal of a third-party complaint can immediately be appealed in an action in which other claims remain unresolved.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Do the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit the woman to bring the company into the action as a third-party defendant?
- (2) Assuming that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit the woman to bring the company into the action, does the court have personal jurisdiction over the company despite the company's lack of contacts with State B?
- (3)(a) Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, what actions, if any, could be taken by the district court to allow the woman to immediately appeal the court's dismissal of her complaint against the insurance company?
- (3)(b) Should the court take those actions?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under Rule 14(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a defendant may bring a third party into a pending lawsuit when that third party "is or may be liable to [the defendant] for all or part of the claim against [the defendant]." Here, the woman properly brought the insurance company into the action by having a summons and third-party complaint served on the company. The woman's third-party complaint properly alleged that the insurance company would be liable to indemnify her if she were found liable to the man.

A federal district court can exercise personal jurisdiction over a third-party defendant who is brought into a lawsuit pursuant to Rule 14(a) if the defendant has minimum contacts with the State in which the court sits or if the defendant is served with process at a place within a judicial district of the United States and within 100 miles of the place where the summons was issued. Here, even though the insurance company did not have minimum contacts with State B sufficient to exercise general personal jurisdiction, it was served within a judicial district of the United States and in a location that was no more than 10 miles from the district court clerk's office, in Small Town, that issued the summons. While Rule 4(k) ("the 100-mile-bulge rule") provides the most direct resolution of whether the court can exercise personal jurisdiction on these facts, the court also has specific personal jurisdiction over the defendant insurance company because the insurance policy imposed a "duty to defend" the woman and because it can be reasonably implied from the facts that the insurance company's territorial coverage included State B, where the accident occurred.

Appeals from the decisions of federal district courts ordinarily can be taken only when there is a "final judgment" in a case. But immediate appeals of decisions are permitted under Rule 54(b) if the district court "expressly determines that there is no just reason for delay" of the appeal and "direct[s] entry of a final judgment," thus certifying the matter as appropriate for appeal. Thus the woman can appeal the court's dismissal of her third-party complaint for lack of personal jurisdiction if the district court expressly determines that there is no just reason for delay and enters a final judgment on her claim. The court should make such a determination because (1) the court's dismissal of her third-party claim is a final decision on her claim against the insurance company, (2) she would be prejudiced by a delay in her appeal, and (3) allowing the appeal would not disrupt the ongoing proceedings in the court below or otherwise disturb the orderly administration of judicial business.

Point One (40%)

The insurance company can be brought into the action as a third-party defendant because the insurance company may be liable to the woman for all or part of the claim against her.

Rule 14(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides that a defendant in a lawsuit may bring a third party into the lawsuit when that third party "is or may be liable to [the defendant] for all or part of the claim against [the defendant]." Here, the woman claims that the insurance company is required to defend her and is obligated to indemnify her if she is found liable to the man.

Here, the insurance policy requires the insurance company to pay any money judgment awarded against the woman—thus to indemnify her for any liability she might face. However, the insurance company owes this obligation to the woman only if the insurance policy was in force at the time of the accident. Although the insurance company denies that the policy was in force at the time of the accident, that is a factual issue to be decided in the course of the proceeding because the facts bearing on whether the policy was in force are disputed. See Total Med. Mgmt., Inc. v. United States, 29 Fed. Cl. 296, 298 (1993) ("Depending on the circumstances, the existence of a contract may be a question of fact, a question of law, or a mixed question of fact and law."). Thus the third-party complaint against the insurance company is based on a claim that the insurance company "may be liable" to the woman "for all or part of the claim" against her, and that is what Rule 14 requires.

In addition, Rule 14 requires a defendant to bring a third party into the case by filing and serving a "third-party complaint" against that party. Here, the manner in which the woman brought the insurance company into the case was consistent with Rule 14. After filing a third-party complaint with the court, the woman (as third-party plaintiff) properly had a summons and the third-party complaint served on the insurance company (as third-party defendant).

[NOTE: The fact that the case between the man and the woman could be decided without the insurance company's presence does not matter to the question of third-party joinder. Although Federal Rule 19 requires the joinder of so-called "necessary parties," the fact that a party's presence is not necessary does not preclude the party from being added to the action under a different rule—here, Rule 14. There is a time limit for the filing of the third-party complaint without leave of the court (no more than 14 days after service of the original answer), but the woman clearly met that limit as she filed the third-party complaint simultaneously with her answer.

Examinees might additionally discuss whether the woman may join a duty-to-defend claim, accurately recognizing that joinder of that claim to her indemnification claim would be allowed under Rule 18. But this additional analysis about joinder of claims is unnecessary to answer the specific call, which asks only whether the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit the woman to bring the company into the lawsuit as a third-party defendant.]

[NOTE: The question asks only whether the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permit the woman to bring the insurance company into the action as a third-party defendant. Thus, an answer that applies Rule 14 to conclude that the woman may implead the insurance company is a complete answer. Some examinees may go on to discuss whether the federal court would have subject-matter jurisdiction over the woman's claim against the insurance company. Because the woman and the insurance company are not diverse, jurisdiction over her claim against the insurance company would need to be based on the court's supplemental jurisdiction.]

Point Two (30%)

Because the insurance company was served within 100 miles of the district in which the action was pending, the federal district court has personal jurisdiction over the company even if the company lacks minimum contacts with State B.

Rule 4(k) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure establishes the "territorial limits of effective service" of process for federal district courts. That Rule provides, in relevant part, as follows:

(1) In General. Serving a summons . . . establishes personal jurisdiction over a defendant:

(A) who is subject to the jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction in the state where the district court is located;

- (B) who is a party joined under Rule 14 or 19 and is served within a judicial district of the United States and not more than 100 miles from where the summons was issued; or
- (C) when authorized by a federal statute.

Here, Rule 4(k)(1)(B) gives the federal court personal jurisdiction over the insurance company. First, the insurance company was joined to the case "under Rule 14." Second, the insurance company was served in Big City, State A, which is certainly within some judicial district of the United States. Third, the summons was issued by the federal district court clerk in Small Town, State B, which is 10 miles from Big City; thus, the insurance company was served "not more than 100 miles from where the summons was issued."

The fact that the insurance company apparently has no contacts with State B does not matter under Rule 4(k)(1)(B).

[NOTE #1: Judicial opinions uniformly treat the exercise of personal jurisdiction under Rule 4(k)(1)(B) as constitutional, although they differ on their rationale. Some say that federal court jurisdiction is constitutional as long as the defendant has minimum contacts with the area "comprising the state where the district court is located plus the 100-mile bulge." See Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1127, at 202–05. Others focus on the defendant's contacts with the state in which service occurs. Id. Still others suggest that federal courts can exercise jurisdiction over a defendant with minimum contacts with the nation, regardless of its contacts with the state in which the court is located. Id. Whichever approach is taken, the exercise of personal jurisdiction would be constitutional in this case.]

[NOTE #2: In the absence of the 100-mile-bulge rule, personal jurisdiction over the insurance company would depend on whether the company "is subject to the jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction" in State B. See Fed.R.Civ.P. 4(k)(1)(A). That inquiry would turn on (1) whether the State B long-arm statute provides for jurisdiction and (2) whether the exercise of jurisdiction would be constitutional (i.e., satisfy the minimum contacts/due process test for personal jurisdiction).

As the facts do not provide any information about State B's long-arm statute, the focus in such an analysis would be on the constitutional issue. Here, the insurance company has no contacts with State B that would warrant an exercise of general jurisdiction over it. Accordingly, the question is whether the defendant insurance company has a sufficient connection to State B for State B to exercise "specific personal jurisdiction" over it.

The insurance company's connections with State B are that (1) the woman was involved in an accident in State B, (2) she was allegedly insured by insurance company, and (3) the insurance policy included both a "duty to defend" the woman and a duty to indemnify her. Moreover, the facts strongly imply that the insurance policy's territorial coverage included State B.

Several courts have held on similar facts that a state where an automobile accident occurred can exercise specific personal jurisdiction over an insurer if an accident within the state was within the insurance policy's territorial scope of coverage, even if the insurer had no other contacts with the state. See McGow v. McCurry, 412 F.3d 1207 (11th Cir. 2005), abrogated on other grounds by Diamond Crystal Brands, Inc. v. Food Movers Int'l, Inc., 593 F.3d 1249 (11th Cir. 2010), cert. denied, 131 S. Ct. 158 (2010); Rossman v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 832 F.2d 282 (4th Cir. 1987); Eli Lilly and Co. v. Home Ins. Co., 794 F.2d 710 (D.C. Cir. 1986); Farmers Ins. Exchange v. Portage La Prairie Mut. Ins. Co., 907 F.2d 911 (9th Cir. 1990).

These decisions reason that the inclusion of a state within the scope of an insurance policy's coverage is a "contact" between the insurance company and the state; that the occurrence of a covered accident in the state is also a contact between the company and the state; that the insurance company could reasonably anticipate being haled into the state of the accident by virtue of its agreement to defend the insured; and that an insurance company that agrees to insure against accidents in a state has purposefully availed itself of the privilege of conducting business in the forum.

Thus, a factual and legal analysis of this sort should receive some credit, although the 100-mile-bulge rule provides a more straightforward basis upon which the court can exercise personal jurisdiction.]

Point Three(a) (20%)

An immediate appeal is possible if the court determines there is no just reason for delay and enters a final judgment.

In most circumstances, appeals from the decisions of federal district courts can only be taken when there is a "final judgment" in the case—when all the issues in the suit have been finally determined by the district court. See 28 U.S.C. § 1291. Because the final-judgment rule proved particularly difficult to apply in cases with multiple claims and multiple parties, "Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 54(b) was adopted to identify those orders in a complex litigation setting that determine finally the rights of a given party or a single claim so that an immediate appeal may be allowed." Jack H. Friedenthal, Mary Kay Kane, Arthur R. Miller & Adam N. Steinman, Civil Procedure 595 (6th ed. 2021).

Rule 54(b) provides that a district court decision adjudicating fewer than all the claims in an action is not final unless the district court "expressly determines that there is no just reason for delay" of any appeal and "direct[s] entry of a final judgment," thus certifying the matter as appropriate for appeal. Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure: Judgment § 2655. If the district court takes those actions, then an appellate court will treat the district court's order as satisfying the final judgment rule unless the appellate court concludes that the district court improperly applied Rule 54(b). See id.

The determination of whether "there is no just reason for delay" is a matter that rests with the discretion of the district judge, who is charged with "weighing the overall policy against piecemeal appeals against whatever exigencies the case at hand may present." Panichella v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co., 252 F.2d 452, 455 (3d Cir. 1958). Factors to consider include the length of time it may take to resolve the case as a whole, the hardship to the party if an immediate appeal is not allowed, the relationship between the two claims, and whether the appeal can be fairly decided even though other issues in the case have not been adjudicated. See generally Wright et al., supra, § 2659.

Courts have held that insurance-coverage disputes are generally distinct enough to be certified as final judgments under Rule 54(b), thus permitting immediate appellate review. See Eberts v. Goderstad, 569 F.3d 757, 760 (7th Cir. 2009). When the insurance-coverage dispute includes the question of the insurance company's duty to defend, courts have stated that equitable considerations weigh in favor of Rule 54(b) certification and of staying the pending proceeding because, if the trial court's decision on insurance coverage is in error, the insured party would have to incur the expenses of defending the action without the benefit of litigation insurance. See New York v. Amro Realty Corp., 745 F. Supp. 832, 840 (N.D.N.Y.1990).

Point Three(b) (10%)

On these facts, the district court should, sua sponte or upon request of the woman, enter a Rule 54(b) order authorizing the woman to pursue an immediate appeal.

This is a case that involves multiple parties who raise multiple claims that, although related, have different factual and legal predicates. The man claims a right to recover in tort from the woman. The woman claims, in turn, a right to be defended and indemnified by the insurance company. The man is seeking to hold the woman liable in tort for her allegedly negligent driving. The woman is seeking to enforce her right to be defended and indemnified against that tort claim under an allegedly valid insurance policy.

The district court's order dismissing the woman's third-party complaint against the insurance company for lack of personal jurisdiction is a final decision on that claim for purposes of this case. As long as that decision stands, the woman will not be able to have the insurance company pay for her defense of the lawsuit or seek indemnification from the insurance company if she is adjudged liable. Insofar as her claim against the insurance company is concerned, the case by the woman is at an end. See generally Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction and Related Matters § 3914.6 (dismissals without prejudice, including dismissals for lack of jurisdiction, are appealable as final judgments).

Thus, the district court should conclude that there is "no just reason for delay" of the woman's appeal of the court's decision that it lacks personal jurisdiction over the insurance company.

Not allowing such an appeal would be unfair to the woman, who would otherwise be forced to wait to appeal this question until the man's suit against her had concluded, at which point she would have lost the benefit of the insurance company's contractual obligation to defend her.

Although the woman theoretically could pursue her insurance-coverage claim against the insurance company in another court with jurisdiction, that would be inconvenient for her and could cause her to incur substantially greater expense. By contrast, she has a strong interest in an immediate resolution of the question of whether the insurance company is obligated to pay for her defense. Although the man might want his lawsuit against the woman to proceed without delay, equitable considerations weigh in favor of the court's staying the proceedings and certifying for appeal the question of whether the court has personal jurisdiction over the insurance company. This would allow the court to more expeditiously resolve the question of whether the insurance company has a duty to defend the woman in the man's lawsuit against her. If she must wait to appeal the insurance-coverage question until the man's lawsuit against her is resolved, she will lose the right to have the insurance company defend her. Thus, the district court should certify for appeal under Rule 54(b) its dismissal of the woman's third-party complaint against the insurance company.

[NOTE: The question expressly asks whether the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provide any means to authorize the woman to file an immediate appeal. It is true that there are other available means for appealing non-final judgments by federal district courts such as the “collateral order” doctrine or 28 U.S.C. § 1292, which allows immediate appeal from certain interlocutory orders of the district court. However, not only does the question ask specifically about the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, nothing in the facts supports application of the collateral order doctrine or of 28 USC § 1292.]

ANALYSIS 4 – SECURED TRANSACTIONS

SEC (I.B.; II.B. & D.; III.B.; IV.B.)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This question is intended to test knowledge of the basic elements of enforceability and perfection of security interests as well as choice-of-law principals regarding perfection of a security interest.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does the State X furniture store have an enforceable and perfected security interest in the couch used by the lawyer in her office waiting room in State X?
- (2) Does the State X furniture store have an enforceable and perfected security interest in the table used by the lawyer in her dining room in State X?
- (3) Does the State Y furniture store have an enforceable and perfected security interest in the desk used by the lawyer in her office in State Y?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The State X furniture store has an enforceable security interest in the couch used by the lawyer in her office waiting room in State X, but the security interest is not perfected because the store neither filed a financing statement with respect to the security interest nor retained possession of the couch.

The State X furniture store has a security interest in the table used by the lawyer in her dining room in State X because the store's retention of title to the table constitutes a security interest. The security interest is enforceable and is perfected even though no financing statement was filed because the security interest is a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods and is thereby perfected without the filing of a financing statement.

The State Y furniture store has an enforceable security interest in the desk used by the lawyer in her office in State Y, but the security interest is not perfected by the filing in State Y because State Y is not the lawyer's principal residence.

Point One (25%)

The State X furniture store has an enforceable security interest in the couch used by the lawyer for her office waiting room in State X, but the security interest is not perfected because the store neither filed a financing statement with respect to the security interest nor retained possession of the couch.

A security interest is perfected if it has attached and if the applicable additional requirements for perfection are met. UCC § 9-308(a). A security interest attaches when the security interest becomes enforceable unless an agreement expressly postpones the time of attachment. UCC § 9-203(a). Here, there was no agreement postponing the time of attachment, so the State X furniture store's security interest attached when (and if) it became enforceable.

A security interest becomes enforceable when each of three requirements has been satisfied. First, "value" must be given. UCC § 9-203(b)(1). Here, the furniture store's transfer of the couch to the lawyer constituted value. See UCC § 1-204. Second, the debtor must have rights in the collateral (or the power to transfer rights). UCC § 9-203(b)(2). Here, the debtor (the lawyer) bought the couch and thus had rights in it. Third, either the debtor must have authenticated a security agreement containing a description of the collateral or the collateral must be in possession of the secured party. UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(A)–(B). (There are two other substitutes for an authenticated security agreement in UCC § 9-203(b)(3), but they are not germane here.) In this case, the Credit Sales Agreement constitutes an authenticated (i.e., signed or its electronic equivalent; see UCC § 9-102(a)(7)) security agreement (i.e., an agreement creating or providing for a security interest; see UCC § 9-102(a)(74)), and it contains a description of the collateral. Therefore, the security interest of the State X furniture store is enforceable and has attached.

An attached security interest is perfected only if a financing statement has been filed with respect to it or an exception applies. UCC § 9-310(a). Here, no financing statement has been filed. The only relevant exception would apply if the secured party (the State X furniture store) had possession of the couch, but it does not have possession of it; rather, the couch is in the possession of the lawyer. Accordingly, the security interest of the State X furniture store in the couch used by the lawyer in her State X waiting room is not perfected.

[NOTE: An examinee might note that a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods perfects automatically upon attachment. That statement is true but is irrelevant for this problem. While the security interest is a purchase-money security interest (see analysis in Point Two(b)), the collateral is not consumer goods because the lawyer does not use the couch for personal, family, or household purposes.]

Point Two(a) (15%)

The State X furniture store has a security interest in the table used by the lawyer in her dining room in State X because the store's retention of title to the table constitutes a security interest.

A "security interest" is "an interest in personal property . . . which secures payment or performance of an obligation." UCC § 1-201(b)(35). Inasmuch as the retained interest of the State X furniture store in the table used by the lawyer in her dining room serves to secure her obligation to pay the purchase price, that interest qualifies as a security interest. Moreover, the UCC explicitly provides that "[a]ny retention or reservation by the seller of the title (property) in goods shipped or delivered to the buyer is limited in effect to a reservation of a security interest." UCC § 2-401(1). See also UCC § 1-201(b)(35) (stating that "The retention or reservation of title by a seller of goods notwithstanding shipment or delivery to the buyer under Section 2-401 is limited in effect to a reservation of a 'security interest.'"). These UCC provisions describe the facts in this case—the State X furniture store entered into a transaction under which it delivered the table to the lawyer while purporting to retain title in itself until payment was made. Accordingly, the State X furniture store has a security interest in the table used by the lawyer in her dining room.

Point Two(b) (30%)

The security interest of the State X furniture store in the table used by the lawyer in her dining room in State X is enforceable and has attached. It is perfected even though no financing statement was filed because the security interest is a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods and is perfected upon attachment without the filing of a financing statement.

A security interest is perfected "if it has attached" and if the applicable additional requirements for perfection are met. UCC § 9-308(a). A security interest attaches when the security interest becomes enforceable unless an agreement expressly postpones the time of attachment. UCC § 9-203(a). Here, there was no agreement postponing the time of attachment, so the State X furniture store's security interest attached when (and if) it became enforceable.

A security interest becomes enforceable when each of three requirements has been satisfied. First, "value" must be given. UCC § 9-203(b)(1). Here, the furniture store's transfer of the table to the lawyer constituted value. See UCC § 1-204. Second, the debtor must have rights in the collateral (or the power to transfer rights). UCC § 9-203(b)(2). Here, the debtor (the lawyer) bought the table and thus had rights in it. Third, either the debtor must have authenticated a security agreement containing a description of the collateral or the collateral must be in possession of the secured party. UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(A)–(B). (There are two other substitutes for an authenticated security agreement in § 9-203(b)(3), but they are not germane here.) In this case, the agreement stating that the store would retain title to the table until the lawyer finished paying for it constitutes a "security agreement" because it creates or provides for a security interest. UCC § 9-102(a)(74). The security agreement described the table and was authenticated by the lawyer, so the third requirement was satisfied. Therefore, the security interest of the State X furniture store in the table used by the lawyer in her dining room is enforceable and has attached.

An attached security interest is perfected only if a financing statement has been filed with respect to it or an exception applies. UCC § 9-308. Here, no financing statement has been filed, but an exception applies. UCC § 9-309(1) provides that a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods perfects when it attaches, without the need for the filing of a financing statement. See also UCC §§ 9-308(a) and 9-310(b)(2). The security interest of the State X furniture store in the table used by the lawyer in her dining room is a purchase-money security interest because the lawyer's obligation was incurred as part of the price of the table (a "purchase-money obligation"; see UCC § 9-103(a)(2)) and the table secures that obligation (and thus is "purchase-money collateral"; see UCC § 9-103(a)(1)). UCC § 9-103(b). The dining room table constitutes "consumer goods" because that table, unlike the waiting room couch (and the office desk), is used for personal, family, or household purposes. UCC § 9-102(a)(23). Thus, the State X furniture store's security interest is a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods and is perfected even though no financing statement was filed.

Point Three (30%)

The State Y furniture store has a security interest in the desk used by the lawyer in her office in State Y, but the security interest is not perfected by the filing in State Y because State Y is not the lawyer's principal residence.

The security interest of the State Y furniture store in the desk used in the State Y office is enforceable and has attached for the same reasons described in Point One with respect to the couch used in the State X waiting room.

An attached security interest is perfected only if a financing statement has been filed with respect to it or an exception applies. UCC § 9-310(a). Here, a financing statement was filed in the State Y central filing office for financing statements. However, the law governing perfection of this security interest is the law of State X. This is because the law governing a non-possessory security interest in goods is the law of the jurisdiction in which the debtor is located. UCC § 9-301(1). Although the desk is located in State Y, the debtor (the lawyer) is located in State X because the statute provides that a debtor who is an individual is located at the individual's principal residence. UCC § 9-307(b)(1). The lawyer's principal residence is in State X so, for purposes of the rule in UCC § 9-301, the lawyer is located in State X and therefore State X law applies to perfection of the security interest in the desk. Thus, for the security interest to be perfected, the financing statement would have to have been filed in the State X filing office under State X law rather than in the State Y filing office under State Y law. Accordingly, the security interest of the State Y furniture store will be perfected only if an exception to the filing requirement is applicable. No exception is applicable under these facts.

[NOTE: An examinee might note that a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods perfects automatically upon attachment. That statement is true but is irrelevant for this problem. While the security interest of the State Y furniture store is a purchase-money security interest (see analysis in Point Two(b)), the collateral is not consumer goods because the lawyer does not use the desk for personal, family, or household purposes.]

RLP (V.A.)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This question seeks to test the examinee's knowledge of basic principles of the law of adverse possession including tacking, tolling for disabilities, and the necessity of having a cause of action for possession for the statute of limitations to run.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) In 2020, did Wendy acquire title by adverse possession to the Central Acre?
- (2) Assuming that Wendy did acquire title by adverse possession to the Central Acre in 2020, did she also acquire title to the Western Acre in that year?
- (3) Assuming that Wendy did acquire title by adverse possession to the Central Acre in 2020, did she also acquire title to the Eastern Acre in that year?

DISCUSSION

Summary

In 2020, Wendy acquired title by adverse possession to the Central Acre because for the entire 10-year statutory period she was in actual, open and notorious, continuous, and exclusive possession of the Central Acre in a manner that was hostile and under claim of right. The 10-year statute of limitations against Wendy started running on January 1, 2010, when she entered the Central Acre. It ran continuously for the entire statutory period, even though during that time the Central Acre was owned by John for only six years and by Mary for only four years because John's and Mary's respective causes of action for possession are tacked to each other as Mary is John's heir. Furthermore, it is irrelevant that Mary was only 12 years old when she inherited that running cause of action against Wendy because minority status to toll the running of the statute was required to exist on January 1, 2010, when Wendy entered the Central Acre, and John, who then had the cause of action, was an adult at that time. It is also irrelevant that the continuity of possession was broken on January 1, 2022, because by that time Wendy had already acquired a title by adverse possession to the Central Acre.

In 2020, under the doctrine of constructive adverse possession, Wendy also acquired title to the Western Acre. Under that doctrine, an adverse possessor adversely acquires title to land not actually possessed if the possessor entered under a colorable instrument, as here, describing both the land possessed and adjacent land owned by the same owner that was not actually possessed. Both the Central and Western Acres were owned by John. Thus, Wendy acquired title to both acres in 2020.

Although Wendy had colorable title to all three acres in 2010 and acquired title to the Central and Western Acres in 2020, she did not acquire title to the Eastern Acre by adverse possession. While the Eastern Acre was covered by the quitclaim deed from Smith's descendant to Wendy, it was not owned by John when Wendy entered the Central Acre. Rather, it was owned by Beth. Because Wendy did not possess any land owned by Beth, the 10-year statute of limitations did not run against Beth, and therefore Wendy did not acquire title to the Eastern Acre by adverse possession.

Point One (65% total weight)

Wendy acquired title to the Central Acre by adverse possession in 2020.

Principles of Adverse Possession (15%)

To acquire title by adverse possession, a possessor must wrongfully enter the land of another triggering a cause of action for possession by the true owner of the land. Once the cause of action accrues, the wrongdoer's possession must be actual, open and notorious, continuous, exclusive, and hostile and under claim of right for the entire statutory period over which the true owner could have sued. If the true owner fails to sue by the end of the statutory period, the statute of limitations runs on that suit, with the consequence that the possessor acquires a title by adverse possession good against all the world including the true owner who failed to timely sue.

Here Wendy (the adverse possessor) possessed the Central Acre in a manner that was actual, open and notorious, continuous, exclusive, and hostile and under claim of right from 2010 to 2022, more than the statutory 10-year period. Thus, the only potential impediments to Wendy's acquiring a title by adverse possession are that (1) neither John nor Mary had a cause of action for the full 10 years, (2) Mary was a minor in 2016 when she inherited the cause of action from John, and (3) Wendy ceased being in possession of the Central Acre on January 1, 2022. None of these factors, however, are sufficient to conclude that Wendy did not acquire title by adverse possession to the Central Acre.

Tacking (15%)

For the purpose of determining whether the adverse-possession statutory period has run when successive owners of property are in privity with one another, the time period for bringing an action against a wrongdoer in possession is determined by adding together the time each owner had to bring the action. Sheldon F. Kurtz, Thomas P. Gallanis & Herbert Hovenkamp, The Law of Property, An Introductory Survey § 4.6 at 73 (7th ed. 2018). This principle is called tacking. Among other things, privity exists when the second person inherited the land owned by the first person. Id. Here John had a cause of action against Wendy to recover the title or possession of the Central Acre for six years beginning in 2010 when Wendy entered the Central Acre, and Mary, John's sole heir, had a cause of action against Wendy for four years beginning in 2016. While neither of them had a cause of action against Wendy for 10 years, because Mary inherited the Central Acre from John, the times each could have sued Wendy (6 and 4 years respectively) are aggregated for the purpose of determining whether the 10-year period has run. Here it did.

Disability (30%)

Here the governing statute provides that if, at the time the cause of action for possession accrues, the holder of the cause of action is a minor, the time to bring the cause of action against the possessor is extended by such period as the statute provides. This concept is known as "tolling." (While not relevant here, many states also allow tolling if the holder of the cause of action is mentally incompetent or imprisoned.) In common with the law of other states, here tolling applies only if the person who had the cause of action when the adverse possessor first entered the land at issue was a minor at that time. Tolling does not apply if, after the possessor wrongfully enters the land, a person who is a minor succeeds to the cause of action, as occurred here in 2016. Thus, the fact that Mary was a minor when she acquired the cause of action is irrelevant in determining whether the 10-year statute has run. Id. at 74. See also Dale A. Whitman, Ann M. Burkhardt, R. Wilson Freyermuth & Troy A. Rule, The Law of Property at 748–49 (4th ed. 2019).

Continuity (5%)

To acquire title by adverse possession, the possessor must have been in continuous possession for the statutory period. Once the statutory period has run, the possessor acquires a fee simple title. That adverse possession title is not derived from the former owner(s) who were adversely possessed; it begins a new chain of title. Whitman et al., supra, at 748. Thus, Wendy's wrongful possession ripened into a fee simple on January 1, 2020. The facts state that between January 1, 2010, and January 1, 2020, Wendy's possession was continuous. For adverse possession purposes, that is the only period to which the continuity requirement applies. The fact that Wendy ceased to occupy the Central Acre after she acquired a fee simple title to it is therefore irrelevant. Id. at 754–55.

Point Two (30%)

Most likely, Wendy acquired title to the Western Acre under the doctrine of constructive adverse possession because John (and later Mary) owned both the Central Acre and the Western Acre.

While ordinarily a possessor cannot acquire a title by adverse possession unless the possessor goes into actual possession of land, there is an important exception. It is known as the doctrine of "constructive adverse possession." If a possessor enters under a "colorable" document but only takes possession of a portion of the entire area described in the document, the possessor may claim any additional portion of the entire area described in the document if (a) the area of the additional portion is reasonable in size, (b) the additional portion is adjacent to the portion of the area actually possessed, and (c) the portion possessed and the portion not possessed are owned by the same person. See Whitman et al., supra, at 750–51; Kurtz et al., supra, at 98.

Here, Wendy went into actual possession of the Central Acre, which was owned by John. Wendy did not take actual possession of the Western Acre. However, because the Western Acre was part of the land conveyed to Wendy by a colorable instrument and Wendy went into actual possession of only a portion of the land described by that instrument, she can claim the Western Acre by constructive adverse possession if the Western Acre is reasonable in size. The Western Acre constituted 50% of the two acres owned by John, creating a fact question to be determined by the court as to whether the area described in the document is reasonable in size under the reasonableness requirement.

[NOTE: Most likely a court would find that the Western Acre is reasonable in size and quiet title to it in Wendy. However, an argument could be made that the Western Acre is unreasonable in size. If a court were to adopt that conclusion, Wendy would not acquire title by constructive adverse possession to the Western Acre.]

Point Three (5%)

Wendy did not acquire a title by adverse possession to the Eastern Acre because the Eastern Acre was owned by Beth, and not by John or Mary.

The doctrine of constructive adverse possession does not apply with respect to land adjacent to the possessed land if the adjacent land was owned by a person who did not have a cause of action for possession against the adverse possessor of land which the adverse possessor actually possessed. Kurtz et al., supra, at 100. Here Wendy actually possessed the Central Acre. But Beth had no cause of action against Wendy to recover the Central Acre, as it was owned successively by John and then Mary, and Beth had no cause of action against Wendy for possession of the Eastern Acre because that land was vacant. Thus, constructive adverse possession will not apply to allow Wendy to acquire an adverse possession title to the Eastern Acre. See id.

EVD (II.A. & C.; V.A., I. & K.)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

OBJECTIVE

This question seeks to test the examinee’s knowledge of several rules of evidence and ability to explain how those rules apply to a set of facts involving several different types and uses of evidence.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Are admissions made by a defendant during a guilty plea proceeding admissible in a later civil case concerning the same matter when the defendant ultimately withdrew his guilty plea?
- (2)(a) In a civil action accusing a defendant of invasion of privacy, is evidence that the defendant committed a different invasion relevant and admissible?
- (2)(b) Is relevant deposition testimony admissible when the witness who gave the deposition refuses to testify at trial and is beyond the court’s subpoena power?
- (3) Can a plaintiff who testifies as a witness at trial be impeached by proof that she committed prior dishonest actions?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Because this action is in a federal district court, the Federal Rules of Evidence apply.

Defendant’s admissions at the plea proceeding are inadmissible because Defendant subsequently withdrew his guilty plea.

The man’s deposition testimony that Defendant watched him under circumstances similar to those alleged by Plaintiff is relevant and admissible evidence to prove either Defendant’s knowledge or his intent (or both). Its probative value is high and is not substantially outweighed by a risk of unfair prejudice or other factors warranting exclusion. Although the testimony is hearsay, it is admissible under the hearsay exception for former testimony because the man is unavailable as a witness and Defendant had an opportunity and motive to examine the man at his deposition.

Even if Plaintiff's prior dishonest actions are probative of Plaintiff's character for untruthfulness, Defendant may not introduce extrinsic evidence to prove those prior actions. Prior bad acts showing a character for untruthfulness may, however, be inquired about on cross-examination of Plaintiff.

Point One (25%)

Defendant's admissions at the guilty plea proceeding are inadmissible because Defendant subsequently withdrew his guilty plea.

Defendant, the Plaintiff's former landlord, admitted in open court that he knew about the hole in the wall and repeatedly used it to spy on Plaintiff while she was dressing. This is relevant and highly probative evidence. However, those admissions are not admissible in this civil action because they were made in connection with a withdrawn guilty plea.

Federal Rule of Evidence 410(a) provides that "a statement made during a proceeding" on a guilty plea is "not admissible against the defendant" in a civil or criminal case if the guilty plea "was later withdrawn."

The facts of this problem raise precisely that situation. Defendant admitted at a plea proceeding that he knew about the hole in the wall and repeatedly used it to spy on Plaintiff while she was dressing. Those statements are highly relevant in Plaintiff's civil action against Defendant as they establish critical facts that Plaintiff must prove. However, the statements are inadmissible under Rule 410(a) because they were made in response to questioning by the judge during a guilty plea proceeding and Defendant subsequently withdrew his guilty plea.

Point Two(a) (25%)

The man's deposition testimony that Defendant watched him under circumstances similar to those alleged by Plaintiff is relevant, nonpropensity, other-act evidence of (a) Defendant's knowledge that there was a hole in the utility closet that he could use to peek at Plaintiff and (b) his intent to use the hole to peek at Plaintiff. In addition, the probative value of this evidence is high and is not substantially outweighed by a risk of unfair prejudice or other factors. Thus the court should deny the motion to exclude this evidence.

Evidence is relevant if it "has any tendency to make a fact more or less probable than it would be without the evidence." Fed. R. Evid. 401. Evidence that Defendant engaged in voyeurism of someone other than Plaintiff is relevant in a number of ways. The man's testimony about Defendant's prior similar conduct tends to prove both Defendant's knowledge (that he was aware that he could see into the bathroom through the closet's hole) and his intent (that he entered the utility closet on the occasion in question specifically to watch Plaintiff through the closet hole). Defendant has denied Plaintiff's allegations. Moreover, the probative value of the evidence is strengthened by the fact that the circumstances of the prior incident were nearly identical to the circumstances of the currently alleged tort.

However, the evidence is problematic because it also tends to show that Defendant has a propensity to engage in voyeurism. Although that fact would make it more likely than it would otherwise be that Defendant committed the invasion-of-privacy tort in the case currently under consideration, the Federal Rules of Evidence disfavor propensity evidence. Rule 404(b) prohibits the use of evidence of "any other crime, wrong, or act" to prove character (or propensity), when the purpose is only to show that some other action was in conformity with a person's alleged "character" or propensity. Fed. R. Evid. 404(b).

However, Rule 404(b) expressly does not prohibit evidence of prior bad conduct if the evidence is admitted "for another purpose, such as proving motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, absence of mistake, or lack of accident." As discussed earlier, the man's deposition testimony about Defendant's prior similar conduct tends to prove Defendant's knowledge (that he could see into the bathroom through the closet's hole), which is relevant to establishing Plaintiff's claim that Defendant used the hole in the closet to peek at her. Thus, evidence of Defendant's prior voyeurism against another tenant is not solely propensity evidence, which would be inadmissible.

Evidence of Defendant's prior voyeurism could still be excluded under Rule 403 "if its probative value is substantially outweighed by a danger of . . . unfair prejudice, confusing the issues, misleading the jury, undue delay, wasting time, or needlessly presenting cumulative evidence." Here, the man's deposition testimony has significant probative value in establishing that Defendant's peeking was deliberate and not a mistake (given the similarity of the circumstances of the two episodes). However, there is also the risk that the jury will find Defendant liable not because of his conduct with respect to Plaintiff but because it wishes to punish him for his prior bad actions or because the man's testimony leads the jury to conclude that Defendant is a bad person.

On balance, it seems likely that a court would admit the evidence in this case. The evidence has a high probative value in establishing Defendant's knowledge of the hole in the closet and therefore the deliberateness of his conduct. The risk of jury misuse of the evidence probably does not "substantially outweigh" its probative value. Because this involves only one witness, whose testimony is recorded in a deposition, there is not likely to be a significant risk of wasting time or confusing a fact-finder (factors which, in some circumstances, may also justify exclusion of relevant evidence).

Furthermore, the judge can give the jury a limiting instruction, see Rule 105, that directs the jurors to consider the evidence only when determining whether Defendant knew of the hole in the closet and that it could be used to peek into Plaintiff's bathroom. Such a limiting instruction would minimize the prejudice by directing the jury not to consider the alleged prior bad acts of Defendant as proof that he committed the acts charged on the present occasion or as proof that Defendant has a bad character.

Point Two(b) (25%)

The man's deposition testimony is hearsay, but it is admissible under the hearsay exception for former testimony because the man is unavailable as a witness and Defendant had an opportunity and motive to examine him at the deposition.

Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter stated. Fed. R. Evid. 801(c). Here, the man's deposition testimony is an out-of-court statement, and he will not be attending trial to testify to the same facts in court. In addition, the statement is clearly being offered to "prove the truth of the matter asserted" in the statement, i.e., that Defendant tortiously spied on the man in his bathroom, invading his privacy. Its relevance and admissibility depend on the assertion being true, and there is no reason to admit it other than to prove the truth of what is asserted. In short, the man's deposition testimony is hearsay.

Hearsay is not admissible in federal court unless admission is specifically authorized by the rules of evidence, by federal statute, or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court. Fed. R. Evid. 802. In this case, admission of the man's deposition testimony is authorized by the hearsay exception for former testimony. Fed. R. Evid. 804(b)(1).

A declarant's hearsay statement can be admitted under the former-testimony exception if three requirements are satisfied. First, the declarant must be "unavailable as a witness" in the trial or proceeding at which the hearsay statement will be used. Fed. R. Evid. 804(a). Second, the statement must be in the form of "testimony that was given as a witness at a trial, hearing, or lawful deposition." Fed. R. Evid. 804(b)(1). Third, the evidence must be offered against a party who "had . . . an opportunity and similar motive to develop it by direct, cross-, or redirect examination." Id.

All three requirements are met here. First, a witness is unavailable when the witness "is absent from the trial or hearing" and the proponent of the witness's statement "has not been able, by process or other reasonable means, to procure the declarant's attendance." Fed. R. Evid. 804(a)(5). The facts state that the man refuses to testify at the trial, that he lives hundreds of miles away from State A, and that Plaintiff has been unable to persuade him to attend the trial. Process cannot be used to force the man to attend the trial, as a federal court has power to compel attendance only for witnesses who reside or work within 100 miles of the court or in the same state as the court. Fed. R. Civ. Pro. 45(c). Plaintiff has tried persuasion, the only other reasonable means to procure attendance, and that has failed. Therefore, the man is unavailable.

The man's prior hearsay statement is in the form of testimony at a lawful deposition, satisfying the second prong of the hearsay exception. The third and final prong is satisfied by the fact that Defendant had an opportunity to examine the man at the deposition. Furthermore, Defendant had a motive to discredit the man's deposition testimony through cross-examination, knowing that the testimony was being secured to establish a pattern of behavior on Defendant's part that could later be used against him at trial.

Hence, although the man's prior statement is hearsay, it falls within a hearsay exception and is admissible.

Point Three (25%)

Even if Plaintiff's prior dishonest actions are probative of her character for untruthfulness, the court should rule that Defendant may not introduce extrinsic evidence to prove those actions. Defendant may, however, inquire about them while cross-examining Plaintiff.

Evidence that Plaintiff plagiarized a paper in college and lied about it on her graduate school application is relevant to prove her character for truthfulness or, more precisely, untruthfulness. Both the fact that Plaintiff would represent work that was done by someone else as her own work and the fact that she would lie about that on a high-stakes application suggest that she has a tendency to be untruthful. Such evidence has probative value insofar as it undermines her credibility and makes it less likely that she is telling the truth about what happened in her encounter with Defendant. Fed. R. Evid. 401.

Defendant may not introduce extrinsic evidence (e.g., evidence other than Plaintiff's testimony) of this alleged misconduct at trial. Fed. R. Evid. 608(b). If Plaintiff testifies, however, Defendant may cross-examine her about these alleged actions. Id.

QUESTION 1 – TORTS

GS gas is a commonly used pesticide injected into the soil before farmers plant crops. After two weeks, 90% of GS will have risen from the soil into the air, and crops can be safely planted. GS is highly toxic and can be fatal to people in a confined area, where even slight exposure can cause serious respiratory problems. Some scientists believe that GS likely causes cancer. Several studies have linked GS exposure to cancer in mice, but no study has definitively linked GS exposure to cancer in humans.

Ten years ago, State A's health department researched GS. It found that GS injected into the soil eventually rises above ground and can then drift to nearby land up to one mile from each application point. It also found that before GS rises into the upper atmosphere, it can remain near ground level for several days in concentrations much higher than the department's suggested "safe" exposure limit. It therefore banned GS use in farming.

Two years ago, however, the health department lifted the GS ban in a county where most farms produce valuable crops that are very difficult to grow without effective pesticides. After the only other effective pesticide was taken off the market, the department lifted the GS ban because of several factors, including the need for GS in order to grow the county's traditional crops, the lack of viable substitute crops, the lack of other effective pesticides on the market, the estimated cost of crop losses county-wide if GS were not allowed ($500 million annually), and the low population density in the county. The department requires all farmers using GS to attend a safety seminar that presents information on various risks of GS use (including the risks described in the department's findings supporting its earlier GS ban) and instruction on prudent GS application.

A married couple moved to this county 10 years ago and rented a house on land adjacent to fields that were owned by a local farmer. The couple has rented and lived in the house for the past 10 years.

When the health department lifted the ban on GS in the county, the local farmer attended the department's safety seminar and then began applying GS to the fields according to the application safety recommendations presented in the seminar. The farmer has used GS at the beginning of the last two planting seasons. The couple's house is less than a mile from several points where the farmer applied GS.

Last year, the wife was diagnosed with cancer and the husband began experiencing severe respiratory problems during the planting season. The wife believes that GS caused her cancer, and the husband believes that GS caused his respiratory ailments. Although cancer rates in the county are consistent with the state rate, reports of severe respiratory problems in the county have increased by 50% since the department lifted the ban on GS. The rate of respiratory illness in the county during planting season is now well above the rate of respiratory illness in other counties in the state at the same time of year.

The wife has sued the farmer to recover damages for her cancer, alleging negligence. The husband has also sued the farmer, alleging trespass and seeking injunctive relief to stop the farmer's GS use within one mile of the couple's house.

1. What must the wife prove to establish her negligence claim? Will she likely prevail? Explain.
2. What must the husband prove to establish his trespass claim? Will he likely prevail? Explain.
3. Assuming that the husband prevails, is it likely that the court will permanently enjoin the farmer from using GS within one mile of the couple's house? Explain.

QUESTION 2 – CORPORATIONS & LLCs / AGENCY

Parent LLC and Sub LLC are both manager-managed LLCs, each with a sole manager. Parent LLC is the sole member of Sub LLC and selects Sub's manager. Parent obtains recycled plastic from various sources. Parent then sells some of this plastic to Sub at prevailing market prices. Sub uses the plastic to make upscale shoes, which it then sells.

The two companies work closely together. Sub sets its shoe production schedule and creates marketing programs based on Parent's projections of its access to recycled plastic. The local newspaper once characterized the two companies as "partners promoting business sustainability."

The two companies' collaboration is also reflected in their management structures and operations. They share personnel for human resources, accounting, and government relations. In addition, Parent's technical staff regularly works with Sub in designing and testing new processes for using recycled plastic. The two companies have no arrangement for sharing the costs of these services.

Last November, Sub entered into a delivery agreement with VanCo pursuant to which VanCo would deliver shoes made by Sub to Sub's customers. At the request of Sub's manager, who was away from the office, the agreement was signed by Greta, the manager of Parent, who happened to be visiting the Sub offices that day. Greta, who was not employed by Sub, signed the agreement and wrote beneath her signature: "as agent of Sub."

Recently, Sub ran into financial difficulties after a slowdown in the upscale shoe market. Sub is no longer able to pay its creditors and has stopped payments due under the delivery agreement with VanCo. Therefore, Sub, which for a time had been regularly distributing its profits to Parent as the sole member of Sub, has discontinued making distributions to Parent. Although Sub's operating agreement requires that its manager "consult with Parent's management group" before discontinuing distributions to Parent, Sub's manager discontinued these payments without consulting with Parent.

Assume that Sub is liable to VanCo under the delivery agreement and is unable to satisfy the claims by VanCo.

1. Is Parent liable to VanCo as a partner of Sub? Explain.
2. Is Parent bound by the agreement between Sub and VanCo signed by Parent's manager? Explain.
3. Should the fact that Parent and Sub are separate organizations be disregarded so that Parent is liable for Sub's obligations to VanCo? Explain.

QUESTION 3 – TRUSTS & FUTURE INTERESTS

In 2008, Tom died in State A survived by his 64-year-old wife, Betty, to whom he had been married for 35 years. He was also survived by his estranged daughter from a previous marriage.

Tom had created a valid testamentary trust stating as follows:

- (1) Betty and I have had a wonderful marriage; she is the love of my life, and my primary purpose in creating this trust is to ensure that there will be sufficient funds to provide for her care and support for the rest of her life.
- (2) During Betty's lifetime, 80% of trust income shall be paid to her annually, and the balance of income shall be accumulated and added to trust principal to ensure further growth in the principal that will generate more future income for her.
- (3) Upon Betty's death, all trust assets shall be paid to my daughter. Sadly, I have no other relatives, so I have little choice but to bequeath the trust to my daughter rather than have the trust property escheat to the state.
- (4) No beneficiary may alienate or assign her interest in this trust, nor shall such interest be subject to the claims of her creditors.

Until 2019, 80% of trust income was sufficient, as Tom had anticipated, to provide for Betty's care and support. In 2019, when Betty was 75 years old, she was diagnosed with a health problem that necessitated her move to a nursing home. Initially, her income from the trust and Social Security enabled her to pay for her nursing-home care and other support needs.

Betty is now 79. Nursing-home fees have dramatically increased, a circumstance that Tom had not anticipated. Even with all available resources and government benefits, Betty can no longer afford current and likely future nursing-home fees.

Betty has asked the trustee to terminate the trust and invest the entire trust principal in an annuity, payable to her. A financial adviser has identified two annuities. Annuity A would provide payments sufficient for Betty's care and support for the rest of her life.

Annuity B would provide payments to Betty that are 3% less than the payments under Annuity A but still sufficient for her care and support. It would also include a cash payment payable to the testator's daughter at Betty's death. This payment would be substantially less than the amount the daughter would receive under the trust.

Betty has asked the trustee that, if the trust cannot be terminated, she be paid 100% of trust income so that she can at least meet her current nursing-home expenses and remain in her current nursing home for the time being.

State A's Trust Code includes the following provisions:

§ 1 A trust may be terminated upon consent of all the beneficiaries, if the court concludes that continuance of the trust is not necessary to achieve any material purpose of the trust.

§ 2 Upon termination of a trust under Section 1, the trustee shall distribute the trust property as agreed by the beneficiaries.

§ 3 For purposes of Section 1, a spendthrift provision in the trust is not presumed to constitute a material purpose of the trust.

§ 4 If not all beneficiaries of a trust consent to a proposed termination of the trust pursuant to Section 1, the court may nonetheless approve the termination if the court is satisfied that, if all the beneficiaries had consented, the trust could have been terminated under that section, and the interests of a beneficiary who does not consent can be appropriately protected in accordance with the testator's probable intention.

§ 5 A court may modify the dispositive terms of a trust if, because of circumstances not anticipated by the testator, modification will further the primary purpose of the trust. To the extent practicable, the modification must be made in accordance with the testator's probable intention.

1. If the daughter consents to the termination of the trust and the purchase of Annuity A (wholly for the benefit of Betty), may a court authorize the trustee to terminate the trust and purchase Annuity A? Explain.
2. If the daughter does not consent to the termination of the trust and the purchase of Annuity B (for the benefit of Betty and the daughter), may a court authorize the trustee to terminate the trust and purchase Annuity B? Explain.
3. If a court does not authorize the termination of the trust, may it, without the daughter's consent, authorize the trustee to pay 100% of the trust income to Betty? Explain.

QUESTION 4 – CIVIL PROCEDURE

On January 4, 2023, Diner Inc. sued Tech Inc. in federal district court in State A. Diner Inc.'s complaint read in full (excluding captions and signatures) as follows:

Complaint

1. Diner Inc. (Diner) seeks damages for breach of contract by Tech Inc. (Tech). The contract is governed by the law of State A.
2. This Court has jurisdiction based on diversity. Diner is incorporated in State C, and Tech is incorporated in State D. The amount in controversy exceeds $75,000.
3. Venue is proper in the District of State A because each party maintains its principal place of business in State A and all the material facts in this matter occurred in State A.
4. On January 15, 2018, Diner and Tech entered into an oral contract in State A. Under the terms of the contract, Tech agreed to design software for a voice-recognition ordering system for Diner's locations. Diner paid $125,000 for the software.
5. On November 30, 2018, Tech delivered software for a voice-recognition ordering system. However, the software did not enable Diner's computers to recognize orders for all the items on a typical Diner menu. It permitted recognition only of "combination meal" orders identified by number, such as "combo #2."
6. On December 1, 2018, Diner notified Tech that the software failed to allow recognition of orders for all menu items and that this failure constituted a breach of contract. Tech refused to correct this breach.
7. As a result of this breach of contract, the software was useless to Diner and Diner is entitled to a return of the contract price plus other damages.

Tech's answer, excluding captions and signatures, read in full as follows:

Answer

1. Tech admits the allegations in paragraphs 1–5 of the Complaint.
2. Tech denies the allegations in paragraphs 6–7 of the Complaint.

One month after filing its answer, Tech filed a motion asking the court to grant summary judgment for two reasons. First, Tech argued that Diner's action was barred by the applicable four-year statute of limitations governing contract disputes. Second, Tech contended that its contract with Diner required it to produce voice-recognition software capable of recognizing only "combination meal" orders and that it fully performed that obligation.

In support of its motion, Tech cited the applicable statute of limitations, which states that actions for breach of contract must be brought within four years after the breach occurred. Tech also attached to its motion the affidavit of its president, who asserted (1) that she and Diner's president had agreed that the voice-recognition software would cover "only combination meals identified by number" and (2) that in any event, any breach occurred no later than November 30, 2018, when Tech delivered the software to Diner, which was more than four years before suit was filed.

Diner opposed Tech's motion for summary judgment and made a cross-motion for partial summary judgment on the issue of a contract breach. Diner asserted that the terms of the contract covered all menu items and that Tech's admission of the allegations in paragraph 5 of the Complaint (i.e., that the software did not cover all menu items) established Tech's breach of contract. In support of its cross-motion, Diner submitted the deposition testimony of eight witnesses to the agreement (including two Tech employees), who testified that they were present when the company presidents met and entered into the contract and that they heard the two presidents agree that the voice-recognition system would "cover all menu items."

Neither party offered a copy of a written contract because there was no written contract.

1. Did Tech properly raise the statute of limitations defense? Explain.
2. Assuming that the court reaches the issue of contract breach, how should it resolve the summary-judgment motions on that issue? Explain.
3. Is there any significant action that the court should take on its own initiative unrelated to the merits of the parties' summary-judgment motions? Explain.

QUESTION 5 – SECURED TRANSACTIONS

On February 1, Company acquired from Supplier a machine for use in Company's business. The price of the machine was $30,000. Supplier agreed that, in exchange for a down payment of $6,000 and a promise to pay the remaining $24,000 in 12 monthly payments of $2,000, Supplier would immediately deliver the machine to Company but retain title to it until Company paid the remaining $24,000. This arrangement was memorialized in a writing signed by both parties. The writing clearly described the machine. Company paid the down payment, and Supplier delivered the machine. Supplier did not file a financing statement with respect to this transaction.

On March 2, Company borrowed $1,000,000 from Lender. The loan agreement, which was signed by both parties, stated that, to secure its obligation to repay the loan, Company granted a security interest to Lender in "all of Company's personal property." Also on March 2, Lender filed a financing statement reflecting this transaction, listing Company as the debtor and Lender as the secured party and indicating "all of Company's personal property" as the collateral. The financing statement was filed in the proper filing office.

On April 3, Company borrowed $750,000 from BigBank. The loan agreement, which was signed by both parties, stated that, to secure its obligation to repay the loan, Company granted a security interest to BigBank in "all of Company's present and future equipment." On May 4, BigBank filed a financing statement reflecting this transaction, listing Company as the debtor and BigBank as the secured party and indicating "all of Company's present and future equipment" as the collateral. The financing statement was filed in the proper filing office.

By August 1, Company had defaulted on its obligations to Supplier, Lender, and BigBank. Each of those creditors is claiming an interest in the machine supplied to Company by Supplier and is asserting that its interest has priority over any interest of either of the other creditors.

1. (a) Does Supplier have an enforceable interest in the machine? Explain.
(c) Does Lender have an enforceable interest in the machine? Explain.
(d) Does BigBank have an enforceable interest in the machine? Explain.
2. What is the order of priority of the enforceable interests in the machine? Explain.

QUESTION 6 – CRIMINAL LAW & PROCEDURE

Just after midnight, police in State A received a report of four men lurking in the alley behind a pharmacy that had been burglarized two weeks earlier. Five minutes later, Officers One and Two stopped a car operating illegally without headlights one block from the pharmacy. Four men were in the car: Adam, Ben, Carl, and Dillon.

Officer One told Adam, the driver of the car, "You were driving illegally without headlights. Step out of the car and hand me your driver's license." Although Officer One did not say so, he suspected that Adam had been involved in the prior burglary and in fact planned to arrest him. As Adam got out of the car, Officer One saw a bulge in Adam's jacket. He pat-searched Adam for weapons and felt nothing suspicious. Wanting to conceal his plan to arrest Adam, he said to him, "Just hold on here a couple of minutes. You're not free to leave now, but you will be as soon as I finish ticketing you for the headlight violation and verify that your license is valid. By the way, where were you guys coming from when we stopped you?" Adam responded, "I say nothing without a lawyer." Officer One said, "Relax, I'm just making small talk. We'll release you in a few minutes whether or not you answer questions. I'm just curious where you guys were tonight." Adam replied, "We were coming from behind the pharmacy."

Ten minutes into the traffic stop, based on incriminating evidence that other officers had just found behind the pharmacy, Officers One and Two arrested all four men on suspicion of burglary and drove them to the police department.

Officer Two took Ben into a room and said, "I need to tell you that you have all the rights the Constitution gives you, along with any Miranda rights you might have. Do you understand?" Ben replied, "Yes, but to avoid prison, I'll admit that me and my buddies broke into the pharmacy a few weeks ago. If you agree not to charge me, I promise to testify against the others."

Officer Three took Carl to a different room. He read this statement aloud: "You have the right to remain silent. Anything you say can be used against you in a court of law. You have the right to an attorney and to have the attorney with you for questioning. If you cannot afford an attorney, one will be provided for you." Officer Three then gave Carl a copy of the statement and watched Carl silently read it. Carl said that he understood his rights, and through two hours of questioning, he sat staring sternly at Officer Three and said nothing. Finally, Officer Three said, "I'm not assuming you're exercising a right to remain silent; I don't read minds. So again, were you involved in the burglary?" Carl then said, "OK. I was there two weeks ago, but I was only sort of a lookout."

Officer Four sincerely but incorrectly thought that another officer had advised Dillon of his Miranda rights. Officer Four took Dillon to the county jail, and while there, Officer Four spoke privately with Cellmate, an inmate and police informant. Officer Four urged Cellmate to introduce himself to Dillon, gain his trust, and ask him about the burglary. Officer Four promised in exchange to give Cellmate $50 and to convince the prosecutor to offer him an early-release deal. Three hours later, Cellmate informed Officer Four,

"I did everything you asked, and Dillon bragged that he broke into the pharmacy two weeks ago and tried again last night."

Two days later, State A charged all four men with burglary and agreed to try them separately. Each moved the trial court to suppress evidence solely on the ground that admission of his statement into the criminal trial would violate his rights under Miranda. Specifically,

1. Adam moved to suppress the incriminating statement he made to Officer One.
2. Ben moved to suppress the incriminating statement he made to Officer Two.
3. Carl moved to suppress the incriminating statement he made to Officer Three.
4. Dillon moved to suppress the incriminating statement he made to Cellmate.

How should the trial court rule on each motion to suppress? Explain.

ANALYSIS 1 – TORTS

TOR (I.A.; II.B., C., D.2., E.1)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) What must the wife prove to establish her negligence claim? Will she likely prevail?
- (2) What must the husband prove to establish his trespass claim? Will he likely prevail?
- (3) Assuming that the husband prevails, is it likely that the court will permanently enjoin the farmer from using GS within one mile of the couple's house?

DISCUSSION

Summary

To recover damages for her cancer on a negligence theory, the wife must prove that the farmer owed her a duty, that the farmer breached that duty, that the breach of duty caused the harm, and that the harm was within the farmer's scope of liability (proximate cause). Here, duty is clear, but breach and causation are less clear. It is possible that the wife can prove that the farmer breached a duty to her. But it is unlikely that she will be able to show causation.

To establish a trespass, the husband must prove that he has a possessory interest in land and that the farmer intentionally invaded that interest through the use of GS. Here, the husband's rental of the house establishes a possessory interest. Given that GS is known to drift onto properties near farms where it is used, the husband can almost certainly prove that, by using GS, the farmer intended an invasion. However, in a significant majority of jurisdictions applying modern tort principles, invasion by a gas does not constitute trespass.

Traditionally, establishing an ongoing trespass entitled the plaintiff to injunctive relief. Today, however, many, if not most, courts deny injunctive relief if the harm to the defendant or the public from granting an injunction outweighs the negative impact on the plaintiff of not granting the injunction. Here, there are a number of factors that suggest that an injunction should not be granted.

Point One (40%)

To recover damages from the farmer for her cancer based on a claim of negligence, the wife needs to establish duty, breach, causation, and scope of liability (proximate causation). Duty is clear in this case; in general, defendants engaging in potentially dangerous activities owe a duty to anyone they might harm. Similarly, scope of liability is not a significant issue here: the risk of cancer is exactly the kind of risk that makes applying the gas dangerous. The main challenges to the wife's negligence claim are her ability to prove (1) breach of the duty of reasonable care and (2) causation in fact; thus, her claim will likely fail.

Under modern tort principles, the farmer will owe a duty to others to exercise reasonable care. See Restatement (Third) of Torts: Liability for Physical and Emotional Harm § 7(a) (2010) (“An actor ordinarily has a duty to exercise reasonable care when the actor’s conduct creates a risk of physical harm.”). Breach of the duty of reasonable care (sometimes itself called “negligence”) requires a fact-sensitive inquiry; reasonableness is determined “under all the circumstances.” Id. § 3; see also 1 Dan B. Dobbs, Paul T. Hayden, and Ellen M. Bublick, The Law of Torts § 125 (2d ed. 2011) (“The duty or standard imposed in most cases is the duty of reasonable care under the circumstances, no more, no less. Equivalent shorthand terms are due care and ordinary care.”).

Here, several facts can plausibly suggest that the farmer breached his duty of reasonable care: the widely suspected general dangers associated with GS; the farmer’s particular knowledge of those risks (based on the training he received); research that shows that when GS is applied to land, concentrations above “safe” levels on neighboring land may result; the fact that he applied GS within one mile of a residence; and evidence that a small amount of GS can cause serious respiratory disorders. Based on the generally known and suspected risks, any reasonably prudent person might avoid using GS altogether. Based on the farmer’s specific knowledge of risks, which is a factor that is “to be taken into account in determining whether the actor has behaved as a reasonably careful person,” Restatement (Third) of Torts § 12, he could have breached the duty of ordinary care by applying GS in areas where it could harm his neighbors.

Other facts, however, suggest that the farmer did not act in an unreasonable manner so as to breach his duty of care: the benefits of GS were significant; the state had studied the matter and decided that the benefits of GS’s use in the county outweighed the risks; and scientific research has not specifically established GS’s risk of cancer in humans. In short, it is conceivable, but far from certain, that a fact-finder would likely conclude that the farmer’s use of GS was unreasonable.

The fact that the health department permits the use of GS does not preclude a finding of negligence. Complying with statutes and regulations does not, on its own, imply that a defendant has acted safely, although it is one factor to consider. See Restatement (Third) of Torts § 16(a) (“An actor’s compliance with a pertinent statute, while evidence of nonnegligence, does not preclude a finding that the actor is negligent . . . for failing to adopt precautions in addition to those mandated by the statute.”); Restatement (Second) of Torts § 288C, cmt. a (1965) (“Where a statute, ordinance or regulation is found to define a standard of conduct for the purposes of negligence actions, . . . the standard defined is normally a minimum standard . . . [that] does not prevent a finding that a reasonable man would have taken additional precautions where the situation is such as to call for them.”).

Finally, to recover damages in a negligence claim, the wife must also show that the farmer's use of GS in fact caused her cancer. Restatement (Third) of Torts § 26. On the facts here, she probably cannot do so.

For one thing, the wife may not even be able to prove that GS causes cancer in humans in general. That is, even putting aside her individual case, there is no clear evidence for a scientific link between GS and cancer in humans. At most, there is suggestive evidence—animal studies and suspicion by scientists—but no scientific study has established that GS causes cancer in humans. The wife cannot establish that a toxic agent caused her harm without showing this general linkage—sometimes called “general causation.”

Moreover, even if GS were known to cause cancer in human populations in general, the wife will not be able to prove that it caused her cancer. This is sometimes called “specific causation.” See Dobbs et al., supra, § 184, at 616 (“[G]eneral causation is necessary to the plaintiff's case, [but] it is not sufficient; the plaintiff must then go further and present evidence that causation is not merely scientifically possible, but that it existed in her particular case.”). Here, cancer is not a “signature disease” linked to GS; when, as here, an underlying disease like cancer may result from many different causes, the plaintiff cannot meet her burden of proof as to causation simply by showing that she was exposed to GS. See Allen v. United States, 588 F. Supp. 247 (D. Utah 1984) (dismissing various cancer cases allegedly caused by radiation exposure), rev'd on other grounds, 816 F.2d 1417 (10th Cir. 1987). While some scientists believe that GS causes cancer, there is no epidemiological evidence showing a link between exposure like the wife's and cancer, nor is there evidence of a higher incidence of cancer in the county than there is statewide. With only these facts, the wife cannot establish that the farmer's use of GS caused her cancer. Her negligence action would therefore fail.

Point Two (30%)

To establish a trespass by the farmer, the husband needs to show actual and exclusive possession of land and the farmer's nonprivileged entry upon that land. In many jurisdictions, a showing of intent would also be required. Here, the husband can show the requisite possessory interest and probably can show intent (i.e., knowledge). But entry by gas is not normally sufficient for trespass. Thus, his trespass claim will fail.

A trespass occurs when a person, or an entity that the person controls, enters or remains upon land in the possession of another without a privilege to do so. Restatement (Second) of Torts §§ 158, 329; Johnson v. Paynesville Farmers Union Coop. Oil Co., 817 N.W.2d 693, 701 (Minn. 2012). Today, trespass is often categorized as an intentional tort. For the purposes of this tort, “intent” includes either purpose or knowledge: an unlawful entry thus may be shown based on either the “desire to bring about” such an entry or knowledge that an unlawful entry “is substantially certain to result.” Restatement (Third) of Torts § 1(b). See also Restatement (Second), supra. Any person with actual and exclusive possession of land (such as that conferred by a rental agreement) may bring a trespass action. Nominal damages are generally presumed, and a trespass additionally subjects the trespasser to liability for physical harm to the land or possessor. See Johnson, supra, at 704.

Here, the couple rents the land and house where they live together, and this rental satisfies the requirement that the husband have actual and exclusive possession of land. He can probably show intent on the part of the farmer, because the farmer attended a safety seminar in which he was informed of the health department's findings about the environmental risks of GS, which would have included the fact that GS moves from the land where it is applied to neighboring land. The husband can use the same health department findings to show that GS, a gas controlled by the farmer, likely entered the air above his land.

Entries above land, rather than on the ground, may still count as trespasses. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 159 (1965). But entry by gas is not normally sufficient for trespass.

The rule requiring tangible entry for a trespass remains sound today, and reflects ancient history reinforced by contemporary policy. Pollution, noise, gases, unpleasant sights, and dangerous conditions such as stored explosives can all reduce one's enjoyment of land, but courts have been unwilling to say that a landowner would have a claim for damages any time she heard a noise or smelled burning leaves. The policy view is that the law of trespass with its automatic responsibility for any purposeful or certain entry would produce too much liability. It provides no mechanism for limiting liability to serious or substantial invasions. If smoke drifting onto the plaintiff's land were held to be a trespass, even a little smoke would count. The law of nuisance is therefore better suited to such cases. Dobbs et al, supra § 53.

Courts have occasionally permitted trespass claims based on an invasion by intangible airborne particles. See, e.g., In re Tenn. Valley Auth. Ash Spill Litig., 805 F. Supp. 2d 468, 484 (E.D. Tenn. 2011) (finding that invasions of intangible particles in Tennessee are trespasses without a showing of actual or substantial harm). But by far most jurisdictions have denied trespass claims based on the entry of intangible forces like electricity or odors. See, e.g., Wendiger v. Forst Farms, Inc., 662 N.W.2d 546 (Minn. Ct. App. 2003) (odors from hog farm); Beal v. W. Farmers Elec. Coop., 228 P.3d 538 (Okla. Ct. Civ. App. 2010) (stray electricity); John Larkin, Inc. v. Marceau, 959 A.2d 551, 556 (Vt. 2008) (air particulates); Barnett v. Conn. Light & Power Co., 900 F. Supp. 2d 224, 245–46 (D. Conn. 2012) (electromagnetic fields). When jurisdictions have permitted trespass claims based on intangible or other nontraditional intrusions, they have generally treated the claims more like nuisance claims by “requir[ing] proof of damage to the invaded property.” Darney v. Dragon Products Co. LLC, 994 A.2d 804, 807 (Me. 2010). See also John Larkin, Inc., 959 A.2d at 554–55 (acknowledging modern trespass theory permitting claims for entry by intangible airborne particulates but dismissing trespass action due to the absence of physical impact interfering with exclusive possession). In such jurisdictions, the husband could conceivably establish that additional factor based on the evidence linking GS to his respiratory illness.

In the large majority of jurisdictions, however, the husband's trespass claim will fail because he can show only the entry onto his land of GS, a gas.

Point Three (30%)

If the husband establishes an ongoing trespass, a court would likely deny injunctive relief because the impact of the injunction would have a disproportionate impact on the farmer and because the health department approved use of GS in the county.

If the husband succeeds in establishing an ongoing trespass, a court will apply a balancing test to determine whether he can obtain injunctive relief. See Restatement (Second) of Torts § 936. Traditionally, establishing an ongoing trespass or private nuisance entitled the plaintiff to injunctive relief automatically. However, courts now consider the impact on both parties and on the public before granting injunctive relief. Courts have denied injunctive relief when the defendant's activity is valuable and granting injunctive relief would require the defendant to close down because the technology to avoid the harm inherent in the defendant's activity is not available. See Boomer v. Atlantic Cement Co., 257 N.E.2d 870 (N.Y. 1970) (declining injunctive relief against emission of dust from cement factory due to lack of technology to produce cement without emitting dust). "Both before and after Boomer, courts have balked at granting injunctive relief in cases of extreme disparity." Richard A. Epstein & Catherine M. Sharkey, Cases and Materials on Torts 618 (11th ed. 2016).

Here, an injunction could well have a profoundly adverse impact on the farmer. The facts suggest that GS or an alternative pesticide is needed to grow the county's crops, that alternatives to GS are apparently unavailable, and that other crops cannot easily be grown in the county. The exact monetary loss that the individual farmer would suffer is unknown, but it likely would be significant, given that the health department estimated county-wide losses of $500 million annually if use of GS were not allowed. Furthermore, the farmer would have to stop using GS on all areas within a mile of the couple's house, which would likely cover a substantial amount of cropland.

On the other hand, the benefit to the husband of stopping the farmer's use is unknown based on the facts presented, but he will attempt to show a causal relationship between the GS application and his adverse respiratory symptoms. The farmer will likely contend that, even if the husband is not exposed to GS from the farmer's land, GS is used throughout the county, and he is likely to continue to be exposed to the gas even if the farmer stops using it.

A court would also likely take the health department's decision to permit GS use into account. On balance, it is likely that, as in Boomer, a court would decline to order permanent injunctive relief on these facts.

ANALYSIS 2 – CORPORATIONS & LLCs / AGENCY

COR (III.; V.D.; VIII.) / AGC (II.; IV.A)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is a parent LLC liable to a third-party creditor of its wholly owned subsidiary LLC as a partner of the subsidiary because the subsidiary distributes its profits to the parent and the two companies share personnel and staff?
- (2) Is a parent LLC liable as a party to a contract that was signed by the parent’s manager when the manager was acting as an agent of the parent’s wholly owned subsidiary LLC?
- (3) Is a parent LLC liable under the “piercing the company veil” doctrine for obligations of its wholly owned subsidiary LLC to a third-party creditor of the subsidiary when
 - (a) the parent company is the sole member of the subsidiary company;
 - (b) the two companies coordinate their business activities;
 - (c) the two companies share personnel and staff;
 - (d) the subsidiary company distributes profits to the parent company; and
 - (e) the general manager of the subsidiary company failed to follow “formalities” in discontinuing distributions from the subsidiary to the parent company?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Parent is not liable to VanCo as a partner of Parent’s wholly owned subsidiary Sub because the two LLCs do not “carry on as co-owners a business for profit.” They share neither profits nor control of a single business. Their legal relationship is that of parent-subsidiary, not that of partners.

Parent is not bound by the agreement between its subsidiary Sub and VanCo. Even though the agreement was signed by Parent’s manager (Greta), she acted solely on behalf of Sub, at the request of Sub’s manager, and signed the contract as “agent of Sub.”

Parent should not be liable to VanCo on a piercing-the-company-veil theory. In LLC piercing cases, courts generally apply similar fact-intensive piercing tests and factors as are applied in corporate parent-subsidary piercing cases. Here, the facts do not indicate, with respect to the Sub-VanCo relationship, that Parent engaged in fraudulent behavior that created the impression that the two companies were not separate. Nor is there any indication that Parent engaged in preferential transfers from Sub at the expense of Sub's creditors. Under the [Revised] Uniform Limited Liability Company Act (RULLCA) (2006), the failure of Sub's general manager to follow formalities in discontinuing distributions to Parent is not a relevant piercing factor. Indeed, the discontinuance of distributions to Parent provides evidence of Sub's appropriate behavior to protect the interests of its creditors.

Point One (35%)

Parent is not liable for Sub's debts as a partner of Sub because the two LLCs do not carry on as co-owners a business for profit.

Generally, partners are jointly and severally liable for the obligations of their partnership. See [Revised] Uniform Partnership Act (RUPA) (1997) § 306(a). Thus, the question here is whether Parent and Sub are partners.

A partnership is defined as "the association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit . . . whether or not the persons intend to form a partnership." RUPA § 202(a) (1997, as amended 2013). A partnership may be formed by individuals, as well as by legal or commercial entities. RUPA § 102(14) (definition of "person" includes an individual or "legal or commercial entity"). Thus, whether the business dealings between two limited liability companies (LLCs) create a "partnership" turns on whether they "carry on as co-owners a business for profit." Consistent with the common law and the earlier version of the UPA (1914), "co-ownership" involves the sharing of control over the business and a right to share in the profits of the co-owned business. See RUPA § 202(c)(3) ("A person who receives a share of the profits of a business is presumed to be a partner in the business").

Here, there is no co-owned business and thus no partnership. Instead, there are two separate businesses. One business, operated by Parent, acquires recycled plastic. The other business, operated by Sub, manufactures upscale shoes from the recycled plastic and sells them. Further, there is no indication in the facts that the two LLCs co-owned a single business by sharing in the profits of a single business. Instead, Parent, as sole member of Sub, has a right to all the profits distributed by Sub, its wholly owned subsidiary.

Additionally, the companies have separate management. The arrangement under which the two companies have some common personnel (that is, certain individuals working in similar capacities for both companies) does not result in the sharing of control in a common business.

Although the local newspaper characterized the two companies as "partners," this characterization has no bearing on their legal relationship. What matters is whether the parties have established a relationship that the law treats as a "partnership." See Comment, RUPA § 202(a).

Thus, because the two LLCs do not carry on as co-owners a business for profit, they are not partners. Therefore, Parent is not liable to VanCo as Sub's partner.

Point Two (35%)

Parent is not bound by the agreement between Sub and VanCo; Parent's manager, who was authorized to sign the agreement as agent of Sub, did not sign the agreement on behalf of Parent.

Under the [Revised] Uniform Limited Liability Company Act (2006), an LLC can be bound to agreements with third parties under general principles of agency law. See Comment, RULLCA (2006) § 301 ("Under this Act, other law—most especially the law of agency—will handle power-to-bind questions."). Thus, the question is whether Parent is bound to the agreement with VanCo under agency law principles on the basis of Greta's signature on the agreement.

Greta was the manager of Parent. Under § 407(c) of RULLCA, she thus had actual and apparent authority to manage and conduct activities on behalf of Parent. Thus, if Greta had been acting on behalf of Parent, or if VanCo reasonably believed that Greta was so acting based on some manifestation from Parent, Parent could be liable to VanCo.

However, there is no indication that Greta was acting on behalf of Parent or that VanCo believed her to be so acting. To the contrary, Greta signed "as agent of Sub," and Greta had been given actual authority by Sub's general manager to so sign. Moreover, the contract was between Sub and VanCo; there is no indication that Parent was mentioned in the contract. Parent, as Greta's principal, is liable on contracts made by Greta only if they were made with "the understanding that the principal is a party." Restatement (Second) of Agency § 144, see also § 146 (liability of a principal to a contract made by an agent with a third person "depends upon the agreement between the agent and the other party as to the parties to the transaction"). Here, Greta was an agent for Parent, but was not so acting when she signed the contract with VanCo, and Parent is not liable on the contract.

Point Three (30%)

Under the theory of piercing the company veil, Parent should not be liable for the obligations of Sub to VanCo. The facts do not indicate, with respect to VanCo's contract claim, that Parent engaged in fraudulent behavior that created the impression that the two companies were not separate or that Parent engaged in preferential transfers from Sub at the expense of Sub's creditors.

RULLCA, like most LLC statutes, provides that neither members nor managers are personally liable for the obligations of an LLC "solely by reason of being or acting as a member." RULLCA (2006) § 304(a)(2). Under the RULLCA, this is true even if the members or managers of the LLC have failed to observe "particular formalities relating to the exercise of [the LLC's] powers or management of its activities." Id. § 304(b). Although "disregard of corporate formalities" is a key factor in corporate piercing cases, the "factor is inappropriate [in LLC piercing cases], because informality of organization and operation is both common and desired [in an LLC]." Id., § 304, comment to Subsection (b).

Apart from that distinction, courts have generally applied judge-made principles of “piercing the corporate veil” when evaluating claims to “pierce the company veil” of an LLC—and thus to impose liability on LLC members. See Miriam R. Albert, The New York LLC Act at Twenty: Is Piercing Still ‘Enveloped in the Midst of Metaphor’?, 31 Touro L.J. 411 (2015). As noted in a comment to RULLCA, “[t]he doctrine of ‘piercing the corporate veil’ is well-established, and courts regularly . . . apply that doctrine to limited liability companies.” Comment to Subsection (b), RULLCA (2006) § 304; see also Retropolis, Inc. v. 14th Street Dev. LLC, 797 N.Y.S.2d 1 (App. Div. 1st Dep’t 2005) (concluding that “the doctrine of piercing the corporate veil . . . applies to limited liability companies”).

“The most common veil-piercing test requires a plaintiff to demonstrate that a corporation was an ‘alter ego’ or ‘mere instrumentality,’ as evidenced by complete control and domination, of a shareholder used to perpetuate a fraud, wrong, or injustice that has proximately caused unjust loss or injury to the plaintiff.” Peter R. Oh, Veil-Piercing, 89 Tex. L. Rev. 81, 84 (2010) (collecting and analyzing 2,908 corporate veil-piercing cases from 1658 to 2006). In addition, courts have referred to various factors that are generally thought to weigh in favor of piercing the corporate veil: close (versus public) corporation, corporate (versus individual) defendant, tort (versus contract) plaintiff, misrepresentation by defendant, intertwining of business activities, commingling of assets, overlap in corporate officials/employees, and failure to follow corporate formalities. See also Robert B. Thompson, Piercing the Corporate Veil: An Empirical Study, 76 Cornell L. Rev. 1036 (1991) (collecting and analyzing 1,600 cases from 1930 to 1985).

Piercing in the context of this LLC parent-subsidary relationship does not appear to be justified. Although Sub is a closely held LLC, there does not appear to have been a confusion of its business and activities with those of Parent. Cf. Comment to Subsection (b), RULLCA (2006) § 304 (identifying lack of “economic separateness,” such as writing checks on the company’s account to pay for personal expenses, as “key factor” in piercing cases). The agreement with VanCo for delivery services was in the name of Sub and was authorized specifically by Sub’s general manager. There is no indication of commingling of assets; instead, payments by Sub to Parent were undertaken as “distributions of profits” by the subsidiary to the parent. In short, there is no indication that Parent and Sub confused or misled anyone about their separate identities and responsibilities. Cf. John H. Matheson, The Modern Law of Corporate Groups: An Empirical Study of Piercing the Corporate Veil in the Parent-Subsidiary Context, 87 N.C. L. Rev. 1091, 1128–29 (2009) (finding “where fraud or misrepresentation is not found [in parent-subsubsidiary piercing cases], courts refused to pierce in more than nine out of ten cases”).

Although the two companies coordinate their businesses and there is an overlap in the human resources, accounting, and government relations personnel of the two companies, these circumstances are not unusual in a parent-subsubsidiary relationship and do not appear to have created any confusion or deception. See id. at 1150. The selection by Parent of Sub’s general manager, rather than evidence of untoward “domination or control” that prejudices creditors, simply evidences a normal arrangement in a parent-subsubsidiary relationship. See id. at 1125–27.

In addition, the transfers of money between the two companies appear not to have been done to prefer Parent over Sub’s creditors. According to the facts, Sub pays market prices for the plastic it buys from Parent. Further, when Sub distributed profits to its sole member Parent, there is no indication that these distributions were illegal or that they disadvantaged creditors of Sub. Cf.

RULLCA (2006) § 405 (prohibiting distributions that would render LLC insolvent or leave it with total assets less than total liabilities).

Finally, the failure of the general manager of Sub to follow “formalities” in discontinuing the payment of distributions to Parent is specifically not relevant under RULLCA. See RULLCA (2006) § 304(b) (specifying that failure to follow LLC formalities cannot be basis for disregarding limited liability). In fact, the discontinuance of distributions by Sub was a financially responsible step considering the decline in Sub’s sale of shoes in the market. Moreover, it reinforces the separate economic existence of the two entities.

[NOTE: Piercing the veil is available only when the entity (whether a corporation or an LLC) is insolvent and the creditor’s claim cannot be satisfied against the entity. See Matheson, supra, at 1094–95 (claimants seek piercing when “subsidiary corporation is subject to significant unsatisfied claims or impending bankruptcy”); Herrick K. Lidstone, Piercing the Corporate and LLC Veil (December 18, 2020), available at ssrn.com/abstract=2207735 (noting that “piercing is a remedy, not a separate cause of action” to enforce an underlying judgment against an entity unable to satisfy a claim). Here, the question makes clear that Sub will not be able to satisfy the contractual obligations it owes to VanCo. Thus, the question focuses only on the issue of whether piercing is appropriate under the facts of this case.]

TRU (I.C.3., G., H.)

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) If the daughter consents to the termination of the trust and the purchase of Annuity A (wholly for the benefit of Betty), may a court authorize the trustee to terminate the trust and purchase Annuity A?
- (2) If the daughter does not consent to the termination of the trust and the purchase of Annuity B (for the benefit of Betty and the daughter), may a court authorize the trustee to terminate the trust and purchase Annuity B?
- (3) If a court does not authorize the termination of the trust, may it, without the daughter's consent, authorize the trustee to pay 100% of the trust income to Betty?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under Section 1 of the Trust Code, if both Betty (the testator's wife) and the daughter consent, the trust can properly be terminated because they are the only trust beneficiaries and continuation of the trust is unnecessary to achieve any material purpose of the trust, even though the trust contains a spendthrift clause. Under Section 3 of the Trust Code, there is a statutory presumption that the spendthrift clause (Clause 4 of the trust) is not a material purpose of the trust. Thus, the only remaining material purpose would be the care and support of Betty, and that purpose would be fully satisfied by the purchase of Annuity A, which is an annuity wholly for Betty's benefit.

If the daughter does not consent to the termination of the trust, the court can nonetheless approve a termination if the court is satisfied that the material purpose of providing for Betty's care and support (the trust's only material purpose) can be fulfilled by the purchase of a proposed annuity and the annuity appropriately protects the daughter. The financial adviser has noted that even Annuity B would allow Betty to maintain her current lifestyle with minimal financial disruption, which should satisfy the trust's material purpose of providing for her care and support. And, given that the facts clearly support the conclusion that the care and support of Betty was the dominant motive in creating the trust and that Betty was the trust beneficiary that the testator primarily sought to benefit, purchasing Annuity B with the proposed cash benefit to the estranged daughter seems consistent with that intent even though it likely will result in the daughter's ultimately receiving significantly less when Betty dies than she would have received if the trust did not terminate.

Under Section 5 of State A's Trust Code, "[a] court may modify the dispositive terms of a trust if, because of circumstances not anticipated by the testator, modification will further the primary purpose of the trust. To the extent practicable, the modification must be made in accordance with the testator's probable intention." A modification under Section 5 does not require the consent of another beneficiary or that the court appropriately protect the daughter's interest. Here, Betty's support was the testator's primary intention in creating the trust, and her current financial needs were clearly unanticipated. Thus, the court could authorize the trustee to pay all trust income to Betty without the consent of other trust beneficiaries (i.e., the daughter).

Point One (40%)

If the daughter and Betty consent, the trust can be terminated because the spendthrift clause is presumed not material and termination to purchase Annuity A would be consistent with the material purpose of the trust to provide care and support for Betty for the rest of her life.

Section 1 of the State A statute provides that "[a] trust may be terminated upon consent of all the beneficiaries, if the court concludes that continuance of the trust is not necessary to achieve any material purpose of the trust."

This statute is consistent with the so-called Claflin doctrine, which is that a trust may be terminated only when all beneficiaries consent and continuance of the trust is not necessary to carry out a material purpose of the trust. See Claflin v. Claflin, 20 N.E. 454 (Mass. 1889). Under the Claflin doctrine, a spendthrift clause barring assignment of a beneficiary's interest has typically been treated as a material purpose. Under that approach, a spendthrift clause typically precludes trust termination even when all beneficiaries consent to the trust's termination. See William M. McGovern, Sheldon F. Kurtz, David M. English & Thomas P. Gallanis, Wills, Trusts and Estates Including Taxation and Future Interests 438–40 (5th ed. 2017).

Because the spendthrift clause (Clause 4 of the trust) is not material, the only material purpose of the trust is to provide for lifetime care and support for the testator's wife, Betty. This is easily gleaned from the language in Clauses 1, 2, and 3 indicating that providing for Betty's lifetime support is tantamount to why the trust was created. The trust was not created primarily to benefit the estranged daughter. In fact, the daughter's interest was created only to avoid escheat to the state.

Given that the trust income will not be sufficient to provide for Betty's lifetime care and support, termination of the trust to allow for the purchase of Annuity A seems entirely consistent with the material purpose of the trust. Thus, termination would not violate Section 1 of the Trust Code.

Point Two (30%)

If the daughter does not consent to the termination of the trust and the purchase of Annuity B, it is unclear whether the court would approve the termination of the trust.

Section 1 of the State A Trust Code provides that “[a] trust may be terminated upon consent of all the beneficiaries, if the court concludes that continuance of the trust is not necessary to achieve any material purpose of the trust.”

Section 4 of the Trust Code provides:

If not all beneficiaries of a trust consent to a proposed termination of the trust pursuant to Section 1, the court may nonetheless approve the termination if the court is satisfied that, if all the beneficiaries had consented, the trust could have been terminated under that section, and the interests of a beneficiary who does not consent can be appropriately protected in accordance with the testator’s probable intention.

Two issues arise here. First, would the trust’s material purpose be met if the trustee purchased Annuity B? This annuity’s reduced payments would be sufficient to cover Betty’s future nursing-home expenses and allow her to maintain her current lifestyle with minimal financial disruption. Thus, this policy meets the material purpose of the trust.

The second issue is whether the interest of the daughter can be appropriately protected if she does not consent to the termination of the trust. Here, purchase of Annuity B would result in the daughter’s receiving significantly less than she would have received if the trust had not been terminated. Thus, it could be concluded that this does not appropriately protect her interest. On the other hand, a court might conclude that given the testator’s expressed intent to provide for his daughter only to avoid escheat to the state and that his primary purpose in creating the trust was to provide Betty with sufficient funds for her care and support for the rest of her life, the smaller amount paid under Annuity B to the daughter would be appropriate protection of her interest.

Point Three (30%)

A court could modify the trust terms to authorize the trustee to pay all trust income to Betty without the daughter’s consent. The facts support the conclusion that Betty’s increased nursing-home expenses represent a change of circumstances not anticipated by the testator. Thus, paying 100% of the trust income to Betty would both further the purposes of the trust and comport with the testator’s probable intentions.

Traditionally, courts were willing to modify administrative provisions of a trust (such as a directive on the investment of trust assets) but were unwilling to modify an unambiguous distributive provision. “When the intention of a settlor is plainly expressed . . . the Court will not go outside of the instrument in an attempt to give effect to what it conceives to have been the actual intent or motive of the settlor.” Taylor v. Hutchinson, 497 P.2d 527, 530 (Ariz. App. 1972); accord, Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 167 (allowing modification of administrative, but not distributive, trust provisions).

However, because trusts often continue for lengthy periods, circumstances may change and dispositive trust provisions that initially made good sense may no longer be consistent with the settlor's likely intentions. Reflecting this reality, the restrictive traditional approach has been abandoned as reflected in Section 5 of State A's Trust Code. Under Section 5, "[a] court may modify the dispositive terms of a trust if, because of circumstances not anticipated by the testator, modification will further the primary purpose of the trust. To the extent practicable, the modification must be made in accordance with the testator's probable intention." A modification under this section does not require the consent of another beneficiary. And unlike Section 4, which applies to terminations of trusts and not modifications, a modification under Section 5 does not require that the court appropriately protect the daughter's interest.

For Section 5 to apply, there must be (1) unanticipated circumstances and (2) a modification that accords with the testator's probable intention. Both elements exist here.

Here, 11 years after the testator died, Betty developed a health disorder requiring nursing-home care. Additionally, there are no facts suggesting that the testator anticipated the dramatically increased cost of Betty's nursing-home care. To the contrary, the fact that he gave Betty 80% of the income and directed that 20% be accumulated to grow principal to provide income for her in the future suggests that when the will was prepared, the testator thought that 80% of trust income would be sufficient to provide for Betty's care and support. The testator simply did not anticipate that after his death Betty would need more than the 80% of trust income for her care and support.

While such a modification will adversely affect the estranged daughter, modification will nonetheless fulfill the purposes of the trust. Both the 80% payout and the 20% accumulation to principal to provide more income for Betty in the future were primarily intended to benefit her. See Clauses 1 and 2 of the testamentary trust. In fact, Clause 1 states that the "primary purpose in creating this trust is to ensure there will be sufficient funds to provide for [my wife's] care and support for the rest of her life." See Restatement (Third) of Trusts § 66 illustration 2 (specifically rationalizing a modification to invade principal for the benefit of the income beneficiary in part on the income beneficiary's being the primary object of the testator's bounty). That Betty's support is the primary purpose of the trust is further evidenced by Clause 3 making clear that the principal was left to the daughter from whom the testator was estranged only for lack of other relatives and to avoid having the trust property escheat to the state at Betty's death. In other words, the testator was not primarily interested in conferring a benefit upon his estranged daughter.

Thus, a court could find that Betty's nursing-home expenses represent an unanticipated change in circumstances and that allocating all trust income to her would best comport with the testator's probable intentions and the primary purposes of the trust. The court could thus authorize the trustee to pay all trust income to Betty without the consent of other trust beneficiaries (i.e., the daughter).

CIV (I.A.; V.A.)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is a statute of limitations defense properly presented to the court when it is raised in a motion for summary judgment but not in the answer to the complaint?
- (2) Should a federal district court grant summary judgment on a breach of contract claim when there is conflicting evidence concerning the content of the contract but the weight of the evidence strongly favors a conclusion that there has been a breach?
- (3) Can a case proceed in federal court when the admitted facts in the pleadings reveal an absence of subject-matter jurisdiction but the parties failed to raise the issue?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A statute of limitations defense is an affirmative defense that must be raised in a defendant's answer. If it is not raised in the answer, it is forfeited. Here, Tech did not raise the defense in its answer, so the court should treat the defense as forfeited.

If the court rules on the motions for summary judgment concerning the question of breach of contract, it should deny both motions. There is a genuine dispute about a material fact (whether the contract covered all menu items or only combination-meal menu items), and both parties have offered evidence on the issue. Although one party's evidence appears much stronger than the other's, the judge should not consider the credibility of the witnesses or weigh the value of the evidence when deciding a summary judgment motion.

However, the court should refuse to decide either motion for summary judgment. Instead, it should, sua sponte, dismiss the case for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Here, although Diner alleges that the court has diversity jurisdiction, the facts contained in the complaint (and admitted by Tech) show that both corporations have their principal places of business in State A. Because a corporation is a citizen of the state where it has its principal place of business (as well as being a citizen of the state of incorporation), both corporations are citizens of State A. For that reason, diversity jurisdiction does not exist, and the district court should take note of that fact and dismiss the case.

Point One (25%)

A statute of limitations defense is an affirmative defense that is forfeited if it is not raised in a defendant's answer. Thus, Tech did not properly raise that defense when it asserted it for the first time in a motion for summary judgment.

When filing an answer to a complaint in federal district court, a defendant must “affirmatively state any avoidance or affirmative defense, including . . . statute of limitations . . .” Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(c)(1). Although the Federal Rules do not specify the consequences of a party's failure to plead an affirmative defense, “[i]t is a frequently stated proposition of virtually universal acceptance by the federal courts that a failure to plead an affirmative defense as required by Federal Rule 8(c) results in the waiver of that defense and its exclusion from the case.” Charles Alan Wright, Arthur R. Miller & A. Benjamin Spencer, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1278 (2021). The Supreme Court has similarly stated that “[o]rdinarily in civil litigation, a statutory time limitation is forfeited if not raised in a defendant's answer or in an amendment thereto.” Day v. McDonnough, 547 U.S. 198, 201 (2006). Applying this basic rule, Tech's motion for summary judgment based on the statute of limitations did not properly raise the defense because the defense was forfeited when Tech failed to raise it in its answer.

[NOTE: The district court could, if requested, grant Tech leave to amend its answer to add the statute of limitations defense. The Federal Rules empower district courts to allow parties to amend their pleadings and direct that leave to amend should be “freely” given “when doing so will aid in presenting the merits” and the objecting party has not persuaded the court that it will be prejudiced. Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(b). However, no such request has been made here. Moreover, this point was not raised by the question prompt.]

Point Two (35%)

Assuming that the district court addresses the merits of the competing motions, it should deny both parties' motions for summary judgment with respect to the breach of contract claim because there is a disputed issue of material fact: whether the contract to produce a voice-recognition ordering system covered all menu items or only combination menu items.

Assuming that the district court addresses the merits of the competing motions, the analysis is as follows.

“The court shall grant summary judgment if the movant shows that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a). The party moving for summary judgment “bears the initial responsibility of informing the district court of the basis for its motion” and must identify “those portions of [the record] . . . which it believes demonstrate the absence of a genuine issue of material fact.” Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323 (1986). The nonmoving party can then avoid summary judgment only if it responds with admissible evidence of “specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.” Id. at 324; see also Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). “On a motion for summary judgment, facts must be viewed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party . . . if there is a genuine dispute as to those facts.” Ricci v. DeStefano, 557 U.S. 557, 586 (2009) (quotation omitted).

Here the parties presented evidence revealing a disputed fact material to whether a breach occurred: whether the agreement obligated Tech to provide a voice-recognition system that covered “all” menu items or only “combination meal” menu items. Tech submitted the affidavit testimony of its president, while Diner offered the contrary deposition testimony of eight witnesses, including two witnesses who were actually Tech employees.

Despite the apparent strength of Diner’s evidence when compared to Tech’s evidence, “credibility determinations, the weighing of the evidence, and the drawing of legitimate inferences from the facts are jury functions, not those of a judge.” Reeves v. Sanderson Plumbing Prods., Inc., 530 U.S. 133, 150 (2000), quoting Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 255 (1986). In other words, whatever the district court may think about the strength of either party’s evidence, the conflicting evidence means that there is a genuine dispute about whether the contract obligated Tech to provide a voice-recognition system that covered all menu items. That fact is material, indeed critical, to the breach of contract claim. Summary judgment on that claim is therefore inappropriate.

Point Three (40% total weight)

The district court should, sua sponte, determine whether it has subject-matter jurisdiction. Although Diner’s complaint alleges, and Tech’s answer admits, the existence of diversity jurisdiction, the undisputed facts establish that diversity jurisdiction does not exist. Thus, the court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction and must dismiss the complaint.

(a) Sua sponte determination (20%)

Diner’s complaint alleges that the court has diversity jurisdiction over its claim because Diner is incorporated in State C and Tech is incorporated in State D. Tech admits the allegation that there is diversity. But the federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction, and “no action of the parties can confer subject-matter jurisdiction upon a federal court. Thus, the consent of the parties is irrelevant.” Insurance Corp. of Ireland, Ltd. v. Compagnie des Bauxites de Guinee, 456 U.S. 694, 701 (1982). See also Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 398 (1975) (“While the parties may be permitted to waive nonjurisdictional defects, they may not by stipulation invoke the judicial power of the United States in litigation which does not present an actual ‘case or controversy’ . . .”).

Federal courts are expected to police subject-matter jurisdiction “on their own initiative even at the highest level.” Ruhrgas AG v. Marathon Oil Co., 526 U.S. 574, 583 (1999). Even when neither party raises the issue, a district court has “an obligation to inquire sua sponte into [its] ability to exercise subject matter jurisdiction.” DuLaurence v. Telegen, 94 F. Supp. 3d 73, 78 (D. Mass. 2015). Moreover, a district court must dismiss an action if “the court determines at any time that it lacks subject-matter jurisdiction.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(h)(3).

The district court should therefore sua sponte raise and determine the question of its subject-matter jurisdiction.

(b) No subject-matter jurisdiction (20%)

Diner’s complaint asserts that the court has diversity jurisdiction. Federal district courts have subject-matter jurisdiction in diversity cases when “the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $75,000 . . . and is between . . . citizens of different States.” 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a). In this case, although the amount-in-controversy requirement is met, the requirement that the parties be “citizens of different States” is not satisfied.

The statute designates a corporation’s citizenship to be of the state of its incorporation as well as of the state “where it has its principal place of business.” 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c). The Supreme Court has “conclude[d] that the phrase ‘principal place of business’ refers to the place where the corporation’s high level officers direct, control, and coordinate the corporation’s activities.” Hertz Corp. v. Friend, 559 U.S. 77, 80–81 (2010).

Diner’s complaint asserts that there is diversity jurisdiction because the two corporations are incorporated in different states. But the complaint also says (in paragraph 3) that each of the two corporations has its principal place of business in State A. Moreover, Tech has admitted this allegation. As noted above, corporations are citizens of the state where they are incorporated and also of the state where they have their principal place of business. Thus, a lack of diversity is obvious from the face of the pleadings, as both corporations have alleged (or admitted) facts that establish that both are citizens of State A. The court should therefore dismiss the complaint.

Furthermore, the court must dismiss the case without ruling on the motions for summary judgment. Because it lacks jurisdiction, it has no authority to proceed with the case.

[NOTE: After the court recognizes the apparent subject-matter deficiency but before it decides whether to dismiss the lawsuit on jurisdictional grounds, it might first ask the parties to address the question of subject-matter jurisdiction in briefing or oral argument.]

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

(1)(a) Does Supplier, who sold a machine to Company on credit pursuant to an arrangement under which Supplier retained title to the machine until the full price was paid, have an enforceable interest in the machine?

(1)(b) Does Lender, to whom Company granted a security interest in “all of Company’s personal property,” have an enforceable security interest in the machine?

(1)(c) Does BigBank, to whom Company granted a security interest in “all of Company’s present and future equipment,” have an enforceable security interest in the machine?

(2) Between the enforceable interests of Supplier and BigBank, whose interest in the machine has priority?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Notwithstanding the agreement under which Supplier purported to retain title to the machine, its interest in the machine is limited to a security interest. All three elements of enforceability of a security interest are satisfied (value has been given, the debtor has rights in the collateral, and the debtor has authenticated a security agreement containing a description of the collateral), so Supplier’s security interest in the machine is enforceable.

Lender does not have an enforceable security interest in the machine. In order for a nonpossessory security interest to be enforceable, the debtor (Company) must have, inter alia, authenticated (signed or its electronic equivalent) a security agreement containing a description of the collateral. UCC Article 9 provides that a “supergeneric” description of collateral, such as “all of the debtor’s personal property,” is an insufficient description in a security agreement. Because the description of the collateral in Lender’s security agreement is insufficient, its security interest is not enforceable.

BigBank has an enforceable security interest in all of Company's present and future equipment because all three elements of enforceability are satisfied. Because the machine is equipment, BigBank has an enforceable security interest in the machine.

BigBank's security interest in the machine is perfected, while that of Supplier is unperfected because Supplier never filed a financing statement covering the machine. Therefore, BigBank's security interest has priority over that of Supplier.

Point One(a) (30%)

Supplier's retention of title to the machine is a security interest in the machine, and all the elements for enforceability are satisfied.

While Supplier and Company described their transaction with respect to the machine as one in which Supplier was agreeing to sell the machine to Company but would retain title to it until Company finished paying the purchase price, the Uniform Commercial Code treats such an arrangement as a credit sale in which the buyer's payment obligation is secured by a security interest in the goods sold. UCC § 2-401(1) states in relevant part that "[a]ny retention or reservation by the seller of the title (property) in goods shipped or delivered to the buyer is limited in effect to reservation of a security interest." Similarly, UCC § 1-201(b)(35), the UCC's definition of "security interest," states in relevant part, "The retention or reservation of title by a seller of goods notwithstanding shipment or delivery to the buyer under Section 2-401 is limited in effect to reservation of a 'security interest.'" Thus, the interest retained by Supplier in the machine is a security interest.

In order for Supplier's security interest to be enforceable, the three criteria in UCC § 9-203(b) must be satisfied. First, "value" must be given. UCC § 9-203(b)(1). Here, the agreement of Supplier to transfer the machine to Company in exchange for a down payment and the promise of future payments constituted value. See UCC § 1-204. Second, the debtor (Company) must have rights in the collateral (or the power to transfer rights). UCC § 9-203(b)(2). Here, once Company acquired the machine pursuant to the terms of the transaction, it had rights in it (regardless of whether its rights constituted ownership). Third, the debtor must have authenticated a security agreement containing a description of the collateral or the collateral must be in possession of the secured party. UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(A)–(B). (There are two other substitutes for an authenticated security agreement in UCC § 9-203(b)(3), but they are not germane here.) In this case, the signed agreement between Company and Supplier is a "security agreement" under UCC § 9-102(a)(74) because it "creates or provides for a security interest." In addition, the agreement contains a description of the collateral, the machine. Thus, Supplier has an enforceable security interest in the machine.

[NOTE: While it is correct that the security interest of Supplier is a purchase-money security interest, this is not relevant to the determination of whether the security interest is enforceable.]

Point One(b) (30%)

Lender does not have an enforceable security interest in the machine because Lender does not have possession of the machine and Company did not authenticate a security agreement containing an effective description of the collateral.

The loan agreement between Company and Lender (which constitutes a “security agreement” under UCC § 9-102(a)(74)) covers “all of Company’s personal property.” The machine is personal property, so the loan agreement purports to create a security interest in the machine. But, under UCC § 9-203(b), a security interest becomes enforceable only when each of three requirements has been satisfied. First, “value” must be given. UCC § 9-203(b)(1). Here, the loan of $1,000,000 constituted value. See UCC § 1-204. Second, the debtor (Company) must have rights in the collateral (or the power to transfer rights). UCC § 9-203(b)(2). Here, once Company acquired the machine, it had rights in it (regardless of whether its rights constituted ownership). The third requirement is satisfied if either the debtor has authenticated a security agreement containing a description of the collateral or the collateral is in possession of the secured party. UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(A)–(B). (There are two other possibilities stated in UCC § 9-203(b)(3), but they are not germane here.)

Lender does not have possession of the machine, so its security interest is enforceable only if Company has authenticated a security agreement containing a description of the collateral. The loan agreement constitutes an authenticated (i.e., signed or its electronic equivalent; see UCC § 9-102(a)(7)) security agreement (i.e., an agreement creating or providing for a security interest; see UCC § 9-102(a)(74)), but it does not contain a sufficient description of the collateral. The standards for what constitutes a sufficient description are found in UCC § 9-108. UCC § 9-108(a) states that “a description . . . is sufficient, whether or not it is specific, if it reasonably identifies what is described.” Subsection (c) states that “[a] description of collateral as ‘all the debtor’s assets’ or ‘all the debtor’s personal property’ or using words of similar import does not reasonably identify the collateral.” The description of the collateral in the security agreement here is identical to what is stated in subsection (c) as not reasonably identifying the collateral. Accordingly, the security agreement does not satisfy the criterion in UCC § 9-203(b)(3)(A) that there be a security agreement authenticated by the debtor that contains a description of the collateral. Therefore, Lender does not have an enforceable security interest in the machine.

[NOTE: An examinee might point out that “all of Company’s personal property” would be a sufficient indication of collateral in a financing statement. See UCC § 9-504(2). This is true, but it is irrelevant to the question of whether Lender has an enforceable security interest in the machine.]

Point One(c) (10%)

BigBank has an enforceable security interest in the machine.

The loan agreement between Company and BigBank (which constitutes a “security agreement” under UCC § 9-102(a)(74)) covers “all of Company’s present and future equipment.” The machine is equipment (see UCC § 9-102(a)(33)), so the loan agreement purports to create a security interest in the machine.

Here, all three elements of enforceability under UCC § 9-203(b) are satisfied. First, the loan of $750,000 constituted “value,” satisfying UCC § 9-203(b)(1). Second, the debtor has rights in the machine, satisfying UCC § 9-203(b)(2). Third, the debtor, Company, has authenticated (here, signed) the loan agreement, which constitutes a security agreement because it creates or provides for a security interest. In this case, unlike Lender’s security agreement, the security agreement contains an effective description of the collateral. Under UCC § 9-108(b)(3), a description reasonably identifies the collateral if it identifies the collateral by “a type of collateral defined in [the UCC].” Because equipment is a type of collateral defined in the UCC, the description of the collateral as equipment reasonably identifies it. Therefore, the third criterion of enforceability has been satisfied.

Point Two (30%)

Between the interests of Supplier and BigBank, the security interest of BigBank has priority over the security interest of Supplier because a perfected security interest has priority over an unperfected security interest.

To determine the relative priority of two security interests in the same item of collateral, it must be determined whether each security interest was perfected. Pursuant to UCC § 9-308, a security interest is perfected if it has “attached” and the applicable additional steps for perfection have been satisfied. A security interest attaches when it becomes enforceable unless there was an agreement to delay attachment, which does not appear in these facts. Thus, since the security interests of both Supplier and BigBank attached to the machine (see Points One(a) and One(c)), each of the security interests would be perfected if the applicable additional steps were taken. In the context of the collateral here—the machine—the applicable additional step would be satisfied either if the secured party had possession of the collateral or if a financing statement with respect to the collateral was filed. UCC §§ 9-308, 9-310(a). Supplier neither had possession of the machine nor had filed a financing statement with respect to it. Therefore, Supplier’s enforceable and attached security interest was not perfected.

On the other hand, BigBank filed a financing statement with respect to its security interest in the proper filing office on May 4. The financing statement contained the three required items of information—the name of the debtor, the name of the secured party, and an indication of the collateral. UCC § 9-502(a). An indication of collateral is sufficient if it identifies the collateral by a type of collateral defined in the Uniform Commercial Code. See UCC §§ 9-504(1) and 9-108. Equipment is a type of collateral defined under § 9-102(a)(33), and thus the indication of collateral is sufficient and the financing statement was effective to perfect BigBank’s security interest. See UCC § 9-310.

Priority between a perfected security interest and an unperfected security interest in the same item of collateral is governed by UCC § 9-322(a)(2). Pursuant to that provision, a perfected security interest has priority over a conflicting unperfected security interest in the same collateral. Therefore, because BigBank’s security interest in the machine was perfected, while the security interest of Supplier was unperfected, the security interest of BigBank has priority.

[NOTE: An examinee might state that, because Supplier’s security interest is a purchase-money security interest, it is perfected upon attachment without the need for the secured party to file a financing statement or take possession of the machine. This is incorrect. Only purchase-money security interests in consumer goods qualify for this special rule.

Because Lender does not have an enforceable security interest, it cannot have a perfected security interest. Accordingly, any discussion of whether the financing statement filed by Lender is sufficient is irrelevant.]

ANALYSIS

- (1) Should the trial court apply Miranda to suppress Adam’s incriminating statement to Officer One?
- (2) Should the trial court apply Miranda to suppress Ben’s incriminating statement to Officer Two?
- (3) Should the trial court apply Miranda to suppress Carl’s incriminating statement to Officer Three?
- (4) Should the trial court apply Miranda to suppress Dillon’s incriminating statement to Cellmate?

DISCUSSION

Summary

The trial court should deny each motion. The trial court should not suppress Adam’s statement on Miranda grounds because, although Officer One interrogated Adam at the scene, Adam was not formally arrested or restrained to the degree of arrest at the time he made the incriminating statement to Officer One.

The trial court should not suppress Ben’s statement on Miranda grounds because, although Ben was under custodial arrest and Officer Two’s Miranda warning was substantively flawed, Ben offered his incriminating statement voluntarily without interrogative prompting.

The trial court should not apply Miranda to suppress Carl’s incriminating statement to Officer Three because the officer gave Carl a valid Miranda warning, Carl did not unambiguously and unequivocally invoke his right to have his attorney present for questioning, and Carl implicitly waived his right to remain silent and his right not to be questioned without his attorney when he responded to Officer Three’s final question.

Finally, the trial court should not suppress Dillon’s statement to Cellmate on Miranda grounds because, although Cellmate was a police agent who encountered and questioned Dillon at police direction, jailhouse confessions to fellow inmates do not implicate Miranda.

Introduction: The Miranda standard (10%)

Extrapolating from a criminal defendant's Fifth Amendment right not to be compelled to testify against himself, the Supreme Court held in Miranda v. Arizona that specific warnings must be given before a suspect's statement made during custodial interrogation can be admitted into evidence in the trial against the suspect. 384 U.S. 436, 478–79 (1966). Specifically, the Court held that “the prosecution may not use statements, whether exculpatory or inculpatory, stemming from custodial interrogation of the defendant unless [the prosecution] demonstrates the use of procedural safeguards effective to secure the privilege against self-incrimination.” Id. at 444. The Court reaffirmed this bright-line requirement in Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 431–32 (2000), prohibiting Congress's effort to alter it. The Miranda decision and the Supreme Court cases that have interpreted and applied it continue to govern the admissibility of statements made during custodial interrogation in both state and federal courts. Dickerson, 530 U.S. at 432.

[NOTE: The preceding paragraph articulates the basic standard of law of Miranda that applies to each of the four parts of this question. A complete answer must include the standard but need not repeat it in each of the four parts of the analysis.]

Point One (25%)

The trial court should not apply Miranda to suppress Adam's incriminating statement to Officer One because Adam was not in custody at the time of the questioning.

The trial court should not apply Miranda to suppress Adam's incriminating statement to Officer One. Two elements are necessary to trigger a potential Miranda violation: custody and interrogation. The focus here will be on the first—custody—because Officer One's question about Adam's whereabouts constituted interrogation, i.e., was intended to elicit an answer that would inform the officer's suspicion about whether Adam had been involved in a crime.

Not every detention by police constitutes “custody.” Custody, for Miranda purposes, exists when either a formal arrest has occurred or police have restrained a person's freedom of movement to the degree associated with a formal arrest. California v. Beheler, 463 U.S. 1121, 1125 (1983) (per curiam). For the following reasons, the circumstances here do not establish custody under either of the two alternatives.

First, Officer One did not formally arrest Adam before questioning him. The facts demonstrate only that the officer “planned” to arrest Adam, not that he actually arrested him at this time. And Officer One's intent is insufficient, and indeed irrelevant, because an uncommunicated intent of a police officer to prevent a suspect from leaving the scene of an investigative stop does not constitute custody under Miranda: “A policeman's unarticulated plan has no bearing on the question whether a suspect was ‘in custody’ at a particular time; the only relevant inquiry is how a reasonable man in the suspect's position would have understood his situation.” Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 442 (1984).

Second, Officer One did not restrain Adam's freedom of movement to the degree associated with a formal arrest. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the imprecision of this part of the analysis, observing that “police and lower courts will continue occasionally to have difficulty deciding exactly when a suspect has been taken into custody.” Id. at 441. Whether a suspect is in custody under this alternative turns on an objective, two-part inquiry. The first is, “[W]hat were the circumstances surrounding the interrogation[?]” and the second is, “[G]iven those circumstances, would a reasonable person have felt he or she was at liberty to terminate the interrogation and leave[?]” J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. 261, 270 (2011) (quoting Thompson v. Keohane, 516 U.S. 99, 112 (1995)).

Several circumstances here may argue for a finding that Adam was in custody at the time he answered Officer One’s interrogative question about where he had been. Specifically, it was late at night, the officers were secretly investigating suspicions about the car’s occupants’ potential involvement in burglary, Officer One had pat-searched Adam, Officer One had taken Adam’s driver’s license, and Officer One had told Adam to “hold on here a couple of minutes” and that he was “not free to leave.” These are facts that the court will consider both when assessing the circumstances surrounding Officer One’s brief interrogation of Adam and when considering how the circumstances might bear on a reasonable person’s belief about his freedom to leave.

But it is highly unlikely that a court would hold that these circumstances constitute a de facto arrest implicating Adam’s Miranda rights. The court will consider the totality of the circumstances and should conclude that, before Adam gave his incriminating answer, Officer One had not restrained Adam’s freedom of movement to the degree associated with a formal arrest. Stopping the car, directing Adam out of the car, and pat-searching Adam for weapons after seeing a bulge are not indicia of a formal arrest. This conduct constitutes a common investigative stop under Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968). See Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106, 109–12 (1977) (per curiam) (police do not violate a driver’s Fourth Amendment rights by stopping a car, removing the driver, and conducting a pat search for weapons on mere reasonable suspicion). And “[t]he temporary and relatively nonthreatening detention involved in a traffic stop or Terry stop . . . does not constitute Miranda custody.” Maryland v. Shatzer, 559 U.S. 98, 113 (2010). Additionally, the officer told Adam that he would be free to leave within a few minutes and assured Adam that his release did not depend on whether he answered questions. The stop was justified based on a headlight violation, and its duration of 10 minutes (before the arrest of all four men) was not so lengthy as to make the occupants feel that they were restrained to the degree of a formal arrest.

The trial court should conclude that Adam was not in custody when Officer One questioned him about his whereabouts. The officer’s questioning therefore did not implicate Adam’s Miranda rights, and the trial court should therefore not suppress Adam’s statement on Miranda grounds.

[NOTE: The fact that Adam responded, “I say nothing without a lawyer,” adds nothing to the custody analysis. It is true that this sort of statement would require a police custodial interrogation to end, see Miranda, 384 U.S. at 473–74, but the issue here is not whether Adam asserted his right to silence under Miranda but whether the circumstances at the time of the interrogation even implicated his rights under Miranda. They did not.]

Point Two (25%)

The trial court should not apply Miranda to suppress Ben’s incriminating statement to Officer Two because Ben offered his statement voluntarily without interrogative prompting.

The trial court should not apply Miranda to suppress Ben’s incriminating statement to Officer Two. As stated, two elements are necessary to trigger a potential Miranda violation: custody and interrogation. The focus here will be on the second—interrogation—since Ben made his incriminating statement only after the police had formally placed him under arrest, meeting the custody element.

It is true that Officer Two provided an inadequate Miranda warning. “Prior to any questioning, the person must be warned that he has a right to remain silent, that any statement he does make may be used as evidence against him, and that he has a right to the presence of an attorney, either retained or appointed.” Miranda, 384 U.S. at 444. Officer Two vaguely stated that Ben had “all the rights the Constitution gives you” and “any Miranda rights you might have.” By so doing, Officer Two failed to adequately advise Ben of his specific rights articulated in Miranda. But this failure to provide a valid Miranda warning is of no consequence here. An invalid warning supports suppressing a statement by an arrested suspect only if the statement results from the officer’s interrogation, and that did not occur here.

In this case, Officer Two’s only question was whether Ben understood his rights. This does not qualify as interrogation, which is “any words or actions on the part of the police (other than those normally attendant to arrest and custody) that the police should know are reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the suspect.” Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 301 (1980). Asking whether a suspect understands his rights is not a question that an officer would think is reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response. Without hearing any interrogating question, Ben voluntarily offered, “I’ll admit that me and my buddies broke into the pharmacy a few weeks ago.” Because Ben’s incriminating response was not the product of police interrogation, the trial court should not suppress Ben’s statement on Miranda grounds.

The trial court should not apply Miranda to suppress Carl’s incriminating statement to Officer Three because the officer gave Carl a valid Miranda warning, Carl did not unambiguously and unequivocally invoke his right to remain silent, and Carl implicitly waived that right.

The trial court should not apply Miranda to suppress Carl’s incriminating statement to Officer Three even though the conditions of custody and interrogation are present here. Carl made his incriminating statement only after police formally placed him under arrest and issued a valid Miranda warning, and Officer Three’s question, “Were you involved in the burglary,” was reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response, meeting the interrogation element. However, Carl failed to invoke his right to remain silent, and he waived that right.

Officer Three’s warning meets all the particulars required by Miranda. He advised Carl, “You have the right to remain silent. Anything you say can be used against you in a court of law. You have the right to an attorney and to have the attorney with you for questioning. If you cannot afford an attorney, one will be provided for you.” This is nearly identical to Miranda. Thus Officer Three issued a valid Miranda warning.

Carl did not properly invoke his Miranda rights. An officer must “scrupulously honor[]” a suspect’s invocation of his rights not to be questioned without counsel and to remain silent, so an officer violates a suspect’s Miranda rights by failing to cease questioning immediately after a suspect in custody invokes either of these rights. Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96, 103–04 (1975) (right to remain silent). But the suspect does not effectively invoke this right unless he asserts the right in a manner that is neither ambiguous nor equivocal. Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452, 459 (1994) (right to counsel). Here, Carl sat in silence for two hours, staring at Officer Three rather than responding to his questions. Carl did not unambiguously invoke his right to remain silent during this time frame. The Supreme Court has rejected the theory that a suspect exercises his right to remain silent by being silent. In Berghuis v. Thompson, the Court considered a suspect who remained mostly silent for three hours, and it held that, because the suspect “did not say that he wanted to remain silent or that he did not want to talk with the police,” he did not invoke his right to remain silent. 560 U.S. 370, 382 (2010). The trial court would apply Berghuis to a shorter period of silence (two hours) in which Carl also did not say he was invoking the right, and it should therefore hold that Carl did not invoke his right to remain silent.

Finally, that Carl did not invoke his right to remain silent does not end the inquiry because statements made after a valid Miranda warning are nevertheless inadmissible unless the government shows that the suspect knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waived his right to remain silent. Maryland v. Shatzer, 559 U.S. 98, 104 (2010). However, unlike a suspect’s invocation of his right to remain silent, a suspect’s waiver of the right to counsel may be merely inferred from his actions and words. North Carolina v. Butler, 441 U.S. 369, 373 (1979) (waiver of right to remain silent or of right to counsel may be inferred). A suspect knows his right to remain silent if he understands the right, and his understanding may be inferred from the facts that he received a written copy of the Miranda warnings, that he knew how to read them, and that he had time to read them. See Berghuis, 560 U.S. at 385–86. Here, Carl heard the warnings, received them in writing, and read them. In addition, he expressly told the officer that he understood them. The court should conclude that Carl understood his rights.

Like a suspect’s understanding of his rights, his act of waiving can also be inferred from “a course of conduct indicating waiver.” Id. at 386. And his responding with an answer to an investigator’s questioning will ordinarily constitute such a course of conduct. Id. Here, the trial court will infer that Carl waived his right to remain silent by responding to Officer Three’s final question. The only other possible bar to allowing the statement as evidence would be police coercion to induce the waiver, id., but nothing in these facts remotely suggests police coercion.

The trial court should therefore not suppress Carl’s statement on Miranda grounds.

Point Four (15%)

The trial court should not apply Miranda to suppress Dillon’s incriminating statement to Cellmate because, although Cellmate was a police agent who encountered and questioned Dillon on police direction, jailhouse confessions to fellow inmates do not implicate Miranda.

The trial court should not apply Miranda to suppress Dillon’s incriminating statement to Cellmate. “Miranda was not meant to protect suspects from boasting about their criminal activities in front of persons whom they believe to be their cellmates.” Illinois v. Perkins, 496 U.S. 292, 298 (1990). The Supreme Court reasoned that “[p]loys to mislead a suspect or lull him into a false sense of security that do not rise to the level of compulsion or coercion to speak are not within Miranda’s concerns.” Here, the facts that Cellmate was paid by and serving as an agent of the police are facts that mirror those the Court considered in Perkins and therefore do not help Dillon’s Miranda claim. Consequently, the trial court should not suppress Dillon’s statement on Miranda grounds.

[NOTE: A person incarcerated and charged with a crime may have the protection of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel, not merely the Fifth Amendment right against compelled self-incrimination as protected by Miranda’s prophylactic rule requiring an express warning. Examinees should not discuss the Sixth Amendment, however, because the question calls only for analysis under the Fifth Amendment and Miranda. Dillon had no Sixth Amendment right to counsel before he spoke with Cellmate because the Sixth Amendment affords only the “accused” the right to counsel in “all criminal prosecutions,” and the right does not attach until a prosecution commences. See McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171, 175 (1991). The Court has established that “[A] criminal defendant’s initial appearance before a judicial officer, where he learns the charge against him and his liberty is subject to restriction, marks the start of adversary judicial proceedings that trigger attachment of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel.” Rothgery v. Gillespie County, Tex., 554 U.S. 191, 213 (2008). Because Dillon did not face charges until two days after his arrest (and after his encounter with Cellmate), and he had not yet appeared in a judicial proceeding, he had no Sixth Amendment right to counsel at the time he made his incriminating statement to Cellmate.]

QUESTION 1 – AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP

In February, Wendy opened Kibble, a store selling dog food made from organic ingredients as well as dog toys and dog grooming products. Wendy operated Kibble as a sole proprietorship. Kibble soon ran into financial difficulties, and Wendy could not pay its bills.

In early April, Wendy asked her friends Mary and Angelo for financial assistance.

On May 1, in response to Wendy's request, Mary delivered to Wendy a check payable to "Kibble." In exchange for this contribution, Wendy agreed in a signed writing to pay Mary 15% of Kibble's monthly profits for as long as Kibble remained in business. Mary also agreed that, if Kibble suffered losses, she would share 15% of those losses with Wendy.

As part of their deal, Mary began working at the store with Wendy and helped Wendy with business planning for Kibble.

On May 2, also in response to Wendy's request, Angelo delivered to Wendy a check payable to "Kibble." On the memo line of this check, Angelo wrote "loan to Kibble." Angelo agreed in a signed writing to accept 15% of the monthly profits of Kibble as repayment of the loan until the total loan amount, including interest, was repaid.

Wendy used the proceeds of the checks from Mary and Angelo to purchase equipment, supplies, and a delivery van in Kibble's name.

Beginning in June, Wendy paid 15% of Kibble's previous month's profits to Mary and another 15% to Angelo.

On October 1, Mary wrote a letter to her son Bob stating that she was assigning to Bob, as a gift, all her interest in Kibble effective immediately. Later that day Mary handed a copy of that letter to Wendy, who immediately read it and said to Mary, "I don't want Bob involved with Kibble." Mary continued to be active in the business operations of Kibble.

Early in November, Wendy distributed the appropriate October profits of Kibble to Mary and Angelo but distributed nothing to Bob.

On November 10, Bob demanded that Wendy distribute Mary's share of Kibble's profits to him and that she also allow him to inspect the books and records of Kibble.

On November 15, Mary learned that Wendy was using Kibble's delivery van on Sundays to transport her nieces to their softball games. Mary demanded that Wendy stop doing so, but Wendy refused, noting that the van was not being used for Kibble's business on Sundays.

1. What legal relationships have the parties established through their dealings? Explain.
2. Is Bob entitled to Mary's share of the monthly profits of Kibble? Explain.
3. Is Bob entitled to inspect the books and records of Kibble? Explain.
4. Is Wendy entitled to use the delivery van on Sundays to take her nieces to their softball games? Explain.

QUESTION 2 – CONTRACTS

A wealthy art collector recently died, leaving her entire collection of artworks to Grandson. After receiving the artworks from the estate, Grandson, who did not share his grandmother's interest in art, decided to sell them. With the help of art appraisal experts, he prepared a catalog describing each of the artworks that he hoped to sell. The catalog, a copy of which was given to each person who expressed interest in buying any of the artworks, identified one painting as an early work by Artiste, a prominent American artist who died in 1956 at the age of 78.

Buyer, an art collector who loves the work of Artiste, read the catalog and was intrigued by the possibility of acquiring the painting described as one of Artiste's early works, so he asked to see it in person. Grandson allowed Buyer to examine the painting only visually for up to 30 minutes.

Buyer visually examined the painting for 30 minutes and did not notice anything that caused him to doubt that the painting was a genuine Artiste.

Buyer then told Grandson that he would be willing to pay $350,000 for "the Artiste painting." Grandson agreed to that price. Grandson and Buyer then executed an "Art Purchase Agreement" prepared by Grandson's lawyer. The Art Purchase Agreement identified the item being sold as a "painting by Artiste" and stated the price as $350,000. The Art Purchase Agreement also contained a number of conspicuous provisions labeled "Terms and Conditions of Sale." One of those provisions stated that "Seller disclaims all warranties, express or implied."

Shortly after Buyer and Grandson executed the Art Purchase Agreement, Buyer electronically transferred $350,000 to Grandson's bank account, and Grandson delivered the painting to Buyer.

Three weeks later, Buyer read a news article reporting that several counterfeits of Artiste paintings had recently been sold. The article reported that these counterfeit paintings were of such high quality that mere visual inspection could not detect the counterfeiting; only a chemical analysis could do so. Buyer consulted a professor of art history, who arranged for a chemical analysis of the paints used in the painting bought from Grandson. The analysis revealed that the painting was not the work of Artiste. Because it was not an authentic Artiste painting, it was worth only $500.

Buyer has sued Grandson, seeking either to recover damages on the theory that Grandson breached an express warranty that the painting was the work of Artiste or, alternatively, to rescind or avoid the purchase contract on the basis of a mutual mistake of fact. Each party has stipulated that the other believed in good faith that the painting was a genuine work of Artiste.

1. Has Grandson breached an express warranty? Explain. (Do not address any remedies to which Buyer may be entitled.)
2. Does Buyer have the right to rescind or avoid the contract on the basis of a mutual mistake of fact? Explain.

QUESTION 3 – EVIDENCE

Cara filed a civil suit against Dana, her former coworker, alleging that Dana had stolen Cara's cell phone from her locker at a gym. The jurisdiction has adopted rules of evidence that are identical to the Federal Rules of Evidence.

At trial, Cara testified during her case-in-chief, stating:

On October 18, I worked out at the gym. After I completed my workout, I returned to the locker room to change clothes and retrieve my belongings from my assigned locker (#344). My locker (#344) was near the entry door to the locker room, and when I walked into the locker room, I saw Dana hurriedly closing the door to my locker. I am positive it was Dana because it was cold and rainy that day and Dana was wearing a heavy, bright orange coat. I had seen Dana wearing that coat several times before at work and the gym. When I got to my locker, my cell phone was not there.

Dana also testified at trial during her case-in-chief, stating:

I definitely worked out at the gym on October 18 because I was training for a marathon. I don't recall seeing Cara at the gym that day. For several reasons, I am also positive that I was not wearing a heavy, bright orange coat. First, I ran on the outdoor track that day because the weather was overcast but not cold and not rainy. Second, as I always do for my track workouts, I ran in shorts and a T-shirt; I never wear a coat or jacket while running on the track. Third, I never take my coat or jacket into the gym; I always leave it in my car so it doesn't take up space in my locker.

Dana also testified as follows:

I'm not surprised that Cara lost her cell phone at the gym. She's pretty careless. At work she often misplaced it, or forgot it in the conference room after a meeting or in the break room after lunch.

Cara objected to this testimony, asserting that it constituted inadmissible character evidence. The judge overruled the objection.

During her rebuttal case, Cara asked the court to take judicial notice of the weather on October 18 based on a certified public record from the federal government's National Weather Service agency. The record was a weather report for October 18 in the area where the gym was located and at the time Cara testified that she was at the gym. According to the record, on October 18 it had rained all day and the high temperature was 41 degrees Fahrenheit (5 degrees Celsius) in the area of the gym.

Dana objected to Cara's request and asked for the opportunity to present an argument that taking judicial notice would be improper. The court immediately overruled Dana's objection and denied her request to be heard. The court took judicial notice of the weather as detailed in the public record.

1. Did the trial court err by denying Dana an opportunity to be heard before it took judicial notice of the weather on October 18? Explain.
2. Assuming that the trial court did not err by denying Dana an opportunity to be heard, did the trial court err by taking judicial notice of the weather on October 18? Explain.
3. Was Dana's testimony that Cara was "careless" inadmissible character evidence? Explain.
4. Was Dana's testimony that Cara often misplaced or forgot her cell phone inadmissible character evidence? Explain.

QUESTION 4 – REAL PROPERTY

On November 1, 2020, a landlord leased an apartment to Tom for $1,300 per month based on a signed, written "term-of-years lease" for a three-year term to begin on January 1, 2021, and end on December 31, 2023. The lease provided that Tom could neither assign nor sublet the apartment "without the landlord's prior written consent." The lease included no provision stating what would happen if Tom remained in possession beyond the term.

On January 1, 2021, Tom attempted to move into the apartment but could not do so because the prior tenant, Helen, whose lease term had ended on December 31, 2020, still occupied the apartment. Tom immediately notified the landlord that Helen remained in possession. The landlord responded, "I will get rid of her as soon as possible." Tom then booked a hotel room expecting that he would be able to move into the apartment within the next few days. On January 4, the landlord told Tom, "The apartment is now vacant, so you can move in immediately. Also, I will reduce the February rent by $100 for your inconvenience." Tom promptly moved into the apartment.

About one year later, in January 2022, Tom found a house that he wanted to rent and told the landlord that he wanted to assign his apartment lease to a friend. The landlord conducted a background check on the friend and learned that the friend had a very low credit rating. The landlord told Tom that she would not consent to Tom's proposed assignment. Tom said, "Okay," and he continued living in the apartment.

On January 1, 2024, the day after the lease termination date, Tom was still in possession of the apartment. On January 4, the landlord sent Tom a letter telling him that she was treating him as a periodic tenant subject to all the terms of their original lease, "including the monthly rent of $1,300," which substantially exceeded the then-current market rate for comparable units. Tom wrote back, "That's unfair. I should have to pay only the current market value. I have remained in the apartment only a few days beyond the lease termination date." The landlord rejected Tom's suggestion and told him that, as a periodic tenant, he would be liable for rent at the rate of $1,300 for each month of the periodic tenancy.

No statute or local ordinance affects either party's position on any issue.

1. (a) If a court were to hold that Tom could have rightfully terminated the lease because Helen held over on January 1, 2021, what rule would the court apply and what would be the rationale for that rule? Explain.

(b) If a court were to hold that Tom could not have rightfully terminated the lease because Helen held over on January 1, 2021, what rule would the court apply and what would be the rationale for that rule? Explain.
2. Did the landlord rightfully refuse to consent to Tom's proposed assignment of the lease to his friend? Explain.
3. Following Tom's failure to vacate the apartment, could the landlord rightfully treat Tom as a periodic tenant, subject to the provisions of the expired lease? Explain.

QUESTION 5 – CRIMINAL LAW & PROCEDURE

City is located in State A adjacent to the border with State B. One evening, a City police officer stopped a driver.

The next day, the driver posted a social-media video, alleging the following:

Late last night a City police officer stopped my car in City near the state border, supposedly for speeding, and ordered me to get out of the car. The officer made disparaging remarks about a religious sticker on the bumper of my car and ridiculed my religious beliefs. He picked up a rock, threatened me, and asked how fast I could run. I ran about 50 feet and turned to see if he was chasing me. He wasn't, but he threw the rock at me, and it struck me in the face. He laughed and shouted, "Look where you are! There's nothing you can do about it!" I saw that I was standing in State B and the officer was still standing in State A. My lip is busted and swollen. I had to get stitches. I want justice.

The officer was charged with committing various crimes.

City Criminal Charge. A City ordinance provides that "any person who assaults another person because of that person's religious expression commits a serious misdemeanor punishable by up to six months in jail." The City attorney filed a charge alleging that the officer had violated this ordinance by striking the driver with a rock because of the driver's religious beliefs and religious expression.

The officer admitted that the driver's allegations were true and pleaded guilty to the charge filed by the City attorney. The municipal court sentenced the officer to three days in jail.

After his conviction for violating the City ordinance, the officer was charged with four additional crimes. All the additional charges were based on the same incident that led to the officer's prosecution for violating the City ordinance.

State B Criminal Charge. Claiming jurisdiction because the rock thrown by the officer struck the driver in State B, a prosecutor in State B has charged the officer with violating State B's hate-crime statute, which, like City's ordinance, provides for the punishment of "any person who assaults another person because of that person's religious expression." This conduct is a felony punishable by one to two years in prison.

State A Criminal Charges. A prosecutor in State A has charged the officer with two different state-level offenses. First, the officer is charged with violating State A's hate-crime statute, which provides that "any person who assaults another person because of that person's religious expression and thereby causes injury to that person commits a felony punishable by one to five years in prison." Second, the officer is charged with violating a State A assault statute that provides that "any person who assaults another person with intent to cause injury is guilty of a felony punishable by not more than two years in prison."

Federal Criminal Charge. The United States Attorney for the federal district of State A has filed a criminal charge against the officer, alleging that the officer violated a federal statute that makes it unlawful for "any person, acting under color of state or local law, to assault another person because of that person's religious expression." The federal crime is punishable by a term of imprisonment of not more than two years.

1. Is the State B hate-crime prosecution barred by the United States Constitution's double jeopardy clause? Explain.
2. Is the federal hate-crime prosecution barred by the United States Constitution's double jeopardy clause? Explain.
3. Is the State A hate-crime prosecution barred by the United States Constitution's double jeopardy clause? Explain.
4. Is the State A assault prosecution barred by the United States Constitution's double jeopardy clause? Explain.

QUESTION 6 – DECEDENTS’ ESTATES

On September 4, 2010, Testator, who had two living children, George and Harriet, properly executed a valid will. The will contained only these dispositive provisions:

1. I give my 200 shares of ABC Corp common stock, which I inherited from my grandfather, to my cousin, Donna.
2. I give my home to my brother, Edward.
3. I give my grand piano to my sister, Faye.
4. I direct that all my just debts be paid before distributing the foregoing devises.

None of the devises were subject to a survivorship contingency. The will contained no residuary clause.

In 2012, ABC Corp distributed 100 shares of its common stock to Testator as a stock dividend.

In 2015, Testator borrowed $125,000 to make home renovations. The 20-year loan was secured by a mortgage on Testator's home. Testator was personally liable on this debt.

In 2020, Testator gave $30,000 to her son, George.

In 2022, Faye, the named beneficiary of the piano in the will, died intestate leaving Testator and Edward as her only heirs.

Three months before Testator died in 2023, her grand piano was substantially damaged. She filed a $10,000 casualty-loss claim with her insurer for the damage, and the insurer approved the claim. The insurer had not made any payment on the claim at the time of Testator's death, and the damaged piano remained in Testator's home. The insurer agrees that Testator's estate is entitled to $10,000 on Testator's claim.

Two months before her death, Testator wrote George a letter informing him that the $30,000 she had given him in 2020 was intended "as an advancement" that would reduce "any share of my estate to which you might ever be entitled."

One month before Testator died, George died survived by his only child, Isaac.

Testator is survived by four relatives: her cousin, Donna; her brother, Edward; her daughter, Harriet; and her grandson, Isaac (George's son).

Testator's estate consists of 300 shares of ABC Corp common stock (the 200 shares she inherited and the 100 shares received as a stock dividend), her home, her piano, $200,000 in cash, and the $10,000 owed by the insurer. Testator's only debt at her death was the mortgage loan on the home she devised to Edward.

Faye's estate is still in administration. Her estate's debts are greater than its current assets, and Faye's personal representative is seeking to recover the piano and the insurance proceeds payable to Testator's estate.

The jurisdiction has adopted the Uniform Probate Code.

How should the assets of Testator's estate be distributed? Explain.

ANALYSIS 1 – AGENCY & PARTNERSHIP

AGC (V.A.; VI.; VII.A., B.)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) What is the legal relationship among Wendy, Mary, and Angelo?
- (2) Is Bob entitled to Mary's share of the monthly profits of Kibble?
- (3) Is Bob entitled to inspect the books and records of Kibble?
- (4) Is Wendy entitled to use the delivery van on Sundays to take her nieces to their softball games?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Wendy and Mary are general partners in the Kibble partnership, but Angelo is only a creditor of Kibble. As a transferee of Mary's right to receive profits in Kibble, Bob is legally entitled to Mary's share of those profits. However, that assignment does not make Bob a partner. Therefore, Bob does not have a right to inspect the books and records of Kibble. Wendy is not entitled to use the delivery van on Sundays to take her nieces to their softball games.

Point One (35%)

Wendy and Mary are partners in Kibble. Angelo is a creditor of Kibble.

A partnership is defined as "the association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit . . . whether or not the persons intend to form a partnership." Uniform Partnership Act (UPA) (1997) § 202(a); see also UPA (1914) § 6(1). Here, a partnership was formed when Mary joined Wendy in running Kibble. Because the partnership was formed without the formalities required of other types of partnerships, it is a general partnership.

Wendy and Mary each receive a share of the profits of Kibble, and each is therefore presumed to be a partner in the business. UPA (1997) § 202(c)(3); UPA (1914) § 7(4). This presumption is supported by the fact that Mary is to receive her share of the profits "for as long as Kibble [remains] in business," and that Wendy and Mary each work in the business and participate in the business planning for Kibble. Further, Mary agreed to share in any losses that Kibble might suffer. Therefore, Wendy and Mary are partners in the Kibble partnership.

Angelo also receives a share of the profits of Kibble and therefore might also be presumed to be a partner in the partnership. However, this presumption does not apply where those profits are "received in payment of a debt by installment or otherwise." UPA (1997) § 202(c)(3)(i); UPA (1914) § 7(4)(a). The statement on the memo line of Angelo's check is evidence that Angelo loaned money to the partnership. Angelo is entitled to receive a share of the profits of Kibble only until his loan to Kibble (plus interest) is paid in full, and therefore he is not presumed to be a partner in the business. In addition, Angelo did not agree to share in any losses that Kibble might suffer. Further, Angelo does not play any role in the day-to-day operations of Kibble. Angelo is a creditor of Kibble but is not a partner in the partnership.

Point Two (25%)

As the transferee of a legally transferable interest in the partnership, Bob is legally entitled to receive distributions that Mary would otherwise have received.

As a partner in the Kibble partnership (see Point One), Mary has a transferable interest in the profits and losses of the partnership and in her right to receive distributions. UPA (1997) § 502; UPA (1914) § 26. The transfer of that interest is permissible and creates in the transferee a right to receive distributions to which the transferor would otherwise be entitled. UPA (1997) § 503(b)(1); UPA (1914) § 27(1). Here, Mary transferred her right to receive a share of the profits of Kibble to Bob when she assigned all her interest in Kibble to him. Therefore, Bob is legally entitled to receive Mary's share of the profits of Kibble.

[NOTE: A partnership need not give effect to a transferee's rights until it has notice of the transfer. UPA (1997) § 503(e). Here, the partnership had such notice because Mary gave Wendy a copy of the letter effecting the transfer. The transfer of a partner's right to profits and losses and the right to receive distributions does not effect a termination or dissolution of the partnership.]

Point Three (25%)

Bob is not entitled to inspect the books and records of Kibble because he is not a partner in Kibble.

As a partner in the Kibble partnership, Mary has a transferable interest in the partnership (see Point Two). That interest, however, is limited. For example, a transfer of the partnership interest does not make the transferee a partner unless the other partner or partners consent to making the transferee a partner. Here, such consent was not given because Wendy said, "I don't want Bob involved with Kibble." Therefore, Bob did not become a partner and is not entitled to access information concerning partnership transactions nor to inspect or copy the partnership books or records. UPA (1997) § 503(a)(3); UPA (1914) § 27(1).

Point Four (15%)

The delivery van is partnership property, and Wendy is not entitled to use it on Sundays to take her nieces to their softball games.

Property is partnership property if it is acquired in the name of the partnership. UPA (1997) § 204(a)(1); UPA (1914) § 8(1). Partnership property is property of the partnership and not of the partners individually. UPA (1997) § 203; UPA (1914) § 25(1). Though partners may use partnership property for partnership purposes, they may not use it for their own purposes. UPA (1997) § 401(g) (§ 401(i) in 2013 rev.); UPA (1914) § 25(2)(a). Here, the delivery van was purchased in the partnership's name and, therefore, is partnership property and not Wendy's individual property. The facts do not suggest that the partners agreed that Wendy could use the delivery van for her own purposes on Sundays, and, absent such an agreement, Wendy is not entitled to use it to take her nieces to their softball games even if the partnership is not using the van on Sundays.

[NOTE #1: Wendy's use of the delivery van could be analyzed through the lens of fiduciary duty. It could be argued that Wendy has violated her duty of loyalty by using the van because it is partnership property. See, e.g., UPA (1997, revised 2013) § 409(b)(1)(B).]

[NOTE #2: The partnership was not dissolved when Mary transferred her interest to Bob. Under § 27 of the UPA (1914) and § 503 of the UPA (1997), the transfer of all or any part of a partner's interest is not a dissolution of the partnership. Thus, Mary's gift to her son Bob of her interest in the partnership does not dissolve the partnership.]

ANALYSIS 2 – CONTRACTS

CTR (II.C.; IV.E.; V.E.)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) What body of contract law governs a contract for the sale of a painting?
- (1)(b) Does a representation that a painting was produced by a particular artist create an express warranty that the painting was, in fact, produced by that artist?
- (1)(c) Is contract language that purports to disclaim "all warranties, express or implied" adequate to disclaim an express warranty that a painting is by a particular artist?
- (2)(a) Where the parties to a contract for the sale of a painting are both mistaken about the identity of the artist who produced the painting, is there a mistake of fact sufficient to allow the buyer to rescind or avoid the contract?
- (2)(b) Where the facts do not suggest that the risk of mistake should be allocated to the buyer, can the buyer rely on mutual mistake of fact to rescind or avoid the contract?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A contract for the sale of a painting is a transaction in goods governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code.

Grandson's representations in the catalog and the Art Purchase Agreement that the painting was a work of Artiste constitute an express warranty of that fact. The disclaimer of "all warranties, express or implied" in the Art Purchase Agreement was not effective to prevent that warranty from becoming part of the contract. The warranty was breached because the painting was not, in fact, by Artiste.

Because rescission or avoidance for mutual mistake is not addressed in Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code, common law rules apply to supplement the rules in the Code.

In this case, the parties made a mutual mistake of fact as to a matter (whether Artiste produced the painting in question) that was critically important to the bargain they were making and that, under the facts, justifies rescission or avoidance of the contract by Buyer.

Point One(a) (10%)

A contract for the sale of a painting is a transaction in goods governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code.

Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code "applies to transactions in goods." UCC § 2-102. Goods are all things "movable at the time of identification to the contract for sale." UCC § 2-105.

The painting was movable at the time of its identification to the contract of sale. Accordingly, the contract is one for the sale of goods, and Article 2 applies.

Point One(b) (25%)

Grandson's representations that the painting was a work of Artiste constituted an express warranty of that fact. The warranty was breached because the painting was not, in fact, by Artiste.

Under UCC § 2-313(1)(a), any "affirmation of fact . . . made by the seller to the buyer" constitutes an express warranty if it "relates to the goods and becomes part of the basis of the bargain." Furthermore, any "description of the goods which is made part of the basis of the bargain creates an express warranty." UCC § 2-313(1)(b). It is not necessary in either case that the seller use language like "warrant" or "guarantee." UCC § 2-313(2).

Here, Grandson described the painting as a painting by Artiste on at least two separate occasions: in the catalog advertising the sale of the painting and in the Art Purchase Agreement drafted by Grandson's lawyer. These representations about the painting constitute either an "affirmation of fact . . . which relates to the goods" or a "description of the goods."

Here, the assertions that the painting was by Artiste were part of the basis of the bargain. Buyer wanted the painting precisely because it was a work of Artiste. Accordingly, they constitute express warranties under UCC § 2-313.

As to whether the disclaimer in the Art Purchase Agreement excludes or modifies those warranties, see Point One(c).

Point One(c) (25%)

Grandson's attempt to disclaim his express warranty was ineffective.

UCC § 2-316(1) provides that "words" that tend to create an express warranty and words that tend to negate any warranty "shall be construed wherever reasonable as consistent with each other." Grandson's representations in the Art Purchase Agreement and in the catalog that the painting was by Artiste cannot reasonably be considered consistent with its disclaimer of express warranties if that disclaimer is construed to mean that Grandson does not warrant that the painting is by Artiste. The warranty and the disclaimer cannot reasonably be construed as consistent with each other.

Where the words cannot be reasonably construed as consistent, UCC § 2-316(1) provides that the warranty disclaimer "is inoperative." As explained in the official comments to § 2-316(1), the purpose of this rule is "to protect a buyer from unexpected and unbargained language of disclaimer by denying effect to such language when inconsistent with language of express warranty." Grandson's disclaimer of "all warranties, express or implied" therefore is not effective to prevent Grandson's words from creating an express and enforceable warranty that the painting was by Artiste.

While it might be argued that the reference to the parol evidence rule in UCC § 2-316(1) may preclude reliance on the statements outside the Art Purchase Agreement to establish an express warranty in light of the disclaimer in that Agreement, the parol evidence rule would not exclude use of the express warranty in the Art Purchase Agreement itself.

Thus, the contract includes an express warranty that the painting was by Artiste. Grandson breached that warranty.

Point Two(a) (25%)

The parties made a mutual mistake that warrants rescission or avoidance of the contract by Buyer inasmuch as the mistake was with respect to a basic assumption on which the contract was made and had a material effect on the transaction, and nothing in the transaction allocated the risk of this mistake to Buyer.

The Uniform Commercial Code does not cover all issues that might arise under a contract for the sale of goods (or other matters covered by the Code). Accordingly, UCC § 1-103(b) provides that "the principles of law and equity," including the law of mistake, supplement the Code unless the common law has been "displaced" by a "particular provision" of the Code.

Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code does not contain any provisions that would displace the common-law doctrine concerning rescission or avoidance for mutual mistake of fact in a case of this sort. See, e.g., ACA Galleries, Inc. v. Kinney, 928 F. Supp. 2d 699 (S.D.N.Y. 2013), aff'd 552 Fed. Appx. 24 (2nd Cir. 2014) (applying common law mistake-of-fact rule in a dispute over sale of a painting). Therefore, the common law doctrine applies.

Under the common law of contracts, in some circumstances a contract may be rescinded, or avoided, due to a mutual mistake of fact. As stated by one court, a contract can be rescinded when there is a mutual mistake by the parties to the contract "as to a material fact, and their acts did not in fact accomplish their mutual intent." Allen v. WestPoint-Pepperell, Inc., 945 F.2d 40, 46 (2nd Cir. 1991) (applying New York law).

The Restatement (Second) of Contracts describes the concept as "avoidance" of the contract and states the rule as follows:

Where a mistake of both parties at the time a contract was made as to a basic assumption on which the contract was made has a material effect on the agreed exchange of performances, the contract is voidable by the adversely affected party unless he bears the risk of the mistake . . .

Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 152.

Here the parties both believed that Artiste had painted the painting purchased by Buyer. That mistake went to the heart of the deal—it concerned a "basic assumption on which the contract was made" because the core of the transaction was the sale of a painting by Artiste. It also had "a material effect on the agreed exchange"—Buyer paid $350,000 for a painting worth only $500. The mistake prevented the parties from accomplishing their mutual intent, which was the sale and purchase of a painting by Artiste.

Thus, the contract may be rescinded or avoided by Buyer unless the risk is allocated to him.

Point Two(b) (15%)

It is likely that a court would allow Buyer to assert mutual mistake of fact. The facts do not suggest that the risk of mistake should be allocated to Buyer.

Under the common law of contracts, the defense of mutual mistake of fact will not be available to a party if the risk of the mistake is properly allocated to that party. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 154. If, for example, the contract explicitly allocates a risk to one party, the defense will not be available to that party. In addition, some courts will allocate the risk of a mistake to a party if the party was negligent in taking steps to avoid the mistake. Furthermore, parties who know that their knowledge of key facts is limited, but complete the transaction despite that limited knowledge, may be denied a mistake-of-fact defense. Id. See also ACA Galleries, Inc., 928 F. Supp. 2d at 701–02.

Here, it is likely that a court would allow Buyer to assert a mutual mistake. First, the contract does not clearly allocate the risk of the mistake to Buyer. As explained earlier (see Point One), under the UCC Grandson warranted that the painting was by Artiste, and the disclaimer was inoperative to alter that warranty. If the contract allocates the risk to either party, it allocates it to Grandson because of the warranty made by him.

Second, Buyer inspected the painting in the only way permitted to him—by a visual inspection. One might argue that he should have brought along an expert to verify the authenticity of the painting, but the facts indicate that it required chemical analysis of the paint to make a certain determination that it was not a painting by Artiste. To say that Buyer was negligent would be a stretch. Compare ACA Galleries, Inc., 928 F. Supp. 2d at 701–02 (buyer of artwork was negligent when seller gave substantial opportunity to investigate authenticity, including opportunity for inspection by third-party experts, and buyer chose to complete sale before seeking such inspection).

One might argue that Buyer bore the risk of loss because he knew he had only limited knowledge and he treated his "limited knowledge as sufficient," Koam Produce, Inc. v. DiMare Homestead, Inc., 329 F.3d 123, 127–28 (2d Cir. 2003) (quoting Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 154 (1981)). But Buyer was not relying solely on his limited knowledge in this case; he was also relying upon an express representation made by the seller. Moreover, allocation of risk to a buyer on this basis is intended to address situations in which a buyer is aware of a risk that the facts are not as he presumes and consciously chooses to run that risk. That is not the situation here, where Buyer had reason (including the seller's assurance) to believe that the painting was by Artiste. Compare Eisenberg v. Hall, 48 N.Y.S. 3d 71 (App. Div. 2017) (mistake defense could be denied to buyer if buyer had notice of potential issues regarding authenticity of antiquities but chose to complete the purchase despite that notice).

In short, the facts do not suggest that the risk of a mistake should be allocated to Buyer.

[NOTE #1: With respect to allocation of the risk, the examinee's recognition of that element of the mutual-mistake doctrine and use of the facts presented to reason to a conclusion with respect to it are more important than the conclusion the examinee reaches with respect to the issue.

[NOTE #2: The doctrine examined in call #2 is usually referred to as the doctrine of "rescission." The Restatement (Second) of Contracts, however, describes the doctrine as one of voidability of the contract. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 152. States vary as to vocabulary on this point.

[NOTE #3: An examinee might note that, depending on the facts, Buyer might also be able to "cancel" the contract under UCC § 2-711(1) because of the breach of warranty and recover the $350,000 that he paid, bringing about a result for Buyer comparable to rescission or avoidance. This is correct but is not responsive to the calls. Question 1 directs examinees not to address issues relating to remedies, and question 2 is specifically addressed to the doctrine of rescission or avoidance on the basis of mutual mistake. In this regard, see comment g to Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 152:

The rule stated in this Section has a close relationship to the rules governing warranties sale by a seller of goods or of other kinds of property. A buyer usually finds it more advantageous to rely on the law of warranty than on the law of mistake. Because of the broad scope of a seller's warranties, a buyer is more often entitled to relief based on a claim of breach of warranty than on a claim based on mistake. Furthermore, because relief for breach of warranty is generally based on the value that the property would have had if it had been as warranted (see Uniform Commercial Code § 2-714(2)), it is ordinarily more extensive than that afforded if he merely seeks to avoid the contract on the ground of mistake. Nevertheless, the warranties are not necessarily exclusive and, even absent a warranty, a buyer may be able to avoid on the ground of mistake if he brings himself within the rule stated in this Section."]

ANALYSIS

Legal problems:

- (1) Whether the trial court erred in not giving Dana an opportunity to be heard before it took judicial notice of the weather on October 18.
- (2) Whether the trial court erred when it took judicial notice of the weather on October 18.
- (3) Whether the trial court erred when it allowed Dana to testify that Cara was "careless," despite the general prohibition on the admission of character evidence and the limited use of other acts evidence.
- (4) Whether the trial court erred when it allowed Dana to testify that Cara would often misplace or forget her cell phone at work, despite the general prohibition on the admission of character evidence and the limited use of other acts evidence.

DISCUSSION

Summary

Federal Rule of Evidence 201 is the sole rule governing judicial notice and applies only to adjudicative facts, i.e., facts at issue in a case. If a party requests that a court take judicial notice of an adjudicative fact and provides the court with the necessary information, the court must take judicial notice if the fact is not subject to reasonable dispute. However, the adverse party must be given an opportunity to be heard on whether to take judicial notice of an adjudicative fact, either before or after the proponent's request.

Here, the trial court erred when it did not permit Dana to be heard on the propriety of taking judicial notice and on the nature of the facts to be noticed. Notwithstanding this error, Cara provided a public record of the weather for October 18, which courts have held is indisputable; thus, the trial court did not err in taking judicial notice of the weather on the date and time and at the location of the alleged theft.

Federal Rule of Evidence 404 regulates the admissibility and use of character evidence. Generally, character evidence is inadmissible to demonstrate that an individual acted in accordance with that character on a particular occasion. Here, Dana's testimony that Cara was "careless" is the precise type of character evidence that the rule prohibits. Though Rule 404(a)(2) and (a)(3) set forth several exceptions to this general prohibition, none of them are applicable here. Thus, the court erred in allowing Dana to testify that Cara was "careless." The court also likely erred in allowing Dana to testify that Cara would misplace or forget her cell phone at work. Though this testimony is not the typical type of character evidence that is prohibited, it describes specific other acts or behavior by Cara and relies on propensity or character-based reasoning and thus is inadmissible as "other acts" evidence pursuant to Rule 404(b)(1).

Introduction

Federal Rule of Evidence 201 determines whether the court can take judicial notice of the weather on October 18, an adjudicative fact in the case.

Federal Rule of Evidence 201 concerns judicial notice of adjudicative facts, dictating which adjudicative facts may be judicially noticed and establishing procedural requirements. "Adjudicative facts are simply the facts of the particular case." Fed. R. Evid. 201 Advisory Committee's Note. Judicial notice of adjudicative facts may be taken at any time during a proceeding. Fed. R. Evid. 201(d); Paul C. Giannelli, Understanding Evidence § 44.04[C] Procedural Issues – Time of Taking Judicial Notice, at 656 (5th ed. 2018).

The weather on October 18 is an adjudicative fact because it will help the jury hearing the case (1) determine the identity of the thief in the case, i.e., whether the thief possibly would have been wearing a heavy, bright orange coat on October 18 because of the weather conditions, and (2) assess the credibility of both Cara and Dana concerning the events of October 18. Because the weather on October 18 is an adjudicative fact, whether the court can take judicial notice of the fact is governed by Rule 201.

[NOTE: Adjudicative facts are distinguished from legislative facts which Rule 201 does not govern. Fed. R. Evid. 201(a). "Legislative facts . . . are used in lawmaking." They are the facts that courts, legislatures, and administrative agencies use in legal reasoning and lawmaking. Giannelli, supra, § 44.02 Adjudicative and Legislative Facts: FRE 201(a) at 648.]

Point One (20%)

The trial court erred when it did not give Dana an opportunity to be heard on whether the court should take judicial notice of the weather on October 18.

Upon "timely request," the court must provide a party an opportunity to be heard "on the propriety of taking judicial notice and the nature of the fact to be noticed." Fed. R. Evid. 201(e). "The rule requires the granting of that opportunity upon request. No formal scheme of giving notice" is required by the rule. Fed. Rule Evid. 201 Advisory Committee Notes. Opportunity to be heard is constitutionally mandated: "Basic considerations of procedural fairness demand an opportunity to be heard on the propriety of taking judicial notice and the tenor of the matter noticed." Id.

Without holding a hearing, the trial court immediately overruled Dana's objection to the court's taking judicial notice of the facts in the weather report proffered by Cara. This was in contravention of Federal Rule of Evidence 201(e), which explicitly required the court to hold a hearing after Dana's request to argue against taking judicial notice.

Point Two (30%)

The trial court did not err when it took judicial notice of the weather on October 18.

A court may take judicial notice of two distinct types of adjudicative facts: a fact that "is generally known within the trial court's territorial jurisdiction"; and a fact that "can be accurately and readily determined from sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned." Fed. R. Evid. 201(b). If a party requests the court take judicial notice of an adjudicative fact and supplies the court with the "necessary information," the court must take judicial notice of the adjudicative fact if the requirements of Rule 201(b) are met. Fed. R. Evid. 201(c).

The requirements of Rule 201(b) and Rule 201(c) are satisfied here. First, as discussed previously, the weather on October 18 was an adjudicative fact in the case. Additionally, Cara properly invoked the rule by requesting that the court take judicial notice of the fact during her rebuttal case and supplying a National Weather Service report for October 18 in the area of the gym. Next, weather on a particular day in a particular location "can be accurately and readily determined" from reports prepared by professionals, such as those who work at the National Weather Service, who are trained and obligated to determine and report historical weather conditions. The accuracy of such reports "cannot reasonably be questioned."

Courts have taken judicial notice of facts included in public records, such as those from executive agencies. Giannelli, supra § 44.03[C] Types of Facts Subject to Notice: FRE 201(b) at 653–54. More specifically, courts have taken judicial notice under Rule 201(b) of facts set forth in public records of weather reports, including reports from the National Weather Service, finding them to be sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned. See, e.g., Julius v. Luxury Inn & Suites LLC, 535 F. Supp. 3d 600, 606–07 (S.D. Miss. 2021) (district court took judicial notice of certified weather records from National Centers for Environmental Information, but court would not take judicial notice of inferences from the weather data); Bain Enterprises LLC v. Mountain States Mut. Cas. Co., 267 F. Supp. 3d 796, 819 (W.D. Tex. 2016) (trial court took judicial notice of facts contained in weather reports regarding rainfall in county and surrounding regions); Gisclair v. Galliano Marine Serv., 2007 WL 1266396, at *2 (E.D. La. Apr. 30, 2007) ("Federal courts have been willing to take judicial notice of weather conditions that are either commonly known in a jurisdiction, such as the existence of a drought, or are verifiable through resort to records kept by various entities."); Are-east River Sci. Park, LLC v. Lexington Ins. Co., 2014 WL 12587051, at *5 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 27, 2014) (The National Hurricane Center is part of the National Weather Service, and is a source "whose accuracy cannot be reasonably questioned" of weather and meteorological facts concerning tropical cyclones.").

Courts have, however, refused to take judicial notice of the weather when the reported information did not eliminate "reasonable dispute" about the adjudicative facts in the case. See, e.g., Walker v. City of Orem, 2007 WL 2956227, at *1 (D. Utah Oct. 5, 2007) (trial court denied request for judicial notice of weather report due to disputed issues of fact regarding the light at the time of the events due to cloud cover and whether "mostly clear" weather with a "1/8th of the sky . . . covered with a cloud" meant that the sky was "clear.").

Here, the facts of the weather on October 18 in the area of the gym at the relevant time, i.e., that it rained and the high temperature was only 41 degrees Fahrenheit, are not reasonably disputable. Though there may be a dispute as to whether 41 degrees Fahrenheit is "cold" (as Cara testified) or "not cold" (as Dana said), such a dispute would not undermine the relevance or indisputability of the weather on October 18.

In sum, the court did not err in taking judicial notice of the weather on October 18 as required by Rule 201.

[NOTE: An argument that the court may not take judicial notice because the public record from the National Weather Service has not been admitted into evidence or is inadmissible is unavailing. First, the source of the fact need not be admissible for the court to take judicial notice of the facts therein. Giannelli, supra § 44.03[C] Types of Facts Subject to Notice: FRE 201(b) at 654. Second, almost certainly the report would be admissible hearsay within the public record hearsay exception. See Fed. R. Evid. 803(8)(A)(ii), (B); see also Fed. R. Evid. Advisory Committee Notes to Rule 803(8) (citing case admitting public records of rainfall amounts).]

Point Three (25%)

Dana's testimony that Cara was "careless" is inadmissible character evidence.

Federal Rule of Evidence 404(a)(1) prohibits the admission of "[e]vidence of a person's character or character trait" in all civil and criminal cases, when offered "to prove that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with that character or trait." Here, Dana's testimony that Cara was "careless" is classic evidence of a person's character or character trait. Hence, the testimony should not have been admitted in light of the general prohibition under Rule 404(a)(1). Newill v. Campbell Transp. Co., No. 2:12-CV-1344, 2015 WL 267879, at *2 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 14, 2015) ("The testimony that Plaintiff 'knew too much' and, thus, got careless in his job is precisely the type of character evidence rendered inadmissible by Rule 404(a).").

Despite the Rule 404(a)(1) prohibition, Rules 404(a)(2) and (a)(3) set forth exceptions allowing the admission of character evidence by defendants in criminal cases or when used in civil or criminal cases to impeach the truthfulness of a testifying witness, respectively. The exceptions to the prohibition are inapplicable here. Dana is the defendant in a civil suit for theft, not a defendant in a criminal prosecution. Additionally, although Dana's objectionable testimony concerned Cara, who was a witness in the case, Dana's objectionable testimony did not impeach Cara's character for truthfulness.

Point Four (25%)

Dana's testimony that Cara often misplaced or forgot her cell phone is inadmissible character evidence.

Similar to Federal Rule of Evidence 404(a)(1), Rule 404(b)(1) prohibits the admission of "any other crime, wrong, or act . . . to prove a person's character in order to show that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with the character." However, Rule 404(b)(2) allows evidence of "other crimes, wrongs, or acts" for noncharacter purposes such as, but not limited to, proof of motive, knowledge, opportunity, or intent. Rule 404(b)(2) applies in civil and criminal cases. While Dana may have offered the testimony for a relevant, noncharacter purpose, e.g., that no theft occurred because Cara lost or misplaced her cell phone, this relevance of the specific acts relies upon character-based reasoning, i.e., if Cara forgot or misplaced her phone at work, then she forgot or misplaced her phone at the gym on October 18. Hence, these specific other acts of carelessness are also prohibited by the rules against character evidence and character-propensity reasoning.

[NOTE: An analysis of whether the testimony is habit evidence is not responsive to the call, which is specifically limited to the question of character evidence. In addition, testimony that a person often misplaces things is not the sort of evidence of a regular response to a specific set of circumstances that is necessary to establish a habit.]

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) If a court were to hold that Tom could have rightfully terminated the lease because Helen held over, what rule would the court apply and what would be the rationale for that rule?
- (1)(b) If a court were to hold that Tom could not have rightfully terminated the lease because Helen held over, what rule would the court apply and what would be the rationale for that rule?
- (2) Under the terms of the lease, did the landlord rightfully refuse to consent to Tom's proposed assignment of the lease to his friend?
- (3) Following Tom's failure to vacate the apartment, could the landlord rightfully treat Tom as a year-to-year periodic tenant subject to the provisions of the expired lease?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under the so-called "English rule," which has been adopted in some states, the landlord is obligated to turn over actual possession of the leased premises on the first day of the lease. If a landlord fails to do so, as the landlord did here, the tenant has the right to terminate the lease. Conversely, under the so-called "American rule," a landlord is merely obligated to give the tenant the right to possession, which in fact occurred here. Thus, under that rule Tom did not have the right to terminate the lease.

Where, as here, the lease provides that no assignment can be made without the landlord's consent, two issues arise. First, in refusing to consent, must the landlord act reasonably? Second, assuming that the landlord must act reasonably, under the facts did she do so? The predominant view is that a landlord must act reasonably when withholding consent. Here, because of the friend's poor credit rating, the landlord acted reasonably. In some jurisdictions, there is no requirement of reasonableness for the landlord's withholding of consent. In those jurisdictions, the landlord could refuse to consent for any reason or for no reason at all.

Upon Tom's holding over beyond the term of his lease, the landlord rightfully treated Tom as a periodic tenant, making Tom liable for the rent payable under the original lease.

If the court would hold that Tom was entitled to terminate the lease, the court has adopted the rule that a landlord is required to turn over to the tenant actual possession of the leased premises as of the first day of the lease. This rule carries out the tenant's expectations and recognizes that the landlord is in a better position to both prevent and solve the problem of a prior tenant holding over beyond the lease term.

Under the so-called "English rule," a landlord is obligated to turn over actual possession of the leased premises on the first day of the lease. This is the predominant rule in the United States. A landlord breaches that obligation when the premises are occupied on that date by a prior tenant who wrongfully held over beyond the lease term of that tenant. For that breach, the tenant denied actual possession is entitled to terminate the lease but is not required to do so. The theory behind the English rule is that, by failing to turn over actual possession of the leased premises, the landlord has denied the tenant's just expectations, and that, between the landlord and the tenant, the landlord is in the better position to ascertain whether the prior tenant will vacate timely and take steps necessary to ensure that he or she does. See generally, Dale Whitman, Ann Burkhart, R.W. Freyermuth & T. Rule, The Law of Property § 6.21 at 215 (4th ed. 2019). Under this rule, Tom had the right to terminate the lease because the landlord failed to turn over actual possession of the property to Tom on January 1, 2021.

If the court would hold that Tom was not entitled to terminate the lease, the court has adopted the rule that a landlord is only required to turn over to the tenant the right to possession, not actual possession. The rationale for this rule is that neither the landlord nor the new tenant is at fault for the wrongful behavior of the prior tenant; the new tenant, who has the greater interest in taking possession, is just as able as the landlord to take whatever legal steps are necessary to remove the prior tenant.

An alternative rule, often called the "American rule," requires that the landlord turn over merely the right to possession to the new tenant on the first day of the lease term. The American rule is clearly the minority rule in the United States. Whitman et al., supra, § 6.21 at 215. The theory underlying the American rule is that, given that neither the landlord nor the new tenant is at fault for the wrongful behavior of the prior tenant, the new tenant, who has the greater interest in taking possession, is just as able as the landlord to take whatever legal steps are necessary to remove the prior tenant. This rule ignores the fact that between the landlord and the new tenant, the landlord is in a better position to ascertain whether the prior tenant will wrongfully hold over. It also ignores the fact that landlords as a class are more familiar with the eviction process than tenants, making landlords better positioned to remove the prior tenant from the premises. Under the American rule, Tom would not have the right to terminate the lease on January 1, 2021. This is because on that date he had the right to possession.

Point Two (33%)

The landlord rightfully refused to consent to the assignment. In some jurisdictions, the landlord can withhold consent to an assignment for any reason or no reason at all, and in other jurisdictions, if the landlord withholds consent, the landlord must act reasonably even if the lease does not express that requirement. Even if reasonableness is required, the landlord had the right to refuse Tom's proposed assignment because it is reasonable to refuse an assignment based on the assignee's poor credit rating.

Unless a lease provides otherwise, a tenant's interest under a lease can be transferred either by an assignment or a sublet. Whitman et al., supra, § 6.66 at 300. This is consistent with the general rule that interests in realty are alienable. For fee interests, restraints on alienation are invalid. But given the landlord's reversionary interest in the leased property and her general concern with the "tenant worthiness" of the tenant who pays rent and who has the obligation to not commit waste on the leased property, courts have permitted a landlord to restrain a tenant's ability to alienate his interest by prohibiting an assignment of that interest without the landlord's consent. Sheldon F. Kurtz, Thomas P. Gallanis & Herbert Hovenkamp, The Law of Property: An Introductory Survey § 9.10 at 281 (7th ed. 2018). This ensures that the tenant cannot transfer his typically relatively short-term interest to a person who might damage the property or fail to pay rent when due.

Where the lease prohibited an assignment without the landlord's consent, under English common law and American law well into the 20th century, a landlord could withhold consent to the tenant's assignment of the lease for any reason or for no reason at all. Applying that standard, the landlord here acted properly in withholding her consent. See generally, Kurtz et al., supra, § 9.10 at 281; Whitman et al., supra, § 6.70 at 306 (4th ed. 2019).

Now, however, many courts imply a reasonableness standard even if one is not expressly stated in the lease. Whitman et al., supra, § 6.66 at 307. A landlord acts reasonably when withholding consent if the landlord is aware of circumstances indicating that the proposed assignee might not pay rent in a timely manner or might damage the property. Here, the landlord was aware of circumstances indicating that the friend might not pay rent in a timely manner, specifically, the friend's low credit rating. A low credit rating suggests that the friend is already carrying debt large enough to render the friend unable to pay rent or that the friend is currently failing or has previously failed to timely pay debts already incurred. This circumstance alone makes the landlord's decision to withhold consent to assign justified, meeting a reasonableness standard if one is implied.

Point Three (33%)

Upon Tom's holding over beyond the term of his lease, the landlord rightfully treated Tom as a periodic tenant.

The landlord and Tom signed a term-of-years lease that fixed December 31, 2023, as the termination date. The lease therefore provided Tom with notice that he was required to vacate on or before that date. Because Tom remained in possession of the premises beyond the date fixed in the term-of-years lease, the continued possession was wrongful. A tenant who wrongfully remains in possession beyond the term fixed in the lease is a holdover tenant.

With respect to a holdover tenant, a landlord has the right to treat that tenant as an ongoing wrongdoer in possession of the landlord's property and sue for possession. Alternatively, the landlord can elect to treat the holdover as a periodic tenant. If the landlord elects to treat the holdover tenant as a periodic tenant, the nondurational provisions of the periodic tenancy are the same as those stated in the lease that terminated. Whitman et al., supra, § 6.20 at 214. Accordingly, in this case, the rent owed by Tom during the periodic tenancy would be equal to the rent stated in the lease even though that rent is higher than the current market rate.

[NOTE #1: The fact that Tom held over for only a few days and the fact that the amount of rent payable during the periodic tenancy is higher than the current market rate are irrelevant to whether the election was proper. A holdover tenant has neither the right to limit his extended time of possession to a period convenient to him nor the right to insist on paying rent at the current market rate.

DISCUSSION

Summary

The State B prosecution is not barred on double jeopardy grounds. Although City has already prosecuted and convicted the officer for an offense with identical elements based on the same conduct that is the subject of the State B prosecution, State B is a separate sovereign from City (and State A), triggering the dual-sovereignty exception to double jeopardy protection. In addition, the federal hate-crime prosecution is not barred on double jeopardy grounds. Although the federal crime and the municipal crime would be the "same offense" under the Blockburger test, the federal government is a separate sovereign from City (and State A) and can prosecute the officer for the assault even if the elements of the crime charged by the federal authorities include all the elements of the crime previously prosecuted by City.

The State A hate-crime prosecution is barred on double jeopardy grounds. The dual-sovereignty exception does not apply because City is a political subdivision of State A rather than a separate sovereign. Moreover, under the "same elements" test announced by the U.S. Supreme Court in Blockburger, the State A hate crime is the "same offense" as the municipal crime because all the elements of the municipal crime are also elements of the State A crime. It does not matter that the State A crime has an additional element not present in the municipal crime.

On the other hand, the State A assault-with-intent-to-cause-injury prosecution is not barred on double jeopardy grounds. That state crime and the municipal crime are not the same offense because each requires proof of an element that the other does not.

Point One (20%)

The State B prosecution is not barred on double jeopardy grounds despite the officer's conviction on the City criminal charge in State A because State B is a separate sovereign.

The Fifth Amendment's Double Jeopardy Clause declares that no person shall "be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." U.S. Const. Amend. V. The Fifth Amendment's double jeopardy provision applies to the states. Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784, 794 (1969). A person's double jeopardy rights include the right not to be subjected to a second prosecution for the same offense after the person's prior conviction. North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 717 (1969).

Here, the facts are clear that State B is seeking to prosecute the officer for the very same behavior for which he was previously convicted by City, which is a political subdivision of State A.

Nonetheless, the Double Jeopardy Clause does not forbid State B's prosecution of the officer because of the "dual sovereignty" doctrine. States are separate sovereigns from one another. Heath v. Alabama, 474 U.S. 82, 88 (1985). So "[w]hen a defendant in a single act violates the peace and dignity of two sovereigns by breaking the laws of each, he has committed two distinct offences." Id. (citation omitted). See also Gamble v. United States, 587 U.S. 678 (2019) ("a crime under one sovereign's laws is not 'the same offence' as a crime under the laws of another sovereign," even if the elements of the two crimes are the same.)

Thus, under the dual-sovereignty doctrine, State B may prosecute the officer even though it will be prosecuting him for the same conduct for which he was previously convicted and even though the elements of the State B crime are identical to the elements of the offense for which he was previously convicted.

[NOTE: Although prosecution by two states for the same conduct is rare because a state crime usually occurs entirely in one state, in this case elements of the offense occurred in two states—the rock being thrown from State A and the injury occurring in State B. State B is entitled to prosecute and punish the officer.]

Point Two (20%)

The federal prosecution is not barred on double jeopardy grounds because the federal government is a separate sovereign from City (as a political subdivision of State A), triggering the dual-sovereignty exception to double jeopardy protection.

Just as states are separate sovereigns from one another, the states are also separate sovereigns from the federal government. So again, "[a]n act denounced as a crime by both national and state sovereignties is an offense against the peace and dignity of both and may be punished by each." United States v. Lanza, 260 U.S. 377, 382 (1922). The dual-sovereignty doctrine thus applies here as well, allowing the federal criminal action to proceed despite the fact that the officer was already prosecuted by City. City is a governmental body in State A, and its actions are taken pursuant to State A law delegating some part of State A's sovereign authority to City. Because the federal government and City (as a political subdivision of State A) are separate sovereigns, the Double Jeopardy Clause is not implicated.

Point Three (40%)

The State A hate-crime prosecution is barred on double jeopardy grounds because both the City criminal charge to which the officer pleaded guilty and the state criminal charge cover the "same offense." Because City and State A are part of the same sovereignty, the dual-sovereign doctrine does not apply.

The State A prosecutor has charged the officer with violating the State A hate-crime statute. The charge is based on the same conduct for which the officer was previously convicted by a City court in State A. However, that does not necessarily mean that the prohibition on double jeopardy is violated. A single course of conduct can lead to multiple different criminal charges. To determine whether the State A prosecution is a prosecution for the "same offense" as the City prosecution, the court must apply the test developed by the U.S. Supreme Court in Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299, 304 (1932).

The Blockburger test focuses on the statutory elements of each offense and asks whether "each offense contains an element not contained" in the other. United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688, 696 (1993). Two provisions are not the "same offense" if each contains an element not included in the other. But if either crime would be fully established by proof of the elements of the other crime, then the offenses are the "same offense" for double jeopardy purposes.

Applying the Blockburger test here results in the conclusion that the City ordinance and the State A hate-crime statute describe the "same offense." Both the State A hate-crime statute and the City ordinance punish persons who assault others because of their religious expression. Although the State A hate-crime statute has an element (causing serious injury) that is not included in the City ordinance, the two crimes are otherwise identical and the City ordinance has no element that is not part of the State A hate-crime statute. In effect, the City crime is a lesser-included offense of the State crime, and proof of the elements of the State A hate-crime statute would fully establish a violation of the City ordinance. For Blockburger purposes, therefore, the two crimes are "the same offense," and prosecuting the same person for the same conduct under both statutes would violate the constitutional prohibition on double jeopardy.

The dual-sovereignty doctrine does not apply to the prosecution of the officer by State A. "Political subdivisions of States—counties, cities, or whatever—never were and never have been considered as sovereign entities. Rather, they have been traditionally regarded as subordinate governmental instrumentalities created by the State to assist in the carrying out of state governmental functions." Waller v. Florida, 397 U.S. 387, 392 (1970) (quotation omitted). The officer therefore has the right not to be subjected to further prosecution by State A for an offense for which he was already convicted by City. See Pearce, 395 U.S. at 717 (the Double Jeopardy Clause "protects against a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction.")

Point Four (20%)

The State A assault-with-intent-to-cause-injury charge is not barred because each of the two crimes—the state crime and the City ordinance violating—requires proof of an element that the other does not.

As noted above, to determine whether two crimes constitute the "same offense," the Supreme Court requires an evaluation of each statutory provision to determine whether they have the same elements. If each statutory provision requires proof of an element that the other does not, then the crimes are different offenses. Prosecution of a person for multiple crimes based on the same course of conduct does not violate double jeopardy if the crimes are different offenses. See United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688 (1993).

The State A assault statute under which the officer is being charged requires proof that the officer acted "with intent to cause injury." That "specific intent" element is not present in the City ordinance. On the other hand, the City ordinance under which the officer was convicted required proof that the officer committed assault on the victim because of the victim's religious expression. That motive element is not present in the State A crime. Thus, each offense contains an element not contained in the other, and double jeopardy is no bar to trying and punishing the officer for each crime based on the same course of conduct.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is Donna entitled to the 100 shares Testator received as a stock dividend in addition to the 200 shares of ABC Corp common stock owned by Testator when she executed her will?
- (2) Does Edward take Testator's home subject to the mortgage even though Testator's will directed that her "just debts" be paid from her estate?
- (3) Is Faye's estate entitled to the substantially damaged piano as well as the $10,000 of insurance proceeds not paid to Testator before her death?
- (4) In the absence of a residuary clause in Testator's will, to whom should the balance of Testator's estate be distributed?
- (5) Does the $30,000 that Testator gave her son, George, in 2020 reduce her grandson's (Isaac's) intestate share in Testator's estate?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Testator's estate is distributed as follows:

300 shares of ABC Corp common stock to Donna.

Testator's home to Edward, subject to the mortgage.

Balance of estate (the damaged piano plus $210,000 comprising the bank account of $200,000 and the $10,000 of casualty insurance proceeds) equally to Harriet and Isaac.

Under the Uniform Probate Code (UPC), Donna is entitled to all 300 shares of ABC Corp common stock because stock dividends earned between the time the will was signed and the time Testator died are allocated to the beneficiary of the stock.

Under the UPC, Edward takes the home subject to the mortgage on Testator's home at the time of her death. The "just debts" clause does not change that result.

The gift of the piano to Faye lapsed. Faye died intestate with Testator (her sister) and Edward (her brother) as her only heirs. This necessarily means that Faye had no issue who survived her or Testator. Because the gift lapsed, the piano passes as partial intestate property, along with the $10,000 insurance proceeds payable because of its damage, to Testator's heirs.

The balance of Testator's estate, including the insurance proceeds payable on the damaged piano, is distributed equally as partial intestate property to Testator's heirs: her daughter, Harriet, and her grandson, Isaac. In distributing the balance of Testator's estate, the $30,000 gifted to Testator's son, George, is not taken into account in computing Isaac's share because it is not treated as an advancement.

Donna is entitled to 300 shares of ABC Corp common stock because the stock dividend is an "increase" treated as a part of that devise.

Testator bequeathed to Donna 200 shares of ABC Corp common stock, which she inherited from her grandfather and owned at the time she executed her will. After executing her will in 2010, Testator received an additional 100 shares from that corporation as a "stock dividend." Under UPC § 2-605, if a testator specifically devised securities owned at the time the will was executed to a named beneficiary and subsequently the testator acquired additional shares of the securities as the result of either a stock split or a stock dividend, the additional shares also pass to the named beneficiary. Thus, Donna is entitled to all 300 shares of ABC Corp that Testator owned at the time of her death.

Point Two (20%)

Edward takes the home subject to the mortgage. The "just debts" clause in Testator's will does not alter that result.

Section 2-607 of the UPC provides that "[a] specific devise passes subject to any mortgage interest existing at the date of death without right of exoneration, regardless of a general directive in the will to pay debts" (emphasis added). While Testator's will provides that all her "just debts be paid before distributing the foregoing devises," § 2-607 expressly provides this general directive to pay debts does not result in Edward's being exonerated from taking the home subject to the mortgage. See also UPC § 2-607 cmt.

[NOTE: This contrasts with the common law, under which the specific legatee of real property is entitled to be exonerated from debts against that property. See W. McGovern, S. Kurtz, D. English & T. Gallanis, Wills, Trusts and Estates 255 (5th ed. 2017). So, although Edward would have taken free of the mortgage under the common law both because of the will's debt-payment directive and because of the general common law rule, under the UPC Edward takes the home subject to the mortgage that existed at the time of Testator's death. To be clear, under the UPC, it is irrelevant that Testator's will contains a general directive to pay Testator's debts.

A thorough answer to this question should discuss the effect of the payment clause in Testator's will but need not discuss the provisions of UPC § 3-814. This section empowers the executor of the estate to pay the mortgage "for the best interest of the estate," but no facts here would warrant that conclusion. And the last sentence of that section states that "[p]ayment of an encumbrance does not increase the share of the distributee entitled to the encumbered assets unless the distributee is entitled to exoneration." As explained above, § 2-607 expressly provides that the distributee is not entitled to exoneration.]

The devise to Faye lapsed because she predeceased Testator and left no issue who survived Testator.

Under § 2-606(a)(3) of the UPC, a specific devisee is entitled to the specifically devised property if it is in the probate estate and to "any proceeds unpaid at death on fire or casualty insurance on . . . the property." Faye therefore would have been entitled to the damaged piano that was still in Testator's probate estate as well as the $10,000 of unpaid casualty insurance proceeds if she had survived Testator. But because Faye predeceased Testator, the question becomes whether the specific devise to Faye lapsed.

Under § 2-603(b), if a devisee who was a descendant of the testator's grandparents predeceases the testator, the devise lapses unless the deceased devisee was survived by issue.

Faye is Testator's sister and thus is a descendant of Testator's grandparents. But the facts make it clear that Faye died without surviving issue. The facts state that Faye died before Testator and that Testator and Edward (Faye's siblings) were Faye's only heirs. Thus, Faye necessarily had no issue who survived Testator.

[NOTE #1: Because this devise lapsed and Testator's will contains no residuary clause, the devise passes as undisposed-of property to Testator's heirs Harriet and Isaac as partial intestate property. See generally UPC § 2-101(a) ("Any part of a decedent's estate not effectively disposed of by will passes by intestate succession to the decedent's heirs."); UPC § 2-103(c) (descendants take by representation). See Point Four below.

The lapse statutes of almost all non-UPC jurisdictions apply only if the deceased beneficiary leaves issue who survive the testator. Under these statutes, like the UPC, the devise to Faye would lapse because she had no issue who survived Testator. See McGovern, et al., supra, at 256.]

[NOTE #2: Ademption is "[t]he failure of specific devises by transfer or loss of the property after the will is executed." McGovern, et al., supra, at 1. At common law, a specific devise adeemed if the subject matter of the devise was not owned by the testator at the time of her death. Here, the piano was owned by Testator at the time of her death; it was merely damaged. Under UPC § 2-606 ("non-ademption of specific devises"), had Faye survived Testator, she would have been entitled to the damaged piano and the $10,000 insurance proceeds. But as explained above, because Faye died before Testator, leaving no issue who survived Testator, the bequest of the piano to Faye lapsed. Thus, the concept of non-ademption is irrelevant to this question.]

Point Four (20%)

Because Testator's will does not contain a residuary clause, all her undisposed-of property (the piano and $210,000) passes as partial intestate property to her two heirs, Harriet and Isaac.

Testator's will does not contain a residuary clause. As a result, any property not disposed of by the general and specific legacies under the will pass as partial intestate property to her heirs. UPC § 2-101(a). Testator's heirs are Harriet (her daughter) and Isaac (taking by representation of Testator's deceased son, George). Each of them is entitled to receive half of the partial intestate property. UPC § 2-103(c).

The partial intestate estate is the damaged piano and $210,000 (the $200,000 in cash plus the $10,000 of casualty insurance proceeds payable on the damaged piano).

Point Five (20%)

Under the UPC, Isaac's share of the estate is not reduced on account of Testator's $30,000 gift to Isaac's father, George, because the gift was not an advancement.

Under UPC § 2-109(a), "If an individual dies intestate as to all or a portion of the estate, property the decedent gave during the decedent's lifetime to an individual who, at the decedent's death, is an heir is treated as an advancement against the heir's intestate share . . . if . . . the decedent declared in a contemporaneous writing or the heir acknowledged in writing that the gift is an advancement" (emphasis added). Here the $30,000 gift to George fails to be an advancement for two reasons. First, there is no contemporaneous writing from anyone or any facts evidencing an acknowledgement by George that the gift was an advancement. The only writing indicating Testator's intent that the gift was an advancement was executed in 2023, three years after the gift was made in 2020. That is not a contemporaneous writing.

Second, the gift was made to George, her son, who predeceased Testator. Thus, George was not an heir of Testator at the time of Testator's death. Under the statute, to be an advancement the gift must be made to a person who was an heir of the donor at the time the donor of the gift died.

Lastly, UPC § 2-109(c) expressly provides that, if the recipient of the gift (here Testator's son, George) dies before the donor, "the property is not taken into account in computing the division and distribution" of the estate "unless the decedent's contemporaneous writing provides otherwise." While Testator's 2023 writing expressed the intent that the gift should be taken into account in the distribution of the estate, it is, as noted above, ineffective because it was not contemporaneous with the making of the gift.

[NOTE: If the gift of $30,000 to George was in fact an advancement, then the shares of Harriet and Isaac would have to be calculated taking that advancement into account. Here, the probate estate of $210,000 cash would be increased by the amount of $30,000 to create a hotchpot (in advancement talk) of $240,000. This is the amount that Testator's estate passing in partial intestacy (piano aside) would have totaled if Testator had not given $30,000 to George. The hotchpot then would generate a share of $120,000 for each of Harriet and Isaac. After Harriet receives her $120,000 share, there would be only $90,000 remaining to be distributed to Isaac, who receives $30,000 less than Harriet because of the $30,000 gift to his father, George.]

QUESTION 1 – REAL PROPERTY

Four years ago, Connie, a professional homebuilder, purchased a five-acre, rectangular tract of land. On its western side, the tract was bordered by land owned by Diane. One month after Connie purchased the tract, Diane sued Connie in state court to establish her adverse possession claim to a 12-foot-wide strip immediately inside the western border of Connie's tract, where Diane had maintained a vegetable garden. The court issued a judgment in Diane's favor, which was filed at the county recorder's office.

Three years ago, Connie built a house on the eastern half of the tract. One month after Connie completed the house, she contracted to sell the entire five-acre tract to Bert and convey it by warranty deed. The purchase agreement contained no express warranties regarding the quality of the house's construction. At the closing, Connie delivered to Bert the warranty deed, which excepted from warranties "all titles, covenants, and restrictions on record with the county recorder."

One year ago, Bert conveyed the five-acre tract to Adam by a quitclaim deed that contained no warranties. Adam had never inspected the tract.

Three months ago, a major crack appeared in the foundation of the house due to faulty construction. This resulted in frequent water intrusion and substantial water damage to the house.

Two months ago, when Adam started to construct a fence around the entire five-acre tract, Diane correctly told him that he could not lawfully build a fence that would block her access to the portion that she owned by adverse possession.

A gravel road runs from north to south through the middle of the five-acre tract. The gravel road connects the adjoining northern lot to the highway that abuts the tract to the south. One month ago, during Adam's fence construction on the north side of the tract, Adam's northern neighbor correctly told him that she had an implied easement of necessity over the gravel road, preventing her land from being landlocked.

1. Does Adam have a cause of action against Connie based on the crack in the house's foundation? Explain.
2. Does Adam have a cause of action against Connie based on Diane's ownership of a portion of the tract by adverse possession? Explain.
3. Does Adam have a cause of action against Bert based on Diane's ownership of a portion of the tract by adverse possession? Explain.
4. Does Adam have a cause of action against Connie based on the neighbor's easement over the tract? Explain.

In answering these questions, assume that none of Adam's claims are barred by any statute of limitations.

QUESTION 2 – CORPORATIONS & LLCs

XYZ Corp owns all the common stock of CruiseCo, which operates a fleet of 24 oceangoing passenger cruise ships. In addition, XYZ owns 90% of the common stock of ResortCo, which operates several large hotels and marinas on ocean coastlines. As a result of its share ownership, XYZ has the power to choose all members of the boards of directors for both ResortCo and CruiseCo, and it has voted its shares so as to elect XYZ employees for all seats on each board. All three corporations are incorporated in State A, which has adopted a corporate statute identical in substance to the Model Business Corporation Act.

During the past two years, CruiseCo's profits have steadily declined because fewer people have booked cruises. Moreover, many of the marinas where CruiseCo's ships stop to refuel have increased their docking fees. CruiseCo's ships frequently dock at ResortCo-owned marinas as part of their ordinary operations. ResortCo charges CruiseCo the same docking fees as it charges other cruise lines.

Last year, XYZ demanded that ResortCo stop charging CruiseCo's ships docking fees. At a board meeting to consider this demand, ResortCo's directors voted unanimously to acquiesce to XYZ's demand, even though ResortCo was contractually entitled to those fees. Eliminating the fees would help CruiseCo by reducing its operating costs and hurt ResortCo by lowering ResortCo's revenues.

Six months ago, at a board meeting, ResortCo's directors voted unanimously not to declare or pay the usual yearly dividend. The directors' rationale for this decision was to retain funds to construct new hotels and increase ResortCo's market share. The board reached its dividend decision after considering for several hours a report on the financial implications of the potential dividend from the company's chief financial officer and its independent accountant, as well as an advisory opinion prepared by an outside law firm.

At ResortCo's properly called board meeting last week, the board considered an offer that had been presented to ResortCo's president half an hour before the meeting. The offer was from Ava, the owner of 1,000 acres of coastal land well suited for commercial property development, to sell her land to ResortCo for $50 million. Ava, who had no previous connection to ResortCo, had told the president that she would hold the offer open for only 48 hours. Citing the time-sensitive nature of the offer and the attractiveness of the property, ResortCo's directors discussed Ava's offer for only 15 minutes before unanimously voting to accept it. ResortCo's directors did not obtain any guidance about the transaction's fairness or potential impact on the company's financial condition from outside experts or from ResortCo's chief financial officer before voting. In fact, the price was above the property's fair market value.

1. Did XYZ, as a controlling shareholder of ResortCo, breach a fiduciary duty of loyalty to ResortCo or ResortCo's minority shareholders by causing ResortCo to stop charging CruiseCo docking fees? Explain.
2. If ResortCo's minority shareholders challenge the board's decision not to declare a dividend this year, are they likely to prevail? Explain.
3. Is the ResortCo board of directors' decision to purchase Ava's land protected by the business judgment rule? Explain.

QUESTION 3 - CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

Three years ago, CarCo, an automobile manufacturer located in State A, entered into contracts with several State A automobile dealers. Under these contracts, the dealers had the right to sell cars made by CarCo. The term of each contract was 10 years, but the contract gave CarCo the absolute right to terminate the dealer's rights upon 60 days' written notice. CarCo insisted upon this termination provision because badly performing dealerships impact CarCo's profitability. CarCo has never entered into a dealership agreement without this provision and, during contract negotiations with other potential dealers, has consistently refused to omit the provision from dealership agreements.

Two years ago, CarCo announced that it planned to terminate agreements with rural dealers in many states and to encourage potential car buyers in rural areas to use CarCo's website to purchase cars. CarCo estimated that this new business model would result in significant cost savings. CarCo relied on the ability to terminate dealers' rights when it invested in expanding its online business.

After learning that CarCo intended to terminate agreements with rural dealers, the State A legislature passed a statute regulating agreements between automobile dealers and automobile manufacturers. The statute provides:

Notwithstanding the terms of any contract, an automobile manufacturer shall not, without good cause, terminate any contractual rights of a dealer located in a county with a population of less than 1,000. This provision applies to contracts entered into both before and after the effective date of this statute.

The legislature had not previously regulated agreements between automobile manufacturers and dealers, and State A's highest court had held that the state common law did not generally limit the enforceability of contract-termination provisions.

Prior to enactment of the statute, some members of the state legislature privately expressed anger that automobile manufacturers were terminating agreements with rural dealers and thought that the statute was a good way to "get back at them." The statute includes the following legislative finding and statement of legislative purpose:

This Act addresses the imbalance of bargaining power between automobile manufacturers and dealers. We find that if the parties were able to freely bargain on an equal footing, their agreements would contain a provision allowing termination only for good cause.

Last month, CarCo gave a State A rural dealer timely written notice of termination as provided in the dealership agreement. The dealer sued CarCo, citing the statute and asserting that CarCo could not terminate its rights as a dealer because CarCo lacked good cause to do so.

CarCo asserts that the statute is unconstitutional for three reasons. First, applying the statute to the dealership agreement, which the parties entered before the statute was enacted, violates the Contracts Clause of the Constitution. Second, the statute violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Constitution because it impermissibly discriminates between automobile-dealership agreements and contracts involving other products with similar provisions that allow termination without cause. For this second claim, CarCo has offered evidence of the legislators' private statements to prove that the state's actual purpose for the law was to effectuate the state's animus against automobile manufacturers. Third, the statute's good-cause requirement for terminating automobile-dealership agreements violates CarCo's substantive due process rights.

1. Does application of the State A statute to CarCo's rights under the dealership agreement with the dealer violate the Contracts Clause? Explain.
2. Does the State A statute violate the Equal Protection Clause? Explain.
3. Does the State A statute violate CarCo's substantive due process rights? Explain.

QUESTION 4 - CONTRACTS

A store owner wanted a new sign for her store. On May 1, she met with a representative of SignCo, a sign company, which she had selected on the basis of its low advertised prices, and detailed her proposed specifications for the sign. The store owner and the representative, who was authorized to enter into contracts on behalf of SignCo, orally agreed that SignCo would deliver to the store owner a 10-foot-long sign, for which the store owner would pay $5,000. They agreed that the sign would bear the unique name of the store, would be constructed of bent red glass, and would meet quality and design specifications stated by the store owner. They also orally agreed that the sign would be delivered to the store owner no later than May 31.

On May 6, SignCo had made substantial progress in shaping the glass into the store's name. By May 8, however, SignCo determined that it would not be able to finish the sign on time. Without the store owner's knowledge, on May 9 SignCo entered into an agreement with another company (the "substitute manufacturer"). The agreement required the substitute manufacturer to complete work on the sign and supply it to the store owner in accordance with the agreement between SignCo and the store owner. In addition, the agreement assigned to the substitute manufacturer SignCo's right to be paid under the agreement with the store owner.

On May 12, SignCo and the substitute manufacturer jointly called the store owner to tell her that the substitute manufacturer would be furnishing the sign to her and that the sign would be ready for delivery by the May 31 deadline. The store owner was angry. She told SignCo and the substitute manufacturer that she had contracted to buy a sign made by SignCo, not by the substitute manufacturer, and that she had no intention of accepting a sign made by anyone other than SignCo.

On May 31, the substitute manufacturer delivered to the store owner a sign that conformed to all the specifications of the store owner's agreement with SignCo. The store owner rejected the sign and refused to pay for it, arguing that the May 1 agreement could not be enforced against her because she had never signed a document reflecting that agreement. She also argued that even if she was bound by the May 1 agreement, its terms required that she receive a sign made by SignCo, not by the substitute manufacturer.

1. Did the store owner and SignCo enter into a contract on May 1? Explain.
2. Assuming that the store owner and SignCo entered into a contract on May 1, is it enforceable against the store owner even though the store owner did not sign a document reflecting the agreement? Explain.
3. Assuming that the May 1 agreement constitutes a contract that is enforceable against the store owner, is the store owner bound to accept the sign from the substitute manufacturer? Explain.

QUESTION 5 - FAMILY LAW

Wanda, who had been married to Harvey for 15 years, filed a complaint for divorce from Harvey shortly after she learned that he was having an affair with their married neighbor, Patrice. In the divorce proceeding, both Wanda and Harvey sought sole custody of their 13-year-old daughter.

Because Harvey and Wanda bitterly argued about and were highly critical of each other's parenting, the trial court appointed a neutral child-custody evaluator to investigate the family dynamics and provide an informed custody recommendation to the court. Both Wanda and Harvey told the evaluator that they were unwilling to share custody. The daughter told the evaluator that she was very upset because her parents were divorcing. She blamed her mother for the divorce and wanted to live with her father. The evaluator found that both parents were devoted to their daughter and recommended that the trial court grant Harvey sole physical and legal custody of the daughter, with Wanda to have liberal visitation with the daughter. The trial court granted the divorce and entered a custody order consistent with the evaluator's recommendation. Neither parent appealed this order.

Two months after the trial court entered the divorce decree and custody order, Patrice moved into Harvey's home. Wanda immediately petitioned the trial court to modify the custody order. She sought sole physical and legal custody of the daughter because of Harvey's nonmarital cohabitation with Patrice. Harvey opposed Wanda's petition, arguing that there was no justification for modifying the custody order. Neither Wanda nor Harvey requested joint custody, and the relationship between Wanda and Harvey remained bitter and acrimonious.

The trial court held a hearing on Wanda's petition to modify custody. The daughter testified, "I am still angry that my parents got divorced, but I do miss my mom and wouldn't mind seeing her more. Patrice is fine." Harvey testified that there had been no change in the daughter's behavior since Patrice moved into his home and that she and the daughter "get along well."

Wanda testified that the daughter should not be exposed to the nonmarital cohabitation of Harvey and Patrice. There was no other testimony.

1. Are the facts legally sufficient to authorize the trial court to consider whether to modify the existing custody order? Explain.
2. Assuming that the facts are legally sufficient to authorize the trial court to consider whether to modify custody, should the trial court modify the existing custody order to grant Harvey and Wanda joint physical and legal custody of their daughter? Explain.

QUESTION 6 – CIVIL PROCEDURE

A woman was driving in State A when her sport-utility vehicle (SUV) collided with a car driven by a man. As a result of the accident, the woman, who is a citizen of State A, had significant injuries requiring treatment by a physician. The man is a citizen of State B and was in State A visiting his brother at the time of the accident.

Three passengers were in the man's car: the man's brother was in the front passenger seat, and two of the man's friends were in the backseat.

The man had a car insurance policy that provided coverage of up to $1,000,000 for personal injuries and property damage.

The man hired an attorney, who began investigating the accident. The attorney spoke to four people: a bystander who had witnessed the accident, the man's brother, and the man's two friends who had been in the car. The bystander recounted that the man had been looking at his phone at the time of the accident. The man's two friends also stated that the man had been trying to read directions on his phone at the time. The man's brother stated that the man had not been looking at his phone when the accident occurred.

Shortly after the man's attorney completed his investigation, the woman sued the man in the US District Court for the District of State A. Her complaint asserted a claim of negligence against the man and sought $250,000 in damages for personal injury and property damage. Pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26, the woman and the man exchanged initial mandatory disclosures. The man's initial disclosures included his brother's name and contact information, along with a summary of the information that the brother could provide concerning the accident. The man's initial disclosures did not identify or refer to the other passengers or the bystander, although the man later identified them in answers to interrogatories. The man's initial disclosures also did not include any information about his car insurance policy.

During discovery, the woman's attorney took the man's deposition. When the woman's attorney asked the man about his eyesight, the man's attorney objected and instructed the man not to answer, asserting that the line of questioning was not relevant. When the woman's attorney persisted in asking the man about his eyesight, the man's attorney abruptly ended the deposition, and the man and his attorney immediately departed.

Subsequently, the woman's attorney filed a proper motion to compel the man to answer deposition questions, but the court denied the motion, finding that "questions about the man's health and physical condition are irrelevant to this tort suit, and inquiry about them is improper."

Later, the woman's lawsuit was tried to a jury. At trial, the woman called the man's two friends and the bystander to testify. Each witness testified that the man had been looking at his cell phone at the time of the accident. The woman also called her treating physician to testify. The physician described the nature and extent of the woman's injuries. The only witness the man called was his brother, who testified that the man had not been looking at his phone when the accident occurred. Immediately after the man rested his case, the woman moved for judgment as a matter of law on the issue of the man's liability for negligence.

1. Was the man required to include in his initial disclosures information about the insurance policy and the identity of the three other witnesses to the accident? Explain.
2. Did the trial court rule correctly on the woman's attorney's motion to compel the man to answer deposition questions about his eyesight? Explain.
3. How should the court rule on the woman's motion for judgment as a matter of law? Explain.

ANALYSIS 1 – REAL PROPERTY

RLP (II.B.; III.F.; V.A. & B.)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Does Adam have a cause of action against Connie for damage to his house resulting from the crack in the foundation based upon the implied warranty of habitability or the implied warranty of workmanlike construction?
- (2) Does Adam have a cause of action against Connie resulting from Diane's successful adverse possession claim because the deed was from Connie to Bert, not to Adam, and excluded from the warranties "all titles, covenants, and restrictions on record with the county recorder"?
- (3) Does Adam have a cause of action against Bert resulting from Diane's successful adverse possession even though Adam took title from Bert by a quitclaim deed?
- (4) Does Adam have a cause of action against Connie resulting from the neighbor's claim of an easement by necessity even though the deed was from Connie to Bert, not to Adam, and excluded "all titles, covenants, and restrictions on record with the county recorder"?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Whether Adam has a cause of action against Connie based on the crack in the house's foundation depends on the jurisdiction in which the house is located. In some states, the sale of a new house includes an implied warranty of habitability or an implied warranty of workmanlike construction. However, among those jurisdictions that recognize such an implied warranty, only some hold that the warranty extends from builders like Connie to downstream buyers like Adam.

Adam has no cause of action against Connie resulting from Diane's adverse possession because the deed from Connie to Bert excluded from the warranty "all titles, covenants, and restrictions on record with the county recorder." Diane's claim was on the record and thus was excepted from the warranty because, as the facts clearly state, she had a court judgment on her adverse possession claim, and a court judgment affecting the title of real property is part of the land records.

Adam has no cause of action against Bert resulting from Diane's adverse possession because Adam took title from Bert under a quitclaim deed and quitclaim deeds contain no warranties of title.

Whether Adam has a cause of action against Connie resulting from the neighbor's claim of an easement by necessity depends on the jurisdiction in which the house is located. In some jurisdictions, Adam has no claim against Connie, even though the easement was not excluded from the warranty deed, because the easement would have been plain and obvious to Adam had he inspected the land when he purchased it. In other jurisdictions, Adam has a claim because there was no exclusion in the warranty deed.

Point One (25%)

Whether Adam has a cause of action against Connie based on the crack in the house's foundation depends on the jurisdiction in which the house is located. In some states, the sale of a new house includes an implied warranty of habitability or an implied warranty of workmanlike construction. However, among those jurisdictions that recognize such an implied warranty, only some hold that the warranty extends from builders like Connie to downstream buyers like Adam.

Under the common law doctrine of caveat emptor, a builder made no warranties to a home buyer regarding the quality of the structure. The buyer took the home "as is." See Dale A. Whitman, Ann M. Burkhart, R.W. Freyermuth & Troy A. Rule, The Law of Property § 11.16 (4th ed. 2019). Today, however, most states recognize an implied warranty of habitability or an implied warranty of workmanlike construction either by statute or by judicial precedent. Typically, this warranty is that the home is "designed and constructed in a workmanlike manner and fit for habitation." Id., § 11.16 at 831.

Jurisdictions differ, however, on whether the warranty between a builder and a buyer runs to downstream buyers such as Adam, who acquired the house from Bert and not from the builder (Connie). Some jurisdictions say that the warranty does run to downstream buyers, others say that it does not, and yet others have not addressed the issue at all. Thus, under these facts, whether Adam has a claim against Connie depends on the jurisdiction in which the house is located.

[NOTE: An acceptable answer may analyze the law and reach a conclusion under the law of any single state.]

Point Two (25%)

Adam has no cause of action against Connie resulting from Diane's successful adverse possession claim because the deed from Connie to Bert excluded from the warranty "all titles, covenants, and restrictions on record with the county recorder."

Warranty deeds include six covenants: three present covenants, which are enforceable only by the warrantee named in the warranty deed (here Bert), and three future covenants, which are enforceable by the named warrantee and all future transferees, such as Adam. The most relevant of the future covenants here is the covenant of quiet enjoyment. This covenant protects the warrantee and any remote grantee (here Adam) against claims based on the warrantor's (here Connie's) absence of title to all or a portion of the land conveyed in the warranty deed. See generally Sheldon F. Kurtz, Thomas P. Gallanis & Herbert Hovenkamp, The Law of Property: An Introductory Survey (7th ed. 2018) at 667-69.

However, a warranty deed may expressly exclude (or "except") from the warranties in the deed claims based on titles, easements, covenants, and restrictions "of record," meaning titles, easements, covenants, and other restrictions that have been filed in the land records of the county in which the land is located. These records include the land records maintained by the county recorder as well as all court judgments and probate records. Where such exclusion is provided for in the warranty deed, as here, the downstream buyer has no cause of action against the warrantor for breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment because the buyer's quiet enjoyment was disturbed as the result of an excluded title.

Here Diane's adverse possession claim to title had been reduced to a judgment that was, as a matter of law, part of the land records. Any warranty to protect a downstream buyer from this title was excluded by the deed from Connie to Bert by the exception language for "all titles, covenants, and restrictions on record." Adam (the downstream buyer) therefore has no claim against Connie for breach of the warranty because Diane's title by adverse possession was excluded from the warranties in Connie's deed to Bert.

Adam has no cause of action against Bert resulting from Diane's adverse possession title because Adam took title from Bert under a quitclaim deed that contained no warranties.

Adam purchased the land from Bert. Regardless of whether Adam was a warrantee under Connie's deed to Bert as a downstream buyer, Adam would have a claim against Bert arising from Diane's adverse possession of land only if he received a warranty deed from Bert. But Adam received only a quitclaim deed from Bert. A quitclaim deed by definition, contains no warranties of title. See Joseph W. Singer, Bethany R. Berger, Nestor M. Davidson, and Eduardo M. Penalver, Property Law: Rules, Policies, and Practices § 3.3 (8th ed. 2022) (under a quitclaim deed, the grantor "does not warrant that the grantor owns anything or has the right to convey" title to the grantee). Adam therefore has no claim against Bert.

[NOTE: Marketable title is relevant only to the question of whether a buyer can refuse to close a transaction and to take title of land from a seller due to a title defect. Once the deed is delivered, the issue of marketable title is irrelevant, and the claims relating to title defects are based solely on the nature of the deed received. In the case of Bert, he took the land by a warranty deed that excluded the adverse possession claim, and in the case of Adam, he took by a quitclaim deed that contained no warranties at all.]

Point Four (30%)

Whether Adam has a cause of action against Connie based on the neighbor's easement by necessity depends on the jurisdiction in which the house is located. In some jurisdictions, Adam has no claim resulting from that easement even though the easement was not excluded from the warranty deed because the easement would have been plain and obvious to Adam had he inspected the land when he purchased it. In others, Adam has a claim because there was no exclusion in the warranty deed.

An easement by necessity is an encumbrance on the land. Because the covenant of quiet enjoyment in Connie's deed to Bert did not expressly except that encumbrance from the warranty, Connie ordinarily would be liable to the downstream buyer for breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment.

[NOTE #1: The language in the deed excepting "all titles, covenants, and restrictions on record with the county recorder" would not be a basis for excepting the easement by necessity from the warranty because these easements arise by operation of law and thus are not recorded.]

Whether the easement by necessity here will be impliedly excepted differs from state to state. Some courts conclude that an easement is excepted from the warranty if the easement is "plain and obvious or is well-known to the grantee." Dale Whitman, et al., supra, § 11.16 at 804. Here the easement was plain and obvious given that it was evidenced by a gravel road running north to south across the land to a public road. No purchaser would reasonably expect that Connie was warranting that the easement did not exist. See id. at 804-05. In these jurisdictions, Adam has no claim resulting from the neighbor's easement.

Other courts hold that the fact that the buyer could see a visible use of the property that might constitute an easement does not preclude the buyer from suing on the covenant of quiet enjoyment. Although the buyer may see the encumbrance, the buyer knows little or nothing about its legal status. Because, as between the seller and the buyer, the seller has better knowledge of the easement's status, the risk of loss from an erroneous assessment of its existence and the need to expressly exclude is on the seller. See S. Kurtz, et al., supra, at 686-87. In these jurisdictions, Adam has a claim because there was no exclusion in the warranty deed.

[NOTE #2: Adam has no claim based on the covenant against encumbrances because that covenant does not extend to downstream buyers.]

[NOTE #3: There are two kinds of warranty deeds: the warranty deed (a/k/a "general warranty deed") and the "special warranty deed." The latter may be evidenced either by using the word "special" before "warranty" or by language in the warranties limiting them to actions occurring only during the time the seller owned the property. That is, by using a special warranty deed, the seller is not guaranteeing the condition of the title during any period of ownership by anyone but the seller. Here, there are no facts suggesting that Connie conveyed the land to Bert by a special warranty deed. If Connie had conveyed the land to Bert by a special warranty deed, another reason that Adam would have no claim against Connie under Issue #2 might be that the statute of limitations that benefited Diane had fully run before Connie acquired the land. A similar argument might also be made with respect to Issue #4.]

ANALYSIS 2 – COROPRATIONS & LLCs

COR (IV.C.; V. B.; VI.A.; VIII.)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did XYZ Corp, as a controlling shareholder of ResortCo, breach its duty of loyalty to ResortCo or ResortCo's minority shareholders by causing ResortCo to stop charging docking fees to CruiseCo?
- (2) Could ResortCo's minority shareholders successfully challenge the board's decision not to declare a dividend this year?
- (3) Is the ResortCo board of directors' decision to purchase Ava's land protected by the business judgment rule?

DISCUSSION

Summary

XYZ Corp likely breached a fiduciary duty of loyalty to ResortCo and its minority shareholders by causing ResortCo to stop collecting docking fees from CruiseCo. As a controlling shareholder, XYZ (the parent corporation) owes a fiduciary duty of loyalty to its two subsidiary corporations ResortCo and CruiseCo. XYZ breaches that duty by preferring itself at a subsidiary's expense unless such preferential treatment is shown to be entirely fair to the subsidiary. XYZ's demand that ResortCo stop charging fees to CruiseCo is a form of self-dealing that allows one subsidiary (here CruiseCo)—and indirectly, the parent (here, XYZ)—to gain an unfair financial advantage to the detriment of another subsidiary (ResortCo). XYZ thus most likely breached its fiduciary duty to ResortCo.

ResortCo's minority shareholders probably cannot successfully challenge its board of directors' decision not to declare a dividend. Any such challenge would be through a direct claim, as the minority shareholders would be alleging that they were directly harmed, not that the failure to pay dividends harmed ResortCo. The declaration of a dividend is dependent on the exercise of the board of directors' good-faith discretion. Courts will not interfere with directors' refusal to declare dividends unless a shareholder demonstrates that the decision was self-interested, uninformed, made for a wrongful purpose, or taken in bad faith. Here, the decision by ResortCo's board not to pay a dividend was well-informed and motivated by a rational business objective. There is also no evidence that ResortCo's directors were acting selfishly or in bad faith. Thus, ResortCo's minority shareholders will most likely fail in an action to compel a dividend.

The final issue is whether the decision of ResortCo's board of directors to purchase Ava's land will be protected by the business judgment rule. ResortCo's directors, feeling some time pressure, decided to make a major land purchase after only 15 minutes of discussion and without receiving any additional guidance on the wisdom or fairness of the transaction from financial experts. Under these circumstances, a court will most likely find that the directors breached their duty of care by not becoming adequately informed during their decision-making process. The ResortCo directors' decision to purchase Ava's land will likely not be protected by the business judgment rule.

Point One (33%)

XYZCorp, as the controlling shareholder of ResortCo, most likely breached a fiduciary duty of loyalty to ResortCo and ResortCo's minority shareholders by favoring the financial interests of XYZ's other subsidiary, CruiseCo, in a way that was unfair and detrimental to ResortCo.

Under the common law, controlling shareholders owe fiduciary duties to minority shareholders. See generally James D. Cox & Thomas Lee Hazen, Business Organizations Law § 11:11 (5th ed. 2020). A controlling shareholder is a shareholder that has sufficient voting power to elect the majority of the board. Because controlling shareholders can exercise their power in ways that prove detrimental to minority shareholders, courts impose a fiduciary duty of loyalty on controlling shareholders that parallels the duty owed by corporate directors. Id. In some states, this duty is described as one to refrain from deriving an improper personal benefit at the expense of the minority shareholder. See, e.g., Data Key Partners v. Permira Advisers LLC, 849 N.W.2d 693, 706 (Wis. 2014). Even if the duty were characterized in that way, it would cover the type of action engaged in here.

When a parent exercises its control in a way that prefers its own interests to the detriment of a subsidiary, the courts often place the burden on the parent to prove that the transaction was entirely fair to the subsidiary.

Here, XYZ's ownership of 90% of the common stock of ResortCo makes it a controlling shareholder (parent) that owes a fiduciary duty to ResortCo and its minority shareholders. XYZ used its power over ResortCo to prefer its own interests at the expense of ResortCo and ResortCo's minority shareholders. Because XYZ was concerned about the declining value of its investment in CruiseCo, XYZ ordered its other subsidiary, ResortCo, to stop charging CruiseCo docking fees. This action enabled CruiseCo—and indirectly XYZ—to gain a financial advantage to ResortCo's detriment.

[NOTE: The facts do not mention the existence of any exculpation charter provisions. Thus, there is no need to analyze how such a provision might impact XYZ's potential liability for breach of fiduciary duty.

Nor does the question ask whether this would be a direct or derivative claim.]

Point Two (34%)

ResortCo's minority shareholders cannot successfully challenge the board's decision not to declare a dividend this year.

Whether dividends will be paid, and in what amount, is to be determined in the good-faith discretion of the corporation's board of directors. Cox & Hazen, supra, § 20.2 (describing directors' general discretion over the declaration of dividends as "well-settled doctrine"). This approach means that directors "are given a great deal of discretion to use corporate resources to expand the business . . . and to establish various reserves if they consider it to be in the interests of the corporation to do so." Id.

This hands-off approach to judicial interference in board decisions, including the decision whether to pay dividends, is known as the "business judgment rule." The rule creates a rebuttable presumption that directors' decisions are made in good faith and in the best interests of the corporation. Unless a shareholder rebuts the business judgment rule presumption, courts will not second-guess a board's decision. See Cox & Hazen, supra, § 10.1. Shareholders can rebut the business judgment rule presumption by showing that directors breached their fiduciary duty of care or loyalty in connection with a challenged transaction. The primary way in which directors might breach their duty of care is by failing to become adequately informed during their decision-making process. See id.; MBCA § 8.31(a). Directors breach their duty of loyalty through self-dealing.

Where a shareholder challenges the nonpayment of a dividend to which it is allegedly entitled, that shareholder generally makes a direct claim against the board rather than a derivative claim. That is because the failure to declare a dividend would be a harm suffered only by the shareholder, not the corporation. Moreover, the recovery would go only to the shareholder, not the corporation. See Strougo v. Bassini, 282 F.3d 162, 171 (2nd Cir. 2002) ("[W]hen the shareholders of a corporation suffer an injury that is distinct from that of the corporation, the shareholders may bring direct suit for redress of that injury; there is shareholder standing. When the corporation is injured and the injury to its shareholders derives from that injury, however, only the corporation may bring suit; there is no shareholder standing."). As such, the shareholder does not need to comply with the various formalities (such as making a demand on the board to bring the lawsuit or show why demand would be futile) associated with bringing a derivative claim.

With respect to the ResortCo directors' refusal to declare a dividend, the evidence suggests that the directors acted in accordance with all their fiduciary obligations. The directors acted with due care by becoming fully informed and engaging in a thorough decision-making process. They received independent guidance on the matter from both an outside accountant and a private law firm. They also deliberated at length and received a report on the financial implications of their decision from the company's chief financial officer prior to acting. There is also no suggestion that the directors acted self-interestedly. For example, nothing in the fact pattern indicates that the directors withheld a dividend so that they could award themselves excessive compensation or squeeze out a minority shareholder. Accordingly, a shareholder will be unable to rebut the presumption created by the business judgment rule that the directors' refusal to declare a dividend was fully informed, reasonable, and in the best interests of the corporation.

Here, any claim by minority shareholders of ResortCo against the board would be a direct claim. That is because any alleged failure by ResortCo's board to pay a dividend to which shareholders are allegedly entitled would be a loss suffered only by the shareholders, not ResortCo. Moreover, any recovery would go to the shareholders, not Resort Co. As such, they do not need to comply with the formalities associated with bringing a derivative claim.

[NOTE: Some courts apply an even more deferential standard to the decision whether to pay dividends. Cox & Hazen, supra, § 20.2. According to that standard, courts will not interfere with directors' decisions to declare or withhold dividends in the absence of "fraud or gross abuse of discretion." Id. (citing Baron v. Allied Artists Pictures Corp., 337 A.2d 653, 659 (Del. Ch. 1975)). On the rare occasions when courts have sided with shareholders seeking to compel dividends, the facts generally suggest that the directors acted self-interestedly, in bad faith, with a motive of driving minority shareholders out of the corporation, or to advance a purpose unrelated to the corporation's business. Id.

Here, nothing in the facts presented suggests that ResortCo's directors refused to declare a dividend fraudulently, in bad faith, or in gross abuse of their discretion. The ResortCo directors' decision to withhold a dividend was for a temporary period (one year), and it was based on a reasonable business objective of building new hotels to expand the company's market share. Goals of growing the business or making improvements to corporate property are among the reasonable grounds that courts have found sufficient to justify a board's decision not to declare dividends. Id. (citing cases). Moreover, the ResortCo directors were fully informed, as noted above. It is therefore most likely that a court would uphold the ResortCo directors' refusal to declare a dividend.]

Point Three (33%)

The decision by ResortCo's directors to purchase Ava's land most likely will not be protected by the business judgment rule because the directors breached their fiduciary duty of care by not becoming adequately informed during the decision-making process.

The corporation's board of directors is responsible for corporate decision-making. See MBCA § 8.01(b) ("Except as provided in a [shareholder agreement], and subject to any limitation in the articles of incorporation . . . , all corporate powers shall be exercised by . . . the board of directors."); see also Delaware Gen. Corp. Law § 141(a) ("The business and affairs of every corporation . . . shall be managed by or under the direction of a board of directors, except as may be otherwise provided . . . in its certificate of incorporation."). Judicial review of board decision-making is governed by a doctrine known as the "business judgment rule." The business judgment rule embodies a "hands off" approach to judicial interference in corporate decisions. The rule creates a rebuttable presumption that directors' decisions are made in good faith and in the best interests of the corporation. Unless a shareholder rebuts the business judgment rule presumption, courts will not second-guess a board's decision. Cox & Hazen, supra § 10.1.

Shareholders can rebut the presumption created by the business judgment rule by, among other things, showing that directors breached their duty of care in connection with a challenged transaction. See id., § 10.2; MBCA § 8.31(a)(2)(ii)(B). The primary way in which directors might breach their duty of care is by failing to become adequately informed during their decision-making process. MBCA § 8.31(a)(2)(ii)(B). To be adequately informed when making decisions, directors must become informed to the degree that "a person in a like position would reasonably believe appropriate under similar circumstances." MBCA § 8.30(b). The MBCA's reference to "similar circumstances" allows courts to consider the complexity or the exigency of the circumstances surrounding a challenged transaction. The overall focus in this context is on the quality of the deliberations, diligence, and research that go into board decisions. If the corporation's directors became informed to an extent reasonable under the circumstances, then courts will not interfere with their business judgment.

Here, the decision of ResortCo's directors to purchase Ava's land will most likely not be protected by the business judgment rule. A strong argument can be made that the directors breached their duty of care by failing to become adequately informed about the purchase prior to voting to authorize it. The directors spent just 15 minutes discussing a major business transaction involving the purchase of land for $50 million, on the same day that they learned of the opportunity, and they failed to gather any additional advice from either outside or inside financial experts. In these respects, the case resembles Smith v. Van Gorkom, 488 A.2d 858 (Del. 1985). The Smith court found that corporate directors breached their duty of care by similarly not adequately informing themselves when voting to approve the sale of the company. Among the most significant informational deficiencies identified by the court, the directors met for only two hours, had insufficient notice about the decision to be made, did not obtain guidance from an outside expert on the fairness of the sale price, did not question the company's internal financial officer about how he concluded that the sale price was in the range of fair, and did not question Van Gorkom about his role in setting the price or orchestrating the deal. 488 A.2d at 874.

Although the directors might argue that Ava's insistence on receiving an answer within 48 hours created exigent circumstances justifying an accelerated and abbreviated decision-making process, the deadline that Ava imposed was not so extreme as to make it impossible for the directors to engage in meaningful deliberations or conduct additional research into the transaction's fairness and financial impact on the company. Indeed, in Smith, the directors were given a deadline of three days to decide and yet the court deemed inadequate their two-hour meeting to discuss the transaction, especially given the absence of outside guidance on the deal's fairness. In sum, no directors in the same position as ResortCo's directors would reasonably believe it was appropriate to approve a transaction of this magnitude and under these circumstances without performing more robust deliberations and due diligence.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1)(a) Does the State A statute substantially impair the contract between CarCo and the dealer?
- (1)(b) Is the State A statute drawn in an "appropriate" and "reasonable" way to advance a significant and legitimate public purpose?
- (2) Is the State A statute's different treatment of automobile manufacturers rationally related to a legitimate government interest?
- (3) Is the State A statute's burden on CarCo's substantive due process liberty interest rationally related to a legitimate government interest?

DISCUSSION

Summary

First, Article I, section 10 of the Constitution provides that "[n]o state shall . . . pass any . . . Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts." Because the State A statute makes unenforceable a term in an existing contract between private parties, the threshold question is whether the law "operate[s] as a substantial impairment of a contractual relationship." Here, the State A statute substantially impairs CarCo's rights under the dealership agreement because CarCo would not have anticipated the statute when the agreement was entered into, and the unilateral right to terminate was an important contract term.

Second, a court would likely find that the State A statute is not an appropriate and reasonable way to advance a significant and legitimate public purpose because it lacks the hallmarks of such a law. While arguments might be made either way, the statute apparently does not address a general societal problem, such as a statewide economic crisis or natural disaster, but rather was enacted in response to specific private conduct. The statute does not cover threats to the government's interest (i.e., the unequal bargaining power between automobile dealers and manufacturers in the state), but rather targets only a subset of those threats (i.e., only rural dealerships). And last, the statute is not a temporary measure but rather imposes an indefinite requirement. Thus, the statute likely violates the Contracts Clause.

Because the statute does not discriminate against a suspect classification and is not based on gender, the law is subject to rational basis review under the Equal Protection Clause. The statute is rationally related to State A's legitimate interest in protecting automobile dealers from the greater bargaining power of automobile manufacturers. Thus, the statute does not violate the Equal Protection Clause.

Because the statute does not burden a fundamental liberty interest, the law is subject to rational basis review under substantive due process. Again, because the statute is rationally related to State A's interest in addressing the imbalance of bargaining power between automobile manufacturers and dealers, it does not violate CarCo's substantive due process rights.

Point One – Contracts Clause (33% total weight)

General principles (11%)

Three general legal principles apply to analysis under the Contracts Clause of the U.S. Constitution. U.S. Const. art. I, § 10.

First, the Contracts Clause applies only when a state law retroactively regulates contracts made before the law was enacted.

Second, when the Contracts Clause applies, the threshold issue is the degree to which state law impairs or interferes with the party's contract. The degree of impairment must be substantial or significant to trigger further analysis.

Third, if a state law substantially impairs the party's contract, courts apply a means-end balancing test to determine whether the law is constitutional. The applicable test is a form of intermediate scrutiny: the statute must be (a) a reasonable and appropriate way to (b) advance a significant and legitimate government purpose.

The State A statute substantially impairs the obligation of contracts between automobile manufacturers and dealers because it overrides an important contract term, and the parties could not have anticipated enactment of the statute when they entered into the agreement.

The Contracts Clause of the U.S. Constitution provides that "[n]o state shall . . . pass any . . . Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts." U.S. Const. art. I, § 10. Because the dealership agreement is between private parties, the first step of the Contracts Clause analysis is to determine whether the challenged law "substantially impairs" the obligations under the parties' contract. The Supreme Court has explained that this first step has three questions: "whether there is a contractual relationship, whether a change in law impairs that contractual relationship, and whether the impairment is substantial. Normally, the first two are unproblematic, and we need address only the third." General Motors Corp. v. Romein, 503 U.S. 181, 186 (1992). As is typical, the first two questions are "unproblematic" in this case; there is a contact between the automobile manufacturer and the dealer, and the state law impairs that contract by altering the provision on termination of the agreement. The question, then, is whether that impairment is substantial.

The Court's cases have considered three circumstances in determining whether a challenged state law substantially impairs private contracts. First, a state law does not substantially impair a contract if it merely tracks the contracting parties' likely intent or expectation, or allows a contracting party to easily override the statutory provision. See Sveen v. Melin, 584 U.S. 811, 819 (2018) (state law voiding ex-spouse as life insurance beneficiary after a divorce did not impair the insurance contract when it allowed the insured to simply re-designate the former spouse as a beneficiary). Here, the state statute is clearly contrary to CarCo's intent.

Second, a state statute will not impair private contracts if it merely enters an area already heavily regulated by the state, so that the parties could have anticipated the challenged law. City of El Paso v. Simmons, 379 U.S. 497, 514 (1965). Here, that is not the case. Neither the state's statutory nor common law had specifically regulated agreements between automobile manufacturers and dealers, and the question provides no facts suggesting that CarCo could have anticipated the statute at the time it entered into the dealership agreement.

Third, a state statute substantially impairs the obligation of a private contract if it negates a contract term that was important to the parties' bargain or that "substantially induced" a party to enter into the agreement, id., as opposed to merely burdening an ancillary aspect of the contract. See id. at 515. Here, the affected contract provision is important to CarCo's contract because CarCo's ability to terminate a poorly performing dealership protects both profitability and overall brand value in a region. The dealers may respond that the statute does not prohibit termination of a dealership but rather limits the reasons for doing so. CarCo would respond that the statute defeats the contractual right that it had bargained for: unilateral termination upon 60 days' notice without any recourse. Also, CarCo has consistently refused to omit the term from dealership agreements. Consequently, the state statute likely substantially impairs the obligation of CarCo's private contract.

The State A statute arguably is not an appropriate and reasonable measure to serve a significant and legitimate state interest. Thus, the statute likely violates the Contracts Clause.

Home Building & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398 (1934), established that a state may impair private contracts in the name of a sufficient public purpose. There, the state imposed a temporary moratorium on mortgage payments to protect homeowners from the economic devastation brought on by the Great Depression. Id. at 416. The Court has since explained that less dire circumstances will justify impairment of a private contract, requiring a significant and legitimate government interest. Energy Reserves Group, Inc. v. Kansas Power & Light Co., 459 U.S. 400, 412 (1983) ("since Blaisdell, the Court has indicated that the public purpose need not be addressed to an emergency or temporary situation.").

The requirement that the law be tailored to a significant and legitimate interest ensures that a state is addressing a public concern as opposed to simply favoring a narrow, private interest. Id. Here, it could be argued that the State A statute had a significant and legitimate state interest. For example, in Energy Reserves Group, the Court found a significant and legitimate government interest in protecting consumers from escalation of gas prices due to deregulation of the gas industry. 459 U.S. at 417 ("The State reasonably could find that higher gas prices have caused and will cause hardship among those who use gas heat but must exist on limited fixed incomes"). Here, State A arguably has a similar interest in promoting the economic well-being of its rural communities and rural car dealers.

While the State A statute may serve a sufficient purpose, it is likely that the statute's means of achieving that purpose are not reasonable and appropriate. In Allied Structural Steel v. Spannaus, 438 U.S. 234, 247 (1978), the Court found that the state did not have a sufficient public interest to support a law that substantially increased an employer's contractual obligation to fund employee pensions. The Court noted three hallmarks that led to its invalidation of the state law. First, unlike the statute in Blaisdell, the law did not address a general societal problem (i.e., the economic dislocation from the Great Depression), but rather targeted specific conduct by a set of private actors. Id. Second, the state law targeted the employee pensions of one or a small number of businesses that had moved out of state, rather than regulating all employee pensions that posed similar policy problems. Id. at 250 (the law's "narrow aim was leveled, not at every Minnesota employer, not even at every Minnesota employer who left the State, but only at those who had in the past been sufficiently enlightened as voluntarily to agree to establish pension plans for their employees."). Third, unlike the moratorium in Blaisdell, the law was not a temporary measure limited to the duration of a crisis. Id.

The State A statute arguably bears each of the hallmarks of unconstitutionality. First, it does not address a general problem throughout the state, but rather targets a specific concern about the relationship between automobile manufacturers and dealers. Second, the statute does not apply to all dealership agreements, but only agreements with dealers in counties with fewer than 1,000 residents. Third, the statute is not a temporary measure, but rather applies indefinitely. For these reasons, a court could decide that the statute violates the Contracts Clause because it is not an appropriate or reasonable means for achieving State A's purpose.

[NOTE: While the above analysis offers a likely outcome for Point One(b), it also notes that the opposite outcome is arguable. Thus, regardless of the conclusions, an answer should receive full credit if it states the proper test (the law is reasonable and appropriate to achieve a significant and legitimate government interest) and applies that test to the relevant facts.]

Point Two (34%)

The statute does not violate the Equal Protection Clause because it is rationally related to State A's legitimate interest in addressing the imbalance of bargaining power between automobile manufacturers and dealers.

The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides: "No state shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." U.S. Const., amend. XIV, § 1. The Supreme Court has applied three tiers of scrutiny under this Clause. See John E. Nowak and Ronald D. Rotunda, Constitutional Law § 14.3(a)(v) (8th ed. 2010). Strict scrutiny applies to laws that intentionally discriminate based on race or national origin. See id. Intermediate scrutiny applies to laws that intentionally discriminate based on sex or against non-marital children. See id. And rational basis review applies to all laws that do not receive strict or intermediate scrutiny. See id. The face of the State A statute does not discriminate on any basis that would receive strict or intermediate scrutiny, and the statute's legislative history does not reveal an intent to do so.

See Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 246–47 (1976). Consequently, rational basis review is the proper Equal Protection standard of review for the State A statute. Cf. Fitzgerald v. Racing Ass'n of Central Iowa, 539 U.S. 103, 107 (2003) (applying rational basis review to a "law [that] distinguishes for tax purposes among revenues obtained within the State of Iowa by two enterprises, each of which does business in the State.").

Rational basis review requires that the challenged law be rationally related to a legitimate government interest. See Minnesota v. Clover Leaf Creamery Co., 449 U.S. 456, 462–63 (1981). The Court has held that any government purpose other than bias or animus will satisfy this requirement. See Village of Willowbrook v. Olech, 528 U.S. 562, 564 (2000) (per curiam). The Court will accept the government's asserted purpose for the law, and it will not credit evidence of a supposed "actual purpose" harbored by members of the legislature outside the legislative record. See Clover Leaf Creamery Co., 449 U.S. at 463 n.7 ("We will not invalidate a state statute under the Equal Protection Clause merely because some legislators sought to obtain votes for the measure on the basis of its beneficial side effects on state industry."). Here, the Court would accept the state legislature's asserted purpose of addressing an inequality of bargaining power, and it would not accept evidence of the privately expressed views of members of the State A legislature concerning their anger toward automobile manufacturers. And promoting the economic success of an industry like automobile dealers is a legitimate government purpose. See Fitzgerald, 539 U.S. at 108 (legislative purpose of promoting the economic interests of racetracks was a legitimate state interest).

The Court gives great deference to the government in deciding whether a challenged law is rationally related to the government's legitimate interest. FCC v. Beach Comm'ns, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 314 (1993) ("On rational-basis review, a classification in a statute . . . comes to us bearing a strong presumption of validity"). The law "must be upheld against equal protection challenge if there is any reasonably conceivable state of facts that could provide a rational basis for the classification." Id. at 313. A court may hypothesize such a rational basis, and courts will not receive evidence that the law does not serve the government's purpose. For example, in Clover Leaf Creamery Co., the state had enacted a statute that banned the sale of milk in certain plastic containers while permitting paperboard containers, and the law recited a purpose of environmental conservation. 449 U.S. at 458–59. At trial, a manufacturer of plastic containers offered evidence that the legislature's true purpose was simple economic protectionism. The Court refused to consider this evidence and upheld the law because banning plastic containers conceivably achieved the state's asserted interest in conservation. Id. at 473; see also Beach Comm'ns, 508 U.S. at 315 ("because we never require a legislature to articulate its reasons for enacting a statute, it is entirely irrelevant for constitutional purposes whether the conceived reason for the challenged distinction actually motivated the legislature.").

Here, the classification is automobile manufacturers versus other contracting parties, and so the question is whether State A has a conceivable basis for treating these two groups differently. A court would credit the state's assertions that automobile dealership agreements involve a greater imbalance of bargaining power than other contracts and that requiring termination only for good cause will address that concern. The relative bargaining power of contracting parties is the type of empirical question entrusted to legislatures, and courts will defer to that judgment under rational basis review. See Beach Comm'ns, 508 U.S. at 314. Consequently, a court would likely find that the different treatment of automobile dealership agreements is rationally related to the government's interest in addressing imbalances in bargaining power.

[NOTE: The Court has applied a heightened form of rational basis review when a law's official administrative or legislative record contains evidence of animus or bias. For example, in one case, the legislative history of a welfare law contained language indicating bias against "hippie communes," see U.S. Dept. of Agriculture v. Moreno, 413 U.S. 528 (1973), and in another case, a city argued that it denied a permit for a group home for persons with intellectual disabilities because of the negative attitudes of neighbors. City of Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Ctr., 473 U.S. 432, 448 (1985). In both cases, official statements indicating animus led the Court to heighten its scrutiny. Here, there are no such official statements. Rather, the statements about "anger" and "getting back at them" were all made privately, outside of the legislative record. And under rational basis review, the Court has not allowed litigants to put on evidence of such statements to prove the government's "actual purpose." See Clover Leaf Creamery, 449 U.S. at 463–69.]

Point Three (33%)

The statute does not violate CarCo's substantive due process rights because it is rationally related to State A's legitimate interest in promoting the economic stability of its rural communities.

The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides: "nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." U.S. Const., Amend. XIV, § 1. The Court has long interpreted this language to protect more than the right to fair process, holding that the word "liberty" ensures that laws are also substantively fair. See Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702, 719–20 (1997). For fundamental liberties, like aspects of the right to privacy, the Court applies strict scrutiny to laws that burden the liberty interest. Id. at 720. For some specific fundamental liberty interests, such as the right of a fit parent to make decisions for a minor child, the Court applies a specific test to assess a law's constitutionality. See Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 66–67 (2000). All other liberty interests are classified as "ordinary" (and not "fundamental"), and the Court applies rational basis review to laws that burden these "ordinary" liberty interests. See Glucksberg, 521 U.S. at 728.

Here, CarCo is not asserting either a fundamental liberty interest like personal privacy or an otherwise specifically protected liberty interest like parental rights. Rather, the liberty interest to be free from the statute's "good cause" requirement is an ordinary liberty interest in freedom of contract. See Williamson v. Lee Optical of Okla., Inc., 348 U.S. 483, 488 (1955) ("The day is gone when this Court uses the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to strike down state laws, regulatory of business and industrial conditions, because they may be unwise, improvident, or out of harmony with a particular school of thought."). And so, rational basis review applies to CarCo's substantive due process challenge to the State A statute.

As with Equal Protection, substantive due process rational basis review requires only that the challenged law is rationally related to a legitimate government interest. Also, substantive due process rational basis review similarly accepts the government's asserted interest and defers to the government's judgment that the burden on an ordinary liberty interest is rationally related to the interest. Thus, for the same reasons discussed in Point Three, the statute would survive substantive due process rational basis review.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Did the store owner and SignCo form a contract on May 1?
- (2) Assuming that the store owner and SignCo formed a contract on May 1, is it enforceable against the store owner even though she did not sign a document reflecting the agreement?
- (3) Assuming that the May 1 agreement constitutes a contract that is enforceable against the store owner, is the store owner bound to accept the sign from the substitute manufacturer?

DISCUSSION

Summary

This is a transaction in goods governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). Under Article 2, a contract may be made in any manner sufficient to show agreement. Here, the discussions of May 1 clearly show such an agreement. Even though the contract is for the sale of goods for a price of $500 or more, and thus within the UCC Article 2 statute of frauds, it is enforceable against the store owner notwithstanding the lack of a writing signed by her because of the exception to the Article 2 statute of frauds relating to specially manufactured goods.

SignCo's delegation to the substitute manufacturer of its duty to supply the sign is allowed because there was no agreement with the store owner prohibiting such delegation and it does not appear that the store owner had a substantial interest in having SignCo (and not the substitute manufacturer) perform so long as the sign met the specifications of the contract. The store owner is bound to accept the sign from the substitute manufacturer.

Point One(a) (5%)

This transaction is governed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code.

Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code governs "transactions in goods." UCC § 2-102. UCC § 2-105(1) defines "goods" as "all things (including specially manufactured goods) which are movable at the time of identification to the contract for sale." Therefore, the sign constitutes goods, and the transaction is governed by UCC Article 2.

Point One(b) (15%)

The May 1 oral agreement is sufficient to form a contract for the sale of the sign.

UCC § 2-204(1) states that a contract for the sale of goods may be made "in any manner sufficient to show agreement, including conduct by both parties which recognizes the existence of such a contract." The May 1 meeting during which the store owner and the SignCo representative orally agreed that the store owner would buy the sign from SignCo is sufficient to show agreement. Therefore, UCC § 2-204(1) is satisfied and there is a contract between the store and SignCo, the original manufacturer. This is the case even if we cannot pinpoint a moment at which the contract was made. UCC § 2-204(2). Moreover, the agreed-upon transaction is clearly supported by consideration.

Point Two (40%)

Because the contract is for the sale of goods for a price of $500 or more, the Article 2 statute of frauds requires a writing signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought unless an exception applies. While there is no such signed writing, the contract is enforceable against the store owner because of the exception to the statute of frauds relating to specially manufactured goods.

Under UCC § 2-201(1), a contract for the sale of goods for the price of $500 or more is not enforceable unless the party against whom enforcement is sought has signed a writing "sufficient to indicate that a contract for sale has been made" or an exception in that section applies. Here, the store owner has not signed any writing, so the contract, which is for the sale of goods for a price in excess of $500, would not be enforceable against her unless an exception applies.

The only applicable exception to the writing requirement in this case is the exception for specially manufactured goods that appears in UCC § 2-201(3)(a). Under that exception, a contract that does not satisfy the writing requirement of subsection (1) is nonetheless enforceable "if the goods are to be specially manufactured for the buyer and are not suitable for sale to others in the ordinary course of the seller's business, and the seller, before notice of repudiation is received and under circumstances which reasonably indicate that the goods are for the buyer, has made . . . a substantial beginning of their manufacture." In this case, the store owner and SignCo agreed on the sale of a 10-foot-long sign displaying the store's unique name. This sign clearly constitutes goods specially manufactured for the store owner, and the sign would not be suitable for sale to others in the ordinary course of SignCo's business in light of the fact that it was customized and bears the unique name of the store. When SignCo substantially began shaping the glass into the store's name, that was a substantial beginning of the manufacture of goods under circumstances that reasonably indicated that the goods were for the buyer. Thus, the exception in UCC § 2-201(3)(a) is satisfied, and the contract is enforceable against the store owner.

Point Three (40%)

The store owner is bound to accept a sign conforming to the agreed-upon specifications from the substitute manufacturer even though her agreement was with SignCo.

On May 9, SignCo entered into an agreement with the substitute manufacturer pursuant to which the substitute manufacturer agreed to supply the sign to the store owner in accordance with the agreement between SignCo and the store owner. This constitutes a delegation of SignCo's duties under the contract. Such a delegation is generally allowed by Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. UCC § 2-210 provides that "[a] party may perform his duty through a delegate unless otherwise agreed or unless the other party has a substantial interest in having his original promisor perform or control the acts required by the contract."

The facts do not indicate that the store owner and SignCo agreed that SignCo's duties could not be delegated to another company, and there is no indication that the store owner had a substantial interest in having only SignCo supply the new sign without delegating its obligations under the contract. In assessing whether a buyer has a substantial interest in the identity of the performing party, the courts typically look at whether the performance is personal in the sense that the performing party possesses certain skills or reputation that the recipient is relying on. The recipient party's mere preference for the original party to perform is insufficient. See, e.g., Macke Co. v. Pizza of Gaithersburg, Inc., 270 A.2d 645 (Md. 1970). While it is clear that the store owner has a substantial interest in receiving a sign that conforms to the contractual specifications, there are no facts here suggesting that the store owner has a substantial interest in having SignCo provide such a sign. Indeed, the store owner selected SignCo for its advertised prices, not for any special artistic skill or other distinctive feature of SignCo's business. Therefore, SignCo could delegate its duties under its contract with the store owner to the substitute manufacturer, and the store owner is bound to accept the sign.

[NOTE : While the store owner's May 12th assertion that she had no intention of accepting the sign from the substitute manufacturer likely constitutes anticipatory repudiation, that is not relevant to the question asked. As this contract is governed by the UCC, it would be appropriate to refer to store owner's obligation to accept only if the goods are conforming goods as the store owner's "right to perfect tender."]

ANALYSIS 5 – FAMILY LAW

FAM (IV.C., E. & F.)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Are the facts legally sufficient to authorize the trial court to consider modification of the original custody order?
- (2) Assuming that the facts authorized modification, should the trial court modify the original custody award to grant Harvey and Wanda joint physical and legal custody of their daughter?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Generally, reconsideration or modification of a child-custody order is discouraged close in time to the original order. Here, just two months have elapsed since the trial court entered its original order. Nonetheless, modification of a child-custody order is authorized if there has been a substantial change of circumstances that affects the child's welfare. Here, there are no facts warranting that conclusion. Harvey's post-divorce, nonmarital cohabitation might, in some states, constitute a substantial change of circumstances allowing modification of custody. However, Wanda did not show that the cohabitation negatively affected the daughter's welfare, in particular the daughter's safety or her relationship with her parents. Indeed, the daughter stated that "Patrice is fine" and did not attribute her feelings of anger to Harvey's cohabitation with Patrice. Also, the daughter did not express a preference for a change in her custody.

Even assuming that the facts authorize the trial court to consider modification of its original child-custody order, the trial court should not order that Harvey and Wanda have joint physical and legal custody, as that would not be in the daughter's best interest. Harvey and Wanda have never agreed to joint physical and legal custody, are still bitter toward each other even after the divorce, and are unlikely to cooperate regarding parental decision-making and day-to-day parenting matters. Furthermore, the facts do not support a conclusion that the daughter is seriously unhappy or endangered in Harvey's home or that she prefers to live with Wanda.

Point One (55%)

The facts are legally insufficient to authorize a modification of the original custody order. Wanda failed to establish a substantial change of circumstances since the original order was entered, and the evidence did not show that Patrice's move into Harvey's home endangered or even affected the daughter's well-being. Further, Wanda petitioned for modification only two months after entry of the original custody order, which is strongly disfavored.

(a) Requirement of change of circumstances (50% total weight—cohabitation & custody)

Custody orders are modifiable, but modification is impermissible unless there has been a substantial, or material, change in circumstances since the initial order was entered. John Gregory, et al. Understanding Family Law § 11.06[A] (4th ed. 2013). Further, some states require that the change in circumstances be unforeseen or unforeseeable. For example, the Uniform Marriage and Divorce Act (UMDA), 9A U.L.A. 211 § 409(b) (1979) requires that there be "facts that have arisen since the prior decree or that were unknown to the court at the time of entry of the prior decree."

Harvey's nonmarital cohabitation (25%)

In some states, appellate courts have held that a custodial parent's post-decree nonmarital cohabitation represents a change of circumstances sufficient to warrant a modification hearing. See Word v. Remick, 58 S.W.3d 422, 427 (Ark. Ct. App. 2001); Todd v. Casciano, 569 S.E.2d 566, 570 (Ga. Ct. App. 2002); Masters v. Masters, 52 So. 3d 1279 (Miss. Ct. App. 2011). In these states, an appellate court would likely find that the trial court did not err in hearing evidence on modification. But, even in states that authorize a hearing in these circumstances, modification is typically disallowed unless the petitioner shows that the nonmarital cohabitation has an adverse impact on the child. See UMDA § 402 ("The court shall not consider conduct of a proposed custodian that does not affect his relationship to the child."); Pingree v. Cossette, 424 P.3d 371, 384 (Alaska 2018) ("courts may properly consider the sexual conduct of a parent when there is 'evidence of an adverse effect to the parent-child relationship'"); Cooper v. Coulter, 783 S.E. 350, 352–53 (Ga. Ct. App. 2016) (same); Denham v. Denham, 351 So. 3d 954, 963 (Miss. 2022). Here, Wanda presented no evidence at the hearing to show an adverse impact on the daughter due to Harvey's cohabitation with Patrice. Although the daughter indicated that she was angry because her parents divorced, there is no evidence that her feelings were attributable to Patrice's move into Harvey's home or placed her at risk of harm. In fact, to the contrary the daughter testified that Patrice was "fine."

Daughter's custody preference (25%)

A child's custody preference is relevant to a custody determination, and a change in a child's custody preference can constitute a substantial change of circumstance warranting modification of custody. See In re Marriage of Sutton, 16 N.E.3d 481 (Ind. Ct. App. 2014). Here, the daughter originally indicated that she blamed her mother for the divorce and wanted to live with her father. At the modification hearing, she testified that she missed her mother and would not mind seeing her more. The daughter's testimony does not clearly indicate any alteration of her custody preference; she did not testify that she wanted to live with Wanda or that she did not want to live with Harvey. Nor did the evidence show that her feelings of anger were attributable to living with Harvey instead of facing her parents' divorce. Again, she testified that Patrice was "fine." For these reasons, it is highly unlikely that the daughter's testimony would be sufficient to qualify as a substantial change of circumstance permitting reconsideration of custody. See, e.g., Dunlap v. Dunlap, 455 P.3d 1 (OK Civ. App. 2019) (modification of custody justified where the preference is explained by the child and good reasons for the preference are disclosed and there is a permanent, material, and substantial change in circumstances); Butland v. Butland, 1996 WL

362038 (Ohio Ct. App. June 27, 1996) (whether child's views qualify as a substantial change of circumstance depends upon the "depth, sincerity, and the extent they reflect changed circumstances within the parent-child relationship or relationship between the parties").

[NOTE: The daughter's preference is an important factor a court should consider either in the change of circumstances analysis and/or in the decision whether to change custody.]

(b) Impact of timing of request for modification (5%)

Most states also disfavor modification when sought shortly after a custody decree has been entered; the principle of res judicata and the belief that children's interests are served by stable custody arrangements both contribute to this view. See, e.g., Graner v. Graner, 738 N.W.2d 9, 17 (N.D. 2007) ("The purpose of the two-year period limiting modification is to provide a moratorium and spare children the painful, disruptive, and destabilizing effects of repeat custody litigation.") Thus, if a modification petition is filed within two years of the original decree, UMDA § 409(a) authorizes a modification hearing only if the evidence suggests "there is reason to believe that the child's present environment may endanger seriously his physical, mental, moral or emotional health." In states that do not have statutory standards restricting early modification, case law typically disfavors it unless the evidence shows that the child is at risk. Gregory et al., supra.

Here, Wanda filed her petition just two months after entry of the original order and, as earlier discussed, the evidence did not show any risk of harm to the daughter since the original custody order. Thus, because the modification was filed so soon, most courts would find that the trial court had no authority to modify the original order.

Point Two (45%)

Assuming that the court has authority to modify its custody order, because the parents do not agree to joint physical and legal custody and have a high-conflict relationship, the trial court should not order that Harvey and Wanda have joint physical and legal custody as that order would not be in the daughter's best interest.

Even if there is a substantial, or material, change in circumstances allowing the possibility of modification of an original custody order, a court should not modify a custody order unless the change serves the child's best interest. See UMDA § 409(b). "Joint custody is not appropriate and not in the best interest of the children when parents are unable to make shared decisions concerning the welfare of their children. The parents' ability and willingness to communicate and cooperate is crucial in considering whether joint legal custody is proper." White v. White, 616 S.W.3d 373, 380 (Mo. Ct. App. 2020) (internal citations omitted). See also Matter of Nicole J. v. Joshua J., 206 A.D.3d 1186, 170 N.Y.S.3d 273 (3d Dep't 2022); In re Paternity of E.P., 194 N.E.3d 160 (Ind. Ct. App. 2022); Elk v. McBride, 344 P.3d 818, 823 (Alaska 2015).

Most courts will not impose joint custody on unwilling parents because it is generally understood that requiring hostile parents to share custody can be harmful to children. Even in states that do permit the imposition of joint custody over a parental objection, a court may not order joint custody unless it finds that this arrangement is in the child's best interest. In making this assessment, the court should consider the extent of parental conflict and the likelihood of achieving both cooperation between the parents and a stable living situation for the child. See Annotation, Propriety of Awarding Joint Custody of Children, 17 A.L.R. 4th 1013 (1982 & Supp.).

Here, Harvey and Wanda's divorce and custody litigation was acrimonious, and since the marriage ended, they have continued to be hostile to each other. Their high-conflict relationship remains likely to be harmful to their daughter. Further, neither parent requested modification to joint physical and legal custody, indicating that they are unlikely to be willing to make decisions collectively. These facts weigh against a trial court modifying the initial order to provide for joint physical and legal custody.

Additionally, a joint custody order might adversely affect the teenage daughter's living situation as it would be disruptive to her life, likely causing her to lack consistency in her upbringing, her schooling, and her friendships. Here, these negatives would not be counterbalanced because the evidence is that the daughter and Patrice are "fine"; the daughter has not indicated any reluctance to living in the home with Patrice and has not expressed a firm preference to live with her mother instead of her father. Although the daughter testified that she misses her mother, her needs in this respect will be met because pursuant to the original order, Wanda will continue to have liberal, unsupervised visitation with her daughter.

CIV (III.E.; V.B.)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Was the man required to include information about his insurance coverage and the identity of the other witnesses to the accident in his initial disclosures?
- (2) Is information about a defendant's eyesight within the scope of discovery in a case in which the defendant is alleged to have been driving negligently at the time of a traffic accident?
- (3) How should the court rule on the woman's motion for judgment as a matter of law?

DISCUSSION

Summary

As part of his mandatory initial disclosures, the man was required to make the insurance policy on his car available for inspection and copying. He was not required to disclose information about persons with information about the case if he did not intend to use that information to support his claims.

The trial court erred in denying the woman's motion to compel the man to answer deposition questions about his eyesight. The man's relevance objection was ill-founded because questions about his eyesight were within the scope of discovery as evidence relevant to the woman's negligence claim. Moreover, the man's attorney had no basis to instruct the man not to answer questions about his eyesight or to terminate the deposition because deposition testimony is to proceed subject to any objections.

The woman's motion for judgment as a matter of law should be denied. Judgment as a matter of law is proper only when no reasonable jury could find for the nonmovant on an issue. Judgment as a matter of law is not proper simply because, as here, the evidence arguably weighs in favor of the movant. Moreover, district court judges are generally encouraged to submit a case to the jury rather than grant judgment as a matter of law.

Point One (25%)

In his initial mandatory disclosures, the man was not required to disclose information about witnesses whose testimony the man would not use to support his case. The man was required to allow inspection and copying of the insurance policy.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26 requires parties to disclose certain information "without awaiting a discovery request." Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(1)(A). These initial disclosures must include the names and, if known, the contact information of individuals "likely to have discoverable information" as well as the subject of that information. Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(1)(A)(i). This obligation applies, however, only to individuals whose information the disclosing party "may use to support its claims or defenses." Id. Thus, there is no obligation to disclose the identity of, or contact details for, individuals who have relevant information if the party does not intend to use that information in support of its case.

In this case, the information that the bystander and the man's friends had was unfavorable to the man. As a result, the man would not (and did not) use their information in support of his case. The only information the man was likely to use (and did use) in support of his case was the information provided by his brother. Consequently, the man was required to disclose his brother's name and contact information, and the subject of the information the man's brother could provide. He was not required to disclose information about the other witnesses.

Rule 26 also requires a party to provide "for inspection and copying" any insurance policy under which an insurer may be responsible to satisfy (or reimburse payments made to satisfy) a judgment in a case. Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(1)(A)(iv). The man's insurance policy qualified for disclosure under this rule because the insurer could be required to pay for the woman's personal injuries and property damage from the accident. As a result, the man was required to provide the insurance policy to the woman, which he did not do.

Point Two (25%)

Information about the man's eyesight was within the scope of discovery because it was relevant to the woman's negligence claim. Further, even if the objection at the deposition was proper, the man violated the federal rules by refusing to answer and terminating the deposition because the federal rules provide that a deposition should proceed with the testimony taken subject to any objections. Thus, the court erred in denying the woman's motion to compel.

The man's relevance objection—whether made in response to deposition questions or a request for production—was ill-founded. The general scope of discovery extends to any "matter that is relevant to any party's claim or defense." Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(1). The woman claimed that the man had been negligent, and there was evidence indicating that the man had been looking at his phone for directions at the time of the accident. If the man's eyesight was poor, looking at his phone for directions could have required more effort and been even more irresponsible while driving. Thus, the man's eyesight was relevant to the woman's claim that he had been negligent in operating the car.

Even if the objection at the deposition was proper, the man violated the federal rules by refusing to answer and terminating the deposition because the federal rules provide that a deposition should proceed with the testimony taken subject to any objections. An objection to deposition testimony "must be noted on the record, but the examination still proceeds; the testimony is taken subject to any objection." Fed. R. Civ. P. 30(c)(2). An instruction "not to answer" is proper "only when necessary to preserve a privilege, to enforce a limitation ordered by the court, or to present a motion [to terminate or limit the deposition]." Id.

Here, the man's counsel could make a relevance objection to the question asked, but the man nonetheless should have answered the questions about his eyesight. Counsel did not assert that the information sought was protected by any privilege. Nor is there any indication that the question violated a limitation imposed by court order or that counsel intended to seek a court order to terminate or limit the scope of the deposition. Under these circumstances, instructing the deponent not to answer was improper, and the man should have answered the question posed.

Accordingly, the trial court should not have denied the woman's motion to compel.

[NOTE #1: Under the federal rules, it is not a defense to a violation of the discovery rules that a party relied on the advice of counsel in taking the action subject to a motion to compel. While a court may consider a party's reliance on counsel in deciding what sanctions (if any) to impose for the violation, the question asks only whether the trial court ruled correctly on the woman's motion to compel. See Charles A. Wright, Arthur R. Miller & Richard L. Marcus, 8B Federal Practice and Procedure § 2284 at 474-75 ("Courts have also shown increasing interest in imposing a sanction against the attorney where the fault is counsel's rather than imposing the ultimate sanction against his or her client.")]

[NOTE #2: A deponent may be instructed not to answer "when necessary to preserve a privilege." Fed. R. Civ. P. 30(c)(2). Here, information about the man's eyesight was not privileged. The doctor-patient privilege might protect the man's doctor from testifying about confidential information provided within that relationship, but the privilege would not protect the man from sharing his own knowledge or standard medical records about his eyesight.

A deponent may also be instructed not to answer in order to "enforce a limitation ordered by the court, or to present a motion" to terminate or otherwise limit the deposition. Fed. R. Civ. P. 30(c)(2). There is no evidence that the court had imposed any limitations on the deposition. Moreover, the man's attorney did not instruct the man not to answer in order to pursue a motion to terminate the deposition. The man's attorney never pursued such a motion. Nor would such a motion have been appropriate if the man had pursued it. Such a motion is only appropriate when the deposition "is being conducted in bad faith or in a manner that unreasonably annoys, embarrasses, or oppresses the deponent or party." Fed. R. Civ. P. 30(d)(3)(A). The man's attorney claimed simply that the questions concerning the man's eyesight were irrelevant. The woman's attorney persisted with the questions but did so properly as objections should be noted and the questions answered. As a result, neither instructing the man not to answer nor terminating the deposition was warranted.]

Point Three (50%)

The woman's motion for judgment as a matter of law should be denied because a reasonable jury could find for the man. Moreover, appellate courts encourage trial courts to submit a case to the jury rather than grant judgment as a matter of law (JMOL) before jury deliberation.

A motion for judgment as a matter of law in a matter tried before a jury may be granted when two conditions are met: the party against whom the judgment is sought "has been fully heard on an issue" and "the court finds that a reasonable jury would not have a legally sufficient evidentiary basis to find for the party on that issue." Fed. R. Civ. P. 50(a)(1). Here, the woman properly moved for judgment as a matter of law after the man presented his case, asserting that no reasonable jury could find for the man on the issue of the man's negligence.

The evidence weighs in the woman's favor. Both the man's friends and the bystander testified that the man had been looking at his phone at the time of the accident. The only witness to the contrary was the man's brother, whom the jury could conclude was biased toward the man.

Nonetheless, judgment as a matter of law is not appropriate. Given the conflict in the testimony, a reasonable jury could credit the brother's testimony and conclude that the man was not negligently looking at his phone at the time of the accident. Indeed, because the brother was seated in the passenger seat, he arguably was in a better position to observe what the man was doing than were the man's friends, who were in the backseat, or the bystander, who would have had to observe the man's action from outside the car while the car was moving. Because a reasonable jury could find for the man on the evidence presented, the woman's motion for judgment as a matter of law should be denied.

Moreover, district courts are encouraged to refrain from granting motions for judgment as a matter of law prior to jury deliberation. See Unitherm Food Sys., Inc. v. Swift-Eckrich, Inc., 546 U.S. 394, 405 (2006) ("the district courts are, if anything, encouraged to submit the case to the jury, rather than granting such motions."); Wright & Miller, 9B Federal Practice and Procedure § 2533 at 517 ("appellate courts repeatedly have said that it usually is desirable to take a verdict, and then pass on the sufficiency of the evidence on a post-verdict motion."). Consequently, they are more likely to grant a renewed motion for judgment as a matter of law after the jury has returned its verdict. If the evidence is so one-sided, the jury is likely to rule consistent with the evidence, rendering judgment as a matter of law unnecessary. And if judgment as a matter of law is reversed on appeal because it was improperly granted before submission to the jury, there would be no verdict on which to base a judgment, and a new trial would be necessary. Thus, based on both the law governing judgment as a matter of law and prudential principles, the district court should deny the woman's motion for judgment as a matter of law.

QUESTION 1 – AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP

Bill and Nancy recently opened a gym, "Comet Fitness," that they operate as a general partnership. Three blocks from the gym is a sporting-goods store that is having a "going-out-of-business sale" with signs in the store's windows stating that "all sales are final." Bill and Nancy are acquainted with the store owner. Last week, Bill called the store owner and said, "I hope you've got some nice treadmills; the gym could use one or more. I'll try to get over there to check them out."

The next day, Bill and Nancy ran into Kim, one of Nancy's friends, at a party. Kim is a personal trainer. Nancy had not seen Kim for several months. Nancy told Kim that she and Bill had opened a gym and that Kim should consider coming to work for them as a personal trainer. Kim said that she would think about it and let Nancy know. While Kim was walking away, she heard Bill say to Nancy, "You know, the gym has only five treadmills, but I sure wish it had two more," and heard Nancy reply, "I agree. We desperately need to buy one or two more."

The day after the party, Kim, thinking that she might be interested in the trainer job and hoping to impress Bill and Nancy with her initiative, went to the sporting-goods store. Telling the store owner that she was acting on behalf of Comet Fitness, Kim purchased a treadmill and directed the store owner to send the treadmill to Comet Fitness, along with the invoice for the purchase. The store owner agreed to do so.

Later that day, Nancy went to the sporting-goods store and purchased two treadmills for the gym. Unlike the treadmill Kim had purchased, these treadmills had built-in video touchscreens and were similar to the ones that Nancy had previously purchased for Comet Fitness. Nancy told the store owner to have the treadmills delivered to Comet Fitness along with an invoice for the purchase. When Nancy returned to the gym, she told Bill that she had bought two treadmills for the business. Bill became furious and said, "You had no right to do that without first consulting me. You should have made sure that I was with you when you bought them to make sure I'd like what you were buying. I'll return them tomorrow after they arrive unless I like what I see."

The following day, three treadmills arrived at the gym. When Bill and Nancy saw the treadmill purchased by Kim, they told the delivery person, "Take that one back. There must be a mistake—we never bought this." When Bill saw the two treadmills Nancy had bought, he told the delivery person, "Take them back, too; they're nice but not the same color as our other treadmills, and they just won't fit in." Nancy objected and told the delivery person to leave the two treadmills.

The delivery person immediately called the store owner, who said, "Leave them all at the gym. All sales are final. Tell them to pay me what they owe me."

1. Was Kim an agent of Comet Fitness when she purchased the treadmill? Explain.
2. Assuming that Kim was an agent of Comet Fitness,
 - a. did she have actual authority to purchase the treadmill for Comet Fitness? Explain.
 - b. did she have apparent authority to purchase the treadmill for Comet Fitness? Explain.
3. Did Nancy have the authority to bind Comet Fitness to the contract to purchase the two treadmills with the video touchscreens? Explain.

QUESTION 2 – CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

Town is a small municipality. Main Street is an eight-block public road that runs through the center of Town with retail shops, restaurants, and other businesses located on each side. The roadway has two lanes of traffic in each direction, separated by a 10-foot-wide median strip on each block. Each median strip is covered with grass and trees, except for paved 10-foot segments on each end. The paved portions of the median strip are part of the crosswalk and are marked for use by pedestrians as they cross the intersections on Main Street.

A Town ordinance prohibits any person other than authorized Town personnel from entering the unpaved portions of the median strip.

The Town council received numerous complaints from Town residents about people who stood in the paved portions of the median strips at intersections on Main Street to solicit money from the drivers of vehicles that stopped at traffic signals. The residents complained that the solicitations were annoying and unwelcome. Law enforcement had no official reports that solicitations from the pedestrian median strips had been aggressive, threatening, or distracting to drivers. Nor were there records of any traffic accidents caused by solicitations made from pedestrian median strips.

In response to the complaints, the Town council enacted the following ordinance:

- (1) No person on a pedestrian median strip on Main Street shall communicate or attempt to communicate with the occupants of vehicles passing by or stopped near the pedestrian median strip.
- (2) A "pedestrian median strip" is the paved portion of the median strip, which is the portion intended for use by pedestrians to cross from one side of the street to the other.
- (3) A violation of this ordinance is a misdemeanor.

The preamble to the ordinance explains that the law was enacted to promote traffic safety by prohibiting those within pedestrian median strips from actively engaging with drivers in a distracting manner. Existing Town ordinances permit posting approved signs on trees and utility poles in median strips, including pedestrian median strips, as well as the posting and carrying of signs on sidewalks adjacent to public roadways. It is also lawful to solicit money from passing vehicles while standing on a sidewalk along Main Street.

Town has charged a man with violating the ordinance by holding a sign stating his opposition to a candidate for Town council while standing in a pedestrian median strip on Main Street in Town.

1. What type of First Amendment forum is the pedestrian median strip? Explain.
2. Is the Town ordinance a content-based or content-neutral regulation of speech? Explain.
3. Assuming that the Town ordinance is content-based, would applying it to the man violate his First Amendment rights? Explain.
4. Assuming that the Town ordinance is content-neutral, would applying it to the man violate his First Amendment rights? Explain.

QUESTION 3 – TORTS

Brenda, a trauma surgeon, was on her way to perform emergency surgery at the hospital. As she drove through her neighborhood, a school bus stopped ahead of her, flashed its red lights, and extended its side-mounted stop sign. The law prohibits passing a stopped school bus under these circumstances. Brenda slowed, considering whether she should pass the bus because of the medical emergency.

Alan was driving a dump truck behind Brenda's car and also saw the bus's extended stop sign. Impatient, he swerved around Brenda's car and the bus. As he did so, his truck's bumper scraped a gash into Brenda's driver's-side doors.

Alan drove out of the neighborhood and onto the four-lane divided highway. Brenda did so also, intent on reaching the hospital quickly. She changed to the left lane and sped past Alan. This angered Alan. He saw Brenda's personalized license plate, "MED DOC." He muttered, "A self-important physician, probably headed to bandage a scraped knee." Alan accelerated and dangerously tailed Brenda's car as both vehicles traveled at 15 miles per hour (mph) above the speed limit. As Alan repeatedly honked his horn, Brenda feared that Alan's truck would hit her car.

Brenda signaled to change from the left lane to the right lane so that she could exit the highway, but Alan positioned his truck beside Brenda's car, matching her speed. Brenda slowed to allow Alan to pull ahead, but Alan slowed also, lowered his window, and yelled, "Oops! Don't miss the exit to the clinic!" Because Alan blocked Brenda from changing into the right lane, she missed the exit for the hospital.

Brenda accelerated more and pulled ahead of Alan into the right lane. She continued 10 miles further at nearly 90 mph, with Alan still close behind. She left the highway at the next available exit intending to double back toward the hospital, but she saw that Alan had followed her off the highway. Brenda pulled into a gas station lot, ran into the restroom, and locked the door. Alan pounded on the restroom door, shouting, "Come out so you and me can have a talk, if you know what I mean!" Brenda shouted back, "I'm not coming out until you leave." Alan yelled back, "I've got all day, so get comfortable." After two minutes, Alan got into his truck and left.

Brenda waited in fear inside the restroom for 20 minutes, after which she peeked out and saw that Alan was gone. She drove to the hospital, using only back roads to make sure that the truck was not following, adding more time to her drive. She finally arrived at the hospital one hour later than she would have arrived if Alan had not prevented her from exiting the highway. The patient had died moments before she arrived. If Brenda had arrived 15 minutes sooner, she would have arrived in time to perform the surgery and the patient likely would have survived.

Brenda sued Alan, asserting two common-law claims. Alan has admitted to all the facts described above. In Brenda's lawsuit, she alleged that Alan "damaged her car as he violated the school-bus law" and that he then "detained her in a public restroom against her will." The patient's family sued Alan for "negligence causing wrongful death."

The jurisdiction expressly allows common-law negligence actions despite the death of the injured party. The jurisdiction's rules mirror the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

1. In a negligence action against Alan, can Brenda establish that Alan breached his duty of care based solely on his violation of the school-bus law? Explain.
2. Can Brenda establish Alan's liability based on Alan's allegedly detaining her against her will? Explain.
3. Is Alan's admission sufficient for the patient's family to prevail in a motion for partial summary judgment establishing that Alan is liable on the family's wrongful-death claim? Explain.

QUESTION 4 – CIVIL PROCEDURE

Coach is a high school basketball coach who currently lives and works in State A, where she is domiciled. One year ago, Coach visited Hometown, in State H, for her high school reunion. During the reunion, she got into an argument with Fran over which of them was the better athlete in high school. Fran lives in State H, where she is domiciled.

A week after the reunion, when Coach had returned to State A, she learned that Fran was spreading rumors about her. In particular, Fran was telling people that Coach had used illegal drugs with students during her visit to State H.

A newspaper in State A learned of the allegations about Coach and published them, along with quotations from Fran, who had repeated her allegations to a news reporter who had visited Fran in State H. The newspaper story led to a public outcry against Coach, and she was fired. She was unable to find another job for many months.

Coach sued Fran in a state court in State A, alleging that Fran had defamed her under state law. Coach's complaint sought damages in the amount of $74,999. In a sworn affidavit attached to the complaint, Coach asserted that she had lost $130,000 in wages due to Fran's defamatory statements, but she stipulated that she would not seek or accept damages in excess of the amount sought in her complaint. That stipulation is binding under State A law.

A process server handed Fran a summons and a copy of the complaint when Fran was attending a basketball game in State A. That was the first time Fran had ever been in State A, and she was there for less than a day. She had no other connection with State A. Statutory law in State A authorizes its courts to exercise personal jurisdiction over persons who are served with process while physically present in the state, without regard to whether they have any other connection with the state.

Ten days later, before filing any answer or responsive motion, Fran filed a notice of removal and the case was removed from state court to the federal district court for the District of State A. The notice of removal asserted that the amount in controversy was $130,000, the alleged amount of Coach's lost wages.

Coach has moved the federal district court to remand the case to the state court in State A, arguing that the federal court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction over the case.

Fran has moved the federal court to dismiss the case for lack of personal jurisdiction over her and for improper venue.

1. Should the federal court remand the case to the state court in State A on the ground that the federal court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction? Explain.
2. Assuming that the case is not remanded for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, should the federal court dismiss the case for lack of personal jurisdiction over Fran? Explain.
3. Assuming that the case is not remanded and is not dismissed for lack of personal jurisdiction, should the federal court dismiss the case for improper venue? Explain.

QUESTION 5 – EVIDENCE

Based on the following facts, David has been charged with knowingly obtaining money under the control of a financial institution (Bank) by means of false or fraudulent representations.

David entered Bank on April 18, 2024. After stopping at the counter where pens and banking slips were located, David presented to the teller a check that appeared to be drawn by Customer on her account at Bank and payable to the order of "David" in the amount of $1,000. Before cashing the check, the teller asked David to produce photo identification (ID), which David did. The teller examined the ID, confirming that it was David's and bore his picture. The teller then returned the ID and gave $1,000 to David, who left Bank.

Customer received a notification on her banking app, alerting her that a $1,000 check had just been charged to her account. Customer promptly called Bank to complain. She was transferred to a fraud investigator and immediately exclaimed, "I didn't write that $1,000 check that you just charged to my account!" Customer was noticeably frustrated and angry.

The investigator began an investigation. First, he compared the signature on the check with Customer's signature in Bank's records and concluded that Customer's signature had been forged on the check. He then reviewed the original video recording of the lobby, counters, and tellers, taken by Bank's security cameras on April 18, 2024. Based on that review, the investigator determined that an individual, later identified as David, had presented a $1,000 check purportedly drawn on Customer's account and that the teller had cashed it. The investigator wrote a report detailing Customer's complaint, describing the video recording, and attaching copies of the check at issue and a copy of Customer's signature from Bank's records.

In a statement to law enforcement, David denied visiting Bank that day. He has pleaded not guilty. The case is now scheduled for trial in federal court. Neither Customer nor the teller is available to testify. However, Bank's investigator, who is a 10-year employee of Bank and works in an office next to Bank's lobby, is available and will testify.

Evaluate the admissibility of the following evidence if it is offered during the testimony of Bank's investigator in the government's case-in-chief. (Do not discuss constitutional issues.)

1. Bank's original video recording of its lobby, counters, and tellers from April 18, 2024, which shows David stopping at the counter in the lobby and interacting with the teller. Explain.
2. The investigator's testimony as to Customer's oral complaint to the investigator. Explain.
3. The investigator's written report, if the investigator testifies that he is unable to recall both the details of the investigation and writing the report. (Assume that the report is relevant and not admissible as a business record.) Explain.

QUESTION 6 – TRUSTS AND DECEDENTS' ESTATES

Six years ago, Alice properly created a trust naming a local bank as the sole trustee and naming herself as the sole beneficiary of the trust income. The trust provided that upon Alice's death, the trust principal would be distributed to her niece, Shirley. Alice and Shirley had a very close relationship, although they lived far apart. The trust also directed the trustee to invest trust assets only in "prudent investments." The trust was silent as to whether it was revocable or irrevocable.

When Alice created the trust, she also properly executed a durable health-care power of attorney naming John, her friend and next-door neighbor, as her agent to make health-care decisions for her. This power was expressly conditioned upon Alice's being unable to make health-care decisions for herself.

Four weeks ago, before she left for a vacation in Europe, Alice had separate telephone conversations first with Shirley and then with John. In both conversations, Alice mused about her wishes if "something should ever happen to me." Alice said to Shirley, "If something should happen to me, I don't want to be connected to a life-support system." In her later conversation with John, Alice told him, "In no event do I ever want to be connected to a life-support system if there is little or no hope of my recovery."

Three weeks ago, Shirley found out that the trustee had imprudently invested 30% of the trust's assets in the stock of a company that later went bankrupt, resulting in a significant loss to the trust. Furious, Shirley immediately contacted the bank officer overseeing the trust. After hearing Shirley's complaints, the trust officer responded truthfully that Alice had approved the investment knowing that it was imprudent. He also accurately told Shirley that Alice was fully competent when she approved the investment. The trust officer then told Shirley, "I guess you win some and you lose some."

The next day, Shirley called Alice, who was still vacationing in Europe, to express her anger about the investment. Alice responded, "We can talk about this when I get home in two weeks."

The day after Alice returned home, she had a stroke and was rushed to the hospital. Three hours later, Alice was connected to a life-support system. Her doctor determined that the stroke had left her unable to make her own health-care decisions. The doctor contacted John and Shirley and told them, "It is unclear whether she will survive or, if she survives, what kind of life she will have. We should know much more in a week or so." Shirley believed that the life-support system should be removed immediately and told the doctor to do so at once. John disagreed and told the doctor to keep Alice on the life-support system.

Ten years ago, the jurisdiction adopted the Uniform Trust Code and a health-care power of attorney act.

1. Is the trust revocable or irrevocable? Explain.
2. (a) Does Shirley have an interest in the trust? Explain.

 (b) Assuming that Shirley has an interest in the trust, how is this interest characterized? Explain.
3. Assuming that Shirley has an interest in the trust, does she have a claim against the bank for making the imprudent investment? Explain.
4. Between Shirley and John, who has the legal authority to direct the doctor whether to remove Alice from the life-support system? Explain.

ANALYSIS 1 – AGENCY AND PARTNERSHIP

AGC (I.; II.; VI.)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. While it is illustrative of the discussions that might have appeared in excellent answers to the question, it is more detailed than examinee responses are expected to be and should not be construed as a model answer. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Was Kim an agent of Comet Fitness when she purchased the treadmill?
- (2) Assuming that Kim was an agent of Comet Fitness,
 - (a) did she have actual authority to purchase the treadmill for Comet Fitness?
 - (b) did she have apparent authority to purchase the treadmill for Comet Fitness?
- (3) Did Nancy have the authority to bind Comet Fitness to the contract to purchase the two treadmills with the built-in video touchscreens?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Kim was not an agent of Comet Fitness because neither Bill nor Nancy manifested an intent to create an agency relationship with Kim. Moreover, Kim did not assent to serving as Comet Fitness's agent, as she said that she wanted to think about whether she would become a personal trainer at the gym.

Even if Kim were an agent (i.e., a personal trainer working for Comet Fitness), she lacked both actual and apparent authority to purchase a treadmill on Comet Fitness's behalf. With respect to actual authority, neither Bill nor Nancy manifested to Kim that she had any authority to act on behalf of Comet Fitness and such authority was not implied from a position as a fitness trainer. With respect to apparent authority, neither Bill nor Nancy ever manifested to the owner of the sporting-goods store that Kim was acting on behalf of Comet Fitness.

Nancy, however, as a general partner of Comet Fitness, had authority to bind Comet Fitness to the contract to purchase the two treadmills. This is because the purchase was apparently for carrying out the usual business of the partnership—operating a gym.

Point One (30%)

Kim was not an agent of Comet Fitness because neither Bill nor Nancy manifested an intent for Kim to act as an agent for Comet Fitness, and Kim did not manifest assent to so serve.

"Agency is the fiduciary relationship that arises when one person (a 'principal') manifests assent to another person (an 'agent') that the agent shall act on the principal's behalf and subject to the principal's control, and the agent manifests assent or otherwise consents so to act." Restatement (Third) of Agency § 1.01. Assent is manifested through "written or spoken words or other conduct." Id. § 1.03. Here, there is no writing to establish the creation of an agency relationship between Comet Fitness and Kim. Thus, agency could arise only by spoken words or conduct.

The only manifestation that could arguably have created an agency relationship was Nancy's statement to Kim that she should consider working for Comet Fitness as a personal trainer. But Kim replied only that she would think about it. That was not adequate to amount to a manifested assent by Kim to work as a personal trainer for Comet Fitness.

While Kim was present when Bill told Nancy, "You know, the gym has only five treadmills, but I sure wish it had two more," and Nancy expressly agreed with Bill, Kim could not reasonably believe that she was empowered to act on behalf of Comet Fitness to buy a treadmill. These statements did not manifest assent by Kim to act on behalf of Comet Fitness or by Bill or Nancy to have her do so.

In other words, neither element necessary for the creation of an agency relationship is present. No manifestation by spoken words was made by a prospective principal to a prospective agent, and no one made any statement indicating that a prospective agent agreed to act as an agent. Nor does there appear to have been any other conduct that would be construed as sufficient to create an agency relationship.

[NOTE: Sections 1 and 15 of Restatement (Second) of Agency are consistent with the foregoing analysis. This point focuses on whether an agency relationship was created, not whether there was actual or apparent authority.]

Point Two(a) (10%)

Kim lacked actual authority to purchase a treadmill for Comet Fitness.

Assuming that Kim was an agent of Comet Fitness, this does not mean that she had authority (actual or apparent) to purchase the treadmill for Comet Fitness from the sporting-goods store. "An agent acts with actual authority when, at the time of taking action that has legal consequences for the principal, the agent reasonably believes, in accordance with the principal's manifestations to the agent, that the principal wishes the agent so to act." Restatement (Third) of Agency § 2.01. Section 3.01 of the Third Restatement expands on this rule by providing that "[a]ctual authority, as defined in § 2.01, is created by a principal's manifestations to an agent that, as reasonably understood by the agent, expresses the principal's assent that the agent take action on the principal's behalf." Section 2.02(1) further provides that "an agent has actual authority to take action designated or implied in the principal's manifestation to the agent and acts necessary or incidental to achieving the principal's objectives"

On these facts, it is clear that there was no manifestation from the partnership to Kim that would lead Kim to reasonably believe that it wished her to act on its behalf to purchase a treadmill. Even if we assume Kim was a personal trainer (since the question asks us to assume Kim was an agent, and the role that was contemplated was her being a personal trainer), she was not expressly authorized to buy a treadmill. Moreover, it was not implied from her title of or her being, a personal trainer that Nancy (or Bill) manifested an intent to grant Kim actual authority to purchase the treadmill.

At most, Kim overheard a conversation between Bill and Nancy expressing Bill's wish that the gym had two more treadmills. But no one mentioned that anyone, including Nancy, would purchase treadmills. Thus, Kim had no actual authority to purchase the treadmill from the sporting-goods store for Comet Fitness.

Point Two(b) (25%)

Kim lacked apparent authority to purchase a treadmill for Comet Fitness.

Assuming that Kim was an agent of Comet Fitness, she did not have any apparent authority to purchase the treadmill. "Apparent authority...is created by a person's manifestation that another has authority to act with legal consequences for the person who makes the manifestation, when a third party reasonably believes the actor to be authorized and the belief is traceable to the manifestation." Restatement (Third) of Agency § 3.03. There was no communication to the owner of the sporting-goods store from anyone on behalf of Comet Fitness except Bill's statement to the owner: "I hope you've got some nice treadmills; the gym could use one or more. I'll try to get over there to check them out." Although this statement suggested that Bill wanted more treadmills for the gym, it was not a sufficient basis for the store owner to reasonably believe that the gym intended to purchase treadmills or do anything more than investigate the store's inventory. Furthermore, the statement in no way communicated that Kim could make such a purchase on behalf of Comet Fitness. Thus, there is no basis to conclude that Kim had apparent authority to purchase a treadmill from the sporting-goods store on Comet Fitness's behalf, even assuming that Kim was an agent of Comet Fitness.

[NOTE: Restatement (Second) of Agency §§ 26 & 27 are consistent with the foregoing analysis. While an agent can create the appearance of that agent's own authority through manifestations of the agent that were authorized by the principal, here, there were no such authorized manifestations.]

Point Three (35%)

Comet Fitness is bound on the contract to purchase the two treadmills with the built-in video touchscreens because Nancy, as a general partner, was empowered to purchase them for the partnership.

Unlike Kim, Nancy is a general partner of Comet Fitness. Because she is a general partner, she is also an agent of the partnership. Revised Unif. Partnership Act § 301(1) (1997, as amended 2013). A partner's act in "apparently carrying on in the ordinary course the partnership business" binds the partnership "unless the partner did not have authority to act for the partnership in the particular matter and the person with which the partner was dealing knew or had notice that the partner lacked authority." Id. Accord, Unif. Partnership Act § 9 (1914).

Here Nancy had actual authority to purchase the treadmills from the sporting-goods store for the benefit of Comet Fitness. First, Comet Fitness was a gym that used treadmills. Second, as evident from the conversation between Bill and Nancy, Comet Fitness needed additional treadmills. Third, the two treadmills were similar to the treadmills that Nancy had previously purchased for the gym. So Nancy's purchase of two treadmills was for "apparently carrying out the business of the partnership" in the ordinary course.

[NOTE: No credit should be given for a discussion of why Nancy is a general partner, as the facts expressly state that she is one.]

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) What type of First Amendment public forum is a pedestrian median strip?
- (2) Is the Town ordinance a content-based or content-neutral regulation of speech?
- (3) Assuming that the Town ordinance is content-based, would applying it to the man violate his First Amendment rights?
- (4) Assuming that the Town ordinance is content-neutral, would applying it to the man violate his First Amendment rights?

DISCUSSION

Summary

First, since the challenged ordinance is being applied to speech on government property, the threshold issue is to determine what type of public forum is involved. Here, a pedestrian median strip would be considered a traditional public forum because it is part of the public streets and sidewalks that have traditionally been open to expression.

Second, the applicable constitutional test for regulations of speech in a traditional public forum depends on whether the regulation is content-based or content-neutral. A content-based regulation receives strict scrutiny, while a content-neutral regulation receives intermediate scrutiny under the time, place, and manner test. There is a credible argument for each characterization of the ordinance. On the one hand, the ordinance could be deemed content-neutral because the face of the ordinance does not address the content of any speech that might occur on a median strip. On the other hand, the ordinance could be treated as content-based because the Town council arguably enacted it because of its disagreement with unpopular speech—unwanted solicitation of motorists.

Third, if content-based, the ordinance would likely be unconstitutional under strict scrutiny. While Town may have a compelling interest in promoting traffic safety, the ordinance is not likely to be narrowly tailored to this purpose because it is both under- and over-inclusive. It is under-inclusive because it allows people standing on a sidewalk to interact with motorists, and it is over-inclusive because it applies to speech that does not threaten the government's interest (e.g., a person passively holding a sign in a pedestrian median strip).

Fourth, a content-neutral regulation is reviewed under the intermediate scrutiny test: the regulation "must be narrowly tailored to serve the government's legitimate, content-neutral interests but . . . need not be the least restrictive or least intrusive means of doing so." Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 798–99 (1989). The regulation must also leave open ample alternative channels of communication. Here, the Town's traffic and public safety concerns are substantial, content-neutral government interests. The ordinance, however, may not be narrowly tailored because it arguably restricts a substantial amount of speech that does not threaten the government's stated interests (e.g., a person holding a sign in a pedestrian median strip), and the government does not have evidence that the ordinance would be less effective if it were more narrowly tailored.

Point One (20%)

The paved portions of Town's median strips are traditional public forums because they are part of the public streets and sidewalks that have historically been open to free expression.

The speech burdened by the Town ordinance occurs on government property, and so the appropriate constitutional test is determined by the type of government property involved. For purposes of First Amendment free speech analysis, the Supreme Court has recognized three types of government property, or "public forums." First, a traditional public forum is "government property that has traditionally been available for public expression." International Soc. for Krishna Consciousness, Inc. v. Lee, 505 U.S. 672, 678 (1992). This category includes public parks, sidewalks, and streets that have historically been open to public speech and debate. See id. Second, all other government property is classified as a non-public forum. See id. at 679. And third, the government may choose to open a non-public forum to speech activities, and in doing so the government creates a designated or limited public forum. Id. at 678.

Here, the pedestrian median strips are part of the public roadways and sidewalks that have historically been open to public expression. As defined by the ordinance, a pedestrian median strip is part of the pedestrian crosswalks regularly used by the public, and the presence of people within that space is expected and lawful, just as with other pedestrian spaces like sidewalks. Consequently, the ordinance regulates a traditional public forum.

Point Two (20%)

The ordinance can be credibly characterized as either content-neutral or content-based. On the one hand, it could be characterized as content-neutral because its application does not depend on the content or viewpoint of any expression occurring in a median strip. On the other hand, it could be characterized as content-based because the ordinance was arguably enacted because of disagreement with unpopular expression (i.e., solicitation that had occurred in pedestrian median strips).

Whether application of a municipal ordinance to expression violates the First Amendment's guarantee of free speech depends heavily on whether the ordinance is content-based or content-neutral. If the ordinance is content-based, a court will apply strict scrutiny, and application of the ordinance will likely be overturned. If the ordinance is content-neutral, a court will apply a form of intermediate scrutiny known as the time, place, and manner test that affords greater deference to the government.

A law is content-based if it "applies to particular speech because of the topic discussed or the idea or message expressed." Reed v. Town of Gilbert, 576 U.S. 155, 163 (2015). The Supreme Court has explained that a law may do so in two ways: (1) the face of the law regulates speech based on the subject matter, topic, or idea discussed or (2) "there is evidence that an impermissible purpose or justification underpins a facially content-neutral restriction." City of Austin v. Reagan Nat'l Advertising, 596 U.S. 61, 76 (2022). Here, the face of the ordinance does not mention speech of any kind, and so the ordinance would not be content-based under category (1).

The only argument that the ordinance is content-based would be under category (2), which applies to laws enacted "because of disagreement with the message" of certain speakers. See Reed, 576 U.S. at 163–64. Here, Town had received complaints that past solicitations made from the pedestrian median strips were "annoying and unwelcome." On the one hand, this could be interpreted as meaning that the message of the speech was unpopular or disfavored, which would be a content-based reaction to speech that had occurred in the median strips. On the other hand, Town's concern could be with the potential for distraction of motorists regardless of whether they agree with the message of the speaker, which would be content-neutral. Whether the ordinance is content-based under this category depends on which argument a court accepts for the ordinance's motivation. Because the ordinance can be credibly argued to be either content-based or content-neutral, an examinee should next discuss application of both the strict scrutiny test and the intermediate scrutiny time, place, and manner test.

Point Three (30%)

If the ordinance is deemed content-based, application of the ordinance to the man's conduct would likely fail strict scrutiny because the ordinance is not the least speech-restrictive means for promoting the government's interest in traffic safety.

If the ordinance is deemed content-based, it will likely fail strict scrutiny. Under strict scrutiny, Town bears the burden to show that the ordinance is narrowly tailored to further a compelling government interest. In this context, though, narrow tailoring requires that the challenged law be the least speech-restrictive alternative for achieving the government's purpose. See Ward, 491 U.S. at 799 n.6; Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 329 (1988). This version of narrow tailoring tolerates very little under- or over-inclusiveness.

As discussed below under Point Four, the ordinance was enacted to promote traffic safety. Although the Supreme Court has held that traffic safety is a substantial government interest under the time, place, and manner test, see McCullen v. Coakley, 573 U.S. 464 (2014) (accepting public safety as a substantial government interest in reviewing state law that restricted speech on public streets and sidewalks in front of abortion clinics), the Court has not yet embraced traffic safety as a compelling governmental interest but has only assumed it to be so. Reed, 576 U.S. at 171.

Ultimately, though, a court would decide this issue based on the narrow tailoring analysis. As discussed in Point Four, the ordinance is both under-inclusive and over-inclusive, and this lack of fit is likely fatal, unless Town can prove that the under- or over-inclusiveness is necessary. For example, Town would need evidence that the safety risk posed by people communicating with drivers from a sidewalk is significantly less than the risk posed by a person doing so from a pedestrian median strip. Similarly, Town would need to show that signs posted along a roadway pose a significantly lower traffic risk than signs held by persons in a pedestrian median strip. Since the question notes that Town had no evidence of the traffic safety threat posed by solicitation of money from pedestrian median strips, the ordinance is unlikely to survive strict scrutiny.

Point Four (30%)

There is a credible argument that application of the ordinance to the man is unconstitutional under the time, place, and manner test because the ordinance could be found to ban a substantial amount of speech that does not threaten the government's interest, and Town does not have evidence that the ordinance would be less effective if more narrowly tailored. If the ordinance is narrowly tailored, it is likely constitutional because it leaves open ample alternative channels of communication for speakers to communicate their message by posting signs in pedestrian median strips or holding signs while standing on the sidewalks.

Under intermediate scrutiny, which is also referred to as the time, place, and manner test, a regulation of speech is constitutional if it promotes a substantial government interest, is narrowly tailored to achieve that interest, and leaves open ample alternative channels of communication. In this case, the first requirement is easily met. The Supreme Court has held that traffic safety is a substantial government interest under the time, place, and manner test. McCullen, 573 U.S. 464.

The narrow tailoring element requires additional discussion. Under the time, place, and manner test, the Court has defined "narrow tailoring" with reference to two factors: (1) whether the challenged law "burden[s] substantially more speech than is necessary to further the government's legitimate interests" and (2) whether the "substantial government interest . . . would be achieved less effectively absent the regulation." Ward, 491 U.S. at 799.

The Court's opinion in McCullen indicates how these two factors apply to a free speech challenge. The Court first asks if there is evidence that the challenged law burdens substantially more speech than is necessary to achieve the government interest. McCullen, 573 U.S. at 490. If that is the case, then the government must put on evidence that the challenged law would be less effective if it restricted less speech. Id. at 495 ("To meet the requirement of narrow tailoring, the government must demonstrate that alternative measures that burden substantially less speech would fail to achieve the government's interests, not simply that the chosen route is easier."). If, however, the challenged law does not burden substantially more speech than necessary, the Court will defer to the government's judgment that the law would be less effective if more narrowly tailored. See Ward, 491 U.S. at 800.

Here, there is evidence that the ordinance burdens substantially more speech than necessary to achieve the government's purposes. The Town council's interest focuses on concerns posed by a distinctively interactive form of speech—solicitation of money from a person who is operating a motor vehicle on a public roadway. More passive forms of speech, such as merely holding a sign in view of passersby as the man did, arguably do not pose the same threat. By banning any communication from a pedestrian median strip, however, the ordinance bans anyone present from speaking regardless of whether they request or propose interaction with a motorist. Consequently, there is a credible argument that the ordinance bans substantially more speech than necessary to achieve the government's interest.

Town, then, may be required to show evidence that the ordinance would be less effective if it were narrowed to solicitations or other similar activities in the median. One way Town may do so is to offer evidence that it had previously tried legal approaches that restricted less speech, and that those approaches did not effectively address the traffic safety concerns. McCullen, 573 U.S. at 495. Here, there is no indication that Town first tried a narrower ordinance that was unsuccessful. Indeed, the facts state that Town did not have any evidence indicating whether or how this ordinance would affect traffic safety. And so, if the court concludes that the ordinance burdens substantially more speech than necessary, Town will not be able to carry its burden.

If the court concludes that the ordinance does not burden substantially more speech than necessary, it will defer to Town's judgment on the empirical question whether the ordinance would be less effective if more narrowly tailored. For example, Town could have concluded that a ban on solicitation of motorists would be difficult to enforce because law enforcement would need to make judgments about what a person was communicating from a pedestrian median strip. If Town receives judicial deference on this issue, it will not need evidence of this judgment to survive the narrow tailoring prong.

Last, the ordinance likely allows ample alternative means for communicating a speaker's message. Here, speakers may still communicate the same message by standing on sidewalks and other property adjacent to public roadways. The ordinance merely prohibits speech while in a pedestrian median strip. See Ward, 491 U.S. at 802 (noting that the challenged regulation "has no effect on the quantity or content of that expression"). Consequently, the ordinance likely leaves open ample alternative channels of speech.

TORTS (I.A.; II.A., E.1)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Is the collision between Alan's truck and Brenda's car the type of harm that the legislature likely sought to prevent, and is Brenda within the class of persons that the legislature likely sought to protect, when it enacted the school-bus stop-sign law?
- (2) Can Brenda recover for the tort of false imprisonment based on facts that establish that Alan engaged in conduct from which a fact-finder would likely infer that he intended to confine her?
- (3) Can the factual issue of foreseeability as it bears on the proximate cause of the patient's death be resolved in a summary-judgment proceeding?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Brenda will not succeed on a theory of negligence per se to establish that Alan breached the duty of care to prove liability for damaging her car because the damage is not likely the type of harm the legislature sought to prevent, and Brenda is not likely within the class of persons the legislature sought to protect, when it enacted the law prohibiting cars from passing school buses stopped to pick up and drop off passengers.

Brenda can establish Alan's civil liability based on his detaining her against her will, as the circumstances should allow Brenda to prove that Alan committed the common-law tort of false imprisonment by using words and engaging in conduct intended to cause Brenda to become and remain confined within fixed boundaries. Brenda confined herself to the restroom out of her reasonable fear that the confinement was necessary to avoid a battery. Although Alan never expressly stated that he intended Brenda to become or to remain confined inside the restroom, a fact-finder would almost certainly infer this intent from Alan's conduct and words. His dangerous and aggressive driving would cause any reasonable person in Brenda's shoes to believe that her self-confinement was necessary to prevent Alan from immediately physically harming her, and his threat to wait for her outside "all day" when he knew that she would not exit while he waited outside compels the finding that he intended that she continue her self-confinement.

The patient's family should not prevail in a motion for partial summary judgment seeking to establish Alan's liability on the wrongful-death claim because, although Alan has admitted that the patient would have survived had Alan not obstructed Brenda's attempt to reach the hospital, whether the patient's death was proximately caused by Alan's conduct will be a disputed issue of material fact, precluding a pretrial judgment as a matter of law.

Brenda will not succeed on a theory of negligence per se to establish that Alan breached the duty of care to prove liability for damaging her car because the damage is not likely the type of harm the legislature sought to prevent and Brenda is not within the class of person the legislature sought to protect when it enacted the law prohibiting cars from passing stopped school buses.

A negligence plaintiff can successfully rely on the theory of negligence per se only when the tortfeasor engaged in an unexcused violation of a statute, the legislature designed the statute to protect against the kind of injury that occurred, and the injured person is within the class of persons the legislature sought to protect. See Restatement (Third) of Torts: Liability for Physical and Emotional Harm § 14. Although the facts here do not state the legislative purpose behind the school-bus required-stop law, a court would reasonably infer the kind of harm the statute seeks to avoid and the class of persons it seeks to protect. It is self-evident that the kind of harm the statute is primarily designed to prevent is vehicle-pedestrian collisions. It is therefore similarly clear that the class of persons the statute is primarily designed to protect includes children who have exited school buses and children who are preparing to board school buses. The collision here between two vehicles passing a stopped school bus is not the kind of harm the statute seeks to prevent, and Brenda is not in the class of persons the statute seeks to protect. Brenda therefore cannot rely on a theory of negligence per se to establish Alan's liability for the damage to her car.

Point Two (30%)

Brenda can establish Alan's civil liability based on Alan's detaining her against her will, as the circumstances should allow her to prove that Alan committed the common-law tort of false imprisonment by using words and engaging in conduct intended to cause Brenda to become and remain confined within fixed boundaries.

Brenda can establish that Alan is civilly liable for common-law false imprisonment because the facts all but compel a finding that all three elements of the tort are met. The three elements of false imprisonment are an action "intending to confine [another] . . . within boundaries fixed" by the tortfeasor; circumstances under which the action results in the confinement; and consciousness of the confinement by the person allegedly confined. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 35. The intent element is critical because "the actor is not liable unless his act is done for the purpose of imposing confinement on the other" Id. comment h.

Here the circumstances establish that Alan engaged in multiple actions intended to cause Brenda's confinement in the fixed boundaries of the restroom. Confinement for the purposes of establishing liability for false imprisonment can result from threats or other forms of duress "where such duress is sufficient to make the consent given ineffective to bar the action." Id. § 40A. And liability can arise when the alleged tortfeasor acts "with knowledge that . . . confinement will, to a substantial certainty, result from" his actions. Id. § 35 comment h. Brenda entered the restroom of her own volition and locked herself inside only after Alan engaged in dangerous driving and an aggressive pursuit that essentially forced Brenda to lock herself inside based on her reasonable fear that self-confinement was necessary to avoid becoming the victim of an imminent physical battery. Although Alan did not order Brenda to enter the restroom or to remain there, his comment that he would be waiting for her outside "all day," under circumstances in which he knew that she would not exit while he waited there, would lead a fact-finder to conclude that he intended that Brenda would feel threatened and continue her self-confinement indefinitely.

The final two false-imprisonment elements are clearly established under these facts. Alan's threatening behavior in fact resulted in Brenda's confinement, and her statement that she would remain inside to avoid contact with Alan demonstrated that she was conscious of her confinement.

[NOTE: An answer that applies the tort of "intentional infliction of emotional distress" to Alan's behavior may deserve some credit. That tort, however, requires "severe" emotional distress.]

Point Three (40%)

The patient's family should not prevail in a motion for partial summary judgment seeking to establish Alan's liability on the family's wrongful-death claim because, although Alan has admitted that the patient would have survived had Alan not obstructed Brenda's attempt to leave the highway, under the circumstances presented, whether the patient's death was proximately caused by Alan's conduct will be a disputed issue of material fact precluding judgment as a matter of law.

The specific question presented here is not whether the family or Alan would prevail at trial on the family's wrongful-death claim, but whether the family can establish Alan's liability on that claim through partial summary judgment. The court may properly enter summary judgment only "if the movant shows that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a). Rule 56 places the burden first on the moving party to clearly establish the lack of a genuine issue of material fact and entitlement to judgment as a matter of law. Id.; see also Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322–23 (1986). "[S]ummary judgment will not lie . . . if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248 (1986). The court will base its decision on the undisputed evidence and will draw any reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. Id., at 255. For the following reasons, the family cannot meet its initial summary-judgment burden.

Alan admits to the conduct described, which establishes that his dangerous driving was a cause in fact of the patient's death because the patient likely would have lived if Brenda had operated on him, and Brenda would have arrived in time to perform the surgery but for Alan's driving conduct that prevented her from exiting the highway to reach the hospital. But to prevail on its wrongful-death claim, the family will have to prove more. The traditional elements of a negligence action are the existence of a legal duty, breach of that duty, proximate cause, and injury resulting in damages. TG&Y Stores v. Atchley, 414 So. 2d 912, 914 (Ala. 1982); Sanford v. Manternach, 601 N.W.2d 360, 370 (Iowa 1999); McMurray v. Sur. Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 348 S.E.2d 162, 164 (N.C. Ct. App. 1986); Hansen v. Washington Nat. Gas Co., 632 P.2d 504, 505 (Wash. 1981); Schmanski v. Church of St. Casimir of Wells, 67 N.W.2d 644, 646 (Minn. 1954). The issue of foreseeability bears on the elements of legal duty and proximate cause in this case. Although "[f]oreseeability, in the context of a legal duty, is a question of law" for the court to decide, Fu v. State, 643 N.W.2d 659, 661 (Neb. 2002), in the context of proximate cause, foreseeability is generally a question of fact for the jury. Id.; see also Florida Power & Light Co. v. Periera, 705 So. 2d 1359, 1361 (Fla. 1998); P.W. v. Children's Hosp. Colorado, 364 P.3d 891, 898 (Colo. 2016). And "foreseeability is the touchstone of proximate cause." P.W., 364 at 898, n. 7.

Here, Alan should succeed in avoiding partial summary judgment establishing his liability by emphasizing the factual issue of proximate cause and foreseeability.

Regardless of how the court decides the foreseeability question as it bears on the legal issue of whether Alan owed the patient a duty, the circumstances leave open the possibility that a fact-finder might conclude that the patient's death was not a reasonably foreseeable consequence of Alan's obstructive driving as it bears on the factual issue of proximate cause. The family would certainly argue to the court that the facts could support the conclusion that the patient's death was a foreseeable result of Alan's dangerous driving: because Alan believed that Brenda was a physician, and possibly on her way to provide some sort of medical care ("to bandage a scraped knee"), he knew or should have known that she could have been rushing toward the highway exit to attend to a medical emergency that required her urgent attention, and that negligently obstructing her from reaching her destination could prevent her from timely providing life-saving medical care. But this argument should fail to establish liability at the summary-judgment stage in the face of Alan's likely argument that, even after Alan prevented Brenda's exit, she continued her self-confinement for an unforeseeably lengthy period after he left the gas station, and it was not reasonably foreseeable that she would take time-consuming back roads to reach the hospital.

In any event, he will contend persuasively that deciding the issue of proximate cause in favor of his liability would require the court to inappropriately weigh multiple factual inferences favorable to the family, the party moving for summary judgment. Because the court must instead analyze summary judgment by drawing all reasonable inferences against the moving party rather than in its favor, the court here should leave the question of foreseeability and proximate cause for the jury after a trial. The court would therefore likely deny the family's motion for partial summary judgment.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

- (1) Can an action be removed to federal court where the state-court plaintiff is seeking damages less than the federal jurisdictional amount but the plaintiff's legal claim, if valid, would entitle the plaintiff to receive damages above the jurisdictional amount?
- (2) Can a federal court sitting in a state exercise jurisdiction over a defendant who has no connection to the state other than the fact that the defendant was served with process while temporarily present in the state?
- (3) Is venue in a removed action proper in the federal district court for the state in which the action was initially filed even if that federal court would not have had jurisdiction over the action if it had been initially filed in federal court?

DISCUSSION

Summary

A state case can be removed to federal court only if the federal court would have original jurisdiction over the case. Here, there is no federal question, so removal is possible only if the federal court would have diversity jurisdiction. Although Coach and Fran are diverse (citizens of different states), the federal $75,000 amount-in-controversy requirement is not met. Coach's complaint limits the damages sought to $74,999, and this limitation is binding under state law. As a result, the amount in controversy falls below the jurisdictional minimum, and the federal court should remand the case to state court.

Assuming that the federal court has subject-matter jurisdiction, it may properly exercise personal jurisdiction over Fran. The federal court sitting in State A is entitled to assert personal jurisdiction on the same bases as a State A state court of general jurisdiction. State A statutes allow the state courts to exercise personal jurisdiction over a person served with process while physically present in the state, and the Supreme Court of the United States has said that such jurisdiction is consistent with due process. Because Fran was served with process while visiting State A, the federal court in State A should not dismiss the case for lack of personal jurisdiction.

Assuming that the federal court has subject-matter and personal jurisdiction, it should deny Fran's motion to dismiss for improper venue. Because Fran removed the case to the federal district where the State A court is located, venue is proper under the federal removal statute.

Point One (60% total weight)

The case should be remanded to state court because the federal court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction over the case.

(a) Removal is proper only if the federal district court has original jurisdiction over the action. (10%)

A case that is filed in a state court may be removed to federal district court if "the district courts of the United States have original jurisdiction" over the action. 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a). Removal is to the "district court of the United States for the district and division embracing the place where such action is pending." Id.

Federal district courts have original jurisdiction over civil actions in two circumstances. First, they have original "federal question" jurisdiction over civil actions that assert a claim arising under federal law. See 28 U.S.C. § 1331. Second, they have original "diversity" jurisdiction over civil actions in which there is complete diversity between the plaintiffs and defendants in the action and the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000, exclusive of interest and costs. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332. Thus, for a case to be properly removed, the federal court must have either federal-question or diversity jurisdiction over the case.

(b) The federal district court does not have federal-question jurisdiction over the action because the complaint is based entirely on state law. (10%)

Here, there is no federal question in the case. The plaintiff's complaint presents a defamation claim based on State A and State H law. No federal question is raised by the complaint.

[NOTE: The fact that this is a defamation case, and that the defendant might therefore have a First Amendment free-speech defense of some sort, is irrelevant. Federal-question jurisdiction exists only if the federal question appears on the face of the well-pleaded complaint. Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149 (1908).]

(c) Although the parties are diverse, the federal district court does not have diversity jurisdiction because Coach limited her claim for damages to an amount lower than the federal jurisdictional amount for diversity cases. (40%)

Here, the plaintiff and the defendant are citizens of different states. Coach is a citizen of State A, where she is domiciled. Fran is a longtime domiciliary of State H, of which she is a citizen. So the diversity requirement is met. See Chicago & N.W. Ry. v. Ohle, 117 U.S. 123 (1886) (an individual is a citizen of the state in which the individual is domiciled).

However, Coach's complaint seeks damages of only $74,999, just below the jurisdictional amount. Coach has attached an affidavit to her complaint specifying that she will not seek damages in any greater amount, although she asserts that the law would entitle her to a greater amount of damages. State A allows her to make such a stipulation. The question is whether Coach can avoid removal to federal court by agreeing to limit her damages recovery even though she would be legally entitled to greater damages in the absence of such a stipulation.

In St. Paul Mercury Indemnity Co. v. Red Cab Co., 303 U.S. 283 (1938), the Supreme Court expressly acknowledged the right of a plaintiff to prevent removal by suing for less than the jurisdictional amount. The Court said,

[I]f [the plaintiff] does not desire to try his case in the federal court he may resort to the expedient of suing for less than the jurisdictional amount, and though he would be justly entitled to more, the defendant cannot remove.

303 U.S. at 294. Consistent with this dicta, the federal statute on removal procedure provides that "the sum demanded in good faith in the initial pleading shall be deemed to be the amount in controversy." 28 U.S.C. § 1446(c)(2). The defendant is allowed to prove a higher amount in controversy only if the "initial pleading seeks nonmonetary relief" or "State practice either does not permit demand for a specific sum or permits recovery . . . in excess of the sum demanded." 28 U.S.C. § 1446(c)(2)(A) & (B). However, in the absence of either of those circumstances, a plaintiff may avoid removal to federal court by making, in its initial pleading, an enforceable stipulation that the amount recovered will be limited to an amount below the federal jurisdictional amount. See Durbois v. Deutsche Bank National Trust Co., 37 F.4th 1053 (5th Cir. 2022). See generally Standard Fire Insurance v. Knowles, 568 U.S. 588, 595 (2013) (noting "that federal courts permit individual plaintiffs, who are the masters of their complaints, to avoid removal to federal court, and to obtain a remand to state court, by stipulating to amounts at issue that fall below the federal jurisdictional requirement.")

Here, the facts do not indicate either of the circumstances that would permit a defendant to prove a higher amount in controversy. First, Coach's complaint does not seek nonmonetary relief. Second, Coach has limited the damages she seeks to $74,999 and has stipulated in an affidavit attached to her complaint that she will not seek or accept a greater award. The facts further indicate that the limitation in the complaint and stipulation is enforceable under state law. In this circumstance, the federal court must respect Coach's choice to limit her damages and remand the case to state court for lack of federal subject-matter jurisdiction. Thus, the fact that Coach suffered losses of $130,000 is irrelevant. Cf. Dart Cherokee Basin Operating Co., LLC v. Owens, 574 U.S. 81 (2014) (where plaintiff has not made a binding limitation on damages, defendant's amount-in-controversy allegation in removal motion should be accepted if not challenged by plaintiff or if defendant establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount in controversy exceeds the jurisdictional threshold).

[NOTE: Federal courts will sometimes refuse to honor a plaintiff's stipulation that damages will be below the federal jurisdictional limit when such a stipulation is made in "bad faith." See Hamilton v. Mike Bloomberg 2020 Inc., 474 F. Supp. 3d 836 (N.D. Tex. 2020) (Hamilton's attempt to limit damages claim was in "bad faith" because demand in complaint was made "in contravention of the state law's pleading requirements."). However, a desire to avoid removal to federal court does not, in and of itself, demonstrate bad faith. There is "nothing wrong with a plaintiff's desire to litigate his claims in state court," even when accomplished by means of a stipulation limiting his damages designed to prevent removal to a federal forum. Durbois, supra, 37 F.4th at 1060. Accordingly, no credit should be given for discussion of a bad-faith stipulation.]

Point Two (30%)

Assuming that the court has subject-matter jurisdiction and the case is not remanded, the federal court would have personal jurisdiction over defendant Fran because she was served with process while she was knowingly and voluntarily physically present in State A. For that reason, the case should not be dismissed for lack of personal jurisdiction.

A federal court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant if the defendant is "subject to the jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction in the state where the district court is located." Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(k)(1)(A). Here, Fran was served with process in State A, and State A statutes provide that in-state service is sufficient grounds for a State A court to exercise personal jurisdiction over an out-of-state defendant. The question is therefore whether jurisdiction based solely upon in-state service is constitutional.

In Burnham v. Superior Court, 495 U.S. 604 (1990), the Supreme Court unequivocally upheld the constitutionality of personal jurisdiction over a person who is personally served by hand delivery with process while knowingly and voluntarily physically present in a state for a brief period of time. Jurisdiction on this basis is sometimes referred to as "tag" jurisdiction. "[J]urisdiction based on physical presence alone" satisfies due process, said the Court, simply because the exercise of jurisdiction on that basis "is one of the continuing traditions of our legal system." Id. at 619. No inquiry into fairness is needed for "a jurisdictional principle [that] is both firmly approved by tradition and still favored." Id. at 622.

In short, the federal court could exercise personal jurisdiction over Fran because Fran was personally served within the territory of State A, and State A authorizes the exercise of personal jurisdiction on that basis. Because Fran was knowingly and voluntarily in State A to attend a basketball game, personal service within the territory of State A satisfies the requirements of due process.

[NOTE: Removal of an action filed in state court to federal court "does not constitute a waiver [by defendant] of any right to object to lack of personal jurisdiction, but after removal the federal court takes up the case where the state court left off." Nationwide Eng'g & Control Sys., Inc. v. Thomas, 837 F.2d 345, 347–48 (8th Cir. 1988) (internal citation omitted). See 5C Charles Alan Wright & Arthur R. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1395 (3rd ed. 2019). Following removal, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure are applicable. Fed. R. Civ. P. 81(c)(1). Thus, Fran may properly move to dismiss the case for lack of personal jurisdiction. Danziger & De Llano LLP v. Morgan Verkamp LLC, 948 F.3d 124 (3rd Cir. 2020).]

Point Three (10%)

Assuming that the federal court has subject-matter and personal jurisdiction, and the case is not remanded, venue over the action is properly in the federal district court for State A because the removal statute authorizes removal only to that court.

The federal removal statute specifies venue for cases that are initially filed in state court and subsequently removed to federal court. Where a case is removed, removal must be to the "district court of the United States for the district and division embracing the place where such action is pending." 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a). See also 28 U.S.C. § 1446(a). Thus, because the action was initially filed in State A state court, venue is proper in the federal district court for the District of State A. See, e.g., Burlington Northern & Santa Fe Ry. Co. v. Herzog Services, Inc., 990 F. Supp. 503 (N.D. Texas 1998). Thus, the State A federal court should not dismiss the case for improper venue.

[NOTE: Examinees might discuss whether venue would have been proper if the case had been filed initially in State H federal court or whether the State A federal court should transfer the case to the State H federal court. Had Coach's action been filed initially in federal court, then the appropriate venue would have been a judicial district in which Fran (the defendant) resided or a judicial district in which "a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred." 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b)(1) & (2). Arguably, this rule would have required the action to be brought in State H, where Fran resides and where Fran made the allegedly defamatory comments. An examinee should not receive credit for discussing either of these points because the call of the question asks only whether the court to which the case was removed (State A federal court) has proper venue.]

ANALYSIS 5 – EVIDENCE

EVD (I.A.2; II.A.1, B.; V.B)

This analysis addresses all the legal and factual issues raised in the question. Note that any changes to the relevant law since this analysis was prepared may affect its substantive accuracy.

ANALYSIS

Legal Problems:

The admissibility of the following evidence:

- (1) Bank's original video recording of its lobby, counters, and tellers from April 18, 2024, in which David appears.
- (2) The testimony of Bank's investigator as to Customer's oral complaint.
- (3) The written report by the investigator, if the investigator is unable to recall details of the investigation or writing the report.

DISCUSSION

Summary

The video recording is relevant to show the scene of the alleged crime and the presence of David, the defendant, in Bank's lobby at the time of the crime. However, it is admissible only if the investigator is able to authenticate the recording by testifying that the video recording fairly and accurately depicts Bank's lobby, counters, and teller area on the day and time in question.

The testimony of Bank's investigator as to Customer's oral complaint is admissible. The complaint is relevant to establish that the money was impermissibly taken from Bank. It is admissible hearsay pursuant to either the present sense impression or excited utterance exception to the general prohibition on hearsay testimony.

The investigator's report can be used to refresh the investigator's recollection, but it is inadmissible unless David requests its admission.

Point One (30% total weight)

The video recording is highly relevant, and the trial court should admit it if the investigator is able to authenticate it.

The video is relevant. (10%)

The video recording is admissible (a) if relevant and (b) if a trial witness, such as the investigator, can properly authenticate it.

Only "[r]elevant evidence is admissible Irrelevant evidence is not admissible." Fed. R. Evid. 402. "Evidence is relevant if (a) it has any tendency to make a fact more or less probable than it would be without the evidence; and (b) the fact is of consequence in determining the action." Fed. R. Evid. 401. To prove David's guilt of the charge, the prosecution must establish (among other things) Bank as the victim of the crime, the date and time when the crime occurred, and David's participation in the crime. According to the facts, David denies being at Bank on the day in question. The video recording will show the lobby, counters, and tellers on April 18, 2024, as well as David's presence in Bank on that day during the alleged crime. The recording thus is relevant to show the location, day, and time of the crime charged and what allegedly occurred.

The video is admissible, subject to authentication by the investigator as showing the bank lobby at the time the check was cashed. (20%)

The requirement of authentication is a special form of the relevance requirement, see Fed. R. Evid. 901(a) Advisory Cmte. Note, and the video recording must be properly authenticated before it can be admitted. "To satisfy the requirement of authenticating or identifying an item of evidence, the proponent must produce evidence sufficient to support a finding that the item is what the proponent claims it to be." Fed. R. Evid. 901(a). Here, the prosecution will claim that the video recording portrays Bank's lobby on the date and time in question. Pursuant to Rule 901(b)(1), the prosecutor may authenticate the video recording by offering testimony from a witness with knowledge that the video recording is what it is claimed to be. Fed. R. Evid. 901(b)(1). The operator of the video recording equipment need not testify to sufficiently authenticate the item. United States v. Stephens, 202 F. Supp. 2d 1361, 1368 (N.D. Ga. 2002). Testimony by a witness with knowledge that the recording accurately represents the scene or activity depicted is sufficient. Christopher B. Mueller, Laird C. Kirkpatrick, And Liesa Richter, Evidence § 9:14—Photographs, Videotapes, X-rays (6th ed. 2018).

The question is whether the investigator, who was not present in the lobby at the date and time that the check was cashed, can provide sufficient evidence to authenticate the video as (1) a recording of the lobby and (2) at the specific date and time that the check was cashed. The facts show that the investigator accessed the original recording immediately after the complaint was made, which in turn was immediately after the bank withdrawal. The investigator also worked as a fraud investigator at Bank for 10 years in an office next to Bank's lobby and thus is presumably familiar with the bank's surveillance systems. Accordingly, the investigator should be able to testify with personal knowledge that the video fairly and accurately depicted the (1) Bank's lobby, counters, and teller area as they existed on April 18, 2024, and (2) more specifically, that the video recorded the time period immediately preceding the investigator's accessing it (i.e., the time period during which David was in the bank). Cf. U.S. v. Brewer, 915 F.3d 408, 417 (7th Cir. 2019) (eyewitness testimony of bank teller that video accurately depicted events of bank robbery was sufficient to authenticate). Authentication requires only a sufficiency showing, and the investigator need not be the operator of the video or have personally observed the lobby at the time. So long as the investigator can testify with personal knowledge that the video is a recording of the bank lobby from the time of the incident, the video should be admissible as properly authenticated.

[NOTE#1: Discussion of the original writing a/k/a best evidence rule is unnecessary for two reasons. First, as stated in the facts, the video recording is the original; therefore its admission satisfies the original writing rule. Fed. R. Evid. 1002. Second, in testimony, the investigator would be adopting the video recording to illustrate a place with which the investigator is familiar and of which he has personal knowledge (i.e., Bank's lobby), rather than testifying to the contents of the video recording, and the former does not invoke the original writing rule. See Fed. R. Evid. 1002 Advisory Cmte. Note.]

[NOTE #2: FRE 902(14) provides that certified data copied from an electronic device is self-authenticating, as long as the certification complies with the requirements of the business records rule. Here, the question is framed as the admission of the video recording via the investigator's testimony, and so discussion should focus on the investigator's ability to authenticate the video rather than certification or self-authentication.]

[NOTE #3: The investigator will not have to prove that the person who appears in the video is David, the defendant. It will be enough for the investigator to testify that the video accurately depicts what happened in Bank's lobby on the day in question. The jury will be entitled to judge for itself whether the person who appears in the video is David.]

Point Two (50%)

The trial court should admit the investigator's testimony as to Customer's oral complaint.

As noted in Point One, only relevant evidence is admissible, and evidence is relevant if "it has any tendency to make a fact of consequence more or less probable than it would be without the evidence." Fed. R. Evid. 401. Here, Customer's complaint is relevant to show that she did not authorize anyone, including David, to obtain $1,000 from her checking account on April 18, 2024, and therefore that David obtained money from Bank by means of false or fraudulent pretenses.

Customer's complaint should be deemed admissible hearsay. According to Rule 802, "[h]earsay is not admissible" subject to exception. Fed. R. Evid. 802. "Hearsay" is defined as "a statement that: (1) the declarant does not make while testifying at the current trial or hearing; and (2) a party offers in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted in the statement." Fed. R. Evid. 801(c). The declarant is "the person who made the statement" and a "statement" is "a person's oral assertion, written assertion, or nonverbal conduct, if the person intended it as an assertion." Fed. R. Evid. 801(a) & (b).

Here, Customer's oral complaint about the $1,000 withdrawal was made over the phone to the investigator, not in the current court proceeding. Customer's statement also is being offered for the truth of the assertion, i.e., to establish that the $1,000 was withdrawn without Customer's permission. Accordingly, Customer's complaint meets the definition of hearsay under the rules.

Although hearsay is generally inadmissible, it may be admitted regardless of whether the declarant is available as a witness if it satisfies an exception. Fed. R. Evid. 803. Here, for Customer's complaint to the investigator, one potentially applicable exception is for present sense impressions and another is for an excited utterance.

A present sense impression is "[a] statement describing or explaining an event or condition, made while or immediately after the declarant perceived it." Fed. R. Evid. 803(1). An excited utterance is "[a] statement relating to a startling event or condition, made while the declarant was under the stress of excitement that it caused." Fed. R. Evid. 803(2). These two exceptions significantly overlap; both require "spontaneity." Fed. R. Evid. 803 Advisory Cmte. Note to R. 803. "The most significant practical difference will lie in the time lapse allowable between event and statement." Id. Present sense impressions require a "substantial contemporaneity of event and statement" that "negative[s] the likelihood of deliberate or conscious misrepresentation." Id. A "slight lapse" in time is allowable; however, the amount of time lapse depends on the situation. Id.

Excited utterances depend upon the existence of "a condition of excitement which temporarily stills the capacity of reflection and produces utterances free of conscious fabrication." Id.

Here, either exception may apply. Customer called Bank to complain about an event, i.e., the unauthorized charge of $1,000, shortly after she was alerted to the transaction by her banking app. Because Customer made the call just after learning of the unauthorized charge, the complaint constitutes a present sense impression. However, if there has been more than a "slight" passage of time, then the court may conclude that the present sense impression exception is inapplicable. Even if the present sense impression exception does not apply, the excited utterance exception may apply. Here, Customer sounded frustrated and angry when lodging the complaint with the investigator. Her excited emotional state while speaking to the investigator was a result of the startling event, i.e., the unauthorized charge of $1,000. Thus, Customer's statement to the investigator may constitute an excited utterance. In sum, the trial court should determine that Customer's oral complaint is admissible hearsay}.

[NOTE: Although either exception on its own would likely overcome a hearsay objection to admission of this evidence, better answers will discuss both exceptions.

Point Three (20%)

The investigator's report, or any portion thereof, is inadmissible unless it is used to refresh the investigator's memory and David requests that it be admitted.

The investigator's report is hearsay if it is offered to prove the truth of the matters stated in the report because the report is an out-of-court statement. See Fed. R. Evid. 801(c). The call instructs the examinee to assume that the report does not fall within the business records exception to the hearsay rule. The question, therefore, is whether any other exception to the hearsay rule would apply to the investigator's report.

If the investigator testifies (as the question suggests he will) that he cannot remember writing the report, then the report will not fall within the recorded recollection hearsay exception; that exception requires that the author of the writing be able to testify that the report accurately reflects his knowledge at the time he wrote it. Fed. R. Evid. 803(5)(C). The investigator could not so testify if he does not recall writing the report at all.

However, a witness may use any writing to refresh the witness's memory while testifying. Fed. R. Evid. 612(a). Refreshing a witness's memory can be done even with a writing that is not admitted or admissible. Paul C. Giannelli, Understanding Evidence § 21.03 – Refreshment; Types of Writings (5th ed. 2018). When used in this way, a writing may be admitted if it is introduced by the opposing party for impeachment purposes but is not otherwise admissible unless some other evidence rule authorizes its admission. Fed. R. Evid. 612(b); Giannelli, supra § 21.05 – Admissibility.

Here, if the investigator genuinely cannot recall the investigation or writing the report, he may review the report in an effort to refresh his memory. Assuming that the investigator's memory about the investigation is refreshed, then the investigator may testify without relying on the report, but the investigator cannot read aloud from the report, see Giannelli, supra § 21.04 – Lack of Memory Requirement, and the report cannot be admitted as evidence. However, David will have the option to "introduce in evidence any portion that relates to the witness's testimony." Fed. R. Evid. 612(b).

If, after reviewing the report, the investigator recalls writing it and is able to testify that it accurately reflected his knowledge when it was written, then the report may be admissible as a recorded recollection.

- (2)(a) Does Shirley have an interest in the trust?
- (2)(b) Assuming that Shirley has an interest in the trust, how is that interest characterized under the Uniform Trust Code?
- (3) Assuming that Shirley has an interest in the trust, does she have any claim against the bank for making the imprudent investment?
- (4) Who has the legal authority to direct the doctor whether to remove Alice from the life-support system?

DISCUSSION

Summary

Under the Uniform Trust Code, if a trust instrument is silent regarding whether the trust is revocable or irrevocable, it is revocable. This rule applies here because Alice's trust was created after the jurisdiction adopted the Uniform Trust Code. Because Alice's trust is silent regarding revocability, the trust is revocable.

The trust provides that upon Alice's death, Shirley is entitled to the principal of the trust. Thus, she has an interest in the trust. Under the common law as incorporated by the Uniform Trust Code, Shirley's interest is characterized as a vested remainder subject to being divested.

Under the Uniform Trust Code, during Alice's lifetime the trustee's duties are owed exclusively to Alice. Therefore, Shirley has no claim against the trustee (the bank) for making an imprudent investment even though she has a remainder interest in the trust as a trust beneficiary.

Only John, the agent under Alice's health-care power of attorney, is legally entitled to make the decision whether to remove Alice from the life-support system.

Point One (25%)

Under the Uniform Trust Code, Alice's trust is revocable because she did not address revocability in the trust instrument.

Under the common law, if a trust instrument was silent regarding whether the trust was revocable or irrevocable, it was deemed irrevocable. Section 602(a) of the Uniform Trust Code rejects that rule and takes the position that unless the trust instrument expressly provides that it is irrevocable, the trust is revocable by the settlor.

Alice, the settlor, created her trust 6 years ago, and the governing jurisdiction's adoption of the Uniform Trust Code was 10 years ago. This is significant because the Uniform Trust Code applies section 602(a) only to a trust created after the enactment of the statute. UTC § 602(a). Since Alice's trust was created after enactment of the Uniform Trust Code, the statute's rule applies to her trust instrument. Because that document does not address revocability, the trust is deemed revocable under the Uniform Trust Code.

Point Two(a) (10%)

Shirley has an interest in the trust.

Shirley has an interest in the trust only if she meets the Uniform Trust Code's definition of a beneficiary. Under the Code, a beneficiary is a person that "has a present or future interest in a trust, vested or contingent." UTC § 103(3). Shirley meets this definition because under the trust's terms she is entitled to the trust's principal upon Alice's death.

Point Two(b) (10%)

Under the common law as incorporated by the Uniform Trust Code, Shirley has a vested remainder subject to being divested.

The Uniform Trust Code does not characterize the beneficial interest that Shirley has in the trust but leaves that matter to other state law. See UTC § 106 ("The common law of trusts . . . supplements this [Code], except to the extent modified by this [Code] . . ."). At the time Alice created the revocable trust and at the time Shirley contacted the bank trust officer regarding the trust's investment, the common law would characterize her interest in the trust as a vested remainder subject to being divested because that interest followed the end of Alice's interest for life and was subject to Alice's not having revoked the trust.

[NOTE: While Shirley's interest is characterized as a remainder under the Third Restatement of Property § 25.2 ("A future interest is a remainder if it was created in a transferee."), the Third Restatement's characterization has yet to be adopted by any state. An answer that mentions only that Shirley's interest is a remainder should not receive full credit.]

Point Three (35%)

Even though Shirley is a beneficiary of the trust, she has no claim against the bank for the imprudent investment because at the time it was made, no duties were owed to Shirley that were breached by the making of the investment.

Shirley is a remainder person of the trust. See Point Two(b). As such she is a beneficiary of the trust. UTC § 103(3). However, as noted in Point One, the trust is revocable. Under § 603(b) of the Uniform Trust Code, the duties of the trustee of a revocable trust "are owed exclusively to the settlor" if the settlor has the capacity to revoke the trust. No duties are owed to other beneficiaries of the trust. Thus, Shirley has no claim against the bank for its imprudent investment.

[NOTE: Even apart from § 603(b), there is a strong argument that Shirley has no claim against the bank for its imprudent investment of a trust asset given that Alice, the settlor of the trust, at a time when she was fully competent and knew that the investment was imprudent, approved the making of the investment. While the original trust instrument limited the trustee to "prudent investments," Alice's approval to invest in an imprudent investment was effectively an amendment of the trust, and a settlor who retains the power to revoke the trust also has the power to amend the trust. UTC § 602(a). See also Restatement (Third) Of Trusts § 63 cmt. g. (2003).]

Point Four (20%)

Only John, the agent under Alice's health-care power of attorney, is legally authorized to direct the doctor whether to remove Alice from the life-support system.

Health-care powers of attorney are authorized throughout the United States. These powers typically authorize the principal's named agent to make health-care decisions on the principal's behalf if the principal is unable to make a health-care decision for herself. See, e.g., Unif. Health-Care Decisions Act (2023) § 11 (providing a health-care power form that includes the clause: "I want the following person to make health-care decisions for me if I cannot make decisions for myself.") and § 18 (the power of an agent commences when the principal "lack[s] capacity to make a health-care decision....").

Here, Alice named John to act for her if she was unable to make a health-care decision for herself. The facts state that Alice's physician has determined that Alice is unable to make health-care decisions for herself, the precondition for the agent's authority to act. Thus John, not Shirley, has the legal authority to direct the doctor whether to remove Alice from the life-support system.

[NOTE: No credit should be given to an answer that discusses whether Alice should be removed from the life-support system. Such an answer is not responsive to the call, which asks only who has the legal authority to make that decision.]
